FRACTURING THE SILENCE ...

...it's a battle of wills.

In the world of medical and psychological thrillers, this collection of authors is unequalled. Thirteen thrillers—written by NY Times, Wall Street Journal, USA Today and Amazon bestsellers—load your Kindle with bold experience.

Medical malpractice, natural disaster, murderers and serial-killers, deviant minds on paths of destruction.

The truth cannot be hidden long.

It's a fight for survival.

These thrillers will keep you turning the pages until the end, and don't worry, the next book will be waiting to keep you entertained.

You'll love this anthology, because the authors are veterans of the craft and the price is a bargain for so many riveting stories.

Which book will you start with first?

In the Big Easy, down by the Vieux Carre...

...Jazz bands play as people die.

The higher the temperature, the hotter the crime.

Especially if the killer's insane.

Thorazine cocktails aren't a cure...

When the killer is brutal, deranged, and vicious.

Alex is saddened by a violent attack on one of her staff and when the violence escalates to become the order of the day, it become sticky...

In a world of politics, underworld, and voodoo, Alex experiences things she never expected as a hospital attorney. There are forces at play she never knew existed.

You'll love this psychological thriller, because it will take more than strong character to come out the other side, it will take brains and guts. Alex has both.

You won't be able to put down this psychological thriller because hundreds of people have told us just that. It'll be "just one more chapter" until you turn the last page and find you've been reading all night.... But don't worry, there's another book to follow.

"Holy Crap, Mary, Mother of God! What the hell is wrong with people? Are they crazy, stupid, or just nuts," hollered Jack Françoise to no one in particular, even though he was sure his rants could be heard through the bullpen of the 8th Police District. "Honest to God, two tourists with their throats torn out in the deepest, darkest part of the Quarter. What is wrong with these idiots? I don't even go in that part of the French Quarter. No one needs to go down there. No one in their right mind wants to go down there, not even NOPD's SWAT team in full combat gear. Holy Shit, can anybody be that stupid or that drunk?! I just don't get it."

Newly-minted New Orleans Police Commander, Jack Françoise, sat behind his massive, but deeply scarred, walnut desk at 334 Royal Street, glaring at two crime reports placed in his in-basket for review. A big, burly man who tended toward overweight, Jack looked distinguished in his commander uniform, and his polished medals matched the glint of silver in his hair. A man's man, Jack commanded the respect of almost everyone he met. He stared out of his tall office windows, already heating up in the August sun, but saw nothing. His attention returned to the crime sheets, and as he reached for his coffee cup, his administrative assistant and PR guy knocked at his doorframe.

"What's up, Jason? Did I wake everybody up yelling?"

Jason Aldridge grinned at his boss. "Well, maybe a few left over from the night beat, but they were due to go home anyway," Jason joked.

Jack shook his head. "Did you check out these murders in the Quarter last night? What the hell?"

"Yeah, pretty bad. Young people, too, from what I heard. Kind of similar to that woman they found in that abandoned warehouse near Canal over in the First District several years ago. By the way, the coroner's office just called, and they want you over there ASAP. It's about this new case, the one they are investigating in the Quarter now."

"Yeah, I just bet it is," Jack muttered sarcastically. "Who's working the scene in the Quarter? Think I'll go over there on my way to see the M.E."

"I think Bridges caught the case, but he's probably gone now. Don't know who the head of the forensic team is. I can check for you."

"Never mind, I don't care. If the M.E. calls back tell her I'm coming, but I'm stopping by the scene first."

"Will do, Capt'n! Whoops, Commander." Jason stumbled over his boss's title and smiled apologetically.

"Just call me Jack. Skip the title. I don't act like a commander anyway. Didn't even want to be one. I was and am happy in the trenches and on the street. But, as you know," Jack said wryly, "I never planned to leave them."

Jason nodded. "Yeah, I know that. I'm sure you'll always be a beat cop, no matter the title. You've never left the streets before, and you're too damned old and stubborn to start at this late date," Jason acknowledged, waving his boss out of the office. His heart swelled with pride, watching the big guy leave the 8th district office.

Jason loved being Jack's right hand man, a job he had just formally assumed several months ago when Jack had risen in the ranks. Jason had more respect for Jack Françoise than he'd ever had for any one man. Françoise could come across as a total police asshole, but deep inside, he was kind and generous and a true advocate for the citizens, particularly the victims of murder and violent crimes in New Orleans. Jack was also tenacious, bull-headed, and hard to work with, but Jason was used to this as well. Sometimes, Jack's dark moods surfaced when he reached a dead end in the crimes he sought to solve. In Jason's mind, Jack was a hero and always would be even though Jack would never claim fame or recognition for the cases he solved.

Jason smiled while considering the magical way Jack disappeared from press conferences and the media. He was sure Jack planned to keep it that way, even as a commander. He was as humble as he was caring and altruistic, and Jack flat out hated the press. Jason smiled to himself as he reflected on his years with Jack Françoise. An honorable man, Jason thought, closing the commander's door quietly as he left the office.

Jack hated the blast of August heat that momentarily blinded him while exiting the 8th District office. He jumped into his vintage police-retrofitted silver Cadillac parked in a no parking zone on the side of the building and headed down toward the Canal crime scene on Burgundy. He parked, illegally of course, at the corner of Toulouse, knowing that all NOPD in the area knew his car and would never ticket him. He trudged down toward the scene, wiping the sweat off his brow with a white linen handkerchief.

Jack, as hardened as he was to street scenes, turned his head away from a man with a needle in his arm and a guy lighting up his crack pipe while sitting in a doorway. He was convinced that neither man had seen the inside of a house or had a meal or shower in days. He quickly glanced inside a vacant, burned-out building on Canal, noting several other vagrants boldly smoking crack, not caring who or what could see them. The bottom of the barrel, the dregs of humanity, hung out in this part of the Vieux Carre. The commander hurried his pace toward the crime scene. He could see the yellow tape several blocks away and thought what a bitch it would be to climb back up the hill in this August heat. He hailed the CSI team's chief processing the scene.

"Yo, Vern, what's your ornery ass doing up so early in the morning?" Jack asked, slapping the forensic chief on the back. "I thought you were working nights!"

Detective Vernon Bridges stood up, turned, and faced Jack smiling broadly. "Why, Commander, what in the world are you doing down here in this hell hole so early? With your big promotion and all, I never expected you'd leave your air-conditioned office on Royal Street," Vern joshed, pumping the commander's hand.

Jack returned the grin, happy to see his old friend. "Vern, you know me better than that. I get the hell out of there every chance I get so I don't have to write reports and go to meetings. I hate all of those damned meetings." Jack shook his head and sighed. "These bureaucrats are crazy. They even meet to decide where to place the water fountains." Jack rolled his eyes, and Vern laughed heartily.

"Well, then, who writes the reports and goes to the meetings? Isn't that why you got the big pay raise?" Vern teased his old buddy.

"Jason goes. He likes meetings and, as my assistant, it's his job to make me happy. So, he goes to the meetings and writes the reports, and that makes me happy. Besides, he's glad to get me out of there so he can do his own thing. So, what do we have here?" Françoise questioned, gesturing toward the crime scene.

Vern pointed to the two chalk-etched bodies on the ground and groaned. "The meat wagon took the bodies away an hour or so ago. Two kids, probably late teens or early twenties. Most likely tourists. They were pretty tatted up, lots of body piercings. Looked Goth, if you ask me, but then what the hell do I know? Black clothes, black hair, black nail polish, and lipstick on the female vic, lots of metal."

Françoise shook his head. "Geez, not again. The report said their throats were torn out, sort of like an animal had attacked them. Anything else?"

Vern searched out his digital camera and flipped to a couple of shots. "They also had their wrists slit."

"Not much blood around here," Jack said. "Has anyone hosed down the streets? Had city maintenance been through here before they were found?"

"No, I don't think so, although they often come through before dawn. We waved off one truck when we got here a little after five."

"Who called it in?" Jack asked.

"Anonymous. Someone dialed 911," Vern said, shrugging his shoulders. "Figures, doesn't it? Probably the sick SOB that did it. I got a funny feeling that he's sitting somewhere close, watching us work the scene. Been thinking that all morning," Vern ended, looking around the area at the rundown buildings and dark alleys.

"Could be. It's happened before. Any possibility they could have been killed somewhere else and dropped here? Any witnesses?"

"Shit, Françoise, you think we got a fairy godmother hanging out down here in no man's land? Nobody saw anything, nobody heard anything, and, the truth is, everybody we've seen is smoking a crack pipe, shooting up, or is drunk or drugged out of their mind."

"Yeah, got'cha. Figures. Get the troops to canvass the neighborhood. You may get lucky. Keep me posted. I am off to the coroner's office. The M.E. sent for me to talk about these two vics."

"Will do. See you, Jack. Hey, by the way, looks like the male may have been upside down on that wrought-iron fence at one point. See the blood on the concrete? Stay out of trouble and meetings," Vern joked as he turned back to the scene.

"Upside down, what the hell?" Jack muttered to himself as he began his hike back to his car. "Damn, it's hotter than the gates of hell already."

When Jack reached his car, he was sweating like a pig. He opened the door of his silver Cadillac and sat down, relishing the plush seats. He turned the AC on full blast, aimed all the vents toward himself, and sat there for a good three minutes taking pleasure in the cold air. Finally, he headed the short distance to the M.E.'s office on Rampart, praying for a decent parking place. He spied one. Bingo! It looked promising as he viewed the street parking. And the parking spot was legal. The day was looking a bit brighter as he slid into the metered spot. Of course, he would never put money in the meter.

Jack squinted from the fluorescent lights as he entered the temporary administrative offices of New Orleans Forensic Center. He was overcome by the smell of disinfectant and bleach. He high-fived the guard at the desk, signed-in, and continued down the back hall to the stark white autopsy room and morgue.

The NOLA Coroner's Office had been under considerable strain lately due to bad publicity in the media. The Times Picayune had run a whole series of articles about screw-ups at the coroner's office. The stories had focused on staff losing DNA evidence, filing incomplete reports, and misinterpreting autopsy findings that had never existed. Worst of all, the office had been accused of selling body parts. It was rumored the coroner had made thousands of dollars selling livers, corneas, and bone marrow. These accusations were providing a field day for defense lawyers. Jack clenched his jaw and gritted his teeth just thinking about it. Damn the liberal press!

The coroner's office employees, like most state offices in the many parts of the nation, were underpaid, understaffed, and under appreciated by most people who crossed their thresholds. The NOLA staff was demoralized, and the office had experienced lots of turnover when, in fact, it was also home to some really fantastic forensic pathologists, dentists, and physicians. They were probably some of the best in the country, although you can bet the Times Picayune hadn't reported that little detail. He cursed the newspapers again under his breath.

The autopsy room was busy. Three physicians were autopsying recent victims, but he didn't see his favorite medical examiner. Nor did he find his two stiffs from this morning — at least, he didn't think he did, since the victims on the tables all looked pretty old.

"Yo, Fred," he hailed a morgue tech. "You seen Dr. Jeanfreau?"

"Yeah, she's in her office. Straight back, Commander." Fred gestured, giving the commander a big grin. Fred was a favorite of Jack Françoise because he always knew what was going on, never played dumb, and wasn't lazy, all traits which put Fred on his way to meeting most of Jack's criteria for earning praise.

"Thanks, man," Jack said, starting back down the hall, noticing the decrepit condition of the offices. Unlike the bright autopsy room, the temporary offices of the coroner were pretty shabby. Jack eyed the faded, dirty carpet as he wandered down the hall toward Maddy's office. He wondered when they were moving into their new building, although he hated the thought of them leaving his police district. It had been convenient having them so close. Now he'd probably have to hit I-10 to get there. What a pain. Traffic was always bad going out of New Orleans. As a matter of fact, traffic in New Orleans was always awful, and he didn't know all of the illegal parking spots in that part of town.

Maddy's door was partially open. Since she wasn't dictating, Jack decided to knock and interrupt her.

"Yo, Maddy, you rang?"

Dr. Madeline Jeanfreau, Assistant Medical Examiner, stood and walked around her desk to greet Jack. She was a tiny woman. Even with high heels, she was only a little over five feet tall. She hugged Jack and kissed him on the cheek. Jack returned the hug.

"What the hell, Commander? You get promoted, have a party, and don't even invite your favorite M.E.? How do you expect to keep getting special treatment from me or my office?" the diminutive Dr. Jeanfreau queried, as she smiled and shook her short, highlighted hair.

"That wasn't a party, it was just a bureaucratic BS hour. I didn't want to go, and you would have hated it. Think of who you would have had to hobnob with for an hour, all the while getting nothing but punch and cookies. It was grueling."

"Well, you owe me lunch then and it's going to cost you a bunch... and drinks as well," Maddy insisted, giving Jack a grin. "Soon! I want my lunch soon."

"Anytime, Maddy. You're the busy one. You know I just sit around and eat chocolate éclairs all day," Jack commented sarcastically. "What's up? Jason said you wanted to see me."

"Yeah, about those two dead kids that came in a couple of hours ago. Have you got any ID or information on them?"

"No, nothing yet. I just talked to Bridges, the detective who caught the case. We're still looking for witnesses. There was no ID found with the bodies. The detective said they looked Goth and were tatted up. Not much blood at the scene, though probably enough for DNA. Why?"

Maddy shook her head and said, "It's pretty strange. We haven't finished the autopsies yet, but we started collecting body fluids when they first came in, before we put them in the chiller."

"Yeah, so? That's pretty normal, right?"

"Yes, it is," Maddy replied, looking straight at Jack. "Problem is, they didn't have any."

"Didn't have any what? Maddy, I am not getting this. What are you telling me? The stiffs didn't have any fluids?"

"That's right, Jack. They didn't have any blood. It's likely the C.O.D. will be death by exsanguination." Maddy stared at Jack.

Jack's shoulders slumped and stared back at his friend. He felt the fear crawling out of his pores. Maybe not fear, just uncertainty perhaps? What The Fuck! Not again! Please, not again, he thought to himself. Their eyes locked, each reading the meaning on the other's face.

Maddy finally broke the silence. "Yeah, Jack. Here we go again. Just like 2009, 1984, and 1933."

Jack was suddenly overcome with fatigue. He shook his head. The day really wasn't getting better after all. "Well, keep me in the loop. Hopefully, these are the only two. We'll know more when we ID them." His voice sounded worn and tired.

"If you ever do ID them," Maddy replied. "Remember, we never had an ID for the case in 2009. I'll handle the autopsies personally. There could be another cause of death, but it's unlikely with the two of them and the fact that they were young and healthy."

"Yeah, I know," Jack replied, while checking a text message that had just come in. "I've got to go. I just got a 911 from CCMC. I hope there's nothing major gone wrong over there." He groaned, hugged Maddy, and left her office. But he knew better. He knew something bad had happened. Whenever he got called to Crescent City Medical Center, it was always something bad.

"Oh, Jack," Maddy called after him, "the vics had a receipt on them for $116. From Howl."

Jack turned around, looked at her, and shook his head. "Great, this day just keeps getting better," he said sarcastically.

It was a little after midnight and Angie Richelieu was just finishing her nursing shift report when the red light went on in the corner of the nursing station at Crescent City Psychiatric Pavilion, signaling an All Staff Alert. "Damn!" she muttered under her breath. Flashing red meant all hell had broken out somewhere on the unit. Sadly, she knew what that meant for her and picking her daughter up on time. Her shift had ended at 11, but paperwork had taken her an hour after that. Now who knew when she would get out of there?

Cursing under her breath, she unlocked a small metal cabinet and took out a syringe filled with Vitamin G. She laughed a bit as she thought about the Vitamin G — a nickname for Geodon. A powerful anti-psychotic agent, it could settle down a horse almost immediately. G for goodnight! She placed the syringe in the pocket of her blue uniform top and cautiously opened the security door that led onto the Psych unit. Never knew who was hanging around, just waiting to get into the office.

The coast was clear, and Angie saw everybody heading toward the east corridor. She heard an angry "Get the hell off of me! I'm a policeman!" coming from that hallway. Big Jim! she thought to herself.

She was surprised and not surprised at the same time. James McMurdie, the former NOPD cop, had been a model patient up until now, so she was surprised that he was involved. She was not surprised because she had almost seen something coming earlier in the evening.

It had been a great shift on the unit until that new administrator, Lester What's-his-name, had shown up. He wasn't even a real employee. Don Montgomery, the CEO, had contracted with him to run the Psych Pavilion. Lester was weird, just as weird as some of the patients. The patients had been quiet until he came onto the unit. Once the patients saw him, a sort of agitation had set in like a wolf walking into a field of tasty sheep.

Plus, he was creepy. Angie shook off a chill when she thought about the way he'd looked at her. He was gross and struck her as a real leech. He'd stayed most of the evening on the unit. He was working in his office between the general psych and the prison units when he wasn't on the units talking with the patients. She remembered the other nurses saying how inappropriate it was that he talked so much with the patients. He'd spent a lot of time talking with Jim in the day room. A lot of time.

Angie hurried past the shuffling patients, and when she turned the corner and looked down the corridor, she saw a sight that was both tragic and comical. Jason, the lone security guard, whose best asset was his enormous weight, was lying on top of Jim in the hallway. Ben, the orderly, had control of Jim's right arm and Amy, a petite Asian-American patient care assistant, was trying to control his left arm. Amy was wrapped around the arm like a python while he threw her up and down as if she were weightless and he tireless. Amy grunted each time Jim slammed her onto the dirty green tile floor.

Ben looked up as Angie ran down the hallway. "Hurry up! He's beating the hell out of Amy!"

Angie looked to Jim's left arm where Amy was clinging like a tired squirrel to a tree trunk and saw that Jim's sleeve had ripped at the shoulder, exposing his taut deltoid muscle. Without hesitating, she sat down on top of Amy. Mercifully, their combined weight kept the flailing left arm pinned to the floor as Angie plunged the needle into the deltoid muscle and pushed the Vitamin G into Jim's body. She withdrew the needle and waited.

As she sat perched on Amy and the softening arm, Angie thought about what a joke the Psychiatric Pavilion was. The "Pavilion" was really an old three-story storage warehouse that CCMC had hastily renovated into three psychiatric units about eight years ago when psychiatric and substance abuse services had actually been moneymakers for the hospital. Now they weren't and the building had been sadly neglected. It was beginning to have the look of a "blighted" building that Angie remembered from her community health class at LSU where she had recently received her Bachelor's degree in nursing. Fat lot of good that did me, she mused.

But Angie knew in her heart that her degree did matter. She chose to work at the Pavilion where the salary was at least fifty percent more than the medical units because the patients were so sick, scary, and dangerous. The Pavilion was actually three nursing units. Pavilion I was now the prison unit and housed some of the most dangerous, criminally insane inmates from the Deep South. Pavilion II was now general psychiatry where chronically psychotic patients were committed by temporary detaining orders. They were kept there "until they promised not to try to kill themselves or others again." Angie thought it was criminal that these sick patients were generally discharged in two days. Jim was one of the exceptions. Pavilion III was the substance abuse unit where patients were detoxed and "cured" in three days, and then discharged. The absolute worst was the CCMC Pavilion management. Don Montgomery, the CEO of CCMC, had contracted with the state hospital over in Mandeville to take their forensic psychiatric patients several years ago when a public outrage from the good citizens of Mandeville had succeeded and the hospital closed. Even though CCMC received a premium for housing and caring for the forensic patients, none of the money went back into the safety and security of staff and patients at CCMC. Angie shuddered and felt a chill when she thought about the patients she'd worked with over the past year. Some of them had nearly frightened her to death. She had thought Jim was one of the safe ones —until now.

While plunging the needle into Jim's shoulder, she had made the mistake of looking into his eyes. The eyes were there, but Jim wasn't. It was as if he were somewhere else. He hadn't recognized her. Recognition was the basis of human interaction and is what separated friend from foe. Those empty eyes terrified her.

"What set him off tonight?" Angie asked Ben as she came back to the present. "He was one of the good ones — I thought."

"Louis and Jim were playing Battleship in the day room. Louis won and Jim said he was cheating. It was so strange. Normally Jim didn't care if he won or lost. Not this time. Next thing, Jim said Louis was sleeping with his wife. Crazy! Louis hasn't had a hard-on in ten years. Next thing, Jim lunged at Louis and missed, and Louis ran into the hallway yelling. Jim followed with murder in his eyes. Louis ducked under Jason's arm and Jim ran smack into that arm. Knocked him down and Jason got on top of him. I came out of the day room and jumped on Jim's arm."

"Thanks, Louis. Many thanks to you, Jason. And Amy — what you did was above the call of duty. I think you're going to be pretty sore. If you need to call off for your next shift, I'll vouch for you," Angie said as she looked at the poor battered Asian-American woman.

"Thank you, Miss Angie," replied Amy in broken English.

"Okay, let's get a stretcher and get Jim into the seclusion room. I've got to go back to the office and write up the report for this incident." Angie got up and hurried back to the office, carrying the capped syringe with her to deposit in the Sharps Container.

It was after two a.m. when Angie finally stood in front of the first of two locked metal exit doors. This one bore the scars of countless chair and table strikes. The institutional grey paint was scratched, and the graffiti had not been washed off for a week. She fumbled with her keys, finally got the key in the lock, and urged the heavy tumbler to turn. "Damn," she cursed, glancing at her watch and noting the time. She wished she had called the childcare center in the main hospital to tell them how late she would be picking up Jessica. Oh my God, I'm three hours late, she thought. They're going to kill me over there. She felt her pulse race with anxiety as she considered how upset her sixteen-month-old daughter was going to be when she woke her up to take her home.

I've got to get a new job, she thought. This psych unit is killing me. She closed the door and heard the reassuring click as it locked. She walked down the short hallway to the second locked door. This one only bore a couple scars, but they were deep. She didn't remember who it was or when, but one of the patients had followed a staff member through the first door with a broken off chair leg in hand. Most of the blows had landed on the unlucky staff member. A few had landed on the door. The door had survived — the staff member had not.

I never get off on time, she thought. She glanced behind her just once to make sure nobody was in there with her, then she unlocked the second door. Once through that door, there was a long hallway, then an exit door with a push bar. The second door closed behind her and she made sure it was locked before she walked down the long hallway. Boy, it's dark out there, she thought, peering through the glass windows of the hallway. Sensing freedom, she pushed on the bar to open the door to the outside. The elation was short-lived.

The heat smacked Angie in the face as she walked into the August night. The air was close and heavy. A crimson-tinged bolt of lightning highlighted the sky for an instant then things went dark again. Thunderstorms, she thought. I've got to get home soon. Jessica is scared of thunderstorms and she will freak out if it happens in the car. She walked quickly down the darkened path toward the parking lot. She looked around and told herself she was alone. It's pretty spooky out here, she thought. For a moment, she considered calling security, and then she remembered that it would take at least thirty minutes for the guard to get over to the Pavilion. Besides, if he were busy, it could be twice that time.

With the cutbacks heralding the new health care act, there was only one security guard on the night shift now. There used to be three or more guards — even on weekends, and now there was only one roaming guard, and one — Jason — in the forensic psych unit where Angie worked. After all, it is New Orleans and even post Katrina, the crime rates were startling.

Angie continued to reflect on the Pavilion as she walked to her car. Now psychiatry was a money-loser, a liability to the bottom line — and CCMC, a world-class hospital, wasn't about to spend large sums of money to safeguard patients or staff. Managed care payment systems made it almost impossible for you to be crazy, have a breakdown, or recover from prescription or street drug abuse or alcohol. Reimbursement had all but disappeared and with health reform on the horizon, it would only get worse. The mental health system in the U.S. was sadly and severely broken, irretrievably so, perhaps. In fact, with everyone getting care under the new reformed system, it was predicted that mental health care would increase steadily with shorter-term admissions.

Angie shook her head when she considered just how awful the mental health system was in the U.S. Depressed, deranged, and addicted psychiatric patients could no longer come in for a few weeks of therapy, get their meds regulated, have a few art classes, and play some board games to learn to control their anger. Why, just last week they had discharged a newly diagnosed Bipolar II female patient who had attempted suicide and been in a coma for ten days with an aspiration pneumonia. She only stayed on the psych unit for two days because the patient promised, "I'll never do it again. I don't know what came over me." Of course, her insurance didn't want to pay either, but the hospital would have been ethically bound to keep her if she had asked to stay. In Angie's mind, that bordered on gross negligence. Suppose that woman went home and "offed" herself with her small children in the home? Worse still, suppose in her psychosis, she killed herself and her family? It had happened before. What safeguards had been put in place? Oh, I forgot, Angie admonished herself. She had two days of counseling and three days of Lithium. At least that's what the attending shrink had told Angie when she questioned the discharge. That should do it. Yeah, sure, she thought. She was disgusted with the entire U.S. mental health system. How in the world could anyone get better in only days? These poor, mentally sick, often physically ill patients were discharged back on the streets of NOLA, or even to their homes, with no regulated medicines or skills to fight back against the demons that endlessly plagued their minds.

Her walk in the black night seemed endless. Even this late, the southern air was stifling and viscous. She was sweating, but she felt cold on the inside. Angie continued to think about the dangerous patient population at the Pavilion. Many of CCMC's psychiatric admissions were initiated at the hands of the New Orleans Police and the local magistrate who had them committed after they had been picked up for a crime or some sort of outburst. Angie quivered again when she thought of some of the deeply psychotic patients trying to live on their own. They also had to medicate several of the most violent patients prior to bedtime. Angie had doled out six Thorazine Slurpees like they were health food drinks, but even then, the brutality was awful. She thought about it and then deliberately pushed it from her mind.

When she was honest, Angie admitted to herself that she hated working in psychiatry. She hated it because she was afraid. And she knew the patients knew. It was almost as if they could smell it on her. She could see the recognition in their eyes when they realized it. They seemed to give her a secret smile. Many of their eyes seemed to have an evil glint. Besides, on the critical care units or in the emergency room, you could predict physiological changes in patients. You knew if a patient was going to "go bad" and have a heart attack or throw an embolus. You knew what to expect. But, in psych? You just couldn't tell. You couldn't anticipate the interworking and short circuitry in the minds of the profanely and criminally insane. They'd go off at the drop of a hat over nothing. You could hand them their fork the wrong way and they'd come after you. It was frightening. Many of the patients were violent criminals, who had committed heinous crimes, yet CCMC cared for them, and she didn't mind caring for them. She just wanted to have enough staff to work in a safe place.

Angie continued her musings on the way to her car. Her background was critical care and emergency department but there'd been an opening on the psych unit where she could work just weekends and get paid for full time. This was ideal in many ways as it allowed her time with Jessica. She could be the kind of wife her husband wanted — at least most of the time. Besides, the money was good. Everybody at CCMC knew the Psychiatric Pavilion was the armpit of the hospital and that nurses were paid a premium to work there because it was dangerous. The Pavilion was also isolated, turbulent, and chronically understaffed. Usually Angie didn't mind so much. But the past three nights had been particularly stressful for her, more so than usual. She had been on a different unit each night, and besides, Jessica had a cold and she always felt bad leaving her baby in daycare when she was sick. Her Catholic guilt kicked in every time.

It was darker than the blackest of nights, as an ominous feeling of dread hung thick in the night air. Thunderstorms earlier in the evening had created a mass of low, overhanging clouds that completely obliterated the moon. Suddenly, Angie felt a chill come over her. She looked over her shoulder as a quiver ran up her spine. Her legs tingled. Did she hear someone breathing? She strained her ears. The hum of the cicadas and other night insects was deafening. Angie picked up her step, making a pact with herself never to walk to the parking lot alone again. Not ever. It was scary and unsafe. What in the world was wrong with her? Why had she made such a reckless decision? After another minute or so, she heard another noise. It sounded like a set of keys hitting the pavement or, perhaps, like metal hitting metal, she thought. Then, she heard a cough and a sigh of what seemed like satisfaction.

Angie's autonomic nervous system kicked in. Fight or flight! She started running for her life but was no match for her assailant. He quickly overtook her, grabbed her by the hair, stuck a rag in her mouth, and pulled her over into a crop of trees to the right of the road. Her attacker seemed huge and had a large scarf tied over his face. His head was covered with a hat. Angie looked into her attacker's face as he leered over her. Her eyes widened in disbelief when they adjusted to the darkness. She knew this man! Her heart was firing erratically, and she was dizzy and weak with fear. Her assailant looked at her and laughed. She saw a large metal spike in his hand. It looked like a huge nail. Terror raced through her heart.

"So, you recognize me, you little slut bitch. We can't have that now, can we?" Her assailant spat the words at her.

Angie was paralyzed with fear. Her hands were pinned down, and her assailant's knee was in between her legs. Her captor outweighed her and was strong. She couldn't move, but struggled against him anyway, trying to overcome his strength.

He let one of her hands go for a second while he pushed one of the metal spikes into the soft ground.

Angie's hand ripped the hat off her assailant's head, and she dug her nails into his hair, pulling as much hair out as she could. She had wanted to poke out his eyes but had missed.

"You little bitch. I could kill you for that! How dare you touch me. You are one of them." The man slapped her, dislocating her jaw.

Angie felt the bone pop near her ear. The pain was overwhelming, and she started to gag. This further enraged her captor and he slammed her face into the dirt, ripping off her uniform pants. His intent was clear, but all Angie could do was lie there and focus on the smell of the rotting vegetation on the side of the road. She tried to detach herself from her surroundings. It didn't work.

She heard him grunting while he pushed three more stakes into the ground, singing quietly to himself as he moved methodically through his tasks, clearing old leaves and trash out of his way and away from her. It was like he was cleaning house. For a moment, she thought he had forgotten about her and she felt a bit of hope. But it was far-fetched. He turned to her, smiled sweetly, and bit her on her shoulder. Angie screamed, and then her attacker hit her in the head with a piece of metal pipe.

Angie felt the searing pain rip through her head and down into her neck and shoulders with the first blow. The second blow didn't seem to hurt so much. Her last conscious thought was how pretty the twinkling lights looked in the intensive care unit in the main hospital building. She could see them clearly from where she was, and she wished she were working a double shift up there where everything was predictable, where the patients were harmless and appreciative. Then, finally, blessedly, she lost consciousness.

“Oh, no, no... no... oh, no... it can't be. It just can't be. This has to be a joke and it isn't funny. Stop telling me these things. Angie's at home right now taking care of the baby. She worked last night, she only works on the weekends. Today is Monday," Bridgett insisted.

A short silence followed as Bridgett continued to listen to the voice on the other end of the phone. Her voice was confused, skeptical as she responded, "You've got to be kidding me. This is wrong, wrong, WRONG! It's not funny!" Bridgett's voice reached a fevered pitch as she continued to argue with the person on the other end of the phone for playing games with her about her sister. Finally, she slammed the phone down and marched into Alex's office, all legs, high heels, and long, blonde hair.

Alex, the legal counsel for Crescent City Medical Center, looked up from her desk, startled to see her normally good-natured, fun-loving secretary glowering at her, full of rage. Bridgett could best be described as a blonde bombshell. She was tall and beautiful. She wore bright colors and survived a full day in the highest stiletto heels Alex had ever seen.

Bridgett's big blue eyes flashed anger, and her voice was clipped as she addressed her boss. "I'm so mad, in fact, I'm pissed. Somebody from the E.D. just called and told me Angie is all beaten up and a patient there. It really isn't funny and it's a sick joke. I know Angie's at home taking care of Jessica." Bridgett glanced down at her watch and added, "Besides, it's 10:00 in the morning, and she worked last night over at the Pavilion. I know, because I talked to her."

Alex stared at Bridgett, confused by the conversation. "Who called you, Bridge?" Alex asked, her voice soft and concerned.

"I've no clue. I didn't hear their name. I'm sure it's a mistake, but I am still pissed because they got the wrong person. They need to be more careful over there. Besides, I'm too busy for this stuff today. I love to have fun and cut-up, but not about sad stuff. This just isn't funny. It pisses me off," Bridgett fumed, her blue eyes stormy with anger.

Alex and Bridgett heard a knock in the outer office and stared as the door to Alex's private office slowly opened. Crossing the threshold into her office were Dr. Monique Desmonde, the chief of psychiatry at CCMC, Commander Jack Françoise of the New Orleans Police Department, and Alex's old nemesis, Bette Farve, the chief nursing executive at CCMC.

Alex felt a cold, numbing twinge in the pit of her stomach, and the hair on her arms began to rise. She knew something was very wrong and surmised what was coming next.

Dr. Desmonde gave Alex a hard look, shook her head negatively and then turned her attention to Bridgett.

Jack moved into a position behind Bridgett and gently directed her toward the elegant sofa grouping in Alex's office.

Alex felt as though she were watching a perfectly choreographed production.

Bette Farve stood uselessly to the side of the group for a moment, studying her bright red manicure, and then took a seat in a Queen Anne chair.

Alex's heart was thudding as Monique motioned for her to join them on the sofa.

Bridgett seemed transfixed, unable to talk. She looked like a beautiful Barbie doll.

Dr. Desmonde began slowly, "Bridgett, I'm afraid I've some bad news for you."

Bridgett's eyes were blank as she stared at Monique, a beautifully groomed, dark-haired woman in her forties.

Dr. Desmonde spoke gently. "Bridge, can you hear me? We must talk, now."

Bridgett nodded her head slowly.

Alex could feel fear and uncertainty crawling up her spine. Her knees began to shake, and her heart was pounding madly. It was the same feeling she always had when something bad had happened. Alex felt her knees jerking so badly that she was sure they would cause her feet to jump out of her 4-inch heels.

Jack touched her knee, realizing Alex's discomfort and offering support.

Alex gave the police commander a small, tight smile.

Dr. Desmonde continued, her voice soft, her eyes meeting Bridgett's straight on. "Angie worked yesterday, Bridgett. She worked the 11a.m. to 11 p.m. shift on the psych unit."

Bridgett interrupted Dr. Desmonde. "Yeah, yeah, I know. I tried to call her last night. I called early in the evening, but she was working on the prison or forensic unit or wherever. We never spoke, at least last night," Bridgett continued, the irritation in her voice unmistakable. "The idiot from the E.D. said she was over there and had been beaten up or something, said she couldn't speak so I didn't believe them." Bridgett turned and noticed Commander Jack Françoise at her side and addressed him, her brilliant blue eyes full of anger. "Commander, can you do something about this? Someone is harassing me about Angie," Bridgett said as she started to rise from the sofa. "I've got to go. I have a ton of work to do." Bridgett rose from the sofa to leave, as if nothing real had just happened.

Jack looked over at Dr. Desmonde who gave him a thumbs-up sign. He took Bridgett's hands in his own and said, "Bridge, it's not a joke. Someone hurt Angie after she left work last night. She was attacked, and we didn't find her until this morning and..."

Alex's heart lurched at the sight of Bridgett's big blue eyes. They were filled with terror and uncertainty. Her pupils were huge, surrounded by liquid pools of white. Her long blonde hair created a halo around her head. Alex wasn't completely sure if Bridge understood what the police commander had said.

Dr. Desmonde interrupted, "Angie's over in the E.D. They're going to take her up to surgery, and I thought you might like to see her before she goes." Monique's voice trailed off, uncertain of Bridgett's level of comprehension.

"Yes, yes, I would. Is she okay?"

Monique continued, slowly as she shook her head, "No. Not really. She is very sick. In fact, she is in critical condition. She has a machine breathing for her, a ventilator, and she has some head injuries. She's lost a lot of blood. She also has some internal injuries, and Dr. Goshette wants to do an exploratory to be sure she isn't bleeding on the inside."

"How'd she get hurt?" Bridgett asked in a dazed and child-like manner as she looked around the room. It was clear to all of them that Bridgett really wasn't getting it.

Alex couldn't help but be amazed at how good the brain was at screening out bad news.

Being the psychiatrist that she was, Monique tried hard to work through Bridgett's shock and denial. She started again, "Bridgett, Angie was attacked and beaten last night after work. She's very ill. Do you understand?"

Bridgett nodded impatiently. "Yes, you told me. I'd like to go see her now, if you don't mind. You said she was going to surgery, right?" Bridgett stared at Dr. Desmonde as if she was a moron for not understanding her.

"Yes," Monique sighed. "Bridgett, you must understand that she has bruises and cuts on her face and that..." Monique stammered, searching for words. "You must understand that she looks very different. Someone beat her badly. Are you sure you're up to seeing her?"

Bridgett nodded her head impatiently. "Of course, Dr. Desmonde, of course I am. But it isn't all that bad, not nearly as bad as you say. Angie and I are twins. If she were hurting badly, I'd be hurting too. It's always been like that, since we were babies." Bridgett smiled and continued, "I'm really not worried, let's go." She looked around the group. "Hurry up! I just need to get my purse."

Alex, Jack, and Monique looked at each other while Bridgett went into her office.

Bette Farve had completely removed herself from the situation and was flipping through a copy of "Architectural Digest" she'd removed from Alex's coffee table.

What an uncaring bitch, Alex thought silently to herself.

Monique rolled her eyes at Bette, shrugged her shoulders, and said, "Well, Bridgett doesn't really get it. Angie looks pretty bad and believe me she's really hurting. The reason Bridgett isn't feeling any pain is because Angie is in a coma."

Alex was startled. "Oh no, is it really that bad?" She searched the faces of her good friends and colleagues. Her crystal blue eyes locked with Commander Françoise's dark ones. "Please say it isn't, Jack," she implored.

"Wish I could, Alex, but I can't. It's bad. It's real bad. I'll fill you in later. Let's get Bridge through this part first." Jack lifted his large, bulky frame from the chair and moved into the outer office to help Bridgett gather her things.

Dr. Desmonde added quickly to Alex, "Jack's right, Alex. Angie is pretty beat up. She may be bleeding internally. She has a skull fracture and some seriously broken bones. Her jaw is broken, as well. She was out there for hours before anyone found her. She lost a lot of blood, and Lord knows how long she's been unconscious. Her crit, CBC are way down."

"Shsssst!" Monique put her finger to her lips as Bridgett and the commander returned to Alex's office. "We'll catch up later."

Bette looked up from her magazine and spoke for the first time. "My secretary called Bridgett's husband and he'll meet us in the E.D. They're looking for Angie's husband. He is supposedly on his way." Farve's voice was flip and tinged with sarcasm.

Alex immediately moved into Bette Farve's personal space to confront her, but Monique waved her away while she motioned for Jack and Bridgett to wait in the hall for them.

"Later, Alex," she cautioned. "We have enough going on here, and you're not dying on the Bette Farve hill right now." Monique glared at Bette Farve. "See me later, Ms. Farve. I want to discuss the concept of empathy with you. And I do mean it."

Alex smiled to herself as she watched Bette bristle with anger and then felt ashamed for enjoying the exchange. Dr. Desmonde was probably the only person at the medical center who disliked Bette Farve as much as she did, and this behavior was so unlike Monique it was a bit shocking. They both had Farve's number and supported each other when the nurse executive ran roughshod over the staff. Bette was uncaring, incompetent, inept, and not very smart. Unfortunately, the CEO, Don Montgomery, didn't share their opinion of Bette — most likely because they were very much alike. If you were to believe the hospital scuttlebutt, they were lovers. Gross, yuck, is all Alex could think about that rumor. It made her feel slightly sick.

As Monique and Alex joined Jack and Bridgett in the hallway, Alex began to feel angry about what had happened to Angie. For three years, Alex repeatedly asked the hospital executive committee to move the psych units closer to the main hospital, if not into the main medical complex itself. Of course, Don had a shit fit over that one. He would never tarnish his "world-class, prestigious medical center, soon to be a health sciences center" with the likes of the crazy lowlifes of New Orleans and criminals with HIV. He had even declared at the board of trustees' meeting that he would never turn CCMC into an insane asylum or increase the number of beds for the psychiatric community. Alex doubted if he ever knew how much he had appalled the board or that he had made an enemy of Monique Desmonde for life, which was probably not a good thing.

Needless to say, Alex had met massive resistance from both Farve and Montgomery, who had issued a joint press release suggesting that "psychiatry, while a necessary albatross to any hospital, was CCMC's gift to the sick, poor, and disenfranchised mental cases of New Orleans." Monique had seethed with anger and it had taken her and Alex several bottles of Virginia wine to settle both of them. Alex had always been afraid that an accident like Angie's would happen and that someone, whether a patient, visitor, or staff member, would be seriously attacked in or around the Pavilion. Now it had happened.

All four were silent as they waited for the elevator to reach the ground level E.D., which seemed to take forever as it stopped on each and every floor. They were met at the nursing station by Sandy Pilsner, the nursing director of the emergency department.

Sandy eyed her friends for some nonverbal direction. She moved close to Bridgett, took her hand, and said, "Bridge, Angie looks bad. Her face is black and blue, her eyes are swollen shut, and she's hard to recognize. We have IVs and bags of blood hanging and she has a tube down her throat, hooked to a machine that is breathing for her. She'll be going up to surgery in a few minutes. We think she's bleeding internally because her lab results are so bad."

Bridgett smiled brightly at Sandy. "Is Angie talking you to death? I know how she is. She has never even been in the hospital, except for when Jessica was born. Do you think we can even count that?" Bridgett was totally out of it.

If Sandy was surprised at Bridgett's lack of understanding, she didn't let on. She said very clearly, "Angie is not talking. She's not breathing on her own and she cannot talk to you. Bridge, do you understand me? She is very sick. Maybe she can hear you, but she cannot talk to you. There's also a possibility her assailant raped her."

Bridgett didn't respond. Her expression showed no emotion and her affect was flat.

Sandy glanced at Alex and Dr. Desmonde, who shrugged her shoulders and nodded her head.

"Let's go, Sandy," Monique said gesturing forward with her hand. "We've got to break through this denial somehow."

Jack's face was impassive.

Alex knew him well enough to know that he was feeling phenomenal stress. She patted his hand for reassurance.

The sounds of the E.D., the newly renovated patients' rooms, and the spanking clean floors brought no comfort to Alex. As physicians and nurses glanced at her and offered tight smiles, she felt their pain. They all knew Angie, and many had worked with her over the years at CCMC. They'd celebrated her graduations from nursing school — first from Delgado at Charity Hospital and then LSU. They'd celebrated her marriage and the birth of Jessica. They'd worked side by side with her every day. Angie was one of the team, one of their team. She was their friend. She was one of their own, one of CCMC's highly skilled and coveted nurses, and one of the millions of caregivers all over the world who gave endlessly and selflessly of their time, talents, and gifts every day.

Alex noticed that Monique was eyeing Sandy carefully. They both knew this was especially hard for her. Angie had worked in the E.D. prior to the birth of her baby, and Sandy had hosted her baby shower. Sandy had already lost her good friend and mentor, Diane Bradley, during the tragic accident in the emergency department just before Mardi Gras earlier in the year. Sandy seemed to be holding up pretty well.

Nurses are tough creatures, Monique thought to herself. Much tougher than we docs.

As they entered the patient bay, they walked slowly toward the bed.

Bridgett looked hard at the patient in the bed and said angrily, "What in the world is going on? I don't know who this is, but it certainly isn't Angie. What kind of sick joke is this?" Bridgett's eyes flared with anger at Alex.

The next few seconds seemed like eons and finally Monique said gently, "Yes, Bridge, it is Angie. Look carefully. Her face is swollen, her jaw is broken, but it is Angie."

"It is not, it is not! Why are you all doing this to me? I thought you were my friends." Bridgett's enormous blue eyes brimmed over with tears as she stared at the faces of her friends around the bed.

Sandy reached to remove the O.R. cap from Angie's head.

When Bridgett saw the long, mussed up curly blonde hair, just like her hair only matted with dark, dried blood, she knew and she began to scream, "Oh, no! Oh, no, no... PLEASE, no, it can't be. Angie, Angie, talk to me, please, Angie, please answer me." Bridgett touched the long knife wounds extending from her sister's forehead all the way around her face. She looked at her friends around the bed. "Who did this? Who did this? It must be a monster. It looks like someone tried to cut off her face!" When she noticed her sister's Mother's Ring with Jessica's birthstone, she began to sob. "Oh, no, she wanted that ring for so long, and Johnny just gave it to her on Mother's Day." Her sobs became uncontrollable and could be heard throughout the E.D.

Sandy and Monique pulled the sobbing Bridgett away while Alex and Commander Françoise stayed by Angie's bedside, continuing to observe her injuries.

Alex, numb with shock, turned away, attempting to control her emotions.

Jack gently touched her on her shoulder. "All right, Alex, we can go. You've seen enough."

"No, just give me a moment." Alex drew a deep breath and turned to face Angie again. As she worked hard to dissociate herself from the body of her friend, she noticed some funny shaped marks on Angie's left shoulder, visible where her hospital gown had fallen to the side. She eyed them curiously and looked at the commander. "Jack, what are these? They look weird."

Commander Françoise shuffled uncomfortably. "It's a damned bite mark, Alex. The SOB bit her at least three times. He's a sick son of a bitch. I'd like to kill him. I will kill him when I find him," Jack hissed, as he felt for his holstered gun under his coat.

Alex looked at Jack with alarm. He was working himself into a frenzy. Not good, she thought to herself. Ever since the spring, when Jack had finally gone to Dr. Robert Bonnet complaining of chest pain, Alex had been afraid that Jack's stress level and stressful job would cause him to have a heart attack or stroke. He'd done absolutely nothing Robert had recommended. Typical, stubborn Jack. He was still overweight, had high blood pressure, and had high cholesterol. He drank gallons of black coffee every day, and his diet was horrendous.

Jack had spent his life living on the edge. He had been a football star in high school and at Tulane University, where he had played linebacker. Shortly after graduation, Jack had joined the service and gone Army Spec Ops. Alex assumed Jack had been engaged in Black Ops but didn't know for sure. Jack didn't talk about it much, but she knew that he had been everywhere in the world where there had been a skirmish until he finally retired from the reserves about ten years ago.

Of course, now, he was a police commander in New Orleans, working in the city with the highest crime per capita of any city in the U.S. Plus, he now was commander over the district with the most crime. This was further complicated by the fact that Jack was an honest cop and still clung to his ideologies, even after all his years of investigating murders, assaults, drugs, and abuse. Jack didn't even need to be in the trenches anymore. He was a commander, for God's sake! But Alex knew that Jack would never leave the trenches. It wasn't in his genes. He didn't go to meetings, ever, if there was a way he could get out of them. He cared about the victims and worked endlessly to avenge the dead and maimed. Besides, Jack liked to get even, and Jack liked to get back at the perpetrators. It was who Jack was and what had earned him the nickname of "Get Back Jack."

For a fleeting moment, Alex considered calling Dr. Robert Bonnet, the chief of surgery at CCMC. Robert and Alex were close to Jack and shared concerns about him. Six months earlier, Jack Françoise had saved both of their lives as they were being pursued through the French Quarter by an assailant intent on murdering them. Consequently, a short while later, after he'd been shot by that same man, Robert had overseen Jack's surgery. Robert had been injured as well, by a gunshot injury to the medial nerve in his right arm that could still cost him his career as a surgeon.

Robert couldn't operate. The verdict was still out on his injury. Additional surgery and physical therapy would render a determination of Robert's future in a few months. Hopefully, he would be able to operate again. If not, he'd be an excellent medical doctor, as Alex had told him repeatedly. Robert was a natural healer, but he was NOLA's most outstanding surgeon.

The police commander, the surgeon, and the lawyer had become close at that time and forged a bond that would never be broken. The three had traveled to Alex's family home in Virginia with her grandfather, Congressman Adam Patrick Lee, and her grandmother, Kathryn Rosseau Lee, for a well-earned vacation and deserved respite. Alex and Robert had been married while attending the University of Virginia. They divorced later but had begun to build a new relationship in New Orleans.

Alex's thoughts briefly returned to her relationship with Robert Bonnet, back when the two were still married. Alex had loved Robert without reservation. They met when Robert was a surgical resident and Alex was a doctoral student in clinical nursing. They dated for over a year, became engaged, and married at the University Chapel on the Lawn in Charlottesville in a very proper circumspect ceremony. The marriage had merged two of the most powerful political families in the South — the Bonnets of Louisiana and the Lees of Virginia. Robert's family had been prominent in the social, cultural, and political fabric of the state since the French had discovered Louisiana in 1769, and his ancestral grandfather had been the first governor of French Louisiana. Robert's father, a former governor, presently served as a United States Senator for the great State of Louisiana.

Alex's Virginia heritage was equally impressive. She could trace her ancestry to Richard Henry Lee, father of Robert E. Lee, Commander and Chief of the Confederate Army during the Civil War. Her uncle still owned the ancestral family home, Stratford Hall, in Westmoreland County. Another relative owned a historic plantation on the James River near Richmond. Alex's grandparents owned a large estate in Hanover County, Virginia — not far from Scotchtown, the home of Patrick Henry.

Congressman Lee, a diehard law and order politician, had been overwhelmed with respect for the then Captain Françoise's integrity, character, and investigative skills. He had tried unsuccessfully to lure Jack into a high-level position with the FBI in Washington, D.C., but Jack was resistant. He told the congressman quite bluntly, and on several occasions since then, that he "wasn't working for no damned bureaucrats," that he was not for sale. Congressman Lee had loved the response and had tried even harder to recruit the burly, fearless New Orleans policeman. In fact, the congressman was still trying to get Françoise to come to Washington and work on some special law enforcement projects, particularly anything related to terrorism, but Jack still refused. Alex knew Jack would never leave NOLA. Alex felt an arm on her shoulder that halted her daydreaming. She turned and looked at Jack Françoise.

Alex's mind returned to the grim situation at hand. She stared again at Angie's battered body. Alex noted how pale, almost waxen, Angie's face looked and turned to Jack. "Jack, she is so pale. She looks like a corpse. Feel how cool she is."

"Yes, I see." Jack was thinking back to the pale young corpse he had seen at Dr. Jeanfreau's morgue last week. She had looked just like Angie.

Alex continued to stare at Angie's face and said, "Most of these areas look like bruises, but they aren't discolored like I would have thought they should be. Bruises are generally discolored from blood perfusion. These slice marks look superficial, and there is little blood. Jack, it looks as if she has been cleaned up and prepared for burial. I guess her eyes are swollen from her brain swelling. We call those raccoon eyes," Alex exclaimed, remembering her own ICU nursing days, feeling more angry and agitated than before.

Just at that moment, Sandy re-entered Angie's room with the O.R. transport. "Gotta go, folks," Sandy said, as she helped disconnect and reconnect Angie's tubes to portable equipment and push the bed out of the bay.

Alex and Jack watched respectfully as Angie was wheeled from the E.D. Alex shook her head and looked at Sandy. "She just looks awful — why, she already looks dead. She's so pale. How much blood did she lose?"

"I've no idea. Her head wound is a closed fracture, so no blood loss. Her blood values, specifically her H & H are 5 & 18, really low, almost incompatible with life. We're thinking there must have been a ton of blood at the scene because we frankly cannot explain the blood values. Several of the docs think the attacker thought she was dead when he left. Did you notice the rope burns on her wrists? They were bleeding a little. One of her wrists was slit."

Alex felt her poise and composure completely leave her. She knew she had to get out of the E.D. She looked at Jack, whose face was a mask of outrage and fury. "Sandy, I've got to get out of here before I lose it. Jack, let's go to the cafeteria. We'll talk, and you, you can fill me in." Alex smiled at him and firmly, but gently, removed him from Angie's bedside. Sandy hugged Alex as she left the E.D.

"Yeah, I'd like that." Jack looked at his watch. It was almost noon. The thought of something sweet improved Jack's mood significantly. "Do you think they have any jelly donuts left? I didn't get one earlier. Maybe if I get my blood sugar up, I won't be so damned angry." Françoise looked at Alex sheepishly.

She laughed and said, "Yeah, maybe, but I doubt it. If they do have donuts, I may fight you for them. I need some comfort food." As they walked toward the cafeteria, the pair reminisced a little. It seemed like a good way to diffuse their incredible stress and anger.

"I'll never forget the first time I met you, Jack Françoise. You were brutally interrogating a nurse and eating a jelly donut. Might I remind you how rude you were to me? I was not impressed!" Alex's voice was stern and emphatic, but her blue eyes were laughing.

"It's all in the past now, Miss Lawyer Lady. I had to check you out good, you know, and you finally earned your stripes!" Jack teased then turned his attention to the food line. Ahead he could spot the donut case. "Oh, good. This day's getting a little better — two jellies left."

Alex shook her head as she watched Jack help himself to the remaining two jelly donuts and a cup of black coffee. She helped herself to decaffeinated black currant tea and a bagel. She decided to spare the commander any lectures on his health. The day had been difficult enough, and it had barely started.

As they moved through the line toward the cashier, Commander Françoise said, "You pay, Alex. You make the big money. Besides, I don't get a hospital discount, although I should considering how much time I spend in this place."

Alex laughed and nodded in agreement, handing her CCMC ID badge to the cashier, who scanned the amount and charged it to Alex's account. The two selected a private table in the back of the physician's dining room. They munched in silence for a few minutes, each caught up in their own thoughts about Angie and Bridgett. Finally, Alex broached the inevitable topic. "Well, Jack, what you got?"

Jack shook his head. "Not a lot. These kinds of cases make me sick. Nurses should never be expected to walk that far alone at night. It's at least two blocks from the psych unit to the parking deck. It's unlit, heavily shrubbed, and unsafe. It's a perfect setting for a brutal crime like this one. I'm surprised there haven't been more crimes over there."

Alex and Jack were interrupted by Dr. Desmonde who joined their table with a cup of tea. Her voice reflected Jack's anger. "I agree. You're right, Jack. I've been screaming at Montgomery and Farve for three years to do something about the location of the psych units, or at least the parking. I would have been satisfied with some lights, for God's sake."

Monique said, "Alex, you've known my concern about this for a couple of years! We both tried to get administration to move toward making the psych areas safer. This hospital doesn't give a rip about psych because it isn't a money maker." Monique slammed her teacup down on the table in frustration.

Alex eyed her friend carefully. Monique was a beautiful woman in her mid-forties. She was clearly distraught over Angie. The tall, thin psychiatrist was impeccably dressed as always, but her luxurious dark hair had fallen out of its neat chignon. Her normally pale, lovely face was flushed with anger and frustration. Her voice, usually low and controlled, was close to hysterical, or as close to hysterical as Monique would ever be.

Alex nodded. She knew Dr. Desmonde was right. She didn't challenge her at all. Monique Desmonde was uncharacteristically upset. After giving her friend a chance to recover and compose herself, she asked Dr. Desmonde how Bridgett was.

"Bridgett's gone home with her husband. I gave her a sedative and a prescription for later. They were going to get Angie's baby, who I might add was in the hospital nursery all night. Damn! Those nursery workers should become suspect if a nurse never shows to pick up her child. Damn, these people." Monique's deep voice was loud. Several physicians looked at her curiously from their tables in the private dining room.

Alex intervened and changed the subject. "What do we have as far as evidence? Did forensics get anything good?"

Jack answered, "Just the normal stuff — you know, pubic hair, oral, anal, vaginal, and rectal swabs, that kind of stuff. We also got some skin and blood that we found under her nails. She must have gotten one swipe at him before he beat her into submission." Jack paused for a few moments while Monique and Alex watched the emotions of hate and rage cross his face. He continued, his jaw clenched, "I'd like to kill the SOB." Neither Monique nor Alex doubted the intensity of Jack's desire for true justice.

"Is there any forensic evidence other than what you've just told us, Jack?" Alex looked at him, expectantly.

"Labs aren't back yet. We don't know if we're even going to get the PEPA and the PGM — you know, those semen tests — because too much time may have gone by." Jack shook his head. "I sure hope we can nail him with the forensics."

"You've got to catch him first, Françoise," Dr. Desmond reminded the commander.

Jack raised his eyebrows and glared at the shrink. "Not to worry, Doc, not to worry. I'll get 'em. In fact, I plan to get him soon. You know me, Get Back Jack," the stocky police commander declared to the psychiatrist.

Alex was deep in thought. As a nurse and an attorney, she knew the proper collection of forensic evidence was critical for a court conviction of a rapist. She also knew that semen usually contains three genetic markers at levels adequate enough to allow for routine typing for evidence. Unfortunately, PEPA decreases within three hours after intercourse and PGM would not survive for more than six hours. Consequently, the early gathering, testing, and analysis of the semen specimen were pivotal to building a successful case. The semen genetic markers were ABO blood group antigens and testing was done by quantitative electrophoresis analysis. Since the genetic markers occur in variable amounts in different populations, their presence or absence in combination with each other often were used to arrive at a percentage or likelihood of whether the suspect is the rapist or not. Hopefully, the comparison of the crime scene evidence with blood and hair samples from the suspect would provide compelling evidence in court and would render a guilty verdict.

Alex continued to review her knowledge of forensic medicine and asked, "Jack, how do the experts handle the bite marks on her back and shoulder? Who did you call in to look at that?" She shuddered as she thought about Angie being bitten by her attacker.

"Damned bastard, a real animal. SOB must be crazy. Probably one of your patients, Monique! Have you thought about that possibility?" Jack turned toward the psychiatrist, flashing his angry, dark eyes.

"Yes." Monique practically hissed at him. "I've thought about it, Françoise! Do you think I'm an idiot? That's all I have been thinking about since this morning! I've got the team working on it now, looking at charts, and putting together a profile among the in-patients." Dr. Desmond glared at the commander from across the table, barely able to conceal her anger.

Alex ordinarily would have interceded between the two but knew Jack and Monique had been friends since childhood and were actually pretty close. Alex also knew that Jack was uncharacteristically affected by this rape because of his fondness for Bridgett and Angie. It would be difficult for the psychiatrist and the police commander to be completely objective on this one. And, me as well, Alex thought. Angie and Bridgett have been my friends since I've been here.

Alex asked again, "What about the bite marks, Jack? What do you make of them?"

"Don't know yet. The crime guys photographed them and were smart enough to include a reference scale this time." Jack rolled his eyes and told Alex and Monique about the time the NOPD crime team had forgotten to use a reference scale with the bite mark. "When we got to court, the evidence was useless because there was no reference scale with which to compare the size of the bite with the mouth and teeth of the suspect. As you can imagine, the evidence was inadmissible. It was a big loss to the prosecution. Lots of heads rolled on that one."

"I bet they did and they should have," Alex said. "A huge error of omission. I bet the prosecutor was enraged." Alex could imagine the colorful and politically astute Harry Connick Senior, the New Orleans prosecutor, being caught with his pants down. The man just hates to lose, just like me, Alex thought. I do hate to lose.

"Are you all sure you did everything right this time?" Alex inquired, with a hint of that old Virginia Southern drawl slipping passed her lips.

"Yeah. Best I can tell. We took the photos, included the scale, and called in a forensic dentist. The crime team also asked that casts be made to use later to identify the perp. I think we're covered. One thing the CSI team said is that one of the forensic nurses noticed some puncture wounds on each side of Angie's neck. She said they were hard to see because they were in the slice wounds going around her face."

The three sat in silence for a few moments, pondering the horrific attack on Angie. Finally, Alex said, "Puncture wounds. Why would she have puncture wounds? Have you ever seen that before, Jack?"

Jack thought for a few minutes and answered, "No, I haven't. I really didn't notice them in the E.D., but we'll crosscheck that with other similar injuries in the database. We may get a hit."

"Did they mention a lot of blood at the scene?"

"Nope. It didn't come up, but I haven't been to the scene yet. If there was, it'll show up in the crime scene photos," Jack replied, looking at both women.

After several minutes of silence, Dr. Desmonde asked Alex, "What do you think the liability of the hospital is on this?"

Alex shook her head. "I don't know yet, probably significant. Personally, I feel that we should provide a safe place for our staff to work and that we should provide security for them to get to and from their cars, which we do—"

Monique interrupted her angrily, her face flushed, "Dammit, Alex. You sound just like a Main Street lawyer! You know as well as I do that the location, staffing, and administrative management of the psych department are unsafe. It's a joke!"

"Unsafe to you and me, Monique, nevertheless, the standard of care." Alex sighed. This was getting difficult. She hesitated a little and then continued, "Well, the nurses can choose to call security to escort them to their cars when they get off and—"

"Stop it, Alex. That's shit." The usually tranquil chief of psychiatry at CCMC was livid, her pale face colored with anger. Monique rarely used bad language. "You and I both know it! Escorting nurses to their cars during the off hours is the lowest security priority in the entire hospital. Last night Angie Richelieu stayed late. There was some sort of patient commotion. One of the patients attacked a woman in the day room. I don't have the details, yet. Anyway, the patient incident got the entire unit in an uproar. Angie stayed late to help the nightshift calm the unit down. She didn't have to. She doesn't get paid for staying late anymore. In exchange for staying three hours overtime, she's told it'll be thirty to forty-five minutes before security can escort her to her car! Alex, for heaven's sake, give it up. You know it's wrong!" Monique's voice and hands were shaking.

Alex sat quietly and said nothing. She knew it was a losing conversation.

Commander Françoise placed his big callused hand over the psychiatrist's small manicured one. He said to her, "Monique, you've got to calm down some. Things are terrible, but for us to help Angie and her family, we've got to get ourselves together. You're an important player in this. Right, Alex?"

"Right, Jack." Alex looked at Monique. "I agree with everything you say, Monique. You're singing to the choir. Don't forget, I'm a nurse! I've been on your side the entire time about everything — about relocating the Pavilion, putting up lights, increasing staff. This will give us an opportunity to really address these things and make some changes. Let's take the lead on this for now. First things first."

Dr. Desmond retorted angrily, "Alex, don't give me any of that psychobabble. That's my job!" Monique hesitated for a moment, thinking. Then, she said to Jack and Alex, her voice uncharacteristically sarcastic, "So what did the esteemed leaders of the hospital do for the psychiatric service? They contracted it out and gave us to strangers to manage. People who have no knowledge of New Orleans, our culture, heritage, or diversity. Give me a break! We now have contract management in psychiatry, which is inadequate to say the very least, and the patient care conditions, safety, and units are less safe now than they were last year. This is totally pathetic and self-serving of hospital administration. The contract administrator has actually cut staffing."

Monique paused briefly and continued angrily, her voice becoming higher and higher, "I'm sure the bottom line has come up. The place is probably making money now, but what a dump. That contract administrator, Lester Whitset, looks like a patient. He even gives me the creeps. I'd like to give him a frontal lobotomy." Monique tossed her head angrily, her dark hair bobbing, her tone of voice acrimonious.

Alex and Jack sat quietly and watched the conflicting emotions trail across Monique's usually well-controlled face.

After several very long moments, Monique finally reached for Alex's hand and squeezed it. "I'm sorry and you're right, Alex. I'm overwhelmed and incredibly tired, and I am being a total bitch. Angie shouldn't be fighting for her life, and her husband shouldn't be wondering if their young daughter will ever have the mother that she once knew. The whole thing just stinks, and I hate that it's happened. And even though I've got concerns about Lester and the contract management group that is handling CCMC's psychiatric services, they came well recommended and are leaders in Behavioral Health Services. Perhaps I am over-exaggerating, but it seems to me our administration and the contract management service is much more concerned with money than with patient and staff safety. I'm afraid that with our growing, acutely ill, psych population we could be in for more trouble, particularly with health reform coming onboard. The delivery system they've implemented is simply not safe for our patient population. We are the only inpatient facility in the state that houses such dangerous psychotics and the criminally insane. It is truly a dangerous place."

Alex nodded and said, "I couldn't agree more, and I couldn't be more concerned. Let's meet soon and talk about it. I've been concerned about the Pavilion for several months. Plan on my office at 10 o'clock tomorrow, okay?"

"You've got it, Alex. If things settle down, I'll be there. Do you want to invite Farve? For what it's worth, I'm sure it will be a waste of our time, but a lot of the safety issues obviously concern the nursing staff."

Alex shook her head negatively and shrugged her shoulders. "When has she ever helped the nursing staff? Why would we even want to include her? Let's get Dr. Ashby." Alex stared at Monique strangely. "I am surprised you asked, Monique. Do you really want her at the meeting?"

"Hell, no! I don't want her," Monique retorted. "She's been a pain in my butt for years. I have loathed her from the first day I met her, but we should have her there. If we can get her on our side..."

Jack grinned at Monique and said sheepishly, "Come on, Monique. Don't hold back. Tell us how you really feel!" Jack and Monique started to laugh, and Alex joined them.

"You're right, everything you say is correct, Monique. I guess we should invite her because it's politically correct and her role should concern the safety of all staff." Alex hesitated for a moment and continued, "We'll have to include her, it's the best thing to do. She'll be mad as a hornet if we don't, and we will hear about it." Alex's tone of voice was almost apologetic as she looked at Monique, who was once again seething with anger at the very thought of Bette Farve.

"Invite the obstructionist bitch, I don't give a damn. I'm going over to the Pavilion. Call me if there's any change in Angie's condition." Monique grabbed her lunch tray and slammed it on the tray rack as she headed toward the door.

Alex and Jack looked at each other in amazement as Monique exited the cafeteria.

Jack spoke first. "Man, I've never seen Monique so blown away. This just isn't like her at all. I sure hope she gets it together."

"She will," Alex assured him. "This is Monique's worst nightmare. She has been waiting for something like this to happen for months and now it has, and she feels responsible. Trust me, that's exactly what's going on here because that's the way she is. Jack, by any chance, did you check out that guy, Lester, who is managing the psych services? I've never seen him or met him, but I hear he's pretty weird. If you haven't, maybe you should question him."

"Not to worry, Alex. I'm questioning everyone, and he is for sure on my list."

"Good," Alex said looking thoughtful and continued, "Let's see what the psych team puts together. There may be in-patients who have a history of rape or assault. We should know more about them later, and we also need to do a historical chart review of former psychiatric patients who have been on the unit. What do you think?"

Françoise was slow to respond. He stared at his coffee and looked longingly at the plate that held his last jelly donut.

Alex could tell by the look in his eye that he really, really wanted it.

"Well, I don't quite know what to make of this crime yet... this guy is a pervert who crosses the categories of defined rapist. If you've got a few minutes later on today, a representative from our sexual crimes division will be coming over to the Pavilion, sometime around lunch time. We're going to meet in the executive conference room. Why don't you join us if you can?"

Alex glanced down at her watch. "It's almost noon now. Would you be willing to meet in my office, since I don't have a secretary or administrative assistant today? I really need to get back to see what's going on."

Jack looked hesitant for several moments.

Knowing Jack as she did, Alex added, "I'll have lunch sent into my conference room. Does that help you make up your mind?" Alex asked, smiling.

"It absolutely does. You win. You know I'll never turn down a free CCMC lunch, particularly if Don Montgomery is footing the bill and won't be attending. I'm gonna make tracks over to the Pavilion and pick up Nadine. She's our sexpert — you know, our expert on sex crimes," Jack added hastily, noting the frown on Alex's face. "She's also a registered nurse."

Alex's voice was frosty as she said, "Jack please don't use that word. Let's just refer to her as an expert on sexual crimes. In some way it sounds demeaning, the word 'sexpert.' To me, it sounds demeaning to both Nadine and Angie."

Jack looked forlorn. He hated it when Alex corrected him or seemed disappointed. "Okay, okay, okay, you got it. I didn't mean to sound disrespectful," Jack said quietly as he rose to leave.

Alex smiled at him and teased, "It's okay, Jack. I'll forgive you this one time, but only this one time. Now get your butt moving over to the Pavilion and then get it back over here for lunch."

Jack stood and said, "Will do. See you shortly." He saluted her on the way out.

After placing her tray on the rack, Alex headed toward her office but decided to stop in hospital administration on the way.

Latetia, Don Montgomery's secretary, was working quietly at her desk. She looked up at Alex sadly and said, "Ms. Alex, how are Bridgett and Angie? I just heard a little while ago and it's just awful. Do you think Angie will be okay? I just know Bridgett must be terribly upset. Is there anything that I can do?" Latetia's liquid brown eyes were kind and reflected deep concern for her friends.

"Latetia, Angie's in surgery and you're right, Bridgett is beyond herself with grief. I wish there was something that we could do to help her and her family, but right now I think it's just a game of waiting and watching and praying." Alex watched Latetia's eyes overflow with tears as she moved from behind her desk to give her a hug.

"Sure, sure. I know you're right. We're planning to send food to Bridgett's mom's house for the next week or so. Check the Meals to Go in your email so you can participate. I'm sure that Bridgett and Angie's mom will be keeping the baby. I would imagine that Bridgett, her husband, and Angie's husband will want to be at the hospital."

"The food is a great idea, and I'm happy to participate. Love the idea of the Meals to Go. By the way, do you think you can find me a temp while Bridgett is out? I would anticipate she will be out for several weeks."

"Sure. Want me to try for Mona again?"

Alex nodded in approval and said, "Yeah. That would be great. She was pretty good during those several weeks last month when Bridgett and her family were vacationing on the Gulf Coast. And she knows me. That's half the battle right there."

"I'll do my best, Ms. Alex," Latetia said, reaching for her temporary staff file.

"Thanks. By the way, what's Don doing? Does he have anyone in his office?" Alex added, as she inclined her head toward the executive's office.

Latetia glanced at her phone. "He was on the phone, but now he seems to have hung up. By the way, you may want to think twice about going in there. He's in a pretty foul mood, so you might want to be careful. The July revenue projections came in and they were low, much lower than we expected." Checking out the look on Alex's face, Latetia added, "Are you sure you want to go in? I wouldn't if I didn't have to. I'm actually thinking about taking the afternoon off to get away from him," she smiled, rolling her eyes. "I know you. You're always up for making him mad," she teased.

"Yeah, I'm going in. He doesn't scare me anymore. It'll only take a minute and will make his day much worse," Alex added as she moved toward the door and knocked.

"Oh, that's just great. Thanks a bunch, Alex." Latetia groaned, as Alex knocked on the CEO's door.

"Enter." Don Montgomery was seated behind his massive, walnut desk, his head buried in computer printouts. He looked surprised and irritated at Alex's interruption.

"Alex, do we have a meeting?" He quickly scanned his Outlook calendar on his computer. "Nope, we don't. I didn't think so." He looked smugly at his legal counsel, always happy to be right and one up on the lovely attorney. "What do you want? I'm busy." Don glanced at Alex briefly and returned to his papers, a blatant act of dismissal. When Alex didn't reply, he looked at his watch and said angrily, "Really, Ms. Destephano! I'm very busy, and don't have time for you to stand there and gawk at me."

Anger crept up Alex's spine and she said, "No, Don. We don't have a formal meeting scheduled, but we do have a situation we must discuss."

"Let it wait. I'm preparing for the next trustees' meeting."

Alex's impatience could be heard in her voice. "That meeting is two weeks away. There's lots of time to work on that. I want to talk to you about Angie Richelieu, now."

Don looked up, irritated. "What? Who?"

"Angie Richelieu, the nurse who was attacked, beaten, and raped last night between the Psychiatric Pavilion and the parking deck."

Don was clearly annoyed. "Oh yeah, her. What a pain. Bette Farve told me about it. Too bad. Tawdry affair. Deal with it, you're the hospital's lawyer." Don shook his head, dismissed the incident quickly, and returned to his printouts.

Alex was furious at the nonchalance in Don's voice. She glared at him, her anger reflected in her face. Montgomery was a pompous man, a real horse's ass, a weak, self-serving leader and completely useless in times of stress. Alex had hoped he would leave Crescent City Medical Center after a conspiracy against the hospital earlier in the year had nearly put the medical center out of business. Unfortunately, Don had siphoned bits and pieces of the catastrophe and used them to his advantage. He'd given several interviews to the press and had emerged in the news as a media hero — a man intent on saving his hospital, preserving quality, and keeping it private and solvent in the changing health care environment. Don was a proverbial cat, always landing on his feet.

Alex's voice was calm, but forceful, as she addressed him. "Don, this situation is precarious. Angie Richelieu has been an employee at CCMC for years and is an excellent nurse. She's in the O.R. right now, fighting for her life. The hospital could be at fault here for not providing her safe access to her car—"

The CEO interrupted her rudely, "That's bullshit, Alex. Farve told me that all the nurses had been instructed to call for a security escort after hours. She did not. It's her fault if she was raped. It certainly is not the fault of the hospital."

Alex wanted to jump over his desk and rip out his carotid arteries. "You're wrong, Don. Totally wrong. How appalling you are." Alex's voice was clipped. "Her fault? How could it possibly be her fault? That's ludicrous."

Montgomery dismissed her, "Really, Alex, I am pretty busy. Can you make an appointment with Latetia?" He picked up his phone to make a call.

Alex's fury mounted. "Really, Don. Are you this dumb? How do you think a jury would view this? We've got a nurse who stayed overtime for three hours and didn't get paid for it because the hospital no longer pays nurses, or anyone, overtime. She stayed late because of patient violence on the unit. Then she's raped and beaten on the way to her car... really, Don. For God's sake, what is wrong with you? Think about it. It's not a pretty picture."

Don was quiet for a moment, obviously thinking.

Alex continued, "We've had numerous meetings about the safety of staff, patients, and visitors traveling between the Psych Pavilion and the main hospital. We've had tons of complaints from physicians, nurses, and visitors that are on record. We've got to make some changes. I'd like a meeting this afternoon with Dr. Desmond and the administrator that manages behavioral health under the contract agreement. Elizabeth needs to be there as well, as does Dr. Ashley. We have to handle this appropriately with the media."

Don interrupted her, "No way, Alex. Not going to happen today. I'm too busy. What is it that you don't understand? I am busy! I am running this hospital, and I don't have time to stop for a stupid, 'called' meeting. Forget it."

"No, I'm not. It's a huge image concern and we all know how you worry about..." Alex said, her voice trailing off momentarily, "...the hospital's image." With these words, Alex hit her boss where it hurt him the most. Don lived and breathed, breathed and lived, CCMC's image. It was his lifeblood because, after all, in his mind it was his hospital and no one else had anything to do with the place.

Don straightened up and looked alert. "Huh, an image thing. How's that?" Don was thinking. Nothing got his attention more quickly than an incident that could affect the world-class image of CCMC.

Alex seized the opportunity. "Heavens yes, yes, definitely an image concern. And, mull this over, Don. There is a distinct possibility that the attacker could be either a patient or, even worse, a hospital employee."

"What, what kind of bullshit is that, Alex? All of our staff has criminal checks done on them. It couldn't be an employee," Don retorted angrily, a self-righteous smirk on his face. "Sometimes I cannot understand why we pay you the big bucks. You'll get your meeting at 3:00. Here in my office. Now get out of here," Don said disparagingly, pointing toward the door.

Alex knew she had been dismissed, but continued to stare at the CEO, noting his impeccably coiffed hair and custom-tailored suit. She reminded herself again that the man didn't give a flip about anything except how much money the place made. He'd told her earlier that he considered patients and staff "widgets", and his job was to make the widgets work as cheaply as possible and, at all costs, make the widgets productive. Alex closed the door tightly as she left.

Latetia shook her head as Alex reemerged from the Lion's Den. "That went well, right? From what I could hear, it was pretty loud in there."

"Yep. I ruined his day," she proudly told Latetia.

Latetia smiled, gave her a thumbs up and told her that Mona would be in after lunch.

Alex thanked her and walked slowly to her office, deep in thought about the difficulties surrounding the hospital and medical center.

Alex relaxed in the inner sanctum of her office. She laid her head on her desk for a few moments to fight off the headache she always seemed to notice after meeting with Montgomery. She had just called the O.R. to check on Angie and ordered lunch from dietary when Jack Françoise entered her office, accompanied by a trim, dark-haired woman. Alex judged the woman to be about thirty-five-years old. She stood behind her desk, smiled, and extended her hand in greeting to the woman as she said, "Hi, I'm Alex. Please sit down."

Françoise made the introductions. "Alex, this is Nadine Wells. She's an investigator and the NOPD expert on rape and sexual crimes. She's a forensic nurse analyst. Nadine, this is Alex. She is the legal counsel for CCMC. She's okay... for a lawyer, I guess." Françoise grinned and winked at Alex.

Alex waved her hand to quiet Jack. "Hi, Nadine. I am a lawyer, but most of all, I'm a nurse. I don't know why Jack never says that when he introduces me," Alex said, giving Jack a reproving look.

"Whoops, sorry, Alex." Jack apologized for the second time that day.

"It's nice to meet you, Ms. Destephano. The commander has spoken highly of you." Nadine Wells accepted Alex's hand.

Alex was a bit confused and wondered who the "commander" was. Oh, yes, Jack's new job. But Jack wasn't doing anything differently as the commander than he had done as a captain. "Please, Nadine, call me Alex. It took me a moment to remember who the commander was." She gave Jack a teasing glance. "I'm not much on formality. Do you have any information on the possible rapist?" She looked hopefully at Nadine, admiring her petite looks, her fresh appearance, and the fact that she was a nurse and a forensic expert.

Nadine hesitated for a moment, looking at the commander.

Françoise spoke up. "Alex, this meeting needs to be off the record. All we have is preliminary information. The guys downtown would freak if they knew we were talking to the hospital lawyer."

"Wow, Commander, I thought you were the guy downtown," Alex said laughing. "Of course, it will be off the record. I'm here as Angie's friend. Not to worry. This is completely between us. Let's sit at the conference table."

Nadine looked relieved. "Sorry, Alex. We just had to ask. Protocol and all."

"I know, Nadine. No worries. Please share."

"Well, this case is more complex than some. It presents a little differently. We usually classify rapists into three categories. The first category is the anger rapist who uses physical brutality to express rage, contempt, and hatred for his victim. The attack is usually unplanned, and the rapist is seldom sexually aroused when he initiates the attack. Anger rape is usually quick, this wasn't. The medical information suggests that Angie was raped more than once. Usually with an anger rapist, the assault is one of physical violence to the whole body."

Alex was listening attentively and making notes on her legal pad. "Yeah. What about the other categories? Do they better fit with what's happened to Angie?"

Nadine continued, "Well, a power rapist initiates the attack to overcome feelings of inadequacy and insecurity. For them, to accomplish sexual intercourse is evidence of personal conquest. These attacks are planned and premeditated. There is usually no injury beyond the attack itself, although it may occur over an extended duration of time. Power rapists outnumber anger rapists two to one."

Victims of power rapists have relatively minor injuries." Nadine stopped for a moment as Alex held up her hand.

"This doesn't work. Angie has extensive injuries. It seems like her attacker has attributes in both categories." Alex put her hands to her face. "You know, this stuff is sickening."

Nadine Wells nodded in agreement.

Jack Françoise suggested that Nadine describe the third category of rapists.

Nadine sighed deeply as she continued, "In contrast to anger and power rapists, the third category is the sadistic rapist. These rapists eroticize physical force. The rape may be long and involve torture, mutilation, or murder. Often times, this is the only way the rapist can achieve sexual satisfaction. Fortunately, this is the most uncommon type of rapist."

"Not for Angie Richelieu! Would you categorize her rape as one of a sadistic rapist?" Alex's blue eyes, crackling with intensity, penetrated Nadine's soft brown ones.

Nadine shook her head. "No, probably not. At least, he's not a pure sadistic rapist. Angie's rapist, at this point at least, seems to embody some of the characteristics of both the anger and the sadistic rapist. Certainly, the perp is sadistic. He bit her, beat her, crushed her skull, and sliced up her face. But he was angry. I think our rapist is a cross between an anger rapist and a sadistic rapist."

Alex's heart was pounding in her chest. "Jack, what do you think? Do you agree with Nadine?"

"Nadine is the expert. I do agree with her. I think the son of a bitch is angry. I think he was enraged, crazy, psychotic, even."

Alex nodded "Yeah, for sure. Nadine do you think he meant to murder her?"

"No. At least, I don't think so. If he had planned to murder her, he would have. He had the opportunity. He simply wasn't motivated to kill her. He wanted to disfigure her, to scare her beyond belief."

Jack grunted. "That doesn't mean he won't come back and try to murder her, especially if it's someone she could identify or recognize. Bastard!"

Alex was anxious. "Oh my goodness, Jack, you don't think he will try to hurt her while she is in CCMC recovering, do you?"

Jack shrugged his shoulders. "Don't know for sure. Possibly. Nadine, do you have an opinion?"

Nadine's voice was uncertain. "I don't know, I just don't know. This case is a bit different. He could. Perhaps he thought she was dead or at least would be by the time she was found. It's hard to say. There are so many unknowns in Angie's case. We need to be prepared in case he does, Commander."

Jack nodded. "I'll take care of it."

"My Lord, what kind of profile do these rapists have? Is there a profile for this type of crime?" Alex's face paled as she considered the perp coming back and attacking Angie while she was at CCMC.

Nadine and Jack looked at each other sadly. Jack nodded while Nadine answered Alex's questions.

"Yes, these profiles usually reveal that the rapist is mentally ill. Violently, mentally ill. They are often psychotic."

"Great Day! It's looking more and more like it could be a patient from the Pavilion. Do we have any in-patients that have such a profile?" Alex's headache was getting worse.

"Don't know yet. There are several patients in the Pavilion now that are violent and have diagnoses that could suggest such a profile. However, rape is not noted in their medical histories. Dr.

Desmonde and the psych team are analyzing the records that we pulled. We should know something by this afternoon. I'm sure she will talk to us then," Nadine assured them.

The conversation was interrupted by a dietary aide delivering the lunch trays. Alex, Nadine, and Jack stared at the food as the aide departed. The food looked good, but no one was particularly hungry.

Finally, Jack spoke. "Alex, there's one more thing. You ain't going to like it. Do you want to hear it?"

"Yes, of course, Commander." Alex's formal tone was indicative of her distress.

"This kind of rapist likes to revisit his victim. He likes to come back to terrorize them over and over. It could be here at CCMC or after she's recuperated and gone home. It could be in five years, who the hell knows. But they do often return and stalk their victims."

"Oh, no. We can't let this happen! No! What do we do?" Alex's voice was approaching a hysterical level, and her head was beating outside of her skull.

"When he comes back, he'll try to kill Angie. I am sure of it." Jack was feeling again for his gun. "Don't worry, Alex. In the meantime, we'll place police protection outside her room. When he comes back, we'll get him. Count on it. It's a given." Jack's face was red with anger.

Alex stared at her plate of uneaten food. She felt nauseated and was startled when Jack's cell phone rang.

He looked at the number. "I've got to go." He turned to Nadine and said, "We caught the double homicide this morning in the Quarter. A young couple. I got to get down to the coroner's office."

"Commander, you're handling that? I hear that's a bad case." Nadine's face was grim.

"Yeah, Nadine, it is. It's looking real bad. But then, this case is bad as well. Today has been nothing but bad." He looked at the lunch he had been so eagerly anticipating and said, "Sorry, ladies. I just lost my appetite."

After Jack left, Alex and Nadine talked quietly and picked at their food.

Nadine told Alex that she would be sure police protection for Angie had been arranged, "just in case". She also reminded Alex that she and Jack were operating only on a theory and that they had no hard evidence. Nadine promised to keep in touch and the two women parted, leaving Alex tearfully depressed in her office.

Shortly after Nadine left, Alex remembered that she'd forgotten to ask her about the puncture wounds on Angie's neck. She'd call and ask her later. But, right now, Alex needed a little time alone.

Jack's brain was bursting as he started his drive back down to Rampart to see Maddy Jeanfreau. He was doubly concerned about Angie's safety and felt there was a risk the perp would try to finish her off, if she made it through surgery. Why did bad things happen to his friends? He'd made a ton of friends over at CCMC in the spring, and the group had gotten together several times over the previous months to keep their connection alive. Several of the CCMC folks had been piqued that he hadn't invited them to his commander celebration. As it was, Jack had barely tolerated the evening. He'd only invited the few folks necessary to be politically correct. Alex, Robert, and Monique Desmond had all attended, the latter two having been his friends since childhood. He figured that if he had to suffer, his closest friends should suffer with him.

As Jack slowed his Caddy to stop for a red light, he allowed himself to think of what reason Dr. Jeanfreau could have to call him downtown for the second time in one day. He prayed it wasn't about what he feared it was. He had been ignoring the possibility since he had left earlier this morning, but the phone call from Maddy had almost confirmed his fears. If what he thought was true was in fact correct, he wanted to bleep himself into oblivion for a few months or at least visit an obscure planet he'd never heard of.

As he wheeled his Caddy into a parking space, his spirits lifted. Two legal spots in one day. That must be a record for him. Things couldn't be too bad, right, he convinced himself. After all, I am parking legally for the first time in months. That has to be a good omen. But there again, it was probably his old Catholic upbringing coming back to trick him.

Maddy was washing up in the autopsy room. She looked like she had aged five years since this morning. It must be a very bad day in the morgue. She saw him, brightened a bit, smiled, and pointed with a soapy hand back toward her office.

"I'll be back there in a few minutes. Got to finish getting cleaned up. Enjoy the Hershey Kisses in my candy bowl... as if you needed an invitation," she admonished.

Jack gave her a half smile and said, "I might just do that," remembering that he had turned down lunch and a second jelly donut. Besides, he deserved it. It was a shitty day.

He made himself at home and sat at the little round table in Maddy's office near the candy bowl. He looked around. Maddy had pictures of her husband, who was a noted urologist in town, and her twin daughters, who looked just like ten-year-old Maddy miniatures. He picked up a picture of them taken at their weekend home in Pass Christian over on the Gulf Coast of Mississippi. The four looked great: tanned, fishing poles sticking out of the sand, sitting under an umbrella on the beach, with the Mississippi Sound in the background. Maddy looked fantastic and carefree. Something she certainly didn't look like today. Jack was reading her numerous diplomas, degrees, and commendations when the petite M.E. joined him in her office. She saw Jack holding her family picture.

She shook her head. "I'd love to be over in the Pass now. Anywhere but here in this depressing morgue cutting open dead people all day."

Jack nodded. "Yeah, I bet. Me, too. I still want to take you up on that fishing trip offer when it cools off."

"You bet. Right after the lunch you offered this morning." Maddy grinned at him and asked, "What's up at CCMC?"

Jack shook his head. "Not good. An attack last night on one of the nurses who works in the Pavilion. She was raped and beaten up pretty bad. Laid in the bushes for hours until someone noticed her early this morning."

Maddy shook her head. "Oh my, I'm not surprised. The Pavilion is a festering, snake-pit time-bomb. I've autopsied two patients who have gotten killed over there in the last couple of years. We're lucky it hasn't been worse. Monique Desmonde deserves multiple gold medals for staying in that hell hole."

"Oh, do you know Monique? I didn't know that."

"Of course, I know Monique. I love her. We female docs have to stick together, particularly in this godforsaken, good old boy network town. I don't see her as much as I'd like, but we do get together fairly often."

"Good to know. I'm afraid the perp could be one of her patients."

"Boy, Commander, I feel real sorry for you. Monique will protect her patients like they are her children. She's a marvelous physician and psychiatrist. If you ever need an advocate, she is there for you."

Jack shrugged his shoulders and rolled his eyes. "Yeah, I know. There could be a struggle. I've already figured that out. Now, why did you call me down here again on this hot as hell day when I could be eating chocolates in my air-conditioned office?" Jack smiled, but his dark eyes were serious.

The two locked eyes for several moments, and then Jack knew without Maddy telling him. He shook his head and said, "Oh no!"

Maddy just stared at him and said simply, "He's back. St. Germaine is back."

Jack looked miserable. "Yeah, I thought so. I was afraid of that. What the hell, here we go again."

He could feel his gut tighten up and cramp. He was instantly depressed and despondent.

Maddy nodded and said, "Yeah, you're right. Here we go again. And we got zip from the bodies. We still need to identify them."

"So, I guess you're telling me that their throats were torn out just like the lady in 2009?"

"Yeah, and their wrists were slit, as well. We could get no fingerprints off the bodies so, hopefully, your team got some. You were right. The bodies had some pretty scary tattoos on them. They were definitely into the occult. They had less than 200 mls of blood that we could drain out."

Jack looked glum. "This sounds identical to 2009 and 1933, at least as far as we can tell from the police report from 1933. And God knows how many more that we never found. Anything else?"

Maddy gestured negatively and said, "Oh, there may be one thing. I don't think they were killed in the Quarter. There were scrapes to both victims' legs that were post mortem. It looks like they had been dragged. There was grass and pebbles embedded in their clothes that I am sure didn't come from the Quarter. The female's shoulder was broken, possibly from being shoved into a small space or, perhaps, she was dropped from a balcony. I can't be sure."

"I'll have the guys check around. Can you maybe pinpoint the grass or rocks?"

Maddy nodded. "Will do my best. We're running them through the database. We're also data-mining everything we know. Jack, have there been any sightings of St. Germaine lately that you've heard about?"

Jack shook his head. "Only the ones from tourists who have been on cemetery tours or have over-indulged. We are always getting St. G. sightings from drunks, at least a couple a week. We investigate, but there is nothing. We've found nothing substantive since just before the 2009 murder," Jack reported and sighed with fatigue. "Damn, I feel about two hundred years old now. We don't need this Maddy. Keep it to yourself. We don't need any media hype of this stuff. You know the mayor will have a fit, and we'll get the BS about hurting tourism."

"Got'cha. Okay. I'll ask the tech to keep quiet, but you know I can't promise anything. Word, no matter what you do, travels in cases like this. Just be prepared for a media onslaught."

Jack nodded. "Just do your best and keep in touch."

"You, too." Maddy hugged Jack for the second time that day. "We've got to stop meeting like this," she quipped.

"Yeah, for sure. Thanks, Maddy," Jack said as he left her office.

Jack couldn't wait to get into the solitude of his luxury automobile, cut on the air, and be alone for the second time that day. He unlocked his car, laid his head back on the Cadillac's thick cushions, and closed his eyes, grateful for the darkly tinted windows. After a few moments, Jack once again forced himself to review the legend of St. Germaine. He really didn't want to, but he knew he had to.

If there was one thing Jack knew a lot about, it was New Orleans's dark and murky underworld. Witches and black magic, voodoo, and the occult, they were all part of New Orleans's sensual, shadowy underbelly that Jack had learned to navigate as a rookie cop. While most cases were readily solved, it was true that the St. Germaine cases remained an enigma to even the most senior members of the NOPD, including Commander Jack Françoise and his dad, retired NOPD.

St. Germaine sightings were reported either by sober, imaginative, and/or terrified locals or by drunken tourists walking the dark streets of the Quarter at night. Legend had it that Comte St. Germaine, a Frenchman of royal lineage, had lived in Europe for many years before immigrating to New Orleans shortly after the city was settled. St. Germaine was known to be an extraordinarily wealthy man with amazing abilities, who had left France shortly before the French Revolution, fearing for his life. It was rumored that St. Germaine was a musician and could play any instrument but favored the piano and the violin. The comte was also well versed in linguistics and was fluent in many languages. In addition, he was charming, eloquent, and an excellent conversationalist. St. Germaine had a reputation for liking the ladies, although he never married. It was also said that he liked men as well.

As Jack continued to review his knowledge of the comte, he remembered his grandfather talking about St. Germaine when he was in his eighties, expressing how unfair it was that his good friend never showed his age. In fact, no one ever knew St. Germaine's age because he never seemed to change physically. He was and always purported to be about forty years old, although he remained that age for at least a half of a century according to octogenarians who had known St. Germaine in their youth. Many of New Orleans's finest citizens had partied with St. Germaine in their early years and swore his face never aged.

In addition to being ageless and rich, St. Germaine was known to have wonderful dinner parties where his friends would dine for hours on the very best cuisine that New Orleans had to offer. Germaine was never seen to take a bite. He never ate. He only sipped red wine, pleading a sour stomach and a taste for only "white" food. The comte loved the ladies, but never had a steady girlfriend or mistress. Many New Orleanians reported he visited the brothels almost every night. In fact, Germaine was on the A list for years, much loved and revered in his adopted city. A dinner invitation from the comte was to die for, until one night when things seemed to go amiss.

St. Germaine had hosted an amazing dinner party that included guests from Europe as well as the locals. After everyone had left, he asked a very lovely lady to have a nightcap with him on his balcony. All seemed well until the lady murmured that she must leave to prevent gossip about them. Suddenly, St. Germaine lunged for the beautiful lady, grabbed her tightly around her shoulders, and tried to bite her neck while pressing her slender body against the ornate wrought iron balcony. Fortunately, for the lady, the balcony was rusty and gave way. She plunged to the ground and landed in azalea bushes, apparently unhurt, and ran through the Quarter for safety.

The incident was reported to the police the next morning, but when the police invaded St. Germaine's home, the comte had disappeared. The police searched his home and only found tablecloths with large red splotches that appeared to be wine, although it was later determined to be part wine and part human blood. In his wine cellar, St. Germaine had stored hundreds of bottles of red wine with French and Italian wine labels, but a random testing of the cache proved them to be a mixture of wine and blood. Several cases of this wine had remained in the NOPD evidence room until it washed away in the Katrina waters a few years back, along with almost all the evidence from the St. Germaine case. But, the proof was clear that the bottles contained wine and blood.

As the air conditioner continued to purr softly, Jack felt himself falling asleep and gave into the feeling. It had been a pretty rough day, and it wasn't getting any better. He deserved a few minutes of shut-eye. He continued to drift off until he was rudely awakened by a blaring horn of a presumably irate driver. After flipping the driver off, Jack shook his head to wake up and shake out the cobwebs remaining in his brain from his short nap. Jack also managed to convince himself that St. Germaine was a legend and only a legend, just another good old NOLA ghost story. But, then reason and logic set in and he was forced to confront the number of unsolved murder cases and deaths where the bodies were discovered upon autopsy to have no blood or just a minimal amount of blood. The most recent case had occurred in 2009, but three other cases had occurred in the 1980s, shortly after Jack had joined the NOPD. Police records also had similar crime reports that dated back to the early 1900s. Unfortunately, a lot of those files had been lost in the floodwaters of the storm.

The unsolved cases perplexed Jack beyond belief, and it pissed him off that he had been unable to solve the crimes. He also wondered about the hundreds of people who had disappeared in NOLA over the years, never to be heard of again. Of course, many of them were prostitutes and druggies, but they didn't deserve to disappear without a trace. There were also hundreds of bodies that had washed up on the shores of the mighty, muddy Mississippi, too decomposed to identify. Fortunately, now they could often identify the corpses via DNA evidence, but even that evidence had been lost in the storm. He was no closer to solving the St. Germaine legend than he had been in the 1980s, and he didn't like that feeling. It irritated him beyond belief. Then he returned to his theory that St. Germaine was a serial killer who preyed on the vulnerable and downtrodden. He continued with that thought until his cell phone rang. Damn, he thought as he listened, here we go again.

After lunch, Alex made several attempts to analyze pending malpractice claims. She was totally not into it and her attention kept returning to Angie and the night before. She called the O.R. and learned that Angie was in the recovery room. A little after 2:00 p.m., her temporary secretary, Mona, checked in and Alex asked her to transcribe the depositions that were left over from yesterday. Unable to work, Alex decided to go off-campus to the psychiatric units to learn if the team had uncovered any possible suspects.

The heat was unbearable as she walked the distance between the main hospital and the Pavilion. Alex noticed the cordoned-off crime scene. The yellow-taped area showed her exactly where Angie had been assaulted, raped, and beaten. Several detectives were still trying to uncover any bits of evidence that could possibly exist. Alex wasn't surprised to see Commander François directing them. Jack waved as Alex passed. She looked at the shaded areas and shuddered when she thought of how dark it must have been last night and how scared Angie must have been. The crop of trees where Angie's body had been found was dense, and the overhanging moss gave the area an eerie feeling, even during the day. It must have been awful for Angie. Alex said a quick prayer for Angie and her family.

The Pavilion loomed in front of Alex, and she couldn't believe how ominous the building appeared, even in the daylight. The psychiatric hospital was a two-story converted storage building, painted grey in color, with most of the windows barred or shuttered, either to protect against the summer heat or to keep patients from looking out — or, more likely, jumping out. Alex wasn't sure which. Probably more to keep patients from jumping out of the windows, she finally decided. Some of the bars in the windows shone brightly in the Louisiana sun. They were a gunmetal color. Everything was grey. How depressing. It was all absolutely, totally depressing, Alex thought to herself as she entered the building.

The foyer of the Pavilion presented as much as the outside, grey and dreary. A pair of metal benches with grey, fake leather cushions was on either side of the door, and a bank of elevators stood to the right. The walls were painted grey. Alex wondered what had happened to hospital green. That used to be the color in hospitals. The doors to the stairway and several other areas were locked. Good, Alex thought to herself, as she tried to open them.

The silence in the foyer was deafening. Alex could hear herself breathe. As she looked around, she thought about all the sick, deranged, and criminally insane patients who had crossed through this space. Deathly quiet. It was as if the walls were waiting for her to say something.

She pushed the elevator button and it slowly crept down toward her, making a slow rattling noise. Geez, the elevator sounds like someone rattling chains, she thought to herself. There was nothing normal or comforting about this place, she surmised, as the metal albatross rolled to a banging stop, and the door crept open. The elevator was unmanned. There was no operator onboard. Usually, the elevator would be manned by a psych tech or mental health worker to usher people up and down the floors of the old storage building — for safety reasons, of course. As she began the slow ascent to the inpatient units, she wondered if the lack of an elevator operator was also part of the budget cuts. She sighed sadly to herself.

Exiting the elevator, Alex walked over and rang the bell for admission into the closed unit. She was instantly admitted and escorted by a large man, presumably a psych tech. As they walked down the hall toward the day room, Alex was surprised by the silence. It was as silent as a tomb on the unit. Deathly quiet and dark, the sun shuttered out by long drapes.

She spoke to two psych techs, one from the day shift and one from the evening shift counting sharps. Sharps were globally defined as anything that patients could use to harm themselves. Hopefully, most sharps, along with cell phones, were confiscated on admission, but psychiatric patients who wanted to die were ingenious at finding things to kill themselves with. Razors, scissors, glass perfume bottles, aerosol cans, and any other instrument the patient could use were kept in the nurses' station. Patients could use their razors during admission but only under the supervision of a staff member.

A quick conversation with one of the psych techs alerted Alex that all sharps were accounted for, except for one razor. The tech had laughingly informed her that one sharp was always missing — nothing to worry about. "We're always missing at least one," he'd joked.

Alex didn't share his macabre sense of humor over the missing razor. In fact, she was concerned at the tech's nonchalance and casual dismissal of a dangerous instrument. Alex asked him where the staff and patients were. He directed her toward the community room on the North Hall, where the patients and staff were holding a group meeting.

Alex walked down the hall trying to remember what a therapeutic community was when her cell phone rang. Mona was calling her to tell her that the three o'clock executive meeting was canceled. Alex felt a tinge of impatience as she continued down the hall. She knew Don had not wanted to meet and figured that Farve had probably talked him out of it. She shook her head in disgust.

Finally, she remembered the definition of a therapeutic community. It was a model of behavioral health care that allowed psychiatry, nursing, social work, and patients to work together to establish a trusting environment at the hospital. In an effort to establish a psychiatric milieu, each group had an equal voice in the operation of the unit. The therapeutic community addressed issues and concerns that affected patients and staff. Alex paused outside the door and listened for a few moments.

Today's discussion was centered around the attack on Angie. The group leader was attempting to get patients to verbalize their feelings about the attack and share any knowledge of how it happened. About twenty faces stared at her as she entered the community room. Alex scrutinized the group, looking for a friendly face, but there were none. Only suspicious faces stared back at her.

She was surprised at the mixture of patients. Both genders and all ages were represented. Some patients looked acutely ill, psychotic in fact. A few had tardive dyskinesia, usually caused by the effects of long-term phenothiazine or anti-psychotic therapy. These patients were easily identifiable by their pill rolling mouths and shuffling gaits. One little, old, white-haired lady looked like Mrs. Santa Claus. She sat attentively in the circle, her hands clasped around her 1950s vintage pearl pocketbook. She smiled sweetly at Alex and nodded. Finally, a friendly face. She spotted Monique in the group and gave her a faltering wave.

Dr. Desmonde, once again her unflappable self, signaled her in.

Alex entered the community room and Monique introduced her.

"Group, this is Alex. She's a nurse and the attorney for the medical center. Alex is a friend of Angie's and she wants to help us understand what happened." Dr. Desmonde looked carefully at the group, gauging their reaction to Alex. She was unsure what their response would be to a stranger and an attorney in their presence. She waited calmly for their response.

After a short silence a male patient angrily retorted, "I ain't saying nothing else. Why does she need to be here? She ain't part of this here. I ain't never seen her before!"

Dr. Desmonde looked nonplussed and replied, "Anthony, Alex is Angie's friend. She's here because she cares about her. She wants to know who hurt her. She's not here for any other reason."

Anthony continued to look angry and uncertain as he muttered, "Yeah, yeah, sure. What other BS you got for us, Doc?"

Alex, unsettled for a moment, responded. "Dr. Desmonde is right, Anthony. Angie's my friend. Her twin sister, Bridgett, works with me. I'm concerned about her and what's happened to her." Alex eyed each member of the group. The silence seemed endless, an eternity. Of course, Alex remembered, silences in psychiatry were meaningful. Right? It probably wasn't an uncomfortable silence, it was simply a long silence, but for sure uncomfortable for her. Each patient looked at her speculatively. Some of them seemed skeptical and uncertain of her presence. Others looked interested in having her there. Alex met each of their stares with a straightforward look.

Finally, a female patient spoke to her in a friendly voice. "Hi, Alex. I'm Penny. I am a schizophrenic, so they say. So, I guess I must be. Anyway, I'm doing good now. It's okay with me if you stay." Penny looked around the room and then addressed the group, "She looks okay to me." Penny nodded her approval of Alex. "Whaddaya say? Can Alex stay?"

A dozen heads nodded affirmatively over what Alex perceived as a long period of time.

Only Anthony seemed unsure. He snarled at her and said, "Why in the hell would she want to be with us? We're castoffs, crazies, don't nobody want to be with us." His eyes glittered angrily at her.

Alex looked directly at Anthony and replied calmly, "Anthony, I admire your courage and your ability to voice your objections. I want to stay because I want to hear your thoughts on what happened to Angie. You know people around here. You may have information that could be useful in helping us solve this terrible crime. Angie didn't deserve what happened to her. She worked here because she cared about you." Each group member seemed content with what Alex had said. Only Anthony continued to stare at her suspiciously.

"Yeah, so you say." Anthony's voice was mocking her. "Angie got a paycheck for comin' here. She may have cared some, but the money was why she came. She's okay, I guess. But, don't hand me no bullshit. She didn't care that much. Besides, she was scared. Angie was scared of us. I know that. All of us do." Anthony looked around at the group, grinning as he spoke. His look was sinister. Several of them nodded their heads in agreement with him. He glared at Alex and growled, "I'm sure that whoever hurt her knows, too. Anyway, we know we cooperate with you or we stay here longer. I'm in for now." Anthony, still mistrustful, gave Alex a shifty look, glared at her, and then looked at the floor.

Alex said simply, even though her heart was beating full force, "Thanks, Anthony. I'll take what I can get. Don't let me interrupt. Just continue as if I wasn't here." Alex felt frenzied, uncertain. She turned to Monique, her eyes pleading with her to take up the reins of the group therapy meeting. Monique nodded at the group leader to continue. Alex was definitely out of her comfort zone and she knew the patients on the unit knew it.

The group leader continued the meeting. "Now, group, before we were interrupted, we were sharing our feelings about what happened to Angie. Rose, I believe you were talking."

Alex turned her head toward the patient identified as Rose. She looked to be in her thirties, was waif thin, and had long, stringy brown hair. Alex thought Rose looked afraid of her own shadow. She wondered if she'd been abused at some point in her life. Rose literally seemed to shrink and almost become invisible as the group stared at her.

"I... I... feel so awful for Miss Angie." Rose's voice was soft and hesitant. "She was nice to me. We talked last night, just before Jim started that fight in the day room." Rose looked around at the group and saw them staring intently at her. Her voice faltered, and she began to cry. Then, she said,

"Angie and I could have talked longer, but Jim ruined our conversation." She gulped, her thin shoulders heaving in despair as she burst into sobs.

Anthony's voice was hoarse with anger and resentment. "Why are you crying, Rose? You're such a little crybaby bitch. Ain't nobody hurt you yet. You're such a cowardly little piece of crap. You're a slut, just like all the women. You remind me of my..." Anthony's voice had become louder and louder as he screamed at Rose, his face livid with rage. Suddenly, he stood up and lunged toward the frail, pale woman, who seemed to shrink away from him. He was going for her neck.

"Oh, no! No! No!" Alex could only exclaim. She was unable to move, paralyzed in her chair.

In a flash, Donna Meade, the nursing manager of the general psychiatry unit, a behavioral health tech, and Dr. Desmonde wrestled six-foot Anthony to the floor, pinning his arms behind him. Donna Meade left for an instant to ring the "all staff alarm" red button located by the door. The ASA was to psychiatry what a code blue was on general hospital units. It announced a psychiatric emergency and requested that all available staff report immediately to the location. Within seconds, two additional male psych techs and a second RN appeared with the syringe of Haldol, which, after a nod from Dr. Desmonde, was administered into Anthony's upper arm. The two psych techs led Anthony away to the seclusion room while the rest of the patients stared.

It was then that an acute realization hit Alex. These people, these patients, had their own culture, their own pecking order. They had their own leaders and power structure. Anthony was the power structure. Now that he was down, no one was going to say much or offer any significant help.

Alex felt safe for a moment. Then she realized, with a sinking feeling, that she was in a very dangerous situation. Suppose the other patients acted out? Didn't that happen often? She tried to remember from her nursing school days. Didn't one patient incident spark other patients to act out? Like an avalanche? Of course they did. She felt her heart rate pick up quickly, and the hair on her arms stood up. She felt chilled. Yes. That is what happens. That's exactly what happened last night in this very place! Alex looked around furtively.

Several patients were agitated, rocking back and forth in their chairs in perfect rhythm. Another patient was plucking invisible particles from the air. Alex felt her heart fill with panic. Just to her left was another large man. He suddenly began screaming and pulling at his hair. Then he stood up and started pitching empty chairs against the window, hollering that he had to get out and save his baby.

Donna Meade looked at the patient, calmly touched his arm, and said in a soft, steady voice, "Jim, stop throwing the chairs. You're okay now. You're in the hospital and nobody's going to hurt you. Please, you're upsetting the other patients." Donna's voice was calm and quiet. She slipped her hand into the crook of Jim's arm just as he was about to toss another chair at the barred windows. He immediately replaced the chair on the floor.

Jim gave Donna a confused look. Then recognition seemed to appear on his face. "Oh, oh, oh! I gotta get outta here. I gotta go. I'm sorry, Donna. I didn't mean to cause no trouble." Jim's eyes were terrified and were full of tears. He looked ashamed of his behavior. The huge man was literally cowering before the staff and the patients.

"I know, Jim. You just couldn't help it. Let's go to the quiet room and rest awhile." Donna continued to hold his arm gently.

Then, to Alex's amazement, the large man allowed the petite Donna Meade to walk him to the secure quiet room.

Donna motioned to Monique that she needed some medication and then said to Jim in a quiet voice, "I want you to rest for a little while. We'll talk about this later."

Alex shifted her eyes from Jim and glued them on Monique. If Monique left her in the community room, there'd be no staff member at all to subdue any patient outbursts. In fact, they had been lucky that Donna had been able to quiet Jim. It would have been impossible for Alex, Donna, and Monique to wrestle the enormous man to the floor.

Several minutes ticked by. It was finally quiet. The only noise in the room was the click, click, click sound of someone clicking their tongue against the roof of their mouth and the squeaking of the two rocking chairs as the patients continued rocking back and forth.

Monique made a decision. She spoke to the patients in a cool, calm voice, glancing at her watch. "Our time is about up. Why don't you all take a break and then report to where you should be at four o'clock. Rose, you can go to my office because we have individual therapy at 4:15. The rest of you know your schedules."

The patients left the community room quietly. Only the two rocking patients remained. Alex breathed a sigh of relief. She was impressed with how Monique had handled the situation. Dr. Desmonde's firm tone of voice had waylaid any further patient outbursts. The psychiatrist had taken control of a potentially dangerous scenario by neither acknowledging nor discussing the situation and by redirecting energies of the patient group in a positive manner. Her behavior and poise were highly professional.

Alex glanced around, still uncertain of her surroundings. "Monique, we've gotta talk—" Alex began.

Monique lifted her index finger to silence her. "Yes, but first I've got to make sure Donna got Jim to the quiet room. Wait for me. I'll send some medicine and a psych tech back here to deal with these two." She gestured at the two remaining patients.

Alex left the community room and walked into the central nursing station, behind a door and glass windows, where she felt much safer. She was relieved to see the patients playing board games and watching the soaps on TV. She wondered to herself just how therapeutic watching soap operas could be, but figured it was better than beating up on each other and the staff. She decided to keep her mouth shut about what she thought was therapeutic. She turned and saw Dr. Desmonde in the medication room and followed her. She watched Monique select a 3 ml syringe from the locked cabinet, snap the top off an ampule of Haldol, and deftly fill the syringe. Monique continued to draw up Ativan for anti-anxiety and Cogentin to combat the side effects of the Haldol.

"Alex?" Monique intoned as she nodded toward the hall.

Alex and Monique walked deliberately down the hall to the quiet room, where they found Donna and Jim talking quietly. Jim had been crying. As they entered the quiet room, he spoke.

"Donna, I don't know what gets into me. These tempers just come. I don't know what to do. I need help. I'm scared. I never know what I'll do next." Jim was so upset, he began to sob, his voice coming out in great gulps.

Donna patted his shoulder reassuringly. "Jim, we're gonna try to help you. We care about you here in the Pavilion, don't we, Dr. Desmonde?" Donna's acknowledgment of the physician's presence drew Jim's attention to Monique.

He looked at Dr. Desmonde sadly and said, "Sorry, Doc. I just need more help. I don't know what's happened to me. Is there something else you can do to help me? A new pill or something?" Jim's voice was desperate.

"I know, Jim. I know you don't understand your outbursts and, yes, we will continue to help you." Dr. Desmonde looked sad as well. "We'll keep working on it. We've made some headway. I've made you a shot that'll help you rest. Where do you want it?"

"Can I have it in my left arm? Last time it was in my right." Jim pointed toward his left deltoid muscle.

"Well," Monique hesitated, "this needle's a little long. How much muscle do you have in that arm?"

"Doc, I got muscle. I just don't have no brains!" Jim smiled for the first time.

Alex was surprised at how handsome he was. He had a beautiful smile, dark hair, and perfect, brilliant white teeth. She guessed he was in his mid-thirties. He looked to be of Irish descent. The Black Irish, Alex wondered to herself, acknowledging her knowledge of Jim's bad temper. How very sad if he is really one of them.

Dr. Desmonde returned his smile as she injected the needle and said, "You've got plenty of brains, Jim. They're just a little scrambled right now. We'll get them fixed!"

"Thanks, Doc, Donna, and Alex. I'm pretty tired now. I guess I'll sleep awhile. See you soon." Jim turned over in the bed of the quiet room.

Alex was impressed that Jim had remembered her name and said so to Monique and Donna on the way down the hall.

Donna said, "Jim's very bright. I'm not surprised at all. I like him. He wants to get better, and I want to help him." Donna's voice was concerned, her interest in helping the patient obvious.

Dr. Desmonde looked narrowly at Donna. "Don't let personal feelings get in the way of professional judgment, Donna. Jim's very ill, psychotic. Don't set Jim and yourself up for disappointment. Don't get too involved in this case." Monique's voice was sharp and a little accusatory.

Donna's face turned red and she replied hotly, "I hope you're not suggesting I have feelings for Jim that are other than professional! There are no boundary issues here for you to be concerned with." Her voice was cold and defensive. "It's just that most of our patients are chronic and we never really help them. Besides, most of 'em don't want help. Many are so manipulative that they can't be trusted. I doubt many of them even want to get well. Jim does. That is the impetus driving my 'involvement' in this case." Donna was enraged and felt attacked.

Monique was quiet for a moment and then spoke. Her voice was repentant and reassuring. She'd accepted Donna's rebuke with grace. She shook her head and said, "I'm sorry, I apologize. I know how you feel, Donna. I have a special place for Jim myself. But we have to keep it all in perspective. I am sorry if you think I suggested that your involvement is anything other than professional." Dr. Desmonde's voice was pensive and apologetic. She hugged Donna around the shoulders and added, "Nice job in there, gal."

Donna hugged her back. "Thanks, Monique. But you and I both know we've gotta do something about this place and the staffing. That situation could have gotten completely out of hand — the one last night did! My nurses are scared. Several are terrified and are planning to leave the Pavilion." Donna stopped for a minute and then admitted, "I'm scared too, and that's not even factoring in what happened to Angie. The patients are getting sicker and sicker and more and more violent, especially since we started taking the ones from the state hospital that Lester Whitset contracted for. We're not staffed for those types of admissions."

Dr. Desmonde sighed. "Yes, yes. I know, Donna. I'm trying to get more positions allocated even if they are only muscle positions. I'd be thankful to have strong bodies to help us in emergencies like this one today. Since we've been under this contract management, it's next to impossible. We need more behavioral health techs to help us out when we have these outbursts of violence."

Alex nodded in agreement with Monique and said to Donna, "I'm concerned about your staffing, too. You don't have enough staff to handle such severely ill patients and control these kinds of situations. What's your typical census?"

Donna responded quickly, "We've got twenty-two general psychiatry beds and average about eighteen or nineteen patients. Usually, eight or so of them are overtly psychotic and have histories of violence or acting out behavior. The rest are acutely depressed or have organic brain syndrome and/or Alzheimer's disease."

Alex nodded in understanding. "How long have we been mixing the elderly and the adolescents with the others? I thought they used to be separated." Alex asked, looking questioningly at Monique and Donna.

Donna shook her head and answered, "We started mixing them at the time the contract manager started. Whitset cut our staff twenty percent, making it impossible to run an age differentiated behavioral health unit. He maintains that a therapeutic milieu can occur with all ages together, so everyone can 'learn from each other'! Isn't that some crap? We've even had to eliminate geriatric and adolescent tract therapies. We couldn't staff them!" Donna's voice reflected her dismay.

"How's it working?" Alex asked.

"Not well, not well at all I'm afraid," Donna said. "The patients just don't identify with each other because of their ages. Mrs. Smithson, the elderly patient with the apple cheeks, is appalled when the adolescent female patients talk about their sex lives and how they have to have 'it' every day. The way they talk about sex is disgusting to Mrs. Smithson, and I know it horrifies her. In fact, her son told Angie last night that he thought she was worse. He said he was gonna transfer her to Ochsner's private geriatric program. I don't blame him. She could get better care there, at least more care directed toward her age group. I'd move my mother over there, as opposed to here, so she could get better care. No question about it." Donna shrugged her shoulders.

"Is Mrs. Smithson the little lady who looks like Mrs. Santa Claus?"

Monique and Donna nodded.

"Why's she here?"

"She's in for a reactive depression. Her husband died in April and her only daughter, her caregiver, has rheumatoid arthritis and breast cancer. It's very sad, but also very typical for people in her age group. Her son is correct when he says we haven't helped her. Older patients need a different kind of care that is more structured to their place in life and their late life losses. Do you think we have been effective with her, Monique?" Donna looked carefully at Dr. Desmonde.

"Perhaps the meds have helped some, but basically we haven't helped her much. You're right, Donna. What we are doing isn't helping. I'm philosophically opposed to mixing these patients, but in view of managed care and reimbursement, we have no choice. I guess some concentrated care is better than none at all. At least we can watch her for suicide attempts — at least, most of the time." Monique looked sheepishly at Alex and Donna.

"What do you mean, most of the time?" Alex asked, her voice anxious.

"Face it, Alex. I usually have two RNs and two psych techs on the day shift. There is even less staff on evenings and nights. We have no security and not a lot of muscle to wrestle these people down if they have outbursts. My RNs have to assess each patient, do paperwork, run groups, give meds, handle emergencies, and participate in community meetings. The psych techs supervise the daily care of the male patients and, together with the RNs, monitor the five-step patient responsibility level. Maybe it will get better when the new health reform act goes into effect. I heard that it may."

"Five step what?" Alex asked.

Donna explained, "Well, it's really not five steps anymore, not since the length of stay decreased to three or four days, sometimes even less. It's a system of patient responsibility level used as a gauge to grant individual patient privileges. As patients improve, they're given more responsibility and freedom. On level I, patients are restricted to the floor. On level V, they may leave the floor unescorted and take unaccompanied trips off hospital grounds—"

Alex's legal mind was racing. Her thoughts scared her. She interrupted Donna, "Are you suggesting that we could have possibly sanctioned an activity where one of the psychotic patients could have left the hospital last night and attacked Angie, with CCMC's blessing?" Her eyes were wide with worry.

Dr. Desmond intervened. "No, we haven't had a patient on level V for several years, mainly because insurance won't pay. They figure if the patient can be off hospital grounds, he can be out of the hospital. Most of our patients reach level III, meaning that they can leave the unit in a group, escorted by a staff member. They go to the coffee shop for meals, the gift shop, and so on. Right, Donna?"

Donna looked pleased. "Good, Monique. Very good. You are the first attending shrink that ever understood the system! I'm proud of you." Donna grinned at Dr. Desmond.

Alex smiled as the nurse and physician high-fived each other.

"I don't know if admissions will ever return to the pre-HMO days when a psychiatric admission actually changed behavior. According to news reports, mental health services are supposed to get better under the new health care system. Supposedly, thirty-two million additional mentally ill people will receive psych benefits and the benefits of the thirty million Americans who already have them will improve. I just don't see how that is going to happen, but it surely sounds good," Monique added. "Of course, I am totally clueless on how we are going to care for them. We have no space for more admissions now, and I'm pretty sure we have more than our fair share in Louisiana," she added.

"Yes," Alex agreed. "It sounds good in theory, but it's all determined on how states interpret the "rules" set forth by the president. Some states could make as many as 500 drugs available for the mentally ill, while other states may only allow access to 250 drugs. Benefits will occur on a state-by-state basis. The same will be true for in-patient care for the acutely mentally ill and for substance abuse treatment. Some states may allow longer acute care stays or better rehab programs than others. It remains to be seen how all of that will settle out, particularly in Louisiana."

Monique looked at Alex and repeated, "Yes, particularly in Louisiana. I think we already know and shouldn't look for much to improve. There will be no silver linings for us," she added regretfully. "We'll just have many, many more patients with no place to put them. I'm not looking for any great fixes to occur in the next few years."

"Anyway," Donna continued, "getting back to your question about patients leaving the unit, each staff member is allowed to take five patients off the unit at one time. And, believe me, the patients raise hell if they've earned level III and they don't get to go. It goes back to basic trust in the building of the therapeutic environment. If our psych techs are out with patients, it's hard for the few who are left caring for the others to monitor everything. There are just not enough of us. We do usually monitor the seclusion, suicide, and quiet rooms, though. We're pretty good at that, unless there's a patient or staff emergency on the floor." Donna looked a little sheepish.

"I'm happy to hear that," Alex said wryly to Donna. "I'll do my best to get you some more help."

Donna smiled, looked grateful, and said, "Alex, I don't mean to kick a gift horse in the mouth or anything, but Sarah Chassion, the nurse manager who heads the prison unit, is in worse shape than I am. Her patient population is much worse and more violent. Many of them also have medical needs.

Lots are HIV-positive and/or recovering dopers. That's not even mentioning the serial killers, rapists, and murderers they care for over there. As a matter of fact, Sarah swears there is a dope line coming into the prison unit. She has the same staffing ratios I do, and although my job is hard, hers is even worse." Donna looked at her watch. "I gotta go. It's almost five o'clock, and the daycare gets ugly when you're late picking up your kids. Thanks for your time." Donna waved at them on her way out.

Monique turned to Alex. "I've got to go also. Rose is waiting for me in my office. Do you have time to catch a bite to eat with me in the cafeteria around six o'clock? I'd like to talk about things."

Alex nodded. "Sure. By the way, Don refused to meet with us today. Big surprise, huh? He says he has little authority on psych because of the contract management."

"Yeah, gee, what a surprise," Monique agreed sarcastically.

"Sure, I'll meet you. Is it okay with you if I review some of the charts up here? I'd like to know a little about the patients."

Monique smiled at her and laughed. "Alex, you know darned well you don't need my authority to review charts. Help yourself. But, thanks for asking! See you at six o'clock!" Monique flashed her a smile as she dashed off.

"Pick me up in the nurses' station," Alex said, watching the elegant Monique Desmonde rush off. She again found herself admiring the psychiatrist and her commitment to the deranged and mentally ill. It's a heck of a job, Alex thought to herself. I'd never do it.

There was no one that Alex recognized on the evening shift. She introduced herself to the RN in charge who was supervising level II patients in the day room. The nurse identified herself as Joanne Waters, an agency nurse, who was helping out. Joanne laughingly asked Alex to fill her in on the patients after her review of the patient charts. She admitted she hadn't had a chance to look at any of them. Joanne also reported that one psych tech had taken five patients to dinner in the hospital cafeteria and that the other tech was making rounds. Further questioning by Alex confirmed that Joanne had never worked psych at CCMC. Joanne also admitted she knew little about psychiatric nursing and was pretty scared to be up there after what had happened "last night."

Alex shook her head as she entered the nurses' station, taking several records with her into the staff lounge. She hated temporary agency help. Why not pay their own nurses more and not spend $150 an hour for temporary nurses? This type of care is unsafe, she thought to herself. This place is a catastrophe waiting to happen. At least Farve could hire agency nurses with a background in psychiatric nursing! Of course, as Alex remembered, Farve was a believer in the warm body theory. As Farve saw it, if you had a warm body and a nursing license, you could practice anywhere in the hospital. Alex continued to reflect on the unsafe, risky environment in the Pavilion, imagining how catastrophic things could become. Her imagination in no way prepared her for the reality that was to set in a few short hours later. Psychiatric services at Crescent City were explosive, to say the very least.

Alex had reviewed three charts and was looking at Jim McMurdie's chart when a voice behind her asked coldly, "Who, may I ask, are you?"

Alex turned around in her seat and saw a tall, cold-faced man, who was obviously furious. His face had the appearance of cold granite, his dark eyes looked like chipped, black ice. She stood up to meet his stare. She felt a bit unnerved, but her voice was strong. "My name is Alexandra Destephano. I'm the lawyer for the hospital. Who are you?" Alex's voice was equally cold and formal.

The man had soft features. His black hair was thick and curly, with abundant grey at the temples. His nose was sharp, and his lips were thick and pouty. He had a high forehead. All in all, his appearance was effeminate, and Alex didn't like him. She didn't like him at all.

Alex squirmed under the man's scrutiny. His cold black eyes canvassed her tall, graceful body. Alex suppressed a shudder as his eyes stopped and surveyed her breasts, and then continued down to stare at her hips and long legs. The man was positively undressing her before her very eyes. She was totally humiliated and furious at the same time.

The man extended his hand. "Oh, I should have known. I've heard about the beautiful, auburn-haired CCMC lawyer ever since I arrived. I am Lester Whitset, the onsite contract manager over the psych, oops, I mean behavioral health department here at CCMC. I'm surprised we haven't met before."

Alex accepted his hand. It was cold, so cold Alex likened it to a corpse. It had a clammy feeling and gave her the creeps. Lester Whitset was so white he looked positively dead. Ugh, she thought to herself, as she shivered slightly in disgust. There was something malevolent about him. He totally grossed her out.

"I believe I was out of town when your group took over the operation of the CCMC psychiatric services. That was in March, wasn't it?" Alex knew she was right. That was when she, Jack, and Robert Bonnet had spent three weeks in Virginia, resting up from Mardi Gras in New Orleans.

"Yes, it was. I've heard a lot about you, Ms. Destephano. The grapevine has it that you're a pretty good sleuth. Are you looking through the patient records so you can find our rapist?" Whitset eyed her carefully, a thin smile on his lips, his eyes cold and unwavering.

Alex was stunned by his question. "Actually, no. I witnessed a potential disaster here today, a fight between the patients, Mr. Whitset. I'm glad we've met each other. We have some work to do up here."

"Please, call me Lester. We're colleagues, are we not? I'd be pleased to call you Alex."

Alex was uncomfortable at the thought of Whitset being a colleague. "Yes, I guess we are. In a sense." She stammered her reply, caught off guard for a moment. The man repulsed her, and she wasn't sure why. He gave her the chills. She began again. "Mr. Whitset, I'm concerned about the staffing levels here on the behavioral health units. I understand you cut staff twenty percent when you took over?"

Whitset glared at her and said nothing.

"I'm convinced that staff numbers aren't appropriate to provide safe care to patients or protect the staff. As a matter of fact, I'm not sure we're meeting a minimum standard of care." Alex continued to belabor her point, uncomfortable under his stare.

Whitset's look froze Alex in her tracks.

His voice was equally as cold. "I assure you, Alex, that safety and standards are being met here in psychiatry. My company was hired to reorganize the psych department and to make it fiscally sound. I've been successful in doing just that. We are experts in behavioral health and behavioral health care. Behavior health at CCMC was a money loser before we took over. I've managed to put it back in the black in six short months — an accomplishment greatly appreciated by your CEO, Donald Montgomery."

Alex was not to be bested. She gave Whitset a hard look. "Perhaps you have, but at what cost? I'm not so sure. I plan to assess the conditions here, do a risk assessment, and determine just what the care is like, from a risk management perspective, of course. I may hire a team of risk appraisers from outside of Louisiana to review our practices." Alex watched his face darken, suffused with anger, and then continued, "Furthermore, I'd like a copy of your management policies and documents to review as part of the investigation."

"Anything you want, Alex." Whitset's voice was controlled, and only the pulsing of his right carotid artery gave any indication of his rage. He continued, "My office is your office, any time." His eyes wandered over her body. "Anything else you need?" The man was positively leering at her, and his intent was clear. His voice remained cold. He gave her a sly smile as he touched her hand.

Alex was startled by his touch and pulled her hand away. The man was positively vile. There was something about him that was malignant. "No, nothing. Please send your internal documents to my office ASAP." Alex turned away from him to continue her chart review.

Whitset persisted, "Alex, I'll be happy to. Can I interest you in a cup of coffee in my office? It's a gourmet blend, one of Louisiana's finest."

"No, thank you. I'm leaving shortly." Alex didn't look at him. Her reply was short, to the point.

"Don't work your pretty little head too hard now. All work and no play makes Alex a very dull girl." Whitset's voice was hushed and Alex could feel the chill of his body behind her. Finally, he left the room, his heels clicking in a military-like fashion.

What a weird dude, Alex thought to herself. It took her several moments to relax after he left. Her heart was hammering so hard her chest wall was hurting. There was something about him that was repulsive, but she couldn't articulate it. She continued to think about him for a few minutes then returned to Jim McMurdie's chart.

She was surprised to learn that Jim was a former New Orleans police detective. He was presently on disability from the department due to mental illness. The chart indicated that he had snapped when his wife of twelve years left him several months ago, taking along their six-year-old daughter. His wife had been pregnant with their second child at the time she left. An interview with Mrs. McMurdie revealed that Jim had become more and more aggressive in his behavior toward her. In fact, he had suddenly begun accusing her of having extramarital affairs when she was three months pregnant. It was documented that Mrs. McMurdie had become increasingly frightened of Jim and had gotten a restraining order against him. Jim had become so angry at this that he had tried to beat her, which is what had precipitated her filing for divorce. Jim's medical record indicated the treatment team was hopeful that he could control his rage, anger, and jealousy through psychotherapy and with psychotropic drugs. Alex was about to read the physician progress notes in the chart when Monique Desmonde tapped her on the shoulder.

Alex jumped at the touch.

"Good Lord, Alex. I did not mean to scare you! Are the charts making you nervous?" Monique laughed at her.

"No, Monique. I guess I was just so engrossed in Jim McMurdie's chart that you startled me. Let's go. I'm famished."

As Alex and Monique left the attending chart room, Alex was surprised to see Lester Whitset sitting in the day room talking with the patients. He was joking with Jim and Anthony, who were both still pretty doped up, but out of seclusion. Both patients were laughing uproariously with the administrator. Alex moved a little closer to the entrance of the day room and saw that the three were playing cards. Rose was looking at them disdainfully, in obvious disapproval. Mrs. Smithson was knitting a sweater and smiling benevolently at them.

Alex nudged Monique's shoulder. "Is it usual for Whitset to converse with the patients? I think that's inappropriate."

Monique's eyes traveled to the day room. She shrugged her shoulders and shook her head in disapproval. "Yep, he comes in most every evening. The nurses hate it. They say he usually stays until after bedtime. Sometimes he's here all night. He's available in the late afternoons and evenings mostly. Angie told me several weeks ago that he seemed to upset the patients from time to time. I've asked him to stop, but he maintains it's part of his system of quality assurance."

"That's total BS. Can't you keep him out? It seems unprofessional to me that he should visit with them."

Monique shook her head. "I couldn't agree more, but the answer is no. I can't keep him out. I've asked him not to be so familiar with the patients, but he just smiles at me. He knows it makes me mad, so now I don't say much about it. Actually, most of the male psychiatrists disagree with me. They've heard positive things about him from their male patients. The female patients don't seem to like him. I can't garner enough support from my male colleagues to complain to Don. The whole thing actually disgusts me. Some of the male psych attendings are such pissers," Monique said, obviously piqued by her male colleagues' behavior.

Out of the blue, Alex retorted, "I don't like the man. He gives me the creeps. I just get an uneasy feeling from him. He's so cold. Yuck."

Monique looked at her curiously. "What do you mean cold? Why does he give you the creeps?"

Alex shrugged her shoulders. "I don't know for sure. I guess it's the way he looked at me. He pretty much undressed me with his eyes."

"Yeah, I know that feeling," Monica intoned. "You, me, and all the female staff. I agree. He's inappropriate as hell, but how can you reprimand someone for looking at you, not that he comes under my review? All he ever does is look. He never says anything lewd or vulgar. I wish he would because I'd love to get him out of here on a sexual harassment charge," Monique replied. "That would make my day."

"I'd love to help you, but the guy is way too smart for that. My guess is that he plays it to the hilt without ever doing anything wrong. I just don't like him. And he is so cold." Alex shivered when she remembered her conversation with him.

"What do you mean 'cold'? You've said that twice now," Monique asked.

"Well," Alex thought a moment. "When he extended his hand in greeting and I accepted it, his hand felt cold, dead, like there was no blood running through it. You know, like somebody who's had a stroke or something. It was just gross, like touching a dead person." Alex shivered at the memory.

Monique nodded. "Not sure I noticed that. I try my best not to touch him. Thank goodness, I don't see him much. He's mostly around when I'm not. By the way, Jack's going to eat with us. I didn't think you'd mind."

"Of course not. How did that happen? Does he have any info about Angie or the rapist?"

Much to her surprise, Alex saw a faint blush crawl over Monique's pale face. Her friend looked a bit guilty, as if she had been found out.

"Well," she said with some hesitation, "Jack and I are pretty good friends."

"Yes, well Jack and I are pretty good friends, too, but I don't blush when I talk about him," Alex retorted, confused by Monique's response.

"Well, we sort of decided... well, we're special..." Monique rambled, stumbling for the best way to describe the change in her feelings for Jack.

Alex was losing patience. Then she slowly began to understand. "What? Great day, you and Jack!" She could hardly believe it. Commander Françoise and Dr. Desmond! Jack and Monique! Two of her favorite people. They were an item! She hugged Monique in her excitement.

Monique couldn't stop smiling. She was ecstatic.

"I just can hardly believe this. What a surprise!" Alex smiled brightly at her friend, and the oppression of the Pavilion lifted for the moment. She continued, "Monique, tell, tell, tell. Are you and Jack seeing each other?" Monique didn't respond, so Alex continued to prod her. "Your non-verbals are telling on you, Dr. Desmond. Now, spit it out!"

Monique smiled and turned bright red. "It's not what you think, Alex. We're just good friends. We've had several dates. Well, I guess you would call them dates. Do people date at my age or is it called something else?"

"Of course you date. You can date when you are ninety years old. How did it happen? Oooh! This is the best thing I've heard in days. Tell me!" Alex retorted, unrestrained in her excitement.

"Shhhhh. I'll tell you downstairs. Way too many ears up here. Let's get the elevator." Monique hushed her as she eyed one of the psych techs staring at them.

As the unwieldy elevator labored up to the second floor and then down toward the lobby, the two women chatted excitedly. Taking a seat on a drab, grey bench located in the lobby of the Pavilion, Monique reached for her purse as her iPhone beeped a text message signal. She checked the text message and said, "It's him. He's gonna be late. I'm going to call him back and see when he thinks he can get here. I'm just going to step over here so I can hear a bit better." Monique walked away from the bench and stood near a large potted plant in the corner of the lobby.

As she examined Monique from the bench, Alex was mesmerized by her changing body language. Monique's erect posture relaxed, her speech became less calm and controlled, and she looked ten years younger. Alex could have sworn she heard her giggle. Even her dark hair, pulled up into its everyday chignon, seemed to gleam brighter in the small stream of sunlight that broke through into the otherwise drab, grey lobby.

Alex was overjoyed. Wow, this is unbelievable. I'm loving it. She loves him. I am so happy for her. But, for just an instant, Alex felt a pang of jealousy. She reprimanded herself, bristling with self-anger at her jealousy. She wished she had someone she could fall in love with, someone she could care for. She hadn't had a date since... well, since February, when her love life had once again ended tragically when Mitch has died.

She and Robert saw each other frequently for dinner, but that relationship was questionable and uncertain at best. It seemed unlikely that Alex and Dr. Robert Bonnet could rebuild their relationship. After all, they had been married for almost five years. She worked hard at keeping her depression at bay, refusing to let it overtake and engulf her.

Her thoughts returned to Robert. He had been a brilliant surgeon. Robert lived to heal, to put people back together after major trauma. A rising star at CCMC, and in the medical community at large, Robert was a luminary to the local citizens of NOLA. But in Robert's mind, he was a crippled surgeon and was totally useless. He suffered bouts of depression over his arm injury and potentially lost surgical career. When Alex had reminded him that all physicians were healers and that he could heal people medically, as well as surgically, Robert had become angry with her and shut her out. As a result, he was often depressed and moribund. She didn't know it, but Robert was seeing Monique professionally in an effort to rebuild his personal and professional life.

Robert had been the one who wanted the divorce, not her. She doubted she would ever recover from that rejection. It had destroyed her for a long time. Besides, it had been years since they had been together. They could be good friends now, but lovers? Well, who knows, but she certainly doubted the possibility. Anyway, after the spring, Alex had decided to shut herself away from romance for a while.

She was jerked back into reality from her musings when Monique rejoined her on the bench. Monique was positively effervescent after her call to Jack, her cheeks flushed, her eyes bright, and her spirit lifted.

"Jack wants us to meet him at the Palace Café. He wants to celebrate that someone knows about us. He's naturally pleased that it's you. We were gonna tell you and Robert this weekend, but now that you know about us, can we go celebrate? Can you go? Should we call Robert and invite him for dinner?"

Alex hugged Monique again. "It's your call, Monique. It's your party. I'm up for anything, as long as it involves fun. We deserve some after today!"

"Yes," Monique agreed. "For sure. Today was a bomb. I think I will. Do you know Robert's number off-hand? Never mind, it's in my cell. Where's my brain?"

Monique saw Alex's hesitation and asked, "It is okay with you if Robert comes, isn't it?" Monique returned to her doctor mode and tried to detect Alex's emotions.

"Of course it is, you crazy fool! Call him." Alex watched happily while Monique fished her smart phone out of her purse and walked toward the window to call Robert. She could tell that Monique was leaving a message on his cell. Monique was breathless when she returned.

"I left a message. Can't get to his phone, I guess. I didn't tell him anything. I just asked him to join us. When we get to the Palace, we'll call and text him again. I'm so excited about sharing our secret. We're in the open! No more clandestine relationship. It feels so good. Come on."

Alex giggled to herself about Monique's being in the open remark. "Really, Monique, it's not like you and Jack have come out of the closet!" Monique laughed as they walked toward the parking garage. Alex noticed how dark it was already though it was only seven o'clock in the evening. The trees, together with the moss that hung from them, blocked out any remaining daylight. Angie must have been so scared when she walked alone in the early hours before dawn. As the two women approached the crime scene, Monique squeezed her hand.

After they passed, Monique continued to chatter gaily. "You know, Alex, Jack and I have known each other for years. In fact, we lived in the same neighborhood. Of course, he's older, but we even dated a few times in college, when he was at Tulane and I was in pre-med at LSU. We were never really serious, but we really liked each other."

"Really! No, I didn't know that. What happened?"

"Nothing, really." Monique looked pensive. "I think we just eventually drifted apart. There was no precipitating event, no argument, or anything. I was in medical school. Jack went into the service, came home from the wars, and became a rookie with the NOPD. Later, of course, you know that I married — a disastrous affair." Monique noted Alex's raised eyebrows at this piece of information.

"I never knew you'd been married, Monique. What happened? How long did it last?" Alex was curious.

"Oh, seven years. Seven very long years. I, for one, am a big believer in the theoretical seven-year itch. My husband was a stockbroker. He left me high and dry about ten years ago for a very voluptuous blonde and a career on Wall Street. I call it the chick du jour experience, better known to my close friends and family as Tartlett. So much for forever after." Monique looked disgusted when she described her ex-husband and his affair.

"Great day! That was pretty awful. How tacky! Did it take you a long time to get over it? I'm being snopy, I know. You don't have to answer if it makes you feel uncomfortable."

Monique looked thoughtful. "To be honest, I'm not sure I'll ever get over it! It felt like I'd been stabbed with a knife. It took a long time for the intense pain of betrayal to go away, but it finally did. The thing that remains is the sense of a loss of trust. I really trusted Jeff. I never would've expected him to do that. I thought we had the perfect, professional yuppie marriage — minus the kids, of course." Monique was quiet for a moment. "I guess it sort of makes me afraid to love someone else, to make that kind of commitment. But I do love having someone in my life to share things with."

Alex was nodding her head continually as Monique was speaking. "Yes, I certainly understand that... perfectly. I felt the same way with Robert. I knew we were growing apart, but I never thought he'd want to divorce me. I was devastated."

"I'm sure you were. I think Robert knows now he made a terrible mistake." Monique gave Alex a knowing look out of the corner of her eye.

"Yes, I think he does. Well, tough for him. Now it's water under the bridge. Actually, I know he does. He told me that recently, but it's just not a relationship that I can jump back into — besides, we have lots of other things to work on. We each carry enormous baggage from that marriage and the breakup, not to mention me losing Mitch, and Robert possibly losing his surgical career. I think we're both fighting demons we need to work through. Anyway, what else about you and Jack? How did all this happen?" Alex waved her hands and Monique laughed.

Monique began her story. "You know we saw each other earlier this year, during the disaster at the hospital. Well, anyway, we had coffee a few times during that..."

"Coffee and jelly donuts?" Alex couldn't suppress a smile.

"Yes, yes, oh my God, those damned jelly donuts. Anyway, I didn't see him for several months after Mardi Gras. In May, I was green grocery shopping at the French market and had stopped for café au lait at the Café Du Monde, mainly to tourist watch. I love to watch tourists in New Orleans. Jack was there, too. It was a beautiful day, not too hot. We spent the afternoon together and even had dinner. Ever since then, we've been seeing each other. It feels so good to share this with someone. I'm so glad it's you, Alex. I know how highly Jack prizes your friendship. He loves you, you know." Monique changed the subject as they reached the parking deck. "Did you drive in today, Alex?"

"No, I walked today. I have no wheels, except for Martin. Should I call him?"

"Oh, no. I have my car. It's on level four. Let's take the stairs, work our leg and butt muscles."

Alex groaned, but agreed.

Monique and Alex continued to talk as they climbed the stairs. Alex could feel the four flights of stairs, but Monique wasn't even winded. She continued talking as she skillfully steered her grey Volvo out of the CCMC garage and onto Canal Street, heading for the Palace Café. The two friends chatted incessantly during the short ride to the restaurant. Life was good for this hour.

Monique maneuvered her vehicle right to the carpeted entrance of the Palace Café, one of Alex's favorite places to dine. The Palace was a local favorite and was owned by the famous Brennen restaurant family. Food at the Palace was to die for, and the award-winning restaurant had been serving Creole cuisine in the old Werlein Music building on Canal for years. Monique generously tipped the valet at the door. She and Alex entered the beautiful eatery and spied Jack at a coveted corner table. The maître d' greeted Monique by name and accompanied them to the police commander's table.

Jack rose and kissed Monique on the cheek. He hugged Alex tightly and said, "Yo, Alex, now you know my deep, dark secret! I've had a hard time hiding this from you because I'm so happy I can hardly stand it."

Alex had tears in her eyes as she hugged Jack. "This really is a huge surprise, a gigantic one in fact!" She gazed into the happy, flushed faces of her dearest friends. "This is just perfect. My favorite peeps. I'm so happy for you all and, to be honest, a bit jealous."

Jack nodded, his face beaming. "I know, Alex, and I understand your feelings. Your day is coming, Miss Lawyer Lady," Jack teased. "Just have patience. I never thought this would've happened to an old, fat, nasty bastard like me, but, well, I'm living proof. If I can snag someone, you surely can." Jack smiled lovingly at Monique, who once again blushed at his look.

"You've got that right, Commander. I am amazed that anyone would want anyone who is as big a pain in the butt as you. You're one lucky man," Alex taunted as she high-fived Monique.

"Jack, we want to call Robert and have him join us. Will you do that?" Monique insisted, pulling at his jacket.

"Of course, honey. If it's okay with Alex. Is it, Alex?"

"Absolutely, okay." Alex nodded her head, still shell-shocked at the big, burly, fearless policeman calling her eminent, elegant, psychiatrist friend "honey". Alex had many descriptors for Monique, but honey was certainly not among them. She laughed. "You guys are flipping me out. I really need a drink. This is just great!" Alex's face glowed with happiness for Monique and Jack.

"Champagne, ladies? I've been ordered to make a phone call." Jack pulled his cell from his pocket as he signaled for the waiter.

As the commander left the table to call Robert, he appreciated the lovely decor of the strictly old-line New Orleans restaurant. He ordered a bottle of Cristal in the surprisingly quieter bar, and in less than two minutes, Alex and Monique were toasting each other with beautiful leaded glass champagne goblets.

Robert responded to Jack's call. After a brief chat, Jack returned to the dining room and was happy to see Alex and Monique having such a wonderful time. Françoise was wise in the ways of life, and he knew that bad times far outnumbered the good times. He also knew that the heartache of Angie's attack and rape would surface again in the morning. He had a suspect with a psychological profile that was promising, and it was one of Monique's patients. To preserve the good feelings and the festivities of the evening, he'd made a pact with himself not to allow the dinner conversation to turn to the case. After all, this was a celebration honoring him and Monique.

Jack continued to observe the two lovely women from a distance. He felt his hard policeman's heart fill with love for both of them. Of course, the love was a different kind of love for each woman. Jack had known Alex for less than a year and was very fond of her. He smiled as he remembered how the tall, beautiful, auburn-haired lawyer had stood her ground against his macho police captain's ego earlier in the year. The then 'Captain' Françoise had treated her rudely, undermined her presence, denigrated her position as the hospital attorney, and had generally been a bastard. Of course, this was the barometer the hard-nosed cop used to check people out. Alex had responded to him in a courteous and professional manner but would not allow herself to be bullied. She immediately earned his respect, not an easy thing to do in Jack Françoise's world.

As events continued to unravel during Mardi Gras at CCMC, Françoise finally admitted to himself that Alex was some young woman. His grudging respect for her had increased. He admired her courage and cursed her fearless and stubborn spirit. Jack's fear for Alex's life had culminated in life-saving heroics for both of them, which had created a bond between them for life. Commander Jack Françoise loved Alex like a sister and best friend.

Jack continued to look at Monique. How could a gnarly, overweight, arrogant cop earn or deserve the love and attention that Monique offered him? What could she possibly see in him? Jack couldn't believe his good fortune. Sometimes, he still pinched himself when they were together. Monique was just stunning. Jack was a bit older than Monique, but she looked twenty years younger. Her long hair was still dark and her face unblemished by sun and age. She was tall, a little taller than he was, and she was positively the most exquisite woman Jack had ever met. She was sensitive and completely without pretense.

Monique already knew exactly what he was thinking and even knew how to respond to and handle his dark moods. He was so lucky. He had decided he'd take Robert's advice to lose weight and get himself back in shape, because who knew where this relationship could lead? He wanted to spend a lot of years with the lovely Monique Desmonde, and he wanted to look and feel his best every moment they were together. When he returned to the table, both women were laughing heartily. Jack kissed them both on their cheeks.

"Ladies, I've good news! Robert can join us. He's leaving shortly — should be here in about thirty minutes. He can't stay long because he has to make late rounds, but at least he'll be with us for a short time."

Alex felt her heart flutter for a second and then was angry for feeling excited. What the hell, she thought. She admonished herself and then convinced herself how neat it would be for Robert to learn about Jack and Monique. Robert had known them since childhood. He and Monique had grown up in the Garden District. Jack had lived close by in the Uptown area of NOLA.

Monique smiled at Jack. "Good work, Commander. I knew you could get him. Did you tell him that Alex was with us?"

"I sure did. No offense, Alex, but I think he'd have come anyway," Jack teased her.

"Robert's going to be thrilled for you all. Did you tell him?" Alex asked as she looked at Jack.

Jack answered, looking pleased. "Nope, played it down. I wanted to surprise him. I've been dreaming of this night for weeks." Monique smiled and patted Jack's hand.

Alex's heart warmed at the gesture.

Jack squeezed her hand and turned his attention to the menu. "I suggest an appetizer for now then wait for Robert to order. I'm sure he'll be able to stay later than he thinks. He's not operating, so he can't have too many patients to see, now can he, Alex?" Jack looked inquiringly at her.

"I wouldn't think so. But, you know, it could be an excuse. He could have other plans," Alex speculated, changing the subject. "What should we have for appetizers?"

"I doubt that," Jack replied, as he consulted the menu. "The Creole Shrimp is good. So is their baked spinach dip. Let's start with those," Jack suggested, as he sought approval from the ladies.

The three friends were enjoying their second glass of champagne and appetizers, unaware that they were being watched from the lobby by Dr. Robert Bonnet. Robert stood behind a column at the restaurant entrance. He was curious and intrigued by what he saw. Alex looked lovely. She always did, even on the worst of days. Seeing Alex always made his heart race, but he couldn't get over the change in Monique Desmonde. She seemed to have undergone a veritable metamorphosis. Her eyes were twinkling, her normally pale cheeks were flushed, and her entire body was relaxed. He'd never seen Monique look so beautiful, not even at their senior prom at Sacred Heart high school where she had been his date. And, to think, he'd thought Monique had been reasonably pretty at seventeen. But now, words couldn't capture how captivating she was this evening! Then, his glance shifted to Jack. Jack was laughing, smiling without reservation — very different from the day-to-day, stressed-out police commander.

What in the world was happening here, Robert wondered. Jack looked happier and more relaxed than Robert had ever seen him. His worn face, the deeply furrowed forehead, and dark eyes had all lost their anxiety and fatigue. His silver hair was shining as he nodded toward the two women. Robert continued to watch his friends as an awakening thought invaded his consciousness. At the same moment, he saw Jack cover Monique's petite hand with his big, calloused one. Then he knew! Jack Françoise and Monique Desmonde were in love. Two of his old childhood friends. This was inconceivable, but it was wonderful.

Robert felt tears jump into his eyes, but hastily wiped them away. He'd found himself much more emotional since his injury, and he was overcome with delight. Monique and Jack were as different as day and night. Why, Monique was the exact antithesis of the commander. She was quiet, reserved, dignified, and cool as a cucumber. Jack, on the other hand, was loud, boisterous, volatile, and earthy. Wow, this was incredible! Robert felt his pulse quicken in delight for his two old friends. He quickly strolled toward them.

Jack saw Robert first, his policeman's intuition kicking in. He stood up, heartily shook Robert's hand, and hugged him.

Robert, charming as always, clasped Jack's hand tightly and bent to kiss Alex and Monique on the cheek.

Alex could not help but notice how handsome Robert looked. His sandy blond hair gleamed in the light of the chandeliers. His light tan suit and pale yellow shirt and tie were perfect for the sultry New Orleans evening. His sensitive, warm brown eyes quickly alerted Alex that he had discovered Monique and Jack's secret. They exchanged knowing nods. Alex felt it amazing that they still communicated so well emotionally even though their marriage had been over for years. They were often on the same emotional plane. For some reason, that pleased her. Plus, she had to admit to herself that her former husband was a hunk and very, very sexy. Her heart quickened with memories of their times together.

Robert smiled at Monique and Jack and said in his cultured Creole accent, "I've been spying on you all. I think I've been invited to a celebration. It seems there is love in the air!" Again, Robert smiled broadly at the threesome, showing his perfect white teeth. Monique blushed again and Robert couldn't stand it. He laughed at her and put his arm around her.

Alex felt her heart quicken again at the sight of her former husband. He was so charming, so handsome, and they had been so perfect.

"Good Lord, Monique. You look like a sixteen-year-old girl on her first date! What in heaven's name is happening! Fill me in, Commander," Robert demanded. "You've never been at a loss for words!"

The huge commander looked a bit sheepish, as well as a bit embarrassed. "Yo, Robert. What can I say? Dr. Desmonde told me she has a crush on me. Me! Can you believe it? Big, ugly, uncouth, gnarly me?"

Robert looked at Monique, his eyes twinkling. "Nope, Jack. Actually, I can't. Tell me, Monique. This just couldn't be true. You could like this big, old, ill-bred, uncouth ox?"

Monique was laughing so hard she had tears in her eyes. "Yes, yes, yes. I totally love the uncouth man. Every bit of him! Perhaps I need a shrink," she joked.

Robert and Jack both nodded in agreement.

Alex's heart warmed and she felt tears springing into her eyes as the commander bent down and kissed Monique. She didn't know if she'd ever seen such a beautiful declaration of love.

Robert was enjoying every minute. "Well, I'm glad I'm here to see this. It's pretty special and, boy, what a surprise it is! This is a reason for celebration! I vote for another bottle of wine." Robert motioned the hovering waiter.

Robert sat down next to Alex and touched her hand. "What do you make of this turn of events?"

"I'm astonished, to be truthful. But I think it's wonderful. I'm happy for them both," Alex replied, enjoying the touch of Robert's hand and then wishing she didn't. What is wrong with me? she asked herself. He is a hunk and he wants me...

Robert proposed a toast to the happy couple and the four friends talked animatedly throughout dinner. Over coffee and dessert, Monique asked, "Robert, do you know how Angie Richelieu is doing? Did you oversee her surgery?"

Jack took Monique's hand in his. "Are you sure we want to talk about this tonight? This is our night. Let's wait until tomorrow," Jack pleaded.

Monique was quick to reply. "I do, if you don't mind. It won't put a pall on my happiness. What about the two of you?" Monique looked across the table, eyeing Alex and Robert. No one objected so she continued, "Well, let's just talk for several minutes, get an update from Robert. After all, we have the best and brightest minds at CCMC, right here, right?" Monique asked, rolling her eyes.

Jack smiled at Robert. "Dr. Bonnet, you know we don't have a chance against Dr. Desmonde and the lawyer, two of the most perceptive ladies in New Orleans, if not in the world. I guess I'll have to tell you what I know, although it's just a theory at this point." Jack noted the attentiveness of the group. "Alex, are you okay about discussing this?"

"It's okay with me. I'd like an update," Alex said, turning toward Robert.

Robert cleared his throat but didn't look particularly happy. "Post-surgery, she's okay, stable, but she's been through a lot. Dr. Goshette sutured up multiple lacerations, mostly stab wounds and the majority of those were superficial. We called in Neurosurgery and they had to do a craniotomy with bur holes for her head injury. She had elevated intracranial pressure and her coma had deepened. We put in a temporary VJ shunt hoping to keep the pressure out of her head. She did have a great deal of internal bleeding simply from trauma."

Jack looked impatient. "VJ what?"

Alex ignored his question. "Do you think she will wake up?" Alex asked.

"I hope so. Our main fear is that she was so hypovolemic from blood loss that we had to transfuse her repeatedly with blood. Hopefully, she doesn't have brain damage from the extensive loss of blood."

"I would imagine she lost a lot of blood at the scene. Maybe she bled out," Alex surmised. "I knew she was anemic in the E.D. Sandy thought she was bleeding internally."

"So did we. And, she was. Her blood values are stabilizing somewhat."

"Okay, dammit, okay. Enough medical talk. What is a VJ shunt and what is the H thing?" Jack was piqued and impatient. He always was when he didn't understand.

Alex smiled at the memory.

Monique laughed at Jack. "So sorry, Jack. We do talk doctorease don't we? A ventricular jugular shunt will pump the blood and fluids from her brain through a tube into her heart and then to the rest of her body, which will keep fluids from filling up in her head compressing her brain and causing brain damage. The H & H is the hemoglobin and hematocrit, blood tests that screen out such things as anemia and how your blood clots or doesn't, among other things."

Robert smiled at Monique. "Hey, that's pretty good for a shrink. I thought you all forgot everything about real medicine," he teased.

"Listen, Dr. Bonnet. I could save your life anytime. Don't you forget it." Monique smirked at him. "Remember, I'm double board certified in medicine and psychiatry!" She then turned her attention to Alex and Robert. "We have to get her through the attack trauma and rape. That is going to be hard work."

"Do you think so, Monique? She's pretty levelheaded and feisty. I hope she will be okay," Jack opined.

Alex shrugged her shoulders. "Monique, how do you think Angie will deal with this? What's been your experience in cases like this?" Alex questioned.

Monique shook her head. She looked incredibly tired and dispirited. The warm glow of the evening had burned off. "I don't know. A lot depends on her physical condition and the support her husband will give her. It's hard to predict how a woman will recover from rape and this is supposing that she does wake up."

Alex and Robert mulled this over but didn't respond.

"Robert, what about the slice wound around her face? Did you call in plastics?"

"Yep, Alex. They sutured it. They think there will only be minimal scarring. And she's got the kind of skin that heals well. This whole thing is horrible. Malicious. It looked as though the rapist was trying to deliberately disfigure her or wipe out her face. The guy is clearly a wacko, a real sicko. Those bite marks were harrowing!" Robert's outrage at the crime was clear in his voice.

Alex could see the flush of anger under his tanned skin. I bet he's been on his sailboat over at Gulf Shores. He looks really good.

Alex refocused and felt herself shudder as she remembered Angie's injuries. The psychotic activity she'd seen in the Pavilion freaked her out and gave her chills. As she glanced at Monique, she could tell she was fighting with herself about revealing any possible suspects among her patients.

"Let's just hope she doesn't remember everything." Robert interrupted. "Let's be sure she wakes up first. That is still an if."

"Yeah, really. Do you think she will, Robert? What's the prognosis?"

"It's guarded, Alex. There are clear concerns based on the blood loss and head trauma. We are hopeful, though," Robert added, remembering that he had just said this earlier.

Alex felt depressed. "Let's hope she wakes up soon. The sooner, the better."

Robert and Monique nodded in agreement.

Jack looked annoyed. He obviously felt left out of the conversation. "Does anyone want to hear about my theory?"

"Absolutely. We all do," Alex answered for all of them.

"Okay, it's about time. I am pretty done with the medical talk. I guess I'll have to tell you what I know, although it's just a theory at this point." Jack noted and appreciated the attentiveness of the group. He continued, "Monique, two of your patients in the Pavilion are possible suspects..." He was immediately silenced by the look on Monique's face. She was enraged.

"Jack, how could you suspect two of my patients when you haven't even talked to me? That's outlandish speculation on your part!" Monique's voice was cutting and derisive.

Alex had never heard Monique speak in that tone of voice.

"Now, Monique," Jack chided her. "I told you. This is purely speculation on my part. You asked and I'm only telling you what I think. Besides, do you think I need you to develop a theory on what happened during a crime?"

Monique looked contrite, but Alex knew she was still seething. In fact, Monique was irked.

Jack nodded and continued, "Nothing's official. Do you want to hear, or do you want to change the subject?" Jack looked at her darkly, his voice impatient.

Monique looked apologetic. "I'm sorry. You're right. I guess I spend so much time defending my patients and fighting for them that my response was purely instinct. Go ahead..." Her face was flushed with either anger or embarrassment.

Alex couldn't tell for sure.

"Okay. Remember, it's a theory, not a reality. I talked to one of the psych techs who told me it'd been reported on the 7:00 a.m. shift that the side stairwell door had been left open during the night. Consequently, it's plausible to think that—"

"What? The door was open! That's impossible! The whole building is secured at eleven o'clock at night by CCMC security. Besides, that door is attached to a fire alarm so if anyone had exited through it, the alarm would've gone off. It's inconceivable that—" Monique was even more angry now.

Robert and Alex caught each other's eye. Robert was looking strained, his deep-set brown eyes displaying his anxiety.

Commander Françoise threw up his hands. "Okay, that's it! No more," he said to Monique in a loud voice. "Change the subject."

There was a heavy silence. Finally, a waiter came over to offer after-dinner drinks. They all ordered Irish coffee. They needed something to fortify themselves against the uncomfortable silence. Monique excused herself to go to the ladies' room, and Alex immediately began to explain Monique's position to Jack, who waved her justification aside.

His voice was impatient. "Stop it, Alex. I don't need to hear this. Monique and I have to talk about this sooner or later — either officially or unofficially. She has to open herself up to reason, for God's sake! Angie was brutally raped. The SOB may as well have killed her. She'll carry scars, inside and out, for the rest of her life... if she lives or wakes up... and, dammit, I'm gonna catch the pervert that did it! I don't give a flying shit if it is one of her patients or the president!" Jack stopped for a moment as if to contemplate his next thoughts. He shook his head and continued in a calm voice. "Besides, we've got to learn to communicate about unpleasant things, don't we?" Françoise was so disgusted that he pushed away from the table and went outside to smoke.

Robert and Alex looked at each other across the table. He said gently, "You know, he is right, Al. They've got to talk sooner or later. It's all part of building a relationship."

Alex knew Robert was projecting their own trouble in communicating with the difficulty Jack and Monique were having. She sighed and said, "I know, Robert. I just wished we had gotten through dinner and we hadn't started in with this stuff. The day's been emotional enough."

Robert touched her hand and said, "Monique will be okay. You can bet she's pulling herself together right this minute, and she'll be back to continue this. She's not one to let feelings of any sort hang around. Tricks of her trade, I guess. Do you think we should stay or leave?"

Monique interrupted him from behind.

She was cool and collected, but Alex could detect the fake gaiety.

"You'll stay, of course! You're right, Robert. I'm gonna get this thing sorted out now, once and for all. Where's Jack?" Monique looked around.

"Outside smoking, I guess," Robert said as he gestured with his finger out the window.

Monique looked impatient. "He's trying hard to quit. He has taken your advice to heart and cut down."

"Good, he'd better. He has ten times more reasons to live now that he has you. Now, go get the big guy and tell him to get his tail back in here so we can get this over with. I'm paying the bill," Robert said as he motioned for the waiter.

Monique started to protest, but Robert waved her protests away and demanded again that she get the commander.

Alex smiled. Robert really was good with people. Maybe I will learn to love him again, she thought. I guess anything's possible. Maybe once I work through the hurt of losing Mitch, I'll be able to love Robert like I loved him once. The idea seemed settling to her. She continued to think positively as she said, "Good job, Bonnet. I've never seen you push both a shrink and a policeman around in less than five minutes. I'm proud of you!"

Robert looked at her with a smile on his face and said, "Not just a policeman, Alex. A police commander." He grinned. "Seriously, these people are like family to me. Even though I have a big family here in town, Monique, you, and Jack are my best friends."

"How are your parents, Robert?" Alex was fond of the elder Bonnets, one of the first families of New Orleans. The Bonnets were of Creole extraction and had lived in the Crescent City since it was settled. His mother was a gracious lady who had kept in contact with Alex even after the couple had divorced. In fact, Elisha Bonnet was one of the main reasons Alex had decided to accept the legal counsel position at CCMC. In many respects, the two women were soul mates. Alex had done exactly what Elisha had always wanted to do. She had moved away from the traditional bounds of matrimony into a profession. Elisha had never been brave enough to do so and had lived a very traditional life.

Robert's family lived in the family mansion on St. Charles Street in the garden district, where they led an active social life. The older Bonnets were young for their sixty plus years and were very wealthy. They had extensive property holdings in the French Quarter and on the riverfront. They also owned several of the finest hotels in New Orleans.

Alex had lunch with Elisha often and knew the elder Mrs. Bonnet hoped, although she would never say it, that Alex and Robert would reunite. It was ironic. Her grandmother had also encouraged Alex to reconsider reconciliation with Robert. Alex had great respect and love for her maternal grandmother, and Robert's mother, but she knew the choice was hers and hers alone. Alex had been raised by her grandparents on their farm in Virginia. For all intents and purposes, Kathryn was Alex's mother.

Robert responded to her question. "My folks are fine. Dad said he hadn't seen you lately. They want us to come for dinner on Sunday. What do you think?"

"Sure, Robert. I love your parents. I'd love to come," she said, as she looked across the dining room and saw Jack and Monique. "Uh oh, here they come. Let's hope all goes well."

Jack and Monique were laughing and holding hands as they returned to the table. Patrons at nearby tables eyed the couple curiously.

Alex figured that several of the diners recognized either Jack or Monique.

After profuse apologies from the two lovers, all of which Alex and Robert waved aside impatiently, Monique said, "I've assured Jack... actually, I've given him my ironclad word, that I won't interrupt him or misbehave in any way until he is finished with his theory."

The commander looked at Monique sideways. "Does that mean you're gonna misbehave when I'm done? If so—"

"No, no. I promise!" Monique was so emphatic that the entire group laughed.

"This, this, I've got to see," Robert said. "Monique could never stay quiet, you know that Jack! She was always in trouble when we were little. I'm holding her to her word!" Robert was serious, but his eyes were laughing. "Go on, Jack. Do your thing."

Françoise took a deep breath and continued, "Supposing the door was left unlocked. It's highly possible that a patient could have easily escaped from the Pavilion and committed the crime. Nadine and I reviewed three medical records and two of them stuck out conspicuously. The records of Jim McMurdie and Anthony Gavette are the most suggestive. Their medical histories both report psychoses and dangerous behavior. Anthony even has a rap sheet with a number of arrests for A & B. He's been arrested several times for malicious assaults on strangers. The shrinks think he was psychotic when he committed the acts."

"Yes," Monique agreed. "Anthony is schizophrenic. He has delusions and paranoia. He's even talked in group about having sexual fantasies involving several of the staff. I believe, I'm not absolutely sure, but I think he was arrested in Alabama for attempted rape. Was that in the chart, Jack?"

"Nope, but we will run a check with Alabama and Florida. Is Anthony prone to violence on the unit?"

Monique laughed. "Why don't you ask Alex? Anthony put on quite a show for her today! Tell them, Alex."

Alex didn't think Anthony's behavior was quite as humorous as Monique did, but she smiled to be agreeable and replied, "I'd say he got pretty violent this afternoon with another patient named Rose. She was just talking. Then she started crying, and he went after her in a rage."

"Why? What precipitated the attack?" Robert asked.

Alex looked to Monique for guidance, but she didn't offer any. "I don't know for sure. I had interrupted the community meeting. The group was trying to decide if I could stay and finally agreed that I could, except for Anthony. He wasn't too keen on it. Then, Monique was having them express their feelings about what happened to Angie. Rose was talking about her feelings when Anthony got mad, called her a slut, and went after her. Fortunately, the staff acted quickly, and no one was hurt," Alex finished breathlessly, her heart racing a little at the memory.

Françoise was intrigued and asked, "What else did Anthony say? Anything specific to Angie?"

Alex was trying to remember. "He did say that Angie came to work for a paycheck and that she was afraid of the patients. That's about it. Do you remember anything else pertinent, Monique?"

Monique shook her head while Robert remained silent.

Jack was rethinking the scenario. "Well," he finally said, "Anthony knew that she was afraid of him. It also sounds like he dislikes women in general from what he said to Rose, especially the bit about her being a slut. What do you all think?"

Monique responded quickly. "Short of giving you a long dissertation in psychobabble, it's possible that Anthony was transferring his feelings about Angie to Rose. It's hard to say, Jack. Anthony's paranoid. None of this is conclusive." Monique's voice was skeptical.

Jack looked irritated. "Of course, it's inconclusive. It's a theory. These are just possibilities, what ifs and wherefores, so to speak. What is conclusive is a DNA match on the hair follicles and other evidence pulled from the crime scene. I'll check on our boy with Alabama tomorrow. You never know." Jack was trying hard to be neutral.

Alex broached the next question. "What about Jim, Jack? Do you know he's former NOPD? I think he's on disability of some type now."

Jack heaved a heavy sigh. "I know Jim McMurdie well. Good cop, good guy. I rode with him when he was a rookie. He was a good man, an outstanding police officer. I'll never understand why he flipped. What about him, Monique? Do you think he could fit into this?"

Monique was clearly annoyed at Jack. She responded in an irritated voice, "Jim McMurdie is a good man. He's still a good guy. He's just sick. I haven't finished working him up yet. He's been on the unit for about three days, and I've made a tentative diagnosis."

"Why was he admitted?" Robert asked.

Monique continued, "Mrs. McMurdie, Lynette, called me several years ago and told me that she thought Jim was having some psychotic episodes. Since Lynette's a registered nurse who worked at CCMC before their first child was born, I gave her telephone call credibility."

"I remember Lynette McMurdie. Didn't she teach critical care nursing over at LSU?" Robert asked as he searched his memory. "From what I can remember, she was a real knockout! A beautiful girl."

Monique said, "I don't know. She may have taught over there. I only remember her from the E.D. She and Jim met in the CCMC emergency department. But, you're right, Robert. She's gorgeous. Tall, fair skinned, with long, curly dark hair that she usually wears down. Anyway..."

Robert nodded his head. "Yeah. That's her!"

Monique continued, "Lynette and I had lunch shortly after her phone call and she told me that Jim, out of the blue, started accusing her of having extramarital affairs. She said she was becoming a little frightened of him because he had become so irrational. She told me that the week before she called me, Jim had run outside their house and threatened a stranger who was out walking his dog. He apparently swore at the stranger, accused him of having an affair with his wife, and threatened to kill him if he ever saw him within eyesight of his house again!"

Alex was wide-eyed. "Humph. Wow, that's pretty intimidating. Bet that man never walked his dog that way again," she quipped, trying to lighten the mood. It didn't work. She paused for a moment, and then asked, "What did Lynette do?"

"Well, she tried to reason with him later. Her four-year-old had witnessed the scene and had been frightened by it. Lynette said that when she mentioned it to Jim later, he denied it ever happened. She believed he had no recollection of the event."

"Damn. How long ago was this?" Jack asked.

"It was several years ago. Anyway, I asked Lynette if Jim had been under any unusual stress or pressure and she—"

Jack jumped up from the table and exclaimed. "Damn, that's just about the time Jim was assaulted and beaten in the Quarter. From what I can remember, he was on foot patrol when he and his partner were jumped from behind by a gang of druggies, cop haters so they said. Anyway, Jim and his partner were badly beaten. They were hospitalized for quite a spell."

Monique looked at Jack and marveled at his ability to remember things, from the biggest things in his life to the tiniest details of a crime committed twenty years earlier. "You're exactly right, Jack. Jim was hospitalized for about two weeks with a head injury. He recovered nicely in the hospital. However, about three months after the beating, he experienced a sudden onset of dizziness, headaches, vomiting, ataxia, and left-sided weakness. He came to the CCMC emergency department for a workup."

Robert was absorbed, his medical mind working. "It sounds like he was having a stroke secondary to the beating. Such a sad story," Robert said, lamenting over the fate of Jim McMurdie.

"Yes," Monique said. "It is a very sad case. On neurological exam, there was evidence of left dysmetria and decreased sensation to touch on the left side. Jim had no history of hypertension or any other risk factors for stroke. His head CT scan revealed a left cerebella hemorrhage with massive effect. He had edema present near the fourth ventricle. He also had some mild atrophy of—"

Jack interrupted in an irate voice. "Yo. Wait a damned minute! Don't forget I'm here. Talk my language!" Françoise was once again frustrated because he couldn't understand the medical jargon. "Talk to me, not above me!"

Alex intervened, "Basically, Jack, Jim had a stroke. It also sounds like parts of his brain weren't working based on the atrophy of—"

"What in the devil is atrophy?" the commander barked at them. "Dammit, talk to me, too. I'm sitting here. You medical people are a pain in the..." Jack stared darkly into his Irish coffee, irritated that his friends were talking above him. He hated that worse than anything.

Monique smiled and patted his hand. "Sorry, Jack. Atrophy just means parts of his brain hadn't been used lately. You know the old saying that if you don't use it, you lose it? Anyway, the jealous accusations of extramarital affairs started after his injury."

Robert was intrigued. "This is fascinating, Monique. Do you think that his head injury caused his psychosis?" Robert leaned forward eagerly in anticipation of Monique's answer.

"I think it's possible. There is research to support the premise and—"

Françoise interrupted rudely. "I don't think it's fascinating. I think it's generally piss-poor. A policeman gets injured in the line of duty, has a stroke, and goes wacko. What the hell is fascinating about that? I don't admire the science of it. I just see the loss of a good, honest cop. Sorry." Françoise's voice was bitter as he continued to stare darkly into his Irish coffee.

Robert looked apologetic. "Sorry, Jack, I just—"

Françoise interrupted, "Save it for the medical books, Bonnet, I'm not interested."

There was an uncomfortable silence. Alex surveyed her nails and made a mental note to call for a manicure tomorrow.

Robert took a long swig from his Irish coffee and wished he'd ordered another one.

Monique and Jack stared at each other.

Finally, Monique began again, "Jack, the entire Jim McMurdie story is pure speculation. May I finish?" Her voice was calm, cool.

"Yes, of course, Monique. I just feel differently. McMurdie's a good man, was a fine cop. Now it sounds as if he could be implicated in this crime. It's unfair, it sucks, to say the very least. Of course, finish." Jack's voice was diffident as he raised his shoulders.

"Okay. Anyway, after I talked to Lynette the first time, she called again and reported that Jim was becoming increasingly depressed and irritable. His mood swings were frequent, and he'd begun drinking more than usual. She said she was becoming more frightened of him. She told Jim he had to go for help, or she would leave."

"How did that go? Did he come to see you?" Alex asked.

"Yes. He came three times. He was quiet, withdrawn, and cooperative. He seemed to know he had irrational behavior but didn't know why. He did better for a while, and he and Lynette got some marriage counseling. Things were better. I put him on a course of psychotropic drugs that seemed to help, when he took them..."

"Only a short period... what happened?" Robert remained absorbed in Monique's story.

"Typically, he stopped taking his medicine. I guess there was some sort of incident at work, and the internal affairs division of the New Orleans Police Department put him on involuntary leave. Then Jim experienced extreme melancholia. He was acutely depressed."

"Why was he admitted to the pavilion last week? What was the reason?" Jack asked.

Monique shook her head sadly and answered, "Lynette and Jim were shopping for baby furniture at the mall when Jim saw a man he believed Lynette was having another affair with. He went berserk and attacked the man. His attack was vicious. Jim was psychotic and delusional at the time. Finally, the security guards at the mall subdued him and he was placed on a temporary detaining order and sent, TDO to us. It's extremely sad."

The group digested this information slowly. Finally, Alex asked, "How badly was the man hurt?"

"Pretty bad. He'll recover, though." Monique threw her hands up in frustration. "The worst part is that Lynette, who is seven months pregnant, took their daughter to her parents' home in Baton Rouge. At this point, she's refused to be a part of Jim's therapy."

Alex thought about this for a moment and said, "Can't say I blame her. She's probably frightened to death of him. I would be. Has he ever attacked her?"

"No, he's verbally abused her, consistently verbally abused her, but he hasn't attacked physically — at least not yet, but it is within the realm of possibility." Monique's voice was low.

Jack was once again annoyed. "What kind of bullshit response is that? It's within the realm of possibility that I will attack each one of you at this table. Now tell us what you really think, Monique. I'm sick of this psychobabble."

Monique bristled and her face flushed as the blood poured to it. She managed to hold her temper. "Yes, I think it's highly probable. I think Jim has Othello Syndrome. If he'd attacked Lynette, my diagnosis would be final."

Robert was the first to respond. "Othello Syndrome... like Othello as in Shakespeare's Othello?"

Monique nodded her head. She turned to Jack and explained "Yes, Othello Syndrome is named for the tragic character in Shakespeare's play in which jealousy played a major role in the character's commission of spousal homicide. While the Othello story occurred in the context of a marital relationship in the play, Othello Syndrome can be applied to any generic situation involving sexual or other intimate partners. As you can imagine, there is no clear demarcation as to what comprises 'normal' jealousy versus 'morbid' jealousy."

Alex could tell Robert was clearly intrigued, although he was smart enough not to say so and incur Jack's wrath again. She could still read his face and anticipate what he would say. She wasn't disappointed.

"How does Othello Syndrome first appear? Is it rare? I've never heard of it. How do they diagnose it? How does the patient present?" Robert fired a barrage of questions at Monique.

"Othello appears much like Jim's psychiatric illness has evolved. The forensic literature suggests that Othello Syndrome has appeared as delusional jealousy, sexual jealousy, erotic jealousy, and delusions of infidelity."

"How is it diagnosed? Are there criteria?" Robert asked again, his medical mind working.

"Well, sort of. Othello is often subsumed in the diagnostic criteria described under delusional, paranoid disorder. There can be non-bizarre delusions of unfaithfulness, as well as auditory or visual hallucinations. Sometimes it's hard to pick up the hallucinations, if they're not clearly evident."

Monique stopped for a minute to think. She continued, "Also, if bipolar syndrome is present, the mood swings may be brief or inconsequential to the relative length of the delusional disturbance. I think that's what's going on with Jim. It's hard to group human behavior into tight little boxes. Frustrates me to death, especially when people try to do it." Monique was beginning to look tired, the wear and tear of the day etched on her face.

"I think you're right," Robert surmised. "The diagnostic criteria sounds very much like Jim to me. What do you think?" Robert asked Monique.

"Yeah. It's very possible. There are two things that prevent me from confirming a diagnosis of Othello. Only one has any scientific or medical merit."

The group looked at her expectantly.

Françoise was trying hard to be patient. "Well, Doc, spit it out," Jack said carefully.

"First of all, the spouse is usually the threat in Othello. Jim hasn't physically harmed Lynette yet — although there are many cases reported where Othello patients attacked neighbors, children, and other unknown persons. Certainly, Jim fits into this mold." Monique stopped, as if examining Jim mentally.

"What's the second reason you haven't made a final diagnosis?" Alex asked Monique, gently.

Monique gave Alex a forlorn look. "It's because I don't want to. The syndrome doesn't respond very well to traditional psychotherapy or medication. It has a very poor prognosis. It's a devastating illness."

There was a long silence at the table as the four friends contemplated Jim's dilemma.

"Yeah, this really sucks, big time," Jack concurred, obviously distraught.

"Is there scientific evidence connecting Jim's head injury with the Othello?" Robert asked.

Monique nodded affirmatively. "Yeah. The best evidence suggests that Othello symptoms follow an injury of some type. As a matter of fact, there's currently a National Institute of Health research team working on identifying typical Othello lesions in the brain."

Commander Françoise, who had been thinking, looked hard at Monique. His face appeared to be carved of stone. "Monique, how dangerous are these people?" His look was ominous.

Monique's eyes met Jack's head on. "Incredibly dangerous. Jack, these patients are very, very dangerous. Othello patients harbor hostility toward others secondary to their delusional jealousy. This hostility can result in serious physical violence, including homicide. Some Othello patients murder out of morbid jealousy. These patients can be extremely violent to themselves and others."

"Are these patients dangerous only to themselves and people they know or are they dangerous to anyone?" Jack was pressing Monique for information she didn't want to give.

After a short silence, Monique acquiesced with a faraway look in her eyes. She looked out the floor-to-ceiling restaurant window as she said, "Individuals suffering from Othello Syndrome pose a significant risk to society in terms of potential violence, both in domestic and generic circumstances. Jealousy in its most severe form, the Othello delusion, plays a major role in completed homicides and spousal murders. In this situation, we know he was delusional. He attacked several men prior to admission."

Robert looked carefully at Monique and asked her gently, "Do you think Jim could have attacked Angie?"

Monique replied slowly, "I don't know. I don't believe rape is part of the syndrome. At least, I've never seen it reported anywhere in the evidence. I think that's a significant factor when we look at Jim. Otherwise, he could easily fit the picture of the attacker. He's known to be delusional, morbidly jealous." Monique stopped for a moment to think and then continued, "And he presents as classically evolving Othello Syndrome. Who knows?" She shrugged her shoulders, looking very tired. She added, "I'm wasted. Can we continue this tomorrow?"

Jack felt his phone vibrate in his pocket. As he struggled to get it out and read the text, he said, "You guys timed this just right. Gotta go folks, sorry to leave such great company, but I've got another murder in the Quarter. Third one today." He shook his head. "Damn, this is getting old."

Monique glanced up and said, "Does the police commander always have to show up at every crime scene?"

Jack glared at her. "We've had this conversation. We're all tired, and, yes, this police commander will always show up at crime scenes and that isn't changing."

Monique looked tired and rejected. It was a good thing she had her car. She'd be damned if she was getting in Jack's car. Of course, she was instantly ashamed for having these thoughts. It was because of Jack's sense of commitment that she loved him so.

"Let's continue this tomorrow. Of course," Alex said, "we're all beat. Monique, don't be too upset. It may not even be a Pavilion patient. It could be anyone, right, Jack?"

Jack grinned at Alex. "Yep. You bet, Al. Proof is in the pudding and the pudding in this case is hair follicles, semen samples, and bite marks. "Yo, gotta go. Later," he said as he kissed Monique goodnight.

As Alex, Robert, and Monique walked toward the door of the Palace, Monique said, "I just don't get it. Why in the hell do police rush to a murder scene? They certainly can't help the victim. It's ridiculous."

"Well," Robert opined, "I think it has to do with testosterone and conditioning. And, in this case, a certain police commander who, trust me, will never change."

Alex nodded in agreement.

Monique sighed in resignation. "Yeah, that's why I love him," Monique admitted.

After hugging each other good night, Alex and Robert congratulated Monique again, who waved them away, suggesting that the romance was "old hat" now.

Robert offered Alex a ride and she accepted gratefully. During the ride home, the couple enjoyed a companionable chat. They talked about their happiness for Jack and Monique, as well as how difficult it was going to be for Monique to adjust to being a police commander's wife, if the romance got that far.

After reaching her house, Alex invited Robert in for coffee, but he looked at his watch and told her he had to get back to CCMC. He wanted to check on Angie and several other patients whose surgery he had supervised in the O.R.

Robert walked Alex to the door of her beautifully restored home, remarked how well manicured the lawn was, kissed her briefly on the cheek, returned to his silver Mercedes, and drove off.

Alex felt very alone after Robert left and wished for a few minutes that he had joined her for some decaf. But when she realized how exhausted she was, she was glad that he hadn't. The day had been two days long. She was worn out from thinking about Angie, the crime, and the patients in the Pavilion. Besides, the celebration dinner had been wonderful, but a bit stressful at times. Too bad this had to happen to the couple now. Her thoughts kept returning to Jim McMurdie, but for some reason, her intuition told her he didn't do it. After assuring herself that there was no concrete evidence to implicate him, she went into her kitchen, poured herself a glass of milk, found some chocolate cookies, and took them into her bedroom.

Milk and cookies in the bed were Alex's treat after a long, hard day. She supposed it was the child in her, and tonight she needed to nurture that child because her day had been so terrible. She changed into her nightgown and climbed into her antique Victorian walnut bed and flipped on the TV with the remote. She watched the late news, pleased there was no mention of Angie's rape and beating. The press had virtually persecuted CCMC earlier in the year when patients had been attacked inside the hospital. Alex clicked the TV off and began to rethink the day. She was too tired to be analytical, so she focused her thoughts on Monique and Jack. When her eyes began to feel heavy, she snapped off her light and went to sleep.

At 3:30 in the morning, she was awakened out of a dead sleep by the constant, shrill ringing of the phone on her bedside table. She picked up the handset drowsily.

"Hello," Alex said sleepily.

Someone was trying to talk to her. It was a woman, but she was hysterical. Alex couldn't understand her words or recognize her voice. The woman was babbling.

Alex sat up in her bed, interrupted the caller, and said clearly, "Please slow down. I can't understand what you're saying." By this time she was wide awake, adrenaline pulsing through her veins.

"Alex, Alex, it's me! Monique. Get here as soon as you can. The Pavilion. It's horrible, just horrible!" Monique started sobbing again and hung up the phone.

Depression weighed Jack down like a ton of bricks as he made his way back down Canal to the Quarter. He was upset over his potential disagreement with Monique about her patients, as well as a nagging feeling that their careers would always present a challenge to their relationship. He guessed he'd just have to figure out a way to maneuver around it. He certainly knew he would try. He still couldn't believe the beautiful Dr. Monique Desmonde wanted him. Damn, he was a lucky SOB. He jumped as his police scanner blared in his ear. He was surprised to hear the voice of his PR man, Jason Aldridge. Oh shit, he thought to himself. This couldn't be good. What is Jason doing out this late at a crime scene? This must be bad. He picked up his receiver, a sick feeling in the pit of his stomach.

"Yo, Jason! What's up? Are you at the scene?"

"Commander, are you close?" Jason's voice sounded tense.

"Yeah, I am turning into the Quarter now. What's up?"

"We'll talk when you get here. Hurry up."

"Gotcha! I'm turning in now." Jack signed off, secure in the knowledge that whoever was dead was important. His sense of dread only increased as he searched for parking on the narrow streets of the Quarter. Bourbon Street was party central with all the sex shops, and no one seemed to have any idea that there was a corpse down the street. Jack doubted they would have cared even if they had known it. While the Quarter was the center of tourism in New Orleans, as well as a beacon of history and architecture, it was also home to some of the most heinous crime scenes in the world. And, it was Jack's beat. It had always been Jack's beat. He loved the French Quarter, but he feared its steamy streets and deviant personalities.

What a bitch, Jack thought to himself. There is no parking to be found anywhere. Not even illegal parking. Jack circled a few times and finally pulled his silver caddy into a private driveway. He put his light on the hood in case the owners should come out and complain.

As he started walking toward the scene, Jack tripped over a body on the ground. The body groaned and rolled over, so Jack kept on walking briskly through the oppressive August night. He saw the blue bubble lights of at least six NOPD police cars, dizzying as they competed with the red lights of the emergency vehicles. As he hurried down the rough, aged, and bumpy sidewalk, it struck him that the crime scene location was close to the scene from last night — or, rather, early this morning, to be more specific. As he got a little closer, he realized that the crime scene was in the exact location as the one less than twenty-four hours earlier. Damn, he thought to himself. What The hell! Here we go again. What the hell is this all about? This is definitely gonna suck. Why the same place? I wonder if it's the same perp. It has to be.

Jason spotted the commander and walked toward him, a frown on his face. Jason could see the finely etched lines of worry and stress in Jack's face, highlighted by the circling beams of the police cars.

Then, Jack noticed that there were two bodies, two victims, in the same exact spot where the two kids had been found earlier. The meat wagon was pulled to the side in another alley.

"What the hell, Jason, there are two bodies? Again? What do you know?" Jack demanded.

"Yeah, and they're not the typical guys we usually find down this far in the Quarter."

"Yeah, I see. They're wearing some pretty expensive threads," Jack observed, as he noted the custom-tailored suit on one of the victims. The other man was dressed casually in khakis and a polo shirt. His face was literally blue. Really blue. Jack had never seen anyone so blue from death. He hoped it was the blue police lights making the guy look worse than he really was. But he wasn't sure. Jack shined his flashlight on the guy. Yep, the guy's nails were so blue that they could have passed for black. For a moment, Jack wondered if the vic had on black nail polish. The guy in the suit had on a wedding band and the other man had on a Rolex watch.

"Is the Rolex real or a knock off and do we have any ID?"

"Commander, yes and yes. The Rolex appears to be genuine and IDs have tentatively been established. Both men had their wallets in their pockets, so robbery doesn't seem to be a motive, unfortunately. Between the two of them, they were carrying several thousand dollars." Jack continued to stare at the bodies, saying nothing as Jason continued, "Bad news, Commander. Here comes the mayor. I can spot him and his entourage a block away."

Jack gave Jason a dark look. The Mayor of New Orleans was Jack's boss and his sworn enemy. He really didn't need this after the day he'd had. "What the hell, who invited them to this party and who the hell else is coming?"

"I hope no one, sir," Jason replied. "Trust me, the only person I invited was you."

"Then why the hell are the mayor and his buddies here?" Jack demanded, sensing the beginning of a huge cluster. "And why is the man in the suit blue? Did he choke or something?"

Jason shrugged his shoulders and replied, "Clueless. The M.E. should be here any minute. I hear there's another murder over in the third district."

Jason continued to check out the body. "Maybe he was strangled or puked," Jason offered, looking closer at the dead man.

"Damn, he's as blue as any dead person I've ever seen. Who the hell are they?"

"Not good, Commander. The blue guy is Senator Beau LaMont, our infamous Senator from Louisiana."

Jack's face was incredulous. "No way. No way that's Beau LaMont! Couldn't be! It looks nothing like him. This guy is skinny. LaMont is a pretty heavy dude from what I remember. Couldn't be."

Detective Vern Bridges hailed Jack, walked over, and joined in on the conversation. "Commander, you been home yet?" Bridges teased.

"What the hell, Bridges, I just saw you here a few hours ago. Are you bringing these bodies in from Kenner?" Jack grunted as he slapped his detective on the back.

"Heck no. We don't have anything like this out in the burbs. That's why I gotta come to town for some action. Kenner police just sit around and eat donuts. You know that, Commander."

Jack gave Vern a wide grin. "Yep, best donuts in the world are on Airline Highway. Who the hell are these stiffs, Bridges?"

"Jason's right, sir. Yeah, Commander, that's LaMont. He had one of those fat surgeries done a year or so ago and lost over a hundred pounds. He does look entirely different, but for sure, that's him. I mean he looks different because of his weight. Not because he's blue, although that's different as well," Vern stammered and couldn't help but laugh.

Jack clapped Vern on the back. "Geez, Bridges, you're a funny man. You get all the good ones. How'd you get so lucky to catch both double homicides? Nobody I know has ever been this lucky."

"Guess it's just because I'm your best detective, Jack," Vern quipped.

Jack nodded. "Who's the other dude? The one with the slit throat?"

Detective Bridges shook his head and gave Jack a solemn look. "Commander, this guy looks just like those kids from last night. Do you see any blood?"

"Shit, no I don't." Jack looked around. "Was he killed here or just moved here after the kill?"

"Don't know, too early. But guess who he is, Commander."

Jack gave Bridges an irritated look, "I don't know, Santa Claus? Just spit it out, Detective, it's too late for games. Who the hell is he?"

"It's, at least according to his wallet, Hayes Hunter."

"Hayes Hunter? Hayes Hunter? That name's familiar, but who is he?" Jack scratched his head trying to remember.

"He's the head of the Democratic National Party. The Democratic National Party, not just Louisiana. He and LaMont were in NOLA finalizing the plans for the Democratic National meeting this fall. They were last seen—"

"Oh my God. Oh shit," Jack said just as he heard the mayor holler his name. Jack cursed under his breath and stared at his team. "We just have all the luck don't we, guys. Two fricking politicians dead in my backyard."

Jack turned around slowly to face the angry, pig-eyed, newly elected mayor of New Orleans. "Mr. Mayor, you're out late tonight," Jack said in a condescending voice. He saw Jason Aldridge flinch at his sarcasm. Jack guessed he didn't make Jason's life any easier.

Mayor Anthony Devries ignored Jack's comment and said, "Commander Françoise, let's put our differences away for a few moments. What has happened here in our beloved French Quarter? Is it true that Senator LaMont and Mr. Hunter have been killed?" The mayor's little pig-like eyes were wide, and he looked frightened.

Jack's eyes narrowed as he gazed at his nemesis, Mayor Anthony Devries. "Yeah. That's right. Mr. Mayor, that's precisely correct, and a better question is — how in the hell did you know?"

Devries bristled at the deprecating tone of the commander. "Really, Françoise, tone it down a bit. I am your boss, and I am happy to answer your questions. I am invested in bringing this to closure immediately. We have a lot riding on this."

"Yeah, I bet you do... like questions about whether New Orleans is a safe enough place to host the Democratic Party right, Mr. Mayor? Jack's voice seethed with cynicism.

Devries ignored the commander's sarcasm. He personally hated the commander and had tried to block his promotion but was unsuccessful because Jack had too many friends. "And to answer your question, my office received an anonymous tip less than an hour ago that two VIPs were dead in the Quarter. We came right down here immediately. Now, what do you know?"

"We know we got two stiffs, one of them is blue, and the other looks like someone tried to cut his head off. The M.E. hasn't gotten here yet. You can take a look for yourself," Jack offered, gesturing expansively with his arm.

Jason Aldridge interrupted, "Mr. Mayor, did you trace the call and does anyone know where the two gentlemen were earlier this evening?"

The vice-mayor offered up some information. He caught Jack's attention, as Jack actually liked the vice-mayor. "We tried to get the state police to trace the call, but the conversation was too short, even though it was transferred through the city network. Our security people got nothing."

Jack introduced Detective Vern Bridges to the mayor's entourage and announced he was the lead detective on the case.

Bridges gave an update on the murders, as best he could, and informed the mayor that the M.E. should be along shortly.

The mayor looked around impatiently and said, "Detective Bridges, is that all you know? That's really nothing. All we really know is that they are dead."

Bridges was getting pissed, "Mr. Mayor, you are correct. We don't know much, but the bodies are hardly cold, and the M.E. hasn't arrived yet. We'll know a great deal more when he or she does arrive. One thing we do know is that both men were last seen together at one of the vampire bars downtown. And, that was about two hours ago."

For a moment, there was total silence in the air at the crime scene. Even the police sirens seemed to cease.

Jack shook his head and considered the scene. His thoughts were interrupted by his cell. He was needed over at the hospital. The psychiatric staff at the Pavilion needed him. It just keeps getting better.

Alex's heart was pounding as she leapt out of bed. She hastily combed her long auburn hair and pulled it up into a chignon. Monique had called her and told her "there'd been an incident" at the Pavilion. She hadn't been specific, but her voice was tense. Alex's anxiety skyrocketed. She considered wearing jeans and a cotton sweater to the hospital but decided against it. She had no idea what she was up against and didn't know if she'd be able to return home to change clothes later. Besides, her grandmother always told her to dress her best when things looked the worst or when she was facing the unknown, good advice Alex always heeded. Sometimes, just knowing you look good makes things seem easier. Alex could hear her grandmother's voice in her head.

She quickly selected and stepped into a pale blue linen dress with a matching jacket. She added a hand-painted blue floral scarf, a long string of pearls, and low-heeled shoes that completed the look. As she checked her appearance in her full-length mirror, her mind was racing with possibilities. The knot in her stomach and the pain in her chest were reminiscent of the terrible tragedies that occurred only a few months ago at Crescent City Medical Center — a myriad of tragedies resulting in utter chaos and damage from which the hospital was just now beginning to recover.

Alex was debating whether she should drive to the hospital or call for Martin, her faithful cabdriver, when the phone rang again. She answered it with apprehension. It was Jack.

"Yo, Alex, I'm sending a patrol car around to get you. Are you ready?" Françoise's voice was low and gruff.

"Yes, Jack. What's going on? What happened?" Alex asked, feeling frantic. "Monique was vague when she called."

"You'll see when you get here. Trust me, that's soon enough." Jack's voice was hushed but ominous.

Alex, fully dressed, paced in her elegant living room, waiting for the uniformed policeman to pick her up. She was so anxious she forced herself to take deep breaths to calm down and think more clearly. She snapped on several lights and seated herself in the blue silk Queen Anne chair flanking the marble fireplace so that she would be able to see the lights of the police car through the French doors.

Each minute seemed like an eternity. The ticking of the grandfather clock slowed time to a crawl and thundered in her ears. If she only knew what had happened, she could be spending this time deciding on the best way to handle the crisis. For a moment, Alex was irritated at Jack for not filling her in. Obviously, Monique couldn't have. Monique could hardly speak. Alex forced herself to calm down. She looked around the room, admiring the soft pastel colors. She had designed the room herself and had used many of the Virginia antiques she had found at Wyndley, her grandparents' Virginia estate. She'd found other antiques in New Orleans on Royal and Magazine streets, the city's antique haven.

Her thoughts turned to Mitch. He'd loved this room and had often said the room captured the "essence of Alex" and personified her spirit, personality, taste, and love of beauty. Alex felt her eyes well up with tears at the thought of Mitchell Landry, the man she had loved and had lost so violently. She could still conjure up Mitch's face. His dark wavy hair and startling dark eyes were crystal-clear in her mind's eye. Alex loved him and missed him greatly. She was just about to let herself slip into one of her "Grand Funks," as she referred to them, when there was a soft knock on her door.

Her heartbeat accelerated again. She hadn't seen any lights. Was she daydreaming? She peered out the window and looked for a police car. She didn't see one. She wondered if she could have been so obsessed with her thoughts that she had imagined the knock. No, there it was again. A very soft knock. Alex walked over to her door and peered through the peephole. She knew she couldn't be too careful these days. Just last week, the Times Picayune had published an article stating that Louisiana was the most dangerous state to live in with the murder rate ten times the national average. Anyway, it was pretty clear that violence against the elderly, preschoolers, and women was escalating and Alex was always careful when answering her door.

She looked through her peephole. She still couldn't see anything. It was dark. She stepped back, rubbed her eyes, and looked again. It was still black. She couldn't even see the light from the porch lanterns. Alex felt her heart racing. She knew she'd heard a knock on her door — hadn't she? She was feeling a little dizzy from her rapid heartbeat, fatigue most likely, and fear.

For a second, she was beginning to think she was crazy. Then she heard voices on her loggia. She looked through the peephole again. Looking back at her with an innocent, enigmatic smile on his face was Lester Whitset the administrator from the Pavilion. Behind him was a uniformed New Orleans policeman.

Alex opened the door and stared at the two men.

Lester Whitset's eyes roamed over her, from top to bottom. He spoke first. "Evening or, should I say, morning, Ms. Destephano. Sorry to awaken you so early, but—"

"What are you doing here, Mr. Whitset?" Her voice was harsh and uncertain. "Commander Françoise told me he was sending a police officer to pick me up and take me to the Pavilion." Alex knew her tone was aloof and rushed. She felt short of breath just looking at the man. He gave her the creeps. He was vile. Besides, she wasn't pleased that Lester Whitset knew where she lived. In fact, it frightened and made her uneasy.

Whitset gave Alex another long, appraising look and said in a soft, sensual voice, "I was at the Pavilion when the tragedy occurred. Dr. Desmonde was extremely upset, so I decided who to call in." He shrugged his shoulders and said innocently, "In the interest of expediency, I decided to personally pick you up, particularly since we most likely have a legal situation on our hands."

Alex decided she wouldn't be ruffled or perturbed by the administrator. She said clearly, with no room for argument, "Thank you, Mr. Whitset. I'll travel with Officer Bennett." She was straining to see the police officer's badge in the darkness. "The commander was kind enough to send me a ride, so I'll honor his kindness by accepting it. I'll see you later." Alex's voice was formal and remote. She locked the door and brushed by Whitset to walk with the uniformed policeman to his car. Usually, Alex was friendlier and not so curt, but Lester Whitset made her blood run cold.

"Are you all right, ma'am?" the policeman asked officiously. "That man didn't bother you, did he?"

"No, Officer Bennett. I just didn't expect him to come to my house at three o'clock in the morning. I didn't like seeing him here..." Her voice trailed off.

"It does seem a bit unusual that he took it upon himself to pick you up. I'm glad I pulled up behind him. The commander would skin me alive if I returned without you," the officer admitted.

Me, too, Alex thought. She smiled at the young policeman and inquired, "Do you know what's happened over at CCMC? The commander just called me and told me to come at once and that he was sending you to pick me up. My friend and colleague called just before that, asking me to come to the hospital, other than that, I'm clueless."

Officer Bennett stared at Alex's huge blue eyes, wide with anxiety. "I don't know, ma'am. I was the closest unit to your house, and I haven't been over to CCMC yet. I guess there's been some kind of accident. They're sending for the crime team again. I heard it on the radio."

Alex's heart sank. Her intuition told her it was patient related violence. She hoped in her heart that none of the staff or patients were injured badly. She had to do something about the staffing and security in the Pavilion. Don Montgomery, idiot that he was, would just have to listen to her.

As the bright lights of CCMC became visible in the darkness of the night, Alex quickly noted that the area around the Pavilion was blazing with activity. The blue and red sirens made her dizzy. When Officer Bennett dropped Alex off at the door, there were at least six NOPD units and a dozen or so other cars parked in the circular drive in front of the main entrance. Alex saw Monique's Volvo in the group. She also noticed Don Montgomery's shiny, gold Porsche. Just seeing the CEO's car convinced Alex that it was going to be a night, or morning, from hell.

The heavy Pavilion doors were guarded by members of the NOPD. Alex had to show her hospital ID to enter the building. On the drab grey bench, where Monique and Alex had talked just a few hours earlier, sat a handsome, well-dressed middle-aged couple. The wife was trying to comfort her husband, a distinguished white-haired gentleman. The man was red-eyed, obviously upset. The couple looked at Alex curiously.

Alex wondered who they were and how they'd gotten past the police. She smiled at them as she waited for the elevator. They didn't give her a response. She guessed she'd know their identity soon enough. As she stood in the lobby, she was keenly aware that the couple was staring at her. She wanted to speak and offer some comfort but decided against it. Instead, she smiled at them and nodded.

A police officer was operating the elevator. He also asked for her ID and then pushed the button for the second floor. The unit was locked, but Alex was quickly admitted by a pale-faced psych tech.

Whitset came in within seconds of Alex. He touched her shoulder as he passed by her on the way to his office and said, "Have a pleasant ride, Alex? Sorry if I frightened you earlier." He gave her a smirking smile and disappeared.

Alex ignored him and looked around for Françoise and Monique.

The psych unit was electric with activity. There were three staff members talking with police in the nurses' station, and Alex noticed several patients sitting in the day room. Two were catatonic and sat rigidly staring, without blinking, at the television set mounted high on the wall. One patient's body posture was grotesque. He was wearing only a T-shirt and boxer shorts. His legs looked like spaghetti noodles, wrapped around each other in a grotesquely contorted fashion. His arms were bent at the elbows and perpendicular to each other. His hands were fixed in a position that suggested he had just finished strangling somebody. His fingers were spaced apart and curved, just as though they would fit around someone's neck. His nails were long and untrimmed. Alex cringed at the contorted patient. His tongue was hanging out of his mouth and his eyes were bulging. He looked as though he had just finished killing his victim. He was even drooling. Her whole body shuddered in disgust.

This place is horrible, she thought, as she continued to look around. Another patient was pacing frantically around the room, never slowing his pace. His face was so devoid of expression that it looked like a mask. His continual motion made Alex dizzy.

The third patient was restrained in a chair, clearly hallucinating. He was speaking directly to President Obama and God, asking them to have Michelle fix things. Alex watched him briefly as President Obama apparently answered him. She shook her head at the disorganized, incoherent thinking of the man. Suddenly, he burst into loud, silly laughter that had a surrealistic tone to it. How could Monique do this every day?

Alex again scanned the day room. Over in a corner, looking most uncomfortable, was a young New Orleans policeman named Josh Martin, whom she recognized as a protégé of Jack Françoise. Alex motioned and caught his eye. He finally saw her and waved.

Josh Martin was an attractive young man. He wore his uniform to perfection and approached Alex with crinkly eyes and a wide smile that stretched over a generous mouth.

"Ms. Destephano. I'm glad to see you. This place is incredible!" Josh scratched his head and looked around wildly. "Look at these people! I'm supposed to be guarding them!" He rolled his eyes and continued, "To tell the truth, I'd rather be in a shootout or chasing a burglar than sitting in here. In fact, I'd rather be losing the shootout!" Josh gave a short laugh, looking around nervously.

Alex smiled at the young man. "Yeah, they're pretty unique, aren't they?" Then Alex changed the subject and anxiously asked, "Josh, what's going on? Where's the commander and Dr. Desmonde?"

Josh gestured toward the North Hall and said, "They're down there. The bigwigs are meeting in the community room. Go on down. It's pretty safe. Most of the patients are either asleep, doped up, or in seclusion."

"Thanks, Josh. You okay here?"

Josh looked uncertain. "Yeah, I guess so... but what do I do if they go off? The commander told me I couldn't shoot them! Heck, he even threatened to take my gun away from me, just in case I was tempted."

Alex laughed. "They look pretty controlled at this point. Keep your eye on the pacer, though. He could be a problem."

Josh grimaced, wavered, and returned to his chair, continuing to watch the eerie threesome he was supposed to be guarding.

"Josh," Alex hissed at him, "Move your chair closer to the door. You never put yourself in a corner with a psychotic patient close by. You'll want to get out if the going gets rough. Don't let them block you in, ever."

"Yeah. Good idea. Thanks, Ms. Destephano." Josh couldn't move his chair quickly enough to get himself closer to the double doors of the day room.

Alex walked down the hall toward the community room, her heart again thudding in her chest. She knocked on the door and a grim-faced Don Montgomery admitted her.

Don's greeting was tinged with scorn. "It's about time. Where in the hell have you been? I can never find you when I need you. When I don't need or want to see you, you're hanging around my office!" Montgomery's normally grating voice had a caustic edge to it.

Alex ignored him. Sweeping feelings of déjà vu encompassed her. This is just like before, she thought. Just like February, right before Mardi Gras. Even the players are the same, she thought to herself as she looked at the group assembled around the table. Monique was sitting next to Jack, her face tear-streaked and pale.

Jack was fighting strong emotions not to overly comfort Monique, while working hard not to beat the hell out of the pompous CEO as he railed out at Alex.

Jack looked like hell. It was clear he hadn't been home at all. He must have come here straight from the murder in the Quarter. A nurse was also present. Alex assumed it was the night shift charge nurse. Missing were Dr. John Ashley, the chief of medicine who was out of town, and Bette Farve. The other person in the room was Whitset, who waved and smiled benignly at Alex, greeting her as if she was his best friend. Monique hardly seemed to notice Alex's entrance.

"What's happened?" Alex's voice was cool, but she was seething with anger at Don Montgomery's disrespect.

Montgomery's voice was loud and testy. "We have a dead patient — a dead, whacko patient — that's what happened!" He looked around impatiently and continued, "A dead crazy, right here at CCMC. I just love it." Montgomery's voice dripped sarcasm as he peevishly added, "Where's Elizabeth? We've got to cover our asses on this one with the media. Where is she, Alex?" Don demanded, his face red with anger.

Alex shrugged her shoulders and said, "I don't know where Elizabeth is. I would imagine home in bed unless someone has called her. Did anyone call?" Alex looked around the room.

Everyone gestured in the negative. No one spoke.

Don's harsh voice broke in again. "Desmonde, you're the medical person here. Call Tippett and get her in here. Now! I can't expect anything from you physicians." Don glared at the psychiatrist.

Alex could feel Monique's fury, and she saw the telltale blush of anger climbing her bruised and battered body.

After several moments, Monique stood, stared at Don, recovered herself, and said clearly, "Mr. Montgomery, I'll be happy to call Elizabeth Tippet. Generally, the unit administrator, who in this case would be Mr. Whitset, calls. But I gather that hasn't happened, so—"

Whitset jumped to his feet, his eyes flashing, and harshly interrupting Monique, said, "How dare you single me out in front of a group for a responsibility I never knew I had. I will get you for this—"

Monique didn't let him finish. "Don't threaten me, Mr. Whitset. We'll talk about this later." Then she turned to face Don, leaned over so she was inches from his face, and said, "As I was saying before Mr. Whitset interrupted me, I will call Elizabeth, but I won't respond to any more of your callous behavior or profanity. Is that clear to you?" Monique's voice was calm and cool, her intent was clear. She had regained her professional demeanor.

Alex telepathically cheered her on. That's my girl, she thought. Go Monique.

Alex noticed the ruthless look Whitset gave Monique and it sent shivers up her spine. The look was downright evil, and Whitset had even bared his teeth. He was furious at her and Alex was afraid he would physically hurt her or sabotage her. She had to remind Monique to be careful and watch out. She turned to Jack and immediately knew that Jack had seen the look as well. His face revealed his anger, and he looked like he wanted to strangle the administrator.

"Just get Tippet in here," Don roared. He glowered at Dr. Desmonde again and said, "I run this place, such as it is. I'll say whatever I want to, when I want to!" Montgomery pointed his finger in Monique's face and said, "Don't try to bully me, Desmonde, with your calculated, psychiatric bullshit. If you knew how to run a psychiatric service, we wouldn't have patients murdering each other."

Alex's heart was racing frantically, skipping beats. She felt hot all over. Murder! So that's what happened. It wasn't just a dead patient, but one that had been murdered. On the psych unit at CCMC? Murder involving patients? Oh My God! Oh, no! This was worse than she'd expected. Her legal mind was boggled with the thoughts of it, not to mention the repercussions. A million thoughts were racing through her head all at once.

Monique continued standing, undeterred by Don's anger, ranting, and rudeness. She stated again, her voice firm, "Mr. Montgomery, I'll call Elizabeth, but I want you to guarantee that you will conduct yourself in an acceptable manner and cut the vulgarity and innuendos."

Don nodded his head and threw up his hands. "Just do it, Dr. Desmonde!" His voice was scathing, and his emphasis on the word doctor was derogatory.

Monique left the room to call Elizabeth Tippet, the young woman in charge of media relations at CCMC.

Alex looked frantically at Jack Françoise. "What happened, Jack? Who was killed?"

Françoise was positively grey with fatigue. He looked at Alex and spoke softly. "An elderly patient, Mrs. Smithson, was found dead in her room about an hour and a half ago. She had been stabbed repeatedly. She'd only been dead for a short period of time. Her body was still warm."

Alex's stomach lurched, and she thought she would be sick on the large walnut conference table. She immediately remembered Mrs. Smithson from the day before. She was the little, white-haired lady who had been admitted with depression. Just yesterday, Alex had questioned Monique and Donna about the clinical judgment of placing an elderly, depressed woman on a unit with so many violent patients.

Her voice was hushed. She could hardly form her words. "Oh God, not Mrs. Smithson. That little, white-haired lady who was knitting yesterday in the community room? The one who looks like Mrs. Santa Claus? The little lady with the apple-red cheeks?"

Whitset was clearly loving Alex's reaction. His smile was inappropriate. He couldn't wait to respond. His voice was remarkably clear and sounded gleeful, "Yes, Alex dear, that's her. But she doesn't have apple cheeks anymore and the knitting needle is now stuck in her mouth."

Alex was stunned, her jaw dropped in shock.

Even Don looked surprised at the sound of Whitset's voice, but his surprise was short lived. To deflect attention from his administrator, Don moved closer to Alex, his face leering into hers. "Looked like Mrs. Santa Claus. You've got it, Alex," he said sarcastically. "Mrs. Santa Claus has been murdered at Crescent City Medical Center by her next-door neighbor, Mr. McMurdie, our inpatient member of the New Orleans Police Department on the wacko unit. Right, Commander Françoise?" Don Montgomery turned his sarcasm on Jack and glared at him.

Alex could see Jack struggle for control. Jack despised Montgomery, who he had disliked before the mayoral election. Now he had two sworn enemies.

The CEO continued, "One of your protégés wasn't he, Captain Françoise? NOPD's finest. Great work!" Montgomery spit his words at the police commander.

"It's Commander Françoise now," Monique said automatically. "He is the highest ranking officer in this police district."

"Well, whoop-de-do! Everyone knows the New Orleans police are all crooked, incompetent, or on the take," Don snarled, staring at Jack.

Alex placed her hand on Jack's arm as if to restrain him from knocking Montgomery senseless, a dream the commander had coveted for months. The blood was bad between the CEO and the police commander — very bad, in fact. Alex knew that the meeting could easily erupt into a free-for-all between the two men and that the commander would lose, not physically, but most assuredly politically. She also knew Don would be a bloody mess. There was nothing Don would like more than to get Françoise fired, or at least, reprimanded. Jack's judgment returned with a touch of Alex's hand. He sat down. Alex noted with some relief that Monique had returned to the room, her composure intact.

Françoise settled down and looked at Alex. His tone was grave. "It looks, at least from the preliminaries, that McMurdie is guilty. He was covered with Mrs. Smithson's blood."

Alex fought another visceral response and thought about how she could possibly keep herself from throwing up. It had been hours since she had eaten. "Who found Mrs. Smithson?" Alex questioned.

"I did," responded the nurse at the conference table.

Alex turned to look again at the nurse. She looked familiar, but Alex couldn't quite place her. She thought for several moments and then remembered her from the evening before. She was a nurse from an agency, who had been working evenings... the nurse who had admitted to Alex that she had no psychiatric nursing experience. This is just great, Alex thought to herself. A jury will love this. We're fish bait on this one. This really sucks.

Alex spoke to the nurse. "Didn't we talk earlier? Weren't you on the evening shift? Sorry, I can't remember your name."

"I'm JoAnne Waters. Yes, we did talk, and I was on evenings. The agency couldn't find anyone else to send for nights, so I volunteered. I guess the word's out around town about the nurse that was attacked and raped. Anyway, I agreed to stay over, you know, do a double. I didn't know I'd signed up for murder."

Alex noticed that Joanne was super pale and had tears in her eyes. "You were the one who found Mrs. Smithson?" Alex asked.

"Yes, I found her when I was making rounds at two a.m. She was dead. I immediately called security and they called the other people who are here. Mr. Whitset was already here, in his office, and came out when I was making the phone calls."

Whitset was here. What the hell was Whitset doing here on the night shift? "Did something happen on your shift that could've caused something like this to happen?" Alex looked speculatively at the tearful, frightened registered nurse.

Joanne answered in a quavering voice, "No. Nothing. The evening was quiet. The patients were doing well. There was no trouble at all." At that point JoAnne turned to look at Lester and said, "Wouldn't you agree, Mr. Whitset? You were here until after midnight."

Whitset gave the nurse a sly smile. "Yes, it was quiet. I agree. I left shortly after midnight to grab a coffee and returned to my office to do some work." He looked around the group as if to be sure that everyone heard him.

"Anyway," Joanne continued. "On the night shift, shortly after Mr. Whitset left, there was a big ruckus on the prison unit next door. They called a stat page for help, and I sent my two psych techs over. Apparently, several inmates were trying to attack a third man, and my techs were tied up for some time. I was alone on this unit. There was a lot of noise and screaming that I could hear from the prison unit. The noise woke up several of our patients who became alarmed and frightened. One was a new admission. I medicated him, along with two others, and told them all to go back to sleep. I guess that was what I was doing when the murder occurred... I didn't hear anything. I promise you, if I had known this had happened or heard Mrs. Smithson's bell, I would have gone there immediately. She went to bed around nine and was sleeping soundly at midnight. I had no idea..." Joanne started crying softly into a tissue, deftly handed to her by Whitset.

Alex pondered Joanne's remarks for a few seconds. She looked at the commander who nodded his head. Jack also believed Joanne's story. Alex turned her gaze to Whitset and asked him coldly, "Why were you here so late, Mr. Whitset?"

Lester gave Alex a placating smile. "I frequently work late, Alex. I make it a point to be on the unit at different times during the day and night so I can evaluate the quality of care the patients are receiving. It's my own system of quality management, you see. I'm a clinical and administrative manager. Besides, I love being here at night. It's quiet and I can get so much more work done than during the daylight hours." His voice was soft and smooth, even sensuous.

Alex found herself once again mesmerized by the man's voice.

He continued to smile at Alex the entire time he was talking. Then Whitset added, "Besides, I don't like imposters working at my hospital. I oversee all operations, clinical and administrative."

Alex was confused. "Imposters? What do you mean, imposters?" Alex questioned.

Whitset hesitated for a second and said, "Imposters, people that pretend to care for patients, but who don't know how. People who aren't in tune with patient needs and don't understand them are imposters. Many psychiatric staff are actually imposters — they pretend to be someone they aren't."

Alex nodded her head slowly. "Did you happen to hear or see anything that made you suspicious before you left?" Alex guessed that Jack had asked the same questions earlier. She glanced at the commander out of the corner of her eye and saw he was listening intently, his notebook open in front of him.

Whitset glared at Alex steadily with a lewd look in his eyes. His eyes dropped to Alex's breasts and stayed there for several moments before looking back up into her face.

Alex could swear he was leering at her.

"No, not a thing, Ms. Destephano. I checked the situation on the prison unit, headed for my car, and went out for coffee." He continued to stare moodily at Alex, his eyes wandering over her body suggestively.

Alex stared back at Whitset. Her gaze wandered over his rumpled shirt and pants. It was clear to her that he hadn't been to bed. Perhaps he had napped in his office because he was a mess.

Lester continued to gawk at her, his eyes wandering over her body as if trying to catch her off guard, daring her to say something that questioned his story.

Alex said softly, "Sorry you were awakened from your slumber, Lester. You must have been napping on your sofa in your office. That must be why your clothes are so wrinkled." She gave the administrator a sweet smile. "I guess we were all awakened abruptly."

"No problem, Alex. I'm a light sleeper. I'm used to rising for any occasion. Any occasion. You remember that." Whitset gave Alex an indecent look. His eyes were half closed, and his mouth was open as he looked at her. A little bit of spittle had gathered at one corner of his mouth.

Alex flashed a look at Jack, who nodded his head, a nod that was imperceptible to anyone else in the room.

Montgomery was glowering at her. He said, "Alex, have you finished your inquisition? If you have, I'd like to hear more from Françoise about his buddy that murdered dear Mrs. Santa Claus." Montgomery's eyes glittered rudely at Alex and Jack.

Dr. Desmonde interrupted Don. "Mr. Montgomery, her name was Mrs. Smithson and her son and his wife are waiting for you downstairs. I suggest you learn her name before you meet with them." Monique's voice was sharp, and she was clearly annoyed and irritated with him.

"That's your job, Desmonde. You're the shrink and this travesty is your fault." Montgomery gave the psychiatrist an ugly look. "Are you out of your mind? I have no intention of ever seeing them or associating myself with anything that has happened or will happen over here in this insane asylum. You should have given them more pills to knock them out. Damn situations such as these. I just don't have time for this," Don added, as he slammed his fist on the conference table.

Monique was livid but held her tongue and remained aloof.

Alex, clearly incensed, resisted an impulse to rail out at Don Montgomery. She could feel Françoise's body tense up beside her. He was so angry his body was radiating heat. She touched Jack's leg and said in a steady voice, "Really, Don, as CEO you and I both need to see the Smithsons. This is a terrible crime and we need to—"

Don interrupted her, his voice piercing her brain. "You just don't get it, do you? You don't know just how gruesome this crime is, Alex. Tell her, Captain Mighty Mouse," Montgomery said as he glanced at the New Orleans Police Commander, refusing to acknowledge his new title.

Jack overlooked Montgomery's slur and looked contemplatively at Alex. "The scene's bad, Alex. Grizzly crime — one of the worst I've seen in my time and..."

Alex remembered the violent crimes earlier in the year. Nothing, nothing could be worse than those crime scenes. Nor could anything be worse than what had happened to Angie the night before... could it? Alex was uncertain and asked herself these questions as she turned to Jack.

"Jack," she interrupted. "Nothing could be worse than what happened in February. Those crimes were horrible." Alex still had nightmares about them, even six months later.

Jack sighed audibly. "This is a little different. It's different in another way." He paused for a moment as he saw Elizabeth Tippett enter the room.

The lovely, dark-haired Elizabeth looked strained. Dressed casually in jeans and a white shirt, Liz had opted to get to CCMC quickly. She looked stunning for 4:30 a.m., prepared to take command of the media fracas certain to erupt shortly. Apparently, she'd heard there had been a murder. She sat down opposite Don and Monique.

"Thanks for coming Elizabeth." Alex smiled hesitantly at her friend. Elizabeth's job as the director of media relations for the hospital was difficult, especially for a young woman who had only two years before received her Master's degree in Communications. Elizabeth had earned her stripes via a baptism by fire earlier in the year, when the press had swooped down on CCMC like vultures, making mincemeat of the place and broadcasting the medical center's dirty laundry to the entire world. Elizabeth had stood her ground and represented the hospital well during those difficult times. As a result, she'd forged an excellent media network, which now worked to the hospital's advantage. She'd earned respect and admiration among her colleagues. She was incredibly well respected.

Alex continued, "We've had some trouble here, Liz. Apparently, one of the patients attacked and murdered another patient, and Jack was—"

Liz gestured to Alex to stop. "I know, Alex. The policeman outside told me. Do you have any details?" Elizabeth looked around the group and immediately extended her hand and introduced herself to Whitset and Joanne Waters, the two people she didn't know at the table. Joanne murmured a greeting to the media director.

Whitset spoke, "Miss Tippett, I assume it's 'Miss'?"

Whitset drew out the 's' in 'Miss' until Alex wanted to throttle him.

Elizabeth nodded, but said nothing.

Whitset continued, "I am so delighted to meet you. I'm in charge of the Pavilion and very happy to be meeting all of you from the 'other side' of the medical center, particularly those of you who are beautiful." Once again, Alex felt mesmerized by the sound of his voice. It was melodious and comforting to her ears. His voice was directly opposed to his appearance, which Alex found repulsive.

If Elizabeth was surprised or appalled, she didn't show it. She gave a half smile and turned to Alex. She was all business and Alex loved it.

Whitset looked annoyed that she hadn't responded to his compliment. His eyebrows were arched in disapproval.

"Commander Françoise was just about to fill us in when you arrived. Would you continue, Commander?" Alex asked.

Commander Françoise gave Elizabeth a quick smile. He'd become friends with her earlier in the year. The commander was well acquainted with the administrative players at CCMC. He knew their strengths and weaknesses. Most of them he didn't respect at all. As a matter of fact, he detested them.

"Hi, Liz. It looks like one of the patients attacked and murdered an elderly woman, Mrs. Smithson, sometime after midnight. The crime scene's a bloody mess."

Elizabeth nodded. "I understand the patient was stabbed. Is that correct?" She looked around the table and was surprised to find Whitset smiling as Jack described the situation.

"Yeah, you're right. But this ain't no ordinary stabbing. Mrs. Smithson was stabbed repeatedly with a long, thin, instrument. Probably at least seventeen times, as best we can determine."

Don interrupted rudely. "It was her knitting needle, you idiot. Couldn't you tell?"

The commander gave the CEO a dark, murderous look, said nothing, and then continued, "The murder weapon has not been confirmed yet, at least not officially."

Jack glanced at Elizabeth and Alex staring at him. Both women were speechless. Joanne looked at her hands, and Monique was staring at an imaginary spot on the wall. All seemed to be trying to disassociate themselves from what the commander was about to say.

Alex looked out of the corner of her eye.

Whitset was gazing intently at Françoise. Whitset's countenance was reverent, almost holy. He looked excited, practically orgasmic, as Jack uttered the next few words.

"Mrs. Smithson was stabbed at least seventeen times with what appears to be her blue knitting needle. She was stabbed repeatedly in the eyes, ears, and the nose and mouth areas. I'm sure the medical examiner will tell us that she died as a result of the murder weapon piercing her brain. It's as if the murderer wanted to totally disfigure her — to wipe out her face." After a pause lasting a few seconds, Jack added, "He did."

Alex felt the bile rising into her mouth. She was hot, so hot... and flushed all over. She felt ill again. She was afraid this time she'd be sick on the conference table for sure.

Jack reached toward her, thinking she would faint.

Elizabeth left the room, apparently to compose herself.

They could hear retching in the restroom down the hall.

Monique looked unwell, her pale face covered with a sheen of perspiration.

The room was so silent you could hear a pin drop, each person caught up in their own thoughts about the brutal murder.

Alex prayed for composure and felt it gradually returning. Thank God, she thought.

Whitset looked pleased. Everyone else seemed in shock.

After several moments, Alex managed to ask, "Did Mrs. Smithson try to fight back? Did she cry for help?" She felt tears in her eyes rise as she imagined the horrible death the little, apple-cheeked lady had endured.

Jack looked steadily at Alex. "We don't know if she called for help. Most likely, she did at first. The M.E. will have to determine precisely what happened. Remember, only Joanne was on the unit. The psych techs were next door."

Alex thought Jack was being evasive. She asked again, "Did she fight back?" For some reason, this was important to Alex. She didn't know why, but she needed to know if Mrs. Smithson had an opportunity to fight for her life.

Françoise held Alex's eyes to his and said, "No, Alex. She didn't appear to fight back. She couldn't. Her hands were tied to the bed. She had on wrist restraints. As a matter of fact, she had on four-point restraints. Her hands and her feet were tied down." Jack's voice sounded dead and weary as he told her.

"But why? Why?" Alex demanded loudly. Her voice was shrill, almost a screech. "She didn't look like a patient who needed to be restrained. Side rails, a Posey vest, maybe... but four-point restraints!" She looked wildly at Monique. "Why, Monique, would you order four-point restraints for a harmless, little, old lady."

Dr. Desmonde said softly, "We didn't tie her down, Alex. Her killer did."

Alex was so devastated by the insanity of the crime she could scarcely think. Her body felt weak, exhausted, and immovable. She felt faint. A look of dread crossed her face as her mind clicked through questions to ask. She was afraid to ask the question. She looked at the people around her. Monique and Jack were gazing steadily at her. Montgomery and Joanne were preoccupied with their own thoughts. Whitset was staring at her as well, his cold eyes unreadable as they bore into her face. His mouth was curled upward in an eager, expectant smile. Her stomach again turned as she looked at him.

Alex continued to gather the strength to ask the next question. Her hands were pressed on the top of the conference table, the tips of her fingers bloodless due to the pressure she exerted against the table. She looked directly at Dr. Desmonde and Commander Françoise.

Her voice was low, breathless. It came in small, short gasps. "Was she... Mrs. Smithson...?" Alex couldn't say the words.

Monique looked in Alex's startled blue eyes with her clear gaze. She knew what Alex was trying to ask and she replied, "Yes, Alex. We believe Mrs. Smithson was sexually assaulted, that she was raped and beaten. It's horrible, atrocious, and horrendous." Monique's voice broke, and her eyes filled with tears.

The room was still, very still. Everyone was gaping at Alex. She finally looked around and said to Commander Françoise, "Jack, could you leave the crime scene undisturbed? I'd like to take a look at it in a little while. First, I need to do a little thinking."

"Sure, Alex. Sure. The CSI team is in there now. We've got some time. Ain't nobody going to touch nothing in there. Biggest problem we got, as I see it, is dealing with Mr. and Mrs. Smithson and figuring out who did this. He insists on seeing his mother's body. Nothing good is gonna come out of that." Françoise shook his head in anticipation of the event.

"I certainly wouldn't recommend that, would you?" This statement came from Whitset. The group stared at him. His voice was high and he was laughing. "You can't even see her face — it's gone! He probably wouldn't even know that it is his mother. But, on second thought, perhaps it will help him deal with his loss." He looked around the group, gauging their response.

Monique and Alex glanced at each other, sharing a look that communicated their disgust with the man, as well as their questions about his inappropriate behavior.

Monique looked at him curiously. "No, Mr. Whitset. We'll discourage the Smithsons from seeing their mother. As a matter of fact, Ms. Destephano and I hope Mr. Montgomery will see them shortly."

Whitset interrupted Monique and said, "I'll be glad to see the family. After all, I am the administrator for psychiatric services here at Crescent City. Besides, Don, you don't need to be involved with this, particularly since you aren't comfortable. Right?" Whitset gave Don an old boy, placating look and patted him on the back.

Montgomery gave a broad smile. "Hell, no. You go, Lester. I hate this kind of stuff. Makes me look bad. This one's going to hurt, too. Where the hell is Elizabeth? Hasn't she had enough time to puke her guts out?" Don glared angrily toward the door.

Alex spoke. "I'll bring Elizabeth up to date. We'll figure out a media strategy and pass it by you." Her voice was cold, and she stared at Don, disgusted again at his inability to deal with unpleasant situations. Of course, he was always available to claim the praise for everyone else's achievements and awards. What a bastard. She was finding it harder and harder to tolerate him.

"Okay." Don looked relieved. He looked at his watch. "I'm going home. It's only 5:00 a.m. I still have time for some shuteye. Don't bother me until noon. I'll be in sometime around then."

Alex and Monique eyed each other with amazement as Don Montgomery left the room. Joanne asked to be excused as well.

Jack was incensed by the chickenshit administrator's lack of interest and leadership. He uttered a string of profanities under his breath at the CEO's behavior.

Monique stepped on his foot to shut him up.

Whitset had been watching them closely, enjoying their disillusionment with Don. He smiled at them and said in a cold, but smooth voice, "Mr. Montgomery doesn't need to be involved in this. I can handle it myself. No problem. When shall we meet with the family?" His eyes were clear, and he was completely composed. He seemed eager to see the Smithson family, and he was getting off on splitting staff between Don and his administration team. He rubbed his hands together in anticipation.

Alex reached across the table and offered the administrator her hand. "Later. Let's see them after lunch. Thank you, Whitset. We'll keep you posted." Alex's voice was low and throaty.

Monique and Jack met each other's eyes, questioning Alex's strategy as they rose to leave.

Whitset held on to Alex's hand just a little too long and then returned it to her, his eyes again raking her body. "I'll be waiting to hear from you, Alex," he said softly. He nodded to the others and left the room.

Alex shivered at his arctic cold touch and watched him leave.

Françoise spoke first and roared, "Let's get outta here. What the hell was that, Alex? That little pervert incites my killer instinct."

Monique nodded in agreement.

Alex didn't respond.

On their way down the hall, they ran into a pale and wan Elizabeth, who immediately started to apologize even though the three tried to wave her apologies away.

Alex said roughly, "Save it, Liz. I want to get outta here. Let's go to my office."

On the way out of the Pavilion, Françoise caught up with Josh Martin and told him to keep an eye on Ms. Tippett.

The police officer agreed and gave Elizabeth a concerned smile. He asked her, "Are you all right, Ms. Tippett?"

"Yes, thank you, Josh. It's been a little rough this morning." Elizabeth smiled brightly at the police officer.

"It's going to be a long day, Ms. Tippett. It's just a little after 5:00 a.m.," Josh said, gesturing to his watch. "Let me know if there is anything you need."

"Yes, I know. I'll make it. I've done it before." Elizabeth waved bye to Josh Martin and caught up with the others at the elevator.

Alex wondered if there was a new romance in the making. She turned to comment on this to Jack and Monique, but they were obviously tied up with each other. Once again, Alex felt loneliness engulf her.

"A little romance in the making? He's good-looking!" Alex joked and poked Liz in the ribs.

"Sure, Al," Elizabeth quipped. "I'm sure Officer Bennett thinks I'm really attractive, especially after he heard me throwing my guts up in the ladies' room." Elizabeth laughed and shook her head and added, "The irony of it all. He is really cute. I could go for him!"

"Don't get too excited, Liz. It probably raised the protective instinct in him. I understand policeman have a bad case of it," Monique joked as she looked sideways at Françoise.

Françoise nodded his head. "Yep, we do. We like to protect all of the good-looking ladies. I am training Josh right," he reminded the three ladies, and then said, "I'll meet you all on the first floor. I still don't ride in elevators if there's another way down." He looked sheepishly at Alex and Monique, a little ashamed of his continual elevator phobia.

They laughed at him, and after a couple of seconds, he joined in. "Laugh all you like — but remember, if the power goes out, I won't be the one stuck in a tin can or, in this case, an iron albatross!" With that, he turned and headed toward the stairway. Fortunately, the Smithsons had left the foyer of the Pavilion, relieving the stress of the group on the ground floor.

Françoise drove the three women to the main hospital in his prized silver Cadillac. Jack loved the luxury of his wheels. Jack defended the expense by saying he spent days at a time in his car. Besides, when he needed to move, he needed to move, and the car was fast. Fortunately, since he was now the commander, he got less grief from the higher-ups.

Alex pressed against the cushions in the backseat and directed the air-conditioning vent toward her. She loved the tinted windows and the comfort of Jack's car. It was already hot and it wasn't even six o'clock in the morning. Damn New Orleans in August, she thought to herself. "Do you think the crime scene in the Pavilion will provoke any further violence?" she asked Monique, who was sitting in the front seat next to Jack.

Monique looked at Alex through the rearview mirror and replied, "I'm not sure. I hope not. But anything can set them off. After the last two days, we could have a riot!" Her tone was light, but her face was dead serious. "We've got to step up security on the unit, at least for the next few days. I guess I'll have to check with Whitset." Monique looked aggravated at the thought. "He is such a slime ball," she added.

Françoise minced no words when he spoke to the women. "I'm going to tell you gals straight up. He raised red flags for me. I think that bastard's as nuts as most of the patients. Strikes me as a real psycho." He looked at Monique sitting next to him in the car and tried to catch Alex and Elizabeth's eyes in the rearview mirror.

Alex was quick to respond. "I agree, Jack. The man gives me the creeps. I despise the way he looks at me. Besides, I think he knows something. He is so sneaky. He looked as though he couldn't wait to talk with the Smithsons. It was almost as if he was looking forward to it. I don't trust him at all."

Monique turned around and looked at Alex. "Is that the reason you are playing patsy with him, Al? It's pretty dangerous, even if he is sane. I think the guy's a leech at the very least." She studied Alex's face in the backseat. "What's up with that?"

"I don't know for sure. I agree with Jack and I think he knows something, too. I'd like to psych him out. There's no way he went to bed last night. His clothes were rumpled and..."

"He could've put the same clothes back on, Alex. Besides, he never said he went to bed. You just inferred that. There's no proof." Françoise looked again at her through the rearview mirror.

"It's proof to me that he's a liar! That's a good beginning. So far, he's a leech and a liar. Why is he always at the hospital at night? It just doesn't add up!" Alex stopped for a minute, thinking. She asked suddenly, "When did he see Mrs. Smithson's body?"

Françoise shrugged his shoulders and looked at her in the rearview mirror. "I don't know. He could have gone in there at some point. I'll check with my men. They were stationed in the room. Why?"

"Because he came to my house to pick me up this morning a little after four, he beat the police. He said he knew her face was gone," Alex said with a chill. "There is something about him that just wigs me out."

Monique cautioned her, "Alex, you seem to hang on to every word he says and you are playing mind games with him. It's very serious and you shouldn't do it. I frankly don't like the way you're interacting with him. It could be dangerous."

Alex was silent for several seconds trying to find a way to express her feelings. She was a little piqued with Monique's critique of her behavior. "You know, Monique, you are right. There is something about him that I find powerful, and I am at some level fascinated with him. I know it sounds crazy, but I find something about him mesmerizing."

Monique turned around and glared at her. "Alex, you need to get over that. The man is at least sociopathic based on his behavior today. He relished, actually loved, the crime scene and was excited by it. Please, please be careful around him. He may mistake your attention and assume you are coming on to him."

Alex felt defensive. "Really, Monique. I wasn't born yesterday. I can see through him and am sure I can handle myself around him. Don't worry."

Elizabeth took all of this in and added, "I agree with Alex, there is something about him that is charming even if it is in a sick sort of way. But, trust me." She patted Monique's shoulder. "Alex and I can handle ourselves. Not to worry."

Monique still looked uncertain and said, "Okay, just be careful and don't play any games with him."

Françoise was thoughtful and said, "You girls listen to Monique. He's a slimy little bastard, and I'd like to kill him. I'll check him out today. That being said, I imagine he saw Mrs. Smithson when the nurse, Joanne, found Mrs. Smithson's body."

Alex was thoughtful and pensive. "You know, you're probably right, but the timing is important, Jack. We know he didn't see her after I arrived. There wasn't time."

"I know. I realize that. I'll check into it, Alex. Don't worry. The man is messed up at best. He even gives me the creeps." Jack turned to Elizabeth. "What do you think, Liz?"

"Commander, I can't honestly say. I'd never seen the man before this morning and then only briefly, but he is weird. He does seem to like Alex, though." She looked at Alex and laughed. "You lucky girl," she teased.

"Wow, thanks, Liz," Alex responded ruefully.

Françoise pulled his big car up directly in front of the hospital. "Alex, you think I'll get a ticket if I park my wheels here?"

"If you do, Jack, I'll fix it for you. But you'll have to repay me when I get my next one in the French Quarter!" The group laughed at the idea of a lawyer fixing a ticket for a cop.

"Thanks. I'm gonna go by the cafeteria and pick up some donuts and cinnamon buns. You make the coffee, Alex. You gals want anything special?"

"I'll eat whatever you bring, Jack," Monique said, as she smiled at him brightly.

"Ditto for me," Alex said, deciding she deserved some junk food and carbs to get through her day.

"I'm in, Commander, I'll take whatever," Elizabeth added.

Thirty minutes later, seated at the conference table in Alex's office, they all felt better. After several cups of coffee and a little sugar buzz, Alex and Elizabeth were talking nonstop and Monique was less wan. Eventually, the conversation returned to the crime.

"Where's Jim McMurdie in this, Jack? Do you think he's responsible for the murder?" Alex glanced at the commander, who was slowly munching his third jelly donut.

Jack was noncommittal, savoring his treat. "I wish they'd learn to make low-fat, low-calorie donuts. Sure would help my weight and cholesterol. To answer your question, Alex, McMurdie's in chains in his room at the Pavilion. I don't know if he's guilty or not, but it looks bad for him. What do you think Monique?"

"I don't know. He was covered with blood when we found him sleeping in his room. That was after we discovered Mrs. Smithson's body. At least, there was blood on his hands. We searched his room, but we didn't find anything. He became upset when he saw the blood, and he started crying. He'd been heavily medicated both around dinnertime and at bedtime. He had enough Thorazine to quiet an elephant. It's the heaviest dose he's had since admission. I don't know... he could have, but I'm not convinced. Most people would have slept for forty-eight hours after receiving that much Thorazine. Jim's not that big of a guy."

"Does he have a history of violent outbursts?" Elizabeth asked Dr. Desmonde.

"Yep," said Monique. "He has delusional jealousy concerning his wife. I think he has Othello Syndrome — a syndrome named after Shakespeare's character who killed his wife in a jealous rage. I haven't made a final diagnosis yet. Jim's had some violent outbreaks during his admission and assaulted several men prior to coming in. He thought they were having affairs with his wife. He's very sick, psychotic, and delusional."

"Why haven't you confirmed your diagnosis, Dr. Desmonde? What's holding you back," Elizabeth asked with growing curiosity. It wasn't like Monique to procrastinate about anything.

Monique was quiet for a moment reflecting on how she had been asked the question the night before. "It's probably because I don't want to, and I need more time to study his case. The syndrome has a poor prognosis. Another reason is that the violence is usually directed toward the spouse in Othello's — not other people. Of course, Jim is delusional. Other than that, Liz, Jim McMurdie is a classic example of Othello." Monique's voice was sad and pensive.

"So, Monique, do you think McMurdie could have been delusional and thought Mrs. Smithson was his wife? Would that be a possible motive for the crime?"

Alex marveled at what a good thinker Liz was. It was a good question.

Monique shrugged her shoulders helplessly. "Of course, that's possible, Elizabeth. I've thought about it myself."

Françoise leaned forward expectantly. "Dr. Desmonde, do you think Jim McMurdie could be responsible for the rape and beating of Angie, as well as the attack and murder of Mrs. Smithson?"

"Commander." Monique's tone was cool, aloof. "I told you yesterday and I'm telling you again today, I don't know! I just don't know! Do you understand that? If I knew, I'd tell you!" Her face was flushed with resentment.

Alex gave Elizabeth a quick look and intervened to diffuse the situation. "Jack, there are twenty-five patients in the Pavilion who could be responsible for the rapes and deaths. Plenty of them are overtly psychotic. Besides, you said the forensic evidence would tell. And, it's possible it isn't a patient." Alex's voice was calm, but her teeth were gritted, and Jack understood the "back off" look she gave him.

In a way, Jack Françoise was a little ashamed. "I accept your reprimand, Alex. You're right. Sorry, Monique. I'm having the department run a check on our local felons in the area. If the door of the unit was open Monday night, it could have been opened last night, too." He saw that Monique's face was livid with anger now. "Let me out of here before you're all mad at me. I can tell this isn't going well for me," Jack said plaintively as he rose to leave.

Jack's departure was interrupted by the surprising appearance of Lester Whitset in Alex's office, unannounced and unwelcome. His shadow in the doorframe seemed to dim the beauty of Alex's well-appointed inner sanctum.

Alex loathed the sight of him but remained fascinated with him — a fact that totally disgusted her.

"Oh, sorry if I interrupted anything. I didn't think of calling first." Whitset had the same angelic smile on his face as he looked around at the group, knowing they were shocked to see him. "I'm especially glad to see you, Commander. I found something you might be interested in. I was going to give it to Alex, but since you're here..." Whitset turned his head, gave Alex a sweet smile, and withdrew a shirt from a plastic bag — it was covered with brown stains.

The room was deathly silent. All eyes were focused on Whitset. He looked directly at Monique, his eyes cold and glaring. "I just found this shirt in the bottom of Jim McMurdie's locker on the unit. It looks like dried blood — certainly older than today's massacre." Whitset turned toward Monique and said in a sneering voice, "Really, Dr. Desmonde, I expected more professional behavior from you."

Monique felt a flush come over her. Whitset's words stung her like the bite of a thousand fire ants. She didn't know if she was embarrassed or just enraged. She tried to will away the crimson in her cheeks. She muttered in a small voice, "I beg your pardon?"

Whitset continued, sneering at Monique, who looked like a deer cornered in the headlights. "I thought you had the unit searched by the staff yesterday. And, Commander Françoise, I thought your men searched as well?"

Jack stared at Whitset, his face impassive.

Alex could see and feel the invisible steam of anger that poured from his ears.

Jack's eyes cut into Whitset's face and he looked like he could kill him at any moment.

Whitset stared back at him with his cold fish look, nonplussed, carefully surveying the reactions of the commander and the CCMC group. "I'll leave this 'evidence' with you, Commander. I trust you'll handle it appropriately. By the way, you may want to test it for the nurse's blood." Whitset's voice and manner were condescending as he handed the bloodied shirt to Commander Françoise. He turned to leave, but on his way out, said to Alex in his soft, sensual voice. "See you later, Alex, my pretty lass." He smiled his pure, beautiful smile at her and abruptly left the office.

Alex shuddered in disgust. Françoise erupted. "That bastard boils my blood and gives me the creeps at the same time. There is something wrong with him. He's not human. He slithers around everywhere, just like a little worm. I think I'll rush that background check on him!"

Monique was quiet. Finally, she said, "Dammit! We did search the unit. Twice! We gave everything over to you all, Jack. Where on earth did he get that shirt?"

"I don't know, Monique, but my men searched as well." Jack's voice was irate. "I'm not sure the evidence wasn't planted."

Alex intuitively knew there was more to Whitset than met the eye. She asked Monique if she knew anything about his background.

Monique thought for a moment, and then shook her head negatively. "Nope, I know nothing. Montgomery made the connection and hired him early in March. I wasn't even allowed to interview him." Monique tossed her head in anger. "If I'd interviewed him, we'd never have hired him!"

Elizabeth changed the subject and asked, "Dr. Desmonde, since I'm not a clinical person, can you tell me what motivates a person to work in psychiatry?" Elizabeth's question was straightforward, and Alex thought it was a darned good one. Jack looked at Elizabeth with renewed respect. Obviously, after her experience on the unit today, Elizabeth was skeptical about why anyone would want to work with such patients.

"That's a hard one, Liz," Monique said in a bemused voice. "I have my own theory. It's not scientific, but I think it's pretty accurate."

"Shoot," Françoise ordered, as he sat back down and sipped his cold coffee.

"I think most people go into psychiatry because they want to know more about themselves. I certainly did. I grew up in a house full of hidden agendas that needed tending one way or another. My childhood was full of secrets. My mother was a socialite and a closet alcoholic. My father was a control freak. He thought he could control my mother by controlling her booze. He was wrong. Alcohol merely cloaked my mother's real illness. She was chronically depressed and suffered from major depressive disorder. When my father realized he couldn't control her, he concentrated on controlling his business. He spent seventy hours a week away from home. The three of us — my sister, my brother, and me — grew up with no parents to speak of, no emotional support, no strong relationships with anyone, and no one to listen to us. We took care of each other. There was no one to help us grow up strong and sound." Monique's voice faltered, she was becoming upset.

Jack put both hands on his coffee mug. He was dying to hug Monique, but he didn't dare.

"You certainly did well, Dr. Desmonde," Elizabeth said, trying hard to preserve the physician's waning self-esteem.

"Yeah, at the time I thought I did okay. I was the oldest, and I remember some of the good times when my family wasn't so dysfunctional. My brother and sister weren't so lucky." Monique stopped for a few moments, thinking about her past. Then she continued, "You see, I had my grandmother. She was strong, wise, and loving. She was a positive influence in my life when I was very young. She helped me a lot in my early years. Unfortunately, she died when I was eleven. My brother and sister didn't have her as a role model. They never knew families were supposed to love you, care for you, and nurture you. It was hard for them."

"What about your brother and sister? How are they now?" Alex was associating Monique's past with her own. Her own mother was mentally unstable and reclusive. Alex had never known her father, Louis, very well. He had deserted them when Alex was three years old, apparently unable to put up with her mother's behavior. Alex had felt deserted with no father. It was painful to think her father had left her and hadn't loved her enough to keep in touch. This was the same pain she'd felt after Robert's rejection of her. Two men had deserted her.

Monique looked sad. She said with tears welling in her eyes, "My brother died fifteen years ago in a drunk driving accident. He inherited my mother's booze genes, I guess. My sister lives somewhere in California. She's pretty whacked out. She still acts like it's the 1960s. I rarely hear from her."

Françoise put his hand over Monique's. He'd known about her brother and sister but didn't know how sad and lonely her childhood had been. It made his heart heavy and made him want to protect her even more.

Monique dabbed her eyes with her sleeve and continued, "Anyway, when I took psychology in college, a light started going off for me. It was like, 'yeah, I recognize this... yeah, that sounds familiar.' That's when I knew I'd try to spend my life helping other people build confidence, self-esteem, and positive coping skills. I guess I just want to help people find their way in life. So, getting back to your question, Liz, I think people choose psychiatry because they are also looking for help. In fact, some of them may be a little bit sick." All three of her friends were listening intently, nodding their heads in understanding.

Monique continued, "I'm not just talking about physicians and nurses. I also mean social workers, music therapists, and other caregivers. I think in some ways we're looking for validation that we're not alone, that some of the things we do are okay and are done by other people, too." Monique gave a bright, false smile. "Anyway, that's my theory, such as it is."

Alex asked cryptically, "Is this in any way akin to Whitset's imposter theory?"

"Hell, no! It's not even close! That got my attention though," Monique said, shaking her head in reference to the imposter theory. "He is very strange and possibly pathological."

Alex's thoughts returned to Lester Whitset. She thought about him for a few seconds. "I'm not sure Whitset's all he's cracked up to be. I think he's one of those 'little bit sick' people you mentioned who choose psych as a great place to hang out, possibly to hide."

Françoise roared, "A little bit? Hell! That SOB is totally crazy!"

Monique contemplated Alex's statement and arched her finely etched eyebrows. "Could be, Alex, could be. You never know. But, I hardly think he's responsible for these crimes and murders. Granted, he is a weird one. Probably has a personality disorder of some type. Forget him." She waved her arm in dismissal of Whitset. "Anyway, lots of bright and creative people suffer from various forms of mental illness."

"Oh yeah, like who?" Jack demanded in a deprecating voice. Jack's world was clearly defined in black and white. He couldn't imagine any nut bunnies being bright or creative.

Monique glanced at him in disbelief. "Jack, really. Open your eyes. There are millions. Look at Winston Churchill and Edgar Allen Poe for starters. Also, Abraham Lincoln who, as history reports, was prone to melancholia. Lincoln was most likely bipolar, as was Churchill."

"Weren't there lots of artists who had diagnosed mental illnesses?" Elizabeth asked, fascinated.

"Yes, many of them were also bipolar. Vincent van Gogh and Paul Gauguin, to name a couple. Certainly they were creative."

Jack was not buying a word of it. "Is that why that dumb SOB cut off his ears?" Jack inquired as he shook his head.

Monique gave Jack a dirty look and continued, "I believe it was only a piece of one ear that he cut off. There are many famous writers who also had a diagnosed mental illness — Walt Whitman, Mark Twain, Cole Porter, Ernest Hemingway, and our own Tennessee Williams suffered from major depressive syndrome, as did Virginia Woolf and Sylvia Plath. Who knows? If we'd had Lithium, Lamictal, and Prozac years ago, no telling what these artists' contributions to music, art, and literature would have been! Lots of severely ill patients are extremely talented," Monique added, finishing her diatribe on a high note.

"This is very enlightening, but somehow, I don't think it's going to make Bridgett or the Smithsons feel better about their dead and/or maimed family members." Françoise's voice was sarcastic, as he looked at his watch. "But, thanks for the review, Monique. I didn't know so many famous people were bipolar." Jack felt a bit guilty for demeaning Monique's profession. He would have to work through his opinions of and bias against psychiatric patients. After all, it was Monique's life work. He glanced over at Elizabeth and Alex. "Sorry to break up the party, but I need to get downtown and get some work done," Jack said.

Monique stood and said, "I've got to go as well. I'll see you all later. I've got patients starting in a few minutes. Anyone free for lunch?"

"Sure. Hospital cafeteria at 12:30 okay?" Alex asked, as she glanced at Jack and Monique. They both nodded and walked out of the hospital. Elizabeth declined, but walked outside with them. Alex, Monique, and Jack continued to the car and Alex watched as Jack gave Monique a quick peck on the cheek as he opened the door for her. He looked around quickly to see if anyone could have seen. No one was anywhere close to the silver Caddy.

"Give it up, Commander. The windows are tinted. You're safe," Alex teased him. Monique smiled up at him from the seat. Jack looked smug, embarrassed, and a little like the tomcat who stole the cream.

Elizabeth smiled, looked at Alex, and said, "Well, this is news. It looks like the two of them are an item. That's pretty cool."

Alex returned the smile. "Yes, it's very cool, but let's keep it quiet until these crimes are solved."

"Gotcha, mum's the word," Elizabeth promised on her way out.

ALEX FELT HER ARMPITS begin to sweat as she and Commander Françoise walked down the hallway to Pavilion II. She didn't want to do this, but she knew she had to. She knew there'd be a huge lawsuit against CCMC, and she needed all the information she could get. This was absolutely a case of wrongful death. CCMC would pay; the question was how much would it cost them? She would certainly sue if Mrs. Smithson was her relative and, as hospital attorney, she felt compelled to review the crime scene. They were about to enter the room when they ran smack into Nadine Wells in the hall. She looked disturbed, but crisply professional.

"Have you been in, Nadine?" Jack asked.

She shook her head.

"Are you ready to go?" Jack looked carefully at the police expert.

Nadine nodded her head, still not speaking.

Jack was getting irritated and you could hear the impatience in his voice. "What the hell — cat got your tongue, Nadine? This ain't going to be pretty, Alex, Nadine. It's pretty awful. One of the worst crime scenes I've ever seen. Just expect to see the worst."

Neither woman replied, so Jack continued, "You can't even imagine it, so don't try." Françoise looked hard at the young, beautiful attorney and the grim-faced forensic expert. Alex seemed to be wavering.

Françoise scrutinized her and said, "You sure you want to go, Alex? You don't have to. We've got plenty of pictures."

"Nope, I'm going," Alex said in a firm voice. "Got to. Remember, Jack, I've seen some pretty horrible things already this year."

"Yeah, but this is worse, and no puking — either one of you. I can't take any more of that today," Jack said, as he thought back to February. "You ready?"

Alex nodded.

Nadine opened the door and stepped into the alcove of the room. Both of them gasped at the smell that greeted them.

Alex was assaulted by the stench of death. It enveloped her and caught her unaware. The metallic smell of old blood and decay entered her nostrils. She was overcome with wooziness. She felt cold and clammy. Even with the air-conditioning set at fifty degrees to delay decomposition, the smell was overwhelming. She looked at Nadine, who seemed to be struggling as well. After several moments, Alex plunged forward and peered around the curtain of the room.

Alex could barely stifle the scream that came from her mouth as she viewed the remains of Mrs. Smithson. Her knees were weak. She felt dizzy and lightheaded. The room was covered in blood. It was all over the bed and the pale yellow walls. And the smell, it was even worse than the smell in the alcove. The smell, salty and fetid, turned Alex's stomach. It was like a scene from a horror movie. The room was a red print of destruction, the aftermath of a massacre. Alex couldn't look closely at Mrs. Smithson. She took some deep breaths and regrouped slowly. Finally, she turned to look down at the body. It was a hideous sight.

Alex, incapacitated and paralyzed at the sight of the elderly lady, clutched futilely at the air for support. Emotions were clouding her objectivity. These emotions turned into distress and shock as she continued to look around the room.

Mrs. Smithson no longer had a face. Her eyes had been completely gouged out by the knitting needle. Alex couldn't even tell if they were open or closed. Her nose was a torn piece of flesh that was barely connected to her face. There were numerous stab and puncture wounds all over her head. Her ears had been desecrated in the attack. Most of her beautiful silver hair was matted with blood. The knitting needle protruded ominously from her mouth. Alex felt her knees buckle and Jack caught her. With effortless ease, he held her up until she felt strong enough to support herself. Alex barely noticed when Nadine left the room.

Alex gasped. "I can't believe this. This is terrible — horrible. What kind of a despicable, loathsome animal could mutilate a little old lady like this? My Lord, Jack! This is... there are no words to describe this."

Jack stood silently next to Alex and nodded in agreement, his arm around her shoulders for support, and led her to a chair. He nodded his head silently, tears in his eyes.

Nadine returned to the room and continued to view the body objectively. She had said nothing since reentering the room.

Alex was impressed by her dispassionate inspection of the body or, at least, she thought she was.

Jack said quietly, "I don't know, Alex. It's bad. The perp is... an animal. No human could create such brutal devastation."

Alex rose from the chair and walked back to the bed. She studied the body of Mrs. Smithson and noticed that the elderly lady's hospital gown was pulled up to her chest. Her small, frail hips were completely exposed. With tears in her eyes, she asked the Commander, "Can we cover her up, Jack?"

Jack hesitated for a moment, unwilling to disturb the crime scene, and then wavered. "Yes, I'll cover her up. She deserves that much dignity. Okay with you, Nadine?"

"Yeah, Jack. Trust me, I've seen enough. We've got pictures, right?" Nadine's voice was terse and despondent.

"Yeah, got plenty of them."

As Alex and Jack moved toward the bed, Alex saw that the patient's call bell on Mrs. Smithson's right side was covered in blood. It was clear to Alex that Mrs. Smithson had rung the call bell repeatedly for help. Her trained eyes immediately traveled the length of the electric cord to the wall outlet, where the bell was connected to electrical power. The bell cord had been pulled out of the wall. The alarm had long ceased ringing — perhaps even hours before the patient had died. Whoever did this was smart enough to disconnect the bell from the wall. But who? A patient? A staff member? Someone with knowledge of hospital equipment had killed Mrs. Santa Claus. Alex just knew it.

"Jack," Alex said breathlessly at the upsetting discovery. "Did you notice that the call bell had been disconnected from the wall? This call system is antique and it won't ring if it has been disconnected from the wall. So, even if someone had been close to the nursing station, the bell would not have rung in there. It has been disconnected from the operating call system in the patient's room!"

Jack shook his head. "No, I hadn't noticed. There were so many folks in here earlier I didn't notice. I am sure the CSI team picked it up. Shit! Unbelievable. This murdering SOB knew what he was doing!" Jack's face had taken on a fierce look. His normally cautious eyes were dark, brooding, and as hard as black coal. He trembled with anger and outrage at the pain and fear Mrs. Smithson must have endured.

Alex and Nadine watched quietly as Jack put the scene together.

"This bastard knows hospitals. This maniac restrained the poor lady in four-point leather restraints and disconnected her call bell. He knew his way around this unit!" Jack's face was flushed with anger. His eyes had turned into burning sockets in his head. He thought his head was about to explode.

Nadine continued quietly examining the body. "Look here, Commander. Check this out." Nadine was pointing to an area on Mrs. Smithson's fragile right shoulder.

Jack crossed over to Nadine's side of the bed. He looked at the mark. Their eyes met with recognition. "Nadine, these look like puncture wounds on her neck. What do you think?"

"What is it? What is it?" Alex implored as she tried to see around the two police officers.

Nadine looked at Alex coldly. "It's a bite mark, Alex. Our killer here is the same man who attacked, raped, and beat Angie. He's probably already selected his next victim."

This was more than Alex could handle. Her face immediately crumpled. She left the room and the locked unit and walked briskly back to her office on the main hospital campus not even noticing the heat of the day. She was still cold with fright. Sticky from the New Orleans heat, but cold on the inside. Alex shuddered as she passed the yellow-tagged crime scene where Angie was assaulted.

She nodded briefly to Mona on the way in and then closed and locked her door. Then Alex cried and cried. She cried for the violent acts committed against two completely vulnerable and undeserving women. She sobbed until no more tears would flow. She vowed to herself that she would make every effort and use every opportunity within her power to make Crescent City Medical Center a safer place for patients and staff. She also decided that she would no longer compromise her own personal value system for the good of the hospital, no matter what or who got in her way. She would work based on her own values and ethical beliefs. The hell with Don! For a short while, Alex sat at her desk, oblivious to the world around her. She began to wonder if she was losing her own mind.

Shortly before noon, Mona knocked softly on Alex's office door. Mona knew that Alex was upset and hated to disturb her, but she felt she needed to check on her. So far, she had been successful in holding off the hordes of people searching for the hospital attorney this morning, and she had managed to successfully stall and reschedule most of her meetings. Still — Mona hated to bother her. Alex had been so distressed when she returned from the Pavilion a little while ago. Mona had heard her crying in her office.

There was no answer to her knock. Mona hesitated, thinking before she knocked again. If she hadn't received the phone call from Don Montgomery, she wouldn't bother Alex. But, as usual, Montgomery had acted like such an ass on the phone she knew she had to notify Alex. Hesitantly, she knocked again on Alex's door.

"Come in." Alex said, her voice faint and hard to hear.

Mona opened the door slowly and stood in the doorway. "Sorry to interrupt you, Alex, but Montgomery has called an emergency meeting of the hospital executive committee about the attacks. Latetia called about an hour ago." Mona sounded apologetic for interrupting.

Alex picked up on Mona's hesitation. "Thanks, Mona. It's okay. Thanks for letting me know. I'm okay now, but I did lose it this morning. When's the meeting?"

Alex spoke in a flat voice and she looked whipped. She didn't sound or look better to Mona. Mona examined her critically. "It's at two o'clock this afternoon in the executive conference room. Latetia said something about a press release and some other matters that will be discussed. You sure you're okay, Alex? You're looking mighty beat up!"

Alex smiled at Mona's typically Mississippi description of her. "I'll be okay. I just look terrible because most of my makeup has worn off. I cried it off. I'll put it back on before the meeting. Thanks, Mona." Alex hesitated for a moment and added, "I appreciate your concern. Thanks for letting me cry and giving me the time to do it. I know you rescheduled all of my meetings."

Mona nodded and left the office. As Mona returned to her desk, she thought about Alex. Alex had been up practically all night, had been through hell, and was going back for more this afternoon. Mona silently agreed with Bridgett, who adored Alex. They had discussed how amazing Alex was and how great a role model she was for women. Bridgett had confided to Mona that she thought Alex was insecure with men and had also whispered that she didn't think Alex had ever gotten over her marriage to Dr. Bonnet. Besides, it had only been six months since her relationship with Mitch Landry had ended so tragically. Poor Alex, thought Mona. She has so much, but she also has so little. As she returned to her computer, Mona was infinitely grateful for her husband, her two small children, and her little house in Kenner. She was thankful for being able to work part-time and was totally glad she wasn't the high-powered Alexandra Destephano. Regardless of how beautiful she was, how much money she made, or how much respect she garnered, Alex's life was hell.

ALEX CHECKED HER WATCH. It was half past noon and time to meet Monique and Jack for lunch in the cafeteria. She sighed. She was exhausted and felt as if she was a hundred years old. Every iota of energy had been drained from her. She walked into her private bathroom to redo her makeup and was shocked at her appearance in the mirror. Mona had been right — she looked bad, really awful. She looked like hell. No question. For the first time, she noticed small dry lines and wrinkles in the corners of her eyes and around her mouth. Her flawless fair skin was pasty white and her normally lustrous auburn hair looked dull and lifeless.

I'm really a mess! I look terrible and feel like hell! As she repaired the damage to the best of her ability, she made a pact with herself to take some extra vitamins and get more exercise. She needed to get more rest as well. That would help. Finally, reasonably pleased with her appearance, she headed toward the cafeteria when her thoughts were interrupted with what she was sure was a telepathic message from her grandmother, Grand. Kathryn Lee had always told her to look her best when she was on her way to slay her dragons, and Montgomery and Whitset were certainly the dragons du jour. Bastard dragons, actually.

Alex smiled when she thought about Grand. She made a mental note to call her tonight. She missed her grandparents and she missed Virginia. She was beginning to hate New Orleans. Her mind flickered to the job offer on her desk. Maybe, just maybe, she ought to consider it. It would take her home to Virginia. Besides, her grandparents were getting older and, even though the congressman hadn't slowed down a bit, Alex had noticed some fatigue and weariness in her grandmother that she had never seen before and it bothered her. Just thinking about her home in Virginia and her family lifted her spirits and gave her the energy she needed to move forward. God bless them, she thought.

Alex steeled herself for the rest of her day and admitted that it totally sucked, as she walked toward the hospital cafeteria. As she contemplated her afternoon, she frowned. She wasn't looking forward to meeting with the Smithsons, especially with Whitset present, and she knew the executive meeting she was headed to was going to be a battle or, more likely, a sham.

She waved at Monique waiting for her outside the hospital cafeteria.

Monique grabbed Alex by her arm. "Let's get out of here, Alex," Monique hissed. "Whitset is waiting for you in there. I told him you'd left the hospital for lunch and that you would meet him at about 1:30 on the unit to talk with the Smithsons. I figured you didn't want to eat with him."

Alex's blue eyes were sharp and her voice was brittle. "You figured right. Only, I want to meet him somewhere else. I'll call Mona and tell her to have Whitset and the Smithsons meet me in my office conference room at 1:30. I don't want them witnessing anything unpleasant in the Pavilion and thinking again that their mother should not have been admitted there."

"Good idea, Alex. The fire is going to be hot enough anyway. No sense adding more fuel."

Alex nodded in agreement. "Let's run over to the Cajun Café. I'll call Mona from there. Is Jack coming?"

"Nope. He's downtown running checks on Anthony and our boy Whitset." Monique smiled grimly at Alex. "Jack also says he has to meet with the medical examiner this afternoon."

"Why? Anything special happen?" Alex looked speculatively at the psychiatrist.

"No, not that I know of. I think he just wants to drop off some pictures of Angie so the medical examiner can compare them with Mrs. Smithson. You know Jack. He's pretty involved in this.

Actually, he's so emotionally involved it bothers me."

Alex looked critically at Monique. She took a risk and said plainly, "Yeah, I know. Let it go, Monique. We're all involved, and Jack's M.O. for years has been to become personally involved in his cases. That's the type of cop he is and that's why he's where he is. Police officers like Jack François are few and far between."

A faint blush was perceptible on Monique's pale cheeks. Alex knew she was trying to control her anger. She spoke again, her voice matter of fact. "Monique, I'm not trying to offer advice or cause trouble, but Jack is Jack, and that's how he operates. It's just part of him that you'll have to get used to or not—"

Monique interrupted her, her voice cool. "All right, Alex. I've got it. Let's table this for now. I'm too tired for another emotional shakedown and so are you. I know you're right, and I know I can't change him. It would've been easier if his first case with us as a couple hadn't occurred on my medical unit."

Alex laughed at her friend. "Yep, for sure, it certainly would've been — but sometimes life's a shit sandwich and we all have to take a few bites!"

Monique laughed at Alex's description, which she knew came straight from the mouth of Congressman Adam Patrick Lee. Alex seldom used profanity and, when she did, it was for emphasis. By this time, they were in front of the restaurant. "My, my, my, where are your genteel Virginia manners and where did you learn to speak like that?"

"You know exactly where that came from because you've been there!" Alex eyed the door thankfully. "Good, no wait. We can go straight in. And, the manners, I left them at home — better watch me at the table. Order me the special and I'll call Mona."

The Cajun Café was a small coffee shop inside the CCMC complex. It was usually filled with patients, staff, and family members for lunch, but for some reason the lunch traffic was light today. The food was authentic Cajun cuisine, and the chef took great pride in his menu. The café was gaily decorated with a Cajun bayou motif and watercolors of New Orleans street scenes painted by a local artist. Monique slid into the last booth at the rear of the restaurant, while Alex fished in her purse for her phone. By the time Alex finished her call, Monique had ordered iced tea and crawfish étouffée for both of them. Pierre, the owner and chef of the Cajun Café, was arguing good-naturedly with Dr. Desmonde over the proper Cajun spices for étouffée.

When Chef Pierre saw Alex, he bowed gallantly from the waist and said with a big smile on his face, "Miss Alex. I'm honored. Please enjoy your meal. I'll send a special chocolate dessert your way. You know, I know your favorite."

Alex smiled her thanks and she, Monique, and Pierre chatted for a few minutes before the chef left the women alone to enjoy their lunch.

The service was quick and within several minutes, they were eating the rich, delicious étouffée. Alex asked how things were going at the Pavilion.

Monique looked at her sideways. "Well, pretty well, I guess. That should be obvious since I was able to get over here for lunch. Most of the patients are still heavily medicated. Several others are depressed... that is, more depressed than usual. Overall, there's still a feeling of shock up there. Things could break bad tonight or tomorrow when the patients rally and start to talk about things — you know, when the meds wear off. The community meeting should be interesting today and tomorrow, especially since we canceled all privileges." Monique rolled her eyes as she imagined the backlash she would get from Anthony.

Alex sighed. "Yes, I suspect you're right. We've got to get Don and Whitset to agree to hire more security at the Pavilion for the next few weeks."

"Good luck with that, Alex," Monique said in a sarcastic voice as she arched her eyebrows. "Whitset told me this morning he wasn't authorizing any increased help — either professional or security. He maintains the unit is safe—"

Alex interrupted her, her face flushed with anger and her voice defensive. "That's insane! That man's crazy! If it was safe and we had enough staff, Mrs. Smithson would more than likely still be alive today."

Monique held up her hand. "Save it for the executive meeting, Alex. We will need all the support we can muster to fight the boys. From what I can tell, Whitset has Montgomery in his pocket. It's pretty disgusting." Monique pulled vigorously at her chignon and several large masses of her dark hair came loose.

Alex was astounded at how "human" Monique had become in the past few days. Before, the distinguished psychiatrist, while always supportive of Alex and friendly, had been aloof, cool, and unapproachable — or, at least, unapproachable in a proverbial human sort of way. Now, she seemed to be real — a real person like Alex, who struggled endlessly with the trials and tribulations of working in a male-dominated organization. It wasn't that Alex had a problem working with men in general; it was just that she had a problem working with incompetent people... and most of the incompetent leadership at CCMC was male.

Thank goodness she was finally meeting this side of Monique Desmonde. It was going to be great to have a colleague to hang out with who was part of the same dysfunctional organization. Of course, she had Elizabeth, but Elizabeth was much younger, and Alex was both her boss and her mentor. It wasn't quite the same. Dr. Desmonde was a power broker in the organization.

Alex touched her shoulder and said, "Monique, in some respects these events, terrible though they are, have created a bond between us. We'll work through this together."

Monique squeezed her hand in return and said, "I agree. Two heads are better than one, and I need all the help I can get."

Alex nodded and continued, "Let's figure out a strategy for this afternoon's meeting with Don Montgomery." She thought for a moment and said, "How about you approach the need for more security from a patient and staff safety point of view and I'll approach it from a legal and image position. We ought to be able to get what we want. Don's hot button is the CCMC image and he wants no airing of our dirty laundry."

Monique looked uncertain. "I'm not so sure, but I hope you're right. We have to go," she said as she ate quickly. She checked her watch. "We're meeting with Whitset. I invited myself, hope you don't mind?"

"Not at all. It's going to be hard. I'm glad you're coming. The poor Smithsons. I'm dreading it. It's still so horrible." Alex had a tragic faraway look in her eyes as she remembered the scene.

"Yes, it's horrible and Whitset's horrible, but we've got to meet with them. I'm still angry that chickenshit Montgomery isn't coming. It makes me furious when he dodges these nasty issues!" Monique was mad.

She only cursed when she was really mad, kind of like Alex. They saved the profanity for when it really mattered. Another lesson from Alex's grandmother.

Alex shook her head and said sarcastically, "Now, Monique, where are your genteel manners? Surely, you know by now that our esteemed CEO only pays attention to the positive things that happen here. Don thinks he's a deity and the only person who does any work!"

Monique smiled ruefully at Alex. "Hell yes, I know. To quote an observant police commander, 'Donald Montgomery is an incompetent SOB.'" Monique and Alex both laughed as Alex's phone sounded, signaling a text. It was Mona texting her, "Get in your office quick!" Monique excused herself and quickly headed to the ladies' room. As Alex was gathering her things, an enraged Donald Montgomery grabbed her shoulder roughly.

"Where the hell is Desmonde? I want to talk with both of you. Where the hell is she?" Don's voice was loud and people at nearby tables looked at him sharply.

Alex was shocked by Don's behavior. "Monique's gone to the ladies' room. Please lower your voice."

Don continued to hurl angry and profane epithets at her, while a number of patrons eating lunch in the café turned to stare at the well-dressed man whose speech would make a sailor blush. One gentleman stood up as if to intervene on Alex's behalf. Even Chef Pierre had emerged from the kitchen, wielding a large chopping knife. He was looking questioningly at Alex. She smiled, but with a small movement of her finger, she motioned for him to go back into the kitchen.

Alex's voice was soft. "Don, what's the matter? Come on over and sit down." She gently grasped the CEO's arm and led him to the table where she and Monique had just finished their lunch. Alex saw that people were still watching them, and she smiled courteously at the people around them. Alex hated scenes. She also hated to see people make fools of themselves because it embarrassed her. Don did it frequently and she still hated it. By this time, Monique had returned and took a seat.

Don sat down. Alex and Monique looked at him expectantly, waiting to hear the cause of his most recent outburst.

The CEO looked around the restaurant and saw for the first time that people were staring at him curiously. He lowered his voice and quietly blasted his words at the two women, his voice hissing a torrent of swearwords like the air escaping from a dying sailor.

"Why in the hell didn't the two of you take care of the Smithsons? The man literally stormed into my office a few minutes ago demanding to see his mother. Damn you all! Both of you are useless, incompetents. Why didn't you talk with him?" Don's face was so red that Alex thought he might have a stroke. Monique hoped he would.

Monique glared at him and answered his questions. She was as angry as Montgomery, but much more in control. "Mr. Montgomery, did you really want Mr. Smithson to see his mother with a knitting needle hanging out of her mouth? Did you want him to see her blood and brains on the walls? Did you want him to see that his mother no longer had a face? Do you think that would've settled him down?" Monique's voice was strong and quiet. Her intent was clear, and her argument was strong. Monique glanced over at Alex, who seemed to be silently cheering her on.

Don Montgomery turned his eyes away from the straightforward glance of his chief of psychiatry. He was quiet for several moments and then said heatedly, "Hell no! That would not have been good... but... it's still your fault. If... if..." Don was groping for words. "I don't see why you all didn't see them hours ago and calm them down. He's in my office threatening to call the press. Says he's going to sue Crescent City for all it's worth. Said his mother was brutally murdered in my hospital by one of my patients. The man's insane!" Don's red face had turned grey and he was shaking, obviously anticipating an onslaught of press reporters and TV cameras. "Where do people get these lies?"

Alex and Monique stared at each other in disbelief. What was going on with Montgomery? Didn't he remember the murder?

Alex spoke to him. "Don, his mother was murdered in the Pavilion. She was murdered in our hospital, and Dr. Desmonde talked with the family this morning. We asked you to see them as well."

You refused. You told Lester Whitset and me to see them. We're seeing them in a few minutes. Do you remember any of this?" Alex watched Don closely as his anger and rage returned.

Montgomery glared at Alex as if she were a moron. He raised his voice and said impatiently, "Of course I remember the murder in the Pavilion. As far as I'm concerned, the Pavilion isn't CCMC. We're a world-class hospital. Those wackos don't count when we look at the good things that are done here. Psychiatry isn't an important part of the hospital! It never has been. The Pavilion is a dump. It's a loser. As a matter of fact, I don't even consider psychiatry a part of this hospital at all." Don was thinking.

Alex could see the wheels turning in his mind. He was completely oblivious to the look of contempt Dr. Desmonde was giving him.

He continued, "Hell, I'm not even sure that psychiatry is part of the practice of medicine! Those sons of bitches never get well. They never even get better. They are just leeches on society. It's a losing battle all the way around. Even the psychiatrists are half crazy!" Don looked smugly at Alex and Monique and folded his hands on the table, as if patiently waiting for their anger.

Alex thought she could see smoke pouring from Monique's ears. She was speechless at Don's diatribe and accusations. She could feel energy, negative energy, radiating from Dr. Desmonde. Monique could hardly contain herself. Alex tried to settle the physician down by placing her hand on her arm, but it was useless.

Desmonde was not to be quieted. She rose and stood over the CEO, her face faintly flushed and her dark hair and eyes glistening in the artificial light of the restaurant. "Montgomery! You know something. Your behavior is infantile, it's inexcusable. You are an idiot. You treat this hospital like a toyshop, lining up your favorite toys and beating up and discarding the ones you don't like. That's what you did to the psychiatric service. You sold us out to contract management. Psychiatric services have been going downhill ever since." Monique paused for a moment and began again, her voice seething with anger, "Frankly, Montgomery, I think you need a bed in the Pavilion. Not only are you an idiot, you have a behavioral disorder!" Monique stared down at the CEO, clearly repulsed by what she saw. With a quick glance at Alex, she stalked out of the café.

Donald Montgomery was silent for a moment and then he turned to Alex and laughed. "Our famous shrink looks pretty good when she's mad. She is much easier on the eyes when she's irate. Maybe I should make her angry more often. Then I can almost stand to look at her!"

Alex was enraged at Don but refused to play into his sexist remarks. She said quietly, "Don, psychiatry is a part of CCMC, and the situation over there will affect the hospital and our image. You may as well prepare for a lengthy wrongful death action and a lot of negative publicity." Alex watched Don as reality set in. She chastised herself for feeling a bit victorious. She had humbled the CEO. "How did you leave Mr. Smithson?"

"Not well. I sent him to your office. He's probably there now. Take care of him, Alex. Handle it and do it right. I don't need this stuff so soon after February!" Don was actually pleading with her. His voice was quiet.

Alex used the situation to her advantage and said, "I'll do my best, Don. At the executive meeting this afternoon, I expect you to approve additional permanent staff positions for the Pavilion, as well as a temporary increase in security — at least until this stuff clears up. Deal? We need strong young bodies up there for security, as well as professional caregivers permanently." She looked carefully at Don, contemplating her next move.

Don shrugged his shoulders. "You give me a good argument, you'll get the money. Farve maintains that psychiatry is well staffed. So does Whitset. Just keep these people out of my office — the crazies and their crazy relatives. I'm busy, and I don't have time for this kind of stuff. Understood?" Don was recovering from his momentary lapse into fear and uncertainty.

Alex shook her head negatively, signed her lunch check, and headed for her office.

Don, since he was already there, decided to have lunch. What was left on Alex and Monique's plates looked pretty good. He waved for the waiter. Things were quiet for him. He had over an hour until the executive committee meeting, so he settled in for a tasty lunch. Besides, he deserved it. It'd been an awful day, and he did run the place. He was entitled to a reward.

Don was a lucky man. He had no idea how close Chef Pierre had come to putting crushed glass into his lunch.

As Alex made her way back to her office, she became more and more infuriated at Don Montgomery. The man was an absolute egomaniacal idiot. Monique was right. The CEO probably did have some sort of a personality disorder. She wondered if asshole was a legitimate diagnosis in psychiatry and asked herself how much longer she could stand working for him. Again, the letter from her colleague in San Francisco surfaced in her mind. Maybe she would consider it. It was only a year and she could return to New Orleans if she chose. Dealing with Montgomery was getting pretty old and very tiring.

Alex paused outside her office door for a few moments, contemplating the best way to handle the Smithsons and the sad tale of their mother's death. When Jack had spoken with them earlier, it had been difficult enough, but he had kept with the police procedure and said nothing about how the crime had occurred. She shook her head, as if to clear it, hoping for some clarity on the best way to manage the conversation. When she entered her outer office, Lester Whitset was sitting on her sofa reading a magazine. Mona was not at her desk. Alex's heart began to beat frantically — just seeing him made her uncomfortable. He was repulsive. She felt her stomach flip-flop.

Whitset rose when he saw Alex, his eyes raking her face and body. "Alex, you're looking amazingly well for such a long day. Marvelous in fact!" His voice was soft and seductive.

Alex pulled back reflexively as his hand touched her wrist. The coldness of his fingers sent a shiver through her. "Are Mr. and Mrs. Smithson here? Where's Mona?"

"Your secretary just took them into the conference room. She's getting them coffee. She seems to be obedient enough — she a good worker?" Whitset smiled balefully at Alex.

"Obedient? What do you mean by obedient?" Alex looked suspiciously at the administrator. Obedience was becoming a theme in Lester's conversations.

"You know what obedient means, Alex dear." Whitset's voice was soft, almost hedonistic. "It means that she did what I asked her to do as soon as I asked her to do it. She scurried right out of here. I like that." Lester had a half smile on his face, and his dark glittering eyes were locked with Alex's blue ones. He moved closer to her. She could feel his breath on her cheek, and for some reason, she was powerless to move back. It was if he had a strange hold over her. Whitset continued to talk with her in the same soft voice. "Another pretty girl. Mona is her name, isn't it? She looks like a darker version of your regular secretary, Bridgett. They're the same size... just the hair is different. Isn't that correct?" He continued to stare at Alex, his dark eyes raking her face as his look commanded her attention.

Alex could barely suppress the shudder she felt crawling up her spine. And yet, there was something about him that fascinated her and made her feel powerless. It was almost as if there was an electric energy between them. She was startled. A dozen thoughts were dancing through her head. How did Lester Whitset know Bridgett? Did he know she was Angie's twin sister? Did all of these things mean something? She was frantically trying to sort the information through her tired brain as Whitset continued to leer at her.

Just at that moment, the door opened, and Bridgett walked in. She looked terrible. Her face was streaked with tears. She had a gold cross in her hand.

"Oh, Alex. It's so horrible. This is all been so dreadful." Bridgett was crying pitifully. Her voice coming out in gasps. "The nurse in the ICU just gave me Angie's cross. She's not doing well at all. She still won't talk to me — they say she can't! I don't think she is conscious, but her eyes are open, and she stares at the wall. Alex, will she get well?" Bridgett burst into fresh tears.

Alex walked over to hug Bridgett. "Sure she will, Bridge. She'll be okay in a few days. It'll take some time." Alex continued to hug Bridgett, conscious of the gaping, sly smile Whitset was giving them. It was almost pornographic, she thought. Whitset was relishing Bridgett's pain. Bridgett seemed unaware of him. Alex doubted that Bridgett had noticed him in her grief.

She held Bridgett close for a few more moments, becoming more and more uncomfortable with the effect Whitset was having on her. He was openly smiling at both of them. He looked pleased with himself and Alex didn't understand why. He seemed to enjoy the secretary's grief. He was enjoying it — feeding on it! It was as if he were a voyeur, basking in Bridgett's abject misery. His smile turned benignly gleeful, and once again, spittle formed in the side of his mouth. He continued to leer at them, as the two women comforted each other.

Finally, Alex broke the embrace. "Bridgett, this is Lester Whitset. He's the contract administrator for psychiatry."

Whitset stepped forward and took Bridgett's hand.

Bridgett visibly flinched when he touched her.

An involuntary reaction, Alex guessed.

She said, "Oh yes, Mr. Whitset. My sister mentioned you to me. I'm pleased to meet you." Instantly, Bridgett dropped Whitset's hand, as if touching him was unpleasant to her.

Whitset seemed to pick up on Bridgett's feelings toward him. "Sorry if my hands are cold, my dear Bridgett. Poor circulation, I suppose. But you know what they say about that..." His eyes gleamed at her as he continued, "Cold hands, very warm, warm heart."

Bridgett just stared at him, speechless.

Whitset was nonplussed and continued, "I liked your sister. She seemed to be a competent nurse, although she was not as obedient as I would've liked. I do hope she improves soon."

Obedient, obedient. There was that word again, Alex thought. The word continued to frighten and grab at her, but Alex remained silent. Alex was also troubled by Whitset's use of the past tense, "liked your sister" and "seemed to be competent" — it gave her a sick feeling in her stomach.

Bridgett said nothing but nodded her head. She turned to Alex, "Do you know where I could get another chain for this necklace? I have a feeling that if I could fix it and get it back on Angie, she will get better. She got this cross and a St. Christopher's medal when we were confirmed at St. Anthony's as children. She always felt it protected her. See, I have one just like it." Bridgett opened the neck of her blouse to show Alex.

Alex heard an unusual noise. She turned sharply toward Whitset. She thought she heard a giggle come from his mouth. He was leering at both of them, his mouth open and his eyes bright with a strange light in the fervor of his enjoyment of the scene. He looked insane, crazed.

Alex turned to Bridgett. "Yes, I'll get it fixed this afternoon and bring it back this evening. Trust me, I promise," she reassured Bridgett. "I'm going to get Mona so she can be with you for a while. Mr. Whitset and I have a meeting to go to. Wait for me here."

Bridgett looked around frantically. She saw Whitset staring at her. His cold black eyes were raking her body with a sense of familiarity.

Alex saw his eyes rest on Bridgett's right shoulder. Oh My God, Alex thought. What is wrong with this man? Whitset was licking his lips. Then, Alex chided herself. She had to be imagining these things, but she was alarmed at the attention and reaction Bridgett was getting from Lester Whitset.

Bridgett noticed his gawking as well. She clung to Alex and said quickly, "No. No, Alex. I'll come with you. I want to catch Mona up on a few things in your office."

Alex picked up on Bridgett's discomfort. She took her arm and ushered her into the private office. She examined Bridgett carefully. Bridgett's eyes were wide with fright. She feels it, too, Alex thought.

Mona entered Alex's office from the conference room on the right. She stared at both of them with surprise. "What's with you two? You look like you've seen a ghost." Mona eyed them cautiously.

Neither woman was able to speak. Both were tied up in their own thoughts.

Bridgett, her fear subsiding, began to cry again, her shoulders shaking as her blue eyes welled over with tears.

Alex took charge, sending Mona numerous messages with her eyes. "Mona, show Mr. Whitset into the conference room. I presume the Smithsons are already in there?"

Mona nodded affirmatively.

"Then, take Bridgett out through the back door for coffee. Put the phones on forward. Still better, Bridgett, go on over to the coffee shop. Mona will meet you in five minutes — okay? Can you do that?"

Bridgett seemed to be in a trance, but she nodded her head. She said quietly to Alex, "Angie didn't like him. She said he was trouble in the Pavilion and that he stirred up the patients. He gives me the creeps. I think he's bad."

Alex held up her hand to stop her. "I know, Bridgett. We'll talk later. Now go! Mona will be there soon."

Bridgett left the office as Mona went to get Whitset.

Alex attempted to compose herself and went into the conference room.

Mr. and Mrs. Smithson were seated at the far end of the table. They were dressed in the same clothes they'd been in at five a.m. and both looked worn and sad. Mrs. Smithson was drinking black coffee and Mr. Smithson had a can of diet Sprite. He stood deferentially as Alex entered the room.

Alex smiled once again, thinking how handsome Mr. Smithson was. She walked toward the distinguished gentleman. "Mr. Smithson, I am Alexandra Destephano. I am the legal counsel for the hospital, and I want you to know that—"

"Legal counsel? So you're the hospital lawyer? I thought we were meeting with administration. Does anyone know anything that is happening around here?" Mr. Smithson's voice was deep, and his face was flushed. He was impatient and angry.

Alex tried to ease his concerns. She said softly, "I'm representing administration. Mr. Whitset will be joining us, and I believe Dr. Desmonde will be coming, as well."

Alex turned as Whitset entered the room. She watched him stand to the side of the table, glaring at the weary, older couple. There was no concern or compassion in his face for the Smithson family. His face was set in an ominous scowl and he looked prepared for battle.

Alex introduced Whitset to the Smithsons and was appalled when Whitset ignored Mr. Smithson's outstretched hand. He waved it aside and sat down. He turned his glittering cold eyes toward Mrs. Smithson and stared at her. The gentle-faced woman seemed nervous at his look and her hands fell to her lap, where she began to play with the catch on her pocketbook.

Alex began, "Mr. and Mrs. Smithson, on behalf of the hospital, I'd like to tell you how very, very distressed and sad we are over your mother's death. We're very sorry about the circumstances and hope that—"

Mr. Smithson, still smarting from the rebuke by Lester Whitset, interrupted her. "Thank you, Ms. Destephano. I understand that. My wife and I want some answers."

Alex nodded, urging him to continue.

"We want to know precisely how my mother died, and we want to know exactly why my mother died. We've had no information at all. When Dr. Desmonde talked with us this morning, she only told us that my mother had died — that she had been murdered!"

Alex felt her heart sink. She hadn't wanted to do this. She began, "I understand that Dr. Desmonde told you this morning that your mother had been attacked and murdered by someone, possibly another patient and—"

"Yes, yes, we know that." Mr. Smithson was clearly impatient. "How did she die? By what manner did she die? Did someone shoot her? I don't mean to sound short, but you've jerked us around since four o'clock this morning. I tried to see your CEO, Mr. Montgomery, and he literally threw me out of his office. I don't mind telling you, Ms. Destephano, that didn't sit well with me." Mr. Smithson sat back in his chair tiredly. He looked exhausted.

Alex took a deep breath and said clearly, "Mr. Smithson, your mother was stabbed — with a knitting needle."

There was a silence that seemed to last for hours.

After an audible gasp, Mrs. Smithson ventured a few words. "A knitting needle? Her knitting needle?" Her voice sounded incredulous. "Could being stabbed with a knitting needle kill you? It seems impossible. Are you sure?"

"She was stabbed more than once," Alex said, wishing she had someone there she could count on for support. She looked over at Whitset who was staring at the wall, smiling to himself. The wheels seemed to be turning in his brain. Alex prayed he kept quiet and behaved.

"How many times?" Mr. Smithson looked directly at Alex.

Alex didn't respond. She was thinking.

"Ms. Destephano, I asked you, how many times?" Smithson's voice was loud and demanding.

Alex's composure was dwindling. She fought for control and said, "She was stabbed many times. I don't know for sure. We'll know more when the police and coroner's reports come in. I can assure you that—"

Alex was interrupted when Dr. Desmonde entered the conference room and sat down quietly next to Mr. Smithson. Alex had to admire the man, his control, his fortitude, and his determination. Of course, he was pissed — she would be, too!

Mr. Smithson turned to Monique. "Dr. Desmonde, you told me in the wee hours of dawn this morning that my mother had died in a hospital accident. You didn't tell me she had been stabbed with a knitting needle! Now, everyone claims they don't know how many times she was stabbed!" Mr. Smithson put his elbow on the conference table and placed his chin on his hand so that he was looking directly into the pale, wan face of the lovely, but very stressed, psychiatrist. "You need not repeat what Commander Françoise told me. I want to know about the hospital's role in the death of my mother."

Monique gave Mr. Smithson her full attention. Their eyes were locked together.

"Now," he continued, "I want to know everything you know about my mother's death. Do you understand?" His voice was quiet but demanding.

Monique nodded at Mr. Smithson. "Yes, I understand. I know you must be very upset over your mother's death and I understand that. We all are. But we are not sure what exactly happened. Conjecture about her death will only be more upsetting. As soon as we know everything, the police will update you again. As soon as the investigation is complete, I'll speak with you again if you would like. Please let me know if I am repeating what the commander told you."

Mrs. Smithson interjected, "Dr. Desmonde, we only want to know if our mother suffered. Did she?"

It was so quiet in the room you could hear the clicking of Mona's computer two rooms away. You could also hear the distant linen carts and x-ray machines rolling down the halls. Far off, someone was laughing. Alex wished she were with them and not here in this room with these poor, sad, grief-stricken people discussing the elderly Mrs. Smithson's horrific death.

Monique remained silent and looked at her hands for several moments, then looked back at the Smithsons. Finally, slowly, she said, "Yes, it is possible your mother may have suffered. We'll know for sure when we get the autopsy report." Secretly, Monique hoped that the gentle, elderly lady had suffered a stroke or a heart attack and had died instantly. This thought was helping her manage her own fragile emotional survival. Although it was unlikely, she was taking some comfort in the possibility.

Mrs. Smithson was crying softly into a tissue.

Mr. Smithson's eyes were red-rimmed as he looked at Alex and Monique and said quietly, "I admitted my mother because she was depressed over my father's death and my sister's illness. She was not chronically mentally ill, do you understand, she was not mentally ill. She'd never been depressed. You, Dr. Desmonde, assured me that this was the best hospital for her—"

A sob escaped Mrs. Smithson's mouth and she said to her husband, "Please, honey, let's not talk about this now. There is nothing Dr. Desmonde can do. Let's just go home, I am so tired."

Mr. Smithson turned to comfort his wife and said tearfully, "Two weeks later, she's stabbed to death in what is supposed to be the best hospital in New Orleans. I repeat, how did this happen? I expected this hospital to take care of her — to help her. Why didn't you? I trusted you to make her better!"

There was silence. No one spoke. What was there to say? Everyone just continued to sit uncomfortably in the conference room.

Mr. Smithson tried to speak again, but his voice broke. He stopped for several seconds to catch his breath, composed himself, and then said, "My mother was a gentle soul. She never hurt anyone. She didn't deserve to die like this."

Alex looked over at Whitset. He was watching Mrs. Smithson cry softly. He had a pleased look on his face. His mouth was turned up in a sly, half smile and he looked as if he was worshipping her grief. He was enjoying himself and was enjoying being a part of this heartbreaking meeting! What the hell was going on? Alex just couldn't understand Whitset. It was like he got off on grief, enjoyed it, and even relished it. A glance over at Monique confirmed to Alex that she wasn't noticing Whitset's behavior. Her attention was focused on Mr. Smithson who continued to vent his feelings.

"You know," he said, "it seems to me that something's wrong here. If my mother suffered, that must be your fault. If she was so brutally killed..." He looked toward his wife as she was seized with a fresh torrent of tears. He took her hand, pressed it for comfort, and continued, "If she was stabbed over and over, then why didn't somebody come to help her? I'm sure she cried for help." Mr. Smithson looked back and forth between Monique and Alex. "Why didn't somebody come help her? Answer me! I demand an answer!" His voice was loud and harsh.

Suddenly, without warning, Lester Whitset jumped from his seat. His tone was harsh, cruel even, his face only inches from Mr. Smithson's, "Listen, Smithson, we told you we were sorry. Isn't that enough? We don't make promises when we admit people to the hospital. Particularly old people—" He stopped as Alex kicked him hard in the leg.

Smithson stood, faced the younger man, and raised his voice, "What did you say? What in the hell did you say about old people?" Mr. Smithson's voice was getting louder. "Say it again, dammit! What's this about promises and old people?" Mr. Smithson was taller and heavier than Lester Whitset and Alex watched as a brief flicker of uncertainty crossed Whitset's face.

Whitset momentarily gained control of himself. Then he lost it completely. His appearance changed and he looked like a pouty little boy. His slicked-back, G.Q. hair fell forward, and he looked at his hands and smiled. Then he began to speak, his lips pouting as he began a singsong litany. His head moved back and forth, keeping time with his voice, "We're so sorry, Mr. and Mrs. Smithson. We're so very sorry your mother was murdered in — our hospital. Please, please forgive us." Whitset's voice ended on a high note.

Alex was dumbfounded, paralyzed with shock at his behavior. Monique was speechless. What the hell was happening? It seemed like Whitset was making fun of the incident. His words were rhymed and spoken in iambic pentameter. His voice was the voice of a child in kindergarten. Alex couldn't figure out whether he was being rude and condescending or was just crazy.

The Smithsons were flabbergasted by Whitset's behavior.

Dr. Desmonde stared at him strangely. She slipped Alex a note telling her to call the hospital chaplain. Alex rose to leave the room as Monique again turned to the Smithsons, who were still shell-shocked by Whitset's words. She sighed with fatigue. She and Alex would now have to deal with Whitset.

Monique took Mrs. Smithson's hand and said to the older couple in a reassuring voice, "We will tell you everything as soon as we get the information. Is there anything else you need? Can I arrange for a cab to take you home?"

"Is there anything else we need to know now?" Mr. Smithson's voice was morose. He was grey with fatigue and grief. Mrs. Smithson looked like a shocked, broken puppet.

"Yeah," said Whitset, his voice loud and commanding. "Yeah, you may want to know that your mother was also raped."

Mrs. Smithson responded with a bloodcurdling sound. Mr. Smithson made the low guttural sounds of a wild animal in intense pain.

Whitset smiled his gleeful, enigmatic smile at the grieving couple, turned to Dr. Desmonde, and simply said, "Well, they needed to know, didn't they? They did ask if there was anything else."

Monique didn't reply. She continued to stare at Whitset. A realization about the man was sending tingles up her spine. He belonged on the Pavilion but not as the administrator.

Whitset flinched under her intense stare and looked at his watch. When he looked back at her, it began to happen. Dr. Desmonde's face was turning to plastic. My God, the bitch is one of them, he thought! Whitset could tell from the way the fluorescent light highlighted the sheen of her pale face. He felt a terrible noise in his head and struggled for control. He wanted to reach out and rip her head off. The bitch, he thought to himself. How had she kept her secret so long? Was he losing his ability to identify them? He stood abruptly and said, "See you shortly in Montgomery's office."

Alex was hanging up the phone when Whitset came into her office.

He grabbed her shoulder and said gleefully, "I told them everything, it's all done. See you in a few minutes."

Alex stared at him as he raced from her office. She couldn't decide whether he was happy, sad, or just crazy. She just couldn't figure him out.

Alex returned to the conference room and found both of the Smithsons in tears, devastated over their mother's death. Monique was doing her best, but she too was having difficulty keeping her composure. Her eyes were full of tears. Alex supposed they were tears of frustration, as well as grief. Alex and Monique stayed with the Smithsons, offering as much comfort as they could until a priest took the heartbroken couple away.

The room was deathly quiet. Monique and Alex sat quietly for a few minutes, each trying to figure out what had happened. Finally, Alex couldn't stand the silence any longer and spoke.

"Monique, talk to me! There's got to be something wrong with Whitset. Did you see him in here? It was as if some type of transformation occurred and a kid broke out! It's like he went to another planet or something! What's wrong with him? I think he's psycho!"

The psychiatrist didn't respond, caught up in her own thoughts. A dozen possibilities were racing through her mind. It was clear in her professional judgment that Whitset had some sort of psychiatric disorder — only she didn't know what. She'd never seen evidence of any overtly psychotic behavior. He'd always seem grounded in reality, although he was very strange. Of course, her interactions with him were limited and minimal because, truthfully, she didn't like or trust him. Monique knew that psychotic patients were often highly manipulative and could cloak their behavior well. The only clinical behavior she'd witnessed had only just happened a few minutes before and she couldn't make a judgment based on just that one incident. She needed verification and validation of what she was thinking. Somehow, she had to figure out a way to corroborate her suspicions. Of course, there was the sexual thing he seemed to have with Alex, but that wasn't conclusive either. Monique didn't know and needed more time.

"Monique. For heaven's sake, what do you think?" Alex persisted and grabbed her arm, pressing for an answer.

Dr. Desmonde shrugged her shoulders and shook her head. "I don't know, Alex. It could be any number of things. There's definitely something wrong, but I just don't have enough information. Anyway, I need to call Jack and find out if he's checked Whitset out."

Alex was not to be mollified. "Do you think he has multiple personalities? That sure seemed like a child that came out in here!" Alex's voice was shrill, as she looked speculatively at her friend.

"I don't know, Alex. It's possible, but multiple personality disorder is pretty rare. If he has it, I guess we've seen at least two of them — the child and the sensual adult. Anyway, it's pure speculation on our part. Multiple personality disorder is extremely difficult to diagnose and treat. I think Whitset's more of a sociopath — he has a sociopathic personality or an antisocial personality disorder, as we call them now. Anyway, I've got to get out of here. I want to check in with Jack and go over to the Pavilion to check on things. Then I'll meet you over in Don's office."

"Okay, Monique. We've got about twenty minutes. Don't be late."

Monique nodded her head and waved at Alex as she left. Her mind was troubled as she walked back to the Pavilion. She was definitely suspicious of Lester Whitset. She couldn't casually blow him off anymore. She didn't think he was involved in the violence at the hospital, but she was troubled by the fact that he spent so much time with the patients, not to mention that he was her administrator. Her intuition told her something was very wrong with the man. He gave her an intense feeling of fear and free-floating anxiety, the origins of which she could not explain or articulate.

As she walked back to the Pavilion, Monique worked up an intense sweat. The August heat was stifling — it was hotter than hell. Even though she was a native of New Orleans, Monique could barely stand the heat. It weakened her. Sometimes she was convinced that it actually crippled her physically and emotionally. It almost assuredly brought out the worst in everybody — colleagues, patients, and families. As she entered the Pavilion lobby, she made a conscious decision. She was going to search Lester Whitset's office. Who would know? She'd never get caught if she planned it right! Right?

Monique used her unit keys to let herself into Pavilion I. Things seemed almost normal. She checked with the charge nurse, who reported that Jim McMurdie had remained in seclusion since he threatened suicide earlier in the day — directly after Whitset had confronted him with the bloody shirt. Monique knew Jim thought he'd killed the elder Mrs. Smithson. The police questioning had been hard for him, even though the officers had been gentle with their questions. After all, he had been one of them.

On the spur of the moment, Monique decided to check on him. She walked down the hall toward his seclusion room, where she ran smack into Anthony Gavette who blocked her path in the hallway. He looked belligerent.

"Hey, Doc. What gives? They say you ain't coming to community today. Why not? Aren't we important to you anymore or are you more concerned with the dead people?"

Dr. Desmonde looked at Anthony. His face was tight and threatening. She said quietly, "Of course you are important. More important than ever. It's just that I have a meeting to go to, to see about getting more staff here so that we can all feel safer."

"Don't give me that crap, Doc. I feel safe. Plenty safe. Besides, I ain't afraid of nobody. Ain't nobody messin' with me. I may mess with other people, but ain't nobody messin' with me!" Anthony's body language was tense and angry.

Monique looked up at Anthony, her heart pounding a little. She decided to push the envelope, asking him quietly, "What exactly are you saying? Have you been hurting someone?"

"Hell no, Doc. I just want you at that meetin' today so I can get my privileges raised another level. I'm ready to be promoted to step three so I can get the hell out of here. The nurses say you got to sign off on it. Right?" He looked at her expectantly.

"Yes, that's right, but we're not raising anybody's privileges around here now. We've got to wait for things to settle down a little bit and—" Monique stopped for a second and looked straight at her often violent, schizophrenic patient.

He was getting mad, really mad. His face was red, and his eyes were glazed over. He started moving toward her in a menacing manner. "Listen to me, bitch, you useless, cold-blooded pig. I'm going to kill you. You hear, you Dr. Pig?" Anthony's voice was low, but threatening. His eyes were gleaming with an evil intent.

Monique knew she was in trouble. She felt her normal calm demeanor slip away. She knew she couldn't let him know she was scared. She never took her eyes off Anthony's face as she felt around her for something to throw for help. She wasn't close to an ASA red button. The nearest one was at least three feet away. She let her eyes wander for one brief second before she was convinced that no one was nearby. She only hoped someone was in the nursing station watching the security monitors.

It only took Anthony that one brief second to realize that Monique was frightened. Her fear gave him the edge he needed. The moment her eyes left his face, Anthony knew he was in charge. Quick as a flash, he reached out for the psychiatrist's slender white throat and wrapped his huge hands around it. At first, he exerted only a little pressure on Monique's neck, enjoying the fear and terror he saw in her eyes. Anthony had a fleeting remembrance of how much fun killing was. He should do it more often. He liked the sense of power it gave him. He applied a little more pressure, watching her eyes dilate with fear at the certainty of her fate.

He began to talk to her in a soft, sensual voice, "You're a pretty lady, Doc. Wish I had time to get a little piece, but I guess there's not much time left in this life for us — at least for you. Maybe in another life. That's okay, though. Squeezing your neck is almost as good as." Anthony was surprised that he was so sexually stimulated. This killing thing felt good. He would do it more often, he thought, once he got out of this hellhole. He'd steal the shrink's keys and escape. The thought gave him another pleasure thrill.

Anthony applied a little more pressure.

Monique began to feel dizzy and felt her body grow weak. Anthony moved his face in position to kiss her and Monique became furious. In a last ditch effort to free herself, she brought her knee up sharply between his legs. He gave a yelp like a wounded dog when she kicked him. He grabbed his crotch, hurling profanities and vulgar epitaphs at her as he lay writhing in pain on the floor. Monique ran for the red button, pushed it, and then threw a stainless steel bedpan down the hall to attract attention as Anthony struggled to his feet.

Within several seconds, a powerful, young psych tech grabbed Anthony from behind and wrestled him back down to the floor. Anthony fell down on his stomach, moaning and holding his testicles.

In a matter of seconds, Donna Meade appeared with a syringe full of Haldol. As she squatted on her knees beside Anthony to inject his arm, the patient gave a huge yell, let go of his testicles, and grabbed Donna's crotch. In an instant, he had ripped through her uniform pants and pantyhose, while Donna lay writhing in pain on the cold linoleum floor.

Monique immediately retrieved the syringe and jammed it into Anthony's outstretched arm, sighing with relief when several additional psychiatric aides showed up and carted the angry patient off to the seclusion room on the far hall.

Dr. Desmonde immediately ducked into the utility room and returned with a blanket, which she placed over the moaning Donna Meade. Monique tried to talk with her, but the nurse manager was in too much pain. She also appeared to be shocky. Monique checked her pulse, finding it weak and thready and her blood pressure low. She ordered a stretcher and waited until two attendants had taken Donna over to the main CCMC emergency room. My God, what a day! she thought. And it's only 2:15 in the afternoon.

Sensing that the staff was now in control of the unit, Dr. Desmonde escaped to her office and locked the door. After forcing herself to calm down, she called Don Montgomery's office to tell them she was running late and would be over shortly. She breathed a sigh of relief when Latetia told her they were starting at three o'clock. The meeting was delayed for an hour because Bette Farve had a prior commitment — probably at the hairdresser, Monique thought ruefully. What a bitch! Thinking about Farve raised Monique's blood pressure and she actually felt better. She could handle Farve, no problem. It was some of the others that were scary. Farve was passive aggressive and a pain in the ass, but nothing like some of the other major players of the day.

After a few minutes, Monique's thoughts returned to Lester Whitset. She was still tempted to search his office, but her eagerness had been waylaid by Anthony's attempt on her life. Besides, as Monique reviewed the scenario with Anthony, she considered the possibility that Anthony was a more likely suspect in Angie's rape and Mrs. Smithson's murder than either Whitset or Jim. Anthony was totally psychotic now. God knows what he could do.

Monique continued to think about Anthony. Anthony Gavette did have a history of malicious assault. But, was it sexual assault? Monique couldn't remember. Her heart fluttered once again when she allowed herself to realize how close she'd come to death. Another minute, and well...

Monique shook off those thoughts and returned to Anthony. He was a diagnosed schizophrenic and did have delusional behavior. Besides, this was the second time in two days he had gone after a woman. Yesterday he'd tried to attack Rose in the community meeting. Monique had considered the behavior a manifestation of Anthony's jealous rage, but then, an attack was an attack.

Gosh, Monique continued to think to herself, was it only yesterday? It seemed like ages ago. Then, today, he had attacked her. That was certainly a notable escalation of psychotic behavior. Both assaults had been accompanied by profane sexual language. She dared herself to look at her hands — they were still trembling. She put her face into her hands to make them stop. She was still frightened, and frustrated, for tons of reasons, and she was scared. She'd never been scared on her own psychiatric unit before. These feelings were new and she didn't like them. She needed to talk to Jack, but she couldn't reach him. She felt defenseless and very vulnerable. Monique didn't like vulnerability, not at all.

Alex was uneasy. She'd been put off when the meeting had been delayed. She, too, had decided that was another manifestation of Farve's uncooperative, passive aggressive behavior. Farve remained useless. Unfortunately, she knew that Farve's management style was similar to that of many nursing leaders. Farve neither supported nor appreciated the efforts of the great nursing staff at CCMC and rarely advocated for them in tough situations. Her style was more one of nepotism and fear. Hence, her nickname was Bigfoot in polite company, but she had more ribald nicknames that were used in the back of the cafeteria. With the initials B.F., it didn't take much imagination.

It was well known that Bette had pet nurses. One of the male nurses in critical care served as her on-call gardener, weeding her garden and mowing her lawn. Another nurse baked cookies for her every week and catered her dinner parties at no charge. Of course, they were rewarded — with favors, promotions, and extra time off. It was so unfair and so unethical. Alex just shook her head. This favoritism had to end.

Alex's thoughts turned from Farve to Whitset. She was convinced he was playing a large part in the current events at Crescent City Medical Center. She wondered if Jack had been able to find out anything on either Whitset or Anthony Gavette. She'd ask Monique after the executive meeting. Alex was so deep in thought that she jumped when her private phone rang.

"Alex here." She spoke into the phone.

"Alex, it's Sandy Pilschner. We've got Donna Meade over here in emergency..." Sandy paused, waiting for a response from Alex. When none came, she continued, "Did you know there was another incident over the Pavilion?"

Finally, Alex squeaked out a "no."

Sandy continued, "Apparently one of the patients whacked out and tried to strangle Dr. Desmonde... Alex, are you there?"

"Oh, no, no. What happened?" Alex's voice was a whisper.

"I don't know much, Alex. The techs had to hurry back. They said the place was wild and they couldn't stay."

"Is Monique all right? Is she all right?" Alex repeated to herself in her anxiety.

"What?" Sandy seemed confused for a moment. "Oh, Alex, I'm sorry. I wasn't clear. Yeah, I guess she's okay. Dr. Desmonde isn't here. Donna Meade is. She's the one who's hurt. The tech said Dr. Desmonde seemed okay."

"How's Donna doing?" asked Alex.

"Well, I guess she's doing as well as any woman can — who's just had most of her lady parts ripped at. She's in a lot of pain... and in shock, too."

"My God! I can't imagine." Alex cringed at the thought. "That's horrible, just hideous. Who did it?"

"Yeah, it is. Awful. No question. I don't know who did it. You know, Alex," Sandy paused briefly, "I would never work in the Pavilion. It's dangerous, and it's a hellhole. I think Angie hated it."

"I expect she did, I sure do. It is a hell pit. I understand perfectly, Sandy. Perfectly." Alex silently agreed with her. She would never work there, either.

"Gotta go, Alex." Sandy's voice was brisk. "We've got red blankets on the way in. Just thought I'd keep you up-to-date."

"Thanks, Sandy. I appreciate it," Alex said as she hung up the phone. She was in a state of bewilderment. She rubbed the chill bumps that had formed on her arms as she thought about what happened to Donna and Monique. Something had to give up there or the whole place would spontaneously combust. I've got to call Monique, she thought to herself, and make sure she's okay.

Monique answered Alex's call on the first ring. She hoped her disappointment wasn't reflected in her voice. She had hoped it was Jack returning her call. Monique assured Alex she was not injured and promised she could see for herself shortly. Then, Monique decided to take the plunge. "Alex, do me a favor? Go over to Don's office and make sure Whitset's there. If he is, call me right back. I want to take a quick look in his office, and I sure as hell don't want him to catch me."

Alex felt a quickening in her gut. "Monique, are you sure? Suppose someone sees you?"

"I'll be very careful, don't worry. Just call me back as soon as you get over there." Monique's voice sounded strong and steady.

"Okay, I'm with you. Give me about five minutes. Just be careful — promise me." Alex's voice was pleading and Monique detected a tinge of fear.

"Promise. You got it. Just call," Monique said as she hung up the phone.

Alex called Monique back a few minutes later and reported that the coast was clear. Latetia had confirmed that Whitset was in Don's private office, and Alex had even interrupted them to be absolutely sure. She tolerated the ridicule in Don's voice with a small degree of triumph. At least Monique wouldn't be apprehended by Whitset as she searched his office.

Dr. Desmonde walked quickly down the hall toward Lester Whitset's office, nodding briefly to staff, patients, and family members. She waved aside the questions of several staff, assuring them that she was okay and would return to the unit later.

She failed to notice the curious glances that several patients in the day room gave her. It was completely out of character for Dr. Desmonde to rush. She was the coolest, calmest, most collected cucumber that most of the patients had ever seen.

Rose was relatively indifferent to the physician's movements but was concerned. She'd been worried about Dr. Desmonde for the past few days and had heard through the patient grapevine that Anthony had just attacked her. Rose, in her confused and flustered state, really liked Dr. Monique. She decided the physician might need some help, so she decided to follow her.

As Monique entered the hall between Pavilion I and Pavilion II, she looked around furtively. The last thing she needed was someone reporting to Whitset that she'd been hovering and snooping around his office. Her heart froze when she thought of the possible repercussions, but she shook off the fear. Monique looked around again, just to be safe. The coast was clear.

She didn't see the waiflike profile of Rose peering at her from around the corner.

Dr. Desmonde tentatively turned the knob on Whitset's door. It was locked. Just my luck, she thought to herself. She thought for a second and then pulled the master key to the psychiatric unit from her pocket. She inserted the key into the lock, her heart pounding in her chest. She'd never broken into anything before. Please Lord, please Lord, let it open, she prayed to herself. She was in luck. The lock clicked with a slight turn of her wrist, and she pushed the door open. She entered Whitset's office, closing the door softly behind her.

The first thing that struck the psychiatrist when she opened the door was the darkness of the office. The heavy curtains had been drawn over the double windows opposite the door. As her eyes adjusted to the darkness, she noted that the office was immaculate. Nothing was out of place. Whitset's highly polished walnut desk was completely clear of any notes, files, or correspondence. The leather desk set and inkstand were easily visible. The round leather container held four different colored ballpoint pens. Several pencils with sharp points were also in the container. A bookcase held several psychiatric reference books and several recent journals were on an end table, next to a pair of leather side chairs. All in all, the office looked like a magazine advertisement for office furniture. It was as if no one really worked in the place. It didn't even have a scent. It smelled like nothing. Monique sniffed again. Well, maybe it did smell like something. She could smell something metallic. It had a salty, metallic scent, kind of like old blood.

After looking around a second time, Monique decided the most impressive thing about the office was that it was unimpressive — except for its neatness, which was pretty typical of an obsessive personality. She continued to look around carefully, convinced that if she searched closely enough, she'd find something. She walked around to the side of Whitset's desk and switched on his brass desk lamp. A warm glow from the light bathed the office in a comfortably colored hue. The polished wood of the desk gleamed brightly in the lamplight. Monique's eyes searched the desk and nearby bookcases for any possible clues.

Once again, her senses were heightened to the metallic smell. What was that smell? As she tried to open the desk drawers, her eyes noted something glistening in the lamplight. It was hanging out of the bottom left desk drawer. Monique reached to pick it up and found it was a slender gold chain that was caught in the drawer. She tried to pull it out but couldn't because it was stuck between the drawer and the desk frame. Monique reached down to examine the chain more closely. She saw that the chain was broken and missing several links. The clasp was in place. The chain looked like one a woman would wear. It was much too fragile to be male jewelry.

Monique tried for several moments to detangle the chain from the desk drawer. Convinced that she couldn't remove the chain, Monique looked around the office again. Her eyes fell on Whitset's diplomas, which were hanging neatly on the wall over his bookcase. He had an undergraduate degree from some university in Europe. His graduate degree was a Master's in business administration from the University of Pennsylvania. Monique looked closely at the date on the MBA. The degree was conferred in 1966. Immediately, her heart started beating hard. It seemed impossible. Whitset certainly didn't appear old enough to have received a master's degree in 1966! She didn't think he was over forty-five. If he had received a master's degree in 1966, he must be a lot older than she thought he was — how then could he look so youthful? Monique intuitively knew that it wasn't Whitset's degree. She quickly looked back at his undergraduate degree. It was awarded in 1963. Damn, that was impossible!

As she stood contemplating this information, there was a soft knock on the office door. Her heart sank. She immediately killed the light and ducked behind the desk, holding her breath for what seemed like an eternity. Her pulse beat rapidly. Wow, the smell was overwhelming. What was that smell? At that point, Monique noted a green bottle, the shape that red wine came in, on the bottom bookcase near the back. She picked it up and sniffed. Oh My God, the smell of old wine and metal about knocked her out. She had to take several deep breaths to recover. Whew, she thought to herself. If I drank that stuff, I'd be loco.

After several minutes of silence, Monique rose from her hiding place and slipped surreptitiously out of the office. When she reached her own office, she pulled out her personnel file on Whitset. Her eyes scanned his resume. His date of birth was recorded as January 27, 1951. Monique smiled a half smile. She knew Whitset was smart, but she doubted he was smart enough to have been awarded a master's degree when he was only fifteen years old! Her watch beeped. It was almost 3:15. She rushed over to the main campus to the executive meeting, her face highly colored because of her discovery.

Alex was getting antsy at the meeting. She found herself fidgeting in her chair. Where was Monique? Where was Commander Françoise? She'd expected that he would attend the meeting to report on the progress of the investigation. Don was obviously getting cross about being held up by his "employees." Farve was droning on and on about how safe the psych units were and how other hospitals didn't have the sophisticated monitoring systems that CCMC had installed several years ago. Farve maintained the staffing numbers in the Pavilion were better than the staffing numbers of several hospitals considered competitors to Crescent City Medical.

Alex wanted to hug Robert Bonnet, present at the meeting because he was acting chief of surgery, when he interrupted Bette Farve's drone.

Robert directly addressed the nurse executive in a reasonable tone. "Ms. Farve, how can you suggest that the Pavilion is safe? Only last night an elderly patient was murdered, and no one heard her screams because the only staff member was on the far hall, a long distance from where the incident occurred."

Bette raised her eyebrows and gave the handsome surgeon a dirty look. "Dr. Bonnet, last night was an extreme and unusual situation. There'd been an emergency over on the prison unit. All other staff had been sent over there to handle it. This is an isolated incident!" Farve gave Robert a tight little smile.

Elizabeth spoke up. "It may be an isolated incident, but it still has a heavy impact. There should be enough staff to cover the unit even when there's a problem. When the media gets a hold of this, as I believe they already have — based on the stack of messages on my desk — we're going to be in for some nasty, negative publicity." Elizabeth Tippett used her advantage well and looked straight at Don Montgomery.

Montgomery didn't respond, but Whitset did. "I believe we are blowing the repercussions of this incident out of proportion in relationship to the actual threat. Accidents happen in hospitals. They happen every single day—"

Elizabeth interrupted the psychiatric administrator, "Really, Mr. Whitset, accidents and incidents do occur in hospitals regularly, but it's a bit extreme to have a patient murdered by another patient on the psychiatric unit. I believe you're the one underestimating the potential disaster here."

Alex wanted to give Elizabeth a standing ovation. She was proud of Elizabeth for the way she was standing up to Whitset. She had emerged from a shrinking violet just a few months ago to a strong member of the executive team. She was a master at dealing with the press and sorting out difficult press related issues. Elizabeth had a well-connected press network, which complimented her ability to perform her job well.

Whitset stared at Liz and gave her a chilling look.

Even Alex could feel the coldness his manner exuded.

He said in an icy voice, his black glittering eyes raking the media director's face and upper torso, "My dear, I do believe you're wrong."

Elizabeth maintained her composure and said simply, "No, Mr. Whitset, I'm right." She turned to Bette Farve and said, "Besides, it's clear to me that our sophisticated equipment you mentioned, Ms. Farve, was useless last night — particularly since there were no staff members available to monitor it!" She glared at the nurse executive, her eyes displaying her displeasure.

Bette just stared at the table. There was nothing she could say.

Alex and Robert both eyed each other after they saw the look of intense hatred Lester Whitset gave Elizabeth Tippet. Elizabeth seemed not to notice. Alex was glad. It was bad enough that she and Robert were worried.

Montgomery checked his watch and eyed the group. "Where in the hell is Dr. Desmonde? And, where is that useless police commander? I was sure he would be here to entertain us with his consistent incompetence." Don looked around at the group to see which of the members appreciated his humor. Bette Farve and Lester Whitset both smiled broadly.

Alex, per usual, was disgusted with Don. She said, "Don, I believe Dr. Desmonde is on her way. There was another incident up on the unit and—"

Whitset about fell out of his chair. "What incident, what happened?"

Alex looked around the room and said, "I don't know the details. Monique will tell us when she arrives."

Don was livid, and his face flushed bright red. "Shut up, Alex. I know what happened, and I don't care about that." Don paused as the door to the conference room opened. "Well, well, well, look who finally made it," Don sneered as Monique entered the conference room.

Robert was angry as well, but his voice was calm. "Don, please watch what you say and keep this meeting professional. Dr. Desmonde and Ms. Destephano don't deserve your sarcasm and disrespect."

Alex flashed Robert a smile. She could hardly believe the CEO had told her to shut up.

Don ignored Robert and said, "Dr. Desmonde, I don't recall you telling me I was going to need double staff to take care of these wackos. Did you tell me that, Dr. Desmonde?" Don's voice was demanding and so sarcastic that Alex could feel Robert get ready to say something else to him. She placed her hand on Robert's arm and whispered to him to let Monique handle Montgomery.

"No, I didn't tell you that precisely, Don. What I did tell you was that there was a distinct possibility our workload would increase significantly and that we may need more staff later. That, I believe, is when you, as our esteemed leader, hired Mr. Whitset's company to manage the psychiatry service." Monique's voice was disdainful and patronizing.

Whitset had been watching the exchange with a great deal of interest. He interjected, "Yes, Mr. Montgomery did hire us around the time he signed the state contract. He was obviously worried about the costs of caring for such a diverse population of psychiatric patients. My company assured him that we had helped many other hospitals do the same type of thing we have done here at Crescent City — successfully managing a changing population of psychiatric patients without increasing costs. We're successful here. It's a good model." Whitset smiled broadly, his thin lips curling over his small rodent like teeth.

Monique could hardly abide Whitset's tiresome ponderosity. What a pile of bullshit, she thought to herself. When she couldn't stand it any longer, she addressed the pompous Whitset.

"Mr. Whitset, your model may be a good financial model for the hospital, but it is a poor clinical model. I'm sure the only reason it's saved the hospital money is because you cut staffing positions."

If looks could kill, Whitset would have eradicated Monique. But he remained silent.

Elizabeth Tippet pushed her long, dark hair back from her face and looked at Whitset as though he were a moron. "I'm a bit confused by your comments. I wouldn't call these recent events successful, Mr. Whitset. I'd call them tragic. I agree with Dr. Desmonde. I vote we increase the staff to the levels she's suggested. It's pretty clear to me that we're understaffed over there. I, for one, don't want any more of these patient or staff incidents to occur."

"I second Elizabeth's suggestion. I trust Dr. Desmonde's judgment implicitly in these matters." Dr. Bonnet smiled warmly at Monique and continued talking. "She is a nationally known expert in her field, and she knows the internal needs of her department."

Don gave Robert a deprecating look.

He'd always hated and distrusted the surgeon. In some respects, Alex believed Don was jealous of Robert.

"Thanks, Bonnet. What a surprise! You physicians never disagree with each other." His voice was laced with sarcasm and disdain as he sneered at Robert.

Don turned to Whitset. "What do you want to do, Whitset? It's really your call, you know. You're in charge of the Pavilion. If you think we need the staff, we'll work it out."

Alex intervened, "Don, I object to giving him this authority. He's hired contract help. This system is an administrative disaster. I would certainly like him on our team, but I wouldn't give him the authority to make the decision. In fact, I don't think he has that authority based on hospital by-laws and policy."

Whitset's eyes shot daggers at Alex, his black eyes penetrated her face.

Alex could feel the coldness he exuded. She could feel the chill as it washed over her.

Don shrugged his shoulders and looked at Whitset. "Don't know, Whitset. What do you think?"

Whitset managed a complete turnabout. He looked at the group, nodding at Don Montgomery. His smile was pleasant and his voice congenial. "Thanks, Don. Thank you all for your input. I'm not in favor of hiring additional staff. We don't need them. According to my numbers, CCMC is well staffed. The staff we have are competent and are used to caring for the type of patients we admit. Secondly, our productivity would drop if we hired ten new positions. It would take us over six months to hire and train them. Hiring these people makes no business sense at all — particularly because we don't need them. I figure these positions would cost us better than $1 million the first year. I'm against it."

Bette Farve nodded her head in agreement with Lester Whitset. "I quite agree with Mr. Whitset. If we have money for positions, Don, I'd much rather put the FTEs in critical care or on the medicine units. Psych is doing okay. Besides, it's hard to fill psych nursing positions. We have to pay them more because of the perceived notion that working with these patients can be more dangerous. I'm against increasing the staff over there." Bette rolled her eyes at the "perceived notion" that caring for psych patients could be dangerous.

Monique interrupted, "Perceived notions, really Bette, you are intolerable. Two nurses have been attacked in the Pavilion!"

Alex gave Bette Farve a disgusted look and shook her head. One thing about Bette was that she never disappointed. For some reason, she always expected that the nursing leader would emerge as supportive of nursing and their needs. Farve never did. I ought to be used to her by now, Alex thought. At least I know what to expect, she mused. I guess it's better than people shooting from the hip. Expect nothing, get less. That's going to be the way I approach her.

Alex spoke. "I recommend, from a legal standpoint, that we fill the slots. We have a file full of complaints from patients, staff, and visitors about how unsafe the Pavilion is. We're required by law to provide for the reasonable safety of those who visit our premises. If we don't, we could be liable for all types of actions."

"Now, now, now, Alex. Perhaps you're being a little overzealous. Aren't you flaunting your lawyer credentials?" Lester Whitset looked at her, a mollifying smile on his face. His voice was so low she could hardly hear him.

"Absolutely not, Mr. Whitset. I'm only being reasonable and prudent, doing my job as the hospital attorney. Dr. Desmond has offered a convincing argument, substantiated by statistics, that we are severely understaffed here in psychiatry. Her numbers aren't even adjusted for the severity of our patient index or patient population. Our overall patient acuity is higher than that of any other hospital in New Orleans. Therefore—”

Alex was interrupted by Whitset as he jumped up from his seat and leaned across, practically lying on the conference table across from her, his face white again with fury. He looked like a little boy who was pouting. "We will not hire any additional staff! It's my decision, and it's final! It's no longer open for discussion." Whitset stared around the room.

Alex was incredulous. How dare that creepy SOB undermine her? She looked at Don and said, "Don, really, we must have some type of closure here.”

Montgomery looked at the hospital lawyer and shrugged his shoulders. "It's Whitset's decision, Alex. He has the last say. It's in his contract."

Alex was incredulous. "No, no, Don. You're wrong. It's our contract. Whitset is contracting with us. We are in charge here. We are driving the bus."

Robert looked scornfully at Whitset. "What's in this for you, Whitset? A bigger bonus based on dollars saved at the end of the year?"

Whitset said nothing and continued to look around the room.

Alex's sense of smell was assaulted by a strange odor. She couldn't quite place it, but it was very familiar. She looked around to see if anyone else noticed it. Whatever the smell was, it had a metallic taint.

Elizabeth said clearly, "I must go on record here as being positively opposed to this decision."

Robert and Alex nodded their heads in agreement with Liz.

Monique Desmonde, still standing at the wall-mounted board with her statistics clearly in sight, looked at the group and quietly, but assuredly, said, "I disagree completely with Mr. Whitset. The Pavilion is a powder keg. Anything could happen up there at any time. In fact, it already has."

The silence was deafening.

Don looked at Whitset for help and support, but Whitset didn't seem to be paying attention.

Monique continued as she locked eyes with Don Montgomery and said to him, "Don, don't take this as a threat. Take this as a fact. If those new positions are not approved by noon tomorrow, I will personally call a press conference. I'll tell them, as the former chief of psychiatry at Crescent City Medical Center, just how unsafe patient care is here. I'll tell the press in great detail about the attack and rape of Angie Richelieu, mentioning her commitment to her work, her unpaid overtime, and the unavailability of a security guard to walk her to her car. I'll also talk about the death of Mrs. Smithson in great, gory detail. I'll describe her injuries — the way in which the knitting needle protruded from her mouth and the fact that her face had virtually been eradicated by her murderer. I'll also mention her patient call light — about how it was covered with her blood and how it was disconnected from the wall. I'll tell the press how Mrs. Smithson, as an elderly, loving grandmother and great-grandmother, frantically called and called for help while she was being brutally raped and murdered because there were no available staff to come help her. I'll tell them where the staff was, both of them. I'll tell the Times Picayune and the Associated Press how both of our staff members were on the prison unit trying to prevent the inmates from raping the new admission."

Monique stopped for a few moments and looked at the group as if surveying the effects of her words. Then she continued, pulling down the neck of her blouse. "Finally, I'll show them my neck, my bruises. By tomorrow, this redness will clearly delineate the hands that tried to strangle me an hour or so ago on the nursing unit. Then, I'll describe the patient attack on the nurse manager. Good story, don't you think?" Monique's pale face was red with fury, anger, and wrath as she continued, "It should keep the tabloids busy for several weeks. Trust me, if you think our Mardi Gras press was bad this year, wait until this hits TV, radio, Facebook, and burns up Twitter and the local news all over the country. It will go viral in a matter of several hours. I may even uplink a YouTube video of my injuries!"

Don looked as though he were going to cry. "Monique, no! You wouldn't do that! You couldn't!" He was pleading with her.

"Don, I can, and I will. Count on it. I want an answer by noon tomorrow. I want the positions at mid-to-upper salary scales, and I want to hire them myself." Monique gave Lester Whitset a sideways glance as she left the room. His look chilled her to the bone, but she didn't care. She was on a roll. "I don't need Mr. Whitset's assistance with any of the human resource issues. As a matter of fact, I would prefer Mr. Whitset not interact with the patients at all," Monique concluded, as she shut the door behind her.

Alex glared at Whitset. She was shocked, but pleased at Monique's ultimatum, although she was afraid for her. The look on Whitset's face was one of unmitigated hatred and rage. Alex was scared for her friend, and her heart raced at the potential danger Monique could be in.

As Whitset watched Dr. Desmonde leave the conference room, he saw her turn into one of them. When she had given him that glance, he had seen it. She was one of them. An imposter. Whitset felt his heart speed up. A hot flush came over him. He was sweating. Could he be wrong? There were so many lately. No. He'd seen right. Right in front of him, Monique Desmonde's face turned into plastic — just as he thought it had earlier in the day. Then he hadn't been sure, but, now, he was positive. Whitset found himself becoming nervous and agitated. He felt like he was being suffocated. He had to get out of the room. He looked around at the others. They looked okay. Their faces had real skin. Suddenly, he got up from his chair and left the room. The noise and screaming in his head was all he could stand. There was no way he could stay for idle conversation.

Don watched him leave and said sarcastically, "Great, he's a lot of help. What a piss poor manager." He turned to Alex.

"Do you think Monique will go to the press? Will you help me?" His voice was pleading, even begging.

Alex hated Don's whiny voice. She was silent for a few moments. "I don't know, Don. Dr. Desmonde is a woman of principle. She feels strongly about things in the Pavilion. She's felt strongly for a long time. In addition to the security issues, she's convinced that the treatment milieu is inappropriate for optimal clinical outcomes. She maintains that mixing ages and placing depressed patients on the same unit with acute psychotics is inappropriate and substandard." She paused for a few seconds. "Yes, Don. She may indeed go to the press. Robert, what do you think?"

Robert Bonnet looked at Alex and Don. He nodded affirmatively. "No question about it — I'm sure she'll go. I've known Monique most of my life. What Alex says is absolutely right. Besides, she has nothing to lose, and a great deal to gain—"

Don interrupted, reverting to his little boy destructive act. "Nothing to lose! Hell, I'll fire her ass! I'll jerk her privileges! I'll blacklist her from every hospital in town!" His eyes gleamed in anticipation of destroying Monique.

Robert laughed at him. "Montgomery, Monique Desmonde is one of the leading psychiatrists in the United States, with an impressive international reputation to boot! Besides, she said she would quit. She's known globally for her work with adolescents and more recently, she's built quite a reputation for herself as a forensic psychiatrist. For God's sake, Montgomery, she's a consultant to the CDC and NIH on mental health issues. She can get a job anywhere. She could write her ticket to Hopkins or Harvard tonight and be there next week."

"I'll be damned if she'll get one in New Orleans. I'll see to that," Don ranted and threatened.

Robert snorted at the CEO. "You are powerless on this one, Don. Monique's currently an attending professor in psychiatry at Tulane, has staff privileges there, and an open invitation to head the service at Oschner. The only reason she has stayed here is because you got the state contract, and she was interested in building her forensic practice. You'd better give her what she wants."

Don looked dismal. "I can't. I really can't. It's Whitset's decision — it's in the contract."

"That's BS, Don. You are in charge of CCMC. Where's the contract? I've never seen it!" Alex was furious. "You shouldn't be entering into agreements with other groups without my advice. That is what you pay me for!" Alex looked at him disdainfully. Don was such an idiot and an appalling leader.

"I'll have Latetia copy it. See if you can work around it." Don looked scared. "Alex, please talk to Dr. Desmonde. Make her change her mind. She'll destroy us!"

"I'll talk with her, Don. But you best talk with Whitset. He's the problem."

"I will. Let's get out of here. You all think about this and let me know what we should do." Don dismissed the rest of the executive team with a wave of his hand. He disappeared into his private office and shut the door tightly.

Alex and Robert walked slowly toward her office, talking quietly to each other.

Robert said to Alex, his voice serious, "You know, Al, Whitset really bothers me. He looks crazy himself. Did you see the way he looked at Monique? At Liz? I swear, I think he'd like to kill them both."

"Yeah, I know, and probably me as well. The man absolutely chills me to the bone. I think there's something wrong with him, too. Monique thinks he probably has some type of personality disorder. I know Jack was going to run a check on him today. By the way, Robert," Alex said, lowering her voice to a whisper, "Monique was going to search his office this afternoon. That's why she was late getting to the meeting. Intuitively, I think she believes he's involved in some of the stuff in the Pavilion."

"Do you mean Angie or Mrs. Smithson?" Robert looked shocked.

"Oh, no, I don't think so. She's just concerned that he spends so much time with the patients. She thinks he agitates them or something. Causes patient outbursts. Anyway, I'm going to go over there and try to see her."

Whitset felt confused on his way back to the Pavilion. He had taken several wrong turns in the main hospital. The voices were screaming in his head. He was so hot, so terribly hot. He stopped to sit on a bench in the shade to rest for a few minutes, but it was still stifling. It'd been a hard day for him. He'd been up a long time, almost twenty-four hours. He always felt bad when he didn't sleep well, and the voices seemed to wear him down more. He placed his face between his hands, pleading with the voices to leave him alone. He was too tired to listen to them. Besides, he was worried about all the imposters that were showing up. They were ganging up against him. There were so many, three in just the last few days. Before that, it'd been years since he had seen one of them.

Lester began to think back. He'd never forget the first one he'd met. It was at school, a teacher of his in Alabama. He had been twelve years old then. She'd been mean to him and ridiculed him in front of the class. He'd wet his pants, and everybody had laughed at him. He could still see their faces — all of his friends. Their mouths were huge, and their lips painted red like the red of a clown's mouth. They were leering at him. They were making fun of him and taunting him repeatedly. They'd even made up a rhyme. He could hear it now. They had sung it to him on the bus over and over again:

Whitset, Whitset is a real big mess

Whitset, Whitset is such a mess

Whitset, Whitset just peed his pants!”

Lester couldn't stand it. After that, the kids never left him alone. He'd become the class whipping boy. He began to hate school and retreated into himself. Then, one day, his teacher had kept him after school and made him write on the blackboard three hundred times, “I will pay attention in class.” He remembered being mad and feeling completely powerless. He had completed his punishment and turned around to face his teacher... and then it happened. He saw her turn to plastic! He watched her face become hard and immovable. He saw her eyes turn into two inflexible pieces of blue plastic. He watched in horror and fascination as her lips became fixed in a red, stiff, hard smile. Her hands, below the cuffs of her blouse, had also turned to plastic. Her nails turned a shiny pink plastic, like seashells. Then, they told him to do it... the voices... and he had. He felt triumphant! After all, she was an imposter. It was his responsibility to "do away" with imposters. His voices said so.

Then there was a huge blank in his life. Whitset didn't remember the next few years. He thought he'd been in school trying to learn to behave better. Anyway, he hadn't seen any imposters for a long time. He could only remember one other one and he pushed her out of his mind. He had loved her, and she had laughed at him. Finally, he saw her turn to plastic, too. And then, well, he'd had to do it. Even if it was his brother's wife. He felt tingly at the memory. He liked the feeling he got when hurting other people.

He got excited now just remembering the feeling of squeezing her neck. God, that was such a long time ago. It was too painful to remember, but the pain felt good and energized him — at least, for a while. Suddenly Whitset felt tired. He closed his eyes for a brief moment and awoke with a start! Had someone spoken to him? They must have because he had heard a voice. It was five o'clock in the afternoon. People were walking from the Pavilion toward their cars. He looked over at the yellow tape and wondered what it was doing there in the trees. Then he remembered. Oh yeah, the nurse. He remembered that night and pleasure riveted through him. He got chill bumps all over his arms. He could feel the hair stand up on the back of his neck. Lester shook his head furiously. He didn't want to think about that now. He had to get control back. He was much too tired, and his head was beginning to ache.

Whitset rested a few minutes longer and then finished walking to the Pavilion. The air-conditioning in the lobby felt so cool. The blast seemed to revive him. So very cool. He sat on the grey vinyl bench for a few minutes. He began to feel better, much better. His strength came back, and his head cleared. He pushed the elevator button, unlocked the door to Pavilion II, and headed toward his office. It was pretty quiet. Everybody was in the day room eating dinner. Rose, the waif, waved at him from her room when he walked by. Whitset didn't respond. He continued the walk down the hall toward his office.

He opened his office door. Immediately, he knew. Someone had been in here. Someone had been in his office. He could smell it — no, not it, her. It was a female smell. Just a slight, slight odor. He felt himself getting angry. Who had been in his office? He began to hyperventilate as he looked around carefully. Nothing seemed to be disturbed. His desk drawers were still locked. He took out his keys and opened his bottom right drawer to check his stash. It was there. He breathed a sigh of relief and began to calm down.

His relief was momentary. He was furious about the invasion of his private space. He stalked out of his door and locked it securely. He walked into Rose's room. Why not? Her room was the closest to his office. Maybe Rose saw something. She was lying on her bed and gave Whitset a shy smile in greeting.

His voice was charming, honey coated. "Rose, it's your good friend, Lester. How are you doing?" Whitset gave Rose his best smile. He sat next to her on the bed, holding her hands. "I like your blouse. Is it new?" His voice was soft and sensual. His eyes rolled up and down her slight body.

Rose nodded her head. Her eyes transfixed on Whitset's face.

"Give Lester a big smile and then Lester will give Rose a big kiss," Whitset said in a childish voice as he moved closer to her.

Rose smiled at him. She didn't really like Lester, but she was so lonely. Besides, once he had made her feel really good. Just a couple of nights ago. They had done the dirty thing or, at least, they had almost done the dirty thing. Somehow, Anthony had found out and that was why he had been so mad at her yesterday. Somehow, Anthony knew she had been with Lester. Rose continued to smile and think. Men usually just ignored her, except for Anthony. He said he really loved her. She didn't really know. Men had said that to her before and, besides, Lester was being nice. She kissed him back.

"That's good, very good." Lester's voice was soft, almost a whisper, as he continued to kiss Rose over and over. His hands undid the buttons on her blouse. Rose gave a little sigh as Lester's soft hand reached for her tiny breasts. As he continued to kiss and fondle her, he asked her softly, talking baby talk to her, "Did little Rose see anybody go into Lessie's office today? You know, when I was at the meeting?"

Rose didn't say anything, but Whitset picked up on the almost imperceptible stiffening of her body. He continued to kiss her, kneading her breasts and fondling her body. He said sensually, "Lester knows that Rose knows who was in his office. Rose had better tell Lester if she wants him to stay and play with her."

Rose was silent. Whitset immediately withdrew his mouth and hands from her body.

Rose moaned in disappointment. It was cold where his lips had been and she shivered. She opened her eyes wide and looked at him. "Please, Lester, please. It feels so good. Please play with me," she begged.

"Only if you tell Lessie who was in his office this afternoon. That's only fair. Then, I'll play with you all night. That's only fair." Whitset's voice was indignant, self-righteous.

That was all Rose needed to hear. She asked in her little girl voice, "Promise, Lester? Do you really promise?"

"Scouts honor. I promise. Tell Lester and we will play with each other all night." Whitset gave Rose another long, lingering kiss.

Rose, her eyes closed, said softly. "It was Dr. Desmonde. She was only in there a couple of minutes."

Rose opened her eyes as she felt Whitset's hands turn cold. His face was white, and his eyes were dilated. She was frightened. She wished he would get up, but he just laid there, his body was so cold that she was freezing where she had been so warm a few minutes before.

Whitset was beside himself with anger. God, he hated that shrink bitch. She'd been a pain since his first day. Always wanting to do things right. Always wanting more staff and more supplies. Always wanting to disorder Lester's perfectly ordered life. Today she had gone too far. She would pay now.

He continued to think, becoming angrier by the minute. First, she'd threatened to close down the hospital and now she'd broken into his office. Then, she turned into an imposter. She was one of them. In his anger and fury, Lester ripped off Rose's polyester slacks and thrust himself into her. He needed a release. Please, somebody, anybody, give me a release, he cried to himself. Let me make it this time. Let me get off! It was such a big deal for him sometimes. Then, other times, it wasn't a big deal at all. The uncertainty made him mad and unsure of his sexuality. He lusted for power and obedience at all times. That also included the obedience of his body.

He continued to go at it. Please, he deserved it today. He needed the release. It had been a horrible day. He thrust and thrust and thrust.

Rose lay beneath him, whimpering silently. "Please stop, Lester. You're hurting me. I want you to play nicely with me." Rose smiled tearfully at him.

Whitset glared at her. "Shut up, you little bitch." He grabbed her face in his hands and hissed at her, "If you tell anybody we did this, I'll kill you!"

He jumped from the bed and disappeared silently from Rose's room, leaving her crying silently into her pillow.

It was late afternoon and Alex was frantic. She could not find Monique anywhere. She had called the Pavilion before she left the hospital, and the staff had assured her that Dr. Desmonde wasn't there. Alex, feeling increasingly apprehensive and useless at work, called Martin's cab, dropped Angie's cross at her jewelry store over on Magazine Street, and went home. Even Martin's humor and jokes had not been able to cheer her up on her way home. She was worried and had a bad feeling in the pit of her stomach.

She glanced at her kitchen clock for the tenth time since getting home. It was almost seven o'clock in the evening. She phoned Monique again and left a voicemail. The charge nurse at the Pavilion told her that Dr. Desmonde had turned over her calls to the senior psychiatric resident at six o'clock that evening. Alex, her frustration mounting, tried to reach Jack. When he didn't answer his cell or text, she called police headquarters and was told that Commander Françoise was unavailable. Alex pressed the watch officer for more information and declared an emergency. The officer finally admitted that the commander was out of New Orleans for the evening, working on a case somewhere either in Mississippi or Alabama. He wasn't sure. The man offered to put Alex in contact with someone else, but she refused.

After the phone call, she chided herself, thinking that Monique and Jack were spending a quiet evening alone — out of New Orleans, probably in an isolated hideaway on the Gulf Coast. That kept her satisfied for a few minutes. If they were together and she was this worried, she would probably murder them herself for not answering her frantic messages and texts.

Time wore on. Alex didn't like what she was feeling. She was so unsettled; she poured herself a second glass of wine and sat on the sofa in her living room. As her mind clicked through the events of the day, she kept refocusing on the look that Whitset had given Monique in the executive committee meeting. His behavior toward the psychiatrist had chilled her to the bone. It terrified her. It was evident that he was enraged with her. Essentially, Monique had the power to put Whitset out of work and, more than likely, Whitset knew that as well. This concerned Alex because she didn't think Whitset was normal or rational. His behavior with the Smithsons had been unnerving, particularly that singsong routine she had witnessed. Oh, if only she could reach either Jack or Monique, she would feel so much better. Besides, she knew Monique had found something in Whitset's office and her curiosity was killing her.

She jumped up when she heard a knock at her door. She ran from the living room to the foyer and felt a twinge of disappointment when she saw Robert on her porch. Well, not disappointment, but she had hoped it was Monique. She opened the door, smiling. Robert looked great. He was impeccably dressed, clean-shaven, and his eyes sparkled at the sight of her. He truly was a hot guy, she thought to herself.

"Hey, what a surprise! What's up? Have you heard from Monique or Jack?" Her voice sounded strained, and she looked stressed.

Robert looked surprised at her greeting. "No, Alex, why? What's happened? Has something else happened?"

"Nothing. Nothing really. At least, nothing I know of. I've been trying to reach Monique since right after the meeting this afternoon and I can't find her. The hospital said she turned over her calls. She doesn't answer her home phone or her cell and..." Alex paused for a moment and continued in a concerned voice, "Oh, Robert, I guess I'm frightened for her. I'm afraid Whitset might go after her. He was so angry!"

Robert nodded in agreement, his face also showing concern. "Yeah, that he was. Have you been able to locate Jack?"

"No, I've tried. I pressed the watch officer at NOPD. He said Jack was out of the state, that he was investigating over in Alabama or Mississippi. I would think his cell phone would work over there, wouldn't you?" Alex paused for a moment, thinking. "I bet he found something out on Whitset. He said he was going to run a check on him in Alabama!" Alex was breathless for a moment then her face fell.

"What's the matter, Alex? If he found something out on Whitset, that's good, isn't it?" Robert looked at her intently.

"Yes, of course it is! I had convinced myself that he and Monique were off on some romantic interlude or something. I guess I'm a hopeless romantic. Heaven knows, they certainly deserve it after today."

Robert attempted to look cheerful. "Well, maybe they are investigating together. Anyway, I'm sure they're fine. Have you had any dinner?"

Alex shook her head. "No... would you like for me to make something for us? I could whip us up something simple. Salad or something."

"I'd be glad to take you out, if you'd like."

"No, Robert, thanks. I prefer to stay in. I feel better here, particularly if the phone rings and it's either Jack or Monique. How about a fresh chicken salad and a glass of pinot noir?"

"Well, you know they can reach you on your cell, Alex. But, that being said, chicken salad and wine sounds great. Are you sure I'm not imposing? We could order out," Robert ventured.

"No, no. It will get my mind off things to be busy in the kitchen. I appreciate the company. I hate to be anxious alone. Come on back to the kitchen."

Robert and Alex retreated to Alex's newly remodeled gourmet kitchen. Robert looked around, once again pleased at how beautifully Alex had renovated her New Orleans home. He reminded himself that he had never really appreciated her talent and abilities when they were married. He guessed he would be sorry for that for the rest of his natural life. He eyed the oak kitchen furniture appreciably and said, "I still love this furniture."

Alex smiled at him. "Yes, it's beautiful. One of our best purchases..." They both remembered the beautiful fall afternoon when they had purchased the lovely antique oak furniture during a sojourn to the Virginia countryside. They had absolutely no money at that point in time. Robert had been a resident at the University of Virginia, and she was a staff nurse in the ICU at the University hospital. They had fallen in love with the honey-colored oak furniture and had purchased it on impulse. Robert had worked three straight weekends in the emergency department at Martha Jefferson Hospital, and Alex had worked many overtime shifts to pay for that extravagance. It'd been worth it. They'd dined on it during their marriage and spent many evenings sitting around it, talking with good friends. Additionally, the couple used the table as a desk and spent many evenings studying together when they were students. The table, chairs, and sideboard were so large they had practically taken up the entire student housing apartment.

Alex was again remembering their first meal together at the table, how it was followed by a night of splendid and unparalleled passion in their marriage — the night she became pregnant with the child she later lost. That seemed to start the downward spiral of what she thought was a perfect marriage. She guessed Robert was remembering the same evening. Suddenly, they were interrupted by the shrill ringing of her telephone.

Alex quickly picked up the receiver. It was Don Montgomery. She winced at the sound of his whiny voice.

"Destephano, have you gotten Monique Desmonde straightened out? This shit is bothering me. We can't have her blabbing to the press. Not good for us. Not good at all." Montgomery was whimpering into the phone.

Alex gritted her teeth. "No, Don, I haven't talked with Monique. I've been calling her since right after our meeting. I don't know where she is."

"Shit, she's probably at home writing her press release. Fix this, Alex. I mean it! Your butt's on the line!"

Alex could hear the irrational anger beginning to surface in the CEO's voice. "I'll do my best, Don. Did you look at Whitset's contract?" Alex skillfully returned the ball to Montgomery's court.

"No. I had a cocktail party to go to. I'll have it on your desk in the morning." Don was whining again.

"Good. Make sure you do. Whitset's the major player here. Make sure you can control him. I'm not your problem and neither is Monique." Alex knew her voice was condescending, but she didn't care.

"Dammit, Alex! Desmonde is the problem, not Whitset!"

"Don, you and I both know that there are a dozen Whitset's for every Monique Desmonde. You need to stand tall on this. If you lose Dr. Desmonde, you will lose psychiatry at CCMC."

"I don't give a damn about psychiatry! Let the wackos go! I just don't want any bad press!"

"You'll destroy our reputation as a world-class hospital. You must have a psychiatric service to keep the world-class designation. You're going to get bad press if you don't get Whitset in line. After all, you are the CEO." Alex knew she was venturing on the fringe, but she didn't care. Don had already tried to fire her once this year — back in February. Her appointment by the hospital board of trustees made it impossible for Don to fire her without their approval. And, so far, they really liked her.

"All right, all right. Just fix Monique." He was backing down and his voice was contrite.

Alex rode her advantage home. "Look, Don. Think about it. Your win-win position is to keep Dr. Desmonde and psychiatry — even if Whitset and his management company have to go. Think about that."

"Okay, okay. Just keep Desmonde away from the press, promise?" Don's voice was placating now, sugarcoated.

Alex was disgusted. "I won't have to keep Monique from the press if you give her what she needs to provide safe, reasonable, standard care. Get the picture, Don?" Alex's voice was defiant.

"Yeah, yeah. I'll do what I can. You do your part." He clicked off the phone without saying goodbye.

"Bye to you too, you idiot!" Alex slammed down the phone. "I hate that Motherfucker," she grumbled to Robert.

Robert laughed. "Whoa! That's rough talk for you, Alex. Can I assume your boss hung up on you?"

"You bet he did. Slimeball!" Alex was quiet for a moment. Then she said, "Robert, I'm going to tell you the truth. I don't know how much longer I can stand working with him. He's an absolute idiot, a model of incompetence. He's the Peter Principle personified. I have a very interesting opportunity on my desk at the hospital. A large, managed care group is looking for a corporate attorney. Of course, I would have to leave New Orleans..." Alex demurred a bit. "I'll never understand why the board keeps him here."

Robert gave her a matter-of-fact look and said, "Sure you do, Alex. For all his faults, we all know why they keep Don around. Montgomery is a financial wizard. Crescent City is one of the few hospitals in New Orleans that is financially solvent. No one cares that he's rude, inappropriate, and non-appreciative of nurses, physicians, and other providers. No one cares that he's insensitive to needs of patients, staff, and families. They only care about money. We are making money and that is ultimately what it's all about — the bottom line, like it or not. CCMC has held together when other hospitals have gone out of business or have been bought up by conglomerates. Don will skillfully maneuver CCMC through health care reform. He understands the health care portability act better than the politicians that wrote it. That, my dear, is very simply Mr. Montgomery's strength."

Alex sighed. "Yeah, I know, Robert. But Don truthfully doesn't give a rip about the care that patients receive. He doesn't even know about clinical care. It seems unlikely that his success will continue."

Robert shrugged his shoulders. "Rest assured, it will continue as long as he keeps giving the physicians the technology they crave and the raises they deserve. I hate to give the man any accolades, but he's doing a fairly good job, all things considered. Even the nursing salaries are competitive, I hear."

"Yeah, but the quality of care is dropping and the working conditions suck. The nurses have absolutely no support. Bette Farve treats them like street workers, not like professionals. Money is important to nurses, but so is professionalism, research, and continuing education — important aspects of a nurse's role that Farve refuses to recognize. Motivation and morale are almost zilch at CCMC among nursing staff." Alex shook her head. "It's actually very sad because CCMC has some of the best nurses I've ever seen."

"Yes, a fact which the physician group is profoundly concerned about. None of them like Farve." Robert paused for a moment and winked at her. "Don't say anything to anyone, but I think Farve may take a fall in a few months."

"Robert," Alex's voice was gleeful, "that's the best news I've heard." She ran over and hugged him.

"Shish. Don't say anything. It is definitely in the making. I've just come from a medical staff meeting and Ms. Farve's leadership, or lack of it, was the topic of discussion. I'm sure it will happen. Just be patient. Besides, I don't want you anywhere other than New Orleans!"

Alex smiled to herself. She was enjoying the feel of being in his arms again. When she broke off the embrace, Alex literally danced around the kitchen, making a gourmet salad of lettuce, cherry tomatoes, cucumbers, and fresh chicken breast. She even pulled out her food processor and made Robert's favorite salad dressing, a creamy vinaigrette, for old time's sake.

Robert knew what she was doing and was secretly pleased. Once again, he could kick his own ass for divorcing her.

"Robert, let's set the table in the dining room! It's been a long, lousy day. It deserves a good ending. No shoptalk at all. The china is in the linen press. I have a bottle of barrel-fermented Virginia chardonnay that should go well with the salad. It's great! Estate bottled at Windy River Winery, a new winery close to my grandparents' home in Hanover County. Grand shipped me four bottles last week. She's impressed with the quality — what do you say?"

"Why in heaven's name would I argue with such a beautiful lady? I'm on my way to set the table." Robert was feeling happy and lighthearted as he moved into Alex's formal dining room. He switched on the brilliant crystal chandelier. It glowed magnificently against the pale blue moiré of the wallpaper. He adjusted the dimmer switch to a low light level until Alex's antique silver service glistened in the light. The silver candlesticks and fresh flowers were beautifully set against the antique mahogany and cherry of the dining room furniture. Robert sighed in appreciation as he looked around the room. The Sheraton banquet table gleamed in the light of the chandelier. Again, he was awed by Alex's taste. He wondered briefly if Mitch Landry had been a part of the house's renovation. A flicker of jealousy flowed through him. Then he realized that Mitch couldn't have been. He remembered they had started seeing each other three months after Alex had moved into the renovated townhouse. The home was obviously Alex's creation alone. For some reason, that pleased him.

He continued to think about the relationship between Mitch and Alex, as he removed the heavy silver from the drawer of the sideboard. He'd known Mitch for years and had been a little perturbed when he had learned that Mitch and Alex were dating. Of course, Mitch had been charming. He was sincerely sorry at the way things had ended. But, to be honest, it did allow him an opportunity to win Alex back. Oh, and how Robert wanted her again. He had been such a fool — young and foolish, a real macho idiot. He could admit that to himself now. Monique had helped him see that.

He had wanted Alex to be a typical haus frau, a stay at home wife and mother. That was what his mother had been. Of course, his mother had always done civic and charity work. She was a proverbial do-gooder. Back then, that was what he thought all men wanted, a wife that stayed at home and cared for the home and children. He never thought a man wanted a professional wife, one who shared his world. Looking back, he guessed it was a culture thing. He'd just recently realized that marriage in the world he lived in was very different than the world his parents shared.

Thank goodness for Monique Desmonde! Now, due to her influence, he saw things differently. He wanted Alex just as she was. Since he had gotten older, Robert had learned that his mother had given up her professional career for his father. She had been a well-known classical violinist. Of course, it hadn't been all bad. She was the first lady of Louisiana when his dad was governor, and now she was a ranking senator's wife. Still, Robert realized, his mother had made considerable sacrifices throughout the years, missed opportunities she could never regain.

As Robert opened the antique linen press, he felt a little maudlin. The china was the same. Alex was still using their wedding china. It was English Aynsley, the pattern, Capistrano. He hadn't liked the china when they were married. He had considered it too busy, garish in fact. Now he thought the colors were beautiful and the birds magnificent. What a purist he had been in those days! He'd wanted china that was white, with a platinum ring around the edge. He had possessed no imagination at all back then, only a preconceived notion of what a wife, a woman, should be.

Alex had fought him on the china decision, telling him continually that if the Queen of England dined on Aynsley, so could they. He had acquiesced but had never liked the china with its colorful birds and flowers. He touched the plates fondly now, as if trying to atone for his former dislike. It was so very Alex, beautifully designed, etched, and colored. He had just finished setting the table when Alex appeared in the doorway with the salad in a large cut glass bowl and a silver basket full of French bread.

"Robert, you did great! When did you learn to set the table? Good job... I'm impressed." Alex really was pleased. Before and during their marriage, Robert would never have helped her in the kitchen, much less have set the table. She looked around. The silver, china, wine, and water goblets were perfectly placed on the table. She continued, "If you light the candles, I'll get the wine. It's chilling in the silver ice bucket in the kitchen."

Alex was thinking about how much Robert had changed, as she returned to the kitchen. He was a wonderful man. Kind, good, even tempered. A healer. Would she ever recover from the distrust and feelings of abandonment he had left her with? Maybe, just maybe, she could. She felt her heartbeat pick up. Maybe they could get back together. She knew Robert was interested. She believed Robert loved her and always had — but he did have a lot of baggage. He had been an excellent surgeon prior to his injury earlier in the year, and while he seemed to be coping well with his limitations, Alex knew he was prone to depression. Of course, what man wouldn't be? He had been at the precipice of national fame prior to his injury and had pioneered several surgical techniques that were now written in the medical books. After all, it was quite possible that a brilliant surgical career had ended in a gun battle at the Endymion extravaganza during Mardi Gras.

Alex also remembered that Robert was a wonderful lover. She briefly allowed herself to think back to their married years and, as her heart quickened, she felt her legs weaken. Even when they weren't getting along, they had always had a consuming passion for each other. They had been great lovers. She felt a little nervous about the dinner. What was going to happen? What would she do if one thing led to another? Well, she made up her mind. She would just savor the day. Wasn't that the avant-garde thing to do? Besides, it'd been so long. There had only been one other lover in her life since Robert, a physician in Texas. She and Mitch had never been intimate sexually. Why, it'd been over two years. No wonder! Alex's heart began to flutter.

Robert reappeared in the kitchen. She heard the sounds of Vladimir Horowitz, her favorite pianist and Robert's favorite as well. He had remembered and played the CD for her. She was beginning to feel wonderful. She felt the tension drop from her body like a discarded garment.

Robert smiled at her — a deep, caring, and sensual smile. She looked into his eyes. She knew the look, the sensitive eyes that smoldered and bespoke of countless pleasures to come. He said in his deep voice, "May I escort the lovely lady into dinner?" He was so gallant, so cultured, so... French. So sexy. She loved this.

Alex laughed a little nervously and accepted his arm. "Of course... I'd be honored," she said, remembering her Virginia upbringing.

He seated her to his right, and he sat at the head of the table. He deftly poured the wine and served her salad.

For a moment, Alex had a flashback. This evening was so typical of the evenings she and Mitch had spent at her house. Only Mitch had been seated at her table. No other man had ever graced her dining room. She pushed the thought from her mind, not wanting to think about Mitch tonight. He wasn't an option any longer.

She had a fleeting thought of what her grandmother, Kathryn Rosseau Lee, would do in a similar situation. It was easy. Grand would tell her to go for it. Grand was such a pragmatist, a wise lady, and so fair with people, their flaws, and relationships. Besides, hadn't Grand encouraged her to try and rekindle her love for Robert? Hadn't she urged her to consider reconciliation when they'd been in Virginia in the spring? Grand had suggested this, and Alex had brushed it off, way too raw from the death of Mitch.

Alex couldn't be hard on her grandmother, her mentor. Grand had suggested to her in her exacting, precise, and practical way, "Alex, my dear, real love comes only once. Robert was your first love, just as Adam was mine. People fall in and out of love with each other many times throughout a marriage. My generation, we put up with each other, but you younger folks run for divorce — an easy out, which prevents people from trying to work things out—"

Alex had interrupted her grandmother, angry and defensive at the conversation. She'd accused her grandmother of blaming her for ending her marriage. Boy, she had some raw nerves back then.

Kathryn had denied this, saying only that she was sure Robert still loved and wanted her. Because the conversation had been painful for Alex and the loss of Mitch so recent, Alex had abruptly ended the conversation. Her grandmother had assured her that she understood and asked only that Alex keep an open mind with regard to Robert's intentions. She asked that Alex be honest with herself. Grand also mentioned she knew Alex had secrets locked in her heart, as Grand did herself. Alex had found this remark particularly perplexing. One day when she wasn't so emotional, she would ask Grand about her secrets.

Robert interrupted her thoughts. "Alex, what are you thinking?" His dark eyes bored into hers.

"I was just thinking about Grand. Something she said to me when we were home. It's nothing really. How's your salad, Robert?"

"It's wonderful! Just as you are, Alex. I'm going to savor this evening — it's perfect!"

Robert reached for Alex's hand and rubbed it gently, tracing the veins in her hands softly. Alex again remembered the passion of their marriage. She decided to let herself be romanced and lured. It felt so good.

Robert continued, "You know, Alex. You're so fortunate to have had your grandparents. They are fine people. The very best actually. I admire them both."

She laughed. "Even Granddad? You always said you never had a handle on how Adam felt about you. Has that changed?"

Robert contemplated her remarks. "No, I guess not. But, I still admire Adam Patrick Lee. He's one of the most noble and ethical men I have ever met." He looked a little sheepish. "I don't think Adam Lee thinks any man is good enough for his Alex."

Alex smiled at him.

"And you know what," Robert continued. "He may be right."

Alex smiled at Robert. Their eyes locked. He continued to stroke her hand. She looked at him, conscious that she was going to have to make a decision very soon — a decision that could possibly affect their relationship for a long time, maybe even forever.

Alex said to Robert gently, "Robert, I don't have any dessert. Sorry." Alex pretended to ponder this impropriety.

He finally said, "Well, I guess I'll accept a dance instead. Isn't that Richard Clayderman?"

Alex nodded. Clayderman, a popular pianist, was playing a romantic medley of songs. They moved into the living room to dance. Alex was pleased that Robert had cut off the lamps and had lit the electric wall sconces. The room was romantic, the sconces casting a warm, mellow glow over the pastel furniture.

Robert and Alex began dancing, each caught up in their own thoughts about the rest of the evening. It was a wonderful feeling for Alex. She felt like a teenager. It seemed so right. After all, Robert had been her husband. That made it feel especially right. Besides, it felt perfect in his arms. It was so familiar.

Robert was thinking the same thing. He felt sure he was interpreting Alex correctly. He wanted her to want the same things as he did. He wasn't looking for a one-night stand. He was looking for the opportunity to reclaim his wife. He said to her softly, "Alex, I love you. I've always loved you. I want to be with you, but only if you really want me."

She moved her head from his shoulder and looked at him directly. His eyes were smoldering with passion and love. She knew the delights they held.

She said simply, "I want you, too, Robert. I can't promise anything forever, but I want you."

He pulled her closer and kissed her. A long, lingering, passionate kiss.

Alex felt her heart beat faster and her legs and arms become weak with anticipation. She was aware of the degree of Robert's passion, as he held her in his arms. She took his hand and led him into her bedroom. "Give me a moment, Robert, so I can brush my teeth."

He laughed at her, remembering that this was Alex's prelude to love. He said, "I'll do the same."

Alex went into her bathroom, stripped off her clothes, and changed into a satin gown. She reemerged and found Robert waiting for her in her bed. No, it was their antique walnut bed with the deeply carved rosewood ten-foot headboard.

For a moment, Alex was infinitely glad she had Helene, her cleaning lady, continue to put satin sheets on her bed. Over the past couple of years, she'd laughed at herself for using them, but now, it was worth it.

She smiled shyly at Robert, and he pulled her into bed. She fell into his arms. Robert was naked and she felt his muscled, lean body press against her as they embraced. She breathed a sigh of contentment as he kissed her. It was beautiful. It was poignantly familiar, it seemed so right. It was right, Alex convinced herself. She loved the way he smelled, so fresh and masculine. She was giving herself up to a night of ecstasy, when the phone rang. Robert gave a little, sad moan. Alex giggled and picked it up. It was Monique. Alex felt guilty. She had forgotten all about Monique and Jack.

"Alex, can you meet me? I have got to talk to you! I can't find Jack!" Monique's voice was strangely hollow and frightened.

Alex looked at her alarm clock. It was almost 11:00 p.m. She said, "Of course, Monique. Are you okay? You sound frightened. Where are you?"

"I am frightened, and I'm at home. Would you like to come here?" Monique picked up on Alex's hesitation. "I could come there, but I'm not sure that someone..."

"No, you stay there. I'll come over. I'll be there in about twenty minutes."

"Thanks, Alex. I appreciate it." Monique sounded relieved.

Alex looked at Robert, who smiled at her sheepishly. "Could I have a rain check," she asked demurely.

He laughed. "You bet! You can have any kind of check you want. Monique okay?"

"I think so. She said she was frightened and wanted to talk." Alex became apologetic. "If it was anything or anyone else, I would've said no, but..."

"Alex. It's okay. Believe me, I understand. Want me to go?"

"No. But if I need you, I'll call. Deal?"

"You bet. I'll drop you off."

Robert and Alex looked at each other shyly. Robert finally said, "I won't look, if you won't look."

"Okay... another deal. Shut your eyes!"

"Okay." Robert pretended to shut his eyes as his beautiful former wife bounded naked from the bed, clutching only a sheet. She had the elegance of a gazelle. She turned around and smiled at him as she ran into the master bath.

God, she's beautiful, he thought to himself. She looks like a goddess with her alabaster skin and perfect body. She hasn't changed at all. In fact, she looks better now than she did ten years ago. He was right. Alex's long legs and buttocks were perfectly formed. Her tiny waist was the same. If anything, she had improved. He sighed as he retreated into the guest bath to dress. Well, he thought to himself, it was almost a perfect night. It was certainly more perfect than he had ever dreamed of on his way over. Robert smiled to himself. I love her, he thought. I really love her. Please God, please make her want me back, he prayed to himself.

Lester Whitset was having a rough evening. He was furious about Dr. Desmonde breaking into his office. He also knew that Anthony Gavette had seen him come out of Rose's room. That had pissed him off, especially when Anthony started screaming rape while hurling obscenities and threats at him. Lester decided he really didn't give a damn about Anthony. Anthony was the least of his problems.

The voices had been screaming at him since he left the hospital and went home. He had tried to stop them but couldn't. His head was hurting so badly, Whitset decided on a chemical fix, something he rarely did. Sometimes it helped calm the voices down and send them away. The booze and pills made him feel mellow and he deserved it. It'd been a bad day. Then, when he was calm and could think better, he could decide what to do about that imposter shrink bitch.

Lester went to his bar and poured himself a tumbler full of scotch whiskey. After gulping the golden liquid, he went into his tiny bathroom to look for his Xanax. Damn, the bottle was empty. He'd have to steal some tomorrow off the medication cart. He refilled his tumbler again and drank it all.

Finally, the whiskey was helping. The voices were fading. He thought again about Rose. He knew she would be loyal to him. She had shared in his little game. He continued to think about her as he drank heavily. He suspected Rose had told Anthony about the little game they'd been playing. Whitset considered Anthony his closest equal on the unit. He also knew that Anthony coveted the little waiflike patient.

Anthony had told Lester one night, over a week ago, that he had wanted Rose for his own. Whitset had laughed at Anthony, reminding him that he was, after all, only a patient and not the administrator, like Les, who had the pick of the female patient litter. Anthony had gotten mad, but Lester calmed him down, assuring him that he liked his women tall and lush, like Angie Richelieu — not like the skinny little waif, Rose. Eventually, Anthony had cooled off, feeling confident that Lester was telling the truth.

Whitset had put on a real show for Anthony and had spent most of the evening watching the beautiful nurse as she worked on the unit. Anthony had watched his every move. Whitset had even followed Angie into the glassed medication room, making obscene gestures behind her back in an effort to prove his point to Anthony and the other patients watching from the day room. Anthony had seemed pretty convinced. Whitset had thought what a dumbass Gavette was. Just a stupid, ignoramus crazy.

Whitset smiled as he remembered how he foiled Anthony. He'd considered Anthony his intellectual equal, but now it was crystal clear that he was the superior being. The two men had a lot in common, but Whitset was the leader. After all, he was the administrator and Anthony was a lowly patient without any power. Lester had all the power, except some that the shrink bitch thought she had. He mustn't think about that, he told himself. Tut, tut, for Anthony Gavette. He smiled as he relived the evening. As soon as Anthony had been medicated and hauled off to bed by the psych tech, Whitset had reentered Rose's room.

As the evening wore on and Whitset continued to drink, he daydreamed about the night with Rose. It had been good, so good. Rose was exactly what he had needed. The two had played like children, naughty children of course, for over two hours. Lester had been able to be himself with her. He was so happy when he had learned that Rose likes the simple little games of house that he had made up. He became more excited when he learned that Rose hadn't minded when the big burglar came in, killed her husband, and then raped her in the special way that only Lester knew how to do. He had ignored Rose when she had cried for help. He knew she loved it.

Whitset shook himself when he realized he had drooled all down the front of his shirt. He got up to get a towel and shuddered when he thought of Angie Richelieu. She was a big, gross, woman pig. He had hated her. Still did. She was trouble. She wasn't obedient. She never had been — like Rose. He felt grossed out at the thought of Angie. He knew he'd have to take care of her if she woke up. It kind of made him happy... it would be a pleasant "chore", he thought to himself.

Whitset began to feel agitated again and poured himself another glass of whiskey, drinking it quickly. It was good. Booze really did help him. He felt better. He was calm. Whitset looked down at his pants. He had a huge hard-on. He thought about Rose again and smiled to himself as he checked his watch. It was a little past nine. He knew that pretty soon it would be lights out at the Pavilion. He had just enough time to finish his drink and go to the Pavilion to sample a few more of Rose's favors. Maybe he'd get off this time! And, afterward, maybe he'd go into Anthony's room and lord it over him. Tell him about the little game he and Rose played, about how she preferred him to the big, powerful Anthony. Lester smiled and clapped his hands in anticipation of his plans for the evening. He felt like such a naughty boy.

His phone rang. It shrilled endlessly in the still apartment. At first, Whitset was disoriented. He had only gotten one or two phone calls in the six months he had lived in New Orleans. They had been from long distance telephone services trying to sell him cheaper long-distance rates. He picked it up. It was Don Montgomery.

"Whitset, is that you?" Montgomery, demanded. "Say something to me, dammit!"

Whitset recovered swiftly. "Don, what's up? Where are you?"

"I'm in my car on the way home. Have you decided to hire the staff we talked about?" Don's voice was laced with static. The cell reception was terrible.

Whitset was annoyed. He hated cell phones. He said clearly, "No, I'm not hiring anyone. I told you my decision today. We don't need all that staff. It costs too much and it's stupid."

"Whitset," Don's voice was placating, "we have got to do something, or else Desmonde will go to the press. You heard her today. Just hire them temporarily. We can get rid of them when all this quiets down. Nobody will listen to her story in two weeks or a month. I think we should give her what she wants — at least for now." Don's voice ended in a whine.

Whitset, hardly sober, reviewed his options. "Don't worry, Don. I'll take care of Desmonde. I'll talk to her again."

"She's not going to back down. I know the woman. You have got to give her what she wants now. Do it, Whitset, it's worth it. I promise it will be a temporary fix."

Lester felt himself losing control. The voices were back, telling him to get the shrink bitch. He could barely talk coherently. "I said I would take care of it, Don. Don't worry. See you tomorrow." Whitset hung up the phone.

"Whitset, you sound funny. You sure you're okay?" Don repeated his question again before he realized the administrator had hung up. The CEO said out loud in his car, "You had better take care of it, you damned asshole! If you don't, I'm canceling your contract, and I'll make sure you never get another job anywhere." Don floored his gold Porsche and drove recklessly down Canal Street toward his house.

Whitset sat on the sofa. The voices had completely taken over his head. In his mind, he again saw Dr. Desmonde turn to plastic in front of him. He was going to have to do what the voices told him to do. The imposter shrink had to be stopped. After all, wasn't that his mission? He was supposed to get rid of all the imposters. They told him so. Whitset grabbed his tie and left his French Quarter apartment.

He wandered aimlessly for about an hour through the sultry New Orleans heat into the Vieux Carre, trying to decide what to do. He sat on a bench, holding his head, trying to argue with the voices. Nobody looked at him. After all, he was in the French Quarter of New Orleans with all kinds of people from all walks of life. He fit right into the crowd. He finally acquiesced to the voices and entered a phone booth to look for Monique's address. Phone booths were a bit of an anachronism in most cities, but New Orleans still had them. Phone booths were still around for the throngs of people who could not afford cell phones. He found no listing for Monique Desmonde.

He was furious. Why didn't the shrink bitch have an address? Maybe imposters didn't really live in houses. They seem to appear only now and then. Perhaps they were already dead. Whitset batted this idea around in his head for a few minutes. It certainly seemed plausible to him. Finally, an idea dawned in his drunken mind.

Whitset reached for his cell phone and called CCMC information. He identified himself, and the hospital operator bought his story and gave him Monique's phone number and address. He was in luck. She lived on Royal Street in the Quarter, only a few blocks away. He dialed the number and got a machine or voicemail. He was livid. He hated answering machines and voicemail. His calls were too important to be picked up by a piece of equipment. Machines represented more of the technology he hated. In frustration, he slammed his phone down.

The voices were loud again, screaming at him. Whitset entered a bar and ordered a double whiskey, which he downed in rapid time. He had a second drink. It was now almost 10:30 p.m. He walked over to the wall phone in the bar and dialed the psychiatrist's phone number. She answered on the first ring. He could see her cold, plastic face talking to him. Her lips were just as red as his teacher's had been, taut, thin, and inflexible. He would change that. Soon. She said hello three times before he hung up. He decided to have another drink or two for the road and the work ahead.

Monique was unnerved by the hang-up phone call. She pressed redial, but no one spoke or answered her repeated “hello”. There was just a dead, ominous silence. Whitset listened on the other end of the phone, relishing the increasing panic in the shrink bitch's voice.

Monique tried to convince herself that she was being paranoid. It could've been anybody — even a wrong number. In desperation, she dialed Jack's home phone and cell again. No answer. Then she paged his beeper, entering her number with the 911. She waited fifteen minutes for a return call, but her phone didn't ring.

Jack, Jack, where are you, she said to herself. I'm frightened half to death. I have to find you. I have the answers you need. Monique, her hands shaking, looked up the non-emergency phone number of the NOPD in the New Orleans phone directory. Finally, after an endless amount of time, she was connected with the watch officer. He chuckled when she asked for Commander François.

The watch officer said, "The commander sure is popular tonight, Dr. Desmonde, and you're the second person looking for him. He's out of New Orleans. He's investigating a crime over in Alabama. He's been gone and unreachable all afternoon."

Monique was panicked. "Has he called in?"

"Nope, not since six o'clock this evening. Said he would be unavailable until morning."

"Can you reach him? It's really urgent." Monique was working hard to keep the hysteria out of her voice.

"No, ma'am. If the commander could be reached, he would've left a number. If you need help, I'll send a blue and white over," the watch officer offered, trying hard to be helpful. He felt sorry for the poor lady. He knew something was very wrong.

"No, no. I'm all right. I'll call a friend," Monique managed to say, as she was fighting for control.

"Listen, Dr. Desmonde, if you're in any danger, just tell me. I'll send a car over. The commander said that if you called and needed anything, I was to give you everything you needed, plus more."

Monique smiled at the watch officer's remarks and said, "What I need is Jack François. I'll call a friend to come over. Thanks. If the commander does call, please tell him to call me stat."

"Yes, ma'am. I will. Take care now. Good night."

Monique laughed a little hysterically. "Yes, I will. Thank you."

After Monique hung up the phone, the watch officer radioed the mobile unit closest to Monique's house and asked them to drive by periodically. They assured him they would. It was a good move on the part of the watch officer, a very good move. Besides, he didn't want to piss off the commander. He'd done that once before and was, to this day, stinging from the rebuke. No one ever wanted to mess with Commander Jack François — not because he was a commander, but because he was Jack François.

Monique decided to call Alex and was relieved that she was coming over. Alex had a good analytical mind and would help her sort out what she needed to do. Finally, after an endless period of time, she heard a knock at her door. Alex was standing on her porch. Monique noticed the silver Mercedes with the lights on out front.

"Alex, thank goodness. I'm so glad to see you. Who's in the car?"

"It's Robert. He dropped me off. He was over for dinner and we—"

"Oh, I'm so sorry," Monique interrupted her. She looked at her friend. Alex looked lovely. Her eyes were as blue as the denim work shirt and jeans she had hastily donned for her late-night visit.

Her beautiful face was flushed, and her eyes were shining. Monique didn't think she had ever seen Alex look so ravishing. She continued, "I interrupted something, didn't I?" Her voice was apologetic.

"Monique, it's okay. I'll tell you about it later. What's up? You look scared, frightened to death. I've been trying to find you all evening. Where were you?"

"I was so angry after the executive committee meeting, that I decided to go to City Park and walk off my frustrations. Then, I went over to the Art Museum to see the Monet exhibit." Monique paused for a moment, capturing in her mind again the beauty and elegance of the French artist's late works at Giverny. "It was magnificent... and sad. Alex, you really must go."

"I will, I will. Then what happened?" Alex asked impatiently.

"I went to the Pavilion. It's a good thing I did. One of my patients had been raped, Rose, remember her?"

Alex's heart sank. Another attack and rape. When would it end? "Of course I know Rose. Is she okay? Who raped her?"

"Physically she's okay. She won't tell who did it. One of the psych techs found her lying in her bed whimpering. She wasn't in the day room for supper. That's when they went to search for her and found her sobbing. I tried to get her to tell me who did it, but she just looked at me and cried."

"Was it Jim or Anthony?"

"No, impossible. Both of them were locked in seclusion. I don't know who it was. Anyway, we sent her to the emergency department. She hadn't returned to the unit when I left..." Monique's voice trailed off.

Alex pondered her comments. "I can't imagine who did it. With Jim and Anthony locked up, our saga has a new twist. I guess we'll know later." Alex looked at her friend. She had become very quiet. She was sitting on the sofa, twisting her hands.

"Monique, what else happened? What else do you know? Tell me, for goodness sake!"

"This sounds crazy, Alex. Bear with me, but it's true. Whitset is not Whitset."

"Huh, what! What the hell are you talking about? For heaven's sake, Monique, spit it out. Make sense." Alex's voice was snappish. After all, her friend had just interrupted the first potential sex she'd had in years.

"Stop interrupting me, Alex. I'm doing my best." Monique paused for a moment, as if getting her facts straight. "This afternoon, when I searched Whitset's office, I noticed the diplomas on the wall were dated 1963 and 1965. Whitset doesn't look old enough to have graduated that long ago. So, I went to my office and looked in the personnel file at his resume. He lists his date of birth as being 1951. It's inconceivable that he could have graduated with a master's degree in 1965. Whitset is an imposter. I don't know who in the hell he is, but I'm convinced that he's parading around as a psychiatric administrator without the education."

Alex was quiet, taking all of this in. Finally, she said, "Who do you think he is, Monique?"

Monique shook her head. "I don't have a clue. I think he's probably a former psych patient who somehow got hold of the real Whitset's degrees and has been pretending to be him for years! Unbelievable, isn't it?"

Alex sighed deeply. "Yes, it is, but it does explain his outbursts this morning. He's definitely a crazy."

Monique glared at her. "Come on, Alex, cut me some slack. You know I hate that term. It's unfair to label people like that."

Alex waved Monique's objections away. "Okay, sorry. Anyway, we have an unbalanced, possibly very mentally ill man running our psychiatric service. Now, that's a real legal problem! Monique, did you find anything else in his office that could lead us to figure out who he really is?"

"Alex, I'm freezing to death. Do you mind if I open the French doors for a few minutes? Maybe we could go outside for a few minutes so I can warm up." Monique's teeth were chattering, more from fear than the air-conditioning.

"That'll warm you up. It's still in the high eighties out there. Hot and sultry. Nope, I don't mind. Let's do it."

Monique unlocked the deadbolt on her French door and walked out on the balcony.

Alex followed her. It did feel a little better. Alex was cold too.

"Do you mind if we sit out here for a few minutes? I promise I won't keep you out here long. As soon as we warm up, we'll go back in." Monique rubbed her arms, as if to rub away the uncertainty and chill bumps.

Alex smiled. "Of course not. These chairs look pretty comfortable." Alex seated herself. "Monique, this is really a lovely balcony." She admired the perfectly manicured flowering plants in hanging baskets. "You're quite a gardener."

"As are you. Yes, I love working out here. It's a great stress reliever. Where were we?"

Alex thought back for a second. "I had just asked if you had found anything else in Whitset's — or whoever he is — office?"

"No. Place was obsessively neat and clean. It was very dark in there. Drapes were completely drawn. There was nothing else significant."

Alex pressed for more. "Tell me everything you remember about the office, Monique. Was there any correspondence on his desk, books, anything like that?"

Monique thought hard. "He had some current psychiatric journals and textbooks lying around. The most significant things were his degrees. Of course, I could've missed something. Someone knocked on the door when I was in there. I thought I was going to have a heart attack! Scared me to death! My heart was racing!"

"What did you do?" Alex could imagine Monique's fright and it bothered her immensely that someone knew she was in there. "Who do you think it was?"

"It could've been the cleaning staff. Anyway, I crouched under his desk for a few minutes."

"Did you go through his desk drawers?"

Monique raised her eyebrows at Alex and laughed, "Of course, I did. I was playing super snoop. It was the usual stuff. Oh..." Monique's voice trailed off again.

Perceiving that Monique had remembered something, Alex urged her. "What, Monique, what else did you see?"

"It's probably nothing. His bottom right drawer was locked. There was a fine gold chain hanging out of it. It looked like a woman's gold chain. I saw it when I was searching through his office." Monique's voice was noncommittal as she told the story to Alex.

Alex's head had started thundering. She felt the hairs on her neck stand up. Her entire body went weak all over and she felt dizzy. She said to Monique in a strained voice, "Monique, are you warm enough to go in? I'm feeling really warm!"

The psychiatrist couldn't see Alex's face in the dark, but she distinguished the change in her voice. She knew something was wrong. She said, "Sure, I've warmed up. Let's go in and have some ice coffee."

Neither woman saw the crouched body of Lester Whitset hidden behind the latticework and a massive copper planter at the end of the balcony. He'd heard every word the women had said, and he was enraged. The voices were screaming in his head. Kill... Kill... Kill. Whitset was drenched with sweat. Would the voices ever stop?

Alex could barely breathe as she entered Monique's living room. She was weak and trembling all over. Monique looked at her strangely. "What is it, Alex? What is it?"

For once, Alex was too frightened to speak. She was speechless.

Monique instructed her in an authoritarian tone of voice. "Alex, take some deep breaths and calm down. You've got time. What you've got to say will keep until you get control of yourself." Monique sounded stronger than she felt. She was terrified at the look in Alex's eyes. After a minute or so, Alex was able to speak.

"It's Whitset. It's Whitset," she gasped, stopping to take a breath. "Monique, Whitset's the one that raped and beat Angie!" Alex gasped out the words, her heart racing and pounding in her chest.

Monique stayed calm. She faced Alex, standing by the French doors. "Whitset? How do you know, Alex? What makes you so sure?" Monique noted the fast pounding and beating of her own heart.

"Because... because... the chain, the gold chain you saw, goes to her cross, her religious medal. Bridgett brought it to me today in the office. I took it to a jeweler this afternoon to have the chain replaced." Alex was so weak from her discovery; she wasn't sure she could stand.

Monique felt the force of the earth coming down on her shoulders. She could hardly speak. She was so frightened. She was about to ask Alex whether she thought Whitset was involved with Mrs. Smithson's murder, when, to her horror, her French door opened, and Lester Whitset entered her living room carrying a long metal pipe.

Alex turned and froze in place. Monique looked like a marble statue. She was transfixed. All color had drained from her face.

Whitset stared at Monique. It happened again. She was so white. Once again, right in front of his eyes, she had turned to plastic. So, he had been right. The voices were screaming at him to kill the shrink. Lester watched in horrified fascination as Monique's face assumed a hard, shiny appearance. Her eyes turned into emerald green plastic ovals. Lester could hardly stand what he was seeing.

He stared at the psychiatrist and said in a cold, measured voice, "I'm going to kill you, you shrink bitch imposter. They are telling me to!"

Monique spoke to him through her pale plastic lips. Lester was startled because she could speak. He had never heard an imposter talk and it confused him. Once they turned, they lost their voice, but, he recognized her voice. Yes, he said to himself, it's her, it's still the shrink bitch. Even though she's plastic, she is the same bad person.

Whitset made no response to Monique's question. He continued to stare at her, a slow smile spreading across his face. He looked very pleased with himself. Finally, he turned toward Alex and said to her in a slow and sexy voice, "Alex, I'm so glad you're here." He shook his head a little, as if to clear it. "As soon as I take care of her, we can leave. I wasn't sure you would meet me."

Whitset raped her body with his gaze and returned to her face, his eyes boring into hers. Alex ventured a look at him out of the side of her eyes. His intent was clear. Whitset meant to rape her. A large amount of spittle had again gathered at the side of his mouth and had begun to run down his chin.

Alex stood mutely trying to decide the best thing to do. Whitset moved closer to her, reached out and gingerly touched her. She flinched at his touch.

Whitset became angry. He gawked at her, then squinting as if to see her better. Was she one of them too? No, she didn't appear to be. Her face stayed the same. He reached out and touched her cheek. It was warm and soft. She didn't move. Lester was satisfied. Alex was real. She wasn't an imposter like the bitch standing next to her.

Alex stood there, like a dead person, while Whitset began to run his hands over her body. He put his face next to hers and started to kiss her. She was overwhelmed by the smell of whiskey.

Suddenly, he pulled back in anger. He was furious. He screamed at her. "You whore! You slut! You've been with somebody else! Who is your lover? Who have you been with, whore?" Whitset was dancing around with rage, waving his lead pipe madly.

She tried to talk but couldn't. Only grunts came from her throat. She looked frantically at Monique.

Monique had been contemplating the best approach to use with Whitset. She decided to try a blunt one — one that would catch him off guard and give them an opportunity to defend themselves.

Monique addressed Whitset, her voice hard. "Whitset, what are you doing here? Don't you know the police are watching this place? They're probably looking for you by now."

Lester looked at Monique and laughed, the sound of a maniac — a loud, piercing, surreal laugh. "Shut up you bitch imposter! Just shut up!" He moved toward Monique and pushed her hard against the sofa. She fell backward on it. "I'll take care of you in a minute." He turned to Alex and said in a sad, soft voice, "How could you do this to me, Alex? How could you betray me? You know I want you. I love you. We've been special for a long time. How could you be with someone else?"

"Lester, I didn't." Alex finally found her voice and it was soft. "You look so tired. Why don't you just sit down for a few minutes, and I'll get you something cold to drink. Then, we'll talk."

Whitset smiled at Alex, the same slow, seductive smile that gave her chills. He said softly, "You're a bad girl, Alex. You're very naughty. Very, very, naughty. Lester's going to make you pay for being naughty."

Then Whitset began to sing to her, once again in that childlike voice that rhymed.

*"Alex is a bad, bad girl,
Bad as all girls in the world,
Lester's going to make her pay,
Lester's going to have his way, way, way, way..."*

The sound of his voice and the emphasis on the word "way" froze Alex's blood. She stood paralyzed with fear as he approached her.

Whitset's stride was broken, disjointed, as he moved toward Alex with an evil and threatening look on his face. He hurled himself toward her, the lead pipe raised in fury. He swung the pipe at her head, but Alex ducked, barely missing contact with the lead. She felt the cool rush of wind whistle by her ear. The stark realization of what was happening propelled Alex into action. She moved behind the chair, ducking another swing of the pipe.

Monique came to life and attacked the administrator from behind. She jumped on his back, her arms around his throat as she shoved her knee up into his groin. With a loud yell, Whitset threw her off, and she fell to the floor, striking her head on the edge of a marble table.

Whitset laughed at her as he clutched his groin. "Look at you, you plastic bitch. I see your plastic head did not split. As soon as you wake up, I'll really fix you. I'll split that plastic head!" Then, he began to laugh again — the high pitched, rumbling laugh of a maniac. The sound was the most evil cacophony that Alex had ever heard. She bent to the floor to help her friend.

Just then, the phone rang. It rang three times as Alex, who was sitting on the floor by Monique, and Whitset each looked at it. Finally, Monique's voicemail clicked on and Alex heard Commander Françoise's voice.

He was desperate. "Monique, where are you? Answer the phone!" There was a pause, and then Jack's voice continued, "Stay inside and lock your door! I have information on Whitset. He is parading around as his brother. I think he's Weston Whitset, the brother of Lester Whitset. If it's him, and I'm sure it is, he was locked up in the hospital for the criminally insane in Alabama for years after killing two women and possibly more. I've been here in Alabama all night gathering information. I've called the precinct and they'll be checking on you." Jack's voice stopped again. Finally, in a desperate voice he said, "I love you, Monique. I'll be there soon. Please stay safe."

Whitset went into a rage after hearing the message. He took his lead pipe and beat the phone repeatedly with it. He ripped the phone plug out of the wall. A low sound caught his attention. He whirled around in his mania and saw that Alex and Monique were talking softly. Monique was attempting to sit up. He gave another furious howl and swung the lead pipe at Monique's head, striking her fiercely on the right side. Monique immediately slumped and lost consciousness.

Alex cringed at the sound of the pipe breaking Monique's skull. She knew Whitset's blow had been a deadly one. She watched helplessly as Whitset cut Monique's face with a knife he had in his belt.

Alex stood up slowly, seething with hate and rage at her attacker. Her voice was filled with fury and wrath. "You crazy bastard, you've killed her!" Alex grabbed a porcelain lamp and hurled it toward Whitset. It missed him, but landed on the wrought-iron balcony, breaking into a thousand pieces.

Whitset laughed again, the high pitch sound of a maniac, as he sprang toward Alex, knocking her to the floor. He began ripping off her clothes and hitting her in the face.

She fought against him furiously. It was a losing battle. Whitset had the superhuman power of the criminally insane.

Officer Josh Martin came on duty at eleven p.m. He'd learned and reported that Ms. Destephano and Dr. Desmonde had called the precinct looking for the commander. The watch officer had described Dr. Desmonde's voice as desperate. The commander wanted the doc's house watched and Josh agreed to cover it for the shift. Josh knew the commander had special feelings for the psychiatrist, but he didn't know what they were and, really, it wasn't his business.

He smiled to himself as he drove into the Quarter. He'd spent a pleasant evening with Elizabeth Tippett. They had talked about the events at CCMC, superficially of course, and he knew that Elizabeth thought something was wrong with Whitset. Josh had experienced similar feelings earlier in the day as he watched Whitset interact with patients. Anthony, the big guy, had told him on the sly that Whitset was one of them — “one of the gang” was specifically how the wacko had put it. Josh hadn't given it much thought since and wasn't quite sure he understood what Anthony meant.

Josh, like most policemen, hated wackos. He'd only had a little experience with them, but he knew some of them were really dangerous, especially if they did drugs and drank booze. It just seemed to make them crazier, he thought.

Josh drove down Royal Street. It was the second time he had cruised by Dr. Desmonde's house. The front light was still on, but the French doors leading to the balcony were open. He stopped the police car just as he heard something breaking on the balcony. He immediately radioed for help, took out his 9mm and raced toward the house, taking the steps two at a time. There was no answer at the door, so the young officer scaled the balcony and entered the living room.

He saw the prostrate, bleeding form of Monique Desmonde on the floor and saw Whitset on top of another woman. Josh aimed his gun at Whitset's head and said, "Freeze!"

Nothing happened. Apparently, Whitset didn't hear him. Josh went over and kicked the administrator in the back. It was then that he saw Alex Destephano, her clothes all in disarray. Josh was appalled at what Whitset had done to her — or may have done to her. The extent of the attack was unclear, so Josh could not be sure.

Whitset looked up in surprise at the policeman. His pupils dilated with hatred. Then, in a flash, he jumped the police officer, knocking his gun from his hand as he ran out the French doors. Josh went after Whitset, but before he could catch him, Whitset leapt from the balcony and disappeared into the Quarter.

Alex was lying on the floor. Whitset had beaten her severely in the face. Handprints were visible on her face. Her lip was bloodied and there was a considerable amount of blood pouring from one eye. Josh bent over her and said quietly, "Ms. Destephano, can you hear me?"

Alex was dazed, unable to talk, but nodded and pointed toward Monique.

Josh felt for Monique's neck pulse. It was beating faintly. He felt sick as he looked at the long slash mark circling the psychiatrist's white, perfectly oval face. He grabbed his radio and called for an ambulance.

Then he turned his attention back to Alex. She seemed more coherent and asked, "Is Monique alive?"

Josh nodded his head. "I called for help. Alex, did he hurt you?"

She gave Josh a tight smile and said, "Josh, he cut Monique's face after she was unconscious. He cracked her skull. I heard it break when he hit her with the pipe. Oh, no..." Alex's voice began to break.

Josh tried to hug her to offer some comfort, but she pushed him back frantically. Then, she started sobbing. Finally, she said, "Josh, call Dr. Bonnet. Call the hospital and get them to connect you. Please. He has to come take care of Monique."

Josh left her for an instant and radioed the information to dispatch. He returned to tell her that Dr. Bonnet was on his way. He also retrieved a quilt from Monique's bedroom and covered the psychiatrist with it.

Alex was attempting to rearrange her clothes when she heard the police car sirens outside the apartment. Within seconds, the house was crawling with NOPD and an ambulance was outside.

Robert appeared a few minutes later. Alex waved him toward Monique. After a cursory examination of Monique, Robert ordered an immobilizing board. He called the hospital and talked directly with neurosurgery. He returned to Alex, took her hand, and said simply, "Monique's unconscious. She's in a coma. Her pupils are barely reactive. She'll need surgery. They're waiting for her at CCMC. It doesn't look good, Alex."

Alex was so traumatized, the right questions wouldn't come — that is, not the questions that she, as a nurse, would have ordinarily asked. She let Robert hold her while she sobbed quietly. Alex was still unable to speak.

Robert sensed this and didn't ask any questions.

Josh told Alex and Robert that they had made contact with Commander Françoise and that he would be there within minutes. He also reported there was a citywide manhunt for Whitset. The police were combing the Quarter looking for him. Josh was confident he would be apprehended soon.

Robert thanked him but waved away the questions Josh was trying to ask Alex. She looked up at him gratefully.

Alex continued to let Robert rock her in his arms. She felt so guilty... and dirty. She hadn't been able to help her friend — she shuddered when she thought about it and broke out into fresh sobs as the ambulance took Monique away.

Robert eased Alex onto the sofa at the same moment Commander Françoise entered the house. His face was strained and as dark as a thundercloud.

"Where's Monique?" he bellowed. "What the hell happened here?"

Robert shook his head sadly. "She's on her way to CCMC. Whitset attacked both Monique and Alex. Monique has a head injury. They'll do surgery as soon as she arrives."

Jack sat down, a broken man. He stroked Alex's face. "Are you all right, honey?"

Alex nodded, her eyes filling again with tears. "I'm sorry, Jack. I just couldn't do anything. He came at us like a maniac. He was so strong. I tried so hard, but I just couldn't stop it."

"It's okay, Alex. You did what you could. We'll find the little bastard, whoever he is, and he'll pay for what he's done. I need to talk to Officer Martin for a few minutes. I'll be back."

Josh and Jack retreated into the kitchen. Josh reported to Jack what he had found, describing in detail the slash to Monique's face and how he had discovered Whitset and Alex. He saw Françoise's face darken again and noted the curious light that came into his eyes. It was the famous Jack Françoise killer light that he had heard older officers describe. He was sure that it was only a matter of hours that Whitset had left on this earth.

"Martin," Françoise asked in a quiet, but demanding voice. "Did Whitset rape Alex?"

Josh looked at the floor and back up into the commander's face. He replied, "I don't know, sir. Her clothes were torn. I just can't say for sure. It certainly looked like it could've happened."

"Did you ask her?"

"I asked her if Whitset had hurt her and she turned the conversation toward Dr. Desmonde. She wouldn't answer me, Commander. I tried to ask her — twice." Josh looked despondent.

Françoise nodded his head, as he felt the anger spread throughout his body. "Robert, come in here for a moment," he barked from the kitchen.

Robert appeared immediately. The men talked in low tones for a few moments.

Finally, Commander Françoise said to Robert, "You've got to find out if Whitset raped Alex. If he did, she needs to go to the emergency room."

"But, Jack," Robert began. "She's been beaten and terrorized. Can't we give her some time?"

"No. No. Hell no. We need the evidence against him. Do you want me to ask her to go with you?" Commander Françoise's voice was firm, and he gave Bonnet a hard look.

Robert wanted to accept Jack's assistance, but he knew he couldn't. He shook his head negatively and said, "I'll do it, Jack. You may want to go to CCMC and check on Monique. I'm worried about her."

"I will. I'm going now. Then I am going to find and kill Lester Whitset." Commander Françoise was reasonably calm.

Robert and Josh both knew that beneath the calm façade was a roaring lion, out for blood — blood to avenge Monique and Alex.

"Jack, Jack, come here. I've got to talk to you for a minute." Alex was calling for Jack from the living room.

Jack went to Alex and sat by her on the sofa. "What is it, Al?" he asked gently.

"You have got to search Whitset's office. Monique went in there today, and she found a gold chain hanging out of his bottom right desk drawer. I'm sure it's Angie's chain. Bridget brought me her cross today and I had it repaired." Alex's voice trailed off, remembering the teary scene in her office. Then she continued, "Monique also discovered that the college degrees in Whitset's office couldn't be his."

The commander nodded his head. "Yeah, I know they aren't. He's a fake, an imposter. I think he's Weston Whitset, Lester's crazy brother. I've got to go. Anything else, Alex?" Jack looked at her sharply.

Alex shook her head. "Not that I can think of. I know there's more, but I can't think of anything now. I'm just so tired..." Alex looked away, uncomfortable at the commander's direct gaze.

"Alex." Jack's voice was gentle. "Did Whitset rape you?"

Alex didn't answer. She looked at the commander and began to cry again.

"You must tell me, Alex. It's important. If he did, we'll need the evidence to convict him. You'll need to go to the hospital and be checked. "

Alex pulled her hand away from Jack's. She got up and left the room.

Robert and Josh looked at her disheveled, torn clothes. Then they looked at each other.

Jack's face was suffused with anger and he shrugged his shoulders as he said to Robert, "You've got to find out for sure, Robert. Need the evidence. Need it bad!" The commander's voice was rough and emotional.

"The hell with that evidence, Jack. I need to get her to CCMC to get her face treated. Besides, you're probably gonna kill him anyway." Robert was angry.

"No, take her over to Community Memorial in Gulfport. Alex doesn't need the ignominy and stress of being treated for rape in her own hospital. Check her in under an alias. I'll call and make the arrangements. Take her now, dammit, I mean it." Jack saw Robert hesitate and said roughly, "NOW, I mean it. And, check on Monique. Make sure she gets the best CCMC has. Do you understand?" Jack was glaring at his boyhood friend, his temper hanging by a thread.

Robert nodded. "Yeah. I'll do my best, Jack. Now, get out of here." His voice and his eyes were tired.

Jack whispered to Josh on the way out, "Get Nadine Wells over here to see Alex. Let her decide about the rape. And, get Alex's statement when Nadine is with her. Move dammit, move now!"

Josh disappeared from the room to call Nadine.

Robert intervened, "Please, Jack, you have got to calm down. I know you are stressed, we all are, but there's no place for temper in this—"

Commander Françoise pivoted around and stared at the physician. "Dammit, Bonnet. This lunatic practically killed Monique and probably raped Alex. He raped and beat Angie Richelieu. He probably killed Mrs. Smithson as well. Don't talk to me about my temper. My temper's the only thing giving me the energy to move right now. Understand? If my temper wasn't acting up, I'd be dysfunctional with grief." Françoise stared at Robert, his eyes full of tears.

Robert walked over to him and hugged the big, burly policeman. The two men stayed in an embrace for several moments, each crying silently for what they had lost.

Françoise broke the embrace. "The next time you see me, Robert, Whitset will be dead. To hell with court justice."

Robert nodded, powerless to stop him.

"Take care of my girls, Bonnet. I'm trusting both of them to you." Françoise slammed Monique's French door so hard that the glass shattered and fell out.

Alex reemerged from the bathroom.

"Al, you've got to tell me about Whitset and what he did. Jack said we've got to get the evidence soon — you know that." Robert's voice was gentle, and he moved over on the sofa so she could sit next to him.

"I'm not going to any emergency facility. Not CCMC, not in New Orleans, and not in Mississippi. I refuse to submit to any examination." Her voice was adamant, stubborn.

He asked gently, "Why, Alex? It was a situation you couldn't control. You're not guilty of anything."

Her voice was morose, her eyes filled with tears, "I'm just not going, Robert, I'm not. Now leave me alone about it, please." She laid her head down in his lap and pretended to fall asleep. She needed to be alone with her thoughts to try to put together exactly what had happened. She needed to think through what she should've done. She was feeling so guilty — about a lot of things. She should've saved Monique. Finally, she fell asleep on Monique's sofa.

A half an hour later, Josh opened the door for Nadine Wells. They talked quietly in the kitchen for a few minutes and Josh motioned for Robert to join them.

Robert seemed uncertain about Nadine. When he learned she was NOPD's expert on sexual crimes and a registered nurse, he retreated into himself.

Nadine perceived the change in Robert's behavior and assured him she wouldn't badger Alex. She mentioned they had met shortly after the rape of Angie Richelieu.

Robert seemed surer of the petite Nadine's concern for Alex and went to awaken her.

Nadine held up her hand, motioning for Robert to wait a moment. She asked him, "Dr. Bonnet, what is your relationship to Ms. Destephano?"

He flushed a little bit at the question. It would have been easy to answer before last night. He didn't know what to say and stammered his reply, "Well... well, to be honest, Ms. Wells, Alex and I were married when we were students and lived in Virginia. We divorced about four years ago. Alex moved to Texas and I moved to New Orleans. I'm from here..." Robert's voice trailed off, unsure of exactly what it was the woman wanted to know.

She continued to look at him, their eyes locked. "And now, Dr. Bonnet, what is your current relationship with Alex?"

Robert was uncomfortable. Her directness was bothering him, and he didn't like it. He felt guilty and defensive for some reason. He remained silent.

Nadine turned to Josh. "Josh, could you leave Dr. Bonnet and me alone for a few minutes?" Josh nodded and hastily left the kitchen. Nadine continued to look at Robert, whose defensiveness was turning to anger. His lean, handsome face was red. She repeated her question, her voice adamant. "Dr. Bonnet, it's important that you answer my question for your sake and for ours."

"Why, why in the hell do I have to answer your question? I haven't done anything illegal or wrong." He was stubbornly defensive.

"I must know if you and Alex are sexually intimate. If you are, and have been recently, it could complicate any evidence we gather tonight. That's the reason for the question. Otherwise, I agree. It's none of my business."

Nadine saw Robert's shoulder sag. "Ms. Wells, I love Alex. I'd like to marry her again. We're presently good friends and have been since earlier this year. I assure you there's no evidence from a sexual encounter with me that would complicate a police rape investigation. I promise you."

"Then why are you so uncomfortable?" Nadine looked at him shrewdly, still persistent.

Robert was amazed at the woman's perceptiveness. "Tonight, at least earlier tonight, Alex and I had dinner at her house." He smiled at the memory. "I believe we could have complicated the evidence if Dr. Desmonde hadn't called Alex at eleven o'clock. Actually, Alex and I were... well, the phone rang, so nothing happened." He looked sheepish, even a little embarrassed.

Nadine smiled at him and touched his shoulder. "I'm sorry she called and spoiled it for you. Trust me, there will be other times. Thanks for being honest with me, Dr. Bonnet. Can I count on your support — emotional and physical — to get Alex through this?"

"Yes, absolutely. What do you want me to do?"

"Help me help her remember what happened. I believe, based on what Commander Françoise and Officer Martin said, it's possible Alex doesn't remember what happened. She may not know if she was raped or not."

Robert was flabbergasted. "You're kidding. I'd never have thought that."

"It's a protective reflex that many women have after a rape. It's a dissociation mechanism that's commonly associated with sexual crime and abuse. It sounds as though her clothes, while torn, were basically intact, so I'm hopeful that she wasn't raped. Let me rephrase that, I am hopeful she wasn't actually penetrated. She was most assuredly raped in the greater sense of the word, and Alex will view it that way. It's critical for her recovery and continued mental health that she knows for sure so she can learn to deal with it. Do you understand what I'm saying, Dr. Bonnet?"

Robert nodded mutely and followed her into the living room where Alex remained on the sofa. Damn! It was a lot easier being a surgeon than a shrink or mental health worker. Being a surgeon was quick and simple, and you got results right away — not so much with mental health stuff.

Nadine shook Alex gently.

She opened her eyes slowly. They were liquid blue in color, the color of bachelor's buttons in the summer. She struggled to sit up.

Robert noticed that her right shoulder was drooping. A fractured clavicle, he surmised — the same arm that had been injured in February.

Nadine spoke softly. "Alex, Jack asked me to come over and talk with you. Josh and I need a statement about what happened here tonight. Are you up to talking?"

Alex nodded, looking to Robert.

Clasping her hand tightly, Robert assured her he would stay with her.

Nadine was pleased that Bonnet was so cooperative. So many men were either useless or macho machines in times like this. He would be a good support for Alex, if she'd let him. For some reason, Nadine's intuition told her she wouldn't.

Josh began, "Ms. Destephano, do you mind if I tape your interview? The commander asked me to get your permission. If you would rather I didn't, I won't."

Alex smiled at Josh. "You can, Josh. It's okay. Call me Alex."

"Thanks, Alex." Josh cut the recorder on, giving the date, time, describing the crime scene, and naming the people present at the taped interview.

"Tell me what happened tonight, Alex. You can go as slowly as you like. I've got three tapes with me. We've got plenty of tape and plenty of time." He handed Alex the microphone.

In a clear voice, Alex talked into the machine. She began with the phone call from Monique and ended with the entrance of Josh Martin. She cried when she related how Whitset had beaten Monique with the lead pipe and how he had cut her face after she was unconscious. She made no mention of rape but recounted in great detail how Whitset had sung his sick little rhyme to her and how he had torn her clothes. Her hand was gripped tightly by Robert throughout the interview, which took about twenty minutes.

Nadine and Josh nodded their heads as she spoke, asking questions to clarify and expand her statement.

Josh seemed satisfied and looked at Nadine for direction.

Nadine picked up on his cue and said to Alex, "You described how Whitset pushed you to the floor and ripped your clothes. You didn't tell us what he did to you."

Alex looked confused. "What do you mean I didn't tell you? I told you everything that Whitset did!" Her voice was angry, defensive.

Nadine persisted, "You've got bruises on your face, a black eye, and an injured shoulder. Did Whitset hit you when he had you on the floor?"

Alex looked thoughtful. "Why yes, I suppose he did. Who else could have possibly hit me?" The tone of Alex's voice implied she thought Nadine's question was ridiculous and stupid. Her tone was condescending, very much unlike Alex's normal voice.

"Did Whitset do anything else to you that you haven't mentioned?" Nadine continued to look thoughtfully at Alex, who shook her head negatively.

There was a silence for a few minutes while Nadine and Josh reviewed their notes.

Robert continued to stroke Alex's hand. He smiled at her gently and said, "It's almost over, Al. Soon we'll go."

She smiled back. She was so tired. All she wanted to do was take a shower and sleep.

Nadine looked up from her notes and said, "I have another question for you, Alex. Listen carefully and answer me as best you can. It's important."

"Okay, Nadine. But, hurry up. I'm tired, and I want to get cleaned up so I can go to CCMC to check on Monique."

Nadine could tell that Alex was getting impatient. Nadine's dark eyes searched Alex's deep blue ones as she asked the question in a matter of fact manner, "Did Lester Whitset rape you?"

Alex was flustered, her voice angry. "Nadine, I told you everything that happened that I can think of. Don't you understand that I'm tired and I want to go home? I've been awake for over twenty-four hours."

Nadine continued to look steadily at her. She asked again, "Did Lester Whitset rape you, Alex? Did he penetrate you?"

Alex jumped angrily off the sofa, her injured shoulder drooping. She shrieked at them, her voice loud and quavering, "I told you everything I know. I want to get out of here, now." She looked around frantically for some means of escape. Her eyes rested on Robert, and she said to him, in a small and broken voice, "Robert, please make them leave me alone. I said everything I can remember. I want to go home. I want you to take me, please!"

He felt his heart constrict as he looked at her, her eyes liquid pools of grief. He felt his reserve melting. She looked so dejected, so sad. He glanced over at Nadine Wells, who gave him a dark look that clearly told him to keep his mouth shut.

He looked back at Alex and said gently, "You've gotta answer Nadine's question. It's important to know whether Whitset actually raped you. If he did, we need to get you to the emergency department for an examination."

Alex became hysterical. "No... no... no... I'm not going anywhere. Don't you hear me! I'm not going anywhere! I've told you what I know, and I am leaving! Don't any of you try to stop me!"

Nadine stood in her way. Her voice was crisp, chilly. "Calm down, Alex. Shut up and stop all the noise, now! None of us wants to hear it. Just answer the question."

Robert was becoming more and more uncomfortable with the line of questioning. He thought Alex was being harassed. He was about to interrupt and protect her when Josh Martin placed his hand on his shoulder in restraint and shook his head.

Nadine asked again, her voice clear, "Did Lester Whitset rape you, Alex?"

She dissolved into tears. She was sobbing so hard her shoulders were shaking. She was hyperventilating.

Robert held her in his arms, reassuring her that it made no difference to him. He told her over and over that he loved her.

Finally, Alex calmed down a little and said in a small, still voice that was almost a whisper, "I don't know. I just don't know. I can't remember!"

Nadine leaned over and put her arms around Alex. "It's all right if you don't know, Alex. A lot of women don't know. They can't remember. They repress the terror of what happened to them." Nadine continued to offer her reassurance for several more minutes until Alex calmed down.

Alex clung to Robert's hand and turned to face the police officers. "You mean there are other women who don't know if they have actually been raped or not?"

Nadine smiled and responded, "Yep, Alex. That's right. You are certainly not alone in this. What's important now is that we get you examined so that we can tell—"

Alex shrank from the thought of a rape examination. It was so humiliating and embarrassing. She remembered having to do them when she worked in the emergency department. "No, no, I won't go."

Nadine looked at her firmly and said, "You've got to go, Alex. If you don't, you will never know if you were physically raped and the uncertainty will haunt you forever. You'll never recover emotionally from the experience." Nadine turned and prevailed upon Alex's relationship with Robert. "You've gotta go get checked out now so you and Robert can work through this together."

Robert was nodding his head, aware of the implications that could result if Alex never knew whether she was forcibly raped by Whitset. "Nadine's right, Alex. We need to do all we can so we can work through this. I'll take you to Memorial Hospital in Gulfport."

"Jack has made the arrangements, Alex. We'll check you in under an assumed name. No one will know you have been there. It'll be confidential. I'll go as well if you like." Nadine squeezed her hand.

Alex looked from Robert to Nadine. She said to Robert, "Would you mind if only Nadine went with me? I'd rather you go check on Monique. Besides, someone will recognize you there."

Robert was surprised and a little hurt. "Of course, Al, whatever you want. I am anxious about Monique. I'll see you back at your house around lunch time — okay?" He raised his eyebrows questioningly at Nadine Wells.

"Yes, that will be enough time. She can even get a few hours' sleep. We'll call your cell when all is done." Nadine thought how lucky Alex was to have a man like Bonnet on her side.

It was after five o'clock in the morning when Nadine and Alex left Monique's apartment on Royal Street. Alex was about to ask Nadine if she could go home to take a shower and change clothes when she remembered that she couldn't. It would destroy any evidence they had against Whitset. It made her crazy that she didn't know whether she was raped or not. What kind of an idiot was she?

There was little conversation between the women as they drove out I-10 toward the Mississippi Gulf Coast. Alex slept most of the way, exhausted beyond belief. When they pulled up in front of Community Memorial Hospital, Alex said very simply to Nadine, "You know, Nadine, no matter what they find, I have been raped." Her voice was teary. She sounded so fatigued and depressed.

"Yes, Alex. You have been raped. You are absolutely right and how well I know."

Alex looked at Nadine curiously, as they entered the emergency room door.

Weston Whitset was frantic. He was hiding, partly occluded in a doorway setback in the Quarter, a wine bottle in his hand, looking like most of the drunks at that time of the morning. He'd been running forever. He still couldn't believe that the police officer had barged into that shrink bitch's apartment and he hadn't heard him! Damn the voices! If they hadn't been talking so loudly, he wouldn't have been taken by surprise. He cursed the voices out loud. Several people walking by looked at him curiously, but he didn't care because he figured they were as drunk as he was.

Weston continued to think. It had just been getting good with Alex. He had been watching her for several months and gaining control over her had become his life's work. Sex with her was a necessity; "a driving obsession" is what that shrink of his in Alabama would have said. Weston knew she had wanted him too. He'd seen it in her eyes several times in the last couple of days. Of course, she had tried to hide it from the others. He had picked up on that. But, he knew she wanted him. Weston couldn't believe she had been playing hard to get over there at Monique's. She was acting like a tease. He hated prick-teasers! What a slut! Well, that had been part of her game. But he had showed her, hadn't he? Just like the nurse pig. He smiled at the memory.

Weston stayed in the doorway, drinking his wine. The voices were quiet now, allowing him to think without interruption. Well, at least he had killed the imposter shrink bitch. There was comfort in that. He had heard her skull crack! It was a beautiful sound — better than any symphony Weston had ever heard. It had been wonderful! He had almost gotten off on the sound itself. Weston smiled as he remembered the terrorized look on her plastic face. The powerful, plastic shrink bitch. Her plastic, fake head had cracked under his trusty pipe. He loved it. Weston jerked his head up when he realized he was drooling again. The liquid had run down onto his shirt.

Far in the distance, he heard police sirens. He guessed he had better keep moving. He felt panicked again. Where should he go? Where could he go? The voices were screaming at him, just screaming. He tore at his face and his hair, trying desperately to quiet them down. Then, he started walking. He stayed close to groups of tourists in the Quarter, attempting to blend in.

His wine bottle was empty, and he needed a drink. He decided to duck into one of the bars, and he knew just the bar he was going to! It was on the other side of Dauphine Street. They would never look for him there! It was a male Vampire Bar and he'd been before. He just loved the place. So many people like himself. He checked his watch. It was almost two a.m. One thing about New Orleans, you could drink twenty-four hours a day, and the male Vampire Bar never closed until dawn. He was good for five or more hours. He'd figure things out by then... how to make his next move.

Weston sat in the dark pub for several hours, drinking double bourbons. He enjoyed watching the men flirt with each other and pretend to feed on each other's blood. And the costumes, wow, so Goth, devilish, fancy, and expensive. Some of the guys were pretty funny, others... well... he wasn't sure about them. There was a rumor that the Sire visited this vampire club. Weston didn't really know what the Sire was, but he had been told that if the Sire chose you, well, you were set for life. He didn't really know.

The men were interesting in the way they communicated. The place was a regular tea room, lots of action. Men just came and went. All kinds of men, pretty men, studs, bodybuilders, executive types, Voodoos, Occults, and, his favorite, daddies with little kids at home. He loved these best. They were so perverse that he was envious of their skills. What double lives they led! They made it with their wives, were appropriate with family members and work, had kids, coached the Little League, and then they came out at night and acted out their perversions. It was disgusting, but Weston loved disgusting and perverted. He shook his head. The more he thought about it, the more it calmed him. It was a little wicked, and Wes loved wicked.

He continued to watch the men. It was fascinating! It was entertaining to watch the men seduce each other. First, there was the eye contact, then the emotional seduction, then the preliminaries, then the fake blood sucking — at least, he thought it was fake — and then the trip to the restroom, or outside. Then, finally, came the release, Weston supposed. He guessed the alley behind the bar had seen some action. He smiled to himself. Maybe he should consider “crossing the line.” Maybe he had been missing some good stuff all these years.

Weston especially liked guessing who would emerge the most powerful of the dyad. Who was who? Who was in control? Who became obedient? Wow, the more he thought about it, the more excited he felt. He continued to watch the men flirt and preen for each other. Hell, maybe he should start playing the vampire part. He'd been “into” it in his youth but had gotten bored and left it alone for years. It looked to him like the vampire craft had grown a lot since the early years. Very interesting, he thought to himself.

Studying these men really calmed him down and shut up the voices. He noted that he was usually right — you could tell at the takeover who was the most powerful! Weston only wished he could have seen some of the kills. He could only fantasize. Weston had never been one for homosexual sex, but... maybe he ought to consider it sometime. After all, variety was the spice of life. He smiled to himself.

It was after five a.m. Weston was the last customer left at the bar, and the bartender offered him a blowjob. Weston declined. The bartender, enraged at the refusal, told him to get the hell out. Weston complied.

The voices were remaining quiet, and now he could decide what to do. He had to make some plans. It would be daylight soon. Where was he going to hide? What was he going to do? Then, the next steps came to him. He knew exactly where he was going! He would be safe there for at least three or four days.

He would be safe until this stuff died down.

Jack Françoise was beat, angry, discouraged, and in so much emotional pain he could barely think. He knew he was in the worst possible situation a police officer could be. He recognized he was vulnerable and knew he should turn the case over to someone who was not emotionally involved. Of course, no one really knew that he and Monique were lovers, no one but Robert and Alex. It had been a secret. Dinner at Palace Café seemed like a lifetime ago now. Would he and Monique ever make love again? Would they ever speak again? The possibility that they wouldn't terrified Jack and took him to an emotional place he had never been before, a place he hated.

He could feel the hot tears pouring down his cheeks. He couldn't begin to describe the pain he felt when he looked down at Monique in the intensive care unit at CCMC. Her beautiful face was pallid, her bright eyes closed. The angry, red streak around her face made by Whitset's knife was clearly visible under the fluorescent lights in intensive care. The sight made Jack want to kill the man even more.

One tube came out of her nose and was hooked to wall suction to keep her stomach emptied. The second tube was hooked to the machine that was helping her breathe. Every now and then Monique coughed, as if she was trying to cough the tube out of her mouth and nose. The nurses said that was good. When she coughed, her eyes opened up wide and they stared straight ahead. Her eyes looked terrified. Jack asked the nurse if she was blind. She assured him she wasn't, but Jack wasn't convinced.

Every time the ventilator alarm went off, it scared Jack to death. He was afraid she had stopped breathing. The nurse explained that Monique was fighting the ventilator. She also said that Monique could probably breathe on her own, but the neurosurgeon had wanted her intubated for the surgery and the first few days afterward, just in case. So, the nurses sedated Monique to keep her calm and from fighting the tubes.

Jack hadn't been able to stay in the intensive care unit long. He felt helpless, useless even. He didn't understand what was happening and he didn't like the feeling. He gratefully accepted a cup of coffee from Monique's nurse and sat down in the doctors' lounge to think — and plan his revenge.

A quick call to headquarters confirmed what the commander expected; the citywide manhunt for Whitset was so far unsuccessful. Where in the hell was that little pervert? What do the insane crazies do when they're scared? Where do the wackos go? Jack pondered these questions as he finished his coffee and left Crescent City Medical Center to begin his own personal manhunt for the bastard who had destroyed the love of his life and raped his best friend.

Weston knew the police were still searching for him. He ducked in and out of the darkened alleyways in the French Quarter. He crossed Canal Street and walked several blocks toward the lovely residential section that surrounded Crescent City Medical Center. He entered the hospital through the radiology department located in the oldest part of the main building. It was dark and desolate. No one was around to see him and Weston smiled at his luck. He rounded the hall, walked toward the service elevators, and pressed the button that would take him to the sub-basement.

As the old, very tarnished elevator groaned and creaked toward him, Weston was pleased with the cleverness of his plan. He told the voices how stupid they were and admonished them for bothering him earlier. After all, he was Weston Whitset, almighty and all-powerful. He needed nothing from the voices that had assumed the identity of his dead brother, Lester, so many years ago. It had been such a clever scheme, and it had worked so well.

For years, Weston had masqueraded as his brother and held positions in psychiatric administration that permitted him to continue feeding his needs without fear. It had been a marvelous game. Weston smiled as he remembered the fun he had at other wackos' expense. God, it had been good. All that sex, all the fun, always emerging on top, being in charge of an army of crazies. Weston exited the elevator with a dreamy smile on his face as he remembered his escapades. Everything had been just perfect until that damned plastic shrink bitch had begun to get in his way.

Where had all these plastic people come from? He hadn't seen one for years. Now, he wasn't certain how many there were. But, of course, Dr. Desmond had been one. He had killed her. Weston became sexually aroused again as he thought about cracking her skull.

And, that damned nurse. She was a pig, but such a temptress. He had wanted her badly. He had to have her, and he had. It had been simple. It had been ecstasy. A night to remember.

He would go back for more when things quieted down, he decided. He'd enjoyed her terror so much that he savored it. That's why he didn't kill her. He wanted it again, the high he got from her fear, from her terror. Angie, the temptress. Angie, the pig. He'd get it, soon, and when he went for her again, she'll be so frightened that the experience would be the best he'd ever had. Maybe he would get her while she was still on the hospital ward. What a lark! What fun! That would be a real coup. Of course, this time he would have to kill her. Weston smiled broadly at his ingenious plan. He wondered if she had woken up yet.

He continued his fantasy as he walked through the darkened tunnel of the medical center. Huge steam pipes hissed at him as he walked by them. The sound was comforting. The steam cleared his mind. Every now and then, he waved and joyfully greeted a large rat or an enormous New Orleans cockroach. They were his friends. Several rats were albinos and had pink, inquiring eyes. They neither bothered him nor required anything from him. Hapless creatures. Helpless, like he made his victims. He loved hapless and helpless.

Weston wished he had a light as he entered the stretch of tunnel between the Pavilion and the main hospital. It was pitch black. There was only a single light bulb about every fifty feet. The engineering people never entered this part of the tunnel. The heating and maintenance facilities for the Pavilion were located directly under the building itself. Weston cursed a little as he wiped the cobwebs from his face. He hated spiders. They reminded him of women who were both as hateful and as dishonest as woven webs of intrigue around full-blooded men. Such a useless exercise, he thought to himself. No wonder they had to be put in their place. Women — disgusting pigs.

Finally, he reached the seldom-used elevator under the Pavilion. He smiled and congratulated himself on the ingenuity of his scheme. They would never find him, not right here in the Pavilion. The tunnel and the elevator were Weston's secret. He had used them many times to enter and leave the hospital covertly, most recently when he had "used" the nurse. He had even left the outside door to the stairwell open to confuse people. He smiled at his cleverness. He felt himself aroused again at the memory of his night with the pig nurse, Angie.

The elevator opened into an old supply room, which was now part of one of the seclusion rooms. A thin wall and heavy metal door separated the supply room from the small seclusion cell. Of course, Weston had a key to the door. He was sure no one else did. He doubted if anyone even remembered the door was there — except for the patients in seclusion, and no one listened to them.

Weston remembered late last March when he had entered the hospital through the tunnel and the elevator. He had been surprised to find the seclusion room occupied by a young, beautiful woman who had just been admitted for severe depression. Of course, she had been suicidal and hostile, which is why the shrinks had secluded her. He would never forget the look of fear in her eyes when he entered her room through the metal door. It had been an unexpected surprise for him, too. A very pleasant surprise indeed, as it turned out. She had screamed, but the seclusion rooms were soundproof. How handy. How fortunate! And his timing had been just right. He had entered a few minutes past midnight and knew he had a full two hours for fun before the next rounds by the hospital staff.

It had been two great sex-filled and sex-crazed hours. The girl had a beautiful body and Weston had used it fully for his convenience. He couldn't remember how many times he had gotten off, but it had been good. Ah, life was good, he thought to himself as he remembered his fortune. After the initial sex act, which never involved penetration, the woman had been submissive and even begged him to kill her. He had accommodated her by helping her slit her wrists. He hadn't wanted to and would've liked to have visited her again but was afraid the shrinks might believe her story. She just hadn't been insane enough. Besides, the best sex of all had been giving it to her while she bled to death. That had also been the best part with the old lady, but she had been an imposter, so it really didn't count as much. She had been a plastic old lady bitch, and she deserved that knitting needle just where he placed it.

Ah, the power of it all, the supreme triumph. Orgasm for one at another's moment of death. Ultimate power, ultimate control. Didn't the shrinks call that something? Necrophilia or something? He liked the word. It had a pleasant ring to it. Several other times he'd enjoyed the "fruits" of the room but had never derived the same satisfaction he had the first time. The first adventure was always the best for him. It was a great setup. Crescent City Medical offered him everything he needed, even a huge bonus at the end of the year for the cost savings he had instituted. His bonus would be even more now that the plastic shrink was dead.

A sudden thought alarmed him. He broke out into a sweat. Suppose the room was occupied tonight? What would he do? Then he relaxed. It would only be a woman in the room. No problem. The seclusion room was on the women's side of the Pavilion I. It was available only for female seclusion. No sweat after all. Cool. Maybe someone would be waiting for him tonight. Maybe even Rose. Weston breathed a sigh of relief. He was tired, and the voices and all the alcohol had finally hit him. He was super human, but everyone had a limit. He walked off the elevator and inserted his key into the lock of the heavy metal door.

As the door creaked open and a shaft of light appeared from the overhead light, Weston felt fear for the first time in his life.

Facing him in the room was the drug crazed, raging face of Anthony Gavette.

Weston was frozen in place.

Anthony stared at him and said quietly, "I've been waiting for you, you slimy bastard. You took my Rose!" Then Anthony lunged at Whitset, knocking him to the floor.

The rape treatment at Gulfport Memorial had been just as awful as Alex had expected. It was the most humiliating experience she had ever endured. She'd always heard rape exams were demeaning during her professional life, but now she'd experienced it. Nadine's quiet presence had been comforting.

She breathed a sigh of relief when she was discharged. The ride back to New Orleans was quiet, both women deep in thought. Finally, Alex asked, "When will I know? When will they tell me if I've been raped?"

"The physician told me he would run the labs himself. He said he would get back to me this afternoon." Nadine glanced over at Alex, aware that she was depressed.

"That long? Why so long?" Alex's voice sounded pitiful.

"They do a lot of testing, Alex. You know that. Try to get some sleep now." Nadine's voice was chiding. She was getting pretty tired, too.

"I just want a shower and something to eat. Then, I want to go to CCMC and check on Monique. I'm really worried about her." Alex's voice faltered as her eyes filled with tears for her friend.

Nadine nodded. "Yes, I talked with Robert. He's also very concerned. Monique's still in surgery. They're doing a craniotomy. She has a depressed skull fracture."

"Did she regain consciousness before the surgery?" Alex was afraid to hear the response.

"No, she didn't. She was completely unresponsive. Robert's also observing the surgery. Said he was hopeful that once they relieve the pressure in her head, she might regain consciousness, maybe even come back full force." Nadine reached for Alex's hand and pressed it. "You know how these things go, Alex. It could be either way." Her voice was sympathetic. The look she gave Alex was understanding.

Alex flinched as she remembered the sound of Whitset's lead pipe splitting Monique's skull. She would never forget the sound it had made, not as long as she lived. She shuddered to herself and cried silent tears for her friend.

"It's so unfair, Nadine. Monique and Jack had just found each other. They're in love. Did you know that?"

Nadine jerked her head and stared at Alex. Her eyes were closed, her head laid back against the seat. Hell no, she didn't know that. She said softly, "No, Alex, I didn't know that. Thanks for telling me."

Alex made no response until Nadine woke her in front of her house. Nadine made them both a sandwich while Alex showered and dressed. It was afternoon. They ate quickly, then they left for CCMC. Alex knew she wouldn't be able to sleep, so she decided to check in on Monique and head for the office.

Don Montgomery was pacing furiously back and forth in his office. Elizabeth Tippet and Josh Martin were sitting at a small conference table. In front of them was the Times Picayune. It was the second day the story had made front page. The lead story on the front page outlined the tragic attack on Angie Richelieu and the death of Mrs. Smithson.

Elizabeth finally spoke. "Don, for heaven sakes, sit down. Your pacing is driving me nuts. Stop it!"

Montgomery turned on her. "Tippet, what the hell is going on here? Tell me again! Are you sure Whitset is responsible for the attacks on Alex and Monique Desmonde?"

Elizabeth sighed and turned to Josh Martin and back to Don. "Yes, absolutely. Officer Martin was there! What other proof do you need? He interrupted the attack on Alex. Monique was already unconscious. Whitset is definitely responsible. Can't you get that through your head?" Elizabeth was tired, worried about Alex and Monique, and sick of Don.

Don sat down and glared at Josh Martin. "Where in the hell is Commander Françoise? That useless bastard should be here helping us clean this shit up!"

Josh bristled at Montgomery's reference to the commander. Jack was his hero, and he worshiped the ground he walked on. He was short on energy, patience, and time. He mustered up some self-control and said in a derogatory voice, "Mr. Montgomery, Commander Françoise is out searching for Whitset. There's a citywide manhunt for your administrator. I'm leaving here now to meet up with him, if I can find him."

"No need. I'm here, Josh. No need to hunt." The three of them looked toward the doorway of Montgomery's office and stared at the exhausted Jack Françoise. Jack was so grey with fatigue and anxiety that he appeared to be an apparition. Jack touched Elizabeth's shoulder and sat down.

Officer Martin rose in deference to his commanding officer. "Commander, can I get you anything?"

Jack shook his head negatively and addressed Montgomery. "Is Alex here yet?"

Montgomery stared at the commander and said, "Hell, no! I heard she'd been attacked by Whitset. Is it true?"

Françoise nodded. "Yeah, Whitset attacked Alex and Dr. Desmonde. I understand she's still in surgery. Anyone check on her?" Jack looked at all of them dismally.

Elizabeth answered, "Yeah. I called up about an hour ago. She was still in surgery. They said it would be several more hours. They're doing a craniotomy, Commander. She has a severe skull fracture. Why not come with me and I'll call again." Elizabeth stood alongside Josh, and the three of them left a speechless Don Montgomery in his plush executive office.

As the trio walked toward Elizabeth's office, Jack's cell rang. He looked at the number. It was Nadine's cell. He said, "Hang on. Let me talk to Nadine. I think she's with Alex." He stopped and sat in the lobby, while Josh and Liz waited at a discreet distance expectantly.

Jack stood and gestured with his hand. "Let's go to Alex's office. She and Nadine are over there."

Alex and Nadine were sitting at the conference table in Alex's office. As soon as Jack entered, Alex went over and hugged him. She could feel his silent tears as they embraced. Alex said softly, "Jack, we don't know anything yet. Let's be positive. Robert's up there, so you can be sure she's getting the best." She continued to hold Jack, feeling him shudder as he grouped for composure.

Finally, he let go and smiled at her. "You're looking pretty good, Miss Lawyer Lady. You do have a few bruises and a shiner. Everything else okay?"

"Yep, I'm doing okay. Promise. Nadine has been great. Can you get her a raise?" Alex winked at Nadine.

"I'll do my best." He looked at Josh and Nadine. "Can we talk privately?" He looked sideways at Elizabeth.

"I get the message, Commander. I've got to go clean up our image with the press anyway. You guys be good while I'm gone, okay?" Liz gave them all a big smile. She hugged Alex when she left and said, "We'll talk later, Al. I'm glad you're okay," Elizabeth said, as she left them alone.

Alex smiled at her friend. "Yes, Liz. Later. I'm doing pretty okay. Say some prayers for Monique."

"I've been praying for you all. And by the way, you two owe me. I've been sitting with Don for hours, listening to him rant and rave. Steer clear of him if you can. He's a wild man again."

"Gotcha, Liz. Thanks," Alex said.

Elizabeth gave Officer Martin a special smile as she quietly closed the door of Alex's conference room.

Jack sat down wearily in a chair and said to the group, "I got the preliminary forensics on Angie. We ain't got zip. Nothing."

Alex gasped, "What? Nothing? How can that be?"

Nadine spoke quietly. "It's probably because so much time elapsed between the rape and the collection of the evidence. What about blood and hair samples, Jack? Are they conclusive?"

Jack's face brightened. Damn, he thought to himself. I really am in bad shape. I'm almost useless. He had forgotten about the evidence, except the rape forensics. "Hell, yeah, we got the hair and skin. We even got the damned bite mark. I can't wait to catch the little pervert." Jack, clearly in a brighter mood, rubbed his hands together in anticipation.

Alex was still confused. She felt her heart flutter with fear. She looked at Nadine and said, "Nadine, why don't we have any specific blood groupings? Surely, there should be something!"

Nadine understood Alex's fear. "I guess the specimens weren't collected soon enough to build a good case. Anyway, the genetic markers could only implicate Whitset if—"

She was interrupted by Commander Françoise, who said tersely, "Nadine, suppose the man's a non-secretor? Then we'll never be able to determine..." Jack's voice trailed off as he stared at Alex, whose face had flushed a bright red. She was staring at the conference table, unable to speak.

Nadine knew what they were thinking. If Whitset was a non-secretor, then Alex might not know if she had been physically raped or not. She'd never come to closure on the subject. Damn, Nadine thought. This just isn't fair.

"Alex," Nadine began. "We don't know anything yet."

Alex stood. She was in the greatest rage she could remember. "Shut up, Nadine! Shut up all of you! None of you know that humiliation, the ignominy I just endured at that Podunk hospital. All of you just get out of my office!" She looked wildly at Josh, Nadine, and Jack. "I said to get the hell out of here, now!"

Jack was shocked. He'd never heard Alex upset like that before. He stood to try to comfort her. As he reached for her, she pushed him away, fighting back hot tears.

Nadine remained seated and looked up at Alex's tear streaked face. "Alex, I know exactly what you've been through. I've been through it myself. We'll leave now and give you time for a short break, but I'll be back here in one hour to see you."

Alex stared at them as they left her office. Then, she put her head down on her conference table and wept, crying for herself, Monique, Jack, and Robert. Her life would never be the same. She just knew it. There was no way it could be.

Commander Françoise, Nadine Wells, and Josh Martin reconvened in the hospital dining room, all of them staring tiredly into their coffee.

Finally, Jack said, "How bad was it in Gulfport?"

"It was as bad as always, Jack. Nothing different or unusual. It's just a demeaning experience for any woman, or man for that matter." Her voice was clear, but her eyes had a faraway look in them.

Jack cleared his throat, uncomfortable with what he was about to say. Finally, it came out. "Nadine, I didn't know that you had been—"

Nadine interrupted him. "I know you didn't, Jack. It's not something I've ever revealed during a case." She looked bluntly at Jack and Josh. "Make sure this goes no further."

"Of course, Nadine. Your secret is safe with us. Right, Josh?"

Josh nodded his head affirmatively and said, "Right, Commander. Right, Ms. Wells. No one will ever know." Personally, Josh never wanted to piss off either the commander or Ms. Wells. They were both pretty scary in their own right.

Robert Bonnet was deeply troubled. As he stood in the shower in the O.R. suite, the warm water seemed to remind him only that he was still alive. He was numb all over. The rest of the world seemed cold to him, cold and unkind and out of sync.

Monique's surgery had progressed well, but Robert was depressed by the extent of her head injury. The neurosurgeon, Dr. Van Hansen, wasn't hopeful for much of a recovery. In fact, early in the surgery, after assessing the extent of her injury, the buildup of intracranial fluid, and its compression on the brain, he had recommended they close, take three EKG readings, and then make a decision. Robert had objected vehemently, even though the clinical picture looked grim.

At a later point, the neurosurgeon had pointedly questioned whether Monique should even have any plastic surgery, suggesting it was a waste of time and doubtful that Monique would ever even ask for a mirror if she ever regained consciousness.

Robert again objected angrily. A volley of harsh words had followed.

Robert really didn't like Van Hansen. He was lousy at the bedside and had the "surgeon rude, superior personality". But Robert knew he was also a great technical neurosurgeon. In the end, the plastic surgeon had come in and done a fairly good job of reconstructing Dr. Desmonde's face where Lester Whitset had tried to obliterate it. Of course, only time would really tell how good she would look, if she even lived.

Robert continued to chastise himself. Perhaps the neuro doc had been correct. Maybe he wasn't seeing Monique's injuries for what they were. Part of the time during the operation, he had found himself remembering their youth together. They had been great friends. They still were. Then his thoughts returned to the "celebratory dinner" they had shared only two days before. Jack and Monique had been so happy that night. Oh, there had been a few tense moments, but Robert knew the two loved each other beyond belief. Now, he had to go tell Jack that things didn't look so good.

"Bonnet, wake up! Are you still in there? You're going to be a prune if you don't get out." Robert recognized the voice of one of the male O.R. techs. He opened the shower door and grabbed a towel.

"Yeah, I'm coming out. Give me a minute." Robert left the shower and was changing into clean scrubs when the tech approached him again.

"You okay, man? You look awful. You're all wrinkled." Tom Finney looked him up and down. He smiled at Robert and gave him a look of encouragement. He studied the surgeon's face and said, "Listen, man, you know how those damned brain guys are. They thrive on pessimism. They always predict the worst... not sure of this, not sure of that, and all that horseshit. Then they look like Santa Claus or the Tooth Fairy when the patient wakes up and starts bitching about the nursing care. Brain surgeons practice more savior behavior than the rest of you. Don't let him get you down!" Tom slapped Robert on the back.

Robert smiled at the aging tech. He had known Tom for years, even before he was operating at CCMC. Tom had been a nursing assistant first and then an O.R. tech. He knew patients, and he knew doctors. "Thanks, Tom. You're right. I'm really down about Dr. Desmonde."

"Listen, Doc. If anyone can pull through a skull fracture, it's Monique Desmonde. She's a fighter, and a stubborn lady. Don't write her off. She'll come back, if only to prove her jackass surgeon wrong. Wait and see!" Tom gave Robert a big hug before rushing down the Hall. "Gotta go. See you, Doc. Get some rest. You look like hell."

Robert waved at the spry tech and smiled. "Thanks, Tom." He entered the physician's waiting room and called Alex's office. No answer. That concerned him. Then he called Jack's cell. Jack answered and agreed to meet him in the recovery waiting area.

Robert walked slowly into the recovery area. His injured arm was killing him. It was numb and felt like someone was sticking pins in it. He brushed the sensations off. It was just fatigue. It always got like that when he was tired. He checked on Monique in recovery and learned from the nurses that she was stable and had been transferred straight up to the neuro ICU. The room was empty except for Jack and Nadine who were seated together on a couch, talking quietly.

Robert stood in the doorway. Robert felt his eyes fill with tears as he saw the goodhearted, hard-nosed policeman. If he looked bad, then Jack looked ten times worse. The commander was suffering. He looked old and tired. His body language spoke of complete misery and severe emotional pain. His face was, well, what was it? Robert had never seen the look that Jack had on his face. He continued staring at him from a distance, as his mind searched for a word that described how the commander appeared. Finally, it dawned on him.

Jack's face was a mask of fear. The commander was desperately afraid of what Robert Bonnet, his friend the surgeon, would tell them about Monique.

Robert approached Jack. He looked at him anxiously. Robert sat on the coffee table opposite Jack and Nadine. Neither man spoke.

Nadine, fearing the worst, reached for Jack's hand.

If he was standing in front of a firing squad, Robert was sure Jack wouldn't be as afraid as he was now.

"Hey, man. How are you?" Robert asked tentatively. The silence was endless. Françoise seemed afraid to ask, and Robert didn't want to talk. His mind was formulating the best way to tell Jack that all estimates to this point suggested that Monique would be a vegetable.

Jack's eyes implored Robert to tell him something good. Robert knew he couldn't ethically do that.

Finally, Robert said, "Jack, the surgery went well. Monique's in recovery." He paused for a moment, groping for the best words. "To be honest, Jack, the neurosurgeon isn't optimistic about her recovery. Her injury was extensive..."

"And...?" Jack asked in a small voice. If the situation hadn't been so serious, Robert would have laughed at Jack's voice.

"We don't know. The next twelve hours are critical. He put in a shunt to drain the fluid off of her brain." Robert watched as Jack's shoulders sagged and then continued, "But, I'm hopeful that she'll regain consciousness—"

Jack interrupted and said hoarsely, "I don't care if she never practices medicine again. I just want her to be able to be with me, to love me, to stay with me. I love her, Robert. I loved her as she was, and I'll love her for what she'll be. I don't care what she's like after this. I'm going to marry her and take care of her. Do you understand?"

"Of course I do, Jack. And, I'm going to pray that you get your wish. We'll all pray for that, won't we, Nadine?"

Nadine nodded and continued to hold Jack's hand. She asked Robert, "Dr. Bonnet, have you experience with patients like Dr. Desmonde?"

"Yes, I do. I'm not offering any false hopes. I never do. I simply want to say that medicine has been proven wrong many, many times. Monique may come out of this and do fairly well, great even. But, Jack, she'll never be exactly what she was, if she's anything at all. You must understand that."

"I understand, Robert. And I love her. Just keep her alive for me so she has the chance to talk again. Will you do that for me, Robert?" The commander's eyes were filled with tears.

"Of course I will." Robert touched his friend's shoulder. "I will do everything I possibly can. You know we all love her, too."

"Can I see her?"

"She's in the Neuro ICU, the neurological intensive care unit. There are a lot of machines. But I'll take you, Jack. Nadine, would you like to go?"

Nadine checked her watch and shook her head. "I'm going to Alex's office. We've got an appointment. Will you meet me there afterward, Jack?"

"Yeah. I will," Jack said in a small voice.

"Is Alex okay?" Robert asked and looked directly at both police officers.

Nadine hesitated for a moment.

Robert immediately picked up on the hesitation and said, "Is Alex okay?" His voice was low, demanding.

"Yes, physically she's okay. Emotionally, she's drained. You can see for yourself after you two visit Monique. I'll be in her office."

At that moment, the telepage operator stat paged Commander Jack Françoise to the Pavilion. Jack said in a sour tone, "Screw the Pavilion. I'm going with Robert!"

"Let me answer the page, Jack. Otherwise, they'll keep stat paging you over and over. We need a little time and a little silence." Robert reached for his cell, called telepage, and talked for a moment.

Nadine saw his face pale a little.

He smiled at them and said, "Another incident at the Pavilion. It'll wait, Jack. Trust me."

"I do. I don't give a damn about that place anyway. Now, let's go." Jack glanced at Nadine and said, "We'll meet you and Alex in her office. Then, I'll check in the Pavilion." Jack gave Nadine a forced smile and left with Robert.

Weston Whitset wasn't used to feeling fear. He didn't like it. What the hell was Anthony Gavette doing in the female seclusion room? Fleeting thoughts raced through his mind, as Anthony wrestled him to the floor and punched him senseless in the face.

Weston knew he had the edge. Even though Anthony was powerfully built and was heavier than Weston by at least fifty pounds, Weston was smarter. He let Anthony knock him around a few times. Then, he stuck his fingers into Anthony's eyes and gave him a fierce kick to the groin. Anthony, momentarily blinded, screamed, and fell backward. Weston sat on top of him and said, "Anthony, you're a dumb, crazy, worthless piece of shit. Let me tell you about me and Rose."

Anthony lay docile under Weston, mesmerized by his cold, black marbled eyes.

"Yeah, Anthony, let me tell you what it was like with your woman. She's like any other piece. If you're nice to her, she'll put out. No question about it. You see, me and Rose, we got this game. We talk baby talk to each other, and I play with her."

Weston was enjoying himself so much that he ignored the hiss that came from Anthony's throat. He continued, "You see, Anthony, you may be a big man and all, but what I got is packaged just right for your poor little Rose. I sing her a few baby songs, sort of like nursery songs, and then we play married. She likes to play married. She pretends she's a little housewife, the little woman of the house, taking care of the plants and cooking me meatloaf. She loves the game. Then, we start to wrestle, you know. I usually sing to her while I wrestle, and then she starts to take her clothes off for me. Sometimes she knows I'm coming to visit, so she doesn't put any on..." Weston caught Anthony's angry look and used it to his advantage.

"Yeah, sometimes all she has on is a little teeny nighty. Now, last night she had on a new blouse. I made up a little song about her new blouse and it took her about two seconds to take it off, and then... well, you know, it was pretty good. Not too great, but not bad for a crazy woman. Basically, she is much too skinny for me. Just a bag of... no real tits, not like Angie."

Weston felt Anthony stiffen under his body. He said in a placating, singsong voice, "Oh, did you want Angie, Anthony, the big tits nurse? Well, too bad, I got her. She was mine and she was good. Anyway, Rose ain't much, even at her best. She looks like a little beggar girl when she's naked, all bones. Of course, Anthony, that probably makes a big man like you feel better, feel good. And then when she puts her..."

Weston was enjoying himself. He loved to inflict pain on others. He was enjoying himself so much that he was unprepared for the primal scream and thrust from Anthony that sent his body flailing against the wall. Momentarily stunned, he was defenseless when Anthony grabbed him and started beating his head against the hard tile floor. Beating it over and over. Weston's last thoughts were those of searing pain, as he remembered his classmates laughing and taunting him on the school bus.

Anthony couldn't stop beating Whitset's head against the floor. He was obsessed. He beat the administrator until blood ran from his ears and mouth. The back of his head was literally flattened from the beating. Satisfied that Whitset was dead, he threw his body into the closet, closed the metal door. He would tell them at group later that the administrator was dead in his closet. Anthony had sweet visions about the congrats he would receive tomorrow from his fellow patients. He knew they hated Whitset. He had been one of them, but the balance of power had been unfair. Now the balance was fair. Whitset was dead, and in Anthony Gavette's mind, that was really fair. He smiled at the thought.

Bye, bye, Lester, you son of a bitch. Forever!

The day had been endless. Alex was exhausted, mentally and physically. She had sent the talkative Mona home for the day, unable to handle any extraneous noise or conversation. She had called the Neuro ICU and been advised that Monique's condition was unchanged. She was still in a deep coma.

Alex was deeply depressed. The sun had gone down. She considered calling her grandmother in Virginia but knew Kathryn would pick up on the despondency in her voice. Her grandmother was just smart like that, and she could read Alex like a book. She didn't want to upset her grandparents and have them chartering a jet to New Orleans anytime soon.

As Alex sat at her desk, she remembered the day in February, just after Mardi Gras, when she had received Mitch's last letter. In essence, it was his declaration of love. For some reason, Alex pulled out her copy of the letter from her desk and reread it. It only made more hot tears come into her eyes, and she began to cry harder and wish things were different. Alex knew her life would never be the same. She knew she had to leave New Orleans and start over. Things here were just too impossible. There had been too much heartbreak in such a short period of time. First, February, and now all of this.

She continued with her morbid thoughts. She could easily identify her losses — Jack, Monique, Mitch, and possibly Robert. And for what? New Orleans had brought her nothing but heartache and grief for the last six months. The first year and a half in the Big Easy had been okay, but lately...

As she continued to think, her eyes strayed to a letter she had received from her colleague in San Francisco. A large managed care organization was seeking a hospital attorney to set up an in-house legal counsel office. The position was only for a year. Her friend was urging her to come for an interview, assuring her the organization would meet any stipulations she required. Alex began to consider it.

San Francisco sounded like a long way to go alone and start over. Virginia, Texas, New Orleans, San Francisco... Was this a logical progression for her career? But was that what she wanted, a career? Or did she want something else? Hadn't she said only a short time ago that she wanted a husband and a family?

Alex laughed out loud and began to consider how screwed up she was. Her grandparents would die if she moved to California. The congressman was convinced the place was doomed and had been waiting for it to fall off the face of the earth forever.

At this point, though, the opportunity was sounding more promising. Perhaps she should find a position in Virginia after New Orleans. Now, that was a thought. Her grandparents were growing older and she wanted to be closer to them. She missed them dreadfully. And, she missed Virginia, the horse farm, and her horse. Still, Alex continued to think as her office door opened. Good, she thought, a distraction. Anything was better than thinking about the last forty-eight hours.

Nadine stood in front of her.

"For heaven's sake, Nadine. Sit down. You're looking at me like I might suddenly go into orbit. I'm better. I think. No, I promise." Alex gave the forensic cop a brave smile.

Nadine sat down across from her and said, "Robert just spoke with Jack. The picture is not good for Dr. Desmonde. If I read between the lines, Robert is trying to offer Jack some hope. But I really don't think there is much, at least based on what Robert is saying at this point."

The sharp intake of air seemed to crush her chest. Alex knew her voice was breathless when she asked, "How did Jack take it?" Alex gazed outside at the darkening sky.

"Okay, I guess. He only wants her to talk to him. Says he's planning on marrying her, no matter what."

"I guess you know they have a secret relationship. But of course, you do, I told you in the car coming back from Mississippi. I only learned several days ago. They were so happy. Robert and I had dinner with them — to celebrate. I think they had planned to marry. They were so happy." Her voice trailed off, unable to believe that so much could happen so quickly and be so devastating.

"Yeah, I know. You told me. I hope she comes out of it. They'll be down here shortly. Robert was taking Jack to see Monique in the ICU again." Nadine's voice sounded glum.

Alex shuddered. "Oh my, I hope Jack's able to keep it together. I wish I were with him. The PACU or ICU can be scary and intimidating, to say the least. "

Nadine nodded. "Dr. Bonnet will do a good job. He's a kind, sensitive man." Nadine paused for a moment and looked at Alex directly. "You know, Alex, Dr. Bonnet loves you as well. Did you know that?"

Alex looked uncertain. "I don't know, Nadine. We have a lot of issues to work on. We were married once, and Robert's been troubled with his arm. I can't say for sure things will ever work for us. He's prone to sadness and depression and I don't want to live with that."

Nadine nodded and looked at her quietly, "That's part of his Creole blood. Do you want things to work out, Alex?"

Alex said in a tired voice, "I don't know, Nadine. There is too much happening now. Too many other things to work on. We'll see."

"Will you promise to allow Robert to help you work through this thing with Whitset? Your recovery from the rape will be the same no matter what the lab test determines. Do you understand that?" Nadine looked at her, her dark eyes locked with Alex's blue ones.

"I don't know. I just don't know. I'm pretty confused now. We'll see. I will promise you that I won't shut—" Alex was interrupted when Robert and Jack walked into her office. They both had a sense of urgency about them.

Robert walked over and hugged her for a moment. He could feel how stiff she felt in his arms. He sighed and looked at Jack.

Françoise said in a rough voice, "We've got to hightail it over to the Pavilion. There's another corpse over there!"

"My God, now who, Commander?" Nadine asked in a breathless voice. "Is this ever going to stop?"

"Don't know, Nadine. Josh just paged me again. He said to get over there ASAP. He and Elizabeth are up there, and the forensic team is coming."

Alex looked and felt weary, as she gathered her legal pad and purse. She asked, "Did anyone call Don Montgomery?"

"I'm not calling Don. I can't put up with him now. Let's move!" No one stopped to argue with Françoise.

The Pavilion was bristling with activity. The staff was not aware that Dr. Desmonde has been attacked. Betty Farve had sent Sandy Pilsner to announce it in a staff meeting before after the patients had dinner. Once again, the place was crawling with police. Sandy Pilsner met them at the locked door and ushered them in. Sandy announced she was covering for Donna Meade, who was still out from the injuries inflicted on her by Anthony Gavette.

"Sandy, you just keep showing up like a good penny every time something bad has happened." Alex reached out to hug her. "I heard they'd sent you up here to break the news about Monique."

Sandy hugged Alex back. "I'm hopeful for Monique. We both know people recover from horrific head injuries."

Alex nodded but remained silent.

Sandy continued, "Thank goodness for the added security. This place is crazy! All the seclusion rooms are full, and the place is finally sort of stable. Let's go back to the community room." Her voice was quiet and subdued, but her high color reflected the intensity of the situation.

"Who is dead? Tell us, Sandy." Alex's voice sounded desperate as they walked down the hall and entered the community room. She quickly looked around, relieved that only staff she knew were present.

Josh Martin met them at the community room door. He quietly ushered them over to a nearby table. His eyes were strangely bright. He looked pleased, even happy.

Sandy sat at the head of the table and addressed the group. "A little while ago in the evening group meeting, Anthony announced that he had a dead body in the closet in the seclusion room. No one really paid any attention to him. He had been locked in seclusion since his attack on Donna. Anyway, he began a long story about how his seclusion room had an elevator in the closet and how someone had come in his room. He told us how that someone had been using the seclusion room for his fun house and love nest and how that same someone had raped and killed a female patient earlier this year. One of the nurses remembered the suicide of a young woman in that room late this spring. I began to take notice, so I called Officer Martin here and he and I went with Anthony into the seclusion room. He was right. There is an elevator and the body..."

"Who the hell is in there?" Françoise's voice was furious. "Martin, have you secured the scene?"

Josh nodded and said, "Why don't we just show you, Commander, all of you if you'd like!"

Alex felt her fear increasing as they walked down the hall, passed the nurse's station, and entered the last seclusion room. Smears of blood were on the floor and the wall.

Josh moved ahead of the group and opened the closet. There, on the floor, in a pool of blood, hair, and brain matter, was a very dead Lester — Weston — Whitset.

A pitiful cry came from Alex, as she crammed her fist into her mouth and fainted into Robert and Josh Martin's arms.

At the same moment, Don Montgomery entered the room, screaming and cursing because he hadn't been called immediately. When he saw the dead Whitset, he turned and started upbraiding Jack Françoise for shoddy police work.

Don's voice was loud and angry. "Something's wrong here, Françoise? What the hell is he doing dead in a closet in my hospital? You and your officers are worthless! How am I ever going to explain this one to the media — to the board? My own administrator, dead in his own hospital on his own unit. What am I supposed to say?" Don's face was red with anger.

Françoise's dark eyes gleamed hatefully at the pompous Montgomery. He said in a scathing voice, "I don't really give a crap what you say, Montgomery, but listen to this. Your administrator, whom you hired all by yourself, was an imposter. He wasn't even a hospital administrator. The bastard didn't even have a college degree. What kind of a moron are you?"

Don looked at Jack with disbelief and said, "Listen, you stupid son of a bitch. Whitset is exactly who he is—"

Jack grabbed the hospital administrator by the shoulder and shook him as he interrupted Montgomery's tirade. "Listen, you idiot. Lester Whitset was really Weston Whitset. Lester, a bona fide hospital administrator, died years ago, and Weston, a deranged mental patient who spent most of his life confined for aberrant behavior, assumed his identity. He was a rapist and a murderer. Did you check him out, Montgomery, or did you just hire him because he promised to reduce costs?" Françoise paused for a moment, and then continued to go head to head with the red-faced CEO.

By this time, an audience had gathered outside the room. Françoise continued, completely out of control, his emotional agony unleashed. He said harshly, "By the way, Donald, how big was Whitset's percentage this quarter? What was his bonus for saving costs at the expense of patient care? Thousands of dollars? Talk about incompetent, look in the mirror, you weasel-faced son of a bitch."

Don was white with anger and unable to speak.

Françoise was enjoying the scene but was still angry. He said, "Never mind, you little ingratiating asshole, you don't have to tell me! It's a matter of record that the Times Picayune will be hot to know. You're a cheap, stingy, son of a bitch!" Françoise sneered at the CEO.

Don was livid with fury. He lunged toward the commander. Josh Martin was about to come to his commander's defense when Françoise slammed his fist into the administrator's face, cold cocking him onto the floor. A rousing cheer went up from the group.

Alex completely missed it. When she came to, Robert took her home, where she slept for hours.

Alex woke up in her bed in a cold sweat, hearing muffled, choking sounds. Where are they coming from? She looked around her darkened room. It's me, she noted. She felt like she was being suffocated. Her body was rigid and heavy. The illuminated dial of the alarm clock next to her bed said three a.m. At first, Alex's mind was numb and frozen. She felt acute pain in her shoulder as she attempted to roll over. Then, it all came back to her and an agonizing sound came from her mouth as she began to scream.

Immediately, Robert Bonnet was at her side.

She continued to cry uncontrollably. Robert attempted to take her into his arms to comfort her, but she resisted, pushing him away forcefully. She turned her body away from him and curled up into the fetal position in her bed.

Robert was desperate. He didn't know what to do. Every effort he made to comfort Alex made him feel increasingly useless. He was tempted to call Nadine Wells for advice but decided against it. He knew the policewoman had put in the long hours and deserved a good night's rest. After all, she had told him to expect something like this since Alex was in the initial phase of rape trauma syndrome. He tried to remember the things Nadine had told him to expect, but his tired mind refused to let him think back to their conversation. Gradually, Alex's crying slowed to a muffled sob, and Robert went into the kitchen to make her some hot tea. When he returned to her room with a tray, Alex was sound asleep.

Robert went back into the kitchen where he sat for several hours, reminiscing over his life with Alex and the tragic events of the past few days. He felt miserable, guilty. He had enough to contend with before, and now he had no idea where his life would lead or whether Alex would ever recover. Finally, he returned to bed, depressed and sad.

He rested fitfully in Alex's beautifully appointed guest room. His mind kept returning to the attack on Alex and Monique. Why hadn't he insisted on going in with Alex when he dropped her off at Monique's house? Why hadn't he sensed the danger? How could he have been so stupid? Robert continued with his self-deprecation until he could think of nothing else to blame himself for. This was all his fault. It was his fault Alex and Monique had been attacked. It was his fault their marriage had ended and that knowledge was utterly painful to him.

He felt tears jump into his eyes. The dinner he and Alex shared several nights ago had been so promising. He had begun to think that perhaps Alex would marry him again. Now, they had all of this to work through — the rape, the medical problems with Monique, and Jack's grief. Of course, he had been grappling for months with the thought that he would never be able to operate again. A surgeon without hands, an amputee, that's how he perceived himself. That in itself had caused him to be terribly depressed over the past six months. And now all of this. He could only hope and pray that he could cope.

Robert checked his watch for the third time in twenty minutes. It was almost six o'clock in the morning. He checked on Alex and she was sleeping peacefully. He then phoned the neuro intensive care unit at CCMC. The nurses reported that Dr. Desmonde was the same, stable but unresponsive. Robert could only guess how Jack was doing and figured he was feeling just as useless as he was. Thank goodness, he wasn't in Jack's position. At least Alex could think and talk, but Monique probably wouldn't ever come out of her coma. She probably wouldn't even wake up. Tomorrow, they would do the first EEG to measure her brainwave activity. He prayed that the swelling had decreased. He wasn't ready to tell Jack they needed to disconnect the ventilator and let her die. Please, Lord, he prayed to himself, don't let that happen.

Robert returned to the kitchen and made coffee. The annoying feeling in his gut told him he was hungry, but he had no desire to eat. He continued to sit at the table, silently drinking coffee, and reminiscing over all the mistakes he had made in his adult life. He only wanted his childhood again, just to be young and carefree. Finally, he was aware that Alex was behind him. He could feel her presence.

She smiled tentatively at him, touched his shoulder, and asked, "Could you share your coffee with me?"

He stood immediately. "I can do better than that. I'll let you have your own cup."

Alex had huge coffee cups, just like the ones Alex's grandmother had in Virginia. Robert removed a brightly decorated porcelain cup from the cabinet, made Alex a cup of coffee in her Keurig, and set it down in front of her with a flourish. He was pleased that she looked so rested and relaxed.

Alex savored the rich flavor of the New Orleans coffee. She murmured her appreciation, "Mmm, this is good. I feel like I may be human again. Thanks, Robert. Thank you for staying with me and for always being there for me. It means a lot, especially in times like these."

Robert smiled, feeling a little brighter. Alex looked lovely this morning. Her hair was down and its curly reddish-chestnut color beautifully framed her delicately colored face. Her eyes were clear and blue. There were no signs of tears, dark circles, or fatigue. Only the black eye and the drooping shoulder told of her recent misery.

He said lightly, "You look rested this morning, Al. You must've gotten some sleep."

"Yes, I did. I remember awakening during the night and crying. It all came back to me, but I decided that today's another day and we need to move forward. Have you checked on Monique?" Her voice and her face expressed her concern about her friend.

"Yeah, I have. There's no change. It's still pretty early, Alex," Robert said, noting the crestfallen look on her face. "You know that." His voice was soft, but definitive, as he attempted to comfort her.

Alex nodded, stirring her coffee. She looked up and asked, "Did Anthony Gavette kill Whitset?"

Robert nodded. "Yes, he did. Apparently, Whitset had a secret access to the Pavilion. He used the old tunnels that connected the Pavilion to the main hospital building. Most people had totally forgotten they existed. That's how he had been coming and going secretly for months."

"Wasn't something said before I fainted about his killing a patient in there?"

"Yep, he did. He told Anthony, who reported it to the psych staff, and it checks out. I talked to Jack, who confirmed that a young woman admitted for depression a few months back had committed suicide in the room by slashing her wrists. The staff never knew where she'd gotten the razor. Apparently, Whitset gave it to her — at least, according to Anthony. Or, who knows, perhaps Whitset slashed her wrists and watched her bleed. He seemed to be that crazy."

"Did he rape her?" Alex asked and continued to stare into her coffee.

"I don't know. I don't think they can prove that, but Anthony said Whitset told him all about it. I would guess it's probably true. Whitset was a sick man." Robert looked carefully at Alex.

"Also, Jack seems to think Whitset probably did slash the woman's wrists because there was a bottle of wine and human blood found in his office. They were mixed together. I think forensics is going to type the blood and see if it matches the dead womans."

Alex was appalled and her face was disbelieving. "What, you think Whitset bled the woman's wrist into the wine bottle? How disgusting!" She shuddered at the thought.

Robert nodded. "Yes, grotesque and disgusting. Somehow, he got the blood into the wine bottle. Unbelievable!"

"Un huh, you bet. Real sick. You're sure he's dead?" Alex's voice was tremulous.

"Positive. I'm absolutely sure. I saw him."

Alex looked relieved. "I'm glad. Very glad. I guess that's not the best way to feel, but I'm glad he is dead."

Robert reached for her hand. "I think it's a very honest and appropriate way to feel. I feel the same way."

"Good," Alex said brightly. "I feel vindicated, and I'm hungry. Let's eat. What should we have?"

"I'll cook, you get dressed. You know that breakfast is the only meal I can make." Robert paused for a moment and said with a smile on his face, "By the way, Alex, do you remember what Jack did to Montgomery?"

Alex looked confused. "What Jack did to Don? No, I don't think so."

Delight was written all over Robert's face as he told her, "He cold-cocked him! Knocked the hell out of him! It was great!"

Alex burst into laughter. "You're kidding! When?"

"Yesterday, just after you fainted. I wanted to take a picture with my iPhone but didn't. Everyone standing around gave Françoise a huge cheer!"

Alex continued to laugh. "I'm sorry I missed it. Jack's been dying to do that for a long time and Montgomery finally pushed him over the edge. I just wish I'd seen it—" She was interrupted by the phone.

Robert answered and said, "Speak of the devil." It was Jack. They talked for several moments. Robert gave a delightful war whoop and hung up the phone. He was smiling a huge smile.

"Robert, what is it? What did he say?" Alex's voice was excited, impatient.

"Jack swears that Monique just squeezed his hand. He swears she can hear him. He said she opened her eyes!" Robert was ecstatic.

"What do the nurses say? Do you think Jack could've imagined it?" Alex felt hopeful but looked uncertain.

Robert stared at her and said firmly, "No. If Jack saw Monique with her eyes open and felt her squeeze his hand, then it happened."

Alex smiled happily. "Let's hurry up and eat. I want to go see for myself."

"Me, too. Get dressed and we'll eat in a hurry. Jack also wants to give us the final information about Whitset before he closes the case."

Alex felt her happiness ebb away and felt fear engulf her. He must have the results of my lab reports, she thought to herself. At least I'll know. Then, she remembered. Well, maybe I will know something.

The couple ate a quick breakfast and hurried to the hospital. They found Jack in the waiting room outside the intensive care unit. He looked forlorn, exhausted, and gloomy. His face brightened when he saw Robert and Alex.

"That damned doctor who operated told me there was no way Monique squeezed my hand. He said her brain is too swollen for her to do anything like that."

Alex felt her heart sink. She walked over and gave Jack a huge hug.

Robert said to Jack, "If you felt her squeeze your hand, then she squeezed your hand." Robert reassured him with a smile. "I'm going to go look in on her." Robert was mentally cursing the neurosurgeon. What a bastard the man was; but that being said, he was a great neurosurgeon.

"I'm going to go, too. The hell with that man. How about you, Alex? By the way, you look mighty good today." Jack leaned over, hugged her again, and gave her a kiss on the cheek.

Alex turned toward him and winced as her shoulder reminded her it was broken, smiled, and once again returned the hug offered by the thickset, kindhearted police commander. She whispered clandestinely, "I heard you knocked out my boss!"

Commander Françoise's eyes lit up, and he smiled from ear to ear. "You're damned right, I did, Al. I would have kept hitting the son of a bitch if Josh Martin hadn't stopped me. Little prick has had it coming for months..."

"Probably all of his life," Alex surmised.

Alex had a hard time controlling her emotions when she looked down at Monique Desmonde. She had forgotten how horrible craniotomy patients looked after surgery. Monique's eyes were both black, and her face was swollen. She wasn't recognizable. Alex managed to keep herself together but felt her heart sink as she heard Jack talking softly to her. She also began to talk to Monique. But there was no response. Monique seemed to be in a deep coma. Alex was beginning to doubt what Jack had seen. She looked over and saw Robert reviewing Monique's chart. He shook his head at Alex and came to the bedside.

Robert and Alex stood quietly looking at Monique.

Jack continued to hold her hand and talk to her. Finally, he said, "Well, she ain't talkin' now, but that doesn't mean she won't wake up a little later, right, Robert?"

"That's right, Jack. Let's go." Robert's voice was gentle.

"Nah, I'm staying a while longer. Can we meet in your office later this morning, Alex? I'll have everything by then and I'll give you both the finals. Nadine's coming at ten o'clock." Jack looked sad.

"Sure, Jack. We'll see you then."

"I'm going to the O.R. to get a shower and change my clothes. Either of you need anything?" Robert asked.

"No," Jack and Alex said in unison.

"I'll walk out with you, Robert. See you in a little while, Jack. You want any donuts?" Alex asked in a teasing voice.

"No, I'm not hungry lately," Jack said a little dismally. He knew what his friends were thinking.

On the way out of the unit, Alex asked Robert, "What do you think, Robert? Do you think Jack just wanted to believe Monique was coming out of it?"

"I don't think anything. I'm just praying Jack is right." Robert's voice was tense, and Alex could feel his disappointment. "That being said, she's still in a deep coma, and I certainly didn't see any response at all."

Mona, Bridgett, and Latetia were drinking coffee and gossiping in Alex's office. All three stood and hugged her when she came in.

Bridgett looked rested and she was laughing. "Guess what, Al? Angie's much better today! Last night she began to come around. She began talking about the attack and said it was Whitset who attacked her. Angie was a little emotional when Jack told her that Whitset was dead. It takes her a while to understand stuff, but then she said she was glad."

Alex hugged Bridgett again, as her secretary continued to talk.

"Anyway, she seemed relieved that Whitset was dead. Nadine told her that her responses were natural, well, you know, normal. Anyway, she is so much better, and I feel so grateful to you all." Bridgett looked like her old self. Her blonde hair was piled high on her head, her blue eyes were sparkling, and the rings of fatigue around her eyes were gone. Her clothes, once again, were outrageous. She wore a pink mini-skirt, an orange tank top, and a lime green blazer. She couldn't be any brighter. She even had on three-inch gold heels, and the largest lime green necklace and drop earrings Alex had ever seen.

Alex shook her head when she noted Bridgett's outfit, but was so happy for her that she just said, "Bridge, I'm so glad. I know Angie's going to be fine now. She is strong and practical, just like you, and she will be able to work through it. Besides, she has her husband and Jessica to pull her through. They'll help her refocus her life."

Bridgett hugged Alex again and said, "Alex, will you help me help her? You are so good at helping people with things."

Alex felt her heart start to beat frantically. She understood then that Bridgett didn't know that Whitset had attacked and raped her as well. Alex didn't know if she would be able to help herself, much less Angie.

"I'll do my best, Bridge. You know that. And by the way, you're so bright that most people would need sunglasses to look at you today. What an outfit!" If Bridgett picked up on the hesitancy in Alex's voice, she didn't let on.

Bridgett looked a bit chagrined. "Yeah, but I wanted to look cheerful for Angie. Believe me, she had plenty to say to me about my outfit. She's so conservative. She doesn't dress like me at all anymore. She used to hate it when Momma dressed us alike in bright colors."

Latetia, laughing at them, commented, "Yes, Miss Bridgett, now, she does wear the bright clothes. No question."

Alex's spirits rose as she looked at Leticia. "Latetia, how's the boss this morning?"

Latetia smiled coyly at Alex and said, "Well, Miss Alex, Mr. Montgomery isn't in this morning. I doubt he'll be here for the rest of the week. Rumor has it that he has a black eye, among other injuries. I even heard he needed to see his dentist 'cause he lost a few teeth!" Latetia was smiling broadly, her white teeth shining.

Alex held up her hand to stop her and said gaily, "Say no more, Latetia. Let's just revel in rumors and the memories! And, Miss Mona, how are you today?"

"I'm all right, Alex. I'm glad to see you're looking so good. Much better than yesterday! I guess I'm a little sad, though. Looks like I'll be out of a job soon. Bridge is coming back next week." Mona looked a little forlorn.

"Get off it, Mona. You know you can only stand working a week at a time. If you need some extra work, I'm sure Alex can arrange it. Right, Alex?" Bridgett winked at Alex.

Alex smiled at both women. "Yeah. You bet. Just let me know, Mona."

Bridgett changed the subject. "How's Dr. Desmonde, Alex?"

Alex shook her head. "Not good, Bridgett. She's the same. She's in a coma. Dr. Bonnet is hopeful that she'll regain consciousness soon. Her neurosurgeon is less hopeful."

Bridgett and Latetia looked sad.

Mona said expectantly, "Commander Françoise was in here earlier. He said she had squeezed his hand."

Alex nodded her head and said, "Yes, I know. He told me, too. But now, she seems to be back in a deep coma." There was silence and Alex continued, "Bridgett or Mona, could you have dietary send up some coffee and donuts for us? Jack and Robert are coming over soon and will be in my office."

Bridgett said with some authority, "The commander just needs to be patient, Angie was in a coma too, and now she's just fine."

"Why don't you remind him of that, Bridgett, when you see him today," Alex suggested. "He could use a perk."

Bridgett gave Alex a bright, dazzling smile. "I'll do just that, Alex. The commander is a good man."

Alex nodded in agreement while Mona went to call dietary. Then, she waved goodbye to the secretaries and went into her office.

As Alex savored the silence and elegance of her office, she noted she had less than an hour before Jack, Nadine, and Robert would show up. It occurred to her that no one knew about her rape except for Jack, Robert, Josh, and Nadine. That was comforting. If Bridgett or Mona knew, she would've picked up on it. Alex felt some relief that her confidentiality was intact.

As she continued to think, she again noticed the letter from her friend in San Francisco. Alex found herself reading the letter and scanning the organization's annual report. Her interest in setting up their legal department was heightened. More than ever, she felt a pressing need to get out of New Orleans and away from Crescent City Medical Center for a while. Perhaps she could arrange for a year or two sabbatical. Maybe by then, Don would have quit, and she could come back. She was infinitely sick of him and his juvenile antics. But she might as well forget California. Her grandparents would have a fit, particularly the congressman. She really needed to get closer to Virginia. It occurred to her that this was the second time she had had these thoughts in a very short period of time. Maybe, though, she should consider California for a year.

Mona buzzed her and said the others were in her conference room. Alex went in, her heart pounding, as if she were about to be executed. Now she would find out if she had been forcibly raped or not. Then she could make plans and get on with her life.

Jack, Robert, and Nadine were drinking coffee and talking quietly. Only Robert was eating a donut. A bad sign, Alex thought. Jack had never turned down a donut before. She studied his face as she sat down. It was dismal as he spoke to them. He looked like a whipped puppy.

"I don't have much to tell you," he began. "First of all, Whitset was responsible for the rape and beating of Angie and the murder of Mrs. Smithson. The evidence is conclusive; the bite marks match up perfectly."

Alex and Robert sat quietly, and Nadine said, "Go on, Jack, what else?"

Jack sighed and continued, "There's also evidence that Weston Whitset killed his elementary school teacher when he was seven years old. After that, he was committed to a state institution for the criminally insane. Anyway, Weston assumed the identity of his brother, Lester, about twenty years ago. Lester was a hospital administrator in the British West Indies and died there rather unexpectedly. As a matter of fact, he died during a visit from Weston. Weston Whitset had been released earlier from a forensics unit and had gone there to visit. Apparently, Lester Whitset's death was never reported in the United States, but Weston Whitset's was." Jack looked around at the incredulous stares of the group.

The commander continued, "Therefore, the psych hospital wrote him off and never expected him back for follow-up. There was some speculation of foul play in Lester's death, but the evidence against Weston was inconclusive. After a year or so, Weston Whitset reappeared in the United States as Lester Whitset and assumed his brother's identity and occupation."

Alex moaned and said, "Oh, my God, this is unbelievable!"

Françoise agreed, "Yes, unbelievable, but true. Anyway, the records at the Pennsylvania psychiatric hospital noted that Lester Whitset had called from the West Indies, shortly before his death, and expressed concern because his brother had stopped taking his medicine and was acting strangely. Shortly after that, the hospital received notice of Weston Whitset's death, so they closed their case."

Robert interrupted, "So, was it proven that Whitset killed his brother?"

"No," Jack said. "Lester Whitset apparently drowned while sailing. An autopsy revealed he had been taking illegal drugs — a real surprise to everyone. Anyhow, the investigation and evidence against Weston was inconclusive. It's an incredible story!" Jack lamented, as he shook his head.

"What was Whitset's psychiatric diagnosis?" Robert asked.

Jack shook his head and said, "I'll try to explain, but it's hard. He was diagnosed with autism when he was little and then as a paranoid schizophrenic. He was dangerous and violent. I'll never understand why they let him travel out of the United States." Françoise shook his head disgustedly.

Alex remembered back when psychiatric hospitals had emptied their patients into society. The timing was about right, the late 1960s and early 1970s. "Not so surprising, really. Has anyone in psychiatry reviewed Whitset's records from Pennsylvania?"

Commander Françoise smiled at her. "Funny you should mention that, Alex. Our state forensic psychiatrist called me an hour ago. He said that, based on his review of Whitset's records, he would diagnose him as having delusional misidentification syndrome."

"What! What in the heck is that? I've never heard of it. Delusional misidentification syndrome. Is that for real?" Robert asked.

"It's apparently a syndrome in which the affected patient believes that people in his environment experience radical changes in their psychological identity without a change in their physical appearance. In this case, the forensic expert said he based his opinion on the fact that Whitset was actually suffering from Fregoli Syndrome. Fregoli's occurs when the patient has the delusion that others exhibit radical changes in their physical identity without changing their behavior."

"Huh? Say that again, Jack. I want to be sure I understand," Nadine said. The others nodded their heads in agreement.

"I wish Monique was here to explain it. I really can't. Interestingly enough, she had suspected it and had noted that as a potential diagnosis in his file in her office. Let me try to tell you what I can." Jack looked so tired and sad that Alex was alarmed for him.

Jack repeated the definition of misidentification syndrome and continued, "Whitset's records say that he reported his schoolteacher turned into plastic before he killed her. He said she was a plastic person, an imposter, as he referred to them, and he had to kill her because his voices told him to. The forensic psychiatrist thinks that is why Whitset tried to destroy and eradicate the faces of Angie, Monique, and Mrs. Smithson. The shrink thinks Whitset saw them as plastic people. Apparently, he believed that his job was to kill imposters!"

Noting the confusion on the faces of his colleagues, Jack tried again, "In other words, Monique, Angie, and Mrs. Smithson turned to plastic in front of him. A delusion, I guess. Anyway, whenever Whitset got angry with them, they appeared plastic to him. They were physically, in his mind, the same people with plastic faces. They were the same people with the same behavior, but, Whitset, the wacko, considered them imposters and his enemies. Since his voices told him to destroy imposters, he went about his mission."

Alex felt sick to her stomach. "This is hideous, just grotesque. It sounds like the plot for a horror movie. I can't believe it happened here at Crescent City!"

Nadine nodded her head in agreement with Alex and said, "Yeah, it's a ghastly story. Isn't it ironic that it was Whitset who was actually the imposter? Do these types of patients usually commit rape, Jack?"

Jack shrugged his shoulders and said, "I don't know, Nadine. The state guy didn't say. There is no evidence to suggest they do. I forgot to ask, I was so appalled at the story. Anyway, Whitset did have an aberrant sexual history. There were several sexual situations when he was hospitalized, so I guess it's hard to say. We do know that Whitset raped people."

"I guess Whitset planted the evidence to try to implicate Jim McMurdie, didn't he?" Alex asked.

Jack answered affirmatively. "Yep, and almost got away with it too. I think he knew Monique was on to him. I think that's why he went after her. Just like Whitset's schoolteacher, Angie, and Mrs. Smithson, I suppose Monique turned to plastic and appeared as an imposter in Whitset's sick, whacked out mind." Jack's voice was sad and forlorn. "I hate crazies," he added.

There was a long silence as each of them considered Jack's story. It was a lot to take in and understand.

Finally, in a quavering voice, Alex asked, "Jack, do you have the results of my rape tests?"

The commander looked at her gently and said, "Yes, I do, Alex. The tests are inconclusive. Whitset was a non-secretor and..."

Alex felt her heart sink. Now I'll never know, she thought to herself.

Jack interrupted her thoughts and said, "However, the other tests were conclusive. The physician reported no evidence of penetration or any other physical evidence that would support an actual physical rape."

Alex felt optimistic for a moment, until Nadine's sharp voice interrupted her.

"You still encountered a psychological rape, so you'll have to be prepared to work through the trauma. The emotional piece is unchanged. You do understand that, don't you, Alex?"

Alex nodded and said, "Of course I do. Thank heavens that Josh Martin arrived when he did. I'll be thankful for that for the rest of my life." In her heart, Alex knew that she hadn't been raped by Whitset. For some reason, that gave her comfort, and she was ready to move on.

Robert took her hand and smiled at her.

Alex resisted the urge to jerk it away from him, not quite understanding why she was having such a negative reaction to Robert. He had been just great, wonderful to her in fact. What the hell was wrong with her?

Just at that moment, Mona appeared at the door, breathless, and said, "Commander, Commander, the nurse in neurosurgery is on the phone. She has news for you. The phone in here should ring in just a moment."

Jack jumped up and grabbed the conference phone.

Alex, Robert, and Nadine looked at him expectantly, hope on each of their faces.

Jack broke out into a gleeful laugh, saying, "I'll be right up." He turned to his friends, "She's awake, she's awake! She asked for me! I'll see you yo-yo's later."

Jack hugged Alex, Nadine, and Robert all at the same time and then literally danced out of Alex's conference room.

"Think he'll take the elevator?" Alex quipped.

"Nah," said Robert. "He'll run up the four flights of stairs! I'd better arrange for a crash cart by the elevator."

They all burst out laughing, all aware of Jack's elevator phobia. Life was good after all.

LATER THAT EVENING, Alex and Robert were finishing dinner at Café Dégas, one of Alex's favorite neighborhood restaurants. The mood had been light and joyful after the great news about Monique. Now, as Alex looked around the restaurant, she found herself a little depressed. Café Dégas had been Mitch's favorite restaurant and they had dined there often. Her thoughts returned to Mitch and how much she had loved him — or, at least, thought she had.

Robert leaned forward and asked in his deep, beautiful voice, "Why so pensive, Alex? We're having a wonderful time! We have so much to be thankful for."

Alex looked at him, smiled lightly, and said, "Yes, we do, but I need to tell you something, Robert."

Robert felt the walls crashing in. He knew it was his depression returning. "Yes," he said hesitantly, afraid of what she would say and knowing he didn't want to hear it.

"I'm going to Virginia for a few weeks. You know how I go back home for renewal. I need to see Dundee and ride her through the woods. I need some time away. I also need to check on Grand and Granddad."

"Yes, I know that," Robert said, his voice anxious, hoping that Alex would invite him as she had in February.

Alex knew what he was thinking, but she also knew she needed time alone. She continued, "I need some time to myself. So much has happened. I'd like to spend some time in friendly, familiar surroundings."

"I understand. I'll be here when you get back. You know that." His voice was low and gentle, his French accent subtle, refined, and cultured.

Alex was trying to choose her words carefully. She knew Robert loved her and she didn't want to hurt him any more than she had to.

She continued, "When I return from Virginia, I think I'm going to consider an opportunity in San Francisco. They're looking for an attorney to set up a legal department in a new managed care organization. I've gotten several letters from them and I..."

Robert felt like something was grabbing his heart. He looked at her sadly and said tenderly, "I understand, Alex. I want you to do what's best for you. I have always wanted that." His eyes were sad.

"I'm not planning to leave forever. I'm only going to take a sabbatical. Maybe a year or so, just to get this legal department up and running. I will come back to New Orleans. You know my grandfather would just die if I moved to San Francisco permanently. He's half dead now because I'm living here."

Robert nodded and smiled. "Yes, I know. I am well aware," Robert said, trying to make light of the situation.

"Anyway, he's convinced it's past time for California to fall into the ocean. It's just that... I need time to think things out and recover from this year. So much has happened..." Her voice faltered.

"You don't need to explain, Alex. I know you need time. I'll be here when you get back. I'll take care of things here — Monique and Jack, and the like. And I'll clean this place up while you're gone. I'll be sure Farve is gone when you return and will work hard on getting Montgomery out of here too." Robert's voice was strong.

"Thank you, Robert. Thank you for loving me enough to let me go." She looked at him sadly.

"I do, Al, and I will." He leaned across the table and gently kissed her. In his heart, he believed he had lost her. But he could still hope, right? He could wait for her forever... and then some.

JACK FRANÇOISE SAT back in the recliner in his office on Royal Street, his door shut against the noise of the bullpen, his eyes closed tightly as they oozed silent tears. He had been motionless for hours, battling emotions he never knew he had. For the first time in his life, Jack felt hopeless, useless, and drained of everything that was good in life.

He had returned from CCMC late in the afternoon where Monique, who had been doing well since she had awakened several days ago, had once again lapsed into a deep coma. Her neurosurgeon was an asshole and was not hopeful that she would awaken again. Of course, the jackass doctor had never thought she would wake up to begin with. Robert encouraged Jack to be hopeful, but of course, Robert was of no use because he was devastated over Alex's plans to leave CCMC for a year in San Francisco, pending Don's approval of course. Robert viewed her exodus as a direct rejection of him and their future. Unfortunately, his therapist was in a coma and unable to help. Things really suck around here, Jack thought to himself.

To make matters worse, his nemesis, the mayor had called the commander to City Hall and berated him for not finding the killer of Senator Beau LaMont and DNC Hayes Hunter. Jack figured the governor was giving the mayor grief and since shit flowed downward, it was now his turn. The mayor didn't give a damn about the two kids who had been murdered on the same day. What a surprise! Jack knew that Dr. Madeline Jeanfreau had connected the political killings with the murder of the kids, but he hadn't had time to meet with her to examine the evidence. There was never enough time and never enough energy to get things done.

Jack sighed to himself as the tears began to cease. He felt his weariness subside and despondency decrease. Tomorrow was another day. Hopefully, it would be a better day. Perhaps, Monique would squeeze his hand, and he could focus once again on finding St. Germaine.

After a short nap, Jack took a deep breath, rose from his recliner, swung open his office door, and roared greetings to his nightshift. They rallied around him in support. The NOPD of the 8th Police District loved and respected their leader. Jack felt his vigor and energy return. He would make it and so would Monique, Alex, and Robert. He was confident again. Life was good.

Zoe knows the secrets, now they're coming for her.

The enemy will stop at nothing to get to Zoe and the military secrets that could change everything. What Zoe knows is getting people killed. Is she next?

Gage is a hardened Marine special forces operative with only one soft spot: Zoe.

Her desperate screams echoing from inside her home switch his instincts from lover to guardian. To keep America safe, to protect the love of his life, Gage is coming full throttle.

USA Today Bestselling author Fiona Quinn will take you on a thrill ride, weaving an intricate plot that puts Zoe's scientific mind and Gage's battle-hardened skills to the test. With the safety of the US at stake.

Zoe twisted her body into a new position under her blankets. Tugging the covers up under her chin, she desperately wished for sleep to overtake her anxious, over caffeinated mind. She squinted at the clock readout glowing from her bedside table, calculating. It had been forty-two hours since she'd last closed her eyes. And even that had been a nightmare-driven sleep, leaving her worse off than when she'd gone to bed.

That night, her flip-flopping and moaning had propelled Gage from her side. He'd stomped across her room, pulled on his pants, and headed home to “actually get a little shut-eye.” She hadn't heard from him since. Zoe rolled over to punch at her pillow, trying to find a restful position to curl her body.

He didn't answer my text.

Her friends had warned Zoe about seeing a new guy just as she'd signed contracts to start a lab project, especially one this big and this time sensitive. But first off, Zoe didn't like to be told what to do. And second? Gage was a Marine Raider, an elite special operator, with a highly capable warrior's body. Why shouldn't she have a little indulgent pleasure to balance out the stresses of her day? Days. She hadn't slept for days.

Metal on metal, a scrape sounded at Zoe's front door, followed by the slow moan of uncoiled hinges. A smile curved her lips as she imagined Gage sauntering in to her apartment to answer her request for some stress relief.

Good. This is exactly what I need.

She sat up, regretting having pulled on Gage's sweats to wear to bed. She flipped her covers to the side. It would be nicer if he found her in something lacy...or maybe nothing at all. Zoe gathered the hem of the black hoodie to tug it off, but whispers from the living room stilled her hands. More than one set of heavily booted footsteps stole over the wooden floor, followed by the scratch of a drawer sliding open.

Zoe froze. Her mind was on fast forward, but the joints of her body held tight, as if rusted and ineffectual. Her brain screamed at her arms and legs to move, to grab a weapon, to hide. Something. Anything.

As she cowered there, her ears worked to dissect the moth-like movements down the hall. She registered the sound of each leaf of paper as it was lifted and rejected. She had a good idea why someone had broken into her condo. Her liaison, Colonel Guthrie from DARPA—the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, the R and D arm of the US military—had warned her to take extra security precautions, but she had scoffed at the idea. Few people actually knew what Zoe did for a living, and as long as she was tight-lipped, she thought she was safe. She was foolish, was more like it.

This could be an ordinary breaking and entering, she tried to reason. But her gut refused to be that naïve. Everyday robberies didn't happen on the twentieth floor in a secured high-rise. When the intruders were done sifting through her desk, surely they'd come and wrench answers from her. Zoe couldn't handle pain. She wasn't a hero. She'd tell them everything.

Straining against her fear-paralysis, Zoe slid off the bed. First her toes, then her knees found the rug. As she pushed and forced herself into action, her brain whirled, feeding her information. She knew that her limbic system was working hard to keep her alive. Though letting off the brake on her body's movements would go a far distance in helping her. Ironic that the system meant to save her was probably going to expose her instead. Her mind whirled with odd tidbits of information that she knew couldn't be random. Her brain was sifting through data it had accumulated in its twenty-eight years of life and was thrusting certain stories forward. Survival strategies.

The loudest message came from a book she had read about Nazi Germany. The Jews, in hiding, would gather all of their bed linens and turn the mattresses over so the Gestapo wouldn't feel the warmth from where their bodies had lain. Zoe eyed the crumpled linens on her queen-sized bed. She forced her arm to smooth the covers into place and shake the pillow so it looked like a sloppily made bed. She snagged her phone from the nightstand as she pulled her arm back to her side. The effort left her panting.

Her unyielding lungs had lost their elasticity. In the ninth grade, her friend, Hope McBride, stood in front of the class to give a speech and stopped breathing until she turned red, then blue, then passed out on the floor. That's how Zoe had learned the phrase anxiety induced syncope. The idea of passing out with intruders in her apartment was even scarier than her current panic, so Zoe worked to suck more air up her nostrils.

Hide. She had to hide. Zoe let gravity pull her the rest of the way to the floor. The sheepskin rug muffled the sound of her collapse. She rolled, tugging her body past the green dust ruffle until she lay under her bed. It was hide-and-seek 101—the very first place anyone would search. Her body iced at the thought.

Light waves, her brain whispered. That was how the intruders would become aware of her. Her body mass would stop the light from hitting the rear wall. Move. Move now! The best she could do was to swivel and align her hips with the far corner of the bed, letting her legs extend out the length of the wall; her torso stretched across the headboard. She glanced down at the phone clenched in her fingers and drew a blank on whom she should call for help. Someone from DARPA? The Pentagon? Zoe was learning to hate adrenaline. Thoughts refused to crystalize. Pulling up her recent calls, hoping for inspiration, she saw FBI Special Agent Damion Prescott's name and tapped out a text that read: SOS. She pressed send, then quickly squeezed the button to silence the ringer.

Zoe listened past her panting. The guest bedroom door scraped open. Then the bathroom. They were getting closer. Zoe toed the elastic at the ankle of Gage's sweat pants over her feet. She turtled her head and hands into the perspiration-soaked hoodie to hide her skin. The number 9-1-1 suddenly surfaced and floated to the top of her swirling thoughts. She dialed.

"9-1-1. Where is your emergency?"

Zoe wanted to jump through the phone and throttle the man for answering so loudly. "Shh. Listen." She managed to say just as her bedroom door snicked open. Zoe pushed the phone into the front pocket of the hoodie, hoping the dark fabric would hide the screen light. Her body was traitorously loud. Her pulse swished rhythmically in her ears. Her heart rate galloped. Her breath came in ragged gulps. Zoe knew they would hear her. And if they didn't hear her, they would surely smell her as her adrenal glands forced fear stench through her pores. The intruders would drag her out from under her bed. Then they would...

Before Zoe's brain formulated a prediction, a loose floorboard squeaked as someone moved into her room. The bedroom light clicked on and exasperated voices conferred. She heard someone move toward her closet and the whoosh of hangers being thrust aside. Zoe stopped breathing. A hand shot under her bed. Fingers splayed wide, it swished through the air before it pulled back out again.

As foreign words in deep male voices jumbled their syllables together, Zoe tried to pick out what language the men were speaking. There was a pause in the men's discussion, then in heavily accented English, "She isn't here. Her bed hasn't been slept in." He was on his cell phone. "Yes, okay... Be there in five."

The front door whined on its hinges. "Hey, Zoe. I'm here." The sexy grin in Gage's voice pried open Zoe's jaw and dragged a horrified scream up her throat.

GAGE

• • • •

Gage's reaction was instantaneous. Suddenly thrown back to his days in the Middle East when he'd be laughing in the streets with his buddies then shot at from behind, his survival instincts didn't need priming. He was on the starting block ready to jet into action. Gage raced down the hall.

A man in tactical gear with black face paint distorting his features filled Zoe's bedroom door. A long blade glinted in his hand. Without breaking stride, Gage's heel shot out to catch the guy's knee, forcing it backward. The intruder's arms flew up for balance. Gage slammed his fist into the tango's throat, crushing his windpipe.

As the hostile collapsed, Gage caught movement in the bedroom's far corner. An unsub, identically suited up, sprang toward the fight. Gage leapt over the dying man to get his feet clear of obstruction. The second tango depressed the button on his stun gun. Sparks crackled as he descended on Gage. Gage blocked the man's arm, twisting his body inward and exploding out in a back fist that broke the man's nose. Gage's boot settled on the man's stomach as he push-kicked him out of reach, driving the man into the highboy. The intruder's head whipped back with his momentum, cracking against the sharp edge of the wooden lip. Gage hurled himself forward, wrapped his fingers around the man's trachea and squeezed until the threat had been neutralized.

Gage pushed back, winded by the exertion. He scanned the room, then shot through the condo, scouring the place for any other intruders.

Returning to the bedroom, he reached under the bed and dragged Zoe out into the open. Her body was slack; her skin gray. He held shaking fingers to Zoe's carotid artery, muttering a prayer under his breath that he'd find a pulse. In the field, he never felt fear when he killed the enemy or saved a victim—the fear came when he thought he'd lost someone from his team, his family.

With the steady thrum of her heartbeat under his fingertips, Gage sucked a lungful of air through his nostrils and sent a cloud of stress back out past his lips. He slapped his fingers lightly against Zoe's cheek. "Zoe? Hey there, Zoe. Open your eyes."

Her mahogany hair shifted back and forth, the long strands tangling in her eyelashes as she roused from her faint. Suddenly, Zoe's lids opened wide with shock. She scrambled to her knees, fists raised protectively. "Gage?" she whispered, as if not trusting what was in front of her.

"It's me, Zoe. You're safe." His heart beat furiously against his ribs, pumping blood to his muscles, held at the ready. His face was contorted into the brutal scowl he wore into battles. He worked to relax his stance, to take the violence out of his eyes, so Zoe could feel secure.

Zoe's gaze shifted to the intruders in their heaps of wayward body parts. Gage watched her eyes lose their focus and roll back in her head. Her body seemed to melt. Clapping iron hands onto her arms, he lowered her onto the rug. "Zoe, it's going to be okay. You're safe." He put conviction into the words he hoped would bolster her, but his warning antennae buzzed. He didn't really know if she was safe or not. "Stay with me, Zoe. Come on. Deep breaths."

She nodded and sucked in a lungful of air. He focused on her body, sprawled limply in front of him. His hands swept methodically over every inch of her as he looked for blood or other signs of trauma. “Did they hurt you, Zoe? Did they touch you?” His mind tried to grasp why two armed men were in Zoe’s condo.

“No, I hid.” Her words rattled between chattering teeth.

Gage pushed to standing. He kicked the black military-issue bag lying near the bureau. Zip-ties, a prison hood, and a neatly folded field stretcher scattered across her floor. He kicked the bag again to reveal a plastic bag with syringes and a vial of transparent liquid. In one stride, he towered over the second man he had killed. He pulled his phone from his pocket and took a picture of the tango’s face, then one of his profile. Gage scrolled through his apps list and pulled up his fingerprint display. Using the hem of his shirt to cover the man’s hand, Gage rolled the guy’s thumb and index finger onto the screen.

“They were here to kidnap you?” Gage stooped to gather the same identification info from the guy lying in her the doorway. “Why would they want to do that?” Gage dipped his head as he checked the guy’s pulse, to be doubly sure that there was none.

“Kidnap?” Zoe tried to jump up, but fell forward onto all-fours, her stomach heaving.

Gage shoved his phone back in his pocket and wrapped his arm under her hips. He half-carried, half-dragged Zoe to the bathroom. As she hunkered over the toilet, sirens sounded in the distance. Zoe pulled her phone from her pocket and whispered, “Thank you. I can hear them coming.”

Gage read the numbers 9-1-1 on the screen before she tapped the red dot to disconnect, leaning with a moan back over the toilet bowl.

“It’s going to be all right.” Gage smoothed a hand over her hair and gathered the strands into a makeshift ponytail away from the bile Zoe was gagging out. “I’ve got you. You’re safe.”

Funny, but as many times as he’d said that out loud, his words held zero conviction. He had been through enough crap on his special ops missions that he’d learned to trust his instincts. And right now, every cell in his body said this was just the prelude.

Zoe tilted her head to the side and swiped the back of her wrist across her mouth. Her skin, which was normally sun-kissed tan, a gift of her Hawaiian ancestry, was still pale and clammy. Gage pulled off his jacket and tucked it around her. She plopped onto her bottom and pulled his jacket tightly about her shivering frame as she squirmed backward and hunkered against the bathroom wall like a hurt animal.

A fist hammered against her front door. “Police. Open up.”

Gage put a steady hand on Zoe to make sure she wasn’t going to keel over and smack her head into the tub, then made his way to the front door.

“Hands. Hands!” The officer shouted with his finger twitching near the trigger of his holstered gun. Gage laced his fingers, planted his hands on the top of his head, then took two slow paces back to give the officers space to move into the condo. Gage followed the gaze of the cop in front as it landed on the contorted leg of the dead man at the end of the hall. The cop rolled Gage and slammed him up against the wall. Gage’s hands flew out and smacked against the drywall to stop his nose from being crushed. A forearm pressed into his back and his feet were kicked to widen his stance. Nervous hands patted him down, yanking his knife from his waistband.

“Special Agent Damion Prescott, FBI.” Gage heard at the door. He wished he could turn his head to see, but the officer’s hand splayed across Gage’s scalp, fastening him in place with what felt like the officer’s full weight.

FBI? Gage’s mind went to the reasons why tonight could have possibly played out like it had, and all he could come up with was that the Zoe he thought he knew was not the real Zoe. She must be involved in some pretty deep shit. As the officers introduced themselves as responding to a 9-1-1 call for help, Gage let those thoughts float around in his head. Testing them out. He couldn't believe for a second that Zoe would do anything outside of the law. Nope. He wasn't buying it.

Prescott, judging from his institutional looking suit, moved past him to stick his head around the bathroom door. He swung his focus toward Gage. "Is she hurt?"

"She's in shock." Gage didn't move from his wide legged stance, his cheek crushed against the wall. "She needs an ambulance." He heard one of the officers in the front room call for a paramedic.

Prescott pushed farther into the apartment to stand in front of Zoe's room. "The apartment was searched and secured? Only two?"

"Yes, sir," Gage responded.

"Would you let him off the wall already?" Prescott asked the police.

When the officer released him, Gage gave himself a shake.

Prescott looked past him toward the officers, who had tripled in number since Gage had opened the door. "This is a case of national security. The Bureau will be along for the ride."

GAGE

Gage stood with his back against the cold surface of the fridge, his arms crossed over his broad chest. He was squeezed into the tiny kitchen with DCPD Detective Adamson and Special Agent Prescott. Both of them were asking questions and scribbling notes, even though their tape recorders sat on the counter beside him, digitally capturing every word out of his mouth.

“What can I say? I don’t know what’s going on. I got a text from Zoe saying she wanted me to come over. I finished up with work—”

“At Quantico? Is that your base?”

“Quantico for now, my unit is based out of Lejeune.” Gage scrubbed a hand down his face. “I grabbed a quick shower and drove up here to spend the night. When I walked through the door, Zoe was screaming her head off and some knife-wielding ops guy was lunging at me.”

“Ops? How do you know that?” Prescott asked.

“He was combat trained. It was his stance. His eyes. The way he held his weapon. The knife was held backward in his hand. Once you’ve been face to face with the real deal, it’s not hard to spot someone with advanced training.”

Prescott nodded.

“The only reason I prevailed was that I shocked the hell out of them when I walked through the door.” He nodded his head in the direction of the dead men. “They came ready to restrain a sleeping female, give her a shot, and wait the twenty minutes or so for efficacy in order to do whatever the hell they were sent to do. From their gear, I’d guess a snatch and drag.”

“Sent?” Adamson asked.

“It sure looked like a mission. Someone outside must have been running them.”

“Do you think they were US military?” Prescott asked.

Gage sent him a scowl. “We weren’t exactly exchanging phone numbers to hook up for a beer later. They didn’t say anything from the time I arrived on scene until they were neutralized.”

“So, Zoe screamed. You see two guys. You assumed they were there for criminal reasons, so you killed them.” Adamson skimmed a finger down his notes as he listed off the sequence, then looked up at Gage with raised eyebrows.

Gage closed his eyes then opened them in disbelief. “Serious?” he asked.

“They could have been playacting some kinky scene.” He tipped his head. “Is Zoe into that kind of thing?”

“She’s Ms. Kealoha to you,” Gage snarled as he pushed Adamson back against the counter and pinned him with a hard bone from his forearm against the detective’s windpipe. “Are you fucking kidding me right now?” he growled through clenched teeth.

Prescott stepped forward to lay a hand on Gage’s shoulder. “Hey, hey, hey. I apologize for the detective. Let’s cool the temperature down a bit.”

An EMT walked into view as he pulled a stretcher down the hall. When Gage moved toward Zoe, he heard Adamson snarl, “Don’t you ever apologize for me.”

“He just killed two men with his bare hands to save his girlfriend’s life. Do you really want to wrestle with that tiger while he’s in combat mode?”

Gage reached for Zoe’s hand and entwined his fingers with hers. She looked up at him; her beautiful obsidian eyes shining with horror. “I’m so sorry. I’m sorry,” she stuttered out.

Gage kissed the back of her hand. “I’m glad I was here for you. You’re safe now.” He tried to sooth her with the calm tone of his voice. He still didn’t believe this was the end, but those were the words that sprang from his lips. It physically hurt to see her so vulnerable. She shook violently under a space blanket that wrapped her body, keeping her shocked system from further collapse.

“We’ve got to get her to the hospital now, sir,” the EMT said.

Gage bent to brush a light kiss onto her cheek and released her hand. “I’m going to help the police, then I’ll come to be with you.” He looked at the EMT as they headed out the door. “Which hospital?”

“Inova Alexandria.”

“As soon as I can, Zoe, okay?”

• • • •

THE FORENSIC PHOTOGRAPHER had been in to document every inch of the crime scene. The medical examiner had collected the bodies and taken them to the morgue for identification. The police were finishing up, and Gage was given permission to pack a bag to take to Zoe.

As he moved to the bathroom, Gage kept his ears open for any stray intel being passed back and forth between the PD and the FBI. Just outside the door he heard Prescott cornering Adamson.

“Hey, if anyone from the media asks, it would be great if you all could seed some misinformation about the victim dying in the attack—keep the bad guys off her trail until she can be taken to a safe house for debrief.”

Prescott thought Zoe was in danger too. Enough that she warranted a safe house. His intuition wasn’t off.

“You want me to lie?” Adamson asked.

“Lie? No. That would be hard to backtrack. Just plant a seed. Say something like you need to contact the family, with a look of sorrow in your eyes.”

“Sorrow?”

“Yeah, dust off your acting skills.”

Both men moved, and Gage pulled a travel case from the bottom drawer of the cabinet. He filled it with Zoe’s toiletries and makeup, eyeliner and mascara, some tinted gloss. She liked the natural look. To him, she was effortlessly beautiful. And honestly, Gage couldn’t imagine that she cared enough about what others thought of her to go to any extensive effort.

He bent down to pick up her phone from where it lay on the bathmat, then pulled her purse forward to tuck it in the front pocket. A lanyard with two work identification badges lay exposed on the corner of her vanity. He lifted them to inspect the picture of Zoe in her lab coat. He’d never seen her dressed for work. It was a DARPA issued SCI biometric badge. His brows drew together. “Sensitive Compartmented Information, Zoe? Dr. Zoe Kealoha?” He flipped to the second ID, a tag for Montrim Industries. He examined her photo. Same gentle curve of her lips, same intelligent eyes framed with black plastic geek-girl glasses, same pristine white lab coat, hanging from her slender frame, same Dr. Zoe Kealoha printed beneath. “What the hell?”

Prescott leaned a shoulder against the bathroom door jamb. His gaze moved from the lanyard in Gage’s hand to look him squarely in the eye. “What are you thinking?”

Gage shoved the IDs into the purse and zipped it shut. “She needs her glasses.” Gage crowded past Prescott, moving to Zoe’s bedroom to retrieve her glasses from the top of the alarm clock where she always put them while she slept.

“Do you know what Dr. Kealoha does for our government?”

They were alone in her room. The techs were in the hall, snapping their cases shut. Gage focused over on him. “Not a fucking clue. She told me she was a lab tech.”

“Yeah, well it’s more like ‘she does tech in a lab.’”

“Do you know what she’s working on?” Gage had tried for nonchalance, but he knew his voice was colored a deep shade of pissed off. Six months together and he had no clue she held a doctorate or worked for the military. What else was she keeping from him?

“I know one of the projects she developed, because I’m field testing the prototype. But what she’s doing now? I’d say knowing that would give us some pretty big clues as to why someone wanted to take her for a ride tonight. I’d really like to find that out.”

You and me both, buddy.

• • • •

THE LAST OF THE LAW enforcement showed themselves out the front door, encouraging Gage to lock it behind them. Gage checked his phone for the time; it was nearing zero one hundred hours. The hospital probably wouldn’t let him slip in to see Zoe in the middle of the night. He rubbed his index finger back and forth over his chin. Surely, she would have called him if she’d been released. He did a quick search for the hospital number, and dialed. He had little hope of gathering any information because of HIPAA restrictions. But the nurse who answered said that he was listed on Zoe’s advanced directives’ form on file. While he waited to talk to Zoe’s nurse, he wondered when Zoe had filled out those forms. How long had she thought that he was one of the people she could rely on to make a health decision if she was incapable? That thought just about winded him. If any other woman he had dated had been so presumptuous, without even a discussion—yeah, he wasn’t really into taking on a burden like that for them. But for Zoe? It felt like a victory of sorts. He’d need to take those thoughts on a long jog after this mess settled down a bit.

“Gage Harrison?” A female voice spoke past the background noise of metal on metal and low-pitched conversations.

“Yes, ma’am.”

“Dr. Kealoha was admitted for shock and exhaustion. We were having trouble getting her vitals regulated, so she accepted sedation. will reassess in the morning.”

“She’s sleeping now?”

“We have her in room 606 with an IV running, so we can adjust her meds as needed. She’s resting comfortably.”

He remembered how vulnerable she looked on the gurney. How fragile. “Can I come and sit with her?”

“We have an open visitation policy. But between the hours of 9 pm and 5 am, you’ll need to show your ID and sign in for a visitor’s pass.”

His nerves iced. “And anyone can sign in during that time? Anyone can come see her?”

“Yes, sir.”

“You know that Dr. Kealoha was attacked, and that’s why she’s in the hospital, right? Is there anything that can be done to increase her security?”

“I’ll bring it to the security officers’ attention. We can restrict her nighttime visitation to you and Colonel Guthrie, who is also on her directives list. I’m not sure what can be done during regular visiting hours, but I’ll ask.”

“Thank you.”

After tapping a finger on the screen to end the call, Gage opened his gallery to take a good hard look at the pictures he’d snapped of the men who had come after Zoe. Of all the questions asked and answered that night, the one that poked at him was whether these guys had been American. Prescott was insinuating that there might be a foreign group interested in Zoe, or maybe not Zoe as much as her research.

Gage scrolled through his contacts until he got to Titus Kane, a retired Marine Raider now functioning as a force commander for Iniquus. Iniquus was an entity who signed both private and public security contracts with deep-pocketed sources. They often served as intermediaries when the governmental alphabets weren’t playing nice in the same toy box. Iniquus was free to cut through the red tape and push the envelope on what constituted the letter of the law to take down bad guys, especially in politically delicate areas of the world. With Titus’s encouragement, Gage had recently interviewed for a job with them. Iniquus had a sterling reputation, and they treated their operatives with respect and provided them with ample resources to get their jobs done. Gage still had another month to decide whether or not to re-up with Uncle Sam. But for now, it was those resources that Gage had his focus on.

“Do you ever sleep, man?” Gage leaned his head back against the wall and closed his eyes.

“Just drinking my morning joe. I’m on graveyard tonight. What’s up?”

Gage quickly briefed Titus on the evening’s events, which was followed by a long pause before Titus said, “Glad she’s okay, man. You followed protocol and took photos and fingerprint ID?”

“Affirmative. The tangos were painted, so it’s hard to see the planes of the face. The ear pics are pretty clear. I was hoping you’d give the data a whirl through your search engines. See if you couldn’t pop up an ID.”

“Roger that. Send them through. I’ll get on it before I punch the clock.”

“Thanks, man.”

“Sempre Fi, brother.”

Okay, that’s good. That’s a step in a forward direction. He needed to take another step and another and another until he figured out who had gone after Zoe and how to keep her safe. He was up and pacing. He felt caged in and wanted to be out beating the bushes for whoever pushed the buttons to make those tangos jump. He’d learned the hard way on his very first deployment, you had to chop the head off the snake to kill it.

Gage ran through the hospital conversation again. Who was this Colonel Guthrie to Zoe? Why was he on her advanced directives list? Was he someone from DARPA? Gage knew a guy named Colonel Stan Guthrie, his unit had run parallel ops on occasion with his. He liked the guy; they got along just fine. He moved to the counter, dragged Zoe’s purse over, and fished out her phone. After swiping the code onto the screen to access her contacts, he looked up Guthrie.

Gage examined the icon next to the Colonel’s name. Same guy. He wondered if the hospital had gotten in touch with him, and if he knew what was going on. Gage considered calling, but then, he didn’t know what kind of relationship the colonel and Zoe had.

Zoe and Gage had never had the “exclusivity” discussion, but he had been monogamous with her. Since he met Zoe, all other women had fallen off his radar. Of course, his decision making wasn’t necessarily Zoe's decision making. Gage typed the Colonel's address into Google Maps. He wanted to look Guthrie in the eye when he told him about Zoe's attack, get some kind of read on what their relationship was all about.

What the hell else am I going to find out about you tonight, Zoe?

GAGE

“Hooah, son. It’s a might late to be ringing folks’ doorbells, don’t you think?”

Colonel Guthrie was dressed in blue striped pajamas and a plush robe that he held tight against the December cold.

“I’m sorry to disturb you, sir, I’m here because of Zoe Kealoha.”

“Zoe?” The Colonel scanned over Gage’s shoulder at Gage’s car parked by the sidewalk light. “Come on in, Marine.” He stepped back from the door, and Gage moved into the dimly lit craftsman-style home.

Gage shot a look up the stairs.

“You didn’t wake the wife. She’s off visiting her sister. I was just about to have a finger of scotch to settle me in for the night. Can I pour you a tumbler?”

“Thank you, sir, but no.”

Gage stood in the middle of an oriental rug as the colonel moved to a side table crowded with lead crystal decanters. “It’s nigh on zero dark thirty. I’m sure you showing up at this hour means bad things for Zoe.” Guthrie moved over so they were standing side by side and eye to eye, both just over six feet tall. “Let’s have it.”

“Sir, may I ask how you know Zoe? Do you work together?”

“I recommended her for her current position. At DARPA, I’m her direct supervisor. Her dad and I were in boot camp together. He was smart and got out once he scratched twenty years onto his belt. Every time my contract comes up, I get bitten by the same damned bug and sign up for another round.” He took a swig from his glass. “When Hani Kealoha and his wife were headed back to the islands to retire, he asked me to keep an eye on Zoe for them, be there if she needed me.” The colonel’s face grew stern. “You’re here, and she’s not, so what’s going on? And how did you come by my name as having a connection with Zoe?”

Gage gave him a sanitized version of the night and concluded with, “Both of our names are on her hospital directives, sir. I got your address from her phone. She’s being treated for emotional shock after the break-in. She’s also suffering from exhaustion from lack of sleep. I thought it would be best if I came by in person on my way to the hospital.”

The colonel knocked back the rest of his scotch. “Not hurt though, you say? Just nerves and exhaustion?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Good. That would be one hell of a phone call to her parents.”

The front window lit up as a car pulled up on the front lawn and parked kitty-corner in the grass. “What in the hell?” The colonel moved to throw the front door wide. He stood with his lips pushed into a tight pucker. Gage could hear a car door open.

“Chuck, you son of a bitch. What the hell are you doing on my lawn, you drunken shit-for-brains?”

A man in a grey suit staggered toward the front door. The colonel glanced back toward Gage and scowled. “Son...” His head swung back to the drunk staggering up the stairs. “God damn it.”

Gage got the message. “Would you mind if I helped myself to a glass of water in your kitchen?”

Colonel Guthrie reached out and thumped Gage's shoulder. Gage moved toward the back of the house where he expected the kitchen would be. His ears pinged when he heard the colonel say, "Senator, you're going to get arrested for DUI, and you don't need that kind of publicity."

"She's dead," the senator sobbed.

"Who, Barbara? Shit, Chuck, come on. Let's sit down before you fall down."

"Not Barbara. I told you... Oh my God, I loved her. I really loved her."

"You mean—? Oh, holy hell."

"I stopped by a pub for a beer and a steak. I'm looking up at the news, and there's her picture. They said she's dead." A long pause was punctuated with a groan. "I have hearings in the morning. She was my main researcher. Somehow, I have to sit there and face the day without letting anyone know how much she meant to me. I won't be allowed to grieve. We went over all of those notes together. How can I look at my notes without remembering her beautiful black eyes? How silky her hair felt as she let it paint over my stomach?"

"All right, stop. Facts. You were having an affair with your researcher, she died tonight—"

"Her picture was on the news," the senator slurred out. "They're saying it's under investigation. They'll find out that she worked for Montrim Industries, and that she was a whistleblower. They'll dig deeper, and they'll figure out we were lovers. My wife is going to know. My career in politics is over. Over. Just as I was primed to stop Montrim."

Gage was prowling the kitchen. The senator had said three things that made him think that this was about Zoe—the woman had black eyes, she worked for Montrim, she did research. There was also that conversation between the FBI and DCPD where a misunderstanding was supposed to be seeded about Zoe's possible death. Had the reporters run with that idea? Had they reported it as a suspicious death? Or was Gage overreaching because everything for him revolved around Zoe right then?

"Chuck, listen to me, you have to lay low, let this storm pass—give the Montrim fight to someone else."

Gage moved on silent feet into the hall and was now plastered against the wall leading to the living room so he could hear better.

"I have to go after them!" the senator roared. "They're playing with apocalyptic weapons of war. Look at the experiments they're doing with weaponized sound waves."

"Ah, but it's better than nuclear, isn't it?" the colonel asked calmly, reasonably. "You need to let this crusade against Montrim go. Think what they're doing for us. If we had that sound technology, we could wipe out the enemy and leave their infrastructure unscathed. And there would be no lasting residual effects on the environment. Think of the soldiers' lives that would be saved." Colonel Guthrie was talking logically, which Gage thought was a waste of breath. "Sure, the area would have to be repopulated from the bugs, to the animals, to the humans. But it is so much better for the world than nuclear. In this day and age? You can't not have a deterrent." Guthrie stopped and laughed, a thin, forced laugh. "Listen to me trying to reason with a drunk. Chuck, let's talk about this when you've got your wits about you."

"We tried it already with the nukes and where did that get us?" the senator asked dolefully.

"The sound deterrent is formidable and one of the best weapons possible to create a post-nuclear world. There would be no nuclear showdown. We'd simply deploy the sound waves before they pushed their buttons."

What in the hell are they talking about? Could Zoe be working on apocalyptic weaponry? As gentle as her soul always seemed to him, that...that was a mind blower.

“See? Saying it that way, you’ve convinced yourself, and you can convince others, that it’s benign. Simply wipe everyone out of a certain area, and we can move in. But you’re talking about every living thing. Women, children, infants in arms. Genocide. And it’s so much easier to make the decision to use sound weaponry over nukes because we wouldn’t have the ongoing radioactive consequences. Thereby making it more likely that it will be used.”

The colonel’s voice came from over in the corner where he had poured his drink earlier. Gage could hear a glass stopper being pulled from the neck of a decanter. “Okay, devil’s advocate here. If we don’t get there first with the research, someone else will, and we’ll have no defense against this thing. Are you willing to let China get their hands on this technology first?” There was a pause in which Gage imagined the colonel belting back his drink. “Senator, why are you screwing up my lawn in the middle of the fucking night?”

“I need you. I need you to come and testify at those hearings.”

“Senator, honestly, I’ve told you. I will not testify against Montrim. I’m not ready to retire yet. And me going up against the defense contractors? I’m not suicidal. Look, it’s almost two in the morning, you’re sloshed. Why are you here?”

“Please, Stan, I’m drunk. I’m sick with grief. I can’t face my wife tonight. Can I stay?”

The colonel released an exasperated sigh. “The guest room is up the stairs, second right.”

Gage moved back into the kitchen, yanking his earbuds out of his pocket and sticking them into his ears. By the time the senator was climbing the stairs and Colonel Guthrie had made his way to the back of the house, Gage stood at the kitchen door, looking out on the manicured garden with his head gently bobbing as if to a good tune.

“Sorry for the interruption. What were we saying?”

Gage pulled the buds from his ears. “Did your friend leave?”

Gage nodded as he stepped forward, his hand extended to shake with the colonel’s. “Okay, I’m on my way to the hospital. You have company, so I’ll call you if anything concerning comes up.”

“Thanks, Marine, I’d appreciate that.” Colonel Guthrie shook Gage’s hand, then he moved to a shelf and picked out a card from a small stack. “This one has my private number on the back.” He handed it over then tapped it when Gage had it in his fingers. “It will get me on the phone instead of an answering service. Use that if you need me.”

Gage moved through the front door, down the steps, and over to the senator’s car. As the senator had made his way to the house, he’d left the car door standing open. A wallet lay on the ground. Gage picked it up and gave it a quick onceover. He reached into the slit meant for business cards and pulled them out, turning them over and fanning through the stack until he found three where “private cell” was handwritten on the back along with a number. If he ever needed to ask the senator a question, Gage didn’t want to be last in queue on some aide’s list of people to ignore that day. Gage pocketed one of them, slipped the rest in place, then put the wallet on the floorboard. He pulled the keys from the ignition, set them next to the wallet, and quietly closed the senator’s door.

Gage climbed back into his SUV, feeling like he was waiting for a grenade to explode.

GAGE

There were no cars on the highway as Gage drove to Inova Alexandria Hospital and parked in the garage. The closer he got to Zoe, the louder his danger signals pinged. He met with the security guard at the front desk and was relieved that the guy did a thorough job with the identification process.

“Has anyone else been in to see her?” Gage asked.

“Not so far, sir.” The guard passed him back his military ID and driver’s license.

Gage gathered his things and made his way to Zoe’s room, nodding at the desk nurse as he passed by. Standing by Zoe’s bed, the room dark except for a dim utility light, Gage’s gaze followed the tubing from the IV bag down to her elbow. She had curved into a ball around her pillow, her long hair fanned across the white sheet, her face peaceful and still. He put a hand on her back to feel the reassuring rise and fall of her breathing.

Gage swallowed down the bitter taste that sat on his tongue. He didn’t know what to think. He scanned the room, then moved to a chair in the far corner. Pulling out his phone, then sliding down to rest his head on the back of the seat, he splayed his long legs out in front of him. He’d learned how to relax and rest his body whenever possible to recharge for the next battle. And Gage knew in his gut that there were more battles to come.

He checked to see if anything had come through from Titus. There was nada. Next on his list was finding out who the senator was talking about when he said his lover had died. He started with local News Nine and on their website’s front page was a picture of Lily Winters, Zoe’s college friend who had stayed with Zoe while she left a bad marriage and found a place of her own. Lily had moved out of Zoe’s apartment...what? Maybe three weeks before?

The news reported that Lily Winters had fallen onto the Metro platform without enough time for anyone to jump to her aid. Gage hit the arrow to watch the video that came with a “Sensitive Subject Matter” warning label. The sound of a reggae band loudly playing the steelpans came to an abrupt halt when a scream went up. Someone had recorded Lily lying on the tracks, looking like she was unable to move. Adrenaline? Drugs? Alcohol? Gage registered fear in her wide-open eyes and raised brow, so he put an x over the second two options. The crowd was yelling for her to get up, to hurry, as they looked down to where she lay beneath them.

As the light of the subway powered forward, their cries became a horrified mantra, like a choir they sang in unison, “Stop! Stop!” They leaned together out into the open space, waving their arms frantically to signal the engineer to apply the emergency brakes. It must have worked, because the subway seemed to slam to a halt. The video panned back to Lily, who had managed to get herself up on her feet. She stretched her hands toward the men who would pull her to safety. She took a single step forward. The video bounced up, missing the last moment as the subway hit Lily and came to a stop a mere two or three feet further down the track. Screaming could be heard from the platform, anguished cries of disbelief.

Lily was dead. Shit. Gage wiped his hand over his face. He didn’t really know her but from brushing by her in Zoe’s hallway or grabbing a quick breakfast before he took off for Quantico. She seemed like a nice person. Intelligent. Sarcastic with a bawdy laugh. He seemed to remember that she worked as an accountant. Had she said she worked for Montrim? He didn't think so. Gage glanced over to where Zoe's unmoving body lay under the hospital sheet and cotton blanket. He was going to have to tell Zoe about her friend before she heard about it online. Zoe was still in recovery from her own shocking experience and now here was another one for her to assimilate.

Gage did another search and decided that Lily's death was the only one that was being reported locally that night. Lily must be the Senator's mistress and the whistleblower. Maybe. Gage realized he was jumping to conclusions.

If Lily was the mistress, then she must have been trying to help the senator take down her employer. If the employer was Montrim Industries, well, that was a major player in the vast military complex that Eisenhower had warned the country about over fifty years ago.

Zoe worked for Montrim. Or at least, she had an access badge. He wasn't clear who exactly Zoe worked for. He looked at the time stamp on the subway video, twenty-three twenty hours. Only an hour and a half after he'd opened Zoe's door and neutralized the tangos. Was it possible the intruders weren't after Zoe at all? Maybe they had been tasked with taking Lily captive. She had been living in that apartment up until recently. Someone could be working from old intel.

Gage wanted some answers. How did Lily land on that subway rail? Why couldn't she move to get up? Was she really the woman who was sleeping with Senator Chuck Billings? Or was Gage pushing to put two and two together when that wasn't the equation at all? He'd know whether Lily was Billing's lover if he could get a look at her phone. Gage pulled the business cards he'd been collecting tonight from his pocket, wondering which one might be his ticket to some answers. He picked out the one for Special Agent Damion Prescott, moved into the hall so as not to disturb Zoe, and tapped in the number.

"Prescott here."

"Special Agent? This is Gage Harrison. Have you got a minute?"

"Where are you?"

"Up at the hospital. Zoe's been admitted for shock and exhaustion. She's asleep right now."

"I appreciate the update."

"Sir, I'm wondering if we couldn't give each other a helping hand." Gage scrubbed his fingers over his eyes.

There was a pause. "How's that?"

"I came by some information that might be helpful. A correlation that you might not turn up on your own. But there's something I need in return."

"Withholding information on an ongoing case is a serious problem, Major." Prescott's voice was shaded a bright color of "don't fuck with me."

"There's a woman in the Alexandria, Virginia morgue who may have a connection to the case. I'll be happy to explain that connection if you can help me get a look at her phone. I want to see who she's been calling."

"When was she taken in?"

"Around midnight."

"Tonight? Is this Lily Winters and the Metro rail accident?"

"Yeah, I'm not convinced it was an accident as much as an on purpose."

"Huh. And you think this is connected to the Zoe Kealoha attack?"

"I'd have to let you draw your own conclusions, sir. But yes, that's what I think. Is it possible to meet me down at the medical examiner's office? I need to be back to the hospital by zero five hundred hours."

“Because?”

“That’s when the guard at the front desk loses his ability to keep Zoe’s room free from bad guys.”

“Got you. Lily Winters was hit by a subway. Her body’s going to be crushed. Exactly what information do you think you’re going to get from seeing her?”

“My understanding, sir, is that any personal effects that belong to the deceased are gathered up and taken with the body to the morgue. Isn’t that the case?”

“Yes, if they find something.”

Gage leaned into the wall as a janitor pushed a bucket on by. “My theory can be proven, if I can see her phone.”

“If her phone was with her, it’s bound to be destroyed. What do you think’s on it?”

“Corroboration of a connection that I’m trying to make for you.” Gage was growing impatient with this back and forth.

“The Medical Examiner’s Office doesn’t open until eight. Chances are good that we won’t get anywhere until then. But I get that your window is tight. We can take a run at it. Worst case, they turn us away. Or the phone isn’t functional.” Prescott paused. “But whatever the outcome, you’re going to make the connection for me.”

“Agreed.”

It was a long shot. But at least he’d squeezed the trigger. Now Gage needed to wait and see if he got a bull’s eye.

• • • •

Gage's footsteps echoed off the cement ramp as he jogged toward his car. He didn't have time to play around. Zero five hundred hours was moving up fast. His tires squealed as he took the corners to the exit at speeds not intended for a hospital parking garage. Without having to dodge traffic, and by playing fast and loose with the red lights, he was parked and climbing the stairs just behind Prescott.

Prescott flashed his badge and the security guard pushed the door wide.

"We don't open 'til eight, sir."

"I'm working with Homicide Detective Kirk Browning on a case of national importance. It's time sensitive. I just need a quick answer from the medical examiner, and then I'll be out of your hair."

The guard gestured toward the sign-in book and gave Gage the stink eye while Prescott scrawled illegibly over the line. Without asking for directions, the special agent stalked toward the elevator, obviously familiar with the building. "We'll go in together, and you're going to keep your mouth shut. I'll do all the talking. Got it?"

"Yes, sir."

The elevator pinged; there was a heavy thud, then the doors hesitated for an overlong pause before they squealed open. Prescott put his hand out, letting Gage walk in first. "The phone holds the key?" Prescott asked after the doors shut again. "How are you going to access it?"

"Lily Winters and Zoe Kealoha were friends—"

Prescott let out a low whistle. "No kidding? Huh."

"I've seen Lily unlock her phone before. If she didn't change her code, I should be able to get us access."

"There's more to that story than Zoe and Lily are besties."

"Not besties. Friends. But yes, I'll tell you more after I see the phone and can confirm what I think I know."

The doors slid open and Prescott gestured to the right. They walked down the empty hall to a double door where Prescott punched a button that buzzed an alarm. He took out his FBI badge and held it close to his face as he looked into the camera above the doors. They were beeped through.

"Dr. Tooker, good to see you again. Looks like I woke you up. I'm sorry." Prescott grinned and held out his arms to give the woman a hug.

It was the sour faced woman with tightly permed hair who had collected the bodies at Zoe's condo. Gage had seen her from where he'd sat on the guest room bed, out of the way. She squinted her eyes at them and grunted.

Prescott let his arms fall as Dr. Tooker made her way to the light switches and flipped them all on. "We open at eight. How'd you get past the security guard?"

"Charm." Prescott dipped his head sheepishly. "I know this is unconventional, Mandy, but I'm on a case that's time sensitive. Someone's life could well rely on my getting answers fast. I'm depending on your goodwill to help me out."

"Goodwill at three a.m. is going to be hard to come by. What exactly do you need? I put your guys in the fridge and that's about it. Autopsies in the morning."

“I’m interested in the Lily Winters case. Is her autopsy scheduled too?”

“She’ll be number three in line. Her body’s not in good shape. I’m not sure what you expect to get from seeing her.”

“Did she come in with personal effects?” the special agent pressed.

Dr. Tooker moved toward the refrigeration unit, and pulled open a drawer with a black body bag. “I found her purse beside the tracks. She must have dropped it as she fell in. The straps were cut off by the subway, and it’s filthy from getting dragged, but the bag itself is intact.”

“I need to see her phone,” Prescott said with a chummy smile.

Dr. Tooker rolled her eyes at him, then unzipped the body bag. Gage looked down at Lily’s corpse and didn’t recognize her. He barely recognized her as having human form. He wondered if she had committed suicide like the news reporter had suggested. It was a pretty gruesome way to go. He shook his head.

His mom died in a car accident when he was fourteen. That’s what the police called it, an accident. She was driving too fast while intoxicated and hit a tree without wearing a seat belt. She died on impact. Gage imagined that much like Lily’s body, his mom’s would have been equally gruesome.

Of course, what the officers didn’t know was it hadn’t been an accident at all. When he had come home from school, he had found two notes side by side. One was a note from his dad saying he’d found his true love and had left them. “Left her” is what it actually said. But the “them” was implied. The other note was his mom saying how she couldn’t live without his dad, so she’d decided to end it. Gage never told the officers about the notes. He’d ripped them up and flushed them down the toilet. With no family to call on, Gage was shipped off to a home for boys where he lived until he went to college.

Gage was glad that Lily—whether this was suicide, a terrible accident, or something darker—didn’t have children left to wonder if their mother had known they’d loved her. Or the even bigger question—why she had decided to leave them. Gage knew why his dad left; he was an asshole. To be honest, Gage had been happy when he read his note saying he was gone. But his mom? That one haunted him.

The medical examiner turned and handed out nitrile gloves, which they pulled on, then she moved the purse to a stainless-steel tray. The phone was nestled in the inside zippered pocket. Dead.

“No battery,” Dr. Tooker said and raised her brow.

“iPhone. You don’t happen to have a charger, do you, Mandy?”

Dr. Tooker moved toward her desk and unplugged her phone. “Yes, if it’ll get you out of here sooner, and I can get some sleep.”

Gage’s gaze scanned over to where an unmade cot stood in the corner. Obviously there for the medical examiners who were on night duty.

As soon as the phone blinked to life, Gage unlocked it and moved quickly to Lily’s list of recent calls. As he scrolled through the screen, Prescott and Gage each took photos with their own phones.

“Hey, who is this guy with you?” Dr. Tooker asked.

Prescott didn’t look up from their task. “Some random homeless dude I found on the sidewalk. I told him if he could wait a few minutes, I’d buy him some breakfast. You know I have a heart of gold and can’t stand to see my fellow man suffering.”

Dr. Tooker snorted. Her phone buzzed, and she moved to answer it. Gage scrolled back through the last month of numbers before he moved to messages and did the same. Either Lily deleted her texts on a regular basis or she just didn’t like to text, she didn’t have much there for him to record. Most of the names looked like family members.

“Okay, Damion, that was a call about a traffic fatality. I need to head out, so we need to zip Lily Winters and her things back up.” She moved over to them and took the phone away, pulling her cord from the bottom. “It’s time for you all to leave. If you need anything more, you can show up during regular hours.” Dr. Tooker put the purse back with Lily’s remains.

Prescott leaned in to Gage. “You get what you need?”

“Not sure.”

“It’ll have to do.” Prescott put his hand on Dr. Tooker’s back as she pushed the drawer in place. “Mandy, thank you as always. I owe you a drink. A stiff one.” He added with a wink.

Dr. Tooker snorted. “Funny.” Then she grabbed her keys and pushed the two men through the door.

Dr. Tooker turned right. They turned left to move back to the elevator, and out the front door. As they reached the street, Prescott broke the silence. “You still have time before five. Let’s grab a quick cup of joe. You must be dragging ass.”

He was tired, but Gage had been trained to fight for days and nights on end, through pain and exhaustion. He had to admit, this was a different kind of tired. It wasn’t physical as much as emotional. This whole experience was eye-opening. He hadn’t realized how much Zoe meant to him. How invested he felt in her well-being. Even though he didn’t seem to have even a basic grasp on who she was, right now he’d move mountains to keep her safe. Gage looked up the street toward an all-night diner and nodded his head in that direction. With their hands pushed deep into their pockets and their heads tucked into their collars, the two men moved through the early morning chill.

Inside, Gage ordered a tall coffee to go. Black. Prescott lifted a brow, and then ordered the same. “Anxious to get back?”

“Yes, sir.”

“You’re worried about her safety. And you should be. Until we can get a better feel for what’s going on, the FBI considers Zoe to be in imminent danger. I’m working on arrangements for a safe house for her. I need you to call me as soon as she’s getting ready for discharge.”

Gage accepted the thick paper cup from the waitress and reached for his wallet.

Prescott put his hand on Gage’s arm to indicate that he’d get the bill. “Zoe’s wearing a wedding ring, and you’re one of two people on her hospital list. To some eyes, it might look like you’re married.” Prescott pulled a ten-dollar bill from his wallet and exchanged it with the server for his to-go cup. “Who’s she really married to?”

“She’s not. Guys think that an attractive woman on her own is an opportunity. Zoe hates it when strangers talk to her. She wears the ring as a deterrent. If they bug her anyway, she tells them her husband’s a Marine Raider. That usually does the trick.”

Prescott put his loose change in the tip jar and put the bills in his wallet. Nodding at the door, they made their way back out to the street. “Does that bother you? Zoe insinuating that you’re married?”

“I don’t think she’s ever insinuated anything about me personally, I think my job gave her a title that sounded like muscle would be applied if anyone bothered her. And I can promise you, it would be.”

Prescott tipped his cup for a sip. “I can see that.” He stopped under a street light. “Did you find what you thought you would?”

“Yes, sir.” Gage put his coffee cup on the ground near his feet. He pulled out his phone and picked the image that had three calls to a single number unidentified by name or icon just hours before her death. He reached in his pocket and pulled out a business card with “private cell” scrawled in blue ink.

Prescott’s gaze slid between the two. “Whose number is this?”

Gage flipped the card over to show the name Senator Charles Matthew Billings on the front. “I overheard a conversation, but I didn’t have a lot of context. You need to take this as a step above pure speculation.”

Gage picked up his coffee. “A couple of hours ago, Senator Billings told a friend of his that he was having an affair and that the woman died last night. She was his lead researcher for the Montrim Industries trial being held by the Senate oversight committee.”

“You said Lily and Zoe were friends and that this could have something to do with Zoe?”

Gage took a sip from his cup. “I’m not sure. I don’t want to run you in the wrong direction, because that might endanger Zoe.”

“Spit it out. We’ll use an abundance of caution with all our decision making.”

“Lily died not two hours after I neutralized the men in Zoe’s apartment.”

“Seems a hell of a coincidence. But I’m not sure—”

“Up until a few weeks ago, Lily was living with Zoe while she got her feet back under her following a divorce.”

“Lily lived with Zoe. Two thugs break in to that apartment. Lily dies shortly after. Crap. They might have been going after Lily, and Zoe happened to be there.”

Prescott’s phone buzzed. He slid it from his belt holster and stepped away from Gage. “Prescott here...I don’t care. We need this in place...well, jump over his head to someone who will authorize.” Prescott threw an exasperated arm in the air and let it land on his head. Pulling the phone back to his ear, he growled, “Do it.” He hung up, strode down the sidewalk then turned and stalked back to Gage. “The safe house wasn’t authorized. I’ll keep working on it. It shouldn’t take me long. Sometime later today probably. Can I depend on you to keep Zoe in your sights until then? Let me know if anyone else tries to contact her, or goes to see her?”

“Roger that.” Gage looked down at the time, zero four thirty five hours. “Shit. I’ve got to go.” With a backward wave, Gage jogged toward his car. He had to get back to Zoe. Now.

GAGE

No sooner had Gage found his place in the corner of Zoe's hospital room than the door pushed open. Gage was immediately moving to get between whoever this new player was and Zoe.

"CIA, son. Relax." The guy moved farther into the room. "The name's Parker." He yanked out his wallet-badge and flicked it open for Gage to see. Parker nodded toward Zoe's sleeping form. "She looks like she's getting some rest. Good. Good." He pulled a chair from one end of the room all the way over to place it directly beside the chair Gage had occupied seconds before. He patted Gage's chair. "Let's chat."

Gage crossed his arms over his chest to make his biceps bulge in an obvious display of physical capacity. He leaned his shoulder into the wall to let the agent know he wasn't going to be compliant. Something about this guy set off his warning signals. Could be, Gage acknowledged to himself, that he was primed to be combative from his night of adrenaline and confusion. He'd see how things progressed before he kicked the guy out on his ear. Right now, curiosity had the edge. He wanted to know why the CIA would be visiting Zoe before sunup.

"Hell of a shock, what happened tonight." Parker crossed his ankle over his knee and adjusted his trousers. "She's been working around the clock on her project. But you already know that, eh?"

Gage didn't answer.

"I understand from the DCPD, she's been diagnosed with exhaustion." There was a pause, and Gage could feel Parker gathering carefully selected words. "Sleep deprivation does terrible things to the brain. Makes people paranoid, creative about reality, overly emotional, poor girl."

Gage said nothing.

Parker cleared his throat. "Ironically, being exhausted also makes sleep come harder—nightmares and sleep talking are common. It's good that she's getting the meds she needs to get some rest." Parker crossed his arms casually. "You sleep over at her place much? Ever know her to have problems like that? Talking in her sleep?" He quirked a brow. "If so, we should let the doctor know so he can adjust her protocol."

Something in the studied ease in Parker's body made Gage shake his head. "Not that I know of. We don't really have that kind of a relationship."

"No? I thought you were the boyfriend." Parker canted his head, the look on his face saying he didn't believe Gage for a second.

"We see each other. I don't think I fall into the boyfriend category. She's pretty busy, and our schedules don't always mesh. I'm jumping between Lejeune and Quantico. She's up here in Alexandria."

"What do you know about her job? She must have told you something," Parker asked.

What did Gage know about her job? Well, he didn't know she was a damned Ph.D., that's for sure. She'd told him she worked in a lab. A "lab tech," she had called herself. But lab techs don't have doctorates, and they sure as hell don't have top secret clearance or the CIA and FBI buzzing around.

"She does something with robotics, I think. We really don't talk about our jobs," Gage replied.

Parker stood and gazed down at Zoe. "I bet you don't do a lot of talking about anything at all, eh?" He sent Gage an I've-got-your-number grin, and Gage wanted to slam his fist into the guy's jaw.

Parker moved back to his seat to answer a text, and Gage looked down at Zoe's drugged state.

Gage had lied to the CIA operatives. He was definitely Zoe's boyfriend. His mind jumped back to one of the last conversations he'd had with Zoe. He'd asked her a question about something random. She had been staring at the wall and pulled out of her trance to ask, "Do we have to talk?"

"No. Not if you don't want to." He'd chuckled at her candor.

"Good, thanks," she'd said as she opened her computer.

"You know, my friends think I'm the luckiest guy in the world."

She'd turned and raised her brow. "I don't know your friends." She didn't say it like a bitch. There was nothing bitchy about Zoe. Her voice had been pleasant and matter of fact. She saw the world through Zoe-colored glasses. Pragmatic. Non-judgmental. Clear about parameters. Hoping everyone would respect hers in return.

"They've seen your picture."

"All they could get from that is what I look like, right? That's kind of a shallow way to decide if you're lucky or not." She tipped her head and looked at him with curiosity. "Why were you showing them my picture?"

Gage smiled over at her. "Putting a face with a name. You know, their girlfriends want to talk to them constantly. Ask them how they feel about stuff."

Zoe's eyes turned thoughtful. "Communication is important to maintaining a healthy relationship."

Gage's smile turned into a grin. "That kind of sucks, since my girlfriend hates to talk."

"Girlfriend, huh?"

"Okay?"

She turned back to her computer. "I guess. Now can you leave me alone?"

That was Zoe in a nutshell. He got that Zoe spent a good part of her time in her head. He was sort of medium on the introversion continuum and liked the time he spent rattling around in his own brain.

At the time, he had been happy about his good fortune in finding a woman who put out zero in the way of couple-vibes or demands. There was no honey-do list or expectations. It was all just...fun. He enjoyed Zoe.

He had flopped back on the couch, thinking he really was a lucky guy. He found Zoe to be an odd mix of edgy and sweet, and it intrigued him. Now that Gage knew she was involved in something damned serious—possibly life threatening—he wished he'd asked more questions instead of just heading back to base when she'd had trouble sleeping. What had she been wrestling with? Did she know she was in trouble? He had thought that their relationship was comfortable and fun. But that had changed seven hours ago when he crushed some guy's windpipe to save her.

The doorknob turned, and Gage took advantage of the distraction to step back into the shadows. A head peeked around the doorframe.

"Grossman, good. What've you got?" Parker waved the guy in.

"Besides acid indigestion? I've got a deadline in my rearview mirror." He strode over to the bed. "How's she doing?" he asked Parker.

Parker raised his wrist to check the time. "She has another few hours before they let her wake up."

Grossman reached over to Zoe's IV and read the prescription label on the bag. "Good." He nodded. "This'll wear off quick and won't give her a hangover. She'll be functioning again in no time. So she was hysterical? Where are the bodies?"

“The medical examiner took custody of them. The DCPD and FBI are working on identification.”

“Shit.”

Parker turned and gestured toward Gage. “And this is the hero of the night.” The tone he used seemed to pass information from Parker to his colleague. “Gage Harrison, meet Jim Grossman, also CIA.”

When Gage took a step forward and extended his hand for a shake, he made sure his face wore the impassive mask he’d used to become his unit’s poker champ.

“You’re the guy who took down the kidnapers? Hell of a feat, soldier. You did Uncle Sam proud tonight, and did your nation a huge favor.”

Gage detected the ember of a lie in the way Grossman squeezed his hand a little too hard and a little too long, and stared into his eyes with a flint-edged gaze. Gage didn’t trust this guy any more than he trusted Parker. “I’m a Marine, not a soldier. Just glad I got there when I did.”

“Are you standing post?” Grossman asked.

“I’m going to stay with Dr. Kealoha until she’s released.”

Grossman pursed his lips then focused on Parker. “I’ve got a fire to put out. We need to know when Dr. Kealoha wakes up so we can have a chat.” He pointed at Gage. “You don’t have clearance to be in here for that.”

“Sir, I’ll wait and ask Zoe what she wants.”

Grossman and Parker exchanged another silent look.

Gage had relied on his ability to read body language to stay alive during his three deployments to the Middle East. He couldn’t always pick out the words when people spoke in their particular dialects, but he always knew when to dive and cover. And Gage knew that Parker and Grossman had their fingers on their triggers. They were dangerous as hell.

A nurse popped the door open. “Gentlemen, I need to hang a new IV bag and check vitals.”

“That’s okay, ma’am, we’re headed out. Lover boy over there,” Parker rolled his head toward Gage, “can’t be persuaded to leave the good doctor’s side. I’m afraid you’re going to have to put up with him.”

Grossman and Parker each reached into their wallets and produced business cards. “We’d appreciate a call when she wakes up. You can buzz either one of us.”

Gage accepted the cards, he needed them to help him keep track of all the players. One after the other, the scrimmage line was filling up in front of him. He watched as the agents walked out of the room. The CIA handled America’s foreign intelligence. Why were they operating on US soil? And why the hell would foreigners want to kidnap Zoe?

As the nurse checked Zoe's vitals, Gage paced. From their timekeeping and their concern about the aftereffects of Zoe's medicine, it seemed to Gage that the CIA was working something urgently sensitive. Gage peered through the blinds at the dark parking lot, but saw nothing that drew his attention. He thought about Grossman saying "our girl." Could Zoe be a CIA asset? Hell, could she be an operative for the CIA? Maybe she was playing on the spooks' field. Gage's cellphone vibrated in his pocket. He swiped his screen to read the incoming message.

Titus: What's the sitrep?

Gage texted: FUBAR sir. 2 CIA were here.

The reply came immediately: CIA?

Gage: Asked a lot of questions. Advise.

Titus: I'd keep a tight watch.

Gage: Any progress on the IDs?

Titus: Nothing domestic, the parameters have been expanded to international. It's going to take time for the computers to search. More as I have it. Out.

Gage glanced at the nurse who sent him a shy smile. "I'm not Doctor Kealoha's nurse on duty, that's Stacy." She pointed to the board with the name written on it. "She got hung up with another patient, so I'm filling in. If you have any questions, I'll tell Stacy, and she'll come in and talk to you."

"How do you think she's doing?" Gage asked, tucking his hands in his pockets.

"From these readouts, Dr. Kealoha's fine. She'll be right as rain after her rest. Her vitals are looking good. This new IV bag is for hydration, not sedation. She should stay asleep for a while, though. We'll let her wake naturally." The nurse turned and cleansed her hands with hand sanitizer before she pushed her computer station into the hall, holding the door so it would close silently behind her.

Gage pulled his chair back over to Zoe's bed and sat down with his elbows on the safety bar and his chin on his fists. He desperately wanted to smooth the hair out of her face, to run a hand down her back, to pull her into his arms. But she needed to be whole and healthy to deal with this situation, and he didn't want to rouse her from her sleep.

The CIA asked if she'd been having nightmares and talking in her sleep. A sign of exhaustion. Why aren't you sleeping, Zoe? Huh? What's on your mind? You're always so laid back...

He tried to think back to when this had started. The last time he'd tried to spend the night was the worst, but she had been flopping around for the last month. Before that, she had slept like a rock.

Spending the night with a woman wasn't something Gage did as a rule. He'd found that women read too much into their relationship if he woke up beside them. The act of spending the night led to too many future plans. It was easier to go home and keep the boundaries solid. Less confusion. Less upset when he had to leave on assignment and had no details to share about his comings and goings. There were no promises he could offer that he'd come home safe and sound. He didn't have the kind of job that lent itself to reassurances.

It wasn't like that with Zoe. She was uncomplicated. He stopped to laugh at how wrong that statement was. She presented as uncomplicated, he amended. Their relationship had been uncomplicated, at least.

Zoe seemed self-satisfied. She seemed to have complete faith in his ability to do his job and get home. There were no tears or angst. It was easy, really easy to be with Zoe. Their relationship was such a relief to him, and he'd never really reflected on his spending the night. Getting up in the morning and heading back to Quantico didn't have emotional weight. He never felt like he was leading her on, because she didn't seem to have an agenda for him. His mind flitted back to thoughts of the CIA and FBI, wouldn't that be the attitude an operative would have? Seemed to him that might fit.

He scrubbed his hands over his face. He needed another cup of coffee bad, but hell if he was going to leave her alone to roam the halls and find a machine. He looked out the window as the tops of the trees started to show an outline against the blue-black sky. He slowed his breathing and let his mind wander. Sometimes when he was on the battlefield, taking a moment and listening to his thoughts instead of raging forward against the enemy gave him the perspective he needed to make good choices. Oddly, what he was thinking about were those trees.

When he was at UVA, taking the obligatory literature class to meet his requirements, he had been struck by a poet that... Gage leaned his weight onto one hip and pulled his phone from his back pocket. He pulled up a search engine, then stared at the ceiling. He couldn't remember the poet's name. The only thing that came to him was "marriage" and "oak tree." He typed it in with little confidence. But the second link on the list was "On Marriage" by Kahlil Gibran. Gage read the short poem.

*Sing and dance together and be joyous, but let each one of you be alone,
Even as the strings of a lute are alone though they quiver with the same music.*

"Let each one of you be alone," Gage murmured. He liked that phrase. Back in Charlottesville, it had been an epiphany. It had led to him breaking up with the girl he'd been dating for almost two years. She was beautiful, smart, witty, and athletic, but the more she scripted their future, the more heavily she leaned on him. Almost every decision she made, she filtered through him—from her choice of majors to what to wear when they went to grab some pizza. It seemed to him that the longer they were together, the more she was devoid of her own opinions; she deferred to him too much. It was her background and upbringing, he knew. Her mother submitted to her father in all things, and that had worked for their marriage.

Gage didn't want anything to do with that kind of a relationship. It felt burdensome. It was a responsibility he'd never looked for and didn't feel comfortable shouldering. He wanted to be with someone who brought new perspectives, ideas, and interests to the relationship, expanding his paradigms rather than absorbing his thoughts and tastes until they weren't two people but one.

His girlfriend had thought that was the goal—to make two into one. But this poem defined for Gage what he wanted in a relationship—someone who was strong. Independent. Someone who knew her own mind. Had her own friends and interests. And they could share, or they could just be amicably and happily together without needing to share it all. His world shouldn't construct anyone else's world. Being in Special Forces, he couldn't guarantee the person who walked out the front door would be anything like the person who came home. If he came home at all.

Gage had searched a long time to find someone who was strong enough to stand on her own and not fold under the weight of a relationship with him. He thought he had found it a time or two. But as the relationship became more serious, the women he had dated seemed to morph and change, as if to make themselves his ideal—not realizing his ideal was that they simply be themselves. Sometimes he found himself falling into that trap too, shifting for a time to become something he wasn't in order to preserve the peace or maintain the status quo. But inevitably, that strategy would backfire. Who had the tenacity to maintain a charade like that?

And stand together yet not too near together:

For the pillars of the temple stand apart,

And the oak tree and the cypress grow not in each other's shadow.

That's the line he remembered—trees not standing in each other's shadow. Standing strong by themselves. Zoe had that inner strength. She was happy within her own skin and didn't seem to need outside validation. It was a very appealing trait.

He stared down at the words of the poem without really seeing them. Zoe seemed to be perfectly content on her own. She also seemed to be perfectly content when he was around, even if they were just two bodies in the same place. He closed his phone as Zoe gave a little moan and straightened her legs. He watched to see if she was coming to, but her lips parted in a sigh, and she continued to sleep.

Gage thought back to the last night they'd spent together, the one that ended with him stomping out of her condo at zero dark hundred to drive back to Quantico to hit the racks when she was tossing around and keeping him awake. He should have stayed and tried to find out what was going on with her. A missed opportunity, in retrospect. And he shouldn't have missed it

She had been quiet that day. That wasn't unusual. When they were at her place, he'd usually read or whatever, and Zoe would wander around in her own little world. He'd stay quiet and out of her way when she got that look in her eye, when she pulled her brows together and stared into the distance. He had a sister who was an introvert, and he knew that expression meant Zoe needed to spend time alone in her head. He got it. At least, he thought he did. Now? Shit, nothing was clear. What had she been thinking about all those times, staring at the wall, mumbling under her breath? Warfare?

He watched the slow rise and fall of Zoe's chest and shook his head. He couldn't believe that this woman, who never had a bad word for anyone, who wore a sweet Mona Lisa smile as her natural facial expression, could ever contemplate creating the level of destruction that Colonel Guthrie was encouraging. Could she?

GAGE

A knock sounded at the door. Gage was out of his chair in an instant. Speak of the devil. Colonel Guthrie stuck his head around the frame. Before he could speak and maybe wake Zoe, Gage was at the door, moving the colonel back into the hallway.

“Just checking in, how’s our girl?”

That was the second time that morning that Zoe had been referred to that way, and it was like nails on a chalkboard to him. Zoe was no one’s “girl.”

“She’s doing fine. Sleeping.”

Colonel Guthrie held out a cup of coffee and a bag with a bakery monogram on the front. “The coffee’s black. I didn’t know how you took it. There’s cream and sugar in the bag with a breakfast sandwich. I thought you’d probably need a pick-me-up by now.”

“Thank you, sir.”

The colonel rocked back on his heels and shoved his hands into the pockets of his coat. “I haven’t called over to Hawaii, yet. It’s about midnight over there right now. I didn’t want to pull her parents from their bed and have them worried all night—not until I talked to Zoe myself or had something a little more definitive.”

“I’m told she’s fine.”

The colonel nodded. A close-lipped smile stretched across his face and worry clouded his eyes. “I’ve known Zoe since she was in diapers. And even though she’s nearly thirty, I can’t seem to make her age past her fourth birthday in my mind.” He looked past Gage into Zoe’s room. “Almost thirty. Huh. Doesn’t that feel like a kick in the nuts.” He scratched the line of his jaw. “You’ll keep me in the loop, with what all’s going on? If she needs anything at all, you’ll reach out?”

“Yes, sir. I have your card.”

“All right then. I’m heading to the office. Thank you, son, I appreciate all you’ve done. All you’re doing.” He slapped Gage on the shoulder and headed down the hall.

Gage moved back into the room and pulled the business cards he’d accumulated over the last eight hours out of his pocket. A police detective, a colonel, a senator, a special agent with the FBI, and not one, but two CIA operatives. He fanned them out. With all these experts worried about Zoe’s wellbeing, you’d think he held a winning hand. It felt more like a shitstorm to him.

Zoe moaned, and Gage moved to her side.

“No one will know.” She whispered it so softly that Gage wasn’t sure he’d heard her right.

He crouched by the bed so his ear was near her lips. “Know about what?”

“Sphecious...” She lifted her hand and rubbed the tip of her nose. Her eyes were still closed.

“Sfeeseus? Is that what you said?”

When she didn’t reply, Gage tried to sound it out and come up with a spelling that seemed reasonable. Google was good at filling in the proper word if he could get his guess anywhere close to being right. He couldn’t remember seeing a word that began with “sf”, so he tried “sph” like sphere. Did she mean sphere? Maybe she meant “spacious.” “Sphecious,” he typed. Google sent him to a

Wikipedia page for a wasp, genus Sphecius. He looked over the description—large, solitary, ground dwelling, predatory. This couldn't be right. She worked with robots. Possibly worked with robots.

Very quietly, so as not to fully wake her, Gage whispered, "Hey, Zoe? Do you know what Sphecius is?"

"Wasp...wasps." She sighed and seemed to fall deeper into sleep.

His phone buzzed, and Gage moved to the far corner of the room. "Titus, man, I was about to call you."

"Yeah, well, I've got some good news and some bad news."

"Shit."

"That about sums it up. Is she still conked out?"

"The nurse stopped sedation a while back. She said Zoe's just sleeping now."

"Didn't you tell me that the special agent on the case was setting her up in a safe house? This might be the time to give him a call and rock Zoe on over there."

Gage was on immediate alert. "What did you dig up?"

"The two guys that you killed last night? They're MIA, assumed dead."

"Come again?"

"They're listed as Israeli Special Forces, killed in a bomb attack in 2006. We'd need DNA to make it one hundred percent, but with the combination of the ear scan, face scan, and fingerprints you sent, we're still hitting probabilities in the low-nineties on both of them."

"What could they possibly want with Zoe?"

"Good question. Why don't you get her moved, then call me back? I already talked to command and was given permission to lend Iniquus assistance, pro bono. They don't like the idea of foreign mercenaries playing with our DARPA scientists."

"Prescott told me this morning the safe house plans for Zoe have been nixed. I'm on my own to protect her for the moment. Surely if they knew who these guys were, it would change their minds?"

"I don't think it's wise to wait on FBI red tape to get sliced. I think you need to shake her awake, get her dressed, and move on out the door. The hospital leaves her too vulnerable with too many ways to make bad things go down. I'm headed your way. I'll take you to an Iniquus location. That should buy us some time to figure out what's going on."

"Thanks, man, I owe you. She's in room 606 at Inova Alexandria. Hey, on the off chance, have you ever heard the word Sphecius?"

"Sphecius? No. You can tell me where you heard it when I pick you up. I'm heading for the garage now."

As he hung up the phone, the door pushed open slowly. Gage shook his head. This hospital room was like a circus tent. Ring one—CIA. Ring two—DARPA and the colonel. In two strides, he was jerking the door open to see who was in ring number three. A small man with the pointed face of a weasel and small, wiry frame, stood outside the door. "I was told this was Dr. Kealoha's room."

"That's correct. She's asleep. May I help you?" Gage held the door, so the man couldn't see in, and stared him down. The guy was dressed impeccably and had the polished feel of a man who enjoyed being pampered.

"Oh, ah, no. I came to check on how Dr. Kealoha is doing." He reached into his coat pocket and pulled out a card.

"Topher Bilik. I'm the director of one of Dr. Kealoha's ongoing projects at Montrim." He held out his card and adjusted his body into a posture of power. At least that's what Gage thought the guy was doing. Gage took the card and slid it into his pocket without a glance. He didn't offer up his own name in return.

"Zoe works at Montrim," Bilik added, then tilted his head, trying again to peek around Gage's muscular build into the hospital room.

Gage stared at the guy, wondering why the heck he'd showed up to see Zoe at this hour of the morning.

"How is she?"

"Fine." Gage arched his brow. "How'd you know she was here?"

The man took a step back, as if thrown off balance. He quickly recovered himself and offered up a plastic smile. "Oh, Colonel Guthrie called me last night."

"Last night?" Gage tilted his head. "What time last night?"

Bilik scratched his upper lip. "Early this morning, I guess."

"He woke you up with this? There's nothing wrong with her."

Bilik seemed to realize how odd that would be. He tried to change the subject. "Is there anything Dr. Kealoha needs? She's a shining star at our organization. We want to make sure she has everything she could possibly need."

"Why would Colonel Guthrie wake you up in the middle of the night?" Gage wouldn't let it go. "Why couldn't it wait for morning? Why did he call you in the first place?"

The man gave him a bloodless smile. "If you'll be so kind to pass my card to Dr. Kealoha and let her know I stopped by? I'll call her on her cellphone later." He turned, and with his arm up in a goodbye, he skulked toward the elevator.

Gage shut the door and moved back toward Zoe, wishing she'd come to. He held his phone between his palms and stared out the window. Too many players were worried about Zoe's wellbeing, and Gage had lead in his belly. It was the feeling he got on a mission when there were bad things on the horizon. He furrowed his brow as he dialed his superior. "Sir? Major Gage Harrison here. I'm respectfully requesting leave to take care of a situation of exceptional circumstance." His gaze fell on Zoe as she stretched out her legs and blinked her eyes open.

Zoe

The better the fruit the more wasps to eat it
~ German proverb

• • • •

Zoe squinted as she took in the industrial efficiency of the hospital room. Lying there, she worked to understand her surroundings. She remembered being brought in on a stretcher, but everything seemed fuzzy—her memory of why, and the things around her.

“Here you go, Zoe.” Gage stood at the side of her bed, placing something in her hands.

She sighed with relief as she realized they were her glasses. “Thank you.” She sounded a little tipsy to her own ears. Whatever they gave her last night had done the job. Zoe remembered talking to the nurse in a darkened room, and now she was awake again with the sun streaming through her window. Time had moved forward without her. She glanced over at Gage, who wore a bemused look on his face. His eyes, which could magically change from blue to green to black as coal, were locked on her. Right now, she could easily read affection and concern in their depths, and also a little bit of that look he got just before they... Zoe felt her cheeks turn pink.

Gage chuckled. “I’d pay good money to know what you’re thinking.”

“Have you been here for a long time?” She glanced at the wall clock, then over to Gage. He wore the same clothes as last night, along with the rough shadow of an unshaven face.

“In and out since last night. Mostly in. I wanted to keep an eye on you.”

Zoe pushed the button on her bed, so she could sit upright. She crossed her legs under the cotton blanket. “All right, Captain America, what happens now?”

Gage sent her a curious look. “Why did you call me that?”

“What?”

“Captain America.”

“Oh.” She tilted her head and examined him. “Must be the body language.”

“Body language?”

“Do you have to repeat what I say? It’s irritating.”

Gage raised a brow.

Zoe scrubbed a hand over her face. “Okay, body language, in one of my robotics classes, the professor was really into discussing body posture and facial displays so that we could help humans connect with the robots.”

“Why would he care about humans connecting with a machine?”

“We were working on a prototype for domestic help. A robot to interface with families. I got into the habit of watching bodies and faces for my research.”

Gage shook his head, and Zoe read that as “you still haven’t answered my question.”

“Your body language, especially right now, reads as trustworthy, intelligent, courageous, and having deep affection for me. You know, a total Captain America.” That last word caught in her throat.

Gage chuckled. “You don’t think those are good things?” When she didn’t answer, he added, “This is an odd conversation. Zoe, you don’t flatter people as a rule.”

The corners of her mouth tugged down and pressure built behind her eyes.

He cleared his throat and wrapped his hands around her guard rail. "You're obviously not trying to stroke my ego." The statement sounded like a question, like he'd found some puzzle that needed solving. "You're usually not sarcastic either. I don't know why the look on your face is throwing me so hard. I hate that you're frowning at me, you've never done that before."

Zoe blinked back tears. "I've never felt this way before." She reached behind her and pulled her pillow around so she could hug it. "I am so deeply, profoundly grateful." She sniffed hard. "Beyond words. It's actually kind of like a tsunami rolling through me right now." She attempted a quivering smile and something that sounded like she wanted it to be a laugh. "Yeah, I feel like I could be swept away and probably drown in all of these emotions."

Gage waited silently as she fought for some semblance of control. When her breathing came a little steadier, he leaned forward and kissed her forehead. Something happened with that kiss. Some kind of promise was made. He pulled her head to his chest where she could hear his heart beating. He was so steady.

After a long moment, she got hold of herself. She sat up and pushed her hair back over her shoulders as she asked, "Has anything happened since last night? Did they find out what those guys wanted?"

Gage's face shifted to stoic. He cleared his throat. "Zoe, I have something I need to tell you."

She raised a brow. Then a quick knock on her door and the entrance of a nurse stalled any further exchange.

"Good, you're awake. I'm doing a last round before I go off duty, and you get a new nurse. The doctor is right behind me." She pushed her rolling computer system beside Zoe's bed. "Unless there's an issue, it looks like you'll be discharged this morning." The nurse glanced over at Gage and smiled. "Good morning."

Zoe considered the way the nurse's tired countenance brightened like her happy pill suddenly kicked in, and realized that Gage had caught this woman's attention. While the nurse documented numbers on her computer, Zoe considered Gage. He was cute. She could see why the nurse would perk up at the sugar rush of some unexpected eye candy. Cute was probably the wrong word. Cute really didn't belong to a man with Gage's hardened warrior's body. His face was ruggedly handsome, more so now that he was sporting stubble on his normally clean-shaven face. She guessed the cute description came from his smile, and how his eyes crinkled at the corners when he was amused. Gage's eyes were his best feature, she thought. Well, no. He had some other features that sat at the top of her list too. As that thought came to mind, Zoe caught Gage's gaze, and he winked. Her pink flush turned to bright red, and he started laughing. The nurse glanced up with a question in her expression, and Zoe looked away quickly, fiddling with her fake wedding ring.

"Can I ask you to wait outside for a moment, please?" the nurse asked Gage.

Gage crossed his arms over his chest. He took on the feel of a boulder that couldn't be moved. Entrenched. This must be one of his war faces. Gage had used a different war face last night, and it was intimidating as all get out. Zoe had grown up in the defense world. She knew that Gage belonged in the sphere of the elite soldiers, but it had been a concept rather than a reality for her until last night. To meet Gage, well, he was an easygoing guy. Her old roommate, Lily, had called him affable. Zoe could get on board with that adjective. But now she also saw him as deadly. He had killed to save her. Tears prickled the corners of her eyes. Her breath caught in her throat. How did you thank someone for something like that?

"I think Dr. Kealoha would like some privacy while I remove her catheter."

The nurse smoothed her hands down the front of her blue scrubs and tilted her head back, so she could smile up at him. “Thank you, this won’t take long.”

• • • •

THE NURSE WAS EFFICIENT, perhaps a little brisk. Zoe could understand that. They were on duty for twelve hours at a time. If Zoe had just finished a twelve-hour shift, she’d want to get off her feet too. Zoe definitely understood the toll that long hours at work could take. She had been pushing hard to get her project in place. She wanted to be done, done, done with her contract and move on. She needed a project outside the world of military research that was more life-affirming, like what she’d done in biomedical engineering. She would do anything to go back to when she signed those darned DARPA contracts. She’d rip them to shreds and march right out of the office. Now she was hospitalized for exhaustion and, call a spade a spade, hysteria. “Shock” was prettying things up a bit. What she was was a big, fat mess. But not for long. Soon she’d have her prototype in the field. Then she could hand things back to DARPA. She planned to take a long vacation to somewhere where she could be alone with nature, and alone in her head where she was happiest. Then she could make some decisions about what her future looked like.

As the nurse exited, Gage came back through the door with a doctor Zoe hadn’t met.

“Dr. Dithers,” he said. “I’m the hospitalist on duty.” The doctor stood at the end of the bed and talked to the clipboard he was scribbling on. “Are you ready to head home? You’re feeling okay?”

“I am, thank you.”

“All righty then. If you’ll sign this, you’re good to go.” He held out a plastic clipboard and pen for Zoe. “You’ll want to follow up with your physician about your sleep issues, and consider seeing a mental health professional if you notice any adverse effects following the break in. It’s best if a counselor works with you earlier rather than later. It leads to a better outcome.”

Zoe offered him a tightlipped smile and signed her name without reading the document. She watched the doctor move out of her room, then threw the covers off. Last night, she had been wearing Gage’s black sweats with no shoes or coat. Maybe Gage could pull the car up to the exit, and she could run out. She hated hospitals, and the sooner she was out of there the better. But she also didn’t know where she would go. Home didn’t feel safe.

Gage lifted her overnight bag from beside the chair and placed it on the bed. “I brought you some things. I hope that’s all right.”

Zoe opened the bag, chewing on her bottom lip as she flipped through the neat piles that he had placed inside. Wow, he brought a lot of outfits. It looked like he’d packed for the week and not just a twenty-minute trip across town. “There are a lot of clothes here.”

“Special Agent Prescott said you might be moved from the hospital to an FBI safe house. I wanted to make sure you had what you needed.”

Zoe’s mind galloped at a rate that made it hard for her to pin down any thoughts. Finally, she landed on, “You make it sound like there was a change of plans.”

“Not a big change, but Iniquus will be putting you up in one of their places instead of the FBI.”

“Iniquus is the security group you were interviewing for, right?”

“Right. A friend of mine, Titus Kane, is a unit commander there.” Gage pointed toward her door. “He’s in the hall, waiting for us.”

Zoe lifted her favorite plum-colored hoodie and hugged it to her chest like a teddy bear. “I’m confused.”

Gage put his hands on his hips and sent her an appraising look. “We’re all confused. But we’ll figure it out. The first step is to get you somewhere safe so we can all share information and come up with a plan. I need you to get dressed, okay?”

She reached behind her to yank the ties and release her hospital gown. It slid to the floor at her feet. She stood there naked, with goose flesh rising across her skin. There was a tingling in her scalp and her mouth had gone dry. The full burden of why she was sedated last night was coming back to her. Two massive goons had broken into her apartment, and Gage had killed them to protect her. Tears prickled the corners of her eyes. He needs me to get dressed so he can get me somewhere safe.

She searched the bag until she found the stack of bras and underwear. She saw that he’d brought her what she considered her “date night” panties and not the comfy cotton hipsters she wore for every day. She pulled out a pair and sent an “Oh, really?” look over to Gage. It was her way of trying to normalize a situation that was everything but normal. “You don’t want to give me a few minutes of privacy so I can get dressed?”

Gage let his eyes slide slowly over her naked body. He frowned and shook his head, though his eyes were bright with merriment. “No can do, ma’am. I’ve been tasked with guarding your body.”

He was teasing, but a new vulnerability raked over her.

“I put your toiletries bag in the outside pocket—it’s got your toothbrush and stuff.”

Quick as she could, Zoe dressed. A hasty brush of her teeth and hair, a zip of the case, and she was almost ready. “You picked all of my favorite outfits.” Zoe crouched to pull on her boots.

“Well, I picked the things I see you in most. I wanted you to be comfortable.”

She stood and flipped her hair back out of her face. “You pay attention to my clothes?”

Zoe nodded. “I’m comfortable, thank you.” That was only partly true. Her clothes felt comfortable, but she herself was not. She had no idea what to think about a move to a safe house.

Gage picked up her case and reached for her hand. Zoe grabbed it like it was a lifeline.

Zoe

He puts his hand into a wasp's nest.

~ Hungarian Proverb

Zoe felt conspicuous walking out the door, flanked by two powerhouse men. She wasn't exactly diminutive. She stood five-foot-ten, but the heels of her boots put her over six feet, nearly eye to eye with the guys, but while they embodied latent force and solidity, she was stumbling along, twitching at every movement and sound.

Titus was a little overwhelming. He had a shaved head and a square jaw. A scar wrapped around one side of his neck and stood out as a pink and white slash against his coffee-colored skin. Zoe wondered how someone got close enough to slice him. His single facial expression seemed to be a glower. But maybe it was the circumstances. Maybe he'd soften around the edges when she was tucked into his safe house. He made Zoe nervous.

Sandwiched between the men, they all moved as a single unit, taking up space on the sidewalk, then in the garage.

Titus had brought a gunmetal grey Hummer that looked like it was going to war. At the sight of it, Zoe started to shake. As she climbed into the back seat of the vehicle, she wondered about the choice of cars. They wouldn't exactly blend. It would be hard to lose someone in this thing if they were being chased. Zoe couldn't imagine that it could go very fast. Of course, if the worry wasn't about blending and outracing, and was more about providing cover and protecting them against being rammed off the street, this might be good. Or maybe this was simply what Titus drove every day, and there was no thought process at all.

Zoe settled in, the heavily tinted windows gave the passengers in the back some concealment. No one would know she was there unless they were already being followed. Gage tipped her overnight bag into the cargo section, then shifted in beside her. Titus would do the driving. Before they took off, Titus handed a pistol to Gage and a couple of extended magazines. "There's an MP5 under my seat if you need it. Mags are in the seat pocket."

So this is what people mean when they say quaking in your boots. Zoe yanked her seatbelt hard across her hips to help hold her in place.

Titus spun the wheel, and they moved onto the street. As if synchronized, Gage looked right while Titus scanned left. Then Gage scanned left and Titus looked right. Zoe focused on her white-knuckled grip on the seat belt.

When they finally reached the highway, the men seemed to ease a bit, even if the shift was microscopic. Titus adjusted his rearview mirror and used it to stare at her. "You can settle in. I'm going to take you on a little tour to make sure we didn't pick up a tail."

"A tail?" She threw her body around to look out the back window.

"Normal operating procedure. Hotel Iniquus is in Maryland, outside of town, and we don't want to lead anyone to your safe house."

"Of course, thank you," she whispered.

Gage had reached into his pocket and pulled out a bunch of business cards. He laid them out on the seat between them. "Here are some players with a big interest in you. Do you know them?"

Zoe read them over. A detective. The colonel. Prescott, well she had sent him an SOS. Parker and Grossman, the CIA shithheads. Topher Birch. He had spoken with Gage? And why was Senator Billings's card here? A frown pulled between her brows.

"Do you trust these people?"

"I'm not sure." Zoe's voice trailed off as she sunk deeper into her head, trying to figure out the connections. How did Gage get all of these cards?

"Do you think it's possible that the intruders were sent by someone you know?"

Zoe shot Gage a look of dismay. She had no idea. Her eye caught Titus's in the rearview mirror.

"Are you still fuzzy from the meds?" he called back over his shoulder.

"I can't feel my lips." Zoe wasn't sure if that was the meds still at work in her system or her anxiety.

"Coffee?" He moved to the far right-hand lane.

"Bless you." Zoe turned to look out the window and rested her forehead on the cool pane.

"Zoe?" Gage called to her quietly. He unraveled her hands from the seatbelt and laced his fingers through hers. She closed her eyes. "Zoe. I have something I need to tell you." His voice was as gentle and smooth as lake water on a summer night. She could float on it in perfect peace, staring up at the wide expanse of stars. That's where she imagined herself to be. Willed her mind to go. She didn't want to hear what he had to say. She knew whatever it was was bad. Fog coated her thoughts like it had last night when she couldn't even remember how to dial 9-1-1.

She didn't respond. Gage didn't push. Yet.

They went through the Starbucks drive-thru. Titus ordered her some food as well as coffees all around. She took the food bag gratefully and ate. After a while, when she felt she'd worn the cowardice mantle a little too long, Zoe looked over at Gage. She forced the corners of her mouth into the semblance of a smile. "Okay, I'm ready. What do you need to tell me?"

Once again, Gage reached for her hand and placed it between both of his and rubbed. "Zoe, you're as cold as ice."

"I'm all right. Can you just spit it out? My imagination is creating some pretty demonic monsters in my head."

"It's about Lily."

Zoe blinked. "Lily Winters?"

He nodded. "I'm so sorry, Zoe, but Lily died last night."

Zoe opened her mouth but nothing came out. None of the questions that pushed themselves forward demanding to be answered found a voice. Are you kidding? How could this happen? Are you sure? Did she suffer? How did you find out? Where was she? All Zoe could do is jerk her head back and forth in some kind of denial. As if to say Gage was lying to her. But Gage never lied to her. Ever.

"She fell onto the tracks in the Metro and was hit by a subway before she could be helped."

"That's really..." Zoe's words trailed off as she searched for a word. The right word. "That's really an improbable way for her to die."

"The news said that she was leaving the theater. The Metro station was crowded for that time of night as people were going home from the performance. She was at the front."

Zoe shook her head.

“Is there any question in your mind—is there any chance at all that she might have committed suicide?”

“No.” The word burst out of her mouth without any thought. She should reflect about it before spouting off. She should be clear and precise. She pulled her hand free of his. She needed to process what had been going on in Lily’s life. Lily had divorced. But Lily was happy now that she was no longer tied to her domineering husband. She liked her job; she’d had a new project that kept her busier than usual. But she seemed excited by what she was doing. She had a new man in her life, Charlie. “No to suicide. I’m pretty sure I can say no. Just yesterday morning she sent me a video by mistake when she was trying—did you pack my phone? I can show you.”

“I put your phone in your purse, but it’s on airplane mode. Let’s leave it there for now.”

Zoe blinked. Did he think someone was tracking her through her phone? That was the only reason that she could come up with for his saying not to use it. Her heart rate was off at a gallop.

“Can you tell me about what you want me to see?” Gage asked.

Zoe turned and searched the traffic out the back window, as if she knew how to spot a tail.

“No one’s following us,” Titus said as he flipped on his blinker and moved toward an exit ramp. “We’re almost to our destination.”

Zoe swallowed hard. “Yesterday morning was um...Thursday morning. Lily was supposed to go out of town tonight with Charlie, the guy she’s been seeing. He was taking her to a little bed and breakfast on the Maryland coast.”

Gage leaned forward. “Charlie?”

“Yes. Lily was so happy about it. She sent me a video she made for him by accident. What she really meant to send me were pictures of her trying on outfits. She wanted to make sure she was packing her cutest clothes, so she was trying them on and snapping pictures and sending them to me.” Zoe thought back to the pictures. Lily’s face had shined with expectation and joy. It was the happiest that Zoe had ever seen her. “She didn’t commit suicide. And it sounds like an improbable accident, even if the Metro was crowded.” Zoe rubbed a hand over her mouth and nose. They had gone numb again. “You remember that Lily lived with me. Is it possible...”

“I’ve considered that the people who broke in were coming after Lily and not you. It is possible. But we’re only at the beginning of trying to understand what happened. So it’s best not to jump to conclusions.”

“No. Data needs to be thoroughly examined before a conclusion could possibly be drawn.” Dread was the only word that Zoe could come up with to describe this feeling. Horror, maybe. She felt like she needed more oxygen than what she could get through her nose. She opened her mouth to take in big gulps of air.

“Zoe, look me in the eye. Right now. Look at me.” Gage’s voice pulled her from a very distant place.

She worked to comply. But she felt like she was drowning. Like she couldn’t get her head above water. She was flailing and floundering, desperation flooding her system. “I think I’m going to be sick.”

Titus was on the side of the road in a split second. Gage reached past her to shove the door open then held her hips while she leaned out and gagged up her just consumed breakfast. When the horrible retching calmed, Titus handed her a bottle of water. She swished and spit, dragging her wrist across her mouth. She reached for the door handle to pull it shut, but she didn’t have any power in her arms. She was powerless.

Gage reached out and shut it for her. He trapped her chin in his fingers and swiveled around so he could scrutinize her. His eyes were deep blue right then, and they shined with concern. Zoe felt like she should be handling things better. In her world of science, she liked to see cause and effect. She preferred when things were linear and defined. What was happening in her head and in her body was chaos, and she hated it.

Titus swung the Hummer back into traffic. “This is an overwhelming situation, I know. I have lots of experience at this, so does Gage.” He nodded Gage’s way. “This isn’t a movie where a good guy shoots a bad guy and then moves on with their day, completely fine. This is what happens in reality. Your reactions are absolutely normal. Okay?”

Zoe could see Titus in the rearview mirror. He wore the same expression he’d worn since she met him in the hospital, impenetrable and stern.

His voice, though, conveyed humanity if not warmth. “Gage says you’re a scientist. Mental health research tells us that it’s important in the long run that you don’t stifle your emotions and play brave. That reacting like this is actually a good sign. It’s psychologically healthy. I’m proud of you.”

Weird that he should be proud that I’m quaking and puking, Zoe thought as she nodded her acknowledgement to Titus.

He caught her eye in the mirror. “We’re here with you. You’re safe. But you need to go ahead and let your body do what it needs to do. Don’t force those feelings away. Be brave. Be strong. Deal with them as they come. Can I depend on you to do that?”

Zoe nodded again, like she had any control over her body’s reactions at this point.

Titus reached for his coffee mug and took a long swig. “Lots of nutritious food. Lots of sleep. Some exercise. You don’t want a big old case of PTSD, now do you?”

Zoe shook her head, not trusting herself to speak.

“Good. And thank you for not puking in my car.” He rolled his lips, and if Zoe squinted, she could actually see the shadow of a smile there. Gage was holding her hand as they powered down the road a short distance and came to a halt.

Titus popped his seat belt and turned toward them. “This is it.”

Zoe

Repeated visits to the mud pit enable the wasp to build its house.

• • • •

To call this a “house” would be an incredibly elastic stretch of the word. Zoe stood in front of what looked like an abandoned manufacturing plant. White paint curled and hung from the metal exterior. Rust accented the door with bright orange streaks along its hinges. “Safe” seemed right though. No one would suspect that anyone inhabited the interior other than maybe a rat colony. Zoe felt her nostrils flare and her nose wrinkle at the thought.

Gage pulled her bag from the back of the Hummer and came to stand beside her. Zoe sent him a wide-eyed gaze. She wondered if this was going to be a dump and run. Were the guys going to open the door, wish her well, and go home to their own beds? Gage didn't sleep last night. He's been up protecting me. I should hope that he'll go and get some rest. Though it felt abundant in its selfishness, what Zoe really hoped was that he wouldn't leave her here on her own.

Titus moved to the back of the vehicle where he removed a computer case. As he strode forward, keys in hand, he aimed for a doorway partially hidden by what had been a fire escape. The door screamed its resistance when he pushed it open. In single file, they moved into the open space. There, in the center of the enormous factory floor, was what looked like a large cube. Titus entered a code on the door handle and pushed it wide, as he snapped on the lights and gestured Zoe in.

Night and day. That's the only way to describe the transformation that took place as she stepped from the filthy factory into the apartment. It was an open space with a modern, clean design. The high ceilings gave it an open, airy feel, despite it being windowless. The wall color was the cool tone of tropical water, set off by crisp white woodwork, that felt soothing and fresh. The furniture looked comfortable. There was a wall of floor-to-ceiling bookshelves with a library ladder attached to a rod so it could slide along them. As Zoe moved farther into the space, she saw that the kitchen was up-to-date with stainless steel appliances and granite countertops. There was a bar. Zoe considered and then discarded the idea of a shot of vodka.

“There are three bedrooms, each with their own bathroom.” Titus indicated the three doors on the far side of the room. “When the safety door to the inner complex is properly shut, there are no telltale signs that anyone is in here. No lights. No movement. The walls are built to be noise resistant instead of noise cancelling. That's so you can have some sense of what's happening outside the cube. It means no yelling. No blaring music or television. You need to keep it down. But you don't have to tiptoe around.”

Zoe opened and then shut each of the bedrooms. The last one, larger than the others, squeezed her heart. It held a queen-size bed, a bunk bed and a crib inside. A family had been in hiding with little kids. She sniffed the air, it had the slightly stale scent of a hotel room with a whiff of lemon. She moved to the kitchen and found a powder room and a broom closet. Zoe swallowed hard. “Wow,” she said as she turned back to Titus, wondering how long she'd have to hide out here.

“Here's the plan.” Titus put his case on the table and pulled out a computer. “Gage has to get down to Quantico and sign papers so he can take leave and pick up his duffle.”

Zoe's eyebrows were up to her hairline. Gage is leaving me here, was her knee-jerk reaction. It was quickly replaced with gratitude that he was going to use his leave to help her. She wondered if she actually needed help. Could the bad guys have really been going after Lily? Had someone actually killed her? Surely that was an accident. A horrible, horrible accident, Zoe reasoned, to keep a new wave of bile from crawling up her throat.

"I'm going to take your phone back to Iniquus and get it checked by our forensics department. Then I'll pick up some food and bring it back. What I need you to do right now, Zoe...Zoe, look at me."

Zoe dragged her gaze over to Titus and worked to focus on him.

In a voice even more quiet than his usual low tone, he said, "I need you to make a list of what you'd like to have on hand. Say, enough food for a week to be safe. A grocery list. Include any toiletries, medications, anything that you need to be comfortable." The timbre of his words forced Zoe to focus on his lips in order to hear and understand him. Her mind was stuck on the fact that they both planned to leave. She'd be there alone. She pulled out a chair at the dining table where a pad and pen lay ready for use.

Zoe had no appetite and no desire to menu plan. Her list started: fruit, vegetables, kefir, pasta, coffee...

"While I'm gone, you can use this computer to do research. But, Zoe, this is extremely important. Do not contact anyone. Not in any way, shape or form. You are not to go on any social media platforms. No Twitter. No Facebook. No Google+. I'm trusting you. Normally, we don't allow Internet in our safe houses. But I think it's important that you have this for your research. You can access news sites, for example."

"Zoe, do you know Charlie's last name?" Gage's question seemed to come out of the blue.

Zoe shook her head and added: sandwich rolls, deli meats and cheeses, eggs...

"Do you know how Lily and Charlie met?"

As she scribbled chocolate. Lots of chocolate. Wine if it's not already here, she said, "All I know is that he was considerably older than she was, and that felt a little weird to her at first. Why?" Zoe sent Gage a hard stare.

"I have a theory about who she was seeing. I have some circumstantial evidence, but—"

"Evidence? Do you think this guy might be responsible for Lily's death? He wasn't with her at the theater, I can almost guarantee. Lily said Charlie was getting ready for some big political showdown. He wasn't coming up for air until the weekend."

"She never posted his picture? How long had they been seeing each other?" Titus asked.

"No to the pictures. I can't remember the time frame. It would be on her calendar though."

"We don't have access to that," Gage replied.

"Sure we do. She has it on Google calendars." Zoe gestured toward the computer. She turned to Titus. "Can I go on Google calendars?"

"You have her password?" Gage asked.

"She has so many passwords to remember at work that she just has a single password she uses in her personal life—outside of her banking, of course."

"Does anyone else have that password beside you?" Titus asked.

Zoe shrugged. "I wouldn't know."

"Okay, first things first. I need you to get into her accounts, her email, her calendar, everything you can access," Gage said. "I need you to take screen shots of everything. We need to get that locked down before anyone has a chance to wipe it."

“You think someone would?”

“We don’t know what’s going on. The important thing here is that we preserve everything ASAP in case it turns out there’s something significant in play.”

Zoe pushed the list toward Titus and waved her hand, gesturing for him to hand her the computer. “I’m not that particular, get whatever’s easiest at the store. I can make do.”

Titus pushed the computer toward her. “Glad to see you have your priorities straight.”

Titus ripped the list off the pad. The men moved toward the door. Zoe refused to watch them leave. She pulled up Lily’s accounts, not taking enough time to read them as she did a screen grab, dumped each image into a folder, and moved on to the next. Zoe imagined that she was racing some nefarious character in some underground dungeon, trying to beat her to the information, and her fingers flew over the keyboard. Lily was dead. That was a fact. Gage had said he went to the morgue and saw her body himself. Why would he do that? How could he do that?

Surely this is just an exercise in... She shook her head. What word did she want? Over-cautiousness? Conspiracy? Paranoia? Who would want to kill sweet Lily? She was a CPA, for goodness sake. She liked cats and hot cocoa and reading romances. She grumbled the entire time she exercised because she hated it so much, but she never missed a day because it was on her list of things to do. And nothing made Lily more anxious than not marking off every last item on her to-do list. Reliable Lily. Generous Lily. Funny as all get out Lily with her dry sense of humor. How could she be dead? Zoe pulled the pad of paper over and wrote: Check Lily’s “to-do” list.

As Zoe pressed save and moved on to the next screen, she wondered about Lily’s ex, Graham. What a misogynistic creep. Zoe had never figured out how those two had fit together as a couple. Obviously, they hadn’t. Their marriage hadn’t lasted long. Zoe picked up the pen and wrote: Is there any way to get a hold of the security tapes from the Metro? Then she moved on with her task. Zoe wasn’t sure how far back they needed the calendar. She arbitrarily cut it off at two years. She closed the screen then went to Lily’s Hotmail account.

Lily was very organized about her accounts. Everything was in nice neat little folders and her mailbox was basically empty otherwise. Since Lily had last logged in to her account, there was just some spammy crap about lady Viagra, time shares, and some guy who was willing to share his five-million-dollar windfall from Zaire. Lily hadn’t been dead long enough for more items to accumulate. Time was doing odd things in Zoe’s head. It seemed she had been living this ordeal forever. But no, she reminded herself, this had all just happened last night. Two men broke into my apartment, Gage killed them, and you died, Lily.

That the events happened in such quick succession made them seem like they absolutely must be connected. But she wouldn’t jump to conclusions. Her mind had been data driven for so long, it would be odd to suddenly give in to this emotionality. The sooner that Zoe could connect with her rational mind the sooner she’d feel more comfortable. She looked around the safe house and felt the solidity of the emptiness. How alone she was. Normally, that was what she craved—time without interruption so she could be in her head moving things around. Now? It was seriously creeping her out.

Zoe forced her attention onto the emails. There were too many to open and capture them all. That would take days. Did Titus mean for her to get all of them? The folder for the vet, she could probably overlook, because Lily’s ex got the cat in the divorce. It was a hateful cat who destroyed the furniture and loved to jump onto counters and bat your drink to the floor. Enjoy the cat, Graham.

Zoe skipped over the folder from Lily’s sorority, and the one from her synagogue, and moved to the one marked XX. She had saved the first three items when everything in the folder disappeared.

Zoe pressed undo and saw the icon swirling, and for a moment the folder filled again. Once again, the items disappeared. One by one, Zoe watched all of the folders being discarded. The “deleted items” folder now numbered in the thousands.

“No. No. No!” Zoe yelled at the screen as she tried to figure out a way to save them from being destroyed, but once the last file had been emptied, even the one from the vet, the discard folder went to zero. Zoe stared at the screen. Who would do that? And why? She clicked around to see if there wasn’t a ripcord she could pull, some parachute that would open and save the email. But she couldn’t find anything. They had been purged from the system.

As a last-ditch attempt, Zoe pressed refresh. The screen brought up the sign in page. That’s odd. She typed in Lily’s email address and passcode, and the red font in the box said that the password was incorrect. She tried again. Still incorrect. Someone had changed the password. It wasn’t enough that the files were emptied; but now she knew there was no way to retrieve the information.

Who would do this? Why would they care?

She tried Lily’s other accounts, her to-do list at Evernote, her cloud files. Even her Picassa folders. All gone.

To Zoe, it felt like Lily had slipped right between her fingers and disappeared into nothingness. Lily is dead. Zoe couldn’t make herself believe it. “Dead,” she said out loud, hammering the word into place, trying to pin it to a hard surface so it wouldn’t keep floating away like a dandelion in the wind. Zoe pulled her knees to her chest and let the tears flow freely. What happened to you, Lily?

And books which told me everything about the wasp, except why.

~Dylan Thomas

Zoe uncurled from the ball she had made on the couch. She'd needed to pull the plug and let some of the grief in her chest drain away. She had allowed herself to moan and sob, trying to keep the decibel level within the confines of the safe house walls. She was glad no one was around. She wasn't a woman who felt free exhibiting her emotions. She was publicly pragmatic and only very privately expressive. She had known Lily since they were in undergrad together. Lily was one of a handful of people that were in Zoe's comfort zone. That she allowed to see her cry. Or laugh with abandon. Or be a bitchy, hormonal, ice-cream-eating mess.

Was. Were. Lily would always be thought of in past tense now.

Zoe moved to the bathroom and splashed cold water onto her face. As she slid her glasses back in place, Zoe saw her eyes were swollen and her face splotchy. She wondered if Lily was being autopsied now. If the medical examiner could say from the evidence how this had happened. She had to force her thoughts away from the visual of someone doing that to Lily's body.

Zoe's thoughts turned to Lily's mom. She'd have been given the news already. I bet she had other plans for this weekend. Something different than organizing her daughter's funeral. Zoe shook her head. She wished she could be there for Lily's mom. Lily's mother, being Jewish, believed that autopsies weren't to be performed. But as a questionable death, the authorities would have no choice. It seemed like salt in a wound. Zoe wondered if she'd be able to go to the funeral. She hoped so. Zoe moved Zoe sniffed loudly, squared her shoulders, and sat back at the computer into the kitchen to get a glass of water. These kinds of thoughts weren't helpful. Helpful would be figuring out why someone would want to wipe all of those emails.. She put Lily Winters's name into Google to see if there was more information about the event available. "Event" was a nice, safe, scientific word. "Event" allowed Zoe to stay analytical. That was a better place for her to be. Especially holed up all alone in a safe house.

Zoe clicked on the top article on the Google suggestions list, the "Breaking News" article from CNN. Odd that Lily would be mentioned on CNN. There was video of Senator Billings standing behind a podium. His wife, dressed in black, stood next to him. She looked like crap. Like she was still in shock from some horrible event, and Zoe wondered why she was torturing herself by appearing in public when she was obviously going through a private hell.

The senator cleared his throat. "I stand before you today with a heavy heart. Last night, a wonderful person, an amazing person, lost her life in a terrible accident on the Metro line."

Zoe watched the senator's wife. When the senator said "wonderful" and "amazing" Barbara Billings curved her stomach in as if she was being punched. Mrs. Billings struggled to hold her shoulders back, to keep her lips from quivering. It was horrible to watch, and Zoe wanted to turn her head and give this woman some privacy, but simply couldn't.

“Lily Ann Winters was working with me on a project of immense import to the United States—indeed, to the world’s security. Her research was invaluable to the American public.” He gripped the podium and rocked back on his heels then forward. His head dropped and he no longer stared defiantly into the camera lens. “Over the time that I worked with Miss Winters, I was moved by her patriotism, her strength of character, and her sunny personality. I grew to love her, very much. Lily and I developed an intimate relationship. It was improper of me to stray outside of my marriage of twenty-two years. It was improper for me to fall in love with a colleague. I have nothing more to say on the subject, other than that it was Lily who shined brightly at a time when I was surrounded by the darker forces of humanity. I deeply cared for her. She made me happy. Her death is a great loss to me and to the American public.”

The camera panned to Senator Billings’s wife, whose face had turned ashen. She was swaying like a metronome, back and forth. A woman in a red trench coat stepped up behind Mrs. Billings, placed a folding chair behind her knees, guided her to sit, and kept a steadying hand on her shoulder. Mrs. Billings kept staring forward, never looking to see who had saved her from a faint. What kind of jerk would put his wife through a press conference like this? It was inhuman. Zoe felt like a voyeur peeking through a window into someone’s very private pain, and felt ashamed to have in any way participated in it.

“How could you have been involved with a married man, Lily?” Zoe muttered at the screen, her mind racing, searching for scraps of conversation that they had shared. “That was so antithetical to your values. Barbara Billings is obviously devastated. You’d never do that to anyone. Ever.” What the heck is going on?

“As much as I would like to have some time to mourn Lily’s death and to work through this with my wife,” Senator Billings continued as he turned, and for the first time realized that Mrs. Billings was physically and emotionally collapsing on national TV. He stared at her for a moment, then looked at the person holding his wife upright, then moved back to the mic. “Our nation is in peril. I will be conducting the first day of senate hearings into the kinds of weaponry that Montrim Industries is developing and the—”

There was a light knock on the safe house door. Zoe pitched herself out of the chair and away from the computer, her gaze swinging around the room for a place to hide.

“Zoe? Titus Kane. Open the door.”

Titus. Zoe felt a little foolish. Her nerves had been spiking since the night before. And maybe there was a tinge of guilt mixed in for having watched the CNN report. Zoe moved to open the door.

• • • •

THE CUPBOARDS WERE filled with the copious amounts of food Titus brought in with him. He handed her a bag that must have contained a good five pounds of chocolate. Thank God, Zoe thought.

“Let’s talk about your phone.”

“Did you bring it back?”

“No. You had an app on there to follow you via GPS. Another one that allowed people to see what numbers you called and who called you. And a keystroke app.”

“Someone was tracking my texts?”

He nodded. “Who would want to keep tabs on you?”

Zoe shook her head.

“Montrim?”

“I don’t work for Montrim, I merely have lab space at Montrim. They shouldn’t care what I’m doing.”

“The military?”

Zoe shook her head again.

“What about those operatives from the CIA?”

Zoe rolled her lips. Yeah it could be them. It very well could.

Titus’s phone buzzed. He pulled it from his belt and checked the screen. “Gage is heading back and asking if you need anything. It can’t be anything from your condo. If it’s being watched, we don’t want to lead anyone to your location.”

Zoe scratched at her head to stop the prickling sensation. She looked over at the bottle of wine Titus had put on the counter. She needed something to take the edge off. “I’m good.”

“Pour yourself a glass if you think it will help. When Gage gets here we need to assemble what we’ve gathered and put it all on the table so we have a better idea what’s going on. I’m going to go get him.”

“Get him? Why get him?”

“His car hasn’t been swept yet, so we don’t know if someone planted a tracker.”

Oh. Zoe moved toward the kitchen and put her hand on the bottle. Maybe two glasses. On second thought, Zoe actually had no intention of drinking any alcohol. She needed her thoughts to be sharp. Focused. Pragmatic. She didn’t have Titus and Gage’s Special Forces skillsets, but she did have a very good brain. Would that be enough to keep her safe?

Zoe

Fire drives the wasp out of its nest.

~ Italian Proverb

“Zoe.” Gage’s eyes were now green with swirls of blue. They seemed turbulent, like a storm kicking up waves of concern. “I need you to trust me. This isn’t going to work unless you do.”

Titus leaned in. “Do you trust Gage?”

Zoe twisted her fingers together in her lap. “With my life—obviously.”

“Now I need you to trust me.” Titus was using his soft voice again. The one that forced her to lean forward and pay complete attention.

She wrinkled her nose. She didn’t like this particular tactic. Zoe wanted to be able to hear and let her mind churn at the same time.

“I’m going to be truthful with you. Gage trusts me—of all the people he knows, I’m the one he called to help protect you.”

Zoe frowned.

“He turned to me because I’m the Commander of Panther Force—an elite group of former Special Forces who work for Iniquus.”

Zoe nodded. She knew who Iniquus was. Not only had Gage interviewed with them recently, but they had been in the paper and on TV. She had never heard anything but glowing terms when it came to Iniquus. Sometimes the admiration seemed to tip into adoration, as if the men and women of Iniquus were superheroes. By all accounts, they were the good guys. The ones who fast-roped off helicopters and swam two miles in the dark of night to save families kidnapped by pirates off of Sudan. The ones who searched for a missing teammate through tropical storms in the Gulf, even though everyone knew there was no hope of survival. And they were as red, white, and blue as the American flag. Titus was with Iniquus, and Gage had called him—Zoe had never for a moment doubted that she was safe in his hands.

“Now, here’s the part that might have you changing your mind about who to trust. Iniquus is headquartered here in DC, and we work as a liaison between different government entities. Gage, can I see those business cards you’ve collected?”

Gage reached into his pocket and handed them over.

“The FBI, the CIA, the military.” As he spoke, he laid down a corresponding card from each. “The legislature, the police. We contract with all of them. They’re our bread and butter. We also do security for people who need us in the corporate world. Montrim is one of our customers.” He laid down the last card in his hand with the name Christopher S. Bilik beside the red foil Montrim logo. “We often go overseas with Montrim executives to provide security in hot spots, though I’ve never met Mr. Bilik. I have worked for all of these organizations. Knowing this, are you still okay with Iniquus protecting you?”

Zoe pulled her gaze from Titus and let her eyes rest on Gage, looking for any sign that he was conflicted. She found only resolve on his face. “Yes, thank you,” she replied. “I appreciate your help.”

Titus's calloused palm gestured over the cards. "I know how they work. I know how they play. And right now, I know you're a hot commodity for someone. All of them have the capacity to have gone after you last night. Or it could have been none of them. It could very well be some outside entity who hasn't landed on our radar yet. That's what we need to start working on now. I need a better handle on what you do and who you think might have targeted you."

Zoe looked between the two men. They both sat at the edge of their seats, their elbows balanced on their knees as they leaned in, closing the circle like a football huddle. Zoe didn't know where to start.

"You both think it was me that was the target and not Lily?" Zoe shut her eyes as she realized how much she had willed the opposite to be true. In her mind, she had decided that some bad men had come after Lily, and, for whatever reason, Lily was the victim of a tragedy. But if Lily had been the target, it would mean that Zoe was not. That she could go home and feel sad, but safe.

"Not after I found the spyware on your phone. You're a person of enormous interest to someone. And we need to know why." Titus hammered his words as if he were nailing a sign in place.

She had allowed herself to lapse into wishful thinking. She had lined up what little information she had and written a story that fit her purposes. It was an unscientific approach, inconsistent with how her brain usually worked. But her brain was usually building and testing ideas in a laboratory, not facing off against bad men with criminal intent.

Facts. Science. Logic. Even if Titus had asked her to be brave enough to experience her emotions and deal with them in the here and now, she thought that it was probably a bad strategy. First, she didn't like to swim around in her emotions. And second, the emotions clouded her thought processes, entangled them in superfluous data, drove her down roads that were dead ends, like the one that went, "surely they were coming after Lily, and I'm safe." Nope. Zoe needed to plant both feet in reality.

She took a deep breath and imagined herself in front of her whiteboard working out a problem. But the faces of the dead men in her bedroom, and Gage's war face when he'd dragged her out from under the bed, formed a barrier between her and logic. Okay, shoving her emotions aside might not be possible, so she'd work to tuck her reactions away the best that she could. She cleared her throat and looked at Gage. "Ready?"

His eyebrows came down low and flat, and he nodded.

"I'm a scientist." She pushed her glasses up her nose into place. "I do research and development in micro robotics. I went to undergrad with a dual major in biomedical engineering and software engineering. Lily lived in the dorm room next door to me freshman year. We liked each other because we both kept our heads in our books. She was working on a degree in accounting. But I'll get to that in a moment." Already her thoughts were jumbled. She needed to untangle the knots to make this as simple and thorough as possible.

Gage stalked over to the table and snapped up the pen and pad. He read over the two items Zoe had written there, then flipped that page over to a fresh sheet as he sat down beside her.

Zoe rubbed sweaty palms over her thighs. "My senior year, I was working on my honor's research project, investigating the usefulness of biomarkers that I'd discovered in human blood."

Titus raised a questioning brow. She held up a hand and said. "First things first. What are your clearance levels?"

Titus put his hand on his chest. "I'm top secret and above."

Gage nodded. "I'm top secret."

Zoe nodded. Top secret. They were safe to read into some of the program. Certainly not all of it. Gage and Titus would need enough to know the who, what, and why of the people who had their business cards on the table. They didn't need to understand the scientific minutiae. Zoe stared at the floor between her feet and was grateful that both of the men gave her time. She decided she needed to walk them through her timeline.

"I was doing some research one night for an ethics paper, and I came across something called the Innocence Project. This project's goal was to free those imprisoned for crimes they didn't commit. About seventy-five percent of those who were later exonerated had been convicted based on eyewitness testimony. Eyewitness testimony depends on human memory, and we know, without a scientific doubt, that human memory is malleable. Memories can be seeded and otherwise changed by the passage of time, the lighting, the person's mood, their profession, or more insidiously, the choice of words in a police officer's question. That's what I ultimately wrote my paper about, the ethics of using information that we can scientifically prove is flawed to take away someone's freedom." Zoe pushed her hair behind her ears, then got up to pace. She wanted to move away from the intensity of the men's scrutiny. It felt too heavy, and she needed to move her muscles and look at furniture rather than their faces.

"DNA testing is newer than some of the Innocence Project cases that I read about. DNA is costly. The labs are backed up sometimes by a year or more. A lot of people simply don't have access to getting their DNA tested to substantiate their innocence." Zoe looked up and the men nodded. "I had been doing experiments on blood biomarkers. For example, I developed a method to tell if blood came from a female or a male."

"These are hormones?" Gage asked.

"No, hormones fluctuate and can be changed, for example, if a person is undergoing gender reassignment and is using hormone therapy, then that changes the blood levels outside of the norm for birth gender. The markers I identified are stable within the subject over time. They cannot be altered by manipulation."

"Would you be able to give me examples of some markers?" Gage asked.

"Well, two that you might know about are blood types like A, B, or O and their corresponding Rh factors. That's positive or negative. I'm A positive. Gage, you're O positive."

Gage sent her a speculative look.

"It's on your dog tags. Those biomarkers are the ones that most people know about. I have more. Lots more."

"All right. Biomarkers. Go on," Titus replied.

"In grad school, my thesis was built around developing a presumptive field test for law enforcement, so they could rule out an individual who had come under scrutiny for a crime."

"Do blood biometric analysis in the field," Gage said as he scribbled onto the pad.

"My aim was to develop a field rule-in rule-out test. It's meant to merely be a presumptive test."

Zoe had paced to the far side of the room, and Gage swiveled to look at her. "What does that mean exactly?"

"In forensic science, they have the ability to do some testing at the scene of a crime. If, for example, they see something streaked on the floor that looks like blood, they can use a reagent to test it. The results are not definitive—they will simply tell the forensic tech that either the substance isn't blood or that the substance possibly is blood. If they get a positive presumptive test result—mind you, it could be a false positive—then the tech knows that they should process the area as if it were blood and take the information back to the lab for further analysis."

Gage scribbled some more words onto his pad. "And this applies to your blood biomarkers how?"

“Let’s say that a tech picked up some blood on the scene, and the police have someone in hand they think is associated with that blood, the officer could ask for a blood sample. It would be a quick finger stick and a couple of drops of blood. The tech could then compare the suspect’s sample to the blood on scene and decide right there and then that no, there is no possibility that this is that person’s blood. Or yes, there is a possibility that this is the person’s blood, which would signal a need to order a DNA test. This presumptive test would help a lot of innocent people walk away without having the time and expense of proving their innocence. It would also save time, money, and effort for law enforcement, the American court system, and even the U.S. prison system. Even though this only accounts for a small subsection of crimes where blood was left on scene by the perpetrator.”

“There has to be blood on the scene?” Titus asked.

“For my test? Yes. It can’t be a DNA sample from skin or hair follicles, or secretions like semen. My test only works on biomarkers found in human blood.”

“I can see that having an amazing effect on law enforcement and their ability to manage their resources better,” Titus said. “I notice that you keep saying America and the US in reference to law enforcement uses for your test. Why is that?”

Zoe looked at the ceiling. She was still grappling with what to tell them. Zoe could hear the wall clock tic-tic-ticking, otherwise, there was absolute silence. The more she explained, the more her nerves tingled. Hadn’t she signed contracts that stipulated that to share any of this information outside of the very tight circle of people who signed the contract along with her would be an act of treason? Would she go to jail because she was trying to save her own life?

Zoe

Today butterflies, tomorrow wasps
~ Namibian Proverb

After a long minute sitting in silence, Titus pushed the conversation forward. “Were you able to make it functional?” He had leaned back in his chair, swiveling this way and that to follow Zoe as she paced. It made her feel like she was a duck in a carnival shooting game. She wished he didn’t scowl so much.

Zoe pursed her lips. “I’ll get to that. But there’s another big step that comes next.” Yup, she was going to take the leap. She had no way of seeing over the edge anyway, no idea where this was going to land her. “Christmas of my senior year, before I got my bachelor’s degree and entered grad school, my parents came to visit me from Hawaii. We went to Washington DC for few days to see the sights. One night, we had tickets to a concert at the Kennedy Center. Colonel Guthrie and his wife, Maeve, joined us for the show and then a late dinner.” Zoe stopped to clear her throat. She realized she’d been using a lot of filler. Telling a broad story as a means of stalling. She knew Gage had probably picked up on the change from her normally succinct exchanges. Zoe sought out his gaze. She read curiosity and worry in his expression, but also affection. She sent him a little smile of gratitude.

“Over dinner, my dad was asking how my research was coming. I was explaining the biomarkers and how I was investigating the efficacy of using them in the forensics field and what I planned to do in grad school to further that research. At the end of the night, Colonel Guthrie asked me to come and talk to him before I headed back to school, and I did. He thought that having a compendium of information about the unique markers could have a big impact on the war on terrorism. He envisioned having a parallel system to CODIS. CODIS being the FBI’s database of DNA. I told you about the Innocence Project, and that gathering DNA has prohibitive issues, mainly the back log and expense of testing it. But testing my markers could let the government know if this was a likely person of interest or not. Colonel Guthrie envisioned a military application for building a library of blood biomarker data to try to identify terrorists. The problem for the military at that time—this was back in December 2009 and our fight in Iraq and Afghanistan—was that it is very hard to identify the bad guys in the field. It’s still a problem with groups like ISIS. Their cultural dress and facial hair make it very hard to photograph them and use facial recognition software or ear identification marks.”

Both Gage and Titus nodded their heads.

“One of the things that I found was that ninety-one percent of the unchanging biomarkers I identified are familial. The remaining nine percent are unique to the family member.”

“What aspects are you measuring?” Titus asked.

Zoe blinked. How did he expect her to describe what she had developed to someone who didn’t know squat about the subject? “That’s classified. I’m sharing the absolute minimum for you to understand. And I’m probably breaching my contract by explaining this much.”

“Right now, law enforcement uses familial DNA to identify a suspect,” Titus said.

“Right, exactly. But there are groups that don’t want everyone’s DNA to be gathered and stored, even if someone is convicted of a crime by a court of law. They think it’s unconstitutional and the question needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. DNA, at this point, is our best identifier. We do need to be very careful about how we use DNA. My tests aren't the same. They can't be used—they were never intended to be used—to identify someone as the culprit. If anyone tried to do that, to use my test to prove guilt, I'd go to court myself to fight it.”

“How did Colonel Guthrie think your tests could help in a war zone?”

“He's a director of DARPA, they subcontract with other entities who do defense research and development. They, for example, subcontract with me. One of the companies they work with is Montrim Industries. Colonel Guthrie wanted Montrim and their contractors to develop a system like the FBI's CODIS. Only this would be for blood biomarkers. Running DNA on everyone is too time consuming and expensive.”

“Who is everyone?” Titus asked.

“Everyone in conflict zones.”

“What?” Gage's eyes went wide.

“Montrim sends in teams of health care workers contracted by the US government to help with the whole “win the hearts and minds” campaign. They go village to village, set up a tent, give everyone in the village a basic medical once over, offer them health care intervention, antibiotics, immunizations, vitamins, stitches—whatever is needed. As part of the field exam, they do a blood glucose test. Blood glucose is measured by poking a finger and putting a drop of blood onto a sample strip, which is then analyzed by the machine and the number displayed. The newer strips take the tiniest bit of blood to sample. Older strips, however, absorb a blood sample large enough to analyze for the biomarkers.”

“Right there in the field?”

“No. The analysis would happen back in the Montrim laboratory. Each of the strips was carefully stored, documented, and brought back to Montrim to be put through testing, and the results were stored in a computer database.”

“That sounds like what they were trying to do with Osama Bin Laden.” Gage leaned forward and posted his forearms on his knees. “Collect DNA samples from the compound where they thought he was hiding. They sent the people in disguised as health workers.”

had developed “Montrim started collecting the samples in late spring of 2010. The CIA had access to the data, and when they killed or captured enemy soldiers, they took samples to add to the database. In April of 2011, the CIA decided to gather information from the Bin Laden complex. I only know this because I was in grad school then and a field test machine. It was a rough prototype, not a sleek finished project. They had to hook it up to a computer screen to read the answers, but it was workable. I only had the one. I allowed the operatives to use it for a ‘special project’ so they could get their results immediately. They came to me, and I trained them on using the machine. They took it away, and then brought it back unused. I put this all together as the news reported Bin Laden was killed by SEAL Team 6. Later, Colonel Guthrie, who had facilitated the CIA's access to my machine, confirmed my suspicions.” Zoe shrugged. “Colonel Guthrie said agents went to the complex under the same ruse that Montrim had been using in Iraq, Syria, and Afghanistan. But they were shooed away before they could get a single blood sample.”

Gage shook his head. “Yeah, but the US didn't have a sample of Bin Laden's DNA or blood to compare.”

“We had familial samples. If they got blood from the children, they'd do the presumptive test. If that was positive, they'd send the samples back to the US for DNA analysis. Of course, just because Bin Laden's wives and children were in a complex didn't mean Bin Laden was there. But it would have been a big clue. And the presumptive tests would tell them whether or not they should go through the effort to test for DNA.”

“That’s nuts, Zoe.” Gage was grinning.

Zoe frowned back at him. “What is?”

“I thought you cleaned beakers in a lab. But instead you were one of the masterminds trying to take down Bin Laden.”

“Yeah, right. That’s like telling the Sig Sauer manufacturer that he’s responsible for the Bin Laden takedown because he built the gun strapped to one of the SEAL’s ankles. I’m just the geek girl in the lab, trying to help the Innocence Project.”

“I’d like to go back to discussing Montrim and their database, if you don’t mind, Zoe,” Titus said. “Montrim set this all up. And you said you were developing a field test. I’d like to hear more about that and where you are with your research currently.”

“Hey, Zoe, are you okay?” Gage had fixed his gaze on her face. “Maybe you should stop and eat something.”

Zoe didn’t want to be “that girl”—the one who was delicate and needy. So even though Gage was right, and she was feeling shaky and sweaty, she wanted to power through this explanation. “I will in a second. Titus, to answer your question, biomarkers were proving helpful in the war against terror. But there was still an unfortunate gap between the time that blood was collected and archived in the States and getting the info back to the boots on the ground. DARPA pushed me to move forward with my long-term goal, helping law enforcement. In order to be of consequence to law enforcement here, and to the armed forces in the Middle East, they needed instant analysis, giving law enforcement the ability to hold a suspect rather than having to let them go while tests were being run.”

“You’re very careful about using the term law enforcement, so I’m assuming that this wasn’t for the police,” Titus asked. Zoe could see his mind churning.

“Right,” she replied.

Gage picked up one of business cards on the coffee table. “So for the FBI, like Special Agent Damion Prescott?”

Zoe debated whether she should respond.

“Did you work with Parker and Grossman?” Gage pointed at the cards.

“No, I don’t work with the CIA. But you were right about Prescott. He’s in charge of the FBI’s side of the field trial. It’s been going on since late 2012.”

“This would save so many resources. It’s an amazing invention. I’d like to get my hands on this for Iniquus,” Titus said.

Gage pushed the business cards back into a nice, neat row. “How did Prescott know you were in trouble? How did he get on scene so fast?”

“When I was under my bed, I sent him an SOS text.”

“And he wanted to safeguard you because of this tech. I wonder why he couldn’t come up with a safe house.”

“I have no idea. Sorry.” Zoe clapped her hands on either side of her head. “I really need to stop talking and get something to eat.” She glanced toward the kitchen. As she said that out loud, she became acutely aware of the nausea that she felt when her mind got so busy that she forgot to take care of her body. She needed fuel. Now.

“I need to call Prescott,” Gage told her as Zoe made her way into the kitchen. “Ask him if he has anything new.”

“Yeah, I’d really like to know too.” She yanked the fridge door open.

“But after you eat I need you to tell me how Lily is involved with this. You started this whole story with Lily living next to you in the dorm and said that you’d get to her in a moment.”

Zoe gathered what she needed for a sandwich. She snagged a nectarine and bumped the door closed with her hip. “When I started my doctoral program, Lily had just graduated with her MBA, she’d taken the CPA exam and had that certification, but she was up against a really difficult job market. Competing against people who had ten years of experience under their belts, while she was still wet behind the ears.” Zoe slapped a quick sandwich together, and she took a big bite. She gave herself a moment to chew and swallow before she said, “Usually, UVA’s Darden program is a launching pad to the best jobs in the US, but with the recession in full swing and industries putting a moratorium on hiring, there weren’t any job openings to compete for. She told me that she had gotten a bite from Montrim Industries and was in town for an interview. We had dinner and she asked what I was working on.”

“Which was?”

Zoe took another bite to buy herself some time. Should she? Shouldn’t she? She swallowed, and then took a few breaths with closed eyes. The full force of both of the warriors sitting in the living room was overwhelming. She looked from one face to the other. She really didn’t have a choice. Zoe sucked a deep breath through her nostrils and on the exhale she said, “WASPs.”

GAGE

Titus lifted his chin in Gage's direction to catch his attention. After years in battle, where micro-gestures protected their locations from enemy eyes, it didn't take much to convey a message. Gage shifted silently toward his buddy while Zoe was busy eating.

"You said you got data off Lily Winter's phone. When was that?" Titus asked under his breath.

"This morning in the morgue."

"You had help?"

Gage moved Special Agent Prescott's card over to him.

"They should have information from the autopsy by now. If Lily's death was an accident it changes the dynamics of this situation. How about you give this guy a call and see if he won't share his intel."

Gage palmed the card and moved past Zoe, who sat in her own little bubble, munching her sandwich. He made his way to the bathroom and opened his phone. The call didn't go through. He tried Titus's number and got the same.

Gage moved to a bedroom and tried again. His alarm bells were ringing hard. He stood in the door, his eyes on Titus until Titus turned toward him then got up and strolled his way. Gage looked over at Zoe—she was off in Zoe-land thinking her thoughts, letting the gears grind and turn.

Titus moved through the door and shut it soundlessly behind him.

"My phones not functioning. No bars, where there had been four bars when I was here earlier. No connection. Unless you've got something going on here security-wise, I think someone's messing with airwaves in the area."

Titus did a quick check on his phone. When he looked up, he caught Gage's eye and held it in a split second of silent communication. They had a plan and moved on it.

Gage surveyed the front room as he scooped up the business cards and shoved them in his front pocket. He swung his jacket on and snagged Zoe's from the hook by the door.

Titus was busy packing the laptop and pad of paper Gage and Zoe had taken notes on. He grabbed Zoe's overnight bag and tilted his head toward the bedroom on the right. Gage put his hand under Zoe's elbow, his index finger making a hush sign. He swept the last of her food from the counter, dumping it into the garbage. Everything was cleared as if they had never been there except for the groceries in the fridge. Nothing he could do about that.

Zoe's eyes widened, asking him what was going on. He didn't have an answer other than the prickle that made the hair on the back of his neck stand up. It was the feeling he got when someone had a bead on him and was about to squeeze the trigger. He moved Zoe to the room that Titus had disappeared into, back to the open door of the bathroom. He could make out Titus's silhouette behind the rippled glass shower doors. He steered Zoe into the bathroom and shut the door.

Inside the tub, on the back wall, Titus had opened an escape hatch. Gage pressed Zoe forward, over the lip of the tub and into Titus's waiting hands. Titus whispered in her ear and pushed her toward the opening. She lifted one foot into the hole then she was climbing down a ladder. Titus nodded toward Gage, who followed her down. Titus handed him the computer, followed by Zoe's bag then her coat. Gage, in turn, handed them down to Zoe's outstretched hands. Titus entered the tunnel, then pulled the hidden door shut, and locked it from their side, preventing anyone from following them along this escape route. Gage and Titus made quick work of the ladder, coming to rest in a dark underground tunnel. With a snap and a shake, Titus's face lit up in the pink glow of a chem-light. He handed it to Zoe.

"What's happening?" In the dim light, it was hard to read Zoe's face, but to Gage's ear, her voice sounded firm and strong.

"Looks like someone's jamming the cellphones. Someone might have located this safe house," he whispered.

"Are you sure there's not an issue because of the materials used to construct the place?"

It was cold in the tunnel. As Zoe spoke, Gage handed her her jacket, and she quickly pulled it on.

"Or maybe it's our distance from cell towers? Or a carrier malfunction? There are reasons for not being able to make a phone call other than there being wolves at the door, right?" she asked.

"Could be, but it's always good practice to go over an escape route. Let's chuck this up to doing a drill." Titus pulled a bulletproof vest from a hook on the wall. "Here you go, Zoe, it's going to be a little big, but you can make do."

Gage rocked back on his heels, watching Zoe getting strapped in. His mind, though, was securely on how the heck someone had followed them. Gage had watched every move that Titus made. Titus was on point with his counter surveillance maneuvers. Gage's mind went back to Titus's explanation to Zoe of all the ways he could be entangled by his past associations with everyone who had a hand in this game. He considered the possibility that Titus had compromised them. But if he had, wouldn't he have made up some garbage about having cellphone issues in the safe house? Iniquus as a company, and Titus as a commander, were above reproach. Gage sincerely believed that, or he wouldn't have interviewed to be on the teams, and he wouldn't have called Titus to help Zoe. But you also thought Zoe was just a lab tech. Yeah. He was definitely questioning his own sense of what was true and what was not. "How do you think they found us, Titus?"

"I don't know, man, we'll work on that later. Right now, the plan is to follow this tunnel. It'll take us to an exfil house about a klick to the north. Once we're topside, there's a landline I can use to send an encrypted message, call in the cavalry. You got a weapon on you?"

"The Glock from earlier."

Titus reached into the front pocket of his tactical jacket. "Here's an extra magazine, sixteen rounds. Zoe? We're going to move forward now. I've got point. Gage's going to bring up the rear. Gage and I have our weapons in hand, and you have the chem-light. If we run into anyone down here, I need you to underhand throw the chem-light toward them, try to get it to roll toward their feet so we can see where to aim, and they can't get a good bead on us. As soon as that light leaves your hand, duck behind us, get flat on the ground up against the wall out of the way of our feet. Do you understand the plan? You don't deviate, no matter what genius idea pops into your head. We're working as a team, and that's your only role. Got it?"

Zoe nodded her head. Her teeth were chattering so loudly that Gage could hear it echoing off the walls of the tunnel.

"Tell me the plan," Titus commanded.

"If someone's there, I throw the light, fall to the ground, and get flat up next to the wall."

Gage had given those same instructions about a dozen times as he moved assets out of harm's way. It sure felt like a different ride when he was in a tunnel under Maryland soil, protecting the woman he loved. Gage let that last thought filter through his head, and he tucked it away to examine later when his nerves weren't so raw.

“Good.” Titus pulled the go bag over his shoulders, reached for Zoe's hand and planted it on his back. “Don't let go unless you're throwing the light and diving for cover. I need to know I haven't lost you, and I don't want to keep turning around to scan. Got it?”

“Yes,” Zoe whispered.

They moved forward at a slow jog. The floor was muddy and slick. In places, they needed to duck their heads a little to move under the joists that kept the roof from collapsing. The farther into the tunnel they moved, the stronger the smell of rot and decay.

Their footfalls echoed through the space. Zoe's breath came in ragged huffs. Gage was counting paces. He jogged at sixty-six paces per hundred meters, Titus said they should be there in a klick. When they reached around the six-hundred pace mark, Titus had slowed his speed perceptibly. He probably felt Zoe getting tired. She was running with twenty pounds of metal around her chest. At pace six hundred and ten the quality of the air changed. Another fifty paces, and they came to another ladder.

Zoe held the chem-light above her head as Titus moved cautiously to the top. He pushed the trap door open about an inch, enough to get eyes on the floorboards and see if there were any enemy boots in sight. They stood as still as statues, ears straining. Finally, Titus pushed the door all the way open, letting natural daylight stream through the hole. Zoe moved to follow, but Gage's hand on her shoulder held her back.

Overhead, they could hear the soft pad of stealthy feet as Titus checked the house. Gage felt like a mouse caught in a trap. Gage had used his elbows to skim the narrow sides of the tunnel the whole way, looking for a possible turnoff. There seemed to be only two ways to get in and out. Gage didn't like this level of vulnerability. He liked options. Sweat dripped from his neck down the back of his cotton shirt. He was antsy to get topside and was about to take action when Titus's head poked down the hole.

“Clear,” he called down.

GAGE

Gage left Zoe's overnight bag in the tunnel, to be retrieved when things were safer. He zipped the computer into his jacket, shoved his Glock into his waistband, and scrambled up the ladder and out of the hole, relieved to fill his lungs with fresh air.

He scanned the room. They were standing in the corner of a minimally furnished bedroom containing a painted iron bed, a faded quilt, and a cross on the wall. He followed Zoe into the living room where she plopped onto a threadbare recliner, her eyes searching his face for answers.

Titus pointed his finger to the olive-green rotary phone hanging on the kitchen wall. "I sent a distress signal to my team. They're en route. We'll have backup within the half hour. Do you have cell service now?" Titus asked as he pulled his phone from his pocket and pressed a number, said, "Systems check," and moved his phone back to the holster on his belt.

Gage rang Titus's phone. When it rang he swiped the red button and put his phone back in his pocket. "The cell jammers aren't working out here."

"That was a drill," Zoe whispered. "We ran down the tunnel so we could try it out and make sure that the plan worked, right? No one went to the factory to find me, right?"

Gage took up watch at the side window where he had a clear visual of the road that ran along the front of the house. Trees dotted the broad expanse of the front yard. His head was on a swivel.

Titus was the one to answer her. "Zoe, we don't know who wants you or what they're resources are. We need to err on the side of caution. You have some powerful people in play. Powerful resources."

"But how?" Her voice warbled. "No one followed us."

Titus moved from window to window, lifting the curtains a fraction of an inch, checking the perimeter, and letting the fabric fall back into place. "No one followed us on the ground."

Gage pulled a heavy, chest-high bookcase away from the wall.

Zoe sat in the corner of the room looking lost. "What does that mean, Gage?"

"Someone could have had us on satellite and been following us remotely. It's a huge stretch. I didn't tell anyone that I called Titus. We left my car back at the hospital, and when Titus picked me up from Quantico, I left my SUV in a garage near the Metro line. In order to follow us, they would have needed to identify Titus and his Hummer as part of our team. Zoe, come here. I need you to come sit in this corner."

"That all seems very improbable." She moved to the corner and wrestled herself down. It wasn't easy with the bulk and rigidity of the bulletproof vest.

Gage had to grab her hands and lower her into position.

"The probability of all that happening is very low," she said again.

"Very low. Move up against the corner, Zoe. I'm going to push this bookcase across the space."

"But why?" she squeaked as he moved the case into position.

He knew she hated small spaces. Hated the feeling of being confined or trapped. Even clutter around her apartment made her uncomfortable; that's why her place was always minimalist and clean. "I'm sorry, sweetheart. I know this sucks. But hopefully it won't suck for long."

“Have you got her situated, Gage?”

“Yeah. What have we got for weapons?”

“I’ll give the house a shake. You look in the jump bag and see what you can come up with.”

Gage pulled the hook and loop closure open on the front of the bag to find a loaded revolver. He leaned over the top of the bookcase. “Zoe?”

She stared up at him with wide eyes.

“Have you ever shot a gun before?” Gage couldn’t imagine Zoe with a weapon in her hand, even if she’d grown up in a military household. She was a bookworm, not an adventurer. But over the last few hours, Zoe had been busting his preconceived notions left and right.

She twitched her head to indicate no.

“Okay, this is a revolver. It’s very easy to shoot because it never jams. But the downside is you only have five bullets, and it has a kick.” He reached down and positioned her hands properly around the grip. “If someone is pointing a weapon at you, look at his stomach. Not his face or his eyes, Zoe. Force yourself to look at his stomach, then reach out like you’re pointing your finger at him, and pull the trigger.”

Her knuckles were white as she squeezed the gun between her hands.

“Deep breaths. We don’t know what’s going on right now. We’re just trying to be prepared for anything, right? Panther Force is only a short distance out. We should hear them roaring up the road any minute now. Noise out front can mean good guys. Breathe, Zoe. Are you breathing?”

“Trying to.”

“Good. You’re doing great. I’ll be back to check on you in a bit.”

Titus was coming out of a side room with a shotgun and a box of shells. He hunkered into the corner that had a view of the front door and was shoving the shells into his pockets.

“Do you hear engines approaching?” Titus asked.

Gage stilled. Yeah, he could hear them. He leaned over the top of the case. “I’m here, Zoe. I’ll protect you. I won’t let anything bad happen to you.”

Zoe said nothing in return, just looked up at him with her glittering black eyes.

Titus swung his head, telling Gage to cover the back. Gage moved into position.

The house fell silent. Those engines should have driven by the house by now. Gage’s senses expanded, sucking in information around him. The bird calls, the leaves blowing across the lawn, every small intonation was analyzed. Gage knew this feeling well. His body was primed for battle. He settled down into the steady count of combat breathing, keeping his mind oxygenated, keeping his body relaxed. Time moved forward and nothing changed. He wondered if what he and Titus had heard was a roadway nearby that he couldn’t account for from the small visual field he had in his position. From what he could tell, anyone coming up the back had little cover. The tree line looked a good fifty yards away. A side street was to his right.

Gage glanced at his watch. “If your team didn’t hit traffic, they’re only a couple minutes out,” he whispered in Titus’s direction. Gage turned his head toward Zoe’s hiding spot. “Soon, Zoe, okay?”

Zoe didn’t answer, but he could imagine her nodding her understanding.

The light on the side table went out. Gage took a step back to get Titus in his view. Titus moved to the phone, lifted the receiver, and after holding it to his ear for a moment, he shook his head and put it back in place. They both checked their cell phones again. Nada.

“Jammers. This isn’t your guys, is it?”

“No way,” Titus responded. His gaze shot back to the bedroom with the escape tunnel and he tipped his head. Did Gage think that would be a good option?

"I'd rather not, man," Gage said. "Going down that hole feels like being a fish in a barrel."

"I'm not going back down in the tunnel again," Zoe's voice rose from behind the shelves.

"Titus, man, if they were able to cut the power and the phone lines they must be close." Gage licked his lips. He slid his phone from his belt and pulled up the number for Special Agent Prescott. He followed Zoe's lead from last night and texted, Zoe SOS, pressed send, and stuck the phone back in his pocket. Since texts were delivered asynchronously, there was the slight chance that it could slip through, and if not, at least he knew the text would keep trying until it was able to be delivered. These bastards couldn't keep jamming the airwaves forever, eventually Prescott would get the heads up.

"Titus, I've got a black SUV coming up the side road. Could it be one of yours?"

"Black, not grey?"

"Black, Durango."

"Not mine. I have the same coming up the front. Counting two heads. Yup. Here we go. AKs."

"Zoe?" Gage called, his voice gruff. "I need you to lay on your side with your back to the bookcase. I want you to pull your knees to your chest and tuck your head down tight. If there are any bullets, they'll need to get through the books and wood, then they'll hit your vest. Stay tucked tight. Tell me when you're in position." Gage worked to make his voice strong and easy, as if this was no big deal. It was a pretty damned big deal. The SUV had pulled behind a copse of hardwood trees, and Gage counted three heads coming up the back. His pistol and limited ammo would be shit stacked up against MP5 submachine guns that his three had in hand. All three men hid their faces behind black ski masks. They moved in practiced formation, leap frogging each other to get closer to the house.

"How would they know we're here, Titus?"

"I don't know, man. We'll have to drill down on that question after we put these tangos to sleep."

"Where's this cavalry you promised us? Times up. They're supposed to be here by now."

"Focus," Titus growled.

Gage watched as the first guy in full tactical uniform jumped the garden fence and ran for the door. Gage massaged the trigger, waiting for the perfect headshot that would take out this guy's nervous system. He needed to make sure there was no last-minute burst of ammo spraying the clapboard walls that offered almost zero in the way of real protection. Those bullets would strafe the house, taking out everyone inside. Just as Gage was about to squeeze the trigger, pink mist engulfed the man's head. The tango's body slumped to the ground.

One of his teammates turned and fired in the direction of the bullet's origin. Gage knew the first man was downed by a sniper rifle. Some guy in a ghillie suit was probably prone in the field just waiting for someone to run in his direction.

"Heads up, Gage. We've got company. The cavalry you were doubting is here. They're dressed in grey camo, Iniquus uniforms. You touch one hair on one of my guys' chinny-chin-chins with your fucking Lauchheimer Trophy shooting skills, and you'll be facing a wrath worse than hell, my brother."

"Copy that." Gage shook his head at Titus's mention of his elite shooting award. He hoped to hell those skills would serve him now. The two remaining tangos were moving in fast. Gage flung himself behind the window frame, hoping for some modicum of protection. The two men split up. One fired toward the woods, forcing anyone back there to duck and cover, the other was racing toward the kitchen door. The tango's MP5 swept high. These men were too well-trained to be shooting so poorly. Gage thought the guy was probably trying to force their heads down, their bodies behind cover. Keep them from shooting. It didn't seem like he intended to kill everyone in the house. Gage thought back to the bag brought in by the two Israelis the other night. It was packed to capture. They were coming to take Zoe alive. As for Titus and him, these guys probably didn't care about their health as much.

The tango was on the patio now. He stopped for a nanosecond glancing down at his dead teammate. As he hopped the body and put his foot on the porch stair, a grey-clad hulk swung around the corner and tackled the man to the ground. Gage had a bead on the guy near the field. He pulled the trigger and saw him fall and roll. When he got up, he gripped his shoulder and took off toward the Durango.

Bullets strafed the house from the front. Gage could hear the plinking of metal and exploding glass. From the front room, the sound of Zoe mewling, temporarily dragged his attention away from the fight. When he spun back, he saw the tango slip through the Panther's grasp and leap through the door. Gage brought his fist up and clocked the man with a hard right hook across the jaw. His knuckles slid across the knitted surface of his mask. Gage readied an uppercut, but before he could deliver it, the tango dropped. The Panther shot through the doorway, flinging himself on top of the unconscious man. He cuffed him and gave him a pat down before he unceremoniously hauled the guy the rest of the way into the house and shut the door.

Gage ducked and ran for the front room.

"Clear," Titus yelled, as he popped the front door open for his team members to come in.

Gage dragged the bookcase out of the corner. Zoe was flailing. With practiced hands he checked her for bullet wounds. There on her back, he could see where three rounds had flattened into shiny silver circles against the plates of her protective vest. He yanked the closure until he had her free of her armor. She put her fists to her chest and sucked in air. He pulled her into his arms and buried his nose in the warm silkiness of her hair. "I've got you, Zoe. You're safe now. I've got you," he whispered.

Slowly, Zoe was able to catch her breath. She clung to Gage and every time he said, "I've got you," she seemed to climb a little further out of the place this attack had driven her.

Titus moved to stand next to the two. "Gage, man, we've got to get her moved."

Before Titus could hustle them toward the car, Special Agent Prescott arrived on the scene, lights flashing. He stood beside the century-old magnolia tree, where Gage introduced him to Titus Kane. Titus gave a two-sentence overview of the attack.

“You got here fast,” Gage said.

“The SOS text system isn’t the best, but it’s working.” It seemed as though the moment the black SUV took off from the side street with its one occupant, Gage’s text went through. Prescott had traced the number and raced to their location, which fortunately wasn’t that far from where he was working. “Are you okay, Zoe?” Prescott asked.

Zoe felt like she was on some kind of hallucinatory drug. She nodded in reply. She was glad for Gage’s hand resting between her shoulder blades. It was her anchor.

Prescott sent a glance toward the bullet-ridden front of the little white cottage. “How many are in custody? How many killed?”

“Panther Force didn’t sustain any casualties. Zoe took three bullets in her vest. She’ll have bruising tomorrow. Of the tangos, one neutralized, one in custody. Three got away, going opposite directions in two vehicles. We didn’t chase them down. We weren’t going to split our forces if they had a B team heading in. But we got photographs of their license plates.”

“Send those over to my phone, will you?”

“Done,” Titus responded.

“Shit.” Prescott shook his head. “I wish I knew what was going on. DCPD wasn’t able to come up with IDs on the men that broke into Zoe’s apartment. They aren’t in any of our systems. It doesn’t mean we’ll stop working on it though, Zoe.”

“Iniquus has that, sir,” Titus said. “I’ll send their identifications to you as well. Right now, what you need to know is that they were documented as Israeli Armed Services. The two men were listed as being MIA, assumed dead in an explosion.”

“How did Iniquus swing an identification, where the DCPD and FBI couldn’t?”

“Gage took photos of faces and ears, and rolled fingerprints after he neutralized the danger. With those three data points, we’re confident in the IDs churned out by our computer system,” he said obliquely.

Zoe turned her head to catch Gage’s eye. When did he have time to do that? She didn’t remember him doing that. Thank goodness he did that.

Gage looked down at her and dropped a kiss on her forehead.

“Israeli?” Prescott shot a glance at the house. “All right.” He took a couple steps away from the men, and posted his hands on his hips while he looked up at the sky, making some decision or other. “This is getting complicated as hell, with a lot of foreign intrigue, and a lot of American interests at play. Let’s start here for now. How did Iniquus get involved?”

“We heard from Gage that a DARPA scientist was in danger, and Iniquus stepped in with pro-bono security when the FBI fell short.” There was no censure in his voice, Titus was merely stating facts.

Prescott chewed on the inside of his cheek. “Is Iniquus willing to continue playing a security role?”

“For the time being,” Titus said. “Of course, if this is going to be long term, you’re going to need to shift this case to the US Marshal Services.”

“But we have some time to try to figure this out?”

“What are you thinking?” Titus asked.

“I’ll call in an FBI cleanup crew to come take care of this. If anyone heard gunshots and called the police, we can wave them off.” Prescott sent a glance up and down the street. “Doesn’t look like that’s going to be a problem though.” He focused back on Titus. “We take the suspect to Iniquus headquarters, put him in one of your interrogation rooms, and see if we can’t convince him to talk. We take Zoe to your headquarters, as well—she’ll be safe and comfortable there for the moment until we can get her rehoused. And we get started piecing the story together. As Zoe names names, I’ll have one of my FBI team run by and pick them up for a friendly chat, to see if they can add anything to our understanding. All very nice, polite, and civilized. Folks will probably be better about spilling their guts in one of the Iniquus conference rooms than they would if we were asking questions at FBI headquarters, where they’d probably lawyer up. Iniquus has the same ability to record and remote view as we do.”

“How do you think they found us?” Gage asked.

“Had to be trackers,” Prescott said. “Did anyone sweep you?”

“Titus looked at Zoe’s phone, and it was compromised. It’s still at Iniquus,” Gage said. He looked for Titus’s nod that that was the case.

“But not you and your clothes?”

“No. Why would we?” Gage asked.

Titus rubbed a hand over his chin. “You were rubbing shoulders last night and this morning with a bunch of people who seem to have a lot riding on Zoe Kealoha. You brought in a pocketful of high-powered business cards. And most of those people have access to tracking technology.” He looked over at Prescott. “I’ve got equipment in my Hummer. We’ll give them both a check before we move them.”

“Let’s go ahead and take care of that sweep,” Gage said, “and get this show on the road. I don’t want the three that got away to come back with a bigger team and bigger weapons. We don’t need a showdown out here.”

Titus moved to his Hummer, driven over by a Panther, to gather his equipment. Prescott was on his cell, barking orders. Gage stood in place muttering in her ear, “This kind of thing was all so normal when I was in the Middle East. It feels pretty foreign here at home.”

Zoe leaned back into him, and he wrapped his arms around her armor-plated vest. She wondered how in the world they were going to keep her safe without putting themselves in even more danger.

Zoe

Anger is as a stone cast into a wasp's nest.

~ Malabar Proverb

A handful of covert tracking devices lay on the kitchen table. Titus, Zoe, Gage, and Prescott stared down at the collection.

“Unbelievable.” Titus laced his fingers behind his head and leaned back in his chair. “This SNAFU is going to be the subject of a command leader meeting. Obviously, a body sweep needs to be part of our intake protocol.”

“Seems like a one in a million shot that something like this could happen,” Prescott said.

Titus focused on him. “It only takes one.”

“Now we know why we had time for Panther Force to get in place. They tracked the safe house but couldn't follow us when we were in the tunnel, no radio signal that deep down.”

One of the Panthers, a guy they called Thorn, tall and lanky like a basketball player, knocked on the doorframe leading from the dining room to the kitchen, and caught Titus's eye. “Sir, I'm back from the safe house.”

“Find anything?”

“Yes, sir, everything was intact at the original site. But they were about to make their play.”

“Signs?” Prescott asked.

“Det cord and C-4 on the factory door. Not the side entrance we use for in and out, the main door that was soldered shut. Boot prints in strategically triangulated observation points. Tire tracks to two SUVs parked on the far side from where you drove your Hummer, Commander. From the rutting, it looks like they took off in a hurry.”

“You were on foot when you escaped. How did you beat them here?” Prescott asked.

“We were only a klick by tunnel, which was dug as the crow flies, but it's a seven-mile detour by car. They had to gather the team, find our location, develop a new plan, and execute. The SOS Gage sent to you slipped through almost immediately, so it looks like the fates were shining a little luck in our direction.”

“What are you thinking, Gage?” Prescott asked.

Zoe turned to Gage to see his fierce as hell combat face.

“I don't like how close we came to not having the present outcome. I'm used to close shaves. But in the rubble of Kabul that was the expectation. On American soil, I didn't anticipate a foreign enemy to be gunning for us. And I didn't expect to be protecting precious cargo.”

“Precious cargo,” Zoe repeated, trying out the words.

“Zoe, you're classified as precious cargo,” Titus said. “It means we're tasked with keeping you safe. Okay?”

Zoe gave a quick nod, not sure how to respond. Was she okay with that? Well, she'd rather be someone's precious cargo than a hunting trophy someone bagged. But who? Who wanted her enough to chance gunfire in the middle of the day? And C-4, for heaven's sake. She looked down at the trackers on the table. “And each of these devices were placed by different people?” Zoe asked.

“No, these two are the same. One planted in your jacket and one in Gage’s. So it’s probably the same person who planted these,” Prescott answered.

“Well, one of these is obvious.” Gage picked up Christopher Bilik’s business card. “Can anyone explain how this is a tracker?”

The four of them stared at the card. Gage turned it over and held it up to the light. He examined the thickness. It looked and felt like every other card in the pile.

Prescott turned to Zoe. “Ideas?”

Zoe took the card from Gage and ran her thumb over the print and graphic. She was alone in her mind, where she was comfortably free of others’ intrusions, though she knew that the men sat still and silent, waiting for her to come back into the room with them and offer up an explanation.

She waved the card in the air. “An EMF detector would be needed to confirm.” She let her gaze circle the table, taking in the men who sat with her. “Have any of you heard about smart dust?”

Three heads shook in reply.

“Hmmm. Well it’s the only thing I can think of right now.”

The men waited patiently.

“I thought smart dust was still conceptual in its communication’s application.” Zoe laid the card back on the table. “There was a grad student at the University of California. I think her name was Janice Link...Jamie Link. She was working on a silicon chip, which she exploded by accident, destroying it. But through that accident she realized that the individual pieces could work as sensors. Those sensors have real-world applications now in many scientific ways, such as detecting tumors.” She fell silent.

The men watched her as she ran the pads of her fingertips over the card like she was reading braille. She pursed her lips in concentration.

“Zoe,” Gage reached for her hand. “You’re going to have to make a connection for us between Jamie Link’s discovery and this card.”

She looked up. “It would just be speculation.” Zoe didn’t like theory and speculation; they could throw thoughts in incorrect directions. She liked facts and clear data. Sitting at this kitchen table, without scientific equipment, she had a hypothesis and that was about it.

“That’s okay,” Gage said.

Zoe put the card back on the table. “A collection of microelectromechanical systems can form a simple computer.”

Prescott reached for the card and ran his thumb over the print like Zoe had. “Small enough that it could be embedded in this card or even the ink on this card?”

“They are light enough that they can remain suspended in air,” Zoe replied. “The concept is used to gather information in environments that are hostile to life.”

“How small would this be?” Titus reached for the card so he could feel the print as well.

“I’m just speculating.” Zoe needed them to hear the word again. They needed to understand that she didn’t have the answers. Shifting her weight from one thigh to another, she said, “That’s not good science.”

Prescott leaned forward. “We’re throwing ideas on the table. No one’s going to call these actual facts. Why do you want this card to be EMF detector? What do you think we might find?”

“It could be that the foil on the “M” is an antenna to augment the capacity of a tracking system built on smart dust research.”

Prescott reached to take the card from Titus and stared at the logo. “It would need a power source.”

“If it were me? I’d go for kinetic energy or possible light power. No, not light. The card will be in a place that gets little to no light, in someone’s pocket or wallet. Kinetic energy. That’s what I’d develop.”

Prescott lay the Montrim card on the table. Gage pulled out the other business cards that he had in his pocket. “Let’s see if we can figure out where the other trackers came from.” He laid the cards in a straight line down the middle of the table. “Zoe sent me a text, I came to visit her. There were two attackers. Neither would have been able to plant a tracker on me. The next people I encountered were the DCPD.” Gage moved the detective’s card to the front of the line. “Detective Adamson and I had a close encounter in the kitchen. I have no idea why he would plant a tracker on me.”

“He wouldn’t,” Prescott said. “Let’s take him off the table.”

Gage scooped the card up and put it in his pocket. “And you were there too, Prescott. Later on, I met you for our field trip.”

Zoe wondered what kind of field trip Gage had taken in the middle of the night with the FBI special agent.

“None of these are mine.” Prescott flicked his finger at the tracking devices. “I had zero reason to track you. I know Zoe from her work with the blood biomarker field analysis. I went to her condo following her SOS text. I met you later because you had a weird correlation between—” Prescott cut himself short when Gage glared in his direction. “I’m involved now because you sent a second SOS text. And frankly, I’m looking forward to getting caught up on what this is all about. Why is there Israeli interest in Zoe?”

“I think we’re all are looking forward to understanding this better.” Gage picked up Prescott’s card. “That takes you off the table too.” Gage moved that card to his pocket. “Leaving Zoe’s place, my first stop was Colonel Guthrie’s house.”

“Why did you go there?” Titus asked.

Zoe turned interested eyes on Gage. “How did you know I know the Colonel?”

“I called the hospital to see if they would give me an update on you. They were able to tell me what was going on because I was listed on your advanced medical directive.”

“That’s right, I filled that out as a requirement when I set up a lab at Montrim. I also listed Colonel Guthrie,” Zoe said as the light went on in her head.

“I found his address in your phone and went to tell him what had happened in person.” Gage moved the colonel’s card forward. “While I was there, Senator Billings showed up drunk on the colonel’s lawn. I removed myself to the kitchen while the colonel sent his friend upstairs. I found the senator’s wallet on the grass as I left and took a card. It wasn’t offered to me. I was never in the same room as the senator.” Gage pulled Charles Billings’s card off the table and put it in his pocket.

“Next, I went to the hospital. First Parker, then Grossman came to visit. They both came right into the room. Grossman mostly stood by the sink except when he shook my hand. I don’t see how he could have planted a tracker on me. But I’m going to leave him in play.” Gage pulled that card to the side. “Parker, on the other hand, made himself at home. The next person to visit the hospital was the colonel.” Gage tapped the card. “Then Bilik from Montrim. We know he handed me his tracker, embedded somehow in this card.”

“The CIA were the only ones who walked into the hospital room?” Prescott asked, pulling Parker’s card to the center.

“That’s right, I spoke with everyone else at her door.”

“Then the CIA would have had the opportunity to plant the pair of trackers in the coats, one for Zoe and one for Gage.” Prescott put the matching trackers on that card.

“Which leaves two more trackers and one card,” Titus said.

Prescott moved the tracker that was found in Zoe’s watch to the side. “This was done in the past. Not last night.” He put the last tracker they’d found on Gage onto Colonel Guthrie’s business card. “Now isn’t that interesting. Why did he go by the hospital in the early hours of the morning? Didn’t you already tell him she was fine?”

“He brought me some coffee and a sandwich. He came to check up on her.”

Titus leaned forward. “So he expected you to be there. He knew what had happened. He knew you were going to be protecting her. Did he know you contacted me?”

“I didn’t mention you, no.”

“He wanted to know where you were taking her,” Titus said. “Still, why would he plant a tracker? I’m not so sure about this one.”

“I’m more confident in the ones planted by the CIA. They definitely wanted to know where she went.” Prescott sent a speculative look Zoe’s way.

“But there’s also the tracker that was in my phone, that Titus found, and now the one in my watch.” She pointed to where her watch lay on the table with its back removed. “People could have been tracking me for a very long time.”

This tracker information was a lot to take in. Why did people feel a need to follow her? She felt gray, as if all the color had been wrung from her body. Gage reached out to run a calming hand down her arm and lace his fingers with hers. She squeezed his hand between both of hers as she looked at the Panther Force men, posted at the doors and windows. “This is an inappropriate location for that discussion.”

“Understood,” Titus said. “We’ll have you in a secured location soon. Now that we have a good idea how they found you at the safe house, we can do a better job of keeping you protected.”

“That’s our cleanup crew,” Prescott said.

Titus picked up a box that would thwart the tracking signals, placed the devices inside, and shut the lid. “Now everyone will know we’ve found the trackers. Whoever sent the teams in knows they blew their best chance at their grab, not once but twice.” He glanced around the table. “They know if they’re going to get to Zoe, the time between our leaving this house and getting her squirrelled away is probably their only window of opportunity. I imagine they’re scrambling to find a way to snatch her from us. Time to head out.”

Zoe

Where the wasp has passed the fly sticks fast.

~ French proverb

The FBI panel van sat to the side of the circular driveway. Prescott went out to talk to them and two of the Panthers had gone to bring their vehicles around. Gage and Zoe waited off to the side.

Prescott jogged back to the front door. “Okay, we’re set,” he called loudly enough for the entire team to hear. “The clean-up crew will take care of the body.”

“Body? What body?” Zoe spun around, searching for an answer.

“Let’s get saddled up and head out,” Prescott finished without answering Zoe.

“Roger that.” Titus moved through the door as two charcoal grey SUVs pulled in. “Prescott, you got restraining systems? We don’t have paperwork to carry the prisoner with us.”

“Yeah, let’s get him strapped into my vehicle.”

Titus turned back to the house. “Okay, bring him out.”

Gage maneuvered Zoe out the door and toward the car that would take the middle spot in the convoy. It sat center stage on the sparsely graveled drive.

Zoe turned to watch as one of the Panthers led a man out the front and down the cracked cement walkway. Prescott reached out and plucked the ski mask from his head, exposing the beginnings of one hell of a bruise, a split lip and a swollen jaw that hung at an improbable angle.

“Zoe, do you recognize this guy?”

With Gage pinned to her side, Zoe moved closer to scrutinize the man’s face.

“No. I don’t know him,” Zoe said as the man licked his lips suggestively. When his leer became a wink, Zoe had the urge to slap the smirk off the man’s face. Gage beat her to it with a straight punch that crushed the man’s nose. Zoe jumped back out of the way of the spurt of blood that shot from his nostrils and dripped down the front of his shirt. The man would have gone down except for the Panther’s tight grip.

“Goddamnit, Gage. You broke his goddamned nose.” Prescott threw his hands in the air. “Now he’s going to bleed all over my goddamned car.”

“Sorry about that,” Gage growled. He was eye to eye with the man who tried to shoot his way into the house to get to her. Gage was palpably seething with violence, and Zoe thought he was having a hard time stoppering it.

Titus patted him on the shoulder. “Stand down, Marine. Get Zoe into the car.”

Gage turned. “Fucker,” he said and spat on the ground. He reached for Zoe’s hand. Gage stalked down the sidewalk, and she two-stepped to keep up.

A Panther opened the SUV’s door and pulled the center bench seat down. “You’ll be in this one, ma’am.” He extended his hand to shake with her. “My name’s Thaddeus Crushed, I go by Nutsbe.”

“Nutsbe?” Zoe said wonderingly, then she put two and two together. “Oh!” She grimaced.

He crawled into the far back with a chuckle and pulled the seat into place.

“Go ahead, Zoe.” Gage held out his hand, gesturing her in.

She moved to the far side of the center bench. Gage folded himself in beside her.

A second Panther came over. “Hey, man.” He reached out and fist bumped Gage. “I heard you might be joining our team, dude. Did you think you’d get better cred if we saw you in action?”

“How am I doing?” Gage asked.

“So far, alive and kicking, and that’s about all anyone can ask. Ma’am, I’m Brian Ackerman.” He reached past Gage to shake her hand. “They call me Brainiack.” Brian, like the other Panthers, looked like he spent a good deal of time keeping his body finely tuned. His tactical jacket was unzipped, revealing how his uniform compression shirt showed off his pecs and washboard abs. His eyes were sharp and he wore an air of competence like a second skin. Gage would fit right in with these warriors. But she couldn’t imagine Gage ever leaving the Marines. She wondered why he even went for the interview. Maybe it was curiosity.

“Zoe,” she said in a near whisper.

Brainiack nodded, slammed Gage’s door shut, and jumped in the front seat as Titus jogged over and flung himself behind the wheel.

Titus cranked the engine and pulled out behind Prescott. “Forty minutes, so settle in,” he said as gravel crunched under their tires.

Prescott held the lead as they pulled away from the little house. The special agent had another Panther sitting shotgun. Zoe hadn’t seen the team all in one place. She turned and scanned the car behind them. There were two more heads. So six Panthers, one FBI agent, and one marine. She should feel safe. Should.

“Gage, are you sure the prisoner is secure? Could he get over the seat and out the back door?”

Nutsbe answered from the back. “The tango is shackled to the floorboard, his hands are cuffed to the rod above his head, and he’s safety-belted for good measure in the far back seat.”

“Okay. Thank you, Nuts—um, Thaddeus.”

“Tad will do, ma’am, if you don’t like my call name,” he said with a grin.

All of the men seemed vigilant. Competent. Ready. She was the only one who was shaking. Gage sent her a searching look, obviously trying to see how she was handling things. Zoe didn’t have it in her to lie, to let him think she was a brave little soldier. She was nothing of the kind. She didn’t inherit any of her father’s military blood. She turned her face to look out the window and wished for the sanctuary of her laboratory.

As they drove, Zoe’s limbic system was lit up. Sweat dampened her underarms and thighs and the small of her back. She licked her lips; her mouth had gone oddly dry. She felt like a woman crawling through the desert desperately hoping to get to water. As they merged onto the highway, Zoe realized that she was having a lot of desert thoughts. The stories her subconscious had pushed forward last night had helped her immensely in her condo when her body went stiff and all she had by way of defense were memories. With them, she had evaded capture or injury.

She would have survived on her own had she not sent that “come and get me” text to Gage earlier that evening. Had he not shown up, the would-be kidnappers might have headed on to plan B. But before they got the chance, Gage killed them. Gage killed them. She closed her eyes. They were Israeli soldiers. They had been assumed dead. Now they really were dead. And who knew why?

Zoe hated the tortured loops her brain was making. She wanted to be back in her life from twenty-four hours ago. Twenty-four hours, could that be right? She lifted her wrist to check the time and remembered that Titus had taken her watch and its tracker away from her. She pushed back her hair, now damp and stringy, getting it out of her face. She’d really like a shower. And some water. That thought brought her right back to deserts.

Travelling in a convoy reminded Zoe of the photos her dad sent to her and her mom from Iraq and stories she had heard on painful anniversaries when her dad drank too much. Her dad had been on a detail that ran VIPs down the hellish twelve-kilometer road that stretched between the heavy fortifications of the Green Zone and Baghdad International Airport. It was extremely dangerous. Getting from the airport to the Green Zone safely was not a given. Insurgents targeted the area because of the military convoys and the high-profile visitors. Suicide bombers, roadside bombs, even random shooters were the norm, not the exception. Her dad drove a hillbilly armored car. That was when a normal military vehicle was retrofitted with anything the soldiers could find in the scrap pile to give themselves a chance at survival.

She turned toward Gage. He was leaning forward, scanning to the right. Zoe looked back at Tad, his eyes were busy looking everywhere around them. “Tad, is this a normal SUV or is it tricked out with bullet proof panels?”

He maintained his focus on his surroundings but said, “Not armored. No, ma’am, But it’s got bullet resistant glass and run flat tires.”

“Thank you.” Zoe turned to look out her window again. They were side by side with an eighteen-wheeler, so she didn’t have much of a view. A soundtrack played in her mind, Tim McGraw’s I’m Already Home. Such a sad song. Zoe wasn’t a big country music fan, but this was the tearjerker that her dad played on endless loop every painful February 26th. It was the only night of the year when he became an angry drunk. Mean. The only night when her mom would slip out to call some of Dad’s buddies to come talk him down, while she came into Zoe’s room, locked the door and climbed in bed with her.

“This isn’t your father,” she’d whisper into Zoe’s ear. “This is the anger.”

In 1991, when Zoe was three years old, Dad’s twin was stationed in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia when a missile destroyed the barracks, killing twenty-seven and wounding another ninety-eight Americans. Zoe hated this song. It reminded her of vulnerability and craziness. Well, she guessed that was fitting, since she did feel vulnerable and crazy. As they drove forward, Zoe’s mind insisted on thoughts of Iraq. Why?

Zoe scanned her memory. She knew that Operation Desert Storm was over two days after the barracks attack, February 28th, 1991. Her teachers on base had made sure that date was drilled into her head. After the Iraqis announced they were withdrawing from Kuwait, they fled down Highway 80.

It was a huge Iraqi convoy of tanks and armored vehicles, fleeing troops, and trucks. Allied forces bombed them from the air. It became known as the “Highway of Death.” The PR was a nightmare, because the airmen bombed the front of the convoy, blocking forward movement, and then bombed the rear, stopping the Iraqis from turning around. For two days, they bombed everything in between. Most of the Iraqis fled into the desert on foot. But there were miles of destruction. It looked like the Americans were having a turkey shoot. That wasn’t the truth of it. But that wasn’t really the point here.

Zoe cleared her throat and once again wished for some water. “Could someone please explain to me how this works? How does the convoy stay safe if someone were to try to attack us?”

Tad was the one who answered. “Prescott’s the only vehicle with lights and sirens. The plan is to only use them in a tight space. We’re doing our best to keep a low profile, which is one of the reasons we left the Hummer back at the house. Our goal is to never come to a complete stop. Our route keeps us to the highways as much as possible, but highways can’t get us entirely from point A to point B.

There are two times when we'll have to deal with stop signs and traffic lights. No matter what, we'll stay bumper to bumper in those spots to avoid the risk of the team getting divided."

"Thank you," Zoe replied. He didn't add, "And possibly conquered," but Zoe heard it in her head.

It really was a complicated time of day to not get cut off from one another, Zoe mused. People were pouring into the city, looking forward to a Friday night of restaurants and entertainment, while others were trying to leave work early for their weekend away from the congestion of the city. Brainiack had told her that Iniquus was positioned on a green space along the Virginia side of the Potomac. That seemed like where the congestion would be concentrated.

Gage reached back behind him, and she slid her hand into his. She knew that his right hand held the Glock just beneath the window line, out of sight but at the ready. They were moving off the highway to the first of the small towns they needed to traverse. They flew through the stop signs and traffic signals with the help of Prescott's blue lights. They travelled in tight formation. In and out. Zoe had held her breath the whole way. As soon as their tires hit the highway and their speed was up to seventy, she breathed again.

They drove on for another twenty minutes before the blinker click-clacked, signaling their move up the ramp.

"Your heel jackhammering the floorboard is shaking the whole SUV, Gage. What you got going through your head?" Titus asked.

"This is too easy, man. We haven't seen hide nor hair of these guys. This is their last shot at Zoe, and their last shot at getting their guy back before we interrogate him and make him spill. They should have been all over us by now. What have we got? Crickets. The hair on the back of my neck is standing up." He scanned the roadway. "Let's not get comfortable. If I were a betting man, I'd say it's going to be when we go through this last town."

"Well, let's hope you're wrong about that. Why don't you lay Zoe down?" Titus said. "Nutsbe told you we've got bullet resistant glass, but its effectiveness depends on what kind of bullets they're shooting. You feel me?"

"I feel you." Gage pulled her hand toward him. "Zoe, put your head in my lap, sweetheart."

Zoe

• • • •

Zoe's brow furrowed. Somehow, she was just now realizing that there were eight men putting themselves in danger for her.

That was ridiculous.

She resisted his tug. She wasn't worth anyone's life. Not these Panthers, not Damion Prescott, and certainly not Gage.

Gage pulled her hand harder until she fell into his lap.

This is what people meant when they wrote "her heart was in her throat." It always seemed like such metaphorical phrase, but this felt literal. Zoe's head rested on Gage's muscular thigh, the seat belt bit into her hip, and she had no good place to put her long legs. Gage ran his fingers through her hair, leaving his hand on her back. She tucked her head down and covered her face with her hands, hating the fact that he knew she was crying.

The convoy slowed. "Not too close, Titus," Brian's low voice wafted back from the front. "Let's leave a little get out of Dodge room if it comes to that."

"Yeah, I hate to say it, but back in the sandbox the hair on the back of Gage's neck was a damned good barometer on what was coming our way. I'd get my barrel up a little higher."

The exchange was so low; she knew they didn't want her to hear. But adrenaline, she'd found, had wild amplification qualities.

"Yellow light. Keep the gas pedal down, man," Brainiack muttered.

They powered through, with horns honking on either side.

"One down. One to go. Then we should be home free," Titus called back, then mumbled under his breath, "Come on, baby, stay green for me."

Zoe turned her head in time to see Titus pull the cord running from inside his jacket up the side of his neck. His comms popped out of his ear. He tapped a button on his dash. "Panther actual, Beta team. Control, what are you seeing?"

A woman's voice came over the radio. "Titus, you've got a cement mixer perpendicular, running south two blocks forward and an RV heading north directly behind car three. If they're working together they can box you in at the next light."

"Alpha, copy," Prescott's voice came over the radio.

"Charlie, copy."

That must be the car behind ours, Zoe thought.

The woman's voice came back. "That scenario is a go. The cement truck is picking up speed for an intercept."

"Beta, going left."

Zoe popped up out of Gage's reach when he let go of her to double-fist his gun. Titus peeled the car around, with a solid bump to the back fender of someone's BMW. The sudden squeal of tires and squawk of a car alarm had Zoe's blood pumping. She sat rigidly in her seat.

“Charlie, right behind you.”

Zoe turned to see the third car rounding the curve with better precision.

“Alpha, backing to follow. Lights and sirens.”

Moments later, though Zoe couldn't see the car, she could hear the sirens behind them as they rocketed down the curving side streets of the town. What town? She had no clue where she was.

“Control. Beta, be advised, the cement truck is in pursuit. The RV is in advance of your position. Your road curves eastward, and they have the ability to cut off your present direction of travel. The cement truck is pushing Alpha from the rear. You are in danger of being boxed in.”

Boxed in. The Highway of Death.

“Alternate route?” Titus asked.

The men in the car were like the edge of a knife. Sharp. Capable of great harm. They all had a latent deadliness as they seemed to fearlessly face this danger. Focused, yes. Primed, yes. But not afraid. She, on the other hand, had the sudden overwhelming urge to pee. She crossed one knee over the other and squeezed her thighs tightly together.

“Roger that. I don't see the break, can you count me in?”

“Control. Beta, you are coming up on the turn in four, three, two, one, hard right.”

Titus spun his wheel, and the car bounced over the ditch in great leaps and bounds that threw Zoe up against the restraint of her seatbelt. Her hands reached out to grab the seat in front of her, and she was able to snatch them back in time. She didn't want to jostle Titus as he navigated the deep furrows of winter wheat.

He was aiming for a narrow break in the trees. Too narrow? It looked too narrow. Zoe scanned left and right. There didn't seem to be any other options. Their wheels were severely hampered on this terrain. Even though this was a SUV with high, wide tires, it seemed to her that the cement truck would have an easier time. She could hear the roar of its engine, and she could see how close it was pulling to Prescott at the back of their convoy.

Titus bounced and bumped into the trees. The saplings in front of them were felled and crushed. The paint scraped from the sides of the vehicle with shrill resentment as Titus gunned the engine and squeezed through. Charlie and Alpha held tight behind them, bumper to bumper.

The woman reported. “The cement truck was unable to navigate the trees, it has returned to the road and is backtracking. It's a long shot, but if he follows along that road, he could possibly take you where the dirt road meets the public roadway. Keep your speed up as much as possible.”

“Where's the RV gone?” Titus asked. His voice perfectly steady.

Glancing into the rearview mirror, Zoe could see his expression was the exact same look of underlying power that it always held. Should that reassure her? She didn't feel reassured.

“Control. The RV is heading north.”

“Any other cars raising a red flag?”

“I'll keep looking. I have an option for you, Beta,” she said.

“Listening.”

“If you go left instead of right on the farm road and cross over a field, you will come to a barn. It looks like there's a church bus parked alongside. You could exchange vehicles.”

“How far out?”

“Five minutes, at your current rate of travel.”

“Prescott?”

“Alpha. Ditching these vehicles sounds like a plan to me.”

“Beta. Copy that. Control can you try to make contact with that house? See if they won’t lend us their bus for the afternoon?”

“Roger. Wilco.” Then communications went silent. The men were silent. The only noise was the thunk of the Tahoe’s overtaxed suspension system.

• • • •

THE FARMER STOOD IN front of the gaping maw of the old barn, signaling them forward. They pulled into the darkness and tumbled out of their car doors.

Prescott and his Panther were busy unhooking the prisoner.

The old farmer had a rotund body and a rosy face. He looked tickled pink to be on this adventure.

“Sir, Titus Kane from Iniquus. That’s Special Agent Prescott, FBI. We very much appreciate your help. But, sir, there are dangerous people involved. Iniquus Control says that you insist on driving. How can I convince you to simply rent your bus to us? If there’s any damage, we’re well-covered by insurance.”

Zoe didn’t hear the rest of the conversation as Gage hustled her onto the bus and sat her in an orange vinyl seat.

Titus must have lost the argument, because the gentleman, with keys in hand, was hot-footing it toward the bus. The Panthers had piled in and sat strategically, with their weapons ready.

The gentleman cranked the engine. He tipped his head up to see everyone in his mirror as he pulled the handle to shut the bus doors. “You’ll see. It’s for the best I drive. This old girl can be a might ornery. And besides, if anyone looks in the window, they’ll see it’s me and not one of y’all driving. If you keep your heads down, we’ll trick ‘em for sure. Hee-hee.”

Zoe bent down in compliance, confused by this man’s obvious glee. An unexpected adventure on a Friday afternoon. Gage had her in the seat next to the window and his gun was pointed out the glass over her back. Zoe whispered up to him, “Gage, is there any way they could have tracked us making the switch?”

“Probably. But there’s nothing we can do about it. We have to play the hand we’ve been dealt.”

Out they rumbled. The only voice on the bus was the soft-spoken directions that Titus gave to their driver. For a good twenty minutes, Zoe stayed bent over, keeping her head down, praying under her breath for safety.

GAGE

“Let’s move,” Titus ordered. He patted the driver’s back and thanked him again as their group disembarked. The bus had let them off at the front guard post at Iniquus headquarters. There was a changing of manpower. Three vehicles sat just inside of the gate. Six men exited and moved toward the bus. “That’s Tidal Force. They’re going back with the bus to bring in our vehicles,” Brainiack said.

Zoe nodded. She didn’t look good. She hadn’t said a word since she asked about convoy strategy. They moved as a group to the new set of SUVs, drove a short distance to a building that looked like a country club with colonnaded porticos. If you didn’t know its true function, you’d swear it was a place for fine dining, wedding ceremonies, and charity golf weekends. That image changed the moment they powered into the underground garage.

They took an elevator up to an atrium that was coldly modern in its décor. It reminded Gage of streamlined efficiency. Everything was gunmetal gray, chrome and black. The men were in Iniquus battle dress uniforms. The women wore civilian clothes in black and grey. Gage felt right at home here. He looked at Zoe, with her shoulders nearly to her ears, and her stiff-legged gait, and thought she didn’t get the same sense of relief from this environment.

Titus moved Gage and Zoe along the right-hand corridor. The rest of the Panthers and Prescott moved down the center corridor.

Titus slowed his step and turned until he caught sight of Zoe. “How are you doing, ma’am?”

“I could use something to eat and a nap, to be perfectly honest.” Her voice was just above a whisper.

“We can take care of both. Here we go.” He opened his palm as a woman rounded the corner, her face brightened with a wide smile. “You’ll have time for a meal. We also have a nap pod available. It’s the adrenaline spiking in your system and dropping out that makes you feel so tired. Some sleep should help. My associate can accommodate you while the team comes up with the next step.”

Zoe stopped walking. “Have you any idea what that might be?”

“We need to hear what you have to say about this situation. And we need to see if there’s any kind of correlate between your experiences and Lily Winters’s death. You were about to tell us about a connection between you, Lily, and Montrim that went beyond school. You said it had something to do with wasps.”

Zoe nodded.

Titus’s colleague arrived at their side. “Commander.” She beamed at Titus.

“Margot, this is Dr. Kealoha. If you could see that she has an opportunity to eat and recuperate from this morning, I’d appreciate it. Tidal Force will be back within the hour with her luggage.”

“Certainly, sir. Doctor, if you’ll follow me?” Margot lifted her arm to point down the hall.

Zoe searched Gage’s face, clearly asking if she should go. He didn’t like to be separated from her, but Zoe needed to eat and sleep. He was worried about her after her hospital stint. She hadn’t fully recovered before her discharge; she was simply stable enough to be sent home. Then they lumped on more anxiety, physical action, and lack of food, and she was bound to relapse. He could do more good for her in the meetings, sharing what he learned while Zoe was in the hospital, than by holding her hand. They needed to go in different directions for now.

He dropped a kiss onto her head. "I'll see you in a little while."

She took a hesitant step forward, then followed Margot onto the elevator, and she was gone.

Titus started them back toward where the rest of the team had headed. "I had a colleague pull security footage from the scene of Lily's death. And we'd like to hear what Prescott has to say about the autopsy. We need a copy of the death investigator's report. We need to know whether there is a correlation between the two incidents or not. That's key."

"Prescott agreed to this?" Gage asked, stretching his legs so he and Titus maintained the same gait.

"He's reporting in to his office and getting the files sent over now. The autopsy and cause of death is a big question and the other one is what the heck the wasps Zoe mentioned are. Any clue?"

"None. Zoe doesn't talk about her work with me."

"You and the Zoe seem tight. How long have you known her?" Titus asked.

"We've been seeing each other for about six months."

They stopped in front of an elevator bank and Titus pressed the up button. "Last I knew, you were stationed at Camp Lejeune."

"Yes, sir, my unit's still down in Carolina." Now that Gage was back in a military setting, his protocols snapped back into place. "I'm in and out of Quantico right now, helping to develop some new training procedures. Still feeling my way, trying to figure out whether I want to re-up or not."

"And?"

"I haven't made up my mind. I appreciate Iniquus's understanding."

"We only invite the best of the best, Marine. We aren't taking in strays off the street. Command knows how to be patient." Titus nodded at a passing colleague who'd lifted his hand in greeting. "I guess your continued work at Quantico has something to do with Zoe being in Virginia?"

"It does."

"How'd you meet Zoe? I can't imagine that you'd land in the same social circles."

"Well, it's kind of embarrassing to say, sir."

The elevator door slid open and the men climbed in. Titus pushed the button. As they moved upward Titus said, "Go on."

Gage looked down as a little smile played across his lips. "Me and some of the guys were at the grocery store and my buddy, Scab, couldn't get his engine to turn over. I was under the hood with another Marine, but we couldn't find the problem. So here comes this beautiful Hawaiian girl in her little sundress. As she slid between our truck and her car, she kind of mumbled, "You shouldn't do that," as my buddy was poking around. She opened her door to climb into her Prius, and I asked her in all seriousness why he shouldn't. She had an air of competency. She wasn't flirting. She probably didn't even mean to say that out loud. She spouted out some technical reason." They stepped off the elevator and walked off side by side.

"The guys said she didn't know what the hell she was talking about. She sighs, takes the wrench from my hand and crawls under the hood. A couple minutes later, she comes back out, flicks a finger at Scab and says, "Now try it." It started up like it was new off the showroom floor. I waved the guys on and stayed back to convince her to let me buy her an ice cream in thanks. We've been together ever since." Gage stopped walking. He wanted Titus to absorb this piece of information. "You should know that Zoe's very happy living in her own head. There's a lot's going on in there, and when she lets any of it spill out, it's always interesting and thoughtful. But if you push her, she gets uncomfortable."

Titus leaned a shoulder into the wall and crossed his arms over his chest. "So you don't push."

"Not if I can help it. I want her in my life. I'm telling you this about her because it's going to come into play. We get a room full of people picking at her, and she's going to slide into her shell. The more we can protect her from feeling overwhelmed, the better. She's an introvert from head to toe."

"You're right. That is going to make a difference." Titus went silent for a moment. "As introverted as you say she is, her circle must be very tight."

Gage didn't know where Titus was heading with this. "Yes, I'd say that's correct."

"And of the people she knows, they're probably all intellectual relationships."

"No. I don't think that's right. She has some good friends, girls she's known since she was a kid—Sydney, Jurnee, and Holland. They Skype, and she's a different person with them, open, goofy, chatty."

Titus's scowl seemed more pronounced. "That's not your relationship with her."

"Not at all. It's just something I've observed a few times. I'm explaining this because I'm afraid I've drawn her like a nerdy caricature, and that would be a gross misrepresentation."

"But you're invested."

Gage tipped his head. What was Titus asking him?

"What I need from you here is to tell me your level of investment with her."

"It's a hundred percent."

"Got it. Good. She's going to need someone to run interference for her. Someone that shy—"

"Oh no, she's not at all shy. She's an introvert. She likes to be alone in her head to process things—but she's definitely not timid or shy. She's a strong, intelligent, highly capable person."

"Within the sphere of her understanding. Which means she's going to need to lean on other people's expertise in this."

Gage breathed out. "That might be a stretch."

Titus lifted off the wall and started down the hall again. "Lynx," Titus called out as a young woman with long blonde hair and a bright pink dress rounded the corner. She looked surprisingly out of place.

She scooted over with a wide smile to shake Titus's hand. "I'm told I've been put on loan."

"Thank you, I know your window is a tight one, but we could use some focus. Lynx, this is Gage Harrison."

Lynx held out her hand for a shake as they continued down the hall. "I've heard your name around our halls recently, haven't I?"

"Gage interviewed for a position on Panther Force. He's still deciding whether or not to re-up." Titus pushed a door open with his shoulder. "This is the Panther Force war room," Titus said, holding the door for Lynx, then nodding for Gage to follow her in. "Lynx was snapped up by Strike Force before anyone else got a fair shot at her. Luckily, she's a good sport about being shared around. We're fortunate to have her with us, even if it has to be short-term. She has an amazing ability to solve some confounding puzzles."

"Well, thank you for that, but you're right, I'm pressed for time. Sorry." She walked toward the front of the room. "Now, before we get going, Titus, I should tell you, the good news is that Iniquus signed a contract with the FBI on this case." She focused on Titus. "It's one thing to give safe haven to one of our military scientists. It's quite another for our team to take bullets." She turned her head to include Gage in the conversation. "I'm so glad everyone came out of that okay. As far as our capabilities go, that contract means we're a go with all of our resources." She smiled warmly at

Gage. “Now we can put all of our wheels in gear.” She switched her focus between Titus and Gage. “I’ll stay in play as long as I can. Got anything we can start with?”

Titus held up the container with the trackers. “Are you ready for a wild story?”

GAGE

They turned on a jammer so they could safely open the box. Gage and Titus discussed what they had come up with at the kitchen table of the exfil house. Lynx bit her lip, picked up the Montrim card and moved over to a machine on the back table. She brought it back and lay it in the box. “The tech guys are going to have an early Christmas present when you hand that to them. Wouldn’t we just love to have that technology if Zoe’s right? Okay, so far I’m with you. If I were taking a stab at it, I’d line this up the same way: two CIA, one DARPA, one Montrim, and two question marks from before that day in the form of the phone apps on Zoe’s cell and the tracker in her watch.” A mischievous look crossed her face. “Two things,” she said.

Titus crossed his arms over his chest and leaned back against the wall. “I always love what comes out of your mouth when you get that twinkle in your eye.”

“Okay, first, Strike Force pulled our guy out of the yellow house. We can send in a clean-up team, and then you can use it for Gage and Zoe, since it’s our closest long-term secure residence.”

“That’ll work. I’ll call Support and get them on that. Let’s hear number two.”

“I’m leaving here for Miami shortly.” She smiled. “Wouldn’t it be amusing if I had the cobblers put together a Zoe Kealoha packet—passport, driver’s license, a couple of credit cards—and I bought a ticket for some random cruise that’s getting ready to leave the dock? No wait, some of those trackers were planted on Zoe and some on Gage. Make that a pair of tickets. I could get a set for Striker in Gage’s name. We could take the trackers out of the kit just before I get on the plane at Reagan, so no one has a chance to come find them. I fly down, Striker and I can board the ship, place the trackers in the cabin, and slip out before it disembarks. I can let the poor cruise ship off the hook by calling and saying there was a sudden personal emergency—after they’re out in International waters, of course—so there are no false alarms that two passengers were lost at sea. But whoever is trying to keep track of Zoe will have eyes on a southern prize, and it might give Zoe a little wiggle room to figure things out.”

“Do you have the time to do that?”

“My schedule today is dictated by my flight. Once I’m down in Miami, though, I have a little more flexibility. Should we give that a go?”

“Thanks, Lynx, we’d appreciate it,” Titus said.

There was a knock at the door. Prescott and the Panthers filed in as Lynx and Titus made quick calls to follow through with their plan.

“Special Agent Damion Prescott, may I present my colleague, Lynx.” Titus said as he got off the phone.

Prescott gave her a curious look.

“Special Agent, if you would,” she said and gestured to a seat at one of the worktables. “My understanding is that Dr. Kealoha is the developer of a forensic field test that you have on trial.”

“That’s right.” He sat down and tipped his head. Gage hadn’t seen Prescott act like this before. Wary, unsure. It seemed odd. Lynx appeared innocuous to him.

“Is that the only capacity you have known or interacted with Zoe?”

He lowered his brows. "Yes."

"I seem to make you uncomfortable," she said sweetly.

"Maybe you're just not what I expected when Titus told me he was pulling in an expert."

"Yeah." She laughed as she moved to the front of the room. "I get that a lot. Okay, I've already heard about the trackers. That's all very interesting." She bent down and whispered something in Nutsbe's ear. He was sitting at a computer bank and tapped something out on his keyboard. "Titus said there might be a correlation between the death of Lily Winters and the attacks on Zoe Kealoha. To this end, he sent me some data, which included copies of Lily's Google calendar and a few emails. The emails were encrypted, so they're with the communications team for now. Our techs were able to capture images from her death on the security cameras, which I watched, along with the videos that were taken by the witnesses on site and posted online."

Gage sat to the side of the room. He'd crossed his arms over his chest and hunkered down in his chair. He was laser focused on what Lynx was saying.

Nutsbe pressed a button and each of the screens filled with a different image. Lynx lined up remotes in front of each. Gage recognized that the screen on the far left had the image that he had watched from Channel Nine News.

Lynx pressed the arrow. The sound of a reggae band loudly playing the steelpans came to an abrupt halt when a scream went up. "Let's start here. It's quite a crowd for a Thursday night. I checked the normal patterns on this particular track, and they might expect one or two people to get on at this time, but on this particular night, the platform is full. We know it was full that night because a local museum put on a play. I checked with the museum. This is the first time they've tried a weeknight event, and it concluded at twenty three hundred hours. That made me wonder, if the museum doesn't normally have weeknight events, and if this track typically has only one or two riders at this time, why would this reggae band be here?" She put down that remote and picked up the one beside it. "I took a look at the last thirty days of security tapes from this area. There were no other instances of this group or any other street performers in or around this Metro location in the last month. This is a security tape from earlier on Thursday evening." She pressed the button to show the band setting up. "That's twenty two thirty hours on the dot, a half-hour before the play let out. Less than an hour before Lily's death. Let's put that on the back burner for a minute."

Lynx went back to the video that showed Lily laying on the tracks, eyes open, looking like she was unable to move.

"I've seen this video," Gage said. "To me it doesn't look like she's hurt. It looks like something else is going on."

A light knock sounded at the door and Brainiack opened it, accepted some papers and brought them over to Prescott. Prescott peeked at them, and then flipped them over on the table.

Lynx walked over and pointed at the current screen. "The videographer is focused on the band and then a scream sounds, and they turn to show Lily on the track. The person filming is perfectly positioned to show Lily laying there. Notice that the videographer doesn't respond. There's no gasp of surprise. No bobble of the image. No scream or move to help. In today's society, we often see a bystander record instead of intervening, but typically you see or hear the human reaction. Not so here. Later, as we go through these tapes, you'll see that in this crowd, there are no other phones in hands at this point. Everyone else in the crowd is focused on the horror that's unfolding in front of them." She paused. "Did you receive some information you'd like to share, Special Agent?"

"This can wait. Thank you."

“Moving on, then. Gage, you mentioned her lying there. Initial thoughts might be that she lost her balance because of drugs or alcohol, but I bet when Special Agent Prescott shares his new data, it will indicate that she was substance free, or perhaps had enough alcohol in her system to account for a glass of wine. Another explanation might be an adrenaline reaction called freeze. Everyone in this room has been trained to overcome freeze and every one of us hopes that training works, because in the field, freezing can mean death. Now, if you look at Lily in this still, you see her muscles aren’t rigid, they’re lax. Not adrenaline freeze. Something else is impeding her ability to stand and get to those oh-so helpful arms that are reaching out to her.”

“That was said with a heavy dose of sarcasm,” Nutsbe said, turning to look up at the screen.

“Yup, I’ll get to that in a second.” She started the News Nine video. “This is what the videographer wanted you to see next. The light of the approaching subway train. Everyone was trying their best to bring attention to the crisis. Again, no other phones are out. Flailing arms. You can make out the shock on the engineer’s face. Boom. He’s doing everything he can to stop the forward movement of the train. But look, Lily got to her feet. She sees hands that can drag her out of the way and she reaches for them. The video bounces up, and then back down, taking in the horrified crowd. We all know she’s been hit. Lily was killed. That’s the story we’re supposed to understand. A tragic accident.”

“You don’t think it is, though. You think someone killed her.”

“I do. Let’s look back at the Metro security footage. Remember, I started trying to figure out when the band had arrived because it was odd. Look who’s arriving at the same time. A group of men, nicely dressed. They’re all wearing similar clothes. They aren’t talking, but they all arrive within fifteen minutes of each other. All in bulky clothes, gloves, hats, scarves. It’s cold. It’s December. No worries. But see how they’re standing out of the view of the security camera? They don’t get on the first subway.” She scrolled forward. “They don’t get on the next. But then two move to the area where Lily will eventually die and three go back near the stairs. Here comes the crowd from the theater, they seem to be gravitating left, away from the men who are already there waiting. See these three men near the stairs? They move in such a way that Lily is herded to the right side of the platform, away from the others.”

She played the rest of the security footage. They could see Lily fall. They could see hands reaching for her. It was hard to see anything else.

“Tech was able to work some of their magic for me,” she said as she moved to the third screen. “This is a close up of that group of men surrounding Lily.” They watched as Lily fell. The men worked to block others from getting near her. Then, when she was reaching for their arms, they pulled just out of her reach and she was hit. “You can’t see that in the normal view of the accident. Now here’s something I want you to hear. I had tech remove the sounds of the reggae band and the milling crowd. Play that track please, Nutsbe.”

ZzzzzzzZzzz ZzzzzzzZzzzz...

“What the heck is that?” Brainiack asked.

“Have a guess? Play it again, please.”

ZzzzzzzZzzz ZzzzzzzZzzzz...

“A stun gun?” Nutsbe offered.

“That’s what I think. It lasts three seconds. Three seconds and a push would land her on the tracks, still conscious. But it can take up to fifteen minutes, depending on various circumstances, to pull oneself back together after being stunned. The reggae band, by the way, left before any emergency personnel arrived on scene. So let’s try a hypothetical. Someone pays a band to play at this time.

They're there to make enough noise that no one standing around would hear a stun gun. They also had someone in place to film their desired narrative and make sure these five men are never focused on."

"Why is that important?" Gage asked.

"The metro's security footage is kind of meh. And they have clear bystander video that tells the story. Lily's body will be crushed, so hopefully if all goes to plan, everyone will get lazy and assume it was a freak accident. The guys position her where they want her. They stun her, push her onto the track, block anyone else from helping, then they leave. From the police report, I can put a name and face to everyone else there, but not these five, and not the band." Lynx turned a sweet smile on Prescott. "I'll bet your report says they found two very small burns below her waist about two inches apart. Is that right?"

Prescott turned the photo over and slid it across the table. It showed two burn marks on Lily's skin. "I'm impressed."

Lynx smiled. "Looks can be deceiving, Special Agent." She seemed to find great amusement in that phrase. Gage thought there was probably a pretty good story behind it.

Lynx walked to the last screen and picked up the remote. "Now, it seems clear that Lily Winters was killed intentionally. But the reason you wanted to know the cause of her death was that you think there may be a link between Lily's death and Zoe's attack. Commander Kane asked me to find that link."

Every man in the room pulled themselves up straight and leaned forward.

"The last thing I wanted to show you is this." There was a close up of a man's left wrist. Right where a man's watch would go, and about the size of a watch face, was a geometric tattoo.

Titus walked over to the screen. "Is this the best that tech could do with clarity?"

"I'm sorry, it is. But we can see it well enough to make a comparison."

Titus turned abruptly. "To what?"

Lynx clicked forward and there were four images dividing the screen. The top two were pictures that Gage took in Zoe's condo. One of the other images was a black silhouette. Those three each had a red X marking them as deceased. The remaining image was the man they had in custody.

Titus's phone buzzed, and he glanced at the screen.

"Two from Zoe's place, one killed at the exfil house, one in custody. All four have the exact same tattoo in the exact same place." She clicked one more time, and there was a close up of the tattoo. "At least one man involved in Lily's murder has this symbol in common with the four men who have made attempts on Zoe. It's also possible that one of these four men is also the man in the picture from the Metro station. And that, gentlemen, makes me believe that yes, these crimes are connected."

Titus pushed his phone into its holster. He stood, planting his fists on the table top. "Lynx, amazing as always. If Strike Force ever forgets how special you are, you've got a place on my team."

"Ha! Well, thank you. Glad I could help."

"Yes, thank you so much," Gage said.

"That call was telling me that the cobblers have the new papers ready, and they've purchased cruise tickets for Zoe and Gage through the Panama Canal."

"Oh, that sounds lovely. Maybe I won't ditch the trackers and run. I could use a bit of a vacation."

"Nope, we need you in action," Titus said. "Speaking of action, we sent a car to ask Senator Billings to come in and answer a few questions for us. He agreed and is in the interview room waiting on us."

"How'd you get him to do that?" Lynx asked.

“We insinuated that we had information about Lily’s death. I’m glad we actually do. Do you have time to at least get us started with some questions?”

Instead of answering Titus, Lynx turned to Gage. “Gage, it looks like you have a thought.”

“Last night I had the chance to look in Billings’s wallet. I saw a card with that symbol on it. I’d love to know whose business card that is.”

“Me too,” Lynx replied. “And, Commander, if the guy’s already in house, I can get things rolling.”

• • • •

TITUS LED PRESCOTT and Gage to the elevator. When they exited onto the executive floor, the vibe was completely different from the one they just left. Downstairs contained the fine-tuned, well-oiled mechanics of the Iniquus security machine. This, Gage thought, must be the floor where they collected the money to make the place hum. More in keeping with the country club façade, there were conversation areas with deep leather chairs that called for comfortable chats about where the kids went to college and upcoming vacation plans. Gage could imagine the movers and shakers enjoying a brandy and an imported cigar, before real points of interest were hashed through, deals made, and contracts signed.

Gage looked down at his clothes, currently covered in mud and blood. He’d be more at home after a shower and a change. He hoped he didn’t run into any of the executives. They had offered him a contract, an extremely generous contract, and he was tempted for a number of reasons to take it. They had been understanding about his being on the fence concerning his next step. They left the contract on the table until his re-up yea or nay with the Marines. Gage wanted to keep that contract open, and his present state seemed disrespectful. Titus was equally dirty, though minus the blood, and he didn’t seem to care about muddy boots on the thick pile carpet, so Gage let his concerns go as they turned into a room.

The lights went on automatically as they sidled down the long, narrow gallery. Captain’s chairs with writing desks stood in a nice neat row in front of a wall of darkened windows. Behind the chairs was a buffet holding sandwiches, water bottles and fruit. All three men loaded up their plates then sat down and ate. Just like with sleep, Gage had learned many years ago that in his line of work, grub didn’t come on a schedule. If you had access, avail yourself. It could be a long damned time before you saw food again.

GAGE

As Gage finished his second sandwich, the lights in the room in front of the observation windows flicked on. Lynx came through the door with Senator Charles Billings. She waved her hand to indicate a chair to the right. This put Billings face to face with the men. Lynx sat kitty-corner at the head of the table.

Lynx struck Gage as very young, much younger than his twenty-eight years. And very innocent, especially when she smiled. She was a trap. A good one. After seeing her in action figuring out Lily's murder, he thought the whole cheerleader, girl-next-door routine was a power tool in her arsenal. Lynx wore her hair down, while other women wore upswept military styles. She had on a full-skirted, bright-pink dress, while others wore black and grey. It all seemed carefully engineered to confuse, distract, and disarm people. He hoped Zoe would get a chance to meet Lynx. He bet they'd get along very well.

"Senator, I can't tell you how much I appreciate your coming in this evening. How are you holding up?" Lynx leaned forward and her voice conveyed genuine sympathy and concern.

"This has been a very difficult day."

"I can't even imagine. I saw your news conference this morning. I know you've been in senate hearings all day. Did you have time to eat? Can I call for some food? Something to drink?"

"No, no, thank you. I had my driver go through a drive-thru on the way over here." The senator glanced at the door, then his watch. "Will they be here soon?"

"I'm sorry. Will who be here soon?"

"I was told that Iniquus had information about Lily, and they thought that it was important that I hear it privately. That's why I'm here. Where is Mr. Spencer and the others?"

"I'm afraid they are otherwise occupied. I'll be helping you today."

"You?" It was almost insulting how dismissive this guy acted toward Lynx, and Gage was offended on her behalf. Titus, on the other hand, seemed to be enjoying this immensely. Titus looked the way he always did, stoic and hard-assed, but having fought enough fights next to him, Gage knew the man was highly amused.

"I wanted to begin by telling you how sorry I am for your loss."

Billings turned his head away, tilting his face down.

"I heard you're staying with your friend Colonel Guthrie. I'm pretty sure I've met him before—kind of a pronounced nose, scar on the chin, a bit of an ass?"

Lynx's pretty mouth saying "ass" had Billings turning toward her with the hint of a smile. "Yeah, that's him."

"You're going after Montrim Industries, that's a big get. A sixty billion dollar a year get. Thank you for your courage. Did the secret service give you someone to help protect you during the hearings?"

"No, why would they?"

"Sixty billion a year in military contracts...that's big. If Montrim Industries was to collapse because of the hearings..."

“No one can touch me. I’m too high profile.”

Lynx tilted her head, considering him. “I can see that. But others involved with this don’t enjoy such an advantage. Lily Winters, for example.”

His lips quivered. “Her suicide is a great tragedy. I don’t think I can ever forgive myself for the role I played in her death. I had no idea that she was depressed. That she was suicidal.”

“Suicide? No, no, no. I heard the speculation on the news too. The pundits all think she took her life because you refused to leave your wife for her. But we both know how they blow hot air to fill the news cycle. No, Lily was killed.”

Lynx let that last sentence settle in. They had been going along conversationally then, boom, she dropped the bomb. She slipped it right in, and Gage knew why. She wanted to gauge his reaction, just like he had wanted to see Colonel Guthrie’s when he said Zoe was in the hospital. What Lynx got from Billings was complete bafflement. It was like watching the senator take a blow to the sternum. He actually recoiled. “What?” he choked out.

“You didn’t know? Surely when you opened her video message on Thursday morning, you would have seen how happy she was. If anyone saw that, they’d know for sure that Lily wasn’t suicidal.”

Senator Billings seemed to realize that Lynx was much more than he’d thought she was. He seemed to be scrambling, trying to figure out the situation. His brows drew together, and he shook his head, as if he were warding away her words.

Lynx pushed on with her sweet smile and conversational tone. “You didn’t get her video message? She sent it first by accident to a friend of hers. Whoops! So embarrassing. But surely she sent it on to you after?”

“I didn’t get a video from Lily on Thursday,” he insisted.

“Oh.” Lynx picked up a remote and pushed the button. “Well, let me show it to you so you can tell me what you think.”

There was a still shot of Lily the way Gage remembered her, with big, black smiling eyes. As the video began though, Gage became instantly uncomfortable. This was definitely not a side of Lily that he’d ever seen.

“Charlie,” she crooned as she batted her lashes. “I miss you.” She gathered her long brown curls and moved them off her shoulders. Lily reached down and pulled off her sweater. She slid her hands under her breasts, covered by the turquoise stretch lace of her bra, and lifted them up, pushing them together to create even more cleavage. “The girls miss you too.” She pouted, then slid one bra strap from her shoulder, then the other. She reached around to unhook her bra. Holding it in place with one hand, she smiled again. “They can’t wait to see you tomorrow. They want to be somewhere where they can be free and available to your hungry mouth all weekend.” She flung the bra to the side and was soon pinching and pulling at her nipples. “And that’s not the only part of me that wants your full attention.” She rubbed the flat of her hand down her stomach to her crotch and left it there. She tilted her chin coyly. “Which parts of you would like my full attention? Will you send me a picture?” She blew a kiss to the screen, and it went black.

Gage had twisted to the side and was watching out of half-shut eyes. He both needed to see and definitely did not want to see that. He felt his face relax again when it turned off.

“So, no dick pic in return?” Lynx asked with not a bit of audacity that she would serve up such a question to the senior senator from Wisconsin.

The senator cleared his throat. “No. Who else has this video? Is this going to be on the news? That’s not how Lily should be remembered.”

“We’ll do everything we can to keep it in-house,” Lynx said.

Prescott chuckled under his breath. “God, she’s good.”

Gage had picked up on it too. The ever so slight undercurrent of threat. You answer my questions or this might get into the public’s hands.

“You said this didn’t arrive on your phone.” Lynx put his card down in front of him. “This phone.” She put her finger on the number printed on the front. “But what about your secondary phone?”

“I don’t have a secondary phone. All of my calls go through—”

“No?” Lynx cut him off. “Not even this one?” She turned the card over and pointed to where the senator had written his private cellphone number.

The senator turned pink with embarrassment, then red with anger. He went to grab the card, but Lynx was lightning fast. Her hand covered the card and slid it back in front of her.

“Senator, would you do me a great big favor in exchange for my returning this card to you?”

The senator’s face twitched and he looked like he desperately wanted to let a slew of curse words fly behind firmly cemented lips.

Lynx offered him her innocent smile, as if the only thoughts in her head were about hot chocolate and puppies. “Can I look in your wallet for a sec?”

Thoroughly perplexed, Billings reached into his back pocket and pulled out his wallet. He slid it over to her. Lynx opened it, reached right in and pulled out the card with the symbol from the tattoos. She replaced that card with the senator’s own card and handed it back to him.

As Billings put his wallet back in his pocket, Lynx positioned the card on the table, a red x showed up on the card, and there was a flash of light that dragged the senator’s attention back to her. “Hey, what’s going on here? Is this some kind of interrogation? Are there people watching me on the other side of those mirrors?”

Lynx surreptitiously slid the card off the table and put it in her lap. “Oh, sorry. Did you get that impression? No, I’m tasked with trying to run down some information. You know, here at Iniquus, we work to bridge the chasms between the different alphabet agencies. Right now, it’s like alphabet soup.” She stopped and grinned like she’d made a great joke. “We have interest from the CIA, the FBI, the DCPD, the DOD... Gosh, lots of interest. Anything you can tell me that might help clear this up quickly and neatly would be great. Let’s start with this. How did you meet Lily?”

GAGE

Senator Billings fumbled around in his seat. He didn't seem sure if he should lean back or forward, if he should cross his knees or ankles or leave his feet side by side. He tried three or four different positions for his hands before he folded them on the table in front of him, like a schoolboy who was in trouble with his teacher.

"You met Lily..." Lynx encouraged.

"I met Lily at a party that I attended with some friends of mine. The Leibowitz's, Ruby and Sal. All right?"

"What do they do for a living?"

"Ruby is a forensic auditor, and Sal is a lobbyist for USIPAC—the United States Pro-Israel lobby."

"Oh yes, I've heard of them. They're working to strengthen relations between the United States and Israel. Did Sal introduce you to Lily?"

"No, Ruby did. They knew each other from college. They were both studying accounting."

"As part of that introduction, Ruby told you that Lily was a CPA over at Montrim, right? I bet that made your ears perk right up. Montrim was in your crosshairs and this woman might, through her accounting duties, be able to get some data for you. Tell me what happened after that introduction was made."

"I brought her a drink. We had polite conversation, where I looked for points of commonality. You're right, I wanted to woo her so that I could access more data."

"Woo her. So your intentions were personal? Sexual?"

"No," he mumbled. "Political."

"But you said 'woo'. Wooing implies flirtation and sexuality. Did you find Lily sexually attractive or politically expedient?"

"I, um..."

"Were you wooing her because you wanted to spend time in her company, or did you want to convince her that was true so you could get your hands on her...books?"

"Ah..."

"Okay, let's try it this way. At what point in your relationship did you find yourself physically attracted to Lily Winters? Did you ever find yourself physically attracted to her? Or were you simply having sex to gain the power to manipulate her?"

"No, it wasn't like that. I found myself attracted to her as we spent time together, and that led to expanding the scope of our relationship."

"Before you 'expanded your scope', you made a flirtatious play for Lily. You wanted to see if she could help you with your fact gathering on Montrim."

"Montrim is a—"

Lynx held up her hand. "Let's stay on the subject of Lily for right now. You were at a Jewish event to raise support for Israel. So you knew Lily Winters was Jewish from the beginning?"

"Yes."

“And did you use this to help convince Lily that she should help you over her own self-interests of keeping her job, and despite the potential of being labelled as a whistle-blower, which would preclude many companies from hiring her?”

The senator said nothing but looked thoroughly ashamed.

“Didn’t you think her loyalty should lie with her company since they paid her salary? Not to mention, much of the information she disclosed to you was classified.”

Billings dropped his hands between his thighs and rubbed them together as if they were cold and he was trying to warm himself. “You’re right, at first I played on Lily’s loyalty to Israel. She knew things were being developed at Montrim that would be a disaster to Israel. Later, I discovered that Lily had three brothers in the military. She grew up as a navy brat. When she went to work for Montrim, she thought she was helping keep her brothers safe by supporting the scientific work that gave the US military its edge. As she rose in the hierarchy and was given higher security access, she realized some of the projects Montrim was developing were genocidal. She was sure the American people would think Montrim’s developments were horrific. But she couldn’t tell anyone. When we spent time together, and I explained the thrust of my concerns, we were already on the same page. I simply gave her an avenue to help make things right.”

“What did this have to do with accounting discrepancies?”

“Do you know that Montrim is working on soundwave technology that destroys animal cells? That’s you and me. We’re animals. Lily had major moral issues with the projects she was assigned to. She was happy to help me bring it to the world’s attention. If she left, someone else would just take her place. If she stayed, she could keep an eye on things.”

“You said that Lily was a military brat. She had this in common with Dr. Zoe Kealoha. Do you know that name?”

“Yes.”

“In what context?”

“Lily was roommates with Zoe until she was able to move into a place on her own.”

“Lily moved into a townhouse in central DC—that’s big bucks. Not really possible on a CPA’s salary. But there’s a parking garage right next door. Would you say that you helped Lily find that place so you could make your way into her house without detection?”

“I needed a safe place for us to meet.”

“Who paid for this safe place?”

“USIPAC did after I told them that Lily was helping me with Montrim.”

“Why would USIPAC be concerned with Montrim?”

“I’m not going to comment any further on USIPAC.”

“We have a witness who says that you were over at Colonel Guthrie’s house drunk Thursday night, and that Colonel Guthrie knew about your affair with Lily.”

“Stan is an old buddy of mine. We were out drinking one night. Our wives were at some female doings. Art center show, maybe. I got soft on scotch and told Stan that I had fallen in love with Lily. I was considering leaving my wife to be with her. I deserve happiness too.”

“The colonel tried to dissuade you?”

“He thought it was political suicide. But I won my election last November. I’ve got six years for my constituency to forgive and forget. There’s a template for true love making an affair okay. They had that going on in Carolina with their governor, after all. He told everyone he was incommunicado because he was hiking the Appalachian Trail, for gosh sakes. Turns out he’s down in Buenos Aires having a lovefest with his mistress. He comes back, does some mea culpas, and is elected to the House of Representatives. He's doing fine. I never lied to my state. I lied to my wife, but everyone understands that goes with the territory."

"The colonel thought this sounded wrong though, you and Lily?"

"A man of my age, and let's be honest, my shape, with a pretty young twenty-something? It's a stretch, even for my imagination."

"What direction did his lack of trust lead you?"

"Stan suggested that I get the whole picture on Lily before I left my marriage. That was sound advice from a good friend looking out for my best interests. I appreciated his concern, even if I didn't believe they were founded."

"Still, you acted on his advice?"

"I hired a private investigator to follow her. See who she was interacting with, see if she was someone's asset."

"That seems like a smart move. The PIs, how did you come to hire them?"

"PI. Just one. He likes to work alone. I got his name from Stan."

"What did the investigator find? Was Lily true to you?"

"Yes. And she was providing me with a great deal of information."

"PIs, especially good ones, are expensive. How did you pay for this and not have it discoverable if you came under scrutiny?"

"USIPAC."

"Again? They've been very generous to you and Lily."

"I've always been pro-Israel. Always gone out of my way to help them in the Senate. I told a contact there, a higher-up, about the soundwave program. In my estimation, it's meant to take out the whole Middle Eastern Peninsula. If no one knows about that technology, it can be deployed without ramifications. There would be no way to trace it back to the United States. With everyone removed, the United States could easily go in and control the oil. They would control the world."

"Ah, so you do know why USIPAC was interested in helping Lily help you." Lynx picked up the remote control. "I'm going to put three photos up on the screen. Would you please tell me if you recognize any of the men pictured?"

Lynx clicked to show the first man Gage killed, then the second, then a picture of their prisoner.

"No, I don't recognize any of them."

"Did you think it was a conflict of interest that Colonel Guthrie is involved with Montrim, and you are fighting against Montrim?"

"He's not with Montrim. He's with DARPA. DARPA has contracts that involve Montrim, but he's an army man through and through. Look, he's a good guy, but he ultimately acts like a politician looking out for his own rear end."

"The irony of you saying that is spectacular. Let's go through this again, shall we? I need to drill down on this PI a bit more. I promise we're nearly through here."

"You said this had to do with Lily's death."

"Exactly. This PI concerns me. He wasn't simply following along with Lily's day so you knew she bought orange juice at Giant supermarket before her yoga class. Your friend Stan had specific reservations that needed to be assuaged and certain shadows that needed to be searched."

"Stan thought it odd that Lily and I would get so hot and heavy so quickly. He suggested that the CIA might have planted her as a honey trap. He said they had a name for assets who slept with men to get information and blackmail power over them. They call them swallows. A swallow, for damned sake. Lily! Stan thought the soundwave technology and other Montrim projects were important to the CIA, so they'd try to stop me from shutting them down."

"The CIA would stop you?"

"That's what Stan suggested."

"Were you sharing any information with Lily?"

"Well sure. We shared data back and forth. She knew what I had found out, and tried to corroborate it with internal evidence. Stan said it was possible that she was actually using black propaganda, seeding my research with fake information so I would be completely discredited and become a laughingstock while Montrim sailed off into the sunset."

"But you never believed it. You just went through the motions to reassure your friend. Do you think that Montrim found out that there was a whistleblower, and decided to take her out of the equation?"

Billing put his head in his hands. "God."

"Let's go back to Zoe Kealoha. You said you recognized that name as Lily's old roommate, yes? But that was only a small portion of that story. I'd like you to finish it. How do you know Dr. Zoe Kealoha from Montrim Industries and how is she tied to your friend Colonel Guthrie?"

"Now that, I have no idea about. I know that Zoe and Lily were roommates, college friends."

"Okay. What did your PI tell you about Lily's death? If he was following her, he should have details."

"All of this happened before. I didn't need any more proof. I trusted Lily. I asked him to stop."

"So he took his last paycheck and left."

Attention moved to the door when a knock preceded the entrance of the woman Titus had called Margot. "Forgive me, Lynx, it's time."

Lynx checked her watch. "Senator, thank you so much for speaking with me. I have a plane I need to catch. Someone will be in to attend to you in a moment." She leaned over and shook his hand.

The senator was obviously confused with this sudden shift. "Wait. You were going to—"

But Lynx was already out the door.

GAGE

• • • •

Prescott made a sucking sound with his teeth. “Oh, the tangled webs we weave. Are you all following this? Do you get what’s going on?”

“The window is getting a little cleaner,” Titus said.

The door popped open and Margot beamed her smile on Titus. Gage tipped his head to see Titus’s reaction to Margot. Titus looked the way Titus always looked. Like you’d better get the heck out of his way.

“Sir, Lynx asked me to give you this card. It’s the man who did the PI work. She said that according to the senator’s facial tells that it’s the name of the man who was captured by the Panthers today. She’s going to call you as soon as she gets in her car with more information.”

“Okay, thank you. Margot, would you see that the senator is shown to the atrium to meet up with his driver? Tell him that we’ll contact him on his private line if we have any further questions. And suggest that at some point that we will release the video we have back to him. But make it subtle. It’s a reminder for him to behave.”

“Yes, sir.” Margot was out the door.

Titus stood. “Let’s head back to the war room, and get Nutsbe going on a computer search.”

• • • •

THEY HAD JUST PUSHED through the Panther room door when Titus’s phone buzzed on his hip. “Titus here.”

“Lynx.” Gage heard her answer.

“I’m putting you on speakerphone. The Panthers, Gage Harrison, and Damion Prescott are in the room.”

“Hey, sorry about leaving so abruptly. I got caught up and forgot about the time. What did you do with the senator?”

“Margot shooed him out the door. I’m just now bringing the search to Nutsbe’s attention. Did you pick up anything else?”

“Some leads to run down. The senator definitely knows who your prisoner is, and he felt shamed by the association. I’m saying that’s your guy, Levi Schultz, or an alias. You may want to drill that one deeper. Did you get his phone when you made the capture?”

“We did. It’s on airplane mode until forensics can make sure it’s not got a failsafe to wipe it.”

“I’d say his contact numbers are going to be gold. I’d check for any photos of Lily, who she was with, and video or audio files. Forensics should be able to track them down if they were taken with that phone.”

“Nutsbe’s giving you the thumbs up,” Titus said.

“Here’s another thing Nutsbe should check—no, actually, two things, no, three things. Gosh, I wish I wasn’t heading out of town. This is such a good puzzle.”

“I’m taking notes,” Titus said. What he really meant was that with Lynx on speakerphone, Brainiack was at the whiteboard taking notes.

“One. The senator said that he met Lily at a party with the Leibowitz’s. I remember seeing that on the calendar pages that you sent over. It had little hearts all over the place. Before that party, I only saw Ruby or the Leibowitz’s name one, maybe two other times. After that party, skip ahead a month, and you start seeing Ruby’s name listed two or three times a week. The senator said that Ruby was a forensic auditor. I may be going out on a limb here, but it might be a good idea to have Ruby Leibowitz in for a little chat to see what she has to say about Lily. My bet is that Lily needed to know how to look for the information that the senator needed to make his case.”

“Got it. We’ll make contact,” Titus said.

“Number two. Thursday morning, Lily had an appointment that was just indicated as 10 a.m. Victoria Park. It’s odd that Lily left work for an appointment in a park on a Thursday morning. And Thursday was bitter cold. My thought is to check with the DMV for Levi and get his plates. Then Nutsbe can run Levi’s plates through the ALPR scanning system and see his route through the city that day. Do the same for Lily and see if those routes overlap.”

“The senator said he called off his wolves. Levi shouldn’t have been in the picture at that point,” Titus said.

“Well, since we have him cuffed in our holding tank, I’d say he didn’t understand that directive. Actually, I’d say he’s probably playing double agent, and Levi was still handing information to someone.”

“Nutsbe’s holding up a sign that says that Lily didn’t have a car.”

“If you have her phone number, check her GPS routing. Maybe Special Agent Prescott can help you with that.”

“Why do you think she was in the gardens?” Prescott called out from his seat across the way.

“I have a guess. But it might be one hell of a stretch.”

“Okay, we’ll take that under advisement,” Prescott said.

“Did any of you see the Washington Post this morning?”

Titus looked around at the shaking heads. “That’s a negative.”

“One of their reporters was found dead in that park. A heart attack. The front page is dedicated to his twenty years of reporting. I’m not sure if there’s any way to find out why he was in that park around the time Lily was there, but he was a government corruption specialist, and Lily was acting as a whistleblower, according to Senator Billings.”

“Hell of a coincidence,” Gage muttered.

“I’d check out that story, and if by any chance he’s connected to Lily, see if anyone has notes on what he was working on,” Lynx continued.

“You think he was murdered?” Prescott asked.

“I’m not willing to speculate. I already feel like that’s thin ice.”

“Okay, you’ve got one more point,” Titus said. They were all huddled around the phone like it was a camp fire on a winter’s night.

“I do?”

“You said three.”

“Huh, hang on, let me think—oh, before we leave the topic of the reporter in the park, another way you can trace that down are the recent calls that Gage took from Lily’s phone at the morgue. See if any of those numbers go to WaPo or this guy.”

They could hear tire squeals and horns honking in the background.

“His name is Colin Bunsinger,” Lynx said, her voice fading and then growing louder. “Ah, yes, the third thing. I can’t remember where I’ve seen the symbol that was on the business card and the tangos’ tattooed wrists, but I've seen it somewhere. Not recently, but probably something I studied as a child. I remember looking at it in a book with my mother, so that tells me it's old, maybe ancient, and probably has something to do with art. Sorry, I can't tune that note for you, but it might give Nutsbe some parameters for his search. Okay, I'm going to be battling traffic from here to the airport. I need to focus. Margot gave me the trackers so that ploy's a go. Good luck, everyone."

The men each called out their thanks and goodbyes to Lynx before the line went dead.

Damion Prescott sat back on the table. "She got all that from her session with Billings? I didn't get any of those connections."

Nutsbe laughed. "Yeah, she's kind of like the Iniquus magician, pulling rabbits from thin air." Nutsbe typed on his keyboard. "I sent a message for forensics to check the guy's phone to see if there was any audio or video recorded on Thursday morning. Shall we lay bets on who's on the tape if it's there?" He tapped a button. "Are you ready for some follow up with what Lynx suggested?"

"Yeah." Prescott moved to the computer station. "What've you got?"

"Here you go." Up on the screen came side by side pictures of their prisoner and a professional photo of the same man in a suit and tie. "This is off his PI webpage."

"He looks better without the scruffy beard and broken jaw and nose," Brainiack remarked.

"I'm pulling up his DMV records. Okay, I have his license plate...and the parameters of Thursday, zero hundred hours to Friday, zero hundred hours, so we'll see where his car went in the city."

"How does Iniquus have this information?" Prescott flared his nostrils. "My understanding is that this data is under government control."

"That's right, and we contract with the government to do this kind of legwork and free up their staff. Right now, this is an FBI contracted job. Obviously, this series of events and crimes has national security ramifications. I'm sure the FBI will be appreciative of all of our efforts to keep America safe," Titus remarked.

"I'm sure they will," Prescott responded dryly.

Titus picked up his phone and pressed a number. "Margot? I need you to go by Ruby and Sal Leibowitz's house and pick up Ruby. She may need a little convincing to come along for the ride... I don't know, you're going to have to go with your gut. Tell her something about her friend, Lily Winters, leaving a package for her or something. Something plausible that Ruby would want to get her hands on... Yeah, well, if she's not there, you'll need to track her down. I need her here ASAP."

“Sir, I have more information.” Nutsbe changed the pictures on the screen. On the top were the two men, whom Gage killed, wearing uniforms, sans black face paint. On the bottom were the man they held prisoner and another man no one recognized. Three of the men had red Xs on their faces. “Honey took ear photos and fingerprints of the target he neutralized at the safe house. This is his picture, bottom right, when he still had a face. Our forensics department was able to get his identification pretty quickly, because they all have an association.”

“Let me guess,” Gage said. “They were all in the same Israeli unit, and they were all MIA, presumed dead.”

Gage moved over to look at it. His brow drew together. “Huh, interesting.”

Titus moved stand next to him. “What are you seeing, Gage?”

Prescott pinched at his lower lip. “Son of a gun. You’re right. So the team goes MIA and at least four members show up years later on American soil with affiliation tattoos. And what’s more, this guy’s services were suggested to the senator by a DARPA director.”

“It’s possible Colonel Guthrie could only be aware of his work as a PI under the name Levi Schultz. He’s well-established here in the DC area if you look at his website. There are court cases listed in which he gave testimony. They aren’t small potatoes hearings either,” Nutsbe added.

“Who does that?” Brainiack asked. “Gets a tattoo of their group’s icon? Besides military, of course.”

“I once saw a guy with a tat of a barcode on his wrist. He worked at a grocery store.” Nutsbe kept typing as he spoke.

“And what was the barcode for?”

Nutsbe glanced up from his keyboard to catch Brainiack’s gaze. “Doritos.”

“Ha.” Brainiack laughed.

“Perhaps it was once something else and some group jacked it for their own reasons.”

“True.” Prescott let his hands rest on the back of his head. “You have two CIA business cards. We could reach out to them. Keep this in the family, so to speak.”

“I’d rather not,” Gage said. “I didn’t get a good vibe from these guys, and I don’t want them involved until we know what role they’re playing in all of this. Zoe can probably answer some of our questions about that role. Where is Zoe, by the way?”

“Margot said she ate, took a shower, and as soon as she laid her head down, she was passed out,” Brainiack said. “We all know how that feels. Adrenaline can kick the shit out of you.”

“I’ll send someone to wake her up in a little bit, if she doesn’t get up on her own,” Titus said, moving back to the table. “Then we can have a chat with her about why she thinks she’s being hunted internationally.”

“You mean besides the biomarker research?” Gage asked.

“Sir,” Nutsbe called. “Forensics sent me an audio file off of the PIs phone. They said that the phone was equipped with an app that allows for sound amplification. They’ve put the audio file through a scrubber to take out the ambient noise. Shall I play it?”

“Go ahead.”

The room grew still.

A nervous girl’s voice said, “Hi,” from the speaker system.

“I’m Colin Bunsinger.”

“Yes, I recognize you from your picture in the paper.”

“And your name is?”

“I’d rather not say.”

“I protect all of my sources. I would never share your name with anyone. But for the sake of our conversation, what shall I call you?”

“Nothing. You will call me nothing.” The tension in the woman’s voice ramped up.

“Does that sound like Lily to you?” Prescott asked Gage.

“Yeah, it sounds just like her.”

“I usually don’t meet with folks when they call and say they have a story for me. I’m not in the gossip business. I wouldn’t be here except that I got a call right before you rang from Senator Billings saying that he was sending someone my way. I’m assuming that’s you, since no one else contacted me. How do you know Senator Billings?”

“I don’t know him. Well, I know he’s working on a Senate hearing about Montrim Industries, and I have information from Montrim to share with you.”

“How did you get it? Are you a Montrim employee?”

Silence followed and Gage imagined Lily nodding.

“What’s in this envelope? It feels pretty thin. Is this all of your evidence?”

“Three pieces of correspondence. The first one is about an apocalyptic weapons system currently being developed. It’s based on a DARPA funded study into the use of soundwaves to destroy animal cells. DARPA was interested in developing a way to kill humans in a conflict area without incurring the expense of rebuilding infrastructure and not contaminating the land with toxins.”

“So the technology could be implemented one day and the invaders could move in the very next?”

“That’s my understanding”

The reporter let out a long low whistle. “The letter contains proof of your allegations?”

“The letter talks about the technology and how we’re in a race with China to develop the system. As a matter of fact, one of Montrim’s employees, George Matthews, was implicated in sharing data with China. George disappeared a couple of months ago. I have no idea where he went. I wasn’t able to find any information about him, and his house is empty and listed for sale.”

“Billings knows all this?”

“I’ve provided the same emails to his office I’m sharing with you.”

“The sound technology is mind-blowing.” There was a string of coughs. “You said two other items?”

“Yes, the next is a letter from a man with the Mossad. I think the Mossad is Israel’s version of our CIA?”

“That’s right,” the reporter confirmed.

“The Mossad sought to purchase a copy of BIOMIST. BIOMIST is an above top-secret initiative. I don’t have access to what it is. But I can tell you that it’s a DARPA project that’s been implemented since 2010, and is similar to the FBI’s CODIS system.”

“And the Mossad want a copy. Was this a letter written to DARPA?”

“Nutsbe,” Titus whispered. “Is that MIA Israeli unit Mossad?”

“No sir, Sayeret Matkal, Special Forces,” he replied.

“No, you can read it for yourself,” Lily was saying. “Apparently, a Montrim board member brought the project to Mossad’s attention and offered to sell them a copy of our data for forty-million dollars. They will update the data bi-monthly for an additional million dollars per update.”

“Montrim initiated the sale of DARPA project data to Israel?”

“That’s what it says,” the woman whispered.

“And the last piece of information?”

“The CIA offered Montrim a contract to get data on a DARPA project and have a team of MONTRIM microrobotic engineers reengineer the project for immediate field use by the CIA.”

“How would Montrim get ahold of DARPA project plans?”

“The scientist working on the project rents laboratory space at Montrim and uses the encrypted computer systems there. Much of the information there is top secret and above. The computer system passes DARPA security standards. Montrim is not supposed to have access, but when they built their computer system, they built a back door so the board could access all of the scientists’ information, whether they worked for Montrim or DARPA. I have that information there for you too.”

“What is the project that the CIA wants to take over?”

“RoboSphecus. The documents are in this folder. I’m not a scientist. These things don’t make sense to me. But the letters should give you the information you need.”

“You have no idea what the RoboSphecus project is about?”

“WASPs,” she said.

“Wasps?”

“I’m really uncomfortable talking to you about this in public. I need to go. The documents are in the envelope.”

“Look, I just—”

“Sorry,” her voice called out. “I can’t do any more.”

The room sat quietly.

“I think we need to have a conversation with this PI guy,” Prescott said. “Where is he right now?”

Nutsbe punched a button and brought up the image of the prisoner sitting in a well-lit white room complete with a white table and white chairs. The man sat with his cuffs attached to the table top. His feet were visibly shackled to the floor. “We put him on ice for a while, sir. It seems to help to give them some time to reevaluate their life choices. Makes them more talkative.”

Gage looked over at the whiteboard that listed the name of the top-secret project that the CIA wanted to get their hands on. BIOMIST. That sounded ominous as hell. “Titus, Lily said her project was similar to the FBI’s CODIS.”

“CODIS stands for Combined DNA Index System. BIOMIST could be Blood Marker Indexing System or Biomedical Indexing System.”

Gage nodded. “Makes sense to me.”

“And wasps?” Titus tapped the board beside the word. “We’ve heard that one before.”

There was a ping at Nutsbe’s computer. “Sir, Zoe’s on her way in.”

Titus turned toward the door. “Good. Now maybe we can get some context for all of this.”

Zoe

From the same flower the bee extracts honey and the wasp

~ Italian proverb

Zoe followed her guide to the Panther war room. She still felt a little bit like she had been sucked into a virtual reality game and was looking for the eject button. The meal had helped. There had been a nap room with sleeping pods. She felt human again—even though she felt like she was plopped into some weird new dimension. She gave the men a wave as she entered the room.

Gage moved toward her, his eyes a turbulent blue with only a few specks of green. “We were hoping you’d come.”

She let her gaze move around the room, taking it in. This was obviously a space where strategizing was done. There were three screens along a focal wall. One contained the faces of four men, three with Xs on their faces, and one displayed a photo that looked like a military unit in the desert. A photo like those her dad used to send home to her and her mom. Nutsb—er—Tad was sitting at the computer console. Titus was glowering, as usual. Prescott looked at her like she was some kind of bacterium on a petri dish.

“Are you doing okay?” Gage put his hand on her arm, pulling her attention back to him.

Zoe gave him a little smile and a slight nod.

“Why don’t you come and sit down. We’re making some strides in figuring things out. Is it okay if I ask you some questions? We’re to the point where we need more information from you. Then I can catch you up on what we’ve learned.”

“Sure, that’s fine.” She moved to a seat and laced her fingers and crossed her ankles, compressing her body into a tight package.

“Do you know the term BIOMIST?”

“Yes, that’s the name of the indexing system I was telling you and Titus about.”

“Who owns BIOMIST?” Prescott asked.

Zoe pulled at her fingers nervously. “I own the intellectual property of how the biomarkers work to create unique profiles. I also own the software that analyzes the data. DARPA owns the software that stores the data and makes it searchable, since this application was their brainchild. Montrim is the collection and housing unit for the data.”

“We know how DARPA became involved. How did Montrim get on board?” Gage asked.

“My understanding is that the United States military didn’t think it would be successful getting foreign citizens to cooperate with the project. The best way to do that was to go in as a charitable medical group. The goal was to include every human in a particular area. They dipped each person’s finger in dye to indicate that they had gone through the process and gave them gifts at the end.”

“Gifts?”

“I heard something in passing. I was told that it depended on the village. In some cases, for example, if the chieftain was over forty and had several wives, they would offer him Viagra in return for his people’s participation. Sometimes they rewarded participation with things like chocolate bars or small solar lanterns.”

“But despite their active participation, Montrim doesn’t own and cannot, therefore, sell BIOMIST data to a foreign entity.”

“No, absolutely not. Nor can I. The data was bought by the US government and is regulated through the DoD. Almost no one knows about its existence. Just the CIA, mainly.”

“Sir, excuse me,” Tad interrupted. “I have that information about travel routes that you asked me for. Also, I’ve received a file on the reporter.”

“Let’s have that,” Titus said.

Brian moved toward the whiteboard and snapped up a marker. Zoe wondered if this information would give her a better handle on what she’d missed while she was in the sleep pod.

Tad put up an image of the DC area with a red line. “All right. We have him starting at the address that’s listed on his driver’s license.”

Zoe shot a questioning glance at Gage. He turned toward her and leaned in to whisper in her ear, “We’re talking about the prisoner we took from the exfil house this afternoon.”

“He travelled to Lily’s work just as she would typically be arriving there,” Tad said.

“We don’t have information from Lily’s GPS yet?” Titus asked.

Prescott leaned forward. “I haven’t heard back from my office yet.”

Lily. How did Lily figure in to the attack on the little house? Zoe wondered, feeling completely lost.

“He’s taking his car and not following her on foot. I imagine that he had a tracker in her phone, to keep him safer from detection if he’s working as a one-man team.”

Tad put up another picture.

Gage tapped his fingers on the tabletop. “I’m wondering about the possibility of a tracker, not only on Lily’s phone and possibly in her other effects, as well. For example, her watch. And if they are, are they similar to those found on Zoe’s phone and watch?”

“Can you get hold of that for us?” Titus asked Prescott.

Prescott pulled out his phone. “I’ll text my colleague to jump on it.”

“In the next photo I put up, we can tell from this street shot,” Tad used a laser to indicate the Mercedes, “that the guy sat outside of the office park until zero nine forty hours. At that point, he went to the gardens and parked at the far north corner.”

As Prescott slid his phone back in his pocket, he asked, “How many entrances are there to the garden?”

“Four,” Tad replied. “Two on the east side, one on the south, and the one on the north. I would guess that Lily entered the garden at the northeastern corner, because that’s where the Metro line lets out. There’s a large fountain toward the center that would be a good landmark for a meeting place of two strangers.”

“Schultz got there at what time?” Gage asked.

“Zero nine fifty hours. Now, the audio tape between Lily and Bunsinger only lasted four and a half minutes. Schultz didn’t follow Lily as she left. He stayed in place for another half-hour. When he left, he didn’t go back to following Lily either. He went home, where he landed for ten minutes, then he went to his office, where he stayed for fifteen minutes. He left town, and we had to switch to satellite imagery, which indicated his next location was here.” The red point of his laser wand circled a barn. “That’s a farm in Maryland, and his car hasn’t left since.”

“What do you think he was doing hanging out in the park for so long when it’s twenty degrees outside?” Prescott asked. “I’m thinking he put his sights on that envelope in the reporter’s hands. Lynx said the reporter died of a heart attack. The guy could have had the attack after Lily left, and Schultz walked right up and took the envelope.”

“Or he could have confronted the reporter, and the sheer threat might have put Bunsinger into cardiac arrest,” Tad offered. “I’m opening the file on his death now. Give me a second to scan it.”

Prescott tossed his pen in the air and caught it. “That time frame makes me believe the PI took the envelope. What he did with it is going to be the real question.”

“Run with that thought,” Titus said.

“He’s not on Billings’ payroll anymore. Is he working the case for his own benefit? Is he trying to blackmail the senator? I doubt it. His unit attacked Zoe and killed Lily just hours later. One would assume that the affair would be revealed through her death. Is Schultz totally loyal to his unit? With something that big in hand, why didn’t he drive straight to his commander? Why did he make a pit stop at his apartment and his office before heading to the farm? That’s where I’m assuming they were meeting up for the later events of the night.”

“He could have faxed them. Scanned them into a computer,” Tad offered.

“Is that how you’d handle this kind of sensitive material? What would you do, Gage?”

“Head straight to my commander and put the envelope in his hand. I wouldn’t have opened it or looked at it.”

“Thorn?”

“Ditto.”

“Brainiack?”

“Same.”

“There you have it,” Prescott concluded. “My guess is this guy thought about the dollar amounts involved and started salivating. Developed an appetite for his own fat bank account. He didn’t have to know exactly what he was going to do, he only needed to be tempted to keep those documents for himself. Blackmail? Extortion? He may need time to process, form a plan. But I’d bet my badge they’re in his possession.”

Titus held up his hand. “Agreed. We need to get our hands on that envelope.” He pulled out his phone and dialed. “Titus here, wake up, sleeping beauty. Brainiack is going to text you some information—there’s an apartment address I need you to shake, and if that’s not successful, an office.”

“Are we going in quiet?” came a crisp, male military voice that didn’t sound to Zoe at all like someone who was just dragged from his bunk.

“I don’t care if either space looks like it went through an earthquake when you’re done. Walls, floors, ceilings, I want it thorough. I need you and the rest of the team to put the pedal down and bring us back a large manila envelope. The contents will have to do with Montrim Industries, Israel, and the CIA. This is a time-sensitive, code orange piece of intel. We’ll send search warrants to the car fax as soon as they’re signed.”

“Roger. We’re on it.”

Titus ended the call. “Brainiack, send Honey and Dagger the addresses and get legal moving on the warrants. You done scanning, Nutsbe?”

“Yes, sir. Colin Bunsinger has had known heart issues for the last six years. Recently, his doctors recommended bypass surgery. He put surgery on hold because he had a cold. Bunsinger was on medical leave from his position at the Washington Post. His family had no idea why he was at that park at that time of day.”

“I bet no one thought to be at the park in that kind of cold,” Zoe said quietly.

“Did they give time of death?” Prescott asked.

“A jogger running in the park over her lunch break found his body around thirteen hundred hours and called the paramedics. Bunsinger was pronounced dead on the scene. They can’t specify the time of death at this point because of the temperature.”

“They called the M.E. in?” Gage asked.

“The medical examiner took him back to the morgue where he was identified by family members. Since he wore a medical alert bracelet, after speaking to the family, the family doctor signed off on the death certificate as natural causes. No autopsy.”

“Prescott, can you find out if amongst the personal effects there happened to be a manila envelope?”

“Yep, I’ll call from the hallway. Take notes if anything interesting comes up while I’m out there. I’ll check on the GPS update too.”

Zoe leaned over and asked Gage what this was about.

“Lily was passing information about BIOMIST, sound technology, and wasps to a reporter on the morning of her death. Subsequent to the meeting, the reporter died. They were being followed by Senator Billings’s private investigator, though Billings wasn’t working with him at that point.”

Zoe’s stomach dropped. “He got information about wasps and then just so happened to drop dead of a heart attack?”

“Zoe? Are you okay? What’s going on?”

Gage’s voice came from a long way away. The whole room was swimming in front of her. Her system was simply not equipped for this level of intrigue. How did Gage do this day in and day out?

“Okay, you’re looking a little better, you went gray on me all of a sudden. What gives?”

“I’m not sure that this man’s death was natural. But there’s no way to prove otherwise. It just is what it is,” Zoe responded.

Titus’s face loomed in front of hers. “I think we need to hear more about this.”

Zoe

The fangs of the green snake and the sting of a wasp don't really make poison ~ Chinese proverb

• • • •

Gage turned to Zoe and held her gaze for a long moment. He believed in her. He stood with her. And his belief in her reminded Zoe that normally, on most days, she believed in herself too.

“Let’s start here. Zoe, why were you admitted to the hospital for exhaustion?” he asked quietly.

“I was working long days and nights on a problem that I couldn’t solve, and I guess it snowballed. I didn’t realize how taxing this all was on my health.”

“This was the last month or so, right?” Gage was talking to her like she was the only person in the room. She was speaking just to him. No judgement.

“Yes. The DoD needed Sphecious to be operable in four months’ time. They had a high-priority project underway. They said it meant the lives of hundreds, if not thousands of people. It’s a lot of pressure, you know?” Zoe’s eyes were glazed with tears. “I felt personally responsible for the outcome. If I could just get my WASP operable, people would live. Families would stay whole.”

“Were you a big part of that program?” Gage asked. “Do you know what the project is all about?”

“No, I only know that there was a push to get it done.”

“Who was pushing you?”

“The messages were being sent through Colonel Guthrie, he’s the director of my project and liaisons with the Pentagon.”

“Okay, good. Let’s start with DARPA—what role do you play there?”

“DARPA is headquartered in Arlington, VA. It’s located near the Montrim industrial park. While I do my work at Montrim, I’m paid by DARPA. It’s a little complicated. DARPA pays me for the use of BIOMIST, and that covers my research expenses and affords me my living wages. I’m working on a project that DARPA is interested in using. But while I lease them the use of the end mechanism, the intellectual property remains mine—the robotics and the software.

“DARPA was put into place so that the American government, with an eye to military applications, could address challenges spanning the scientific spectrum. Colonel Guthrie is a program director. Normally, I would have a program manager I would be accountable to. But because of Colonel Guthrie’s and my longstanding relationship, and his particular interest in supporting my scientific discoveries, he was allowed to serve both as my manager and my director.”

“And this is outside his normal purview?”

Zoe wondered why Gage’s brows knit together when he asked that. “Right. Normally his responsibilities are developing the technical direction of study, hiring program managers, overseeing the execution of various programs, things like that. Colonel Guthrie is with the Biological Technologies Office, which is the office that started BIOMIST and with whom I later developed the applications for both the military and the FBI to field test the biomarkers.” Zoe’s gaze travelled the room where the men sat perfectly still and completely quiet.

Gage’s steady gaze pulled her back to focus on him alone. “But that’s not the project you’re working on now. The project with the deadline.”

“Yes and no. I’m sorry but none of this is straightforward. You’re going to have to bear with me while I go through it. DARPA asked for my biomarker field test to be extended. They’re afraid that if these machines get into the hands of law enforcement, even though that was the reason for my developing them in the first place, others would reverse engineer them and figure out what was being measured. Or if it went to court, I would be forced to reveal the biomarkers that were being measured. As my machines became public, the rest of the world would be closer to having the same technology.”

The door opened and Zoe jerked her head around to see who was coming in. Prescott moved into the room and slid into a nearby chair. He gave her a nod.

Gage touched her knee to get Zoe’s attention. “And we would lose our ability to gather the blood census that we’re accumulating. So what is this new project about? You mentioned wasps.”

“Okay, so in undergrad, I developed the idea of blood biomarker applications. In grad school I also studied biomedical engineering. That’s when I developed the field test. Then I went on to get my PhD in microrobotics.”

“And you developed a wasp robot?”

“Its name is WASP, which stands for Winged Analytical Surveillance Project.”

“That’s quite a leap from biomarkers to robotic wasps.”

“It is and it isn’t. I was driven by the ethics of innocence. My original projects were meant to help keep people out of prison who didn’t commit a crime, so that the police were freed up to find the people who actually did break the law. A societal win-win. When I was in grad school, I saw news article after news article about how drones were being used to stalk terrorists and that whole compounds were being exploded, only to find out that the intel was old or faulty. Women, children, the elderly, and men who weren’t involved with terrorism were being killed.”

“And you wanted to stop that from happening.”

“Of course I did. But that’s naïve, isn’t it? I can’t stop all of it. But if I stopped just one mistake? If I saved even one life? Then I’m protecting innocents.”

“You thought that you could do this with wasps? I’m going to need you to lead me through this. My mind isn’t coming up with any way for you to save innocent people with a robotic wasp.”

“I took a class for fun in microrobotics before I decided to continue my studies with a PhD in the subject. I absolutely loved it. It was in that class that I developed a very crude wasp-like structure. My goal was to develop ocular enhancements, so that a tiny lens could send pictures to a computer that could identify and augment what it was seeing, thereby becoming a means of intelligence gathering. It was my goal to develop the eyes. My plan was to develop it to send visual data to someone watching a long way away. I wasn’t able to do that. But as I made progress, I was able to get this robot to send enough information to an external human, functioning as a pilot, to be able to navigate a room, and see basic human shapes.”

“It needs an operator, like a drone does?”

“Most of the time. I was worried about the WASP being seen and swatted. Then people would discover that these types of micro robots exist. Colonel Guthrie and DARPA taught me about paranoia and secrecy. I have an override in the computer system. If the WASP believes it is going to be captured or destroyed, it will override the pilot and fly away like an actual wasp. Once it’s safe, it hands the controls back to the pilot.”

“That’s pretty cool. How would the robot know it was in danger?”

“Analyzing shadows and detecting speed of movement, and since that’s harder to do at night, in a worst case scenario, if the pilot lost control, the robot’s head contains acid that will melt the WASP into what looks like black, chewed-up gum. No way to tell what it was or how its systems functioned.”

“All right, you got to a point where your optics could detect structure and basic human form. But you were after a different result.”

“I couldn’t get my optics to be adequate enough for identification. One day, I had one of those smack myself in the head moments. What was I doing trying to develop these ocular definitions? I was on a fool’s journey. You know, I got caught up in an idea, and it was like I couldn’t see the nose in front of my face. The reason I developed biomarkers was because of the Innocence Project. If you’ll remember, about seventy-five percent of the people that the program proved to be innocent were convicted because of faulty human memory and an inability to discriminate human faces. And DARPA wanted to develop BIOMIST because it was having trouble identifying terrorists because of similar cultural dress and facial hair. So why in blazes was I trying to develop a WASP that depended on visual discrimination? Stupid.”

“But you didn’t tank the project. You came up with a better identification system.”

“Right, I decided to put the two projects together. A WASP is piloted via ocular apparatus to the possible target. At that point in the project, the pilot could see if the person were male or female. If they were old or young. Basic, basic. Imagine rubbing a thin layer of Vaseline on the inside of your glasses and being sent into a room to find your suspect. That’s what the pilot has to contend with. The goal is to pilot the WASP to whoever they believe is the mark. The WASP lands on the suspect and by inserting a proboscis that punctures the skin, it sucks up a blood sample. At the same time, a second proboscis is inserted into the skin to plant a tiny beacon. The beacon is about half the length of a piece of rice and about that diameter. The weight of the beacon is replaced with the weight of the blood. To the person, it feels like a sting. The WASP must be able to function very quickly and maneuver away. So once the pilot finds the mark, the computer takes over.”

“What’s the purpose of the beacon?” Prescott asked. His sudden introduction into the conversation made Zoe jump. He put up his hands up in a “sorry” gesture and leaned back.

“Say the WASP took a blood sample. It flies back to the pilot who takes the blood and applies it to the test strip in the field analyzer. The pilot gets a plus sign. There’s a good chance that they’ve got their terrorist in house. Then they send that info to the Air Force, or whoever wants this guy, and they move in with a bomb, or boots. Preferably boots that can be more surgical about the outcome. How would I be sure that my intel is not already old? It was true in that moment, but the terrorist could leave. Then, not only would I have not helped to get the bad guy, but lots of people might be bombed on my faulty data. And we may think the guy is in there, see the rubble, declare him dead, and yet, he’s still operational. There are still lots of opportunities for bad outcomes.”

Gage tipped his head, his eyes far away as if he were imagining this in the field. “The beacon is something that the pilots can track?”

“No, it’s too small, it can’t put out enough power. But once the airstrike, or other means of interception begins, the pilot can send the wasp to find its egg. That’s what I call the beacon. And the pilot can verify the location. The wasp can travel up to two miles on each flight. It gets juiced up while the biomarkers are being run, and then can fly another two miles.”

“Then what happens? It just stops?” Gage asked.

“It uses the acid to self-destruct with its last burst of energy. I can’t let them fall into anyone else’s hands.”

“I’m sorry to interrupt. This is an absolutely mind-boggling concept, and I can think of hundreds of times when it would have made all the difference in the field,” Brian said. “Do you have to destroy it? For example, if we had eyes three-sixty and no way for this guy to escape, would you have to destroy the WASP? Or could you use it again?"

"Each WASP can obtain only one blood sample, and then it can't be used again. The biomarker test is highly sensitive, and the WASP would be contaminated. A micro drop could change the outcome on subsequent blood samples. If, however, we were dealing with a known mark and a biomarker test wasn't required, then the WASP could be used to mark the subject with an egg and track that person. It would still need to be called back by the pilot to recharge."

"I'm sure they cost a freaking fortune. You'd better be right when you're piloting to the mark. I don't know that I could do that." Brian said.

"Agreed. I developed software that's supposed to help. When Gage killed the men in my apartment..." Zoe instantly regretted recalling that scene. Her body went right back into panic mode. Gage reached over and drew a steady hand from her elbow to her palm then laced their fingers together.

"You're doing fine," he encouraged. "Take your time."

"If a photo was taken with ears or with faces, those data points could be put into the system. Height really helps. Gender, of course. The wasp tries to help the pilot. There's a scale that shows up on the screen to facilitate pilot decision making. It runs red to blue. Hot to cold, like the children's game."

Titus slid forward in his seat. "Okay, I have a question for you. I'm going to leap in a different direction. How did the CIA know that you were in the hospital? How do they play into this WASP story?"

Zoe's gaze searched over the floor. If anything made her feel vulnerable, it was explaining what the CIA, she, and WASPs had in common.

Zoe

Do not kill a single wasp; for then a hundred will come to its funeral.

~ Russian Proverb

“How did the CIA know about me being in the hospital? I don’t know.” Zoe’s nose tingled, and she squeezed it to stop the distraction.

“Do you know Grossman and Parker?”

Now her lips were going numb. Brian moved over and set a bottle in front of her. It was a chocolate protein shake. Zoe thought he’d probably hit on something, her system was burning through energy, like she’d been running a marathon. “Thank you,” she said as she twisted off the top and took a sip. “Parker and Grossman? Yes. I know them.”

“How do you know them? Were you doing something for the CIA?”

“Yes, the CIA activated the BIOMIST data. But Grossman and Parker weren’t part of that. I refused to work for them.”

“They were in your hospital room the other night, and said they were on a time crunch,” Gage said.

“They are, but that’s not my worry.”

“Can you tell us what they were asking you to work on?”

Zoe filled her cheeks with air and blew it out. “If this goes outside of these walls, I could go to prison. I’m probably breaking a bunch of espionage laws. My contracts all have non-disclosure statements and stuff about treason. Now I’m caught between giving you the information to save lives, including my own, or shutting up. I’m not a hero. I don’t want to be shot full of drugs and dragged somewhere to do things against my will.”

“Zoe, we deal in State secrets every day,” Titus said. “Our job is America first. None of us is going to take this beyond the tightest possible circles. But you’re right. There are choices to be made. And lives on the line. Yours, others. Innocent others, like Lily.”

“Lily.” Zoe still couldn’t believe her friend was dead. Murdered. Yeah, she’d have to keep telling them about her work. She didn’t really have a choice. “Parker and Grossman want my help getting to a guy in Pakistan. It’s high stakes, the next Osama Bin Laden, they said. I’m okay with them using my identification processes—that could save innocent lives. That’s been my goal all along. Keep innocent people out of jail, keep innocent people off death row, keep innocent civilians from being targeted by drones.”

Gage’s eyes darkened.

“They approached me about building a RoboSphecius because they wanted me to extend my research.” Zoe took a big glug of her protein shake. She could feel the sugar working in her system.

“In which direction? Zoe. Are you okay?” Gage asked.

“I think I’ve used up most of my word quotient for the week.” Zoe forced a little laugh.

“A little bit more, okay?” Gage’s eyes were green now, soft and comforting.

“Yes, that’s fine.” She paused, wondering how to explain this to those outside of the scientific community. “Science is accumulative. There are no new ideas. Any idea that is sparked by anyone else's is simply a next step." She grimaced and tried to come up with an example. "Do you know how Post-it Notes came to be?" She looked around at the shaking heads. "Back in the late sixties, Spencer Silver was a 3M chemist. He developed a "low-tack" adhesive. It was strong enough to hold paper to a surface, but the genius of it was that it was also weak enough that it wouldn't tear the paper when it was removed. Silver worked for a good long time trying to figure out how to make this adhesive marketable and he wasn't able to. One day, Silver's colleague, Art Fry, uses it in his choir book because he thought it would make a great book marker. Ta-da. Post-it Notes were born. Having something already, and changing it slightly to meet a need, that's the basic story of Parker and Grossman and me."

Gage said nothing. Waited.

Zoe considered how every word out of her mouth made the circle of people who had the information wider, and she felt that the mere concepts were potentially lethal. Already had been lethal. Lily, three men that the Panthers called "tangos", and maybe, possibly, the reporter. She pulled her hand away from Gage's. She wished she had time to consider her actions further. But inaction at this point seemed dangerous too. "Parker and Grossman were on the trail of Osama Bin Laden. They were accessing BIOMIST to try to track down Bin Laden's children. Recently they discovered my WASP project. They never told me how that got leaked to them."

"Who knows about it besides Montrim?" Titus asked.

"Montrim doesn't know what I'm working on. They just rent my lab space to DARPA."

"Weird," Brian said.

Zoe saw the men passing looks around and wondered what they were telegraphing to each other.

"As for who knows at DARPA? I'm not sure. Colonel Guthrie is my contact," Zoe finished.

"No one else? No bookkeepers or another staff at Montrim?"

"This is supposed to be above top secret—I don't know how they deal with that in terms of their accounting."

"Lily wouldn't know?"

Zoe searched the men's faces again. They were focused hard on her. This point meant something to them. "I don't know how Lily would come across the scope of my work."

"But somehow the CIA did. Did you tell Guthrie the CIA knew?"

"Yes, I told him right away that they wanted me to change the trajectory of my research. I was worried that they'd pile that on my lap too, because I was already on the tight deadline Guthrie had set for me. And I wasn't willing to do what they wanted anyway. Colonel Guthrie seemed pretty pissed about it. He told them to stand down, that I was working on a military contract. I was there and heard his side of the phone conversation."

"But Parker and Grossman pushed you anyway. What were they pushing you to do?" Gage asked.

"Back in the 1970s, the CIA had a secret weapon used for assassinations. A dart was used to shoot a small amount of poison into their target. The dart would dissolve almost instantly, leaving the tiniest of red dots. The substance would cause a heart attack that, at that time, couldn't be thwarted. I'm not sure how that poison would stand up to modern medical interventions now. But at the time, it was very effective. It also had a short half-life, meaning any traces that might be found in post-mortem exams would come up as naturally causative. Which is why, if this reporter had documentation that brought a CIA SNAFU to light, then I'm not sure, and no one will ever be sure, if Bunsinger's heart attack was a natural event or if it was triggered by the CIA's use of this poison."

"I've seen videos of those old Senate hearings, and everything Zoe's saying is true. But that initiative was nixed. They put that program aside," Prescott said.

Zoe shook her head, and the men turned to look at her. Their concern was growing palpable, and Zoe dearly wanted to leave. “The person who is hit by the dart may not feel anything at all or possibly just a bug bite or sting. Sound familiar? The CIA wanted me to develop a RoboSphecus with the capacity to detect a beacon implant and to, via proboscis, sting the person, administering a lethal dose of poison. The poison from the seventies. They have it in hand. That I can tell you with certitude.”

“Did you take on the project at any point?” Prescott asked.

“No, of course not!”

“Can I ask why not?” he pushed back.

“Imagine the ramifications. Anything we have in terms of science is just leading the race, but eventually all dedicated runners cross the finish line. Everyone would have this technology, especially if it was already functional and the “other” got hold of the wasps or my designs and software. They could reverse engineer the thing, send the poison to their chemists. Can you imagine the ease with which our government could be taken down? How could anyone prevent senators from being stung as they exited the Capitol? I’m not having any part of that. I’m okay with identifying the players so that we can separate the innocent from the culpable, to the extent that it’s possible. But my science will not be used to actually kill people.”

“But the CIA won’t take no for an answer.” Titus’s voice was a low growl.

“No. They won’t leave me alone.”

Prescott held up his finger. “I just got a text from the morgue. Colin Bunsinger had a phone, a wallet, and a set of car keys in his pocket, but there was no envelope on his person when his body was transported. They still have Lily Winters. They’re expecting the funeral home to transport her body later today. My team has signed chain of custody paperwork and is bringing her purse and her watch here to Iniquus. I hope that’s okay.” He turned to Titus. “We didn’t discuss it, but I think this will be the most efficient route. Of course, they’ll need to maintain that chain of custody, so they’ll need to remain in your forensics department with the potential evidence.”

To Zoe it seemed not quite a challenge. It was almost like Prescott wanted eyes on the inner sanctum, and this was his play. Iniquus was Zoe’s protector, and she didn’t like that the FBI was snooping around. Zoe thought that her aversion was probably do to her interaction with the CIA. She didn’t dislike Prescott. But in this moment, she didn’t like him either.

“That happens all the time. We’re set up to accommodate you,” Titus said evenly. He wasn’t ruffled. Probably Zoe shouldn’t be either.

Prescott tapped a response into his phone.

“Zoe.” Brian moved to sit next to Gage. “Your work on the WASPs is amazing. I love sci-fi. It’s all I read and most of what I watch on screen. I see how these things are possible in the future. But right here and now, you’re describing things that can be of so much help and you’re right, they have so much potential for harm. I like hearing you talking about the ethics of your research. It never occurred to me that scientists would be put in such difficult places. In the military, Gage and I make decisions like that on a minor scale. You’re making them with a wider scope. Do you have someone you can talk to, to debate these issues as you make your decisions? Is there someone’s advice you seek out? Perhaps that’s how this information is getting out.”

“The only person I’m allowed to discuss this with is Colonel Guthrie. None of this can get out to the wider scientific world. Mostly I try to be true to my own inner voice. Sometimes I follow through with the colonel, sometimes not. Colonel Guthrie told me to keep my head down and get the WASPs ready for intelligence, and then we’d talk about what happens next with RoboSphecus. On this, though, I’m not swayable. I could see our president being stung. I won’t have any hand in that.”

“But have you seen some good in your work? Do you feel uplifted by what you’ve accomplished?” Gage asked.

“I don’t often get to know how my work is being used. I told you about the failed attempt to use it to find Osama Bin Laden. I was able to help with the Paris attacks though, and yeah, that felt good. A few stories have siphoned back to me and really touched me, gave me courage, kept me working toward future advancements.”

Brian asked, “Was this with your WASPs?”

“No, BIOMIST.”

Brian went quiet, and Zoe could see him thinking hard. He shook his head. “I can’t put it together. Can you explain how BIOMIST helped in the Paris attacks? Would it breach security to share?”

Zoe opened her arms wide. “Everything I’ve said to you has breached security. I can’t see how one more item will make that much difference. After the Paris attacks, President Obama told the CIA that they were to do everything in their power to help Interpol. There was a short list of people the CIA thought might be involved. They ran the blood samples found on scene through BIOMIST.”

“What? But you said they were gathering the census markers in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Syria.”

“Montrim, under CIA direction, expanded its humanitarian efforts when Europe started to be overwhelmed by refugees fleeing the war zone. Montrim’s humanitarian arm set up medical stations at refugee centers to try to document everyone coming in from the Middle East and Northern Africa. Once Montrim was in the field, gathering data in the Middle East, they thought there was a glitch in my protocol because different names were coming up as matches. It turned out the patients were changing the names they were telling the relief workers. Montrim added a fingerprint identification screen to the intake. When the patients are processed, before the blood sample is taken, the finger is rolled on the digital pad, and it’s stored as a name and a fingerprint with a unique number sequence. That change happened fairly early on.

“Of course, they’re not Montrim in the field. They have several other names they use, like WorldMed International, and WorldCares. In the attempt to get the biomarkers, people are being given basic medical interventions. That’s a wonderful thing. Another good thing is that the software I wrote groups people into families—families in this instance are defined as parents and their children. A grandparent won’t lead to a grandchild. But a brother can lead to a sister. A father can lead to a child. If a child came in without supervision—the adult died in passage, for example—the medical workers would flag it. They’ve told me that dozens of families were reunited this way. I think that’s pretty cool. I had to sign off on that use for a set period of time. Montrim is giving the data to the field workers, who then do the leg work. It’s their charitable outreach, and they receive a great deal of goodwill in the communities for doing this kind of thing. The whole hearts and minds initiative. They say it’s name recognition software, putting people together.”

“Wow.” Brian sat back in his chair. “Wow,” he said again, then scrubbed a hand over his short military cut. “That must be an amazing feeling.”

Zoe offered up what Gage called her Mona Lisa smile. Yeah, it did feel good. It made her proud to know she was helping to make the world a better place. Then she sighed. “And now my science is responsible for four, maybe five deaths. I don’t know if one side of the scale balances the other.” She rubbed her hands together.

“I’m sorry, but I’m still stuck on the Paris attacks. How did your research help?” Gage asked.

“At first, the authorities had a blood sample they found at the scene where one of the terrorists exploded himself, and that’s how they found the name of Brahim Abdeslam in BIOMIST. Then the authorities worked to find his family. They also found a fingerprint that pinpointed Salah. The CIA, of course, didn't identify the means by which they made the identification. And they even tried to stay off the radar as the entity that identified him."

"But the Abdeslam family was from Brussels," Prescott pointed out.

"In 2015, Brahim Abdeslam travelled to Turkey, intending to go to Syria, but Turkish authorities deported him back to Brussels. That's when the sample was taken. Authorities had him pass through one of the Montrim sites for a health check. I really have very little information on the subject—there was an addendum to the contract I needed to sign so that the CIA could give the information to Interpol, that's the only reason I have this much. I'm sure that their media briefings disguised the true facts, because my index isn't supposed to exist. As soon as it's a known entity, our government will no longer have the freedom it has now to expand the database."

"Have you ever considered selling a copy of BIOMIST to Israel?" Prescott asked.

"No, absolutely not. Once this becomes known, the program is done. It's just now getting populated to the point that it can be helpful."

"Montrim never approached you about doing a sale to Israel?" Titus asked.

"No." Zoe was thoroughly confused. She looked at the men's photos on the screen. The two attackers from her condo had spoken another language. It could have been Hebrew. Was Israel trying to kidnap her?

"Is there any way that Montrim can access your data without your consent?"

"It's protected. I have a hacker friend who helped me write the code for the firewalls. But nothing's foolproof. DARPA has their own firewalls in place. All we can do is hold people off. My best defense for the database is that Montrim likes the money they get for gathering the data. DARPA needs this mission to be a secret. No one should be looking for it."

"Montrim has some of the best minds in the world working for them on their military software applications. They could have put someone on the task of hacking you."

"Why would they? That's cutting off their nose to spite their face, right?"

Silence.

"Right?"

Gage had his warrior face on again. "We're trying to figure all of this out."

Zoe

If I be waspish, best beware my sting
~ William Shakespeare, The Taming of the Shrew

Zoe stood and walked to the corner to get some air. No one stopped her. Twenty-four hours ago, she was eating Chinese take-out and reading a book in peace. In less than a day, someone had tried to kidnap her, she lost a dear friend, she was hidden, tracked, shot at, and chased some more. And now she realized that she was at the center of an international intrigue, playing with people who didn't have any rules. She pressed her forehead against the polished wood wall and tried to be still.

"Zoe." Gage's warm voice came from a good distance away. He sounded like he wanted permission to approach, and she very much appreciated that he was trying to honor her space.

When she turned, he took two steps forward. "We'll figure this out. Okay?"

"In the wrong hands...the wrong mindset... Just think. Can you imagine what would happen if I developed a RoboSphecious to kill? When the CIA brought the project to me, I could see how simple it would be to make the change. It's simply a matter of up-taking poison instead of blood and secreting poison into the skin instead of onto a test strip. Depending on the weight and viscosity of the poison, it's probably just a matter of making a few changes to the software and bam, it's a killing machine. I could probably rig something together in less than a day. And what if this went open source? Or there was a mole? Our enemies could kill any leader not liked by someone with a RoboSphecious. Imagine if they could build as many RoboSphecious as they wanted? Soldiers could send the micro-robots into the camps. Sting. Pilot them back, refill, sting again, and again. They could sting an entire army, and they'd all drop dead in the blink of an eye. Marines like you." A picture of Gage laying in the desert, clutching at his chest, gasping for his last breath, with no way to protect himself against this assault came vividly to mind, and it felt like she was being stabbed.

"Hey." Gage reached out and covered her hand with his. "I agree with you. I think you made the right choice."

"Zoe and Gage, sorry to interrupt." Tad walked toward them. "Forensics called to let me know that they've been monitoring your phones. Colonel Guthrie made three calls to Zoe and two calls to you, Gage. The timing is getting closer and closer, so we can assume he's agitated. Zoe, your phone needs to be tossed in the trash. It's too corrupted for forensics to guarantee they got it completely clean. Yours passed their tests, Gage, and you can use that one to make the call. They're bringing it down now. Be careful, though, don't reveal any new information since you last saw him, including your present location, or any of the intelligence we've compiled."

"Roger that."

Tad went to answer a knock at the Panther War Room door. Zoe assumed it was the forensics guy bringing down Gage's phone.

Gage turned to Zoe. "Do you want to call or should I?"

"I really don't want to talk to him. I'm not good at subterfuge, and he knows me too well. I think he'd press less with you."

“Agreed.” Gage took the phone from Tad. He pulled up recent missed calls and pressed the number for Colonel Guthrie. As it rang, Gage laced his fingers with hers and leaned in so she could hear.

“Gage? Thank you so much for calling,” the colonel said. “My blood pressure’s been inching up all day. I called the hospital. They said Zoe was discharged. I tried her number. I hope I’m not bothering you, but it worries me that I’m going right to voicemail.”

“She’s fine. She just woke up from a long nap. We’ll be headed out to dinner here in a couple of minutes.”

“Good, good. Is she with you? Can I chat with her for a second?”

“Sorry, no. Zoe’s not available at the moment. Is there a message I can pass along?”

“Yeah, sure. Great. Let her know that Maeve and I’d like her to come stay at our house until this is all settled. The more I think about the break in, the more concerned I’m becoming. I should also tell you that I didn’t call Zoe’s parents. I thought she should be the one who decides what, if anything, she wants to say to them. She is an adult, after all.”

“She’ll appreciate that, sir. I’ll pass the invitation on to her. I’m sure she’ll want to talk to you tomorrow.”

“But tonight, Gage? Does she have someplace to stay? I want her to be safe. I couldn’t forgive myself if something were to happen.”

“She’s fine,” the colonel repeated. There was a long pause. “You’ve been great through all of this, Major. Thanks for being there for her. I’ll check in tomorrow.”

“Good night, Colonel.”

“Incoming,” Tad called and put a new image up on the screen.

“An interview room here at Iniquus,” Brian told her.

“Is she here because of Lily’s death?”

“Ruby’s married name is Leibowitz. Do you know her husband, Sal Leibowitz?” Titus asked.

“No. I haven’t seen Ruby since...well, it’s been years.”

“Lily left her husband and was living with you when she went to a party for the USIPAC as a guest of the Leibowitz’s. She didn’t mention that to you?”

“I wasn’t Lily’s keeper. We didn’t run our schedules by each other. We got along because we both like our boundaries.”

“When did she tell you that she started dating Charlie?”

“I don’t know, months ago. I never met him. He was someone I knew about peripherally. His name. That he was older. That he made her happy. It was nice to see her bloom again after that disaster of a relationship with her ex. That is seriously all I can tell you. I had my mind occupied with the DARPA push to get the WASPs actionable and,” she caught Gage’s eye, “I had my own social life. I wasn’t really involved in Lily’s.”

“We need to figure out who’s the best person to talk to Mrs. Leibowitz,” Titus said.

“How did Margot get her here?” Prescott asked.

Tad smiled. “She said that they had spoken with the senator earlier about Lily, and Ruby’s name had come up. Margot thought she’d like to have the information so she was well-armed if any reporters came knocking on her door.”

“Smart move.” Titus folded his arms over his chest and scanned the room. “Okay, I think we send Zoe in, since Ruby and she know each other, but we also send Gage in to do the questioning, because he’s been in the room through all stages of information gathering. He’ll know best how to get to the needed intel. Thoughts?” He looked at Prescott.

“Agreed. Gage has enough field experience, he knows what he’s doing,” Prescott said.

“Zoe?” Gage asked.

“I’m just there to greet her and make her feel safe? I don’t have to talk to her?”

“That’s right,” Titus said.

Zoe didn’t dislike Titus, but his hard face always made her feel like she had been caught doing something wrong. She felt unsettled and apprehensive around him, though his words and actions had done nothing but support and protect her. So why did she feel like he was sending her into the lion’s den?

Don't pick a wasp out of a cream-jug
~ Jewish Proverb

Gage put his hand on the small of her back and the roomful of people filed out the door and moved up the hallway.

In a completely different part of the building, where things looked less like a military complex and more like a resort hotel, Titus opened a door, and Zoe started to walk in.

“That’s the observation room,” Gage said, and pointed to the door next to it. “We go in here. Ready?”

“Yup.” Not really. But they said all she had to do was sit there. She could do that.

As they moved through the door, Margot stood, shook hands with Ruby, and slid past them.

“Hi, Ruby,” Zoe said.

“Zoe, oh goodness, Lily is dead, can you imagine?”

Ruby stood and wrapped Zoe in an embrace. Lily was dead. Why did Zoe have so much trouble grasping that? She pulled back and shook her head. No, she couldn’t imagine Lily dead, despite all of the evidence, all the things people had been telling her. It seemed more nightmare than real.

Ruby’s gaze travelled between her and Gage and back to her.

“This is Gage Harrison. He knew Lily too.”

“Why do they have us here? What do they need us to know? The woman who brought me in said that they had information they wanted to share with me in case the media came around asking questions. Does this have to do with Lily’s affair with Senator Billings, do you think?”

“Why don’t we sit down?” Zoe pulled out a chair and slid into the seat.

Gage followed suit. “I’m trying to understand what brought us together too. We were told that you introduced Lily to the senator?”

“That’s right. I did. Do you think people are trying to hold me accountable for their affair? That would be...I don’t want to be embroiled in this.”

“None of us do. Let’s see if we can’t help each other figure this out,” Gage said. “You and Lily weren’t close friends, were you?”

“No.” Ruby shook her head. “In college, yes, but she married outside of the Jewish faith, and my husband didn’t like that. It caused tension. Lily and I were estranged until I learned that Lily divorced her husband. Sal thought it would be okay for us to bring her back into our lives, that maybe we could get her involved in our work with the USIPAC, and she would meet a nice man she could settle down with.”

“Yet Senator Billings is a Christian,” Gage said.

“That introduction was happenstance. I never thought that Lily would have an affair with the man. He was married. He was twice her age.” She leaned forward and lowered her voice. “He’s not exactly in the best shape.” She sat up again. “My mind never went in that direction.”

“Recently, you and Lily were getting together frequently, several times a week.” Gage tried to lead her in the direction they needed her to go.

Ruby's brows knit, she crossed her arms over her chest and leaned back. "Now how exactly would you know that?"

"Did you know that Lily and I were roommates?" Zoe inquired.

"No." Ruby seemed to relax. "She didn't tell me that."

"Did Lily talk about me with you?" Zoe watched Ruby quickly look up to the right, then she shook her head. "No. No, you didn't come up."

"What did come up in your time with Lily? You were helping her help your friend, Senator Billings, weren't you?"

"How do you know all this?"

"Lily and I were roommates." Zoe was offering a false door for Ruby to walk through. True, Lily and Zoe had been roommates, but Lily had never mentioned anything about Ruby. By juxtaposing the statement with Ruby's question, Ruby would assume it was the answer to her question, and Zoe wouldn't need to lie. She hated to lie.

"Did Lily seek out your expertise in forensic auditing to help her find information for the senator?" Gage asked.

"Yes, she did. And I was helping. Of course, I was."

"And you talked to someone else about this, didn't you?" he asked.

Ruby went pink. Her hand slid to her throat. "What is this?" she whispered. "Why are we really here?"

Zoe reached out and took Ruby's hand. "I'm here because I'm scared, to be honest. Lily told someone something, and it's putting lives at risk. The people here are telling me that Lily was murdered. That it wasn't an accident at all."

Ruby's eyebrows stretched toward her hairline. "The news said she committed suicide."

Zoe looked her in the eye and thought she saw fear but also guilt. "What did you do, Ruby? You told someone something. And you told them my name."

Ruby just stared at her, dumbfounded.

"People came to my condo to kidnap me." Gage gave her knee a warning squeeze. She must be disclosing too much. She was supposed to leave it to him and his field interrogation skills. But she couldn't seem to sit back and let him take over. "I can't go home. I'm terrified. Ruby, help me. Tell me what you did so I know how to be safe."

Ruby opened her mouth and shut it again. She pulled her hand from Zoe's and clutched it to her chest. "Lily was killed?" Her hands came up to cover her face. "You were attacked?"

Zoe reached out and pulled Ruby's hands away so she could look Ruby in the eye. "You made a mistake. You can help to correct it. Please, tell me."

"I'm sure that's not right. I didn't speak to anyone in the United States. I only spoke to my cousin because he's studying the same thing you are."

"What am I studying?" Zoe asked. "What did you tell him?"

"That you developed a means of identification through blood that's more useful than DNA because it's a quick and dirty, yes or no kind of test, and that you had developed a system like CODIS to index your findings. He's trying to do this—has been working on this for decades. I thought he could come and speak to you and get a direction for his work. Maybe you could collaborate."

"Lily told you that's what I do?"

"Your name is on the files that she was able to find to give to the senator."

"You said you spoke to no one in the United States. Where does your cousin live?" Gage asked.

"Jerusalem."

Zoe could feel his tension rising. “And when was this phone call?”

“This past Wednesday, late afternoon, is when I spoke with him.”

“Wednesday, you’re sure? Not earlier than that?”

“I promise you that’s when I called. See?” She pulled her phone from her purse and showed Gage the number. She’d called at 16:39, almost midnight in Israel.

“Thank you, Ruby. This is helpful to our timeline. Is there anything else you told your cousin besides the information about the biomarkers?”

“He asked if the program was already being implemented, and I said yes, for years now, and he wondered what new project Zoe was working on.”

“And what did you tell him?” Gage asked.

Zoe was astonished that Gage had kept his face so placid, like he didn’t really know what was going on. He, like Zoe, was a friend of Lily’s who’d got caught up in something scary. She needed to think later about the ease with which he slid into this role and how simple he seemed to find it to maintain. But not now. Now she needed to know how her secrets were being shared.

Ruby’s voice was so low that both she and Gage had to lean in until they were almost head to head to hear her. “I told him you were working on a new program for the CIA. With your new weapon, you can remotely pinpoint people for assassination. I told him that was the technology that he should be developing.”

“Wait.” Zoe sat straight up. “That’s not true. That’s not what I do. Why would you tell him that?”

“It is what you do. It was in one of the files that Lily shared with me when we were trying to follow the money trail for the Senate hearings. The CIA had come to an agreement on the price they would pay Montrim to have you develop your microrobotics in this direction.”

Zoe felt a noose tightening around her neck. Her voice could hardly squeak through. “And you told all this to your cousin?”

“Yes, but Zoe...” This time it was Ruby who was reaching out with placating hands, petting arms, clutching at her fingers. “He is very circumspect. He would never tell anyone. I just thought it might be interesting for him to come and see what you were doing, I thought Lily wouldn’t mind introducing you two and that it might be a good project for him to be involved with. We are, after all, allies. Friends. But then Lily...” Her voice drifted off and her eyes filled with tears.

“The Israelis think that I’m building a remote killing machine?”

Ruby swiped her wrist across her eyelids and sniffed loudly. “Aren’t you?”

“No. I am most certainly not. I’m not developing anything with the CIA.”

“Well, what are you working on?” Ruby looked thoroughly confused.

“Field forensics analysis of blood stains.”

“Oh. Well, that is very different.” Ruby glanced around, tears streaming down her face. Her gaze landed on a box of tissues.

Gage followed her line of sight and went to retrieve the box for her. “Why did you think that Zoe would share a project like that with the Israeli government?”

“Not the government. I was only thinking of my cousin, the researcher.”

“Still.”

“Well, the Israelis are furious with the Americans over the new Iran agreement, and of course, the billion and a half dollars given to the Iranian government.”

“It’s Iranian money, not American money,” Gage said.

“That’s completely irrelevant. Now the Iranians have over a billion dollars to use against Israel, and a goodwill gesture from the US might help. Who knows? I put a toe in the water to see.”

Zoe looked at Gage who had the same incredulous look on his face as what she felt. This was a stunning revelation. Were the Israeli's responsible for killing Lily and trying to kidnap her? Were they going to take her out of the United States to Israel? Away from any kind of support or help? How could Zoe stuff that cat back in the bag and convince people that she wasn't making a remote killing machine?

GAGE

The more Gage heard, the deeper he saw the hole that Zoe had fallen into. Releasing her name, releasing her research, of course she was going to be the focus of international intrigue. He was only glad that they were dealing with the possibility of an ally being embroiled in all this. What if a different government figured out Zoe's ability with possibly lethal microrobots? A country where they had little leverage, like Iran or Russia?

Gage's mind flashed back to Thursday evening as he was getting in from field training. It had been a shit kind of day. The team he was working to build wasn't gelling. They were nowhere near ready to be sent out on missions, but their training was coming to an end. Stressed out, the text from Zoe had instantly brightened his day. Sure, he could provide her with "a little stress relief." He'd enjoy some of that too. He had been grinning broadly when he used the key Zoe had offered him once Lily moved out. It felt like coming home, to slide his key into the lock, to hear the click, to know there was a beautiful woman in her bed waiting for him.

Then the scream. He'd been stumbling around mostly blind ever since. Learning things about Zoe, learning things about himself and how deeply he was aligned with her. How much he needed to keep her safe. How personally threatening this all seemed. To know someone was training their sights on Zoe gave him the same feeling he had on the battlefield when he knew he was caught in someone's crosshairs.

"Do you have any copies of what Lily found at Montrim?" Gage pulled himself together enough to ask Ruby the question.

"No. Nothing. She showed me and took it all away with her when she left. It was mostly us trying to follow the money trails. Accounting ledgers. The information I shared with my cousin is a tiny portion of a much bigger picture."

"Speaking of pictures, I have one I'd like you to look at." Gage reached over to the seat beside him and pulled out an eight by ten color photo of a tattoo. Gage watched Ruby's face carefully as he placed the image in front of her.

She pulled it over and frowned, wiping away the last of her tears, the clutching at her Kleenex. "Someone tattooed that on themselves?"

"You recognize it then?" Gage asked.

"This is based on a form of the Sephirot. It comes from the divine tradition of the Kabbalah that is associated with an esoteric group back around the time of the Crusades. It has to do with the Knights Templar, which some say was a group actually formed by Jews to protect priceless treasures."

Gage lifted a brow, silently asking for more information.

"Some historians believe that there was a group of European royalty who were descendants of Jewish Elders who had fled the Holy Land before the first century of the Common Era, when the area was invaded by the Romans."

"What kinds of treasure?" Zoe asked.

"Oh, not what you'd think. Not chests of gold and jewels. They were priceless Kabbalistic and Essene scrolls that had been secretly stored around various regions of the Holy Land to guard them from being plundered as spoils of war by the Roman invader Titus.”

“Titus?” Zoe glanced toward the wall of two-way mirrors where Titus was listening.

“Yes, that’s right. When the Elders fled Titus, they married into the European continents noble families. According to lore, twenty-four men would eventually become the leaders known as the Rex Deus or sometimes called the Star families.” She tapped the picture where the design had a definite star shape. “They formed into the Knights Templar, not to be crusaders in the common sense of the word, but to retrieve the treasures. The legend says that those who survived through the crusades continued using the name Rex Deus, becoming the Jewish Illuminati, and their descendants secretly rule the world.”

“Does this group really exist? The Rex Deus?” Gage asked.

“No. It’s the stuff of conspiracy theories and wild imaginations. It’s a way to tell people that the Jews have a secret international banking system that rules the world and all kinds of other scary things that make people suspect Jewish people of great malevolence. With Sal’s and my work with USIPAC, we’re trying to fight stereotypes.” She tapped the photo again. “This upsets me. I don’t like to think that there are people playing with the concept of Rex Deus.” She stopped and looked from him to Zoe. “Now that I’ve told you what I know, what do you know? Who has this tattoo? How did you get this picture?”

Ruby was looking at Zoe, but of course, Zoe had no clue. She batted her long eyelashes at Ruby, looking like a doe in the headlights.

“It was on a man’s arm who was recently taken prisoner,” Gage said. “It ties back to Lily, and we’d like to know how. Could your cousin have anything to do with this group?” He pushed the photo closer to her.

“Isaac? Oh no, he isn’t involved in anything but his laboratory. His head in a book. His eye to a microscope. Nothing else exists for him.”

They all stared at each other. Zoe looked like she was in shock. Gage didn’t know what else to wring out of this woman. The silence was becoming embarrassing when a knock sounded on the door.

“Hello,” Margot said with her big smile. “I have word that your car has been driven around by the valet. It’s outside the atrium.” She held out her hand toward Ruby.

“Aren’t they coming?” Ruby stood and gathered her purse.

“They’ll be done soon,” Margot said, holding the door and gesturing Ruby out.

As Ruby moved into the hallway, she glanced over her shoulder with deep concern in her eyes.

Zoe didn’t move as Margot shut the door. She didn’t say anything. She sat staring at the wall. Gage knew that she’d gone inside her head, wrestling with this new information. But the thought that Ruby’s cousin was out there with high-level, beyond top secret information, possibly putting the BIOMIST program at risk, spiked adrenaline through his system. They needed to jump on that and jump on it now.

Gage moved to the door and opened it a crack to peek into the hallway. “Okay, Zoe.” He held out his hand. “Let’s go next door and see what they think.”

In the observation room, the men stood in a loose circle. Titus was on the phone in the corner.

“The Rex Deus? Descendants of the Knights freaking Templar? Is this going to get any more nuts?” Brainiack asked.

“Who’s he on the phone with?” Gage lifted his chin toward Titus.

“The CIA,” Prescott said in a voice that said what they all knew. This had started out bad and kept getting worse. “Titus needs to give them a heads up to go sit on this cousin. We can’t have Zoe’s name out there, and we can’t let him spread the word about BIOMIST or the RoboSphecius.”

“Right. But this cousin...” Gage scrubbed a hand over his forehead. “Shit! I didn’t get his name.”

“Yeah, you did.” Brainiack leaned back in the captain’s chair. “You held the phone under our optics, and we got a screen shot of the number. Nutsbe traced it. We’ve got all his vital stats, and they’re being passed to the right people. Things’ll be fine.”

“You guys sure do work fast,” Zoe said.

Brainiack turned to her. “We don’t have the luxury of slow, ma’am.”

“The cousin isn’t responsible for the ops group coming after Zoe.” Gage paced the small confines of the room. “He didn’t have time to find the right contact, bring it to their attention.”

Titus tucked his phone back in its holster and joined them. “Agreed,” he said to Gage before he turned to Zoe. “The CIA is going to squash that bug, Zoe. They’ll keep this quiet.”

She nodded her head vigorously.

“We need to look elsewhere for the group that came after Lily and Zoe. Who needed Lily dead? And who needs Zoe off-grid?”

“Montrim is under fire from the Senate committee. They could lose their federal paycheck. That would basically put them out of business,” Prescott said. “It’s not a stretch to think they’d kill Lily. It certainly doesn’t explain Zoe.”

“Zoe, do you remember earlier you were telling us a story about Lily and you having dinner when she was in DC to interview for a job.” Titus had added a worry line to his scowl. “And you also mentioned WASPs.”

“Lily asked for an update over dinner. I started on the WASPs in grad school. They had no military tie at the time, so I wasn’t keeping my research on them secret.”

Titus pressed her, “But they became secret. They became above top secret, right?”

“Where are you going with this?” she asked.

“What was your answer to her about the WASPs.”

“That I was under DARPA contract and couldn’t discuss it.”

Titus put his knuckles on the table and leaned in. “And you were working on that at Montrim, in rented research space, but Montrim had no connection to your research, so they had no idea what you were working on.”

“That’s right.” Zoe looked at him, baffled.

Gage saw where Titus was going. “Did you eat dinner with Lily before her job interview or after?”

“Before.” She scrunched her brows together. “Do you think Lily used her connection with me to land her job?”

“What if she knew the secret of what was behind door number one, and she shared it with Montrim? They had to learn about what you were doing somehow.”

“Why do you think they know about the WASPs?” Zoe asked.

“They were negotiating with the CIA. They were supposed to gain access to your work, and then the Montrim microroboticists would rework your designs to meet the CIA parameters of use,” Gage told her.

Zoe looked like she might puke. Gage pulled a chair around and pressed her into it.

“Wait. Do we know which direction that came from?” Brainiack asked. “Did the CIA approach Montrim? Or did Montrim approach the CIA? I’d love to have been a fly on the wall for that discussion.” Brainiack turned red around the ears and turned to Zoe. “Sorry, ma’am, I didn’t mean to joke. It was a figure of speech.”

Zoe sent him a smile, but her face was still pale. Brainiack noticed too, because he turned and poured a glass of water from one of the bottles on the buffet and pressed it into her hand.

“Lily told the reporter that Billings had copies of what she was handing to the reporter.” Brainiack said. “Maybe we can find out more in that direction.”

“Asked and answered,” Titus told them. “Margot tried to get him to share the information Lily gathered when she was taking him down to his car. Billings is claiming they can’t release copies to us because we aren’t officially read into the CIA program, and we shouldn’t know anything that’s going on in a sealed Senate chamber.”

“And yet he wanted Lily to hand the evidence to a reporter and made the call to facilitate that.” Gage wished he was back in a room alone with the senator. He’d help the guy see reason.

“It makes sense,” Prescott said. “Billings couldn’t release this himself, so he needed a whistleblower to do it in order to keep his hands clean from any sign of sharing State secrets.”

Everyone stilled as Titus’s phone buzzed. “Titus here. What have you got, Honey? I’m putting you on speakerphone.” He held the phone in the flat of his palm.

“We had carte blanche with our search warrants.” There was a decided grin in the man’s resonant voice. His team had obviously had fun with the shake. “You asked us to put the apartment on the Richter scale, sir. If we shook it any harder, the whole building would have collapsed.”

“You cover your tracks?”

“We went in as a renovation team. If you can believe renovators would be pulling down drywall this time on a Friday evening, then we’re covered.” His booming laugh filled the room.

“And?” Titus cut him off.

“Negative, sir,” Honey snapped back to military precision. “There was no manila envelope of any kind in either location. As a matter of fact, there wasn’t even much in the way of paper in either locale. The apartment looked like it was all window dressing. He kept it as depersonalized as a motel room. His office is paper free. There’s not even a computer system in there. He must carry a laptop with him. We’re guessing the envelope is in his car.”

“Nutsbe.” Titus raised his voice. “The guy went home, to his office and then directly to the farm?”

Nutsbe responded over a speaker system. “Yes, sir.”

“Let’s pull that farm up on satellite and see what we’ve got going there. All right, I need Panther Force in battle rattle, pronto. We can’t leave that envelope in the wind. It’s fucking dangerous.”

“I’m in,” Gage said, knowing it was a long shot that he’d be allowed.

“You haven’t signed the contract, Gage. You’re a liability. You stay here with Zoe. Have some dinner, try to relax.”

The thought of relaxing while that envelope was in Israeli hands didn’t sit well. Not being part of the team didn’t either. “What if I signed?”

“It’s bad to make life choices based on adrenaline and momentary goals,” Titus said.

Gage knew Titus was right, was giving him good counsel. But Gage had been on the fence for weeks. And now, seeing Iniquus in operation, seeing the team in play? Yeah. He was in. “I’ve been making up my mind ever since you showed up at the hospital. If this is what you do, I’m your man.”

Titus considered him, then with a nod said, “Margot, facilitate Major Harrison’s Iniquus contracts and get him fitted out in tactical gear. Double time.”

“Sir.” She caught Gage’s eye and headed toward the door. Gage gave Zoe’s shoulder a squeeze, dropped a kiss into her hair, and whispered, “I’ll see you in a little bit. Please get some more rest.” Then he followed after Margot, glad to know he’d be boots on the ground.

As he moved toward the door, he heard Titus ask, “Prescott you in or you out?”

“You get warrants in hand, and I’m in.”

“Nutsbe, you on that?” Titus asked.

“On it.” Nutsbe’s disembodied voice came through the speaker.

Prescott was right behind him as Gage moved through the door. “I think I’d like to interrogate Schultz, now.” Prescott said. “Wring out some intel. See what we’re headed into.”

• • • •

“Gage? Hey, man, I’m Honey.” The man to his right stood almost seven feet tall and was built for the gridiron. He held up his fist and Gage tapped it with his. They were doing weapons checks in the Panther war room.

The man next to him raised a fist as well. “Dude, your glow is blinding me. You’ll want to kick some dust on them shiny new boots.”

Gage bumped his fist.

“I’m Thorn,” the man continued. “We’re a man down at the moment, glad to have you mix it up with the team. Give us a chance to see the newbie in action. Welcome aboard.”

“Special Agent Prescott’s going to be riding shotgun tonight, so Sunday manners,” Titus said. “He’s finishing up his intel roundup with our prisoner. Here’s the deal, we aren’t looking for any blood tonight. We just need to get our hands on the Mercedes. That car is the only thing covered in our search warrant. We will not be entering the residence.”

Nutsbe put up a graphic. “We need to go in now rather than later. It’s a matter of satellite coverage with the weather pattern that’s moving in. Besides, no one wants the possibility of a gunfight in a sleet storm. That’s the bad news. The good news is, it’s a new moon, and we have thick cloud cover. It’s going to be as black as ink, boys.”

Titus moved to the graphic. “We’re staging a tow truck down here around this bend. The plan is to roll the car over, hook it up, drive it out. One of our easier nights. But that doesn’t mean complacency. This group is Israeli Special Forces trained. Granted, they’ve been MIA for about a decade. They’ve got some age on their bodies and maybe not the same level of training they had back in their military days. But let’s not think we’re wrestling with Grandpa. We’ve had three bodies to look over, and they’re all hard as rocks. Maybe even put you princesses to shame.”

Titus moved over to the picture of the Israeli unit. “If this team stayed intact, we’ve kicked the hornets’ nest by taking out four members. Gage went hand-to-hand with the first two, and Brainiack sniped the other. Levi Schultz is in our tank on his blind date with Prescott.”

“That leaves possibly eight left,” Brainiack said.

“Seems fair. There are seven of us who’ll be boots on the ground too, counting Prescott and Gage.” Thorn yawned. “I like a little challenge.”

“Let’s not get cocky. They were trained to be some of the most lethal Special Ops in the world. This is their hidey hole. Imagine what we’d do to make our home safe. And gentlemen, we don’t have the luxury of time or intel.” Titus put his knuckles on the table and made sure he caught each and every one of them in his glare.

Panther Force was comprised of elite military operators. He and Titus were trained Marine Raiders. The others were all Special Forces from various branches—Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines. Their Ranger was out on loan to Strike Force, a fraternal Iniquus unit. Hence, one man down. They were the best of the best, and Gage was honored to be invited to join. Gage knew that though they were messing around, keeping things light so they were in good mental shape when they were under the gun, each and every one of them had lost brothers out on the battlefield to hidden threats. It went part and parcel with the job. But it meant that this easy camaraderie would be swapped for battle faces once they were in place.

Thorn grinned broadly. “One thing we do have, though, is a set of Mercedes GLC SUV keys that the guy kept in his wall safe.” He fished them out of his pocket. “That should take care of the alarm system and shifting it into neutral.”

“Careful, these guys are big into booby traps. It’s all fun and games until someone loses an eye,” Nutsbe said.

“Thanks, Mom.” Thorn slapped him on the shoulder and reached for a banana from the buffet filled with food.

The men were wolfing down burgers and power shakes, making sure they had the fuel for whatever lay ahead. Margot had taken Zoe down to the cafeteria. They were going to go back to Margot’s apartment in the women’s dorm and hang out there until the team got back. That was as far as their planning had gone. If nothing else, at least he knew Zoe’d be safe here on the Iniquus campus.

Prescott moved into the room. “Well, the guy’s a brick wall. His SERE training—survival, evasion, resistance, escape—was in full swing. I got his alias repeated back at me about a hundred times. We talked about how he could resist his little heart out, but he was heading down the CIA hole and the only chance for better treatment was timely information.”

“And?” Titus asked.

“I learned he can spit like a camel.”

“Nice. Anything else?”

“We had him hooked up to a polygraph. I concluded that he hasn’t handed over the envelope. We played twenty questions for a while.” Prescott grabbed a burger from the platter and took a bite. “I think the smell of steak on the grill and fresh baked bread you had wafting in was a nice touch. Made me hungry as a horse, and the sound of the guy’s stomach gurgling was echoing off the walls.” Prescott moved to the map. “I’m guessing from the polygraph that we’re facing seven members of his unit.” He stopped and took another bite of his burger. Speaking between chews, he said, “They’re all housed in the same place. Arms? They’re loaded. They’ve got flashbang, grenades, MP5s, AKs, side arms, and dogs.”

The men threw their hands in the air.

Brainiack gave voice to men’s thoughts. “Shit, man, are you kidding me? I hate when they have dogs.”

“Steaks and tranqs,” Nutsbe said.

“And time. All that takes time,” Thorn added.

Gage was focused on Prescott. “Did you ask about booby traps?”

“That one, I couldn’t tell. Either they had them, and he wanted to hide it bad, or they didn’t have them, and he wanted me to think they did. That’s a crap shoot. I’d assume we’ll be tiptoeing through a minefield, ladies.”

• • • •

THE TOW TRUCK WAS ALREADY in place around the bend. Honey got the short straw and was twiddling his thumbs behind the wheel. The rest of the team lay on their bellies in the brittle weeds. The December cold seeped through their battle gear and into their bones. They did a comms check. Gage’s transmitter wrapped around his throat, his receiver was dropped into his ear canal. He was hands free as he whispered, “Gage, check.”

Thorn was apparently the team's dog whisperer. He had laid piles of steak, carefully seasoned with a sedative that would kick in after twenty minutes, and a powder that would disarm their sense of smell immediately and make them dizzy as hell in the process. Now Thorn was off in the trees. The wind carried the slight tinny note of a dog whistle along with the smell of raw beef toward the house.

As a beautiful German shepherd pushed his way past the man holding the door, Gage was glad that their treats were in no way lethal. It would simply buy the team some time and ensure safety for the dogs as well as for the men.

Through the binoculars on his night vision apparatus, Gage watched the man dressed in jeans and a sweatshirt cast his gaze over the field. The guy's arm hugged tightly to his chest in a sling, and Gage could see the corner of a large dressing sticking out of his shirt's neck hole. Gage guessed that this was the man he'd shot earlier. Gage hoped the guy was loopy on pain meds and had lost his observation skills and some of the sixth sense that warriors developed over time in hostile surroundings. Would the guy go in and announce their presence, or were they still under the radar? Thorn was smart to put the meat on the other side of the rise where the man couldn't follow the line of sight.

A second dog pushed past the man, a third, and a fourth. Then he shut the door. Gage watched to see if there was any change to the farmhouse. Lights that suddenly snapped on or off. Movement at the curtains. He thought they'd probably gotten away with the ruse, the guy didn't attempt to call the dogs in. The evening was still but for the last of the brown leaves rustling in the wind.

Thorn, from his location, reported over the comms. "Beta One. The dogs are all high as loons. I put on the harnesses and have them chained in the woods. Even if things take longer than expected, the most they can do is raise hell with their barking. But most likely, they'll just sleep it off."

"Base. Panther Force, be aware cloud cover's giving us satellite problems. I'm getting intermittent visual. I've got your locations from your tracking units on screen. Everyone is in position."

"Panther actual. Copy," Titus whispered over the comms. "Alpha team, go."

Gage was Alpha One and Brainiack was Alpha Two. They had drawn the long straws and got to go after the car. The others were at vantage points with their eyes on the windows and doors. Nutsbe was back in the war room with his bird's eye view up on the screen.

Gage had a Glock in his side holster and another at his ankle. If things got bad, they could and would defend themselves. But Titus and Prescott wanted anyone who got in their way captured, not killed. To that end, he'd been handed a stun rifle. He'd never seen, let alone used one before. He knew that the Marines had asked for the development of this weapon for room-clearing operations, and to be able to take potential threats into custody using non-lethal means. Gage would have liked to have used it at least once on a firing range before trying it in the field. The shell for the twelve-gauge shotgun had a range of only a hundred feet. That was damned close if he was going up against an MP5.

"Alpha team, move."

"Alpha One, moving," Gage whispered back as he belly crawled toward the side of the barn. Brainiack repeated the answer, and they both squirmed from their observation points toward the Mercedes.

Brainiack had the fob and would push and steer from the front as Gage shoved from the rear. The Mercedes was parked at the top of a gravel-lined drive, and while the decline made pushing easier, the gravel was a definite deficit. There was no way to move the car silently. The trees lining the drive meant there was no space to maneuver the car onto dirt or grass. "Come on, wind. This would be a good time to pick up the noise level," Gage muttered under his breath.

Brainiack hit the key fob, somehow timing it with a flash of lightning, hiding the chirrup behind a boom of thunder. Brainiack quickly popped open the driver's side door and slammed the light switch to off.

The farmhouse door banged open. Gage threw himself flat, squirming under the edge of the fender where the dim house light created a shadow. From his position, he could see the same man who had let the dogs out before. His good hand wrapped around the collar of a massive Rottweiler. The dog was barking and lunging, his fangs gnashing at the air. The man whistled. Waited. Whistled again. Then he let the dog go, and he banged the door shut. They were made.

"Go. Go. Go," he whisper-yelled to Brainiack. Brainiack had one hand on the door frame and the other on the steering wheel. Gage came up into a lunge, pushing with all his weight into the back of the car to get it rolling down the hill, falling forward as he did. Through his night vision goggles, Gage saw the dog at the corner of the barn, staring at him. The Rottweiler's massive muscles vibrated. His mouth frothed with saliva. Gage could feel the growls in his bones as they rumbled through the air, low and threatening. Gage knew he had one shot at not getting mauled. With a twist of his torso, he grabbed for the rifle, pulled it to his shoulder and fired off an electrical shell as the dog leapt toward his throat. The device hit the dog's thigh and was quickly shaken off. The Rottweiler took off in the opposite direction, whimpering his surprise and pain. Gage was relieved that he didn't have to use a bullet to save himself.

The slow crunch of gravel in the distance told Gage that Brainiack was making good progress.

"Beta one. I've got the dog," Thorn's voice came over his comms. "I'm chaining him up with his buddies. He's going to get a steak and sleeping pill reward for coming right over to me when I called."

Relief was short-lived.

Flashbang exploded where the Mercedes had once been. Gage had been scanning the area with his night vision goggles when his optic nerves exploded into an inferno. All he could hear was the squeal of his ears ringing. A thick blanket of smoke choked him. Blindly he rolled toward the barn, hoping for something sturdy at his back while his system fought the overwhelming stimulus.

He was on his knees, gagging up the toxic sludge that he had breathed in, when the sound of firepower seeped through the cacophony. The terse communications of his teammates resonated in his ear, but he couldn't make out the words. He staggered up to crouching position then snaked his way along the length of the old barn. Gage put the stun rifle to his shoulder before rounding the corner, thinking what a piece of shit this damned thing was with its hundred-foot range, when that strafe of bullets being laid down was coming from a submachine gun. Gage yanked the rifle strap so the weapon swung to his back. He pulled his Glock from his side holster.

Gage's aim was the tree line and some concealment while he got himself back to operational. He blew the stress from his lungs, and with his Glock squeezed between his palms, his finger ready to pull the trigger, he rounded the corner to find himself nose to nose with a figure. Gage's momentum was already swinging right, so he extended and continued the gesture, bringing the butt of his Glock into someone's temple. The guy toppled into the barn wall and used it for leverage to spring back at Gage, knocking the gun from his hand.

The night was pitch black and his eyes were still burning. Gage couldn't get a visual of who was on top of him. What weapons were on hand, what was nearby. Someone slammed their fist into his cheek bone. He rolled and could feel the second punch hit the ground where his head had just been.

From the feel of the man's clothing, Gage knew he wasn't going hand to hand with a friendly. This person wasn't wearing the Iniquus uniform. Gage locked his legs around the guy and flipped him over, crawled up his body until he was sitting on the tango's chest. Gage pinned the man's shoulders under his knees. With the advantage of space and height, Gage pummeled the guy until his target stopped writhing beneath him. He rolled the unconscious man onto his stomach and pulled out a pair of flexi-cuffs.

Flexi-cuffs, Gage reasoned, would do little against a seasoned special ops guy. He'd just jump up and run to the nearest sharp object. Gage grabbed the man by the collar and dragged him into the woods. Gage stretched the man's arms over his head with a sizable tree between them and locked him in place lying on his back. Gage scrambled down and did the same with the man's legs. This combatant was trussed and ready for Prescott to pick him up.

"Alpha team, sitrep." Gage heard Titus's voice in his ear, still garbled but at least understandable.

"Alpha One. I've taken custody of one tango. Over."

"Alpha Two. The car is loaded on the flatbed, moving. Over."

"Beta team, sitrep," Titus called.

Prescott answered first. "Beta Two. I have custody of one male with an earlier bullet wound. He's sustained another. Medic required. Over."

"Beta One," Thorn said. "Dogs secured and sleeping. I have a bead on a guy who's sneaking around the right side of the house."

"Nutsbe. Beta Two, be advised that has him rounding on you."

The angry sound of electrical sparks filled the air, along with the garbled screams of a man.

"Beta Two. Taking the guy into custody now. I'm liking these stun rifles," Prescott said.

"Panther actual." Titus came over the comms. "I'm moving toward you to take hold of your captures. Since you have the badge, Prescott, I'm going to let you take lead on the house search. Now that we've been fired upon, I'd say we have probable cause for securing the place. I'll lock the prisoners down, then we'll stack up and finish this mission."

Gage stood in the infirmary while the medic gave him the required onceover. He had a pretty good bruise on his cheekbone, but the tango he'd wrestled had lost four teeth. Gage would take that for an outcome most days of the week. The good news was that they had all three tangos alive and kicking their shackles, each in their own interrogation rooms. Turned out the guy who took his second bullet in less than twenty-four hours was just grazed. The medics stitched him up, gave him some antibiotics, and called it a day. His wound from the exfil house looked like homegrown surgery. If he hadn't chosen to go to the hospital for that, no reason why they should force the guy to go now.

Thorn had crated the dogs, and had them transported to the Iniquus kennels for a vet check and housing. Prescott was elsewhere, applying his interrogation magic. His FBI team was fine-tooth combing the farmhouse. Brainiack and Honey were doing the same with the Mercedes in the Iniquus garage. Hopefully, the teams would have news soon. Solid information about what was going on, and where the five other soldiers from the unit were located now.

Gage and Titus left together and walked to the women's barracks where Zoe was waiting for them. The women's dorm was designed to look like a McMansion on the "Gage and Titus came to get you," Margot said softly. Potomac River. They took the front steps two at a time and knocked on the door. Margot opened it, and without a word, turned to get Zoe. The men weren't allowed in. Women only. Gage could see Margot shaking Zoe awake where she was curled under a throw blanket at the end of the sofa.

A few moments later, Zoe was at the door. Her eyes widened at the sight of the bruise and scratches on his face. When she locked her eyes on his, she seemed to find the answers to her unspoken questions. She nodded and accepted his wounds. There was none of the hysteria he'd experienced with past women in his life. No babying and sympathy. And Gage appreciated being treated like a man instead of a boy who needed mothering.

Titus left the porch as Zoe and Gage thanked Margot, then they moved as a unit to Titus's Hummer, heading to the new safe house.

"NO FOOD AT THE HOUSE, so we need to run by the grocery store to get something for tonight and breakfast in the morning. We can fill the fridge tomorrow. Zoe, this might end up being your home for a while."

"Thank you," Zoe said, still looking out the side window.

"Did you have dinner? Are you hungry?" Titus asked. "It's late, but I'm sure I can find some fast food if you can't wait for Gage and me to cook."

"I'm not hungry, but thank you." Her voice was too soft.

Gage remembered her trembling under the metallic rescue blanket. He didn't want them to be making another emergency run to the hospital. It was too hard to secure her there.

"When we get to the store, I'll just run in real quick, is that okay, Titus?"

“You can do the shopping.” He pulled into an all-night grocery store. “We all need to get out here, though. We’re changing cars. We’ll go in this door.” He pointed to the far door near where they had parked in the shadows. “And out the pharmacy door on the other side of the building. I’ll escort Zoe. Gage, when you come out, you’ll see a blue Oldsmobile, lots of rust, looks like a piece of shit, but that’s just its cover. It’s a good machine.”

As they walked through the automatic doors, Gage turned to Zoe and asked, “What do you want to eat?”

“Anything is fine.” Zoe’s eyes were scanning the walls.

Gage wanted a straight answer. He was too damned tired to be playing games. “Zoe, I don’t want to go get eggs and bacon and bring it back and have you pout because you didn’t want eggs and bacon. Just answer me.”

The look she sent him showed confusion. “Who are you talking to right now?”

“You!” His voice boomed louder than he’d expected.

“No, you’re not. I’ve never pouted over food you’ve brought me. This isn’t some kind of test. I’m not playing games. If you brought me a jar of pickles, I’d eat them. I. Don’t. Care.”

That was Zoe, clearly and rationally pointing out the facts. Of course, she was right, she didn’t set traps for him to fall into.

“I’m going to the ladies’ room.” She pointed to their left and walked away.

“Gage, you’ve found yourself one hell of a woman,” Titus said as he and Gage followed her. “She doesn’t say much, but what she says is what she means. Who wouldn’t love that?”

Some Neanderthal instinct roused in Gage the need to stake his claim. This was his woman. Ha. Zoe was her own woman. He was along for the ride. Gage worked to squash the feelings, knowing that he’d been on his own adrenaline rollercoaster with no sleep, and it was affecting him like it would anyone else on the team. This was not the time to tick off his new boss.

“But take my advice,” Titus was saying. “Get her something other than a jar of pickles.”

Gage loped off.

“Oh, and pick up some beer,” Titus called after him.

TITUS TURNED THE PIECE of shit car into the long drive. A little yellow house sat in the middle of a wide field, positioned like a postage stamp on an envelope. On three sides, there was a thick copse of trees, shielding the house from its neighbors. It was the very last house on the street that had a cul-de-sac for people who mistakenly arrived at the dead end. It was a great set up, Gage thought. Easily defended.

The driveway curved around the back of the house, and Titus pressed a button near his mirror to power up the garage door. A gunmetal grey Iniquus SUV was parked inside.

“Gage, why don’t you sit tight? I’m going to go give the house a quick run through, and once I’ve determined it’s safe, you can park next to the Tahoe.” The implication being that if it wasn’t safe, he should take Zoe and get the hell gone.

Gage moved to the driver’s seat and repositioned the car so he had the option of backing into the garage or speeding forward. Zoe was back in Zoe-land, and he drummed his fingers on the steering wheel, thinking back to the grocery store conversation.

Zoe? While she was as tantalizing and sexy as the sway of a hula dancer’s hips, she was also self-contained. Yeah, there was something undeniably... He couldn’t pull out the right word. She didn’t fit a form or pattern. He bet that freaked guys out—that they weren’t able to mold and manipulate her into something more recognizable, something that they had a better handle on. That wasn't Zoe. She didn't need translating into his language, he needed to learn hers, just as she learned his.

He thought about the Skype calls she'd had in her living room while she thought he was asleep—how free she was, gabbing with her friends. How goofy and funny. Laughter in every word. He wanted to have that with her. Sometimes. Not all the time. He liked how she looked up at the ceiling with that little frown between her eyes as she worked out some conundrum. She could sit that way for hours. Now he knew what kinds of thoughts filled her head. When he'd realized what she did for a living, Gage couldn't say he was surprised. It was like a puzzle piece falling into place.

He was proud of how fiercely she defended innocent people. How she put her amazing brain to work every day to keep them safe. Yeah. Zoe being Zoe, in all of her facets, he wanted to be the guy who got to stand next to her and watch her shine. He rubbed his hands over his thighs and looked up to see Titus waving them in. Shit, I've got it bad.

After scooping up the grocery bags, Gage followed Zoe through the garage and into a small hallway. Bathroom to the right. Laundry to the left. Then a great room with living, dining, and kitchen.

"I'll cook," he said, moving into the kitchen and putting the ingredients for dinner on the counter and the ingredients for breakfast in the fridge. He found a cutting board and knife and switched on the oven to warm the loaf of bread he'd purchased.

In the living room, Titus moved to the flat screen TV and turned it on. "Let's see what the news is saying about the events of the day." He moved to the couch and sat.

To Gage's surprise, Zoe didn't go up the stairs to look around, but went to sit on the other end of the couch.

The newscaster was concluding his remarks on Senator Billings's very bad day and the Montrim Industries inquiry.

"The senator is going after Montrim. Are you worried about that?" Titus asked Zoe.

Zoe curled herself up with her knees under her chin. "I don't work for Montrim. I work out of their laboratory because it's secure. I think the Senate probably should go after them. Montrim's got some things going on there that are pretty horrific."

"Like what?" Titus asked.

Gage was paying close attention to the conversation while he chopped onions.

"The soundwave technology that takes out entire cities but leaves the infrastructure and flora intact—that you know about now. That, to me, needs to be stopped."

"Were you read into that program?"

"No. I eat in the cafeteria. I can hear people talking around me."

"Are they allowed to do that? Just chat about top secret studies in front of others?"

Zoe tipped her head. "Folks there all have high clearance levels, at least the ones who eat in the same cafeteria I do. Montrim has this social psychology interior design. The public spaces are developed to encourage people to bump into each other and communicate. Montrim wants projects to cross-pollinate. I told you about the Post-it Notes. Someone says something that's an ah-ha moment for someone else."

"And that works?"

Zoe shrugged. "As much as it can in a room full of unsocial science geeks. Synchronicity happens."

"What else have you overheard?"

Gage tried to move around the kitchen as softly as possible so he could hear as he pulled out a skillet and flipped on the burner.

“Have you watched the film GI Joe: The Rise of Cobra? That’s what Montrim Labs reminds me of. They’re developing things that can easily be seen as destabilizing in the wrong hands—or even the right hands. It’s scary stuff.” Zoe got up and headed for the stairs.

“I guess she’s done.” Titus moved to the kitchen.

“Yup.” Gage followed her progress with his gaze until she rounded the corner.

Titus opened the fridge, and pulled out two beers, handing one to Gage. “Do you need to go check on her?”

“Are you serious?” Gage accepted it, twisting off the top and taking a swig. “No. She wants her thoughts to herself. And we probably want that to happen too, so she can churn through what’s happening. She’s the genius, after all.”

Titus looked up the staircase where Zoe had disappeared. “I can’t envision a mean thought in her head. Do you think she’ll be able to figure out how criminals think?”

“Nope. That’s why she needs us. She knows it, or she would have walked out the front door and not through the bedroom door.”

Titus had headed home in the Iniquus SUV, leaving them with the Oldsmobile. That felt okay to Zoe. She felt comfortable being in this little yellow house, especially after the car ruse at the grocery store. She stood at the sink, pouring liquid soap under the hot water faucet so she and Gage could clean up the dishes.

Gage scraped the plates and put the stack next to the sink. “Do you want to wash or dry?”

“Wash,” Zoe said, and watched Gage pull a couple of dish towels from the cupboard. She liked that he was as neat about his environment as she was, and that he pitched in equally to keep things up without being asked. She grabbed the glasses and slid them into the water.

“Today is our half-year anniversary. We started dating on Junefourteenth.”

Zoe pushed a cloth into the glass and swirled it around while sending Gage a smile. “That’s romantic of you to realize.” She rinsed it and handed it over to Gage to dry.

“You know, most girls I’ve gone out with talk about wedding plans and kids’ names by week three. We’re at six months. Obviously, honeymoon destinations aren’t on your list of topics to think about.”

“Nope.” Zoe pulled out another glass and gave it a swish.

“You don’t think I’m a catch?”

Zoe loved it when Gage got that teasing lilt in his voice. She thought it was sexy as all get out. “A catch? Oh my God, this is a cheesy conversation.” She handed him the glass. “I’m not sure how you’d define a catch.”

He smiled at her, accepting the glass, but not defining his parameters. Instead he asked, “I’m wondering what you see when you look into the future, Zoe. Are you married to your job? If you are, I get that.” He dipped his head as he studiously dried the glass. “Or maybe you see a husband and children?”

Zoe picked up a plate, confused by the switch in tone. “Sure, I have an idea of what I’d like my life to look like. A husband, yes. Eventually adopting some kids, eight years old or so.”

“I’m sure there’s exhaustive reasoning for that particular age.” Now he was grinning.

She studied his face and decided there was nothing malicious there. Not even amusement, really. It was kind of like joy. Now that was really perplexing. She handed him the clean plate. “Not everyone has to want the same thing. Science is my thing. Alpha-dogging is your thing.”

“Alpha-dogging? That isn’t the title on my contract.”

“Did you know that societies are balanced?” She clattered the silverware into the suds. “China is having a real problem with that right now. Most families get one child, and they thought for a long time that boy babies were more desirable than girl babies, aborting female fetuses, putting girl babies up for adoption. Same thing is happening in India, where they have like forty-three million more men than women. They’ve thrown their culture off balance. Too many males without a similar ratio of females creates disturbing outcomes.”

“Too much testosterone and not enough estrogen? Is this something to do with Alpha dogs?”

“Not really. I was just thinking about the fight you were in tonight.” She focused on the multicolored bruise, stretching across his cheekbone. “You said that you had seven good guys, and you expected about the same number of bad guys. That’s how things work in our populations. One percent of our population is made up of psychopaths—people who can kill with no moral barometer, and one percent are what I’m calling Alpha-dogs—people who can kill because of their moral barometer. It’s a balancing act.”

“That’s pretty interesting.” Gage pulled out the cutlery drawer, dropping the knives and forks into place as he dried them. “What else works that way?”

Zoe let the water out and leaned against the counter. “Artistic brains and mathematical brains, extroverts and introverts. I’m oversimplifying to make the point. One of my friends in undergrad said I should find the markers for that in blood. She said that the phrase ‘It runs in my blood’ is true.”

“Do you think that’s right? Do you think that someone’s profession is something that they’re physiologically predestined to do?” Gage placed the dishes up into the cabinets.

“I’m not willing to study it.”

“Because?”

“The ramifications of such a test could be pretty awful.”

“I don’t know,” Gage said, shutting the doors as Zoe cleaned out the sink. “There are a lot of people who search their whole lives to find the thing that’s right for them. And if we blood tested them in third grade—”

Zoe followed Gage out of the kitchen. “And said, you will be a musician whether you like it or not?” she asked.

“It wouldn’t be like that.” Gage caught her around the waist and pulled her hips tight to his.

“It’s been that way. I have an older friend who escaped from Hungary when it was still a communist country. She was designated a musician and was given a flute—Here is your future, they said. What does she do now? She plays the flute.”

“See?” Gage kissed her lightly.

“No. She didn’t want to be told. She wanted free will. Do you see the difference between choice and no choice?”

“Well, maybe it could be a privately-run venture where people who have no idea what they should be doing could go and pay to have the blood test done—sort of a What Color Is Your Parachute of biology.”

“Maybe not knowing what to do is exactly what they’re supposed to do. Maybe in this lifetime they were sent here to quest.”

“This lifetime? Do you believe in reincarnation?” he asked.

“I don’t not believe in it. I believe that seekers are an important component in our social chemical solution. All of the substances in that solution are added in the right proportions or our grand human experiment wouldn’t work. That’s my hypothesis, anyway. But it’s an experiment that I think is unethical to undertake.”

“You’d be a millionaire,” he crooned.

Zoe caught the playfulness in his eye. This wasn’t a serious philosophical discussion. She didn’t know what this was. She was grateful, though, that they weren’t rehashing the day. She’d had quite enough of the day. “If I were interested in being a millionaire, I would have asked the government to compensate me correctly for the ongoing use of my intellectual property for the biomarker database.”

Gage’s brow furrowed. “They don’t?”

“No, I only ask them for enough money to run my lab and pay my bills. I don’t need the distractions that come with wealth. I want to focus on my projects.”

“I can understand that.” He dropped a kiss on her forehead and reached down for her hand. She could see the fatigue in his eyes. “Come on, Zoe, I need to take a shower. I want you to shower with me.”

GAGE

Water sluiced over Gage's skin. Zoe stood back while he gave himself a quick wash. He didn't want her pressed up against the filth he'd been rolling in. As he scrubbed himself down, he was thinking about Zoe and her biomarker tests that she refused to perform to see if certain traits ran in someone's blood. He wondered if Zoe could find the familial biomarkers that would predict the outcome of their relationship. Was serial philandering part of his paternal genetic code? He'd never considered cheating in a relationship before. But it could lie there, latently waiting. What about maternal alcoholism and suicidal tendencies? Was that what he was bringing to a relationship with Zoe? At least he'd found a strong woman, someone who wanted to remain separate and whole. Someone who could leave him and save herself if he turned out anything like his parents. That made him feel safer about broaching the idea of a future, especially one with kids in it.

When Gage was less contaminated, he reached for Zoe's hand and pulled her under the water.

With her round bottom pressed against his abdomen, he reached around, rubbing suds over her belly. He let his finger graze over her ribs so she'd giggle and squirm.

"Stop, Gage, that tickles!" She was laughing, and his cock stood at attention. When she tried to pull away, he held her tight until she stilled.

"Well, at least I got a smile out of you." He poured shampoo onto his palm then rubbed it into her hair. "You know how you laugh and kid with your old dance company friends? I'd like you to feel that comfortable with me," he said as he rubbed bubbles into her scalp and down the long strands. "To feel that level of—"

"Immaturity?" She laughed as she put a hand on the shower wall to steady herself and kept her hips pinned to his, using her other hand to move his hard-on between her warm thighs.

"I was thinking abandon." He leaned down and kissed her shoulder. "Where you let yourself be playful without using brakes."

She leaned her head back as he massaged the suds into her hair. He felt her body stiffen under his hands. That was the opposite reaction to what he wanted.

"That's an interesting way of perceiving that relationship. For me, talking with my childhood friends, I have that childlike relationship with them. You know? The jokes we're laughing at are private jokes from many many years ago." She turned her head for a kiss, then put her hands back on the wall, relaxing again.

He massaged the bubbles down her back, being extremely gentle over the three angry looking bruises from the rounds she took to her bulletproof vest.

"I can't have that with you, because even if we have private jokes, I'm not filtering them through a middle school mindset. I have no desire to be that person again." She paused for a second, then asked in a smaller voice, "Is that who you're waiting for in our relationship?"

"Nope." He tilted her head back so he could rinse the shampoo out. "I guess what I'm waiting for is the level of comfort and trust I hear in your voice when you're having fun with them."

Zoe stepped forward, turning and running her hand up and down his dick before she sandwiched it between their bodies. She looked up for a kiss. "I trust you." And another kiss. "And I appreciate you.” Then she laid her head on his shoulder.

Gage turned so the water would run down her back and keep her warm.

“Because you seem to get me and don’t try to make me something I’m not,” Zoe said. “I didn’t misread that, did I, Gage?” She leaned back so they were eye to eye. “Were you waiting for me to morph into a different person over time?”

Gage could lose himself in Zoe’s eyes. The honesty. The depth. “No, Zoe.” He sent her a smile. “It’s impossible for a flower to change her petals.” He held her chin so she wouldn’t look away when he said, “And you are the most beautiful orchid.”

Zoe’s eyes filled with bashful curiosity.

Gage turned her again so her back was against him, and he reached for the soap to play with her breasts. Her nipples pebbled under his fingers, and she reached between his legs to massage his cock, then guided it inside of her. As she undulated her hips to move up and down his shaft, he drew a long breath between his teeth. After a day like today, his emotions were on edge. His orgasm was right there. A few more strokes and he’d be done. Gage forced the sensations down and pushed his thoughts to his rational mind so he could wait for her to catch up. “Orchids look delicate but they are incredibly hardy,” he whispered into her ear. “The plant blooms for weeks, if not months on end, where other flowers blossom and fade in just days.”

Zoe arched her back with a moan as his hands moved over her breasts, her belly, her ass. He rocked his hips to move in and out of her. He took another breath and tried to focus on words, not sensations. “Where other flowers need to be watered constantly, you are satisfied with very little—in fact, giving you the same amount of water as I would a different flower would be harmful.”

Zoe pushed against him.

“Orchids like diffused light. If the light is too intense they don’t do well. They need just the right touch.” He reached between her legs to drag the rough pad of his thumb over her clitoris. With one arm holding her tight against him, and the other hand rubbing her clit, he stroked gently in and out of her. “Orchids are graceful flowers. Oh-so beautiful to look at. But I’d never pick one and take it home to put in a vase. Orchids have to be left alone.”

She made little mewling noises as she steadied herself on the wall, then pushed her bottom back into him, her signal that she wanted it harder. Deeper.

Thank God. Gage wrapped his hands around her hips, happy to comply.

Gage’s legs were rubbery underneath him. He couldn’t remember ever having an orgasm that wild. Every nerve in his body lit up as heat spread through him like wildfire. He wrapped Zoe in his arm and held both of them up with his other hand on the toiletry shelf. She was like a rag doll draped over him, reaching one arm up to hook around his neck.

When he bent to kiss her, her eyes were shut and her mouth was bowed into a perfect pink smile of satisfaction. Gage couldn’t have loved her more than he did in that moment. With that thought, his dick hardened again. Gage wasn’t sure he could survive another orgasm like that. He moved them out of the tub, wrapped Zoe in a towel, and together they made their way to the bedroom to collapse on the king-sized bed.

“I love you, Zoe,” Gage said for the very first time.

She didn’t answer.

He looked down to see her smile fall away and her eyes flash open. Her breath went shallow. What did that mean? Didn’t she feel the same? That would be a hell of a thing. “I’m crazy about you.” He pushed the wet hair from her face.

She shook her head.

Gage flipped onto his side and propped his head on his bent arm, resting his other hand on her stomach. “You don’t feel the same?”

“That’s not what our relationship’s been about.” She pulled the towel tighter. “We agreed that we were going to enjoy each other’s company. Have sex. We talked about no commitments. You were very clear about no commitments. You could be sent off at any time. Attachments could be problematic. Let’s enjoy the here and now. Does this sound familiar?”

“Yes.” That was exactly what he’d said. He’d laid out his parameters from the start. It was his go-to beginning of a relationship discussion. “I’ve moved on from there,” Gage said.

She flipped on her side, mirroring his position. Once again tucking the towel tightly around her like a shield. “What does that look like to you?”

What did that look like to him? If she was this shocked with an ‘I love you,’ he wasn’t willing to test the waters with the rest of it. Gage combed his fingers through the damp ropes of her hair.

“A committed relationship?” she asked, refocusing him on her words.

Gage was silent, trying to weigh what he wanted to say. A life. A family. Those seemed too big of an ask. Too much of a leap. “Yes, actually,” was what he finally offered.

She blinked like he had blown dust into her eyes, and she was trying to clear her vision. “What does committed look like to you?” She put her hand on her chest as if she felt pain. “Moving in together? Marriage?”

“Well, yes. Both,” Gage said softly.

“Gage, no.” She rolled off the bed and moved to her suitcase. “I’m sorry. But no.”

Gage tensed his muscles like she was delivering body blows. No. He felt like he’d been kicked in the guts, his lungs deflated. He held perfectly still, praying the feeling would go away.

With the towel as a screen, she pulled on a pair of panties and then the oversized t-shirt she slept in. Dressed, she turned back to look at him. “I grew up as a military brat.” Her voice was whisper-soft, and she looked like a praying angel as she hugged the towel to her chest. “Every time my roots took hold, my parents yanked me up and stuck me in some new plot of earth. I’m over that lifestyle. I’ve established a career and friendships. I learned from my mom’s experience that not only do I need to be able to stand strong on my own, I also have to live my own life, not dictated to by the whims of my husband’s employer. I’m not marrying into the military. I’m not falling in love with a Marine. I won’t let it happen.”

Gage swallowed. “But it has, just a little bit, hasn’t it?” The words caught in his throat and he had to clear them before he could say, “You love me at least a little.” As soon as the words slipped past his lips, Gage knew it was a mistake. Zoe completely slammed the doors down and turned her face to the wall.

“What if I weren’t in the military? Would you feel differently then?”

“I don’t do hypotheticals with relationships,” she told the wall.

“You might have missed it in all of the hullabaloo today, but I signed a contract to work with Iniquus. I won’t be re-upping with the Marines. Iniquus, they’re headquartered right here in Washington DC. I’ll have overseas assignments, but DC would always be my jumping off block.”

She turned turbulent eyes on him and pursed her lips as she studied him. “I hope that that didn’t have anything to do with me. I’m not getting involved in your career. Don’t add me and our relationship to any scale you’re using to weigh your decisions.”

“That’s kinda cold, Zoe.” Gage moved to the top of the bed where he sat completely naked with his back to the headboard.

Zoe came and sat on the corner of the bed, facing him. “You have to be you. You have to be your own tree with your own root system.”

“Hah! I know where you got that from.”

Zoe canted her head.

“Kahlil—”

“Gibran, right. I think it’s one of the wisest things I’ve ever read when it comes to relationships.”

“Agreed. We’re of the same mind on that.” That they both knew the same poem and both used it as a means of defining a perfect relationship only served to deepen Gage’s trust in their connection. They belonged together. “So here are the facts. As soon as my contract is up with Uncle Sam next month, I’ll be the newest member of Panther Force. I’ll be working under Titus Kane. These next few weeks, I’ll still be at Quantico.” He paused. “Now that the military change of address is off the table...”

Zoe pursed her lips and let her breath out slowly.

Gage stopped. She hadn’t said no. She didn’t say yes. But that gave him room to try. “What are you thinking, Zoe?”

She did it again, a deep breath in, then the slow release through her beautiful pink lips. All he wanted to do was grab her up and kiss her. Hard.

She held up her hand. “You threw me off balance with that one, Gage. I need some time to process. Can we please take one crisis at a time?”

“Our relationship is a crisis?” For some reason, that amused him, and he offered up a grin.

“No. No.” She crawled up the bed and scooted under the covers, rolling until she was resting in his arms. “I didn’t mean that. I simply meant that I need brain space to process what you’re saying and right now my brain is busy.”

“Gotcha.” He bent to kiss her and moved Zoe so he could better hold her. “So first we save you and the world as we know it.” He reached back to click off the light. “And once the apocalypse is averted, we can figure out who we are to each other.”

GAGE

• • • •

The smell of coffee pulled him to a sitting position. Gage rubbed his eyes and reached out to yank open the blackout curtains that hid the morning light. The clock read zero eight hundred hours. He could probably sleep a few more hours and be the better for it.

Zoe, of course, wasn't in bed. He reached over and the warmth was gone from her side. She must have been up for a while. Gage decided to shower and brush his teeth before he went down to see her. The noise would give her time to adjust to someone else being around, interrupting her thoughts. He scratched his hand through his two-day-old beard. He'd probably feel better after a shave too.

Titus had brought in Zoe's overnight bag, and he had a sports bag for Gage. When Gage opened it, he found an Iniquus uniform, a new set of socks and briefs, and a Dopp Kit with all the needed toiletries. That would do. He brought them with him into the bathroom for a quick clean up.

Now revived, he was ready for a cup of joe. He headed down the steps to find Zoe sitting at the breakfast bar with papers spread in front of her and her hands wrapped around an oversized, green coffee mug.

He moved toward her. "Did you sleep at all last night?" He dropped a kiss onto her forehead as he wandered into the kitchen.

"No." She sighed. "My brain was on overdrive."

Gage picked up one of the papers scattered across the counter. One was covered in doodles and had his name framed in squiggly lines. The other looked like a math formula on steroids. At the bottom, it said Colonel Guthrie, and that too was surrounded by squiggly lines. "What's this all about?" He laid the papers back in front of her.

"Two different ways of thinking things through. This is my emotional thought process and nonlinear thinking." She put her finger on the page with his name. "And these are my logic formulas."

"You can take the girl out of the lab," he said, snagging a coffee mug from the shelf. "But you can't take the lab out of the girl." He moved back and pointed to the doodle page. "Obviously, this is the one that interests me the most." He poured the coffee and moved to the stool next to Zoe's. "What do these squiggles around my name represent?"

"Conclusion drawn."

His heart stumbled, then raced forward. He scanned over the page to see if he could pull any information from it. Was this a conclusion that was in his favor or not? "An ice cream cone. That's when we met?"

"Yes." Zoe wasn't giving anything up for free. Her eyes looked troubled, angst-filled.

He looked at the upper right hand corner that took up a sizeable portion of the page. "And this symbol? Is that a bomb going off?"

"It's an explosion."

Gage had felt this way one other time in his life. He'd been doing field training. Coming under simulated firepower, he dove head first into the icy Mississippi river. Pain flooded his system as he immersed himself. He had to battle his inner demons as much as the current to get his boots safely underneath him.

She rolled her lips in and looked into her mug, then her lashes flew up as she caught him with her gaze. “It represents our sex life.”

Maybe that was the solid footing he needed. “That’s good then?”

He held her gaze for a long moment. He saw that really was a question. She wasn’t being flip. She never was. He hadn’t quite gotten used to the fact that Zoe spoke in facts, not sarcasm. He shouldn’t layer in the times from his past when he’d had relationship conversations with other women and had to be wary of all the trip wires laid across the path. Zoe was Zoe, and different. “Yeah, I think.”

He stared at the paper and started recognizing symbols of things they done together, the canoe trip, the book fair, the lecture on Zika, for christsake. Not what he normally thought of as dating scene stuff. Interesting stuff though. He’d liked it, anyway. “And here at the bottom, these leaves?”

“The oak and the cypress.”

“Kahlil Gibran’s poem. What conclusion did you come to, Zoe?”

She pulled the paper in front of her. “That I fell in love with you here.” Zoe put her finger on the ice cream cone. Then she traced her finger over the other images. “And all of these things are reasons that that love became solid.”

“That huge suitcase is baggage though?” Gage asked. “Yours or mine?”

“Not baggage, per se. It’s the reason that I wouldn’t allow myself to do anything but hold you at arm’s-length. To protect my heart, because eventually you’d be at a new base—back at Lejeune, or wherever—and I’d be saying goodbye to you...to us.”

Gage wouldn’t consider that last sentence. That wasn’t something he was prepared to do, say goodbye and never see Zoe again. He turned his attention to something more hopeful. “These, then?” He pointed to the bottom of the page under his name.

“The leaves are the reason I would be willing to dedicate my heart to you. I know you’ll appreciate me for who I am and not try to make me into something I’m not because it suits you better. Not that I’m not willing to bend. If we’re together, the gales that blow against you will be the same winds that buffet me.”

Something inside him grew big and broad. Fierce. Zoe wasn’t playing coy. She was simply unfolding her thought process for him. But he felt like storming the barricade and capturing the flag. He wanted his yes. “I need a clearer answer than that.”

She looked straight into his eyes, then tilted her head. “I think committing myself to our relationship is what I want to do.”

“You think or you know?” Gage asked. She still sounded like the answer was a maybe. And that wasn’t good enough. He needed that solid ground under him. He needed to know where he stood. “Because I know. If these last few days have taught me anything, it’s how deeply I love you and how much I want you in my life, always.”

“Please don’t say that.” She reached out and wrapped her hands around his forearm, the look in her eyes a little wild. “Crisis emotions are temporary.”

Gage realized he was combat focused, his face and his body had taken on a hard-muscled stance. He was in self-protection mode and that was the wrong place for his head to be right now. He stepped even closer to her and gently lifted her chin to look her in the eye. He kissed her softly and rested his forehead against hers until he felt himself letting down his guard. Only then did he say, “No, Zoe, I thought those thoughts on the drive to your place before any of this started.”

He stood up and reached for her hands and pulled them to his heart. “I got your text after a shit day and everything was suddenly better. I’m happy when I’m with you.” He watched her eyes to gauge her reaction. “I look forward to your smile. I look forward to you in my arms. I look forward to us talking about life’s complexities and your unique way of seeing simple beauty.” There, that was what he was hoping to see shine back at him. Belief. “You are the bright spot in my life. I’ve loved you since you leaned under the hood of that car. And I want to love you that way for the rest of my life.”

This was the time he wanted to pull a ring from his pocket and take a knee. But the pockets he was wearing belonged to Iniquus. Besides, he wanted to make that moment special for both of them. Not a conversation on the run from the devil, hiding in a safe house.

Zoe heaved a sigh.

He needed to lighten this for her. This shouldn’t feel so heavy. “You know, Zoe, when I look into the depths of your eyes, I can actually see the machinations of your brain, like a giant clock with the gears moving.”

“Robot-like?”

“Mmm. As a member of the US military’s elite forces, I think maybe I’d better give you a thorough once-over to make sure you’re human in nature.”

“Once-over?”

“You sound disappointed.”

“I could definitely use that right now.” But he knew this was banter, and they weren’t headed back up the stairs.

As if she could read his thoughts, she said, “This is important. We’re important, and I want to be able to focus on that conversation. Right now, I’m distracted and my thoughts are cluttered. I’m conflicted—not about you. Not about us. About this mess I’m in.” She glanced down at a page of formulas. “I can’t see a way out of it. The “us” discussion needs to wait until there’s some kind of conclusion. If they end up putting me in some kind of protective program, then those life choices may not work for you. And if you say, ‘I don’t care. I’ll follow you anywhere,’ then I know that you’re not an oak, and I’m not a cypress. I’ll know you’ve bent your life to mine. So don’t.”

He shook his head. Of course, he could find a way to make his life work, no matter where she went. But he’d never seen her eyes so fierce. This meant everything to them—that Zoe was Zoe and that he stood strong as an individual too.

He forced his gaze onto the other piece of paper. “Tell me about these formulas.”

She twisted around on her stool until she faced the counter. “Once I realized that I wanted our relationship to evolve into being your life partner—”

“Wife,” Gage corrected with no wiggle room.

“Once I decided that I wanted to be your wife, I needed to resolve the problem that is keeping us from moving forward in our lives.”

“And the conclusion was Colonel Guthrie? You think he’s the answer to our problem? That he can do something to help?”

“I think he is our problem.”

“What?” Gage sat on the stool beside Zoe.

“I was thinking about what you said. The solution is a formula, the chemicals, and their combination. If I could figure out the formula of how this came to be, then I could reverse engineer the end result, me in a safe house and Lily dead.”

Gage leaned against the backrest and crossed his arms over his chest. His brow knit with concentration. And he waited.

“The colonel is the common denominator. He’s the one who asked me to work for DARPA. He’s the one who suggested that Montrim do the data collection with a humanitarian front. He’s the one who brought BIOMIST to the CIA’s attention to help find Osama. He’s the one who sent me to set up my labs on the Montrim campus after I got my doctorate.”

“He’s the one who knew that Billings was going after Montrim long before it became public,” Gage said. “He’s the one who said Lily might be a spy, either for the CIA or Montrim. He’s the one who suggested she be followed and gave the senator the card for the private investigator, Levi Schultz, who is really an Israeli former special op on the run.”

“Exactly.” Zoe nodded her head vigorously.

“Colonel Guthrie’s the one who we assume planted one of the trackers on me in the hospital. And most likely the one who called Christopher Bilik.”

“There are other ways Bilik could have known.” Zoe tucked her hair behind her ears.

“Maybe. But at the hospital, Bilik said Colonel Guthrie called him,” Gage noted.

“You said there was a deal between Israel and Montrim for forty million. I can see Montrim getting through my computer firewalls. But they couldn’t get through DARPAs.”

Gage picked up the pen and pointed to Guthrie’s name on the paper. “What if this was a private deal between Bilik, Guthrie, and the Mossad? Guthrie had access.”

“Absolutely. And you put my phone on airplane mode in my apartment. Guthrie could have determined that after you left his house. He became worried that the phone was off or lost or—”

“No. This doesn’t fit neatly together. I don’t think Guthrie knew about the break-in at your apartment. He seemed genuinely upset when I went by his house to tell him. And he was also surprised that Lily was dead when Senator Billings showed up at his house drunk.”

“I think that that’s where the chemistry analogy went wrong. I think it’s more like a Venn Diagram. There are some holes. Who needed to stop the hearing? Who would benefit the most?”

“Montrim,” Gage said without any doubt.

“What if Guthrie and Bilik decided to guard Montrim to protect a private deal they were doing with Israel. A forty-million-dollar deal couldn’t be hidden. I don’t know how they could do that as a corporate entity and keep that hidden from the US military.” Zoe paused, thinking. “Say it’s just Bilik and Guthrie in on that deal, they really needed to save Montrim Industries.”

“Save them for two reasons that we know about—there’s an Israeli deal on the table and a CIA deal on the table. If the Federal government severed ties, whoever was orchestrating those deals would lose access to the data for both deals.”

“My thoughts exactly.” Zoe nodded. “Okay, now Guthrie tells Bilik. Bilik, by the way, is a big-time donor to USIPAC, and that would give him the connections to approach Israel with the database information. It could very well have been Bilik who handed over the card for the PI, told Guthrie to convince Billings to have Lily followed, and arranged for USIPAC to both move Lily to her own place and pay for the PIs bill. You said that the PI kept following Lily after Billings said to stop. If the guy was working for USIPAC, he’d still be working the case, right?”

“Yeah, I don’t know about that,” Gage said. “Why would USIPAC do that? Why wouldn’t they put a PI on Lily and not triangulate with Billings? For that matter, why wouldn’t Bilik fire Lily?”

“I wouldn’t fire her,” Zoe said. “It’s like that Montrim scientist, George Matthews, who was spying on the soundwave technology studies and selling the updates to China. What did the investigators do? The scuttlebutt is that Montrim hired agents in to watch him to see who all was involved and how the operation worked. Only when they had all the pieces of the puzzle did the guy disappear. I would guess the FBI is dealing with him.”

“That makes sense,” Gage agreed. Montrim, or maybe Bilik and Guthrie, wanted to learn from Lily what the senator knew and how he was going to go about taking down Montrim. They would have discussed this at Lily’s house, provided by USIPAC, which I’d guess was fully wired for audio visual. Gage pulled a fresh piece of paper over and started scrawling notes. “If nothing else, that would give them blackmail material.” Now he realized why Zoe had filled so many pages. This wasn’t a straight line. This was the convergence of variables. “Prescott needs to go check for bugs, though whoever planted them probably pulled them out again.”

“The PI was associated with this group of Israeli special ops,” Zoe said. “Who else is a player here?”

Gage thought back to his pocket full of business cards and two of them were from “The CIA.”

“Is it possible that the CIA could have rewarded the Israeli special ops guys for some action, some piece of intel, with a viable cover story of their deaths, and then brought the unit to the US under new names? They can do that, can’t they?”

“They can.” Gage dragged out the words, thinking that was more stuff of movies than reality. “They do. But it would be one hell of a reward.”

“If anyone could warrant that reward it would be these guys. Let’s say they had CIA operatives in danger’s way, and these guys had the wherewithal to get them out. That might be an even exchange. Right?”

“Yes.” Shit, they might have made that kind of deal.

“The CIA may use these guys from time to time to do things that they couldn’t get away with on US soil. There may be some reason that they got those tattoos and kept up their training. I put the CIA in that loop for keeping Montrim viable, not because they know about the sale of BIOMIST data, but because they really want the killer wasp, RoboSphecus, in play.” Zoe pointed to some of her symbolic math that meant zero to Gage. “What if the CIA ordered Lily to be killed to protect Montrim—she could no longer testify and the affair would discredit Senator Billings. And what if that same night they also send two of their guys to capture me? In that case, the CIA killed Lily to keep Montrim viable because they wanted their RoboSphecus. And they could have tried to kidnap me to force me to make it for them. And as I say it out loud, I find all of this ludicrously outside the realm of actual reality. But if there’s even a hair of truth to that tale, the CIA could only know about the WASP from one direction and that’s—”

“Guthrie,” Gage growled.

“Guthrie may not have known about the hit on Lily or that I was to be captured. He may have thought that I was safe in all of this. He could actually be completely innocent of any wrongdoing, and only passed DARPA intel to the CIA as his position required. I want to believe that. He’s been friends with Senator Billings for a very long time. And he’s been a friend of my dad’s even longer. Colonel Guthrie is like family to me. But his innocence doesn’t mean that he had no hand in this outcome. It seems to me he was the engine that drove this bus. I believe that. I think if we bring this to the attention of Iniquus and the FBI, that they will be able to find the proof that Guthrie inadvertently created this fiasco with Bilik and the CIA. Guthrie was duped. He was a pawn, I’m sure. But he’s the connector. I bet he can help us figure out what’s happening.”

“We need to get back to Iniquus, Zoe. They need to hear this. Now.”

GAGE

Zoe piled into the car beside Gage, putting her purse on the floor near her feet, and pulling her safety belt into place. The interior of the car was as beat to hell as the exterior, but the engine hummed, the tires were first rate, and it maneuvered like a sports car.

Gage pressed the button on the dash and the garage door closed behind them. He pushed the button to the right.

“Communications,” came the man’s voice.

“Gage Harrison, Panther Force, Zoe Kealoha, and I are heading to Iniquus Headquarters. Our ETA is forty-five minutes.”

“Copy. We have you on satellite. Be advised there is a road crew ahead. Traffic is being detoured, we estimate an additional ten minutes to your drive time.”

“Roger. Out.” He tapped the button again.

“That’s handy,” Zoe said.

They drove in silence down the country road. They were the only ones around. Gage enjoyed the quiet and the stark beauty of the winter landscape. But his head was still on a swivel. It was illegal for the CIA to operate, for the most part, in the United States, but that didn’t mean much, especially in this case. Zoe’s research put her square in the sphere of CIA intelligence gathering. And they were the masters when it came to technology. They could be following their progress down this lonely road the same way Iniquus was. Their only real safety was in the anonymity they gained through the grocery store car switch.

Gage was glad that he had a heads up from Iniquus that there was construction up ahead. He was ready for it when he saw a flagman. Iniquus had said it was a detour, though. That’s not what was happening here. This guy held a stop sign. Gage slowed to a roll. There were ditches on either side, and this Olds had a low-slung body. He pushed the comms button.

“Communications.”

“Gage here. Heads up, we’re at the construction crew. There’s a flagman. I’m inching up on a stop sign.”

“Copy.”

Gage could see men with their backs to him in the road and dirt that looked freshly dug.

“There’s another flagman ahead, holding back two cars,” the comms guy said.

The workers moved out of the road. The flagman spoke into his radio. He spun the sign to “slow” and waved them through.

Gage tapped the gas to pick up speed as he maneuvered left to go around the digger. As they moved over the dirt, four pops sounded like rifle fire. Gage’s right hand shot out and dragged Zoe’s head down to her lap. He stomped the gas pedal to the ground, and the car moved forward on the hard edges of his run flat tires. He’d hit a spike strip.

Two cars, one in the left lane, one in the right, barreled toward them. Gage slammed his foot on the brake until they jerked to a stop. He threw the car in reverse, burning rubber as he tried to backtrack out of this ambush. All the while Gage was calling the play by play to the communication tech, hoping they had some Iniquus guys somewhere nearby.

The digger moved across the road before Gage could make it past. They were trapped.

“Zoe, sit up and put your hands in the air,” Gage said with as much steadiness as he could muster.

“Communications. Listening in silence. Iniquus support is mobilized to your location. We have you locked on satellite. We can see everything,” the man said.

“Look, Zoe, they’ve pulled ski masks over their faces. That means they don’t want to be identified. They aren’t here to kill you. They’re going to take you prisoner.” They turned to each other.

“Zoe, I need you to be strong. Give them whatever they want. Do whatever they want. We’ll figure out how to undo that later. Don’t try to be a hero.”

Zoe never missed a thing. “You said they’ll take me prisoner. What will they do to you?”

The butts of a pair of rifles smashed through their windows, showering them with safety glass. Men dressed in tactical gear stepped up with pistols in their hands.

“Colonel Guthrie,” Zoe’s shocked voice called out as darts pierced their necks.

Gage felt the medication flowing into his artery.

Zoe spun back to look at him with bewilderment and fear, yanking the dart from her skin. “Gage, oh my God. I’m so sorry.”

Zoe

Women are like wasps in their anger.

~ English proverb

“If you didn’t want to help the CIA and our military, why the hell did you sign a contract with DARPA, Zoe?”

Zoe swallowed. She was seated on a folding metal chair in the middle of a room painted pink, with circus animals dancing around the border paper. She had pulled herself out of her stupor about an hour ago. But she was still a little wobbly. She stuck her feet out on either side of her like a bicycle kick stand to hold herself upright.

There was a table with a computer, it was pointed at her, and Zoe imagined that this conversation was being recorded.

She had recognized Colonel Guthrie at the side of the car, despite his face mask. Now that they were inside, he’d pulled his disguise off and stood red-faced and seething in front of her. She had never seen him look like this before. Zoe was afraid. Afraid for herself. Afraid for Gage. She wondered if he was still alive.

“How did you find me?” Zoe demanded. Anger boiled under her skin.

“Grossman and Parker need the WASP functioning. They got a heads-up from the CIA that you were at Iniquus. With CIA technology, the rest isn’t rocket science. And speaking of science,” Guthrie kicked the leg of her chair, “why’d you sign a DARPA contract if you didn’t want to help your country?”

Zoe grabbed the seat lest she go flying. “I watched a YouTube video about 9-11. Not about the towers coming down, but about the greatest maritime rescue effort in human history. A half-million people were plucked off Manhattan Island by the men and women who worked on boats in the area. The Coast Guard put out a call, ‘if you can, come help.’ The boats converged. At the beginning of the video they posted the Romain Rolland quote, ‘A hero is a man who does what he can.’”

Colonel Guthrie reached out to swipe a tear that brightened the corner of Zoe’s lashes. “Are you crying?”

She smacked his hand away. She wondered where her glasses were. She’d feel much better if she could see clearly. “I can do biomedical engineering and microrobotics. If my inventions mean saving lives, then that’s what I stepped up to do. And it’s not just for military applications. My inventions, once they’re out of prototype, can have an impact on making our law enforcement more effective.”

“Again, I’m asking you why you signed up. It’s because you want to help your country. You’re a patriot, aren’t you, Zoe?”

“I love my country. I want what’s best for my country.”

“Your country needs you. The CIA needs you. We need, for the best future of America, to have the RoboSpecies in play. The CIA needs them to function in a little over four months. That should be enough time for you to get them flying, so to speak.”

Zoe’s brows came together. “That’s the timeline you gave me for the WASPs to function for military intelligence.”

Colonel Guthrie shook his head with a sigh. “We need both. A WASP to identify and monitor the mark, and a RoboSphecious to find your beacon and sting the target. Once you have one that’s actionable, the second is easy. It’s the same damned mechanism with a different fluid. Getting the WASP to identify the right person. That’s the big deal.”

“All along, I’ve been developing a CIA project.”

“Of course. I can’t understand why this is a problem for you. You want to save lives. This is a no-brainer. When your WASP identifies a subject, instead of bombing the compound, we can take out the single culprit. How many lives could you save, Zoe? How many innocents?”

“Colonel, that argument is myopic, simplistic, illogical, and completely beside the point.”

“Do tell.”

“I will never develop a means of killing. Identification? Yes. Killing? No. I will not be responsible for anyone else’s death. Period. My developing a means of identification is meant to prevent bombs from being used in error. I am not responsible for the decisions that come after. For example, the military could choose to track that person until they are in seclusion and then take them out. They can send in a sniper. If others decide to take out a complex, that’s on them. Once my microrobotics and software are functional, they become part of the human experience. That means other scientists can and will do the same. I will not provide the world with a new weapons system by adding to the knowledge scaffolding. Scientific knowledge is accumulative, and we don’t know where this could lead.”

“Enough. You are far too naïve to weigh the ethics of your recalcitrance.” Colonel Guthrie leaned his hips into the table with the laptop. As he bumped it, the screen filled with an image.

Zoe squinted at the screen, not sure what she was seeing. Guthrie pulled her purse toward him and handed her her glasses.

Now the image was crystal clear. Gage sat in a chair. His face was bloody. His clothes were ripped. He looked dazed. His hands were cuffed in place. His feet were shackled.

Zoe jumped from her chair.

“Sit your ass down!” Colonel Guthrie yelled at her. “Gage is our incentive. He’s going to stay with us for a while. Right there in that chair.” He pointed at the video. “You want him to eat? You behave. You want him to drink? You behave. You want him to get up and use the bathroom instead of pissing down his leg and sitting in his own filth? You behave.”

Zoe gasped. “Are you going to kill me? Kill Gage?”

“With a brain like yours? Why would I do that? You’re an asset. Kill Gage? That depends. You will do whatever I tell you to do. Sign whatever I tell you to sign.”

“Of course,” she said. She looked around the child’s room again. “How am I to work here?”

“Not here. You need your laboratory, obviously. You will go home. You will go to work. You will make progress. You won’t try any cute tricks to make things self-destruct or tell me that you need more time. Gage Harrison’s life is on a time clock. March fifteenth—three months from today—if we don’t have the two kinds of wasps operationally ready, I will personally electrocute Gage in front of you with a low enough voltage that it will be an excruciatingly slow and painful death.”

Zoe started vibrating. She shook so hard; she could hardly keep herself planted on the seat.

“And that’s when I call your parents. I’ll tell them you’ve gone missing, and they need to come to DC right away, stay at my house. And we will start again. And if they die, then we will go after your friends. I will be relentless. I will be heartless. I will be the devil himself. I will have these wasps.” Colonel Guthrie moved over and leaned in until their noses touched. “Do I make myself clear?” he spat out, his eyes demonic. Everything about this man made Zoe recoil.

“And if you think you can find a way to get a message to Iniquus or your buddy Damion Prescott, be aware that you will have a shadow six inches from your elbow until I am satisfied. You won’t eat alone. You won’t sleep alone. You won’t bathe or pee alone. There will always be one of my men six inches away. And let me tell you, they have lost seven of their unit members to this FUBAR op already. They aren’t feeling magnanimous when it comes to you. I’d tread carefully where they’re concerned.”

Zoe went numb. Her mouth fell open. Her brain failed her completely. She loved her brain. It was her super power. But when she needed it, it let her down. Nothing came to her. No stories to help her find a way clear. No clever ideas. She was nothing but an autonomic nervous system, exchanging oxygen for carbon dioxide.

“Are you doubting me? Are you doubting the integrity of my team?” Colonel Guthrie sneered. “Lily died by my command. People don’t go around falling onto Metro rails just as the subway is powering toward them.” He reached over tapped the screen, bringing up a picture of a car that had slammed into the side of a cement mixer. The next picture he scrolled to was a close up of the driver who was obviously dead, crushed under the steering wheel. “This is what happened to Ruby Leibowitz on her drive home from Iniquus. Poor thing. I couldn’t let her go to USIPAC with her information. And now I have Gage.” He waited while this seeped into her conscious.

“How many people do you want to see dead, Zoe? Should I call your folks in Hawaii? Pay your friends Sydney and Holland a visit? Jurnee? She lives nearby, doesn’t she? In central Virginia? That’s only a few hours from here. A nice drive.”

He seemed to be waiting for a response, but Zoe wasn’t in her body. Besides the ability to see and hear, she was little else. She was floating. Weightless.

“There are people you love that can suffer greatly for your heroics. But in the end, you know you’re a patriot and want to help your country. There is nothing intrinsically bad about what you’re developing in terms of safety for the American people.”

“And what do you get out of this? A gigantic paycheck. One from the CIA and the other between you and Bilik from the Mossad.”

Colonel Guthrie squeezed her jaw until she thought it would pop. “Who else knows that?”

“I do.”

“Who else?”

“No one else. I figured it out last night when I was thinking it all through. I’m right, aren’t I?”

The colonel threw her off the chair. She splayed across the floor. She had gotten her answer.

“Really, I shouldn’t need to twist your arm to get you to comply. But I can certainly twist his.” Guthrie flipped back to Gage’s picture.

He needs medical help. “Is Gage here? Can I tell him that I’ll be following your directives to the T?”

“I’m not stupid enough to put you in the same location.”

Zoe stood and caught at the back of the chair as she wobbled. “Well, I guess you’d better drive me to Montrim so I can get going in my lab.”

“That’s my girl.” Colonel Guthrie took her elbow in an iron clasp, snagged her purse, and steered her out the door.

Zoe

Zoe put the RoboSphercius down on its petri dish. Her hands were shaking to the point of being ineffectual. She turned her microscope off. Instead of moving forward, she was destroying what she already had in hand. As much as she hated the idea of taking a break while Gage was tied to that chair, she needed to eat. She needed a big fat sleeping pill. She needed to black out like she had at the hospital. She needed to wrangle control of her nervous system.

The man who was tasked to be her shadow was taking his assignment too literally. He hadn't been six inches from her side since she got out of the car at Montrim. His breath had been hot on her neck for the last two hours. She was a tall woman, but this guy was a behemoth. He'd even make Gage seem small in comparison. So far, she hadn't tested out Colonel Guthrie's threat that he'd even be six inches from her while she used the bathroom.

“Do you have a car? I need to go home.” She stood.

The man followed her to the lab door and waited while she entered her codes to lock up. Without speaking to her, he took her elbow, just as Colonel Guthrie had, and steered her down the hall. They wound their way through the labyrinth of Montrim's campus, out the side door, through the courtyard, through another door down the hallway and up some stairs to come out in a back parking lot that Zoe didn't even know existed.

The man was speaking into his cuff in a foreign language. He pressed her up against an air conditioning unit, and they waited. The wind blew. The cold got into her lungs. She coughed to expel it, which reminded her that she'd been holding her bladder all day long.

A car came around the corner and stopped. With an iron claw gripping her elbow, the behemoth thrust her forward. A door popped open on the sedan. Zoe heard a bang. Suddenly, her guard leaned over her, making guttural noises and twitching. He grasped at her convulsively. A ball-like object flew past her into the open car door. There was an explosion that lit her auricular nerves on fire. She stuck her fingers in her ears and collapsed under the guard's weight. She tried to push him off and saw that the car had filled with billowing smoke. The air became acidic. Zoe breathed into the fabric covering her elbow.

The driver tried to take off driving, but the smoke was too thick to see through. He ran straight into the cooling unit, not two feet from where she and her captor lay. Zoe screamed and flung her arms out, making the guard drop off of her. Two men fast roped down the side of the portico roof. One grabbed her and jerked her back inside of Montrim.

Zoe fought with everything she had. But the man had wrapped her in his arms and had a hand over her mouth stoppering her screams.

“Zoe. Calm.”

She bit his finger hard, and he flung her out away from him, but kept a good grip on her wrist.

“Zoe. Calm. It's Titus.”

Zoe panted. Relief and danger fought for dominance. “No, you can't save me. I need... They have Gage!”

“Zoe. Shhh. We have Gage. He’s at the Iniquus infirmary.” He held up his cellphone with a picture of Gage lying on a cot. The wounds she had seen earlier were cleaned and dressed in pristine white bandages.

“You saved him? How?” Zoe was completely confused. “You saved me? How?”

“We’re good at what we do.” He held out his hand. “Come on.”

“But the CIA are good at what they do too. They have the same capability as you do. More.”

Titus touched the comms that wrapped his neck. “Panther actual. Roger that. I’m exiting with our precious cargo.” He pushed the door open and took her by the hand. “We weren’t up against the CIA, just Guthrie. Guthrie had a friend at NSA who was helping him with satellite images. We have friends there too.”

“But Colonel Guthrie said—”

“Let’s get you back with Gage, and we’ll tell you what we found out.”

Zoe moved out into the diffused light of a gray winter’s day. Red Christmas bells, hanging on the parking lot lights, swung in the wind cheerily. Special Agent Prescott was hefting her captor to his feet. He was in cuffs. Prescott looked over at Titus. “I’m loving these stun rifles, man. So much less paperwork.”

Brian had another man bent over the hood of his car, cuffing him, as well. Smoke billowed around them.

Zoe was escorted to Titus’s Hummer. He helped her in, then scooted around to his side. She was too stunned to speak.

“You’ll feel better once you see Gage,” Titus predicted. He did her the great kindness of not talking again until she was in Gage’s arms.

• • • •

ZOE SAT AS CLOSE AS she could get to Gage without actually crawling into his lap. Touching him helped her remember that he was safe, not being beaten and bound, with his life on the line for her ethics. He reached up to stroke his hand over her hair and planted a kiss on her temple.

After she had gone to the infirmary to see Gage, the female doctor had taken her off to make sure that she hadn’t been sexually attacked during her captivity. Zoe hadn’t even considered the possibility. It was though. Possible. And she remembered again how Colonel Guthrie had said these men would be within six inches of her when she slept and peed and bathed. She was fine. Thank God, both she and Gage were fine. Lily was not. Ruby was not. What a horrible string of events.

She and Gage had eaten and now they were back in the Panther war room, waiting for Special Agent Prescott to come and debrief them.

“Can you tell me what they found in the Mercedes?” Gage asked, lacing his fingers with Zoe’s. Zoe grasped his hand with both of hers and pulled it up against her belly.

“Yeah, sure,” Brian said. “We stripped it down. The envelope was taped up under the rear seat. It had Colin Bunsinger’s name on it. The envelope was still sealed when we handed it over to Prescott.”

“They charged the men at the farmhouse? They’re still in custody?” Gage asked.

“Yeah, we have eleven of the twelve up here, counting both hot and cold bodies. We have one who was picked up in Miami,” Brian said.

“Lynx’s ploy dragged one of their guys down there?” Gage grinned.

“Looks like it. He was caught trying to sneak onto the cruise ship. Either he was on his way to the Panama Canal on vacation, or he was falling into her trap. Strike Force kept an eye on the cabin for us. They’re the ones who nabbed him. FBI took control of the guy and is shipping him back here.”

Gage was laughing and held up a hand for a high five.

Zoe decided to ask Gage about the story of Lynx and the cruise ship later. Right now, she wanted to be very still and very quiet. Gage seemed to answer that thought with the kiss he brushed into her hair.

The Panthers rose respectfully as Special Agent Prescott moved through the door. Gage went to stand as well, but Prescott caught his eye and waved him back into his seat. Zoe sat up straight as the mood shifted from hanging out to official debrief.

Prescott stood at the front of the room. “I want to tell Panther Force how appreciative my unit is and how grateful I am for your help on this case. Nine men from the Israeli Special Forces are in custody, and three of them were killed while committing their crimes. We haven’t yet learned how they came to be in America. This case will continue to unfold.” He reached up to scratch his brow. “The CIA has been apprised and will be working with the FBI on the best way to handle the situation from this point forward.”

There was a general groan that went up with the Panthers. Prescott acknowledged this with a calming hand gesture. “I know that’s a stretch of the imagination, but on this case, it is in America’s best interests that these criminals be kept under wraps. We can’t let the public know in any way, shape, or form about the BIOMIST program. You’re right, Zoe.” Prescott opened his hand toward her. “This database has been of immense help to our intelligence community. On that, there is no disagreement between the FBI and CIA.”

Prescott focused on Gage, and Zoe could feel Gage’s muscles stiffening. “I have spoken directly with the Director of the CIA and apprised him of the actions and pressures that were put on Dr. Kealoha as well as the illegal contract they had developed with Montrim’s board member, Christopher Bilik.”

“Only Bilik?” Titus asked.

“From the papers that the team brought in that were meant to be disclosed to Colin Bunsinger, the funds were to go into two offshore accounts, both in shell companies’ names. Bilik, of course, needed someone of Guthrie’s stature at DARPA in order to gain access to the designs that Zoe was developing. It’s being investigated. Guthrie is being held on two counts of kidnapping, and one count of torture, and a list of accompanying crimes. He won’t be free from prison in this lifetime.”

“What’s the CIA’s position on my research?” Zoe asked.

“The CIA’s unofficial position is that their need was great. They were forced by circumstances to use whatever means they had at their disposal, bribery being one of the tools they have in their toolbox.”

“They were okay with the plan to steal Zoe’s intellectual property?” Brian asked.

“That’s what the CIA does. That’s their job. You’d understand that better if you made Zoe a stranger. Pull the personal out of the equation,” Prescott said. “And again, that’s unofficial. Officially? Grossman and Parker are being reprimanded for their actions and for reckless behavior that put lives at risk, ultimately leading to two deaths.”

“Wait. The CIA wasn’t running the Israelis?” Gage asked.

“As far as we can tell, in this set of circumstances, they were not. They did know that the project was in danger because Lily was helping Senator Billings. They’re the ones who put the spyware on both Lily and Zoe’s phones.”

“And in their watches?”

“We haven’t figured that out yet. The CIA says it’s not them, and they’ve been forthright with the rest of the information.”

“Colonel Guthrie said that he had ordered Lily’s and Ruby’s deaths.” Zoe felt the full weight of the betrayal resting on her chest. She had trusted the colonel. He’d been an uncle to her her whole life.

“We were apprised that she was in a car accident.”

“She hit a cement mixer. I think it was the same one that chased us.”

“We can pin that down through license plate recognition,” Nutsbe said as he tapped his keyboard.

“At this point, we know Guthrie is a key player in all of this. We believe that Bilik is complicit in the BIOMIST scheme as well,” Prescott said. “We have a warrant out for his arrest based on the correspondence between him and the Mossad.”

“What was going on with the tattoos and the Rex Deus?” Titus asked.

“The men all say that it was a pledge of brotherhood they made to each other. They claim it has no implications beyond that. We are, of course, at the beginning of the investigation,” Prescott said.

Gage leaned forward, propping his elbows on his knees. “And Bilik’s not in custody yet?”

Prescott checked his watch. “There’s a team on it now. As soon as we have him in pocket, you should be safe again, Zoe.”

“Thank you.” Zoe’s eyes filled with the tears that had been turning off and on like a water faucet since Thursday evening. She scanned the faces of all the men, including them in her gratitude.

Titus crossed his arms over his chest. “Zoe, Mr. Spencer, one of the Iniquus owners, also let the Director of the CIA know about Grossman’s and Parker’s connection with everything that’s happened. At that time, Spencer made it clear that you, Zoe, are under Iniquus’s protective wing. We don’t allow bad things to happen to one of our own.” He gave her a nod that punctuated the statement.

“This is part of the FBI contract?” Zoe asked, confused.

“No,” Titus said. “It’s part of Gage’s contract. He listed you as his fiancée. Like I said, we take care of the Iniquus family. By contract, that means you.”

Titus walked up to shake Prescott’s hand, and they moved toward the computer system when Nutsbe flagged them over.

Zoe and Gage moved to the corner to talk privately. They wrapped their arms around each other.

Zoe tipped her head up. Gage’s eyes were turquoise green. The shade they turned when he was very happy.

“You didn’t ask me yet—we hadn’t decided on marriage when you signed those contracts with Iniquus,” she whispered.

Gage canted his head and sent Zoe a sexy grin. “You didn’t ask me yet either when you signed my name to your hospital advanced directive, giving me the right to make life or death health decisions for you.”

“My Montrim contract required me to put two local names.”

“Funny.” He planted a kiss on the tip of her nose. “My contract only asked for one. Aren’t you glad I picked you?”

“Yes.” Zoe came up on her tiptoes to give Gage a gentle kiss. “As a matter of fact, I am.”

Alexei Expedition Northwest Territory, Canada 1704

The sound of another exploding tree caused Nikolai Alexei to jump.

He heard the men behind him snicker, but he did not care to address them. It was not worth his time, and besides, it was poor leadership to acknowledge such pettiness. His father had explained the odd occurrence to him on a wolf-hunting trip when he was a boy; the frozen tree sap inside the trunks of the pines would expand, causing the bark and wood to explode. He had often lain awake at night, counting the rippling explosions as they worked their way through the wooded area around their cabin. He knew the sound well, but it still took him by surprise when it happened, even now.

He grumbled to himself and marched onward through the knee-deep snow.

He enjoyed this land. It reminded him of home; of the countless miles of deep black forest, filled with the same animals he used to hunt, the same trees he used to climb, and the same bitter cold he used to long for with fresh blankets of snow thick enough to halt a horse. He remembered the smells, too—the ripe evergreens and the sheer emptiness of the air. He was more comfortable in the woods than any of his men, with the possible exception of Lev.

And yet their laughter frustrated him. It was not a sign of insubordination as much as it was a sign of their laziness. For three months they had made their trek over mountains and across valleys so high and so deep he had thought they would not make it to the other side with their entire crew intact. They had crossed tundra, plateaus, and wetlands, all without losing a man. Their hunting excursions were always successful, and most nights ended around a large bonfire with a deer roasting on a spit. Breakfast was hot soup, and they snacked on smoked meats throughout the day.

Nikolai had to admit that so far it was one of the more successful expeditions he had been on, and he knew God was smiling on them in this new land. But he knew also that it made them weak; it made them soft. They had grown fat and sluggish, covering less ground each day than the day before. Their energy and excitement had been replaced with a restlessness that had turned their stories and poems around the fire into passionless songs.

Without glancing back, Nikolai called out behind him. “Doctor?”

A short, thin man struggled through the snow but Nikolai did not slow his pace. “We will stop and make camp when we next find a clearing. The river is to the north, and we can fish there for as long as we like.”

“Split the men into crews of two and three,” Nikolai said, “and I will send them out in the morning to chart the area. These Cossacks will find pleasure in a change of scenery, and I myself will enjoy an excursion of a more solitary nature.”

Nikolai was a man of his word; a man of integrity. He had promised the Tsar a map of the deep terrain of North America, and he intended to deliver it. His expedition had grown mundane, and it was time to bring it back to life.

“So you will wander alone through these parts?” the doctor asked.

Nikolai laughed. “I will take care to not lose myself in the fog, if that is what you are asking. Sometimes a man must wander, my friend,” he said. “But rest assured, we will gather together after three days.”

The doctor nodded and fell in line behind his leader. Nikolai was uncertain if this plan of his would do more good than it would endanger them all, but it was a risk he was willing to take. They had found nothing useful thus far; nothing the motherland would be inclined to return to claim. Cartography was their stated manifest, but he was under no false pretenses. By moving outward in smaller groups, the expedition could cover more territory and more ground than by moving in a single line.

So far, they had charted the great river to their north all the way from the sea, but they knew that every river began somewhere. Whether it was a lake amid the mountain peaks or from tributaries caused by glacial melt, he did not know.

And he did not care.

Nikolai Alexei was here for one reason, and one reason alone. His homeland sought riches, as did his men. All men sought more than what God had initially blessed them with. It was a man's duty to find what he was owed in this life, with all the more blessings to be bestowed upon him in the afterlife.

This new land was not known for its riches, but only a fool would think the Spanish had been capable of taming it when they came. This land was made for Russians. Only they understood it. This great unknown that had attracted Nikolai was an opportunity that he was not going to let pass.

Prologue

Alexei Expedition

Northwest Territory, Canada

1704

When the first star appeared in the heavens above them, the men made camp, throwing oilskins over tent poles in a circle by the river bank.

They were slow, Nikolai noted. After the last few days' effort it did not surprise him, but it did not please him much either. It took over an hour to set up the ten tents and build a fire, but no more than ten minutes for the men to begin huddling around it.

Soon the moon rose, nearly full. A meal was prepared, a roasted deer and herb soup, and the men began singing.

But Nikolai had had enough. He broke away from the camp and lifted the moose skin hood up and over his head. This Siberian Yupik coat was one of the best trades he had made. The bitter cold tried to bite into his flesh, and the gentle wind threatened to chill his core, but he didn't notice. He made for a smaller clearing to the south that he had seen earlier, one with a rock outcropping against a higher mountain cliff. The river they were following had likely cut down into this valley they were currently in, and if he was lucky, it had left some interesting formations for him.

He reached the clearing and scared away a small beaver that would make a fine pelt when it reached adulthood, and stepped out into the open grassy area to get a good look at the outcropping. It appeared that the boulders were precariously situated around a hole near the ground, beckoning him closer. As he approached, he could see even in this failing light that what he had found was an opening to a small cave.

He had no light with him, but he ducked inside anyway. It was useless. He could explore little with just hands and arms.

Tomorrow, he would head here first thing, bring a torch and a few extra men. This was the type of cave that would have made a perfect shelter for one of the native tribes that might call this place home. So far, they had not encountered any such people, but he had no way of knowing if these indigenous tribes he had heard tell of lived along these rivers or not.

A light appeared behind him, flickering and orange. He could almost feel the heat of the torch as it grew brighter.

"Nikolai?" A voice said, softly. "Is that you?"

It was the doctor's voice, a little unsure.

"Yes, doctor," Nikolai said. He felt the excitement within him growing. "Bring the light! I would very much like to have a look at this place."

The doctor joined him and lifted the flaming torch up in front of them.

Scrawled upon the walls were dozens of paintings articulating dancing men and women around fires, hunting trips, and deaths.

So many deaths.

One particularly macabre image depicted a man and woman lying sideways next to each other, their arms crossed as in a representation of death. Six children were drawn below them haphazardly as if added at different times in the past.

Nikolai and the doctor gazed at the drawings, trying to decipher their meaning. Sections of paintings had been scratched out or painted over as if the original author had changed the story halfway through.

“I don’t understand. Do you, sir?”

Nikolai didn’t respond. He took the torch from the other man’s hand and continued on deeper into the cave. A few feet past the first wall, the ceiling grew higher, and he drew himself up to his full height. More cave paintings decorated the walls to his left and right, and arrows were drawn near the floor. Farther on, and the small cavern twisted to the left and ended in a rounded chamber.

He swung the torch around this room, at first looking for a continuation of the path he was on. Finding none, he held the torch lower. Stacks of bones and skulls lay atop one another, of all shapes and sizes. Men, women, and children all lay close together, though arranged into what he assumed must have been families.

In front of these, he found baskets made from sinewy animal skins, with lids fashioned from skin and bones. The leatherwork was remarkable and he reached down to grab one. He examined it closely, handing the light to the doctor. Stamped into the sides and top of the basket were designs and symbols that he could not interpret. They swirled around the edges, leaving no section of leather untouched.

“Beautiful,” he whispered. He twisted the top of the basket, finding the lid secured tightly, either by design or from years of rest. He gave the lid a harder twist and felt a pop.

The top of the basket came off, sending dust shooting through the air. He waved it away and dropped the lid to the ground.

He saw what was inside, and only then realized how heavy the basket was. He turned the basket upside down, emptying its contents out onto the cave floor. Hundreds of silver coins bounced on the dirt and rolled around.

“For the glory of...” the doctor said, his voice hoarse.

“I imagine this is the sort of thing we have come here for,” Nikolai said. He scooped up a handful of the silver coins and held them up to the light. “Do you recognize these?”

“No. I have never seen such a design.”

Upon the surface of each coin was a remarkably intricate design; either hand carved or stamped. It featured the bust of a native man, and Nikolai could even see the outline of a frown on his face. He was surrounded by what looked like fire, each wisp carefully measured and drawn.

“From the local population?” the doctor asked.

Nikolai shook his head. “No. The people here use the shells of clams as their currency, and most simply trade goods instead. This... must be from somewhere else entirely.”

He flipped it over in his hand. The back was a reflection of the front, with the same native man frowning up at them. The fire, however, was markedly absent from this side. In its place were swirls and lines, which looked to be framing the man in the center.

“Fire on one side, wind on the other,” Nikolai whispered. “A dichotomy. What could it represent?”

“What is in the other baskets?” the doctor asked. He reached for another, trying at first to lift it from the ground. The basket slid a few inches toward him but stayed on the floor. “This one is considerably heavier, sir,” he said.

Nikolai reached down and twisted the lid free. He pushed the basket over with his right foot and watched as more silver coins tumbled out, identical to the one in his hand.

“Doctor,” he said, “bring the men. And bring the satchels as well. I count at least twenty of these baskets. What about you?”

The doctor shook his head excitedly. “Perhaps more.”

“If each contains even a portion of what is in these first two, it should be more than enough to justify a return home, do you think?”

The doctor smiled.

Nikolai wasn't greedy, but he felt the stirrings of excitement growing in his chest. He would share this treasure with his men without question, but he needed to be sure of what he had found. He moved to the back of the cavern, now standing directly in front of the pile of skeletons. Reaching down, he lifted the lid on one of the baskets that had been placed close to the back.

More dust spread outward from the freshly opened container, and he blinked and waved it away with his free hand. He moved the torch down closer to the top of the basket and peered inside.

It was empty.

Odd. He reached for the basket nearest it and lifted its lid too.

Empty, save for a few small tools.

He considered calling the doctor back, but stopped himself. Why would they bury them here? he wondered. Why would they place a nearly empty basket next to a tribute to their deceased loved ones?

Had someone come before him? Someone who had found the baskets and emptied what they could? It did not make sense. Anyone who had explored this cave before them would certainly have emptied it of its treasures. They would not have left anything of value behind, and they would not have put the lids back on each basket. Thieves were anything but tidy.

Yet these two baskets were empty? He looked again, this time lifting one of the baskets to eye level and turning it. He could see the fine sinewy lines of the bottom, woven together and sewn shut. A few tools shifted at the bottom; what looked like a few small pipes, a bowl made of clay, and some other small sticks and rocks.

He coughed and realized for the first time how thick the dust in the air had become. Waving his hands, he backed away from the burial site. He coughed again, and this time, felt his lungs strain with the effort.

He turned away from the room and walked back upward until the cave ceiling closed in on him. He stepped out into the small clearing. Night had fallen completely, and thousands of stars peered down at him. He fell to his knees, trying to catch his breath. He sucked in air, forcing his lungs back open again. He struggled forward then rolled onto his back in the snow.

Nikolai struggled to calm his thinking and shut his eyes.

Breathe. He willed himself to breathe, in and out, until he felt the dust clearing from his system. His breathing became normal and controlled.

Just then, he heard the footsteps of his men running toward the clearing. He stood and brushed the snow from his back. He lifted his head and walked towards the edge of the woods. “Have you retrieved the satchels?”

“We have, sir. Where is the cave?” The voice was Lev's, the huge bear of a man tumbling out of the woods first. His eyes were wide, and his breath was heavy, pouring out of his mouth and nose in great bursts. With scars on his face and body from a lifetime serving his homeland as a soldier and a woodsman, Nikolai enjoyed the man's company and trusted his skill as a dedicated naturalist who was as knowledgeable as himself.

Nikolai gestured to the entrance. The group, fifteen men in all, trotted past and soon emerged three at a time with their satchels heavy. The endeavor took only thirty minutes, and they joined Nikolai in the clearing when they were finished. Only four of the baskets had been empty, including the two Nikolai had found.

If the men were jovial before, they were near ecstatic now. They knew their leader was a fair and honest man, and they would each get a good portion of the discovery. The primary cartographer among them, Roruk, began scratching some notes into a small notebook he had produced from his pocket. He measured the edges of the clearing, counting each step as he went and drawing them into this book.

When he finished, he nodded to Nikolai and they returned to the main camp.

“We leave tomorrow,” Nikolai said as the other men gathered around. “We have added too much weight to continue the expedition for now, and it will be a burden already with the water and food we must carry with us.”

Cheers erupted around the fire and the men broke into song. Nikolai wondered how men could be so merry without the aid of spirits and drink, but he did not stifle the mood.

He silently stepped away from the doctor and Lev and entered his tent. As the leader of this expedition, he shared it with no other man, and he enjoyed the privilege. He slipped off his coat and nestled onto his cot.

The noise around the campfire grew, but Nikolai could hardly hear it. He felt as if his mind was on fire, as if his head was being held above a pot of boiling water. He started to sweat, and his hands and arms began to itch. Nikolai struggled to stifle the burning sensation, and considered calling out for the doctor’s aid. Before he could, however, he drifted into a welcome and deep sleep.

Alexei Expedition

Northwest Territory, Canada

1704

Nikolai awoke the next morning to an odd sound.

Silence.

Pure, pristine winter silence. The quiet he had not heard since before they had left Russia. The quiet of his youth. Intense and intimidating. Nikolai would normally have welcomed it with a sharp sniff and a deep, satisfying breath, but this morning should not have been so quiet. An expedition with a group of almost thirty men guaranteed that every moment would be filled with some racket or another.

He threw the blankets off and stood. His head brushed the top pole of his tent as he opened the flaps. The fire had long since diminished, though wisps of cold ash rose with the gentle breeze, giving the appearance of smoke. The cluster of tents was situated in a circle around the fire, like spokes on a wagon wheel. His tent was the northernmost one, and separated from the others on each side by a few rows of trees. The tents were traditional, two vertical poles and a horizontal one resting atop them, with canvas stretched over it and staked into the ground at the corners. Each tent was immaculately placed, perfectly spaced, and set up to look exactly the same. His men were good men, Nikolai knew, and they cared deeply for these small details. But where were they? Why weren't they preparing for their long journey home?

"Doctor? Lev?" He called out. He entered the nearest to find the two men still asleep beneath mounds of blankets and furs. He kicked at the doctor's cot with an unlaced boot and asked again.

Hearing nothing in return, Nikolai pulled the blankets from the man's head. The outermost blanket, a thick woven fabric, caught on something and he struggled to pull it down. After a more forceful tug, the blanket fell away to reveal the flesh of the doctor's face eaten by a rash, red boils covering the surface of his skin.

Nikolai stumbled backward in disgust. A portion of the skin on the poor man's forehead had stuck to the blanket, glued there by dried tissue and blood. The doctor's eyes were open, but they were glazed over in death.

Instinctively, Nikolai clutched a hand to his mouth, struggling to hold back the vomit he felt rising in his throat. He pulled the blanket away completely, and found every inch of exposed skin on the doctor's body covered in similar boils. He turned to Lev's cot and made the same cursory examination.

More rash. More boils. More death.

Lev had also passed sometime during the night. Both men lay in their blankets, gazing up at the roof of the tent with blank eyes. Nikolai moved away. Closed the flap behind him. He looked down at his own hands and arms and noticed the same rash spread and thickened over most of his skin.

It was no longer itchy, but he felt the heat radiating from his skin on the places around his body that had been infected. Last night it was just his hands and arms. Now he felt it over his shoulders, neck, and upper back.

He checked two more tents, finding the same horrifying faces staring up at him in each. All of his men—all twenty-seven of them—were dead.

He was the sole survivor on an expedition that was now thousands of miles away from home, in one of the remotest places known to man.

Another tree cracked in the distance, and he knew that winter was about to set in for good.

Yellowstone National Park Wyoming Present Day

Harvey “Ben” Bennett eased the end of his rifle through the small space between the two bushes. He readjusted his left knee, moving a rock to the side of the bush he had crushed under his jeans. He held the rifle steady, using a stray branch as a platform. He watched the scene through the end of the scope.

The grizzly was busy rummaging through the food from an overturned cooler in the clearing. The female, small for her age but no less dangerous, grunted in delight as she discovered bits of bacon and pancakes from that morning’s breakfast.

The campers had long since fled, calling the main park line and complaining of a nuisance bear in the area. They were worried the bear would enter their camp and scare their kids, or worse.

Worried the bear would do what it was designed to do, Ben thought.

These types of campers were the worst kind. They left a mess, complained constantly, and ruined the sanctity of the ecosystem they’d stumbled into.

People from the cities treated camping like a luxury all-inclusive resort vacation. As if nature was designed specifically to please them. Ben hated them, almost as much as hated this part of his job.

Nuisance animals, everything from raccoons to grizzlies, were a major turnoff for visitors and tourists, and therefore a problem. People had no idea how to handle animals looking for an easy meal and tended to freak out and assume they were under attack rather than calmly leave the scene and find a ranger.

Ben slid a round into the chamber and took aim. He closed each eye in turn, checking the distance and trying to gauge where the bear would move next. His left eye provided him a view of the attached manometer as he peered through the scope, allowing him to adjust for pressure without losing sight of the target. The aluminum barrel and American Walnut stock felt warm in his hands; alive. It was a comfortable weapon, and Ben was satisfied with the department’s purchase of these relocation tools.

He watched the bear’s thick neck muscles throb as she tore off a chunk of cardboard from the pile of smelly trash she’d discovered.

That was the other thing Ben hated about these people. They had no intention of learning anything—how to cook, what to eat in the woods, how to find food—they just wanted the comforts of home in a temporary excursion from reality.

The bear straightened its neck slightly, and Ben suddenly caught a glimpse of her left eye.

It glistened with age, a sheen of gray sparkling in the corner.

Mo.

Ben recognized the grizzly from the other times he’d encountered her down here. He had helped a few crews move her only months ago last summer, and again two years prior to that.

Ben sighed, and focused on the air leaving his lungs. He sucked in a quick, small breath, and held it in. He counted to five and pulled the trigger.

The soft popping sound took him by surprise—it always did. The juxtaposition of the man-made machine he’d just fired was severely out of place in what was supposed to be a pristine environment. Yet here he was adding to the mess and he was immediately remorseful.

The bear bristled and sat straighter, her back still to Ben. She turned slowly, her head lolling around as the tranquilizer began to take effect. Mo wouldn't charge him. The projectile dart alone wouldn't have alarmed the bear any more than if a small branch had fallen on her, but Ben knew the two milligrams of etorphine and acepromazine maleate compound the dart had just injected into the side of the bear would be more than enough to drop it.

Ben waited, not wanting to alert the bear. Angering or exciting an animal just before they fell asleep would cause undue stress, and it may even put them in danger. After a few more seconds, the bear let out a low moan as she stood on her hind feet. She turned in an unsteady circle, then fell back to the ground. The grizzly lay down on the damp leaves, and her head fell to the forest floor.

Ben waited a full minute before stepping out of his hiding spot. He pushed through the bushes, not bothering to spread the brambles apart and crossed the clearing and stood over the animal.

"Sorry about that, Mo," he said softly. "Let's get you back up north again." He removed the small CO2 cartridge from under the barrel of the rifle and dropped it in his pocket. He crouched down and found the red feather-tipped dart protruding from the bear's left flank.

The dart was expensive and reusable, and the department prohibited rangers from leaving them in the parks, even if they were damaged or destroyed.

Ben unclipped the walkie-talkie from his belt and rotated the knob at the top.

"This is Bennett," he said into the device. "I've got Mo dropped up here; requesting assistance to get her cleared."

The radio crackled, then came to life.

"Okay, tag the location and stand by for location verification. We're sending out a crew—out."

Ben tucked his radio away and took out his phone. He tapped an app on the home screen and clicked around a few times, setting his current location into the device's memory, then turned on the GPS beacon.

Within minutes, a crew of four men and two women arrived at the campsite and began strapping the grizzly onto a board.

The rangers would move Mo to another area of the park with less human traffic. She would eventually wander down again, drawn to the enticing opportunity ignorant campers left her.

This was Mo's third repositioning, and Ben was worried it would be her last.

Don't come back down here, Mo, Ben willed the sleeping giant. I won't be able to help you out again.

The Chevy hiccuped over an invisible pothole in the road, and the aging suspension compensated with a clicking sound and a groan.

Ben pulled the truck to the left, easing it back to the center of the narrow dirt road before turning the radio up. The country song already blaring through the strained cabin speakers didn't need a boost, but it got one anyway.

"You really don't like to talk, do you?" Ben's passenger yelled. The young man sitting to Ben's right glanced over at him.

Ben kept his attention on the uneven road lying before them.

Out of the corner of his eye, Ben noticed Carlos Rivera turning back to looking out his side window. Over the past hour, Ben had said maybe ten words, and what he had said was mainly instructive, telling Rivera to "call in to base" or "check Mo" in the truck bed. To his credit, Rivera had dutifully done as he was told, but Bennett still hadn't warmed to him.

They drove on for another fifteen minutes, moving slowly over bumps and divots, until finally, Ben pulled off the road and began guiding the truck over a small plain toward the edge of the forest. Behind it, a small mountain lifted itself from the flat ground, shadowed by Antler Peak to the north. As they drove, Ben took in the surroundings—it was beautiful, pristine. He took a deep breath and turned the radio back down.

"No, I don't much care for talking," he said. Rivera glanced over. "You're a decent enough kid, I guess. Thanks for helping out today."

Rivera laughed. "Kid? What, aren't you like twenty-five yourself?"

Ben kept his eyes straight, looking out at the road. "Thirty-two."

Rivera nodded, a surprised look on his face, as they pulled up to the thick tree line. The section of woods in front of them stretched around the base of the mountain, ending about halfway up and turning into a scraggly patch of saplings and bushes. Ben maneuvered the truck backwards into a gap between two trees and jumped out. He unhitched the tie-downs on the side of his truck and waited for Rivera to do the same on his side.

Ben moved to the rear of the truck and started to pull the tailgate down.

"Did you feel that?"

Ben looked up at his partner. Out of nowhere, a heavy bass note rocked the ground at their feet, and Ben felt a pressure of sound vibrate through his head. The deep rumble grew to a deafening tremor, then quickly died, reverberating through the trees.

"What the—" Rivera backed away from the truck, looking to the east and squinting through a strand of trees. His eyes grew wide. "Ben. Look."

Ben followed the younger man's gaze. A smoking mass mushroomed from the horizon upward. The cloud billowed out, growing exponentially.

Neither man spoke. They just watched, glued to the spot.

Suddenly an earthquake tore through the trees, ripping roots and stumps from the ground and lifting the truck into the air and throwing both men thirty feet head over heels. Ben hit the ground so hard he felt his insides churn.

He forced himself to sit up, trying to get his bearings, but the temblor would not stop. The truck lay on its side but he couldn't get to it even if it wasn't.

The ground had opened up. A widening gap in the earth drew a jagged line in the cracking dry soil and threatened to swallow the entire vehicle. Ben stumbled when he tried to stand.

We have to get out of here. Ben whipped around. Where's Rivera?

He wasn't at the truck. The bear's cage had toppled off the back and now lay upside down. Ben broke into a run and leapt over the widening crevasse.

Working frantically at the animal pen, he unlocked the padlock on the door and unlatched the two enclosures. He swung the door open and reached in.

Just as he did, he ripped his arm back.

Of all the things there was to worry about, and all he was concerned with was helping this bear survive.

Good way to lose a hand, he thought. He looked into the cage to find the grizzly unmoving, but breathing. The great beast was still unconscious.

The earth began to settle back to normal.

As fast as it had happened, it was over. In a mere thirty seconds the ground had lifted up, been pushed together with cataclysmic force, and fallen back down again. Trees had toppled over one another, trunks battered and smashed in half. Boulders that had rested in place for a millennia now sat disturbed, some cracked and broken.

And now, tranquility...

"Ben! Help!"

Rivera's voice came from somewhere on the other side of the truck. He ran toward it, skidding to a halt near the edge of the new fissure in the ground. Ben could see that the earth actually sloped downward for about twenty feet before it dropped straight down into an abyss.

Rivera was dangling over the edge, his white-knuckled fingers clawed around a tree root.

"I can't hold on," Rivera said.

Ben dropped to his stomach and reached down, grasping the other man's free hand. He gritted his teeth, summoning all his strength, and pulled.

The edge of the fissure wasn't solid rock, and as Ben pulled Rivera upward, the sides of the cliff eroded and fell away. Ben struggled with the angle for a half minute, then stopped.

"Switch hands. Give me your other arm," Ben shouted down to Rivera.

The young man's eyes burned with fear as he tried to do as instructed.

His arms shook as Ben willed himself to drag his colleague out of the hole.

And then, an aftershock, trembling through the woods.

The ground quaked again.

Ben lost his grip.

Rivera tumbled back down, swinging from the root with his other sweat-soaked hand.

Ben lunged over the edge to grab him, his finger glancing across Rivera's collar but missing him by mere inches. His hand slammed back into the wall of the cliff.

And then the tree root broke loose and snapped away from the dirt.

Rivera looked up at Ben as he realized in that instant what was happening.

The tree root fell away and Rivera with it.

Within seconds he was gone.

Ben called down to him.

There was no answer.

“What do you mean, crack?”

Ben looked up from the couch. “Crack. Fissure. Hole in the earth.”

“Like a sinkhole?”

“Yes. Sort of.”

“Then why didn’t you just say sinkhole?”

“I didn’t think of it,” Ben said. “And it wasn’t a sinkhole, technically. It was caused by some... explosion.”

“And Carlos Rivera fell into it?”

Ben nodded, his expression blank. The officer sighed and turned to his partner. The second officer stepped forward, resuming the line of questioning. “And you said you two were moving—relocating—a nuisance bear?”

A man walked into the room. His large, round frame was unmistakable. Ben’s boss, George Randolph, jumped in to the discussion. “A nuisance bear is a bear that’s caused no harm or considerable damage and just needs to be relocated to a more remote area—”

The officer was not impressed. “This is Wyoming. We know what a nuisance bear is.”

“Look, Mo, the grizzly, has three strikes against her now. We were trying to get her far enough away that she’ll stay put.”

The officers wrote everything down, the others muttering amongst themselves. Ben sat motionless on the lounge couch, the only remotely comfortable place in the entire room. The lights above the gathered local officers, park rangers, and staff burned down on him like the sterile lighting in a hospital wing. Ben felt trapped, out of place, and anxious.

The last time I was in a hospital...

Ben shook away the feeling. He knew it wasn’t going to help his anxiety levels now to dwell on memories from the past.

All the staff on duty during the explosion had been summoned to this staff building to “debrief,” as the local police called it. A fire and rescue team was on its way, due to arrive any moment. Ben also saw a few men and women milling about whom he didn’t recognize, talking quietly to individual members of the Yellowstone team about the morning’s events.

Government, he thought. One of the women walked toward him. Slim, fit, and wearing a tight suit that matched her demeanor—like the kind of person who took herself too seriously.

When the woman didn’t deviate from her course, Ben almost said something he shouldn’t have.

The words left her mouth before she’d even stopped moving. “May I ask you a few questions?”

Ben didn’t respond. He glanced at her quickly, top to bottom, and aimed his eyes at the only window on this side of the building.

“Mr. Bennett, correct? Harvey Bennett?” she asked.

Again, he didn’t answer.

“People usually call you Ben, though, right?”

Reluctantly, he nodded.

“Mr. Bennett, you’re a ranger here at Yellowstone? You’ve worked here for thirteen years, correct? First as an intern of sorts, then moving into your current role.”

These weren’t questions. She was verifying information some subordinate had given her.

“Standard procedure would suggest you introduce yourself first,” Ben said.

The woman wasn't sidetracked, and she continued. "You were nineteen, moved your life up here, and now live in a trailer just outside the park's perimeter. May I ask what you were running away from?"

Ben clenched his jaw and resumed staring out the window.

I wasn't running away, he thought. I just needed space.

"Later, then. What about Rivera? Mr. Carlos Rivera, twenty-five years old, from Albuquerque, New Mexico. How long had you worked with him?" The woman's emphasis on the word "had" was not lost on Ben.

"Are you going to ask any questions you don't already know the answer to?" he shot back.

The woman hesitated, before nodding. "Fair enough. Mr. Bennett, can you talk about what you saw up there this morning? The explosion?"

Ben thought for a moment. "Looked like a bomb. Mushroom cloud and everything."

"Right. And what reaction did you and Mr. Rivera have when you noticed it?"

"We didn't have time to react to it—there was an earthquake, and then..." He didn't finish the thought. She was wearing an ID tag he didn't recognize.. "Who are you with?" he asked.

"The Centers for Disease Control, BTR Division, local out of Billings, Montana."

Ben got off the couch and stood over her. "Listen, uh, CDC, BTR—whatever, lady," he said as he walked past her. "I've answered questions now for almost an hour. If you want more information, just read the reports." He walked through the gathering of people, heading for the door. He pushed it open and stepped down onto the patio, not looking back.

He heard the outer screen door slam closed behind him, then creak back open again. Footsteps quickly pounded down the steps. Within seconds, the woman was next to him. He didn't slow down.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Bennett, I know you've had a rough morning, but—"

"Rough morning?" Ben stopped and wheeled around to face her. "A rough morning is what Rivera's family is having. A rough morning is what the families of the—what, one hundred or so?—people who were killed in that explosion are having. I'm just trying to have a morning, but it's apparently not going to be possible."

"I—I know, Mr. Bennett, I just—"

"Stop calling me that."

"Okay, I just need to know exactly what happened."

"You know what happened. You and everyone else. A bomb went off and a lot of people died. There was an earthquake, the ground opened up and Rivera fell into it. What else do you need from me? I tried to save him, okay? I had his arm, and he fell. What? You think I'm a suspect in a murder investigation or something?"

She lowered her voice. "No, I don't, Ben. But my boss isn't the kind of man who will just let things be. He's going to ask some questions—some very specific questions—and I need to be able to answer them to his satisfaction. I just want to get back to Montana, back home."

Ben kicked at a stone at his feet, then met the woman's eyes again. "Where exactly is home?"

"Outside Billings, small town called Lockwood."

He thought for a moment. "Will you do me a favor, uh—what is your name again?"

"Julie. Juliette Richardson."

"Right. Just do me a favor, Julie?"

She waited.

"If you can make sure I don't have to talk to anyone else about this mess? I'll tell you what I know; that's all I can do. But I don't want to screw around with the other government types like you or anyone else. Fair?"

The corner of her mouth tugged upwards, almost into a smile. "I think I can work that out."

The club connected with the ball directly in the sweet spot. Josh Hohn watched it sail down the fairway, breaking left before landing and following the contour of the long par 5, as if the ball had been guided remotely. Josh smiled, knowing exactly what his boss, Francis Valère, would say.

He heard the older man standing behind him mutter a French curse word under his breath and then, in English, “must be that nice piece you are using.”

Josh knew that his countless hours of practice and thousands of practice drives, as well as his commitment to fitness, were the real reasons he was able to send the ball just about wherever he wanted it. But the TaylorMade SLDR driver was a gift from Valère, and the man tried as hard as possible to make Josh feel bad about it.

“Well, you picked it, boss.” Josh winked at him.

Francis Valère grabbed a driver from his golf bag strapped to the back of their cart and marched up to a bright pink tee. Placing his ball carefully, he took a few practice swings before launching the ball down the fairway. He watched it rise and get caught in a gust of wind that pushed it to the right. The ball landed close to a sand trap, bounced a few times, and came to a stop in the taller grass just before the tree line.

Josh laughed. Valère glared at him.

“Should have bought one for yourself, I guess.” Josh shrugged.

“Said the man who is still trailing me by three.” Valère returned to the cart and put his club away. He slid into the driver’s seat. “Come on, that one is going to be hard to find.”

Josh was already sitting in the cart and checking his cell phone. “You’ve got to be kidding me...” He glanced up. “You’re not going to believe this. Looks like a bomb went off at Yellowstone. ”

“Terrorists?”

Josh scrolled through an article on his smartphone, skimming the news article that he’d pulled from his feed reader. “I don’t know. It says there was minimal damage, some casualties...” he paused. “Shit, I don’t mean to be morbid, but if you’re going to bomb a place, wouldn’t you choose one a little more, uh, populated?”

“I suppose I would.” Valère kept driving, keeping the cart on the path that stretched along the right side of Hole 13. “Unbelievable.”

“I know, right?”

“I am talking about the ball. I cannot see it anywhere.” He brought the golf cart to a halt and stepped out. “You want to help me find it?”

Josh returned the phone to his pocket and exited the vehicle. “What were they hoping to achieve?”

Valère poked around with his foot, trying to find where the white Nike ball had landed. The grass was perfectly trimmed, left a little long to differentiate it from the short-cropped blades nearby. “What do you think they are working on?”

Josh thought for a moment, the question and change of subject taking him by surprise. “Who knows? Maybe they’re actually taking a vacation, like you ordered them to.” Josh knew his boss was talking about the two lab assistants who also worked for Frontier Pharmaceuticals Canada. Valère had founded Frontier Pharmaceuticals Canada only a few years ago with a massive personal investment and some venture funding from a couple of his friends. He’d hired Joshua Hohn as his right-hand man and partner, and Josh had, in turn, hired the two part-time university students to help with data and organization.

“You know them as well as I do, Hohn—they are probably hard at work curing cancer or creating the next superfood.” He stressed the word “super” with his thick French accent. Josh knew he meant it as a joke, as they’d often made fun of America’s blind obsession with “super” fruits and vegetables. He loved creating hybrid plant fungi in their lab that included an extra dosage of a vitamin or two, then trying to get Valère to market it as the “next big thing.” It was a fun game Josh played while working on the other project.

And their other project really was the next big thing.

For the past three years he had inched closer to the finalization of a very real “super” drug: an organic shell that could grow around the cell walls of microscopic organisms. The shell acted as a sort of flexible and semi-permeable “armor.”

It was fascinating to Josh, to conceive of a lab-created chemical bonding molecule that actually fused to a cell’s outer wall and added an extra layer of protection while still allowing the cell’s internal functions to interface with the outside world. It would revolutionize the pharmaceutical world. The world of nanotechnology was almost upon them, and Josh knew his career would be solidified if they were successful.

So far, they had been. Their biggest breakthrough happened last week, at the end of a long stretch of over twenty hours in “The Dungeon,” the nickname he had given their dark, cluttered workspace. Josh had called Valère frantically, almost tripping over his words as the test results poured in.

The nano-coating he’d applied had finally done what it was supposed to do—it stuck.

Valère finally found his ball near a tree stump that was lined up perfectly between himself and the hole. He cursed again, grabbing a pitching wedge from his bag.

“Going up and over?” Josh asked, clearly surprised.

“I do not have it in me to waste three shots and let you catch up.” He took a few practice swings and set into his swing ritual.

The shot was beautiful—a perfect arc that carried the ball cleanly over the stump and straight to the middle of the fairway, mere inches from Josh’s first shot.

“Well, I’m glad I didn’t bet you that you couldn’t do it,” Josh said.

“I am not a betting man,” Valère said.

“No, you’re not, but you should be. With this product of yours, you could have been set.”

Valère turned to Josh. “Rest assured, my friend, my exposure in this company is over and above anything I would wager out here with you. And do not forget, you have quite a stake in this as well.”

Josh nodded. He had signed on for a half-million-dollar salary, in Canadian dollars, and had taken an options contract as well in preparation for their inevitable IPO. Further, he had a small percentage share in the company’s future profits.

Basically, both men were about to be rich beyond their wildest dreams.

“When I get back into the office next week, I have a call with our other two investors and patent lawyer, and from there I will make a decision about timing,” Valère said.

“What do you need me to work on, then?” Josh asked. They’d arrived at the mid-point of the hole and walked to where their balls lay in the grass. “I’m guessing we’ll need to set up some meetings with the bigger representatives and start on the marketing?”

“No, we will wait on the marketing. I need to get the sample to the investors, and they will start production.”

“Production of what?” Josh asked.

“Do you remember my trip to the Northwest Territory that I took a year ago?” Valère asked.

Josh cocked his head. This was an interesting and sudden change of subject.

“I visited the site of a native tribe of people who have long since perished. There, we also found the remains of a camp, and what we assumed was a Russian expedition.”

“We? I thought you went alone?”

“I met with my investors—as you know, we have been business partners for a long time.”

“So this was a business trip?” Josh asked. He was growing more and more confused.

“Of sorts, yes. Anyway, we discovered the cause of death for these poor explorers. A plant that is capable of releasing a small amount of its natural defense mechanism into the surrounding air when disturbed. In its powdered form, I believe, it was used by this native tribe as some sort of hallucinogen. However, over time, that same defense mechanism turned into a quite lethal substance.”

“You’re talking about the sample you have in the freezer, right? Those boxes that were shipped back with you?”

Valère nodded. “We wished to also use this substance as a defense mechanism, just like the plant did. However, I needed to strengthen it; to improve its potency—”

“You created a virus?”

“I discovered one. In its natural state, its potency is barely enough to harm a small mammal unless it is ingested in large quantities. But with a few alterations and improvements—”

“What are you talking about?” Josh was horrified. “That’s not a medical application, Francis—”

“It does not concern you what the application is,” Francis said.

Josh stepped up to his ball and slammed his club down in a reckless swing. The ball flew off the ground, leaving a dirty streak of brown in the grass. He watched, his anger building, as the ball careened to the right and over the line of trees. Without turning back around, he began walking toward the trees to find it.

How could he do this? he wondered. Josh had been working with Valère for over three years, and he thought he knew the man. They both had been interested in preserving life through their work and science.

This sounded like the exact opposite.

He crashed through the thick bushes that marked the end of the golf course and the beginning of undeveloped land and kept walking toward a stand of pine trees he’d last seen his ball flying toward. As he neared the trees he could hear the sound of running water.

The trees stood like sentinels in front of a steep hill, standing guard over the cliff. The hill fell away at a steep angle down to a river, where he could see water tumbling over rocks and forming small rapids as it wound through the canyon.

What he didn’t see, however, was his ball.

“I believe it landed farther up,” his boss’s voice called out from behind him. Valère had driven their cart to the edge of the course and walked to Josh.

“You can’t do this, Valère. You can’t sell us out like that. Who’s buying, anyway?”

“It is not a matter of money—”

“Bullshit!” Josh barked. “Of course it is! Why else would you have kept this from me?”

“I told you, it is not something you should concern yourself with. This plan predates our arrangement, Josh.”

Josh watched as his boss removed Josh’s driver from his bag. He inspected it, examining the lightweight graphite build. “We have been working for a lifetime on this, and it is not something I will abandon before I am finished.”

Josh took a step back up toward the hill, a pained expression on his face. “Seems like you’re a terrorist. That’s all this is. You smug, genocidal fool.”

“You have your names for what I do, and I have mine. I am working on something far bigger than anything you can imagine,” Valère said. “Something much more significant.”

“You won’t get away with it,” Josh said. “You won’t be able to run from it when you’re done.”

“I am not planning on running, Josh. I am here, and I will stay right here. And if I am removed, there will be another to take my place. And another.”

Josh saw his friend and business partner watch him, as if he were examining a specimen. “It is truly a shame, Joshua.”

“What?” Josh’s eyes widened as he noticed Francis raising the golf club into the air.

Valère lashed out with the club and struck Josh in the head. There was a sickening smack, and Josh immediately fell to the ground.

Blood ran into and over his eyes. Coating his vision with a shade of red. Another second passed and he couldn’t see at all. The pain was excruciating. His brain felt like mush. He couldn’t think; he couldn’t speak—

“It is a truly a shame to lose a mind such as yours, my friend. But you are wrong. I will get away with it. America is not united enough to save itself.”

Josh tried to raise his arm, to do something to fend off the attack he knew was coming—

But he could not.

He could only stare with unseeing eyes as Valère brought the driver down and smashed it into his skull.

Ben and Julie sat tucked away in a back corner of the staff cafeteria where the peeling paint on the walls had gone unnoticed for years. The faint smell of fryers and old food mixed with cleaning supplies was off-putting and yet familiar at the same time. Unpleasant if you were a newcomer, oddly comforting if you weren't.

Ben sipped his coffee, black, almost too hot to drink, while he waited for Julie's next question.

"Did you know Rivera well?"

"No."

"That's it? That's all you've got for me?"

"If you hadn't noticed, I don't make friends too quickly."

"So what was the deal with this bear?"

"Mo."

"Excuse me?"

"The name of the grizzly," Ben said. "Her name is Mo."

"You named the bear?"

"Yeah, we give names to some of our frequent flyers. Mo's got three strikes now, but we got her moved up there pretty far. Hopefully she was okay after the, uh, incident."

Julie scrawled some notes in a miniature notepad she'd taken from her back pocket. Ben sipped his coffee, waiting for her to finish. He listened to the gentle commotion emanating from the front lounge, bits of conversation floating in from rangers and park staff.

"...Was probably nuclear, right?"

"No way, too small—I mean, could have been a test or something gone wrong..."

"...Government's probably gonna try to cover this one up and sweep it under..."

Julie looked up and caught Ben's eye. "This wasn't an accident, but it certainly wasn't a government test or anything. They're going to be all over this place within the hour. By tonight, Yellowstone will be crawling with FBI, CIA, DoD, every acronym you can think of."

Ben cringed. "What about BTR?"

Julie glanced down at her own name tag briefly as though seeing it for the first time. "Oh, BTR," she said, "Biological Threat Research division of the CDC. Not exactly top-secret, but it's a new program the CDC's trying to get funding for. We're keeping it quiet until we have some victories under our belt."

"Like trying to figure out who bombed Yellowstone?"

She snorted. "Well, more like trying to analyze the long-term negative environmental effects of possible radiation in the fallout zone."

"Hmm, not exactly tabloid-worthy."

"No, it's pretty unexciting stuff, and that's why it's just an idea at this point. But if I—we—can write up something worthwhile, they might just make it a formal department."

Ben nodded. "And your office is in Billings. Seems like a pretty small city for a CDC office."

"It is, and that was part of the attraction. It's a skeleton crew right now, just me and my team of five—"

A loud shout echoed through the corridor from the other room, followed by a growing commotion and more voices.

"Get him inside, on that couch!" one voice shouted.

“Who is it?” Ben heard.

The voices grew frantic, Ben heard the deep gravel of his boss, George Randolph, trying to make his orders heard over the din. “Get him down and get some water. Pull his shirt off and let’s get a look at that rash—”

Julie was on her feet. Ben followed along on behind.

“How much is covered? Hands, arms?”

“And his head—look at his neck!”

Julie pushed on the swinging door to the hallway and barred Ben from going any further. “Wait. We don’t know what that is, but it’s not going to do anyone any good if we walk in there, and it’s contagious. They’ve got enough people in there anyway.”

“But—”

Her cellphone started ringing. “Richardson,” she said as she brought the phone up to her ear.

After a minute, she banged the phone on the table.

“A bit one-sided for that to have been an argument,” Ben remarked.

“My boss. Come on,” she said. She didn’t wait for Ben to follow as she slid out the cafeteria’s rear exit, through the back of the commercial kitchen.

Outside, they were met by a bright noon sun and a red haze from the morning’s blast.

Northwest Territory, Canada University of Manitoba Archaeological Dig One Year Ago

The rest of the afternoon faded quickly into evening, but thankfully, their excavation moved at a brisk pace as well. Before nightfall, the team of six—five students and the professor—had uncovered the remains of a camp.

Their excavations had revealed that the camp was arranged in a semi-circle around a central opening, in which one student found the remnants of a campfire. Another student found a nearly complete flap of canvas tent, with tie-downs and a large tent stake. Next to it, a small pouch containing five silver coins—a miraculous find, especially considering that the Native Americans who had lived in these parts had never printed any coins.

They shared the information about depth, soil density, and procedure as they went, and just as dusk approached, the team found three more tents, all collapsed in on themselves and preserved reasonably well beneath layers of the cold soil.

Together they marked, documented, and mapped the entire area, eventually creating a computer model of the landscape and coordinates.

But it wasn't the tents, or the artifacts, or even the coins that caused the most commotion.

It was what the team had found beneath those tents.

As two students carefully removed the canvas from the ground under the watchful eye of Dr. Fischer, what lay undisturbed beneath it for three centuries became visible.

The corpses of a lost expedition.

Some bodies were preserved better than others, but it was clear from the clothing, cranial structures, and some of the additional artifacts found nearby, that it was the fabled Alexei Russian expedition of the early 18th century.

Dr. Fischer was ecstatic; this was a discovery that, to him, surpassed anything he'd ever achieved in his professional career before now. He would write a book—maybe a volume of books—about this expedition, what it was attempting to accomplish, where it had been, and what had led to the eventual demise of these poor men.

Of course, there were questions to answer before these secrets would reveal themselves.

They had found pieces of maps, journals, and scraps of clothing, but they would need more to piece the story together. But now that Dr. Fischer had committed to exploring the nearby caves tomorrow, they had even less time to spend at this site.

He moved to another rectangular opening in the earth; a new hole they'd dug to continue their exploration. Another three tents were revealed, and another six skeletal remains were uncovered. In one, a student had removed a smoking pipe of carved bone and a small leather-bound journal. The student gave the pipe directly to another student, who was hard at work logging the items into the computer database and mapping the precise location they were found. The journal he handed to Dr. Fischer.

"Thought this might be interesting to you," the student said.

Dr. Fischer donned a pair of fresh latex gloves and held the journal delicately. He felt its worked leather surface, noticing the fine craftsmanship and attention to detail. After so many years, it really was remarkable.

Most remarkable, however, was the fact that some of the paper inside the journal was still intact. Dirty, smudged, and difficult to read, but intact nonetheless.

He held the journal open, barely enough to peer inside, as he did not want to damage the worn spine, but he moved the book around to let enough light in to see what was on the right-hand page.

“Anyone read Russian?” he called. “And good eyes? This is too small for me to see.”

“Losing your vision already, old man?” one of the students yelled.

Dr. Fischer laughed.

Gareth, the student working the computer, stood and stretched. “I got it,” he said. “I can use a break anyway. Anyone want to take over?”

Another graduate student fell in behind the computer screen and continued to document the dig site.

“You read Russian?” Dr. Fischer asked.

“Yeah, it was an undergraduate minor. Something I was interested in.”

“Why?”

“Girl I met before that semester. I was hoping to impress her when I saw her again next year. Turned out she was German, but I kept taking the classes for fun.”

Dr. Fischer shook his head. He handed the small book over to his student and waited.

“Okay, yeah, I got this. Pretty good handwriting, actually. Let’s see... ‘One more eventless day. Full moon last night and one of the men has caught a rabbit.’” Gareth looked up. “Pretty exciting stuff, Doc.” Some of the other students who had gathered around chuckled.

“Keep reading,” Dr. Fischer said.

“‘One other place in my life I have found solace such as this...’ Can’t read that word; I think it’s a town or something. ‘The wind whispers through our ranks; the snow crunches beneath our feet, and you would imagine it was the loudest noise in the forest.’” He gently flipped through a few more pages. “A lot of this is more of the same,” he said.

By now, the other four students were gathered around Gareth and Dr. Fischer, each leaning on a shovel or sitting on the ground.

“Skip to the end,” Dr. Fischer said.

Gareth flipped to the back of the small leather journal. “Here we go. Last entry: ‘It has made us sick. The baskets filled with that strange powder. No treasure is worth this. It has consumed us all. It is clear to me now that I am to die here alone...’” Gareth’s voice trailed off just as the words of the journal entry had. His eyes were wide, surprise on his face. “Whoa. Pretty intense.”

“Damn,” another student whispered.

Dr. Fischer replayed the words in his mind, trying to commit them to memory. They’d found baskets somewhere. Somewhere close to where they now stood. Whatever was in them, besides these coins, was deadly. He looked up sharply, finding a young woman’s face in the crowd. “Steph—did any of you find any of these baskets? Or more coins?”

She shook her head. “No, nothing like that yet...” her voice shook. “Should we be worried? You know we hear about live Yersinia pestis being found at sites once in a while.”

“No, no, I don’t think this is the plague,” Dr. Fischer said. “Besides, the coins were out in the open, so they should be fine. But we need to change our plans a little. I’m not sure excavating any more of this area tomorrow is such a great idea.”

The students nodded solemnly. Somehow, just knowing this information had changed their perceptions of this site. Knowing that it wasn’t starvation or attack that had killed these men, but something sinister and hidden, had deeply unnerved them.

“David Livingston,” Julie said to Ben as they walked across the parking lot, “is pretty much exactly what you think of when you think ‘bureaucracy by the book.’ He’d rather fail doing it the right way than succeed by not following the rules.” Julie turned left and started down a row of parked cars, Ben in tow; sedans, small station wagons.

“He’s not exactly the easiest person to work with, either,” she continued. “Actually, you don’t work with Livingston at all. You work for him. In his world, that means everyone’s working against him, and it’s up to him to right all our wrongs.”

“Sounds like a bucket of fun,” Ben said as they passed yet another Subaru Outback. “Which one’s yours?”

Julie clicked the button on her key fob and a beep sounded from down the row. Ben stopped short. Ahead lay a monstrous Ford F-450, extended cab Lariat. Dark gray. It loomed over the minuscule Subarus around it.

Julie threw him the keys. “You drive,” she said.

Ben wondered if it was Christmas. “Really?” He tried not to seem impressed.

She reached for the back door on the driver’s side and opened it up, grabbing a laptop case and bag. “I’ve got some work to do. You, uh, think you can handle her?”

Ben got into the driver’s seat and strapped in. He turned on the engine and listened to it purr while he waited for Julie to get in on her side. Once seated, he threw the truck into gear.

“Anyway, Livingston’s making us do these reports.” She opened the laptop. “He’s got this idea that if we write everything down and email it to him, he’ll be able to ‘crack the case,’ or figure out whatever it is we’re supposed to figure out. It’s pretty annoying, to say the least.

“So that call just now?” Julie continued. “He wants an in-person report every forty-eight hours. Can you believe that? He said if we can’t make it face-to-face, we have to call in, but it ‘won’t look good.’ I’m already up to here with processing, reports, and government forms, not to mention actually doing my job. And he thinks if I’m too busy to actually get to the office I have enough time to give him a play-by-play update over the phone?”

Ben listened as she vented, guiding the truck out of the parking lot and down the curved path leading from the staff facility. As he turned onto the main park road, he turned to Julie. “Where exactly are we going?”

She glanced back at him. “Oh, uh, I guess I should ask you first.”

Ben waited.

“You have plans? I could use your help back at the office.”

Ben couldn’t hide his surprise. “Back in Billings? That’s two hours away.”

She shrugged. “Just over two-and-a-half, actually. I assumed you didn’t have anything going on, what with the park needing to be closed for a while.”

“I do have a life outside of the park.”

“Really?”

Ben couldn’t tell if she was being serious or not. “Theoretically,” he said.

“I’ve got more questions to ask you,” she said. “But I can’t wait until after I get back. Livingston will want to know as soon as possible.”

He drove in silence for a few minutes. “I’ll need to swing by my place to pick up some clothes.”

“Billings has a Target, buy some when we get there.” Julie’s head didn’t even lift up from her computer screen.

“You buy ‘em, if you want my help.”

“Deal.”

He hadn’t expected that. “Look,” he said. “I’ll help you out for a couple days, tops. But just because I don’t have anything else going on doesn’t mean I want to play chauffeur for you forever.”

“I promise. Just to the office, and then I’ll buy you a plane ticket home—I can get my report prepared and sent on the way, and if anything comes up I can just ask.”

“Okay then,” he replied, uneasily. “But hold the plane ticket. I’ll rent a car.”

Julie didn’t question him. They drove on in silence for another twenty minutes, finally coming to a gas station. “One other thing,” Ben said.

“What’s that?”

“This is your truck. You pay for gas.”

David Livingston sat in his executive leather office chair and cracked his knuckles—an old habit. He ran his hands through his thick, oiled black hair and shifted in his seat. His computer dinged once with the sound of an incoming email, but he ignored it.

Clicking away from the news site, he read through the dossier on Juliette Alexandra Richardson, native of Montana. Other than a brief stint in California during and after college, she'd lived in Montana her entire life. He'd had his data lead, Randall Brown, send a copy to his office, where he scanned it and shredded the paper—a wasted tree and no doubt a waste of productive time. After five years at the CDC, he still had no idea why it was so damned difficult to just email everything. The data lead had tried explaining it to him several times—something about security and sensitive information, but it never took.

He reached the end of the dossier, not finding anything unusual or out of place. He shouldn't have been surprised—this was the third time he'd read it. It was similar to what his own looked like five years ago. Clean, simple, and without a black mark.

He had reached this point in his career through determination, hard work, and then bad luck. He'd first applied to the CDC as an investigator, hoping to land a job that allowed him to travel, study, and research the kinds of terrifying things the rest of world paid them to keep hidden. He'd started out following a team of scientists and biologists into the Andes but couldn't manage to get his name in the paper that was eventually written. After graduating and finishing his internship, he was passed over three times before landing a desk job at the Atlanta campus—CDC headquarters. He had toiled there for four years, e-signing his boss' expense reports and preparing meeting agendas.

Then his boss died. A man of sixty-one, a sudden heart attack left the department without a manager. Rather than replace him, Livingston found himself outsourced along with everyone else and the department all but shut down. Floating around, he landed a brief position as a “research specialist,” effectively a news and media junkie who speculated on which outbreak or natural disaster would lead to the next Mad Cow Disease or Bird Flu.

During his tenure, there was none.

Finally, his luck turned—or so he thought. What appeared to be an opportunity to lead a brand new, recently brainstormed section of the CDC became the mind-numbing middle management job in which he currently served. They'd been relegated to the backwaters of the CDC—southern Montana—and asked to “provide guidance on environmental and biological threats to the nation.”

In other words, he and his team were glorified storm chasers.

To Livingston, it was the worst place in the entire world.

Juliette, on the other hand, had come through his doors as a young CDC employee three years ago, still wet behind the ears with the usual “change the world” mentality. He wouldn't have picked her himself, but she had come highly recommended by people above his pay grade.

Plus, her looks certainly hadn't hurt her chances. Average height, thin, and curved in all the right places, she was certainly what he would describe as “a looker.”

Livingston pushed back from the desk and stood up, stretching his back and popping his neck. He pressed a button on the small intercom next to his computer and waited a moment.

“Please grab Stephens and tell him to come up here.”

A woman's voice responded through his closed door. “Yes, Mr. Livingston.”

Livingston knew his use of the intercom was an act of arrogance, but he didn't care. The intercom was a speaker that had been mounted on the wall outside his door, pointing down at the rest of the staff's desks. Their office space was so small that the only closed-door office rooms inside were his own and Julie Richardson's, which was currently unoccupied. The administrative secretary, technically charged to serve the entire staff of seven, had been given the nameplate "Executive Administrator" by Livingston, in order to help specify to everyone in the room who exactly she—and everyone else—really worked for.

When the knock on the door came, he waited a while, sat back down, then cleared his throat. "Come on in, Stephens."

Benjamin Stephens opened the door and stood on the threshold. He looked annoyed. "What can I do for you, Livingston?"

Livingston bristled—he wasn't a fan of people calling him just by his last name. He let it slide, but logged it into his mental file of personal grievances. "Thanks for coming so quickly."

"David, the secretary's desk is literally right next to mine, four feet from your door. If I didn't hear you over her intercom, I would've still heard you asking for me through the door."

Livingston ignored the response and motioned for Stephens to sit.

"I need you to do me a favor, Stephens," he said. "Richardson's out on assignment, and she was near Yellowstone Park." He paused. "You're aware of what happened at Yellowstone Park?"

Stephens nodded.

"Good. Well, anyway, she's out there traipsing around, trying to figure out how the regional environment will be affected by the radiation."

"I thought she was trying to study some fishing traps and the impact they're having on insects downriver?"

"She is—or she was. This is a little side project she came up with when she heard about the explosion. You know how she can be—overzealous and all that."

Stephens nodded again. "She's a hard worker."

"I want you to check in with her, like normal. You're her second-in-command on this team, and I need you to step up. She's not the kind of person to get excited about reporting back, but I know you understand why we do that."

"Yes, sir."

"Good. Get in touch with her and stay in touch with her. Stick to the traditional channels—send everything through SecuNet. Clear?"

Stephens hesitated.

"What is it?"

"Well, no, sir, I mean that's great, but I don't understand how this is different than how I usually run things."

"It's not, Stephens. I'm just reminding you, since your team lead seems to think she can invent the rules. I don't want you forgetting how we do things around here, okay? You get Julie on speed-dial, and you keep me updated on what she's doing."

"Right."

"Randy from Data is ready to go, and he'll get you set up on SecuNet if he already hasn't. All phone calls, emails, hell—even telegraphs, I don't care—go through Data."

Livingston watched his employee carefully, trying to read the younger man's expression. He knew that Stephens knew Randall Brown was on vacation, but he wanted to see how Stephens would react. Would he ask a follow-up question? Pretend that Brown wasn't away? Something else entirely?

It was one of many types of “power games” Livingston enjoyed playing with his underlings—watching them squirm as they tried to figure out how best to respond.

Stephens stood as Livingston was finishing. “Got it, sir.”

In Stephens’ case, Livingston was usually disappointed: Stephens had a fantastic poker face.

“Great.” Livingston looked back down at his computer and pretended to be checking email. He waited until Stephens left the office, made his way over to a small cabinet on the wall at the back of the room.

He pulled out a decanter and poured himself a scotch. He’d made sure to specify in the employee manual that drinking was not allowed in the office, but he also believed that it was his executive right to be able to indulge in some of the finer things in life. He would have lit a cigar as well if it wouldn’t smoke them all out of the small space.

Ben had been driving for the better part of two hours.

Julie was now fast asleep in the seat beside him. Her hair was tousled, poking up from the back where her tight brown ponytail had come into contact with the seat's headrest. She'd kicked her right knee up against the window, trying to curl into a position that was more conducive to sleep, her body pressed into a much smaller space than Ben would've imagined possible. She'd kicked her shoes off long ago. Thankfully her feet didn't stink.

Ben changed the channel to country music. An old George Strait song piped through the cabin.

Julie stirred and wiped her mouth.

"Didn't mean to wake you," he said.

She opened her eyes and blinked. "Oh, my God. I, uh, I guess I fell asleep," she said with surprise. She sat up straight, moving her leg back down and straightening her creased blouse. She reached up to her hair. "Oh, man, what a mess. I guess I was more tired than I thought. Sorry."

"Don't worry about it," Ben said. He was about to say something else but stopped himself.

"What?"

"Huh? Oh, nothing. Just, uh, don't worry about it. Go back to sleep, you obviously need it."

"No, I think I'm good." She noticed the music. "Country? Good choice for this road."

Ben thought for a moment. "Hey, back at the staff building. That guy they brought in? What do you think it was?"

Julie didn't answer at first. Ben wondered if she was collecting her thoughts, or still tired. "Yeah, I've been thinking about that too. The way they described it—at least what I could hear—it sounded like a rash. Maybe viral." She sighed. "I should have taken a look before we left."

"Viral? That's a leap. I was thinking poison ivy or something."

"Are you kidding? The way they were talking about it? Those guys were mostly all park rangers, right? You'd know a simple poison ivy rash, wouldn't you?"

Ben shrugged. "Sure."

"Besides, it was spreading. They said it was on his hands and arms, but then a few seconds later said they thought they saw it on his neck, too."

"What spreads like that?" Ben asked.

"Well I guess—if it's just a rash, it could be anything. Candidiasis, rheumatic fever, mononucleosis—chickenpox."

"Chickenpox? Really?" Ben looked skeptical.

"Sure—VZV, the varicella-zoster virus—if you don't get it as a child, can be super dangerous as an adult, especially if you're immune-deficient. But without getting a look at it, it's impossible to say. I'll be interested to see what the medical team has to say."

Ben waited a moment before asking his next question. "Except you don't think it's Chickenpox at all, do you?"

Julie didn't respond.

"This isn't some run-of-the-mill rash, is it?"

Julie didn't look him in the eye. Finally, she turned to him. "I think this is something else—something bigger. First the explosion, then this? What if both are related?"

Ben shrugged. "Depends on if anyone else has this rash thing, right? Might just be a one-off thing. A coincidence."

“Yeah, it just seems fishy.”

They drove on in silence for a while longer. According to the news, ninety-three people had died from the explosion at Yellowstone, and countless others were now being evacuated from the park grounds. Early reports confirmed their suspicions: there was some sort of pathogen that appeared to be infecting some people.

“When will they get the results back on whether this is your fake Chickenpox?”

“We don’t have a mobile lab in place yet, so they’re airlifting the samples to Atlanta in the morning. We should get the results back in a couple of days. Why?”

“You think we can get our hands on a sample?” Ben asked.

Julie seemed circumspect. “Maybe. It won’t be easy, but I think I could. Why?”

“If this is bigger than people realize, and we’re talking about a fast-spreading disease, why are we evacuating the park and letting everyone go home when they could be infected?”

“Because we have no reason to hold them.”

“Look,” Ben said. “I might know someone close by who can help. If we can keep this boss of yours out of it...”

Ben watched her think it over.

“How fast would your friend get results back to us?”

“An hour. Two tops.”

“I’ll need to send Livingston something, so I’ll see if I can get a sample from the park sent over, and I’ll send part of it to the lab and the rest to your contact, if you trust him.”

“Her. And I do,” Ben said. “She’s not working under any sort of traditional structure, so it should be pretty quick. Maybe it’ll give you a head start.”

“Of course. Who is this person?” she asked.

“Like I said,” Ben responded, “just someone who might be able to help.”

The computer in front of her chirped, signaling a new email. Amid stacks of books, un-filed papers, and other detritus from weeks of research, the desktop computer was almost hidden from view. Dr. Diana Torres found the mouse hidden under a sheaf of papers and shook the screen awake from its preinstalled screensaver—a never-ending ribbon of color.

She navigated across the desktop and clicked on the icon—the only app that was constantly running on this machine. Never much of a computer person, Dr. Torres often called in her research assistant to finalize and prepare her reports electronically. He chided her for the irony of it—a woman whose career was spent creating computer models of molecules and microscopic organisms was afraid of computers. She never let it bother her; it was all in good fun. But regardless of her methods, unorthodox or not, the research firm knew she was one of the best in the business at what she did.

Her position had only recently been finalized after months of contracting with the research firm. She enjoyed the work, mainly because she didn't have to put up with any bureaucracy or any of the usual corporate nonsense that had driven her from previous jobs. The firm had been established over forty years ago and had constantly been in a stage of growth. Still, Dr. Torres had been a “key hire,” and was expected to take the firm to new levels in biological molecular research.

Dr. Torres double-clicked the email—no subject line—and began reading the body of the text. The email was short and to the point; just a request for help on a particular project. She brushed aside an old Wendy's burger wrapper and a half-empty Diet Coke that was lying in front of her keyboard. She rolled her chair closer to the desk and clicked on the “reply” button. As her fingers hit the keys to type a standardized answer to the request, she caught a glimpse of the sender's email address.

She did a double-take and read the email address again. She lifted her hands from the keyboard to think through her response. She reached over to the Diet Coke and brought it to her lips. She took a long, slow sip of the completely flat soda and read the email one more time.

> I need your help on this one. Sending sample soon. Came from Yellowstone explosion. Please rush, will call soon.

> Ben

Ben? She hadn't heard from Ben in over a decade. She knew he'd become a park ranger and had little to no access to the outside world most of the time. Still, she was stunned.

She took out her cell phone—a flip phone relic that she'd used for years—scrolled through the contacts. When she came to his name, she hesitated over the dial button. She'd never actually used this number. She stared down at the phone for another few seconds and then slammed it shut.

Not now, she thought. Not yet.

Thoughts raced through her mind. Where was he? What was he doing? Why did he need her help, of all people?

She sat in the chair for another few minutes, brooding. She didn't move until her assistant came in.

“Dr. Torres?” The young man's voice snapped her back to reality. She tried to wipe the surprised expression from her eyes but she failed.

“Dr. Torres—are you okay?”

“I—I'm all right,” she said in return. “Just got another request. Something... I didn't expect, but we'll get going on it pretty soon.”

“Sounds good. I can prepare equipment and send word down to Vanessa that some samples will be arriving. Do you have a date?”

At first, Dr. Torres didn't know how to respond. She eased out of her chair and walked toward the young man in the doorway. “Not sure, Charlie. Let's get everything set up now just to be ready. It's just going to be me and you on this one, understand?”

Charlie Furmann nodded without hesitation. The bulk of the company's projects were government funded, but the employed scientists were free—encouraged, even—to pursue personal interests and research projects when time permitted. Some of these projects, Charlie knew, weren't exactly public knowledge.

“I'll get everything set up this afternoon. I'll have Vanessa bring the package up personally when it arrives and leave it outside my office. The lab is open tomorrow night from about 8:30 until the next morning—shall I get it booked?”

“Yes, please. Thank you. I'm going to finish up here and head home. Don't worry about cleaning anything up; I'll be back in bright and early.”

Charlie didn't say anything else. He left the room, closing the door behind him. Dr. Torres turned back to her computer and sat down in the chair. The screensaver had already resumed, and she wiggled the mouse to wake it up.

She stared at the screen for another minute, reading the email over and over again.

Northwest Territory, Canada
University of Manitoba Archaeological Dig
One Year Ago

It'll be any minute now, Gareth Winslow thought. He'd called in, just the way he'd been instructed, over three hours ago, just after he'd finished reading out loud the small journal they'd found. Dr. Fischer was ecstatic, mostly because their findings would verify and support his tenure.

He couldn't believe it himself, really. Some weird powdery substance that killed people? That was pretty exciting. But what was it? Spores, maybe? It was the ultimate question, but there was no way Dr. Fischer was letting any of them near the cave and the rest of the unopened baskets. It was way too risky, and besides, they didn't have the equipment to start a field analysis of whatever might be inside.

Still, Gareth knew everyone was curious. Beyond curious, actually. Dinner was campfire-cooked foil packets filled with vegetables, and the conversation surrounding the bonfire in the middle of camp related to two topics: What was this substance and who put it there?

Theories ran from the dried remains of some mysterious plant the native tribes in the area held as sacred, or at least viewed as medicinal, to some extravagant assassination conspiracy by a Romanov-era traitor. Even Dr. Fischer, clearly playing along, threw in a far-fetched story of alien invaders using a cosmic element to start their takeover of the human race.

Gareth listened intently, as curious as everyone else, but he didn't contribute to the building exuberance of the conspiracy theorists. He wasn't sure what was in the baskets, but he knew it didn't matter.

Only a matter of time, he told himself again. They should be here by now.

As if on cue, his ears picked up the faint beating of helicopter rotors. It was low pitched and vibrated gently, seeming to emanate from within his body rather than from a machine flying in from miles away. As it grew in volume, a few other students picked up on it.

"Hey, shut up for a sec—you guys hear that?" one of the students asked. Everyone went silent, and only the crackling of the fire in front of them could be heard.

Another few seconds passed, and another student heard the noise. "Is that a helicopter? Out here?"

Gareth watched Dr. Fischer straining to listen— he probably couldn't hear it yet, Gareth thought— but he will.

Suddenly, Dr. Fischer's eyes opened wider and Gareth stood, acting out his role. "It definitely is. Weird; I wonder where they're headed?"

Gareth excused himself from the group and walked over to one of the trucks in their three-car caravan. He opened the passenger-side door, reached below the seat, squeezing his arm into the gap between the truck's floor and the bottom of the chair, and felt around.

He found his prize. Slowly, he withdrew his hand, the dome lights inside the truck illuminating the small device.

It was black and silver, plastic with some metal components. A small rubber antenna extended from one side of the rectangular box, directly above a tiny button. He pushed the button, held it, and waited for a faint LED light to flash red once.

Done.

It was amazing what technology could do. The tiny GPS tracking device was now activated, and the inbound helicopter would stop tracking the archeology team's expected location within a grid of longitudinal coordinates and begin tracking their actual location. Their general coordinates had been posted on the university's internal boards months ago, but even Dr. Fischer was unsure where exactly their hunt for the Russian team would take them.

For that reason, the Company needed someone on the ground.

Gareth Winslow was brought onto the team to provide IT and administrative support—a part of archeology that hadn't existed a few years ago, when much of the data collected was shipped off and documented elsewhere. Using his interest in archeology and his undergraduate degrees in Computer Science and Technology Systems, he had assisted in building a suite of software tools that were helpful to archeologists, geologists, and geographers.

And since he was the one who had written the program, he was the perfect grad student to operate it. The recruitment interview with Dr. Fischer was short and sweet—they shook hands, Dr. Fischer asked if he was interested in helping out, and Gareth was in.

It was only after they'd started planning the trip that Gareth was approached by the Company. A shady guy in a black suit showed up at his apartment one day, knocked on his door, and gave him a check.

It was the largest paycheck that Gareth had ever seen his name on before, and he hadn't done anything to earn it.

"There's another one just like it after your trip," the man had said.

"For what?" Gareth knew that everyone had their price, but he wasn't about to kill someone.

"Don't worry," the man had said, sensing his unease. "Nothing illegal. The Company deals in information, and we've set up similar deals with plenty of other digs and research projects around the world."

"And what company is that?" Gareth had asked.

"The Company," the man had replied.

Gareth remembered nodding once, still consumed by the amount of money on the check.

"Okay, that's fine. I can live with a mysterious benefactor. But why not just go to the university? Or the expedition lead, Dr. Fischer?"

"We can't have a legal battle if there's anything of value found. You understand that. Plus, we need the expedition to run as smoothly as possible, without any hiccups along the way. Follow?"

"I do. You don't want anyone jealous that I'm making this kind of money on some low-profile dig."

The man had nodded in return. "Good. You understand. As I said, the Company is prepared to write another check in this amount if you successfully report any findings during your excursion." He made sure Gareth was looking at him as he finished. "You have a few days before you depart. I would suggest cashing the check first so you know we're not messing around, and then you'll be given instructions."

Gareth's hand had been shaking the entire conversation, but as the man finished speaking, he suddenly found a boost of confidence. "You got it. I'm in."

That was over a week ago, and Gareth was still riding the high of knowing what would be in his bank account one week from now. So much money it would wipe out his student loans and he'd still have enough left over to live life. He thought through the list of instructions he'd been given after he cashed the check, to make sure he wouldn't mess anything up.

It was a short list:

1. Participate in the expedition and do nothing to raise suspicion.

2. If any profitable or seemingly conspicuous items are found, email details to the address below.

The rest of the letter was a simple liability waiver, “that by accepting and depositing the check the Company was hereby removed from any liability yada yada...”

He’d sent the email after reading the journal for Dr. Fischer, using his laptop and satellite connection. Gareth mentioned briefly that they’d found “some sort of powdery substance that supposedly led to the demise of the entire Russian expedition...” and “we believe there to be more of the substance available in a nearby cave...” He sent it, and almost immediately there was a response.

It was simple:

“We are converging on your general location. As the included battery will not hold much power, use the device only when you believe we are close to help us find your exact position.”

Wow, Gareth thought. These guys are on the ball.

Now, as the helicopter’s rotor wash grew, he knew they’d be on them in minutes. Do I need to do anything to prepare?

He placed the tracking device back under the seat of the truck and slammed the door. As he turned back to the campfire, he noticed the students and Dr. Fischer standing and looking around the sky, trying to figure out where the helicopter was coming from.

“There it is!” the Korean guy yelled out. Gareth hadn’t bothered to learn any of their names—he knew they’d go home empty-handed, so there was no reason to become part of the team.

They all looked to where he was pointing. Southwest, hanging low over the tree line. If it weren’t for the slowly receding hill they were on, they wouldn’t have been able to see the bird at all.

Gareth examined the growing shape in the dusky sky. It looked dark, almost black, but that could be due to the lack of light at this time of day. It seemed to be sleek, too, not like the commercial helicopters he’d seen flying around cities. It was flatter, more military-looking.

Stealthier.

The copter finally drew near. It slid gently over the trees, slowing to their location, and began to descend. Where the hell is it going to land? Gareth thought. He looked around at their small clearing. The trucks, tents, and campfire were spread out almost evenly over the area, and he couldn’t see where a helicopter that size would fit.

But the pilot had a different impression of the clearing. Gareth watched as the pilot masterfully guided the machine to a spot less than twenty yards from the campfire and then straight down to the grassy platform. He watched the skids land gracefully on the blades of grass, finally coming to a rest without the slightest bump or hop.

Before the copter had even hit the ground, though, three men jumped from its interior. Dressed in black and silver body armor and flight gear, they immediately began walking toward the group of students as the pilot finalized his landing.

It was hard to hear over the rotor noise, but the first man yelled over it anyway. “Gareth Winslow!” he paused and looked at each student and the professor, waiting for a response.

The three men turned to him and met him halfway between the trucks and the campfire.

“Gareth Winslow?” the man said again. Gareth nodded. “Good. Take me to the location of the discovery.”

“What is this?” Dr. Fischer yelled. “What’s going on here?”

“It does not concern you,” one of the men said. “Gareth, take us to the location.”

Gareth snapped to attention, remembering his bargain. “Right. Okay, come on. We’re about a quarter mile away, through these trees.”

He led the way, the three men and the rest of the group following behind. As they neared the cave, one of the men held up a hand and grabbed Gareth’s shoulder. “Wait,” he said.

Gareth watched him enter the small cave and return a minute later. He nodded to the two other men from the helicopter and began walking back toward them. He addressed the entire group of confused students and professor. “Who is leading this expedition?”

Dr. Fischer raised a hand. “I am. And do you mind telling me what’s going on?”

The man eyed Dr. Fischer. “I see. And you have an idea of what might be inside that cave?”

“I—I guess. We found it earlier today, by accident. I believe whatever was in there killed the Russian expedition we came here to find.”

“I understand that much, Dr. Fischer. But I’m asking if you have any idea what, exactly, killed them?”

Dr. Fischer thought a moment, then replied. “I have some ideas, but none that I’m entirely confident about just yet.”

“I see.” The man marched back through the group, the two other men following behind. He delivered orders without turning back. “Mark the location. Get me the coordinates saved and ready to go.” The two men nodded and peeled off from the group, heading back toward the cave.

Gareth was now at the back of the line, watching as the lead man entered the helicopter once again. He heard him address the professor from the inside of the vehicle. “Dr. Fischer, would you care to join us? I would like to discuss your knowledge and experience with the items found within the cave.”

“I’m not sure I feel comfortable—”

The man cut him off as he drew a pistol from a hip holster and aimed it squarely at Dr. Fischer’s face. “Let me rephrase the question, professor, so that it doesn’t seem so... optional.”

Dr. Fischer swallowed, then started climbing into the helicopter. “What about the others? The students?” he asked.

The two men reappeared, apparently having finished marking the coordinates, and jumped into the helicopter. Gareth looked around at the frightened students, and a growing wave of nausea filled him.

What have I done? he thought. The helicopter, filled with the pilot, the three men, and their professor, lifted a few feet off the ground. The students, wide-eyed and confused, began yelling.

“You can’t do this!”

One of the men appeared in the open door of the helicopter and made eye contact with Gareth, just as he lifted something off the floor. It swiveled, held by some support mechanism, and swung out and stopped just outside the helicopter.

Gareth felt his blood run cold.

It was a gun. A huge gun. Gareth recognized the gigantic bullets, strapped together in a shiny gold chain of death. He took a staggering step back, trying to form words. We need to leave, he tried to say.

The words didn’t escape his mouth. Instead, he felt himself being lifted off the ground and thrown backwards, hard, just as he heard a new noise. A chug, chug, chug sort of sound, but fast. He saw the gun’s fiery tip burning as each round left the barrel and flew into one of the students. He wanted to close his eyes, but he didn’t need to.

Everything went black.

As he walked past the newsstand just inside the door to the gas station, Ben noticed the tiny black and white television sitting on the shelf above it. It was set to a news channel he didn't recognize, most likely only syndicated throughout the small region of southern Montana they were in.

They'd stopped just past Red Lodge, on a stretch of highway that looked like it had been abandoned for a century. When they came to the service station, Julie had opted to stay in the truck while Ben ran in for some snacks and use the restroom.

He asked the attendant to turn up the volume. The old guy complied and Ben listened to the station's reporter on location outside the Yellowstone gates. The information wasn't anything new.

The explosion had, in fact, been a bomb, based on air sample analysis done on site and in a radius around the park. It was a type of thermobaric bomb, combining heat and pressure into a 5-kiloton explosion. Initial estimates postulated that the Yellowstone detonation was contained mostly underground, due to the vast amount of crust that had turned up around the site, as well as the relatively mild explosion. But it wasn't just the immediate effects of the bomb's blast that had the CDC and this news station worried about: the thin layer of crust beneath Yellowstone had been rattled, causing the cracks and earthquake-like effects Ben had experienced.

Ben set a candy bar and bag of chips down on the counter. He paid in cash and headed back out to the truck.

"Got you some chips," he said through Julie's open window. "Want to drive?"

"No," she said. "I'm enjoying being a passenger for a while." She smiled.

"I'm sure," Ben said. "Getting all that work done, catching up on your reading..."

"Just get in. We need to get to my office before tonight. Did you hear anything from your boss yet? What was his name?" she asked.

"Randolph. He just texted me. I'll call him back now." Ben swung into the lifted truck and started the engine. He slid his phone out of the cup holder in the center console.

The phone rang three times before Randolph picked up. The man sounded exhausted; breathing heavily, his voice raspy. "Ben—that you?"

"Everything okay?"

"No. No, it's not, Ben. There's—well, there's been..." Randolph took a labored breath. "It's Fuller. He's—he's dead."

Ben whispered the news to Julie. Her eyes widened. "I'm sorry," Ben said into the phone. "He was a good man."

"Whatever got to him, it's spreading."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean exactly what I said. It's spreading. Jumping, almost. We can't figure it out. It's fast. Much faster that we would have thought. Those of us who helped Fuller are covered in the rash, and our skin is starting to burn—me, Matheson, Frank, Clemens, everyone who was in that room. We've got it. We're quarantined inside the main building. Matheson passed out not too long ago, but—this is bad."

Ben didn't know what to say. "Listen, Randolph, you're going to be fine. You just—"

"Ben, listen. I didn't text just to keep you in the loop. We're in over our heads here. Two of my guys are already starting to hyperventilate, and there's a doctor in here that's checking everyone out. He pulled me aside an hour ago and told me it's some sort of viral infection, he thinks, and there's nothing he can do for us without quarantine facilities and better supplies.

"I wanted to see how you were doing. I don't know where you were when we brought Fuller in, but you might be safe from it. Did you get out of the park?"

"We did."

"We?"

"I'm with Julie. Juliette Richardson, from the CDC."

"Oh." Randolph paused, taking a deep, raspy breath. "Okay, good. Well, stay away from the park, Ben. I'm not sure what's going to come of this, but if we can keep the contagion isolated long enough, we might be able to get a jump on it and figure out what it is before anyone else..."

"Right. I'm headed to her office now. We're outside of Red Lodge, Montana." Ben stopped for a second, catching himself. "Randolph—George. I—I'm sorry."

"Stop. Don't worry about it. Stay with that CDC gal and help her do what she can to stop it. Oh, and there's one more thing."

"What's that?"

"Fuller was at the lake when that bomb went off. He said he was close enough to feel the heat, and the pressure blast knocked him on his ass. But he wasn't hurt badly, and started walking back to his cabin when he felt the itching start.

"I'm starting to think it might have, uh, dispersed something into the air."

"How can a bomb do that?"

"I don't know. But he was the closest person to that explosion that we've talked to, and he's the first person who's died from this virus—whatever it is—that we know about. Understand?"

"I do, George," Ben said. He considered apologizing again, but thought better of it. What was the point? They were already dead.

He hung up the phone and hammered on the gas pedal, aiming the truck down the long highway.

Francis Valère poked at the food in front him. One of Quebec's finest restaurants and he couldn't get himself to eat.

Did killing Josh really affect him that much?

Of course it had, but it needed to be done.

He wondered if he needed to vomit again. The anxiety had risen immediately after their encounter on the golf course. Valère forcefully pushed the memory away and looked down at the plate in front of him.

Lobster, filet mignon, and the most decadent-looking chocolate mousse he'd ever seen stared back up at him. Not a bite had been taken from any of them. He used his fork to poke around the plate, pushing the meat to one side. He used another utensil to pile the lobster on the steak, forming a wall. It was a castle; a sanctuary now. If only he was small enough to fit inside...

"Are you alright, Valère?"

The voice snapped Valère back to the real world.

"Valère? Are you okay?" A second voice asked.

He was fine, but he needed them to assume he was struggling with his earlier decision. He had to hide the... nervousness. The anxiety that had plagued him since he was young.

Yes, I am okay, but I will play the role for as long as it is needed.

He looked up at his dinner guests sitting across from him. Roland and Emilio. He'd called the meeting on his drive back from the private golf course, suggesting this location for its world-renowned American cuisine, and for its semi-private rooms. One of his partners, Emilio Vasquez, the man now sitting across the table from him on his right, had called ahead and reserved the banquet room.

Even so, they'd chosen the table in the far back corner of the room. The waitress, a young blond woman in her thirties, had been instructed to enter the room only once every fifteen minutes. So far she'd performed well, never interrupting the men as they discussed the day's events.

The man to Valère's left didn't wait for him to respond. "Everything is taken care of?"

Valère nodded and finally spoke. "Oui, everything was accomplished. I do apologize, gentlemen, I seem to have lost my appetite."

Emilio smiled. "It is nothing, Francis. I remember the first time I, well, had to remove a piece from the chessboard. It is never an easy task."

Valère nodded once, accepting his friend's gesture. "Nevertheless, it is time to move to the next phase of our plan. We need to inform the media channels of our intention, and what is at stake."

The first man, Roland, swallowed loudly, trying to vie for their attention. While Valère hadn't touched his meal, Roland was on his second plate of dessert. Rotund, with rosy-red cheeks and jowls that hung nearly to his chest, the man was loud, invasive, rude, and liked by his peers for one thing, and one thing alone: his money.

They looked toward him. "We will wait."

Valère waited for him to explain. Never one to deny himself an opportunity to heighten the drama, Roland instead took a bite of a roll of bread that had somehow escaped earlier destruction. He chewed it no fewer than five times before speaking again. "We will wait to tell the media. We need to let the Yellowstone incident take center stage for a little longer. The news down there—hell, even here—is eating it up, and they're not letting go of it soon." His southern accent grew in strength, no doubt egged on by the three glasses of wine he'd already consumed, and he continued. "The more pressure that builds around this story in the States, the better off we'll be."

"We'll lose our opportunity," Emilio said. Valère nodded.

"No," Roland continued, crumbs falling from the corners of his mouth. "We'll benefit from this timeline. They have no idea what's gone on there, and they won't be able to get anything from the site without losing anyone they send in. We have the advantage of time, and we need to keep it."

Valère frowned. "That wasn't the plan. Why are we waiting? And what are we to do in the meantime?"

The fat man answered immediately, his mouth now full of vanilla pudding. "There are still loose ends to tie up. Something our contact at the CDC has informed me about. There's a woman there, digging around. Nothing major, but she's clever. More importantly, she's persistent. We need to get a jump on it, and make sure she doesn't talk."

The man to Valère's right looked upset. "No, we can't. It's too risky. Besides, the body count is rising, and for what? And what about the coins? I have heard that the students and that professor uncovered some of them."

Valère pitched in. "The coins are beside the point, and there is nothing left of the group that found them. There is no way to tie them back to us. As for the body count, I understand your concern. Believe me, I do. But think of the end result: it is the same."

"Then why the needless deaths? Won't there be enough of that?"

"Yes, my friend," Valère said. "But consider the alternative: we cannot let something leak before we're ready. Remember the rules: we control the means, we control the end. Nothing less, nothing more."

Valère and Roland nodded in unison. Emilio shook his head. "I am with you, but I do not agree. We risk more by trying to tie up these loose ends than we do in just letting them run their course. Can we not let this particular one go?"

"No. It's not a matter of risk, it's a matter of principle," Roland said. "I won't let anything like this slip. It's not in my nature to let things get out of my control."

They all knew that to be true, but the other man was still persistent. "If something happens, and this leaks before we're ready..."

"Let's vote on it." Roland spoke louder, obviously trying to control the conversation. "That was the agreement, was it not?"

"What is the proposition?" Valère asked.

"We take necessary action to prevent any of these externalities from becoming too knowledgeable. We postpone the media's involvement for another day and use that time to rehearse our strategy once again. The extra time will help settle us, and it will help our contingency do what it can to snuff out these little discrepancies."

"So," Valère said, "you suggest we use part of the allotment we've been given for containment and eradication?"

Roland smiled. "I do. What good is a dragon, then, without its fire?"

The two other men considered this. It would only take one more of them to agree with the man's decision before this plan would be enacted. Valère looked at the two men, measuring the addendum to their plan against the alternatives.

He pushed his steak around on the plate once more, toppling the castle and destroying his sanctuary.

“I agree. This is the best option for us at this moment.” He looked up at Roland. “Alert your chosen men and deliver their objective.”

It had been exactly fifteen minutes, and the waitress entered. All three men put on their most unassuming smiles as she hovered over them, refilling their water glasses.

The truck pulled up to the opening of an alley, and Julie told Ben to take a left down the narrow road. Run-down apartments and worn out buildings lined the route on each side as the truck bumped over potholes and through brown puddles.

“Seems like a pretty fancy place you’ve got here,” Ben said.

The truck lurched over a deep pothole and bounced wildly as the suspension tried to compensate. Ben knew that any other vehicle would have suffered damage, but the massive lifted truck handled each bump and dip in stride. The alley curved to the left, and the truck and its two passengers found themselves facing a wide, squat warehouse. Made of metal siding and covered with a shallow steel roof, the warehouse fit in well with its dim surroundings. Ben slowed the vehicle and glided it toward the building, aiming for the small parking lot in front.

“No,” Julie said. “Go around back. Park on the street.” Ben didn’t argue as he pressed the gas pedal and the truck lurched forward. “Most people assume this place is abandoned,” Julie said. “We’re okay with that, so we like to park on the street across from the health center.”

They found a parallel parking spot on the street at the back of the warehouse, and Ben pulled the truck into the space smoothly.

“Wow,” Julie said. “It took me about three weeks to be able to do that.”

“Not bad,” he said. “I’m surprised you can even see over the dash.” He stepped onto the curb and waited for Julie.

She led him around the side of the warehouse and up a short flight of stairs. Her fingers brushed the keypad. She typed six numbers.

123456.

A small LED on the door blinked green, and the locking mechanism clicked.

“123456. Really?” Ben asked.

“Well, we’re not the CIA,” she said.

“Let’s hope not.”

She pushed the handle down, and the door slid open. Ben felt a wave of heat from the building’s interior wash over them as they stepped in.

“Let me check in with Livingston first,” she said. “If you don’t mind waiting by the front door.”

Ben shrugged. “Take your time.”

She wasn’t gone long. When she returned, she motioned for him to join her at the end of the hallway.

“He must be out golfing,” she said. “Let’s see if Stephens is in. He’s my assistant, but we’ve got him working on another case right now. He’ll at least appreciate that I’m checking in.”

This time she headed to the right, and as Ben followed, he realized how small the office complex really was. The hallway intersected with another that ran perpendicular, but then opened into one large workspace. Half a dozen cubicles were sprawled in the middle, with two closed-door offices around the exterior. The fluorescent lighting was either on a dim setting or someone had neglected to replace many of the bulbs.

Julie led him to one of the cubicles and stopped in front of a thin man with his back to them.

“Hey, stranger,” she said. The man spun around in his chair. “Hey, boss. Good to see you. How was the trip? Fishing traps and insects, if I recall correctly?”

“Something else came up, as I’m sure you’ve heard. This is Ben,” she said. “Ben, meet Benjamin Stephens.”

Stephens got up and extended his hand. “Nice name. Good to meet you.”

Tall, wiry, and with black horn-rimmed glasses to match his disheveled hair, the kid looked as if he were maybe sixteen years old and on his way to a comic book convention.

“And what do you do, Mr. Bennett?”

Julie interjected. “He works at Yellowstone. Any news?”

“Not much,” Stephens said. “It’s all over the web now, though.” He stepped to the side, revealing a triple-wide monitor setup full of open tabs and browser windows. Just about every one that Ben could see was filled with reports of the Yellowstone incident and explosion.

CNN, Fox news, Yahoo!, and the Wall Street Journal.

“I’ve been following it since it broke about four hours ago,” he said. “You guys okay?”

“We’re fine,” Julie said. “We could use some coffee. Where’s Livingston?”

Stephens walked over to the wall where an antique coffee pot sat empty. He placed a filter in it and added water as he spoke. “It’s Thursday,” he said, as if that explained everything. “He’s golfing. Listen, there’s more to it than just the Yellowstone incident.”

Julie didn’t understand “What you mean?”

“About an hour ago, a local news station way up in the northern part of Minnesota released a statement regarding some sort of debilitating virus that’s already killed two people. Husband and wife, up near the border. He was out hunting, according to some neighbors, and she was waiting for him at home. Next thing they know, when the neighbors went to check on them, they were both dead.”

Ben listened in silence.

“What makes you think it’s related?” she asked. “Could be just some sort of seasonal fever. It is flu season.”

“The bodies were found with a deep red rash covering their skin, and boils and welts over most of their body as well. The man was out in the snow, facedown. His wife was on the bathroom floor. Doesn’t sound like any flu I ever heard of.”

“That’s awful.” Julie glanced briefly at Ben. “Sounds like he was trying to combat the fever. With cold.”

“Sounds a heck of a lot like what’s going on at the park,” Ben said.

“Rashes, boils, and a heat fever?” Stephen asked. The kid was obviously eager to confirm the details for his files, likely hoping the virus would turn into something significant that might lead to a promotion.

“Yeah.”

“I’m sorry to hear that.”

“Nothing we can do about it now except figure out what the hell this thing is.” Ben said.

“Let’s do it,” Julie said. “Stephens, you know the drill. Anything you find goes through Randy’s system, even though he’s on vacation. Send me what you have curated and ready so far. Skip the duplicate content.”

“Right,” he said. “I’ve already started compiling it, and I’ll send it through SecuNet later this afternoon. Hey—do you think this is going to get big?”

“It’s already big.” Julie said. “Let’s just hope it doesn’t get any bigger. An explosion that was obviously man-made, followed by two instances of whatever this virus thing is at the same time? Even if it’s not an outbreak, it very well could lead to one.”

“What do we do?”

“What we’re trained to do,” Julie said, as though she were a concerned parent, trying to console the hyperactive imagination of her child. “We find the source and stabilize the potent properties, then get it to the higher-ups for processing and propagation. Standard stuff. You know that.”

The coffee machine behind Stephens began gurgling hot water down through the filter. Almost immediately, the smell of coffee filled the office air.

Ben licked his lips, just now realizing that he had driven the bulk of the journey from Yellowstone without so much as a sip of the stuff. “You going to pour that? I could use a cup.”

“Oh, right,” said Stephens, obliging. “Where are you two headed now?”

“Back to my place first,” Julie said, “then we’ll find this guy a hotel,” gesturing to Ben. “Livingston won’t cut his golf game short for anything short of a nuclear attack, but he’ll be expecting all of us to work an all-nighter tonight if this thing blows up.” She winced at her poor choice of words but continued. “Like I said, give me what you have whenever you can and keep it coming. As long as he’s got information coming in, he’ll stay quiet.”

Stephens sank down into his chair. “Sure would be easier around here if you ran this place,” he said almost under his breath.

“I would keep it down if I were you,” Julie said. “Knowing Livingston, I wouldn’t be surprised if he has this place bugged.”

“Right” Stephens said, smiling. “But I’ve seen the budget for this operation—I think we’ll be okay.”

Julie turned and raised her eyebrows, silently asking Ben if there was more to cover. He shrugged. They took their coffees with them on the way out.

The evening sky turned to a bluish haze thanks to a gentle showering of rain and a near-full moon. Livingston clicked the key fob on his keychain.

The Mercedes-Benz was his pride and joy. He'd taken out a second mortgage on his condominium to ride in this kind of style, and he hadn't regretted a moment of it. As a government employee, he understood the irony and the juxtaposition of seeing a man of his status rolling around in a vehicle like this, but that was all the more reason to love it.

He'd always been fond of money. His first word, in fact, was "money," a story he loved sharing at parties and around the office.

Livingston headed over to the squat warehouse building that served as his temporary office. He liked to think of it that way: temporary. Everything in this life was temporary, he knew, but especially dead-end jobs like this one. He'd get to ten years, cash in his tenure play, and move on to a middle management job in a huge corporate bank or investment firm. Companies like that were always looking for management who weren't pushing for more and driving everyone around them to insanity. He'd fit in well at a company that needed an axe-man or a standard-issue pencil-pusher.

He'd also fit in well at a place that enjoyed the same type of indulgences.

Julie, Benjamin, Charles, his executive assistant, Laura—these people didn't understand him. He couldn't care less if they did or not, but he at least expected more respect than he got.

Wasn't a $400,000 luxury car enough to make an impression?

He tapped his six-digit entry code into the keypad, opened the door and breathed in the musty air. God, I hate this place. At the T-intersection in the hallway, he stopped to check his appearance in the long window of the lab room.

Tall, dark, and slightly heavysset, he wasn't a bad-looking man. Years of sedentary work had taken his college swagger and turned it into a waddling gait, but he still had a full head of brownish-blond hair and a proud jaw. He'd played hockey in college, but he'd lost his youthful spryness long ago, as well as a couple of teeth.

He hooked right into his office at the end of the hall.

He dropped his briefcase onto the chair next to the door and hung up his overcoat. He poured himself a double shot of scotch and opened the miniature freezer to find a cube of ice, and—

Perfect. Laura couldn't even remember to do that right.

He slammed the door shut and sat down at his desk. Like his car, the desk was an indulgence even the United States government wouldn't waste money on. He'd spent all $2,000 of his office decoration budget line item as well as another $1,500 of his own money to get this antique mahogany desk, complete with a hidden door beneath the top drawer.

He opened up the laptop in front of him and clicked around for the folder he needed. A prompt nudged him for the password. He entered the string of characters, the folder opened, and Livingston browsed through the list of pictures, sipping on the warm scotch.

Double-clicking on one particular image, Livingston sat up straight in his chair. It was a picture of Julie Richardson, smiling in a two-piece bathing suit at the local branch's company picnic. She was holding a volleyball under one arm and talking to someone off-camera.

He clicked on another. This time Julie was mid-serve, the volleyball inches above her right hand, and her body stretched out to its maximum length.

Livingston didn't know who had taken the pictures, but when Laura had given everyone in the office Dropbox access to them, he'd made sure to save them locally to his hard drive.

Another picture opened—Julie and Benjamin Stephens sitting at a picnic table across from one another. Julie's back was to the camera, and Livingston clicked the magnifying glass to zoom in slightly...

The phone rang.

He checked the caller ID. It was his daughter. He let it ring a second and third time, and waited for it to go to voicemail. He hadn't talked to Rebecca in almost a year, and he knew he'd regret not answering it later.

The answering machine picked up. He groaned as the sound of his own voice interrupted his thoughts. "This is the voicemail box of David Livingston, Director..."

At the beep, his daughter's voice punched through the low-quality phone speaker and into his office. "Daddy? Hey, it's me... Just wanted to say hi. I figured you'd be working late again, but I wasn't sure." The voice paused for a moment. "Listen, call me back sometime. It's been awhile."

Another pause, then the sound of a phone hanging up. Livingston swirled a sip of scotch in his mouth and stared at the conference phone on his desk. He swirled again, swallowed, then took another deep sip.

He squeezed his eyes shut tightly, holding them for a moment as the burn of the low-quality scotch ran down his esophagus. "I miss you too, honey," he said to no one.

He took another drink. Nine years since her mother had walked out. Nine years since she'd slept with that rat-bastard from the softball team..

He snapped his eyes open. Was he still alone in here? Yes. Good.

He sniffed, trying to shake off the feeling of delirium caused by the whiskey. Get it together, Livingston. You're better than this. He slammed the rest of the whiskey and set the glass on the far corner of his desk.

He needed a way to keep tabs on Julie without raising a flag in the data center. He thought for a moment, then sat back up and clicked away from the picture.

The image of Julie at the park bench disappeared, replaced by a browser window displaying the SecuNet homepage, an intranet server with a user interface for the company's secure communications and file storage.

He almost laughed out loud. Though SecuNet was secure enough for the CDC's standards, he knew all too well how unsecured the shitty browser was. A perfect example of "good enough for government work," the browser had been thoroughly proven unsafe by just about every web development and tech blog on the net, but it was the mandatory browser installed on every government computer, and it was a serious pain in the ass to circumvent it.

The page had a few options available, and he clicked on one toward the bottom in the first column. The site redirected him to a secure page, and he typed his username and password in the respective boxes and was soon faced with a new dialog box:

"Email Redirect: Choose Originator"

Being considered "executive" at a government organization did have its perks, even if it didn't pay well. Livingston entered Julie's email address, then added a second Originator email address entry for Benjamin Stephens. In the "Enter Forwarding Address" box, he entered his own email account and hit "submit."

The dialog box disappeared, and Livingston closed the browser window. The redirect would be "silent," meaning it would run invisibly in the background—neither of his employees would know they were being tracked via email—and it would be relatively untraceable. Only a seasoned IT veteran specifically looking for the redirect would be able to find it.

He stood, refilled his scotch, and sat back down at the computer. He smiled at his own ingenuity and went back to the folder with the pictures from the company picnic.

Dr. Diana Torres peered through the compound microscope, certain that whatever it was, she hadn't seen it before. The structure was different. This was not a normal virus. First, it appeared to have an integumentary system that protected the rest of the microscopic body from external elements and diseases. What she assumed was the capsid was studded with odd bumps and scrapes, as if the virus itself was infected. Secondly, while she recognized the lipid and protein structures that made up the bulk of the body, she couldn't quite place their configuration.

Finally, the entire inner cavity of each individual viral body was made up of the traditional nucleocapsid and capsomeres, but also other bodies she didn't recognize that seemed to be crammed in as well. While the overall structure was standard for a type of herpesvirus, it didn't fit any of the eight strains modern science was aware of.

She took another measurement and checked her notes.

"Varicella Zoster strain; assumption smaller form. Standard nucleocapsid and lipid envelopes; odd protein buildup differs from traditional strains."

"Most spherical virions 80 to 90 nm in diameter; largest observed 93 nm, smallest observed 73 nm."

The results were accurate; her measurements weren't off. Her assistant, Charlie Furmann, had reserved the lab space at 5:30 that evening and she'd been inside until now. She checked her watch.

7:30 PM.

The act of checking her watch suddenly triggered her body to announce that it was exhausted. She yawned and stretched her arms. Standing, she shut the light from the microscope on the long lab table in order to prevent any unwanted reactions in the sample. She slipped on her lab coat once again—essentially her entry key to the myriad of rooms, labs, and closets spread around the building. She rarely wore it inside her office, but it was considered bad form to walk around the campus without it.

It would also get her into the cafeteria on the main level; her chosen destination. The nature of the work at the research facility, as well as the personality types of those doing it, meant that the facility had 24/7 cafeteria access. The scientists and research assistants that populated these offices weren't governed by traditional 9-to-5 jobs, nor did they care for culturally accepted norms about when to sleep and when to work.

Torres stepped off the elevator on the main level. The halls were dimly lit, but the open doors to the cafeteria spilled light out into the corridor, beckoning. Another involuntary response in her brain reacted to the smell of food, hunger pangs running up and down her insides.

Surprised to find the cafeteria empty, she pulled out a small plastic bin of hummus and crackers and a 20-ounce bottle of Pepsi from the open-faced refrigerator and tapped her identification card on the credit card terminal. After the terminal beeped, she clipped the badge back to her lab coat pocket and walked back out into the hallway when she felt her cell phone buzz in her jeans pocket. She juggled the Pepsi around and reached for the phone. It was a text from Charlie.

"Where are you? Wanted to check in with this model."

She frowned, wondering why he had taken the time to send her a text message when he could have just waited for her to return. She sent a quick reply.

"Went to cafeteria. On my way back. What's up?"

She didn't wait for a response; instead, she stepped into the elevator and pressed the number for her floor. She found Charlie, his back to her, hunched over the microscope.

“What’s going on?” she asked.

Charlie jumped and turned. “What is this, Diana? Is this the same sample that was sent over from earlier?”

“Yes...” Dr. Torres replied.

“Did they say what it was?”

“What do you mean? They sent over a standard laboratory-required specimen size for examination and classification. If they knew what it was already, they wouldn’t have sent it.”

Charlie nodded. “I guess I’m just confused...”

“About what?”

“Well, I don’t understand why you would have mounted both samples at once.”

Now it was Dr. Torres’ turn to be confused. “Both? What do you mean?”

Charlie plugged in the external monitor display into the microscope’s output line, displaying the image from the microscope on a 60-inch display hanging on the wall behind them. “Look,” he said, using a wireless computer mouse to draw a circle around one of the spherical objects on the screen.

“This is your virus, right? The ‘Varicella Zoster’ strain, or whatever?”

She nodded.

“Well, when you continue to zoom in, you’ll see the standard components—nucleocapsid, lipids, different protein amalgamations, etcetera.”

Dr. Torres nodded again, trying to hurry him along.

“But then if you keep increasing the magnification...” he paused to reset the microscope’s magnification wheels, “you’ll notice that the interior structure of the virion is completely crammed with foreign bodies.”

“Right—but that doesn’t mean they always were. The virus certainly doesn’t look like it wants them in there, does it? They’re all bulging at the seams, thanks to the spirillum pushing everything around.”

Dr. Torres looked up sharply. “Spirillum? What are you talking about?”

He zoomed in further. As the microscopic components of the viral organism came into focus, she saw the unmistakable spiraling of one of the common bacterial shapes. The twisted object grew as Charlie pushed the microscope to its limits; the screen suddenly appearing grainy and slightly out of focus.

“Oh, my God,” she whispered.

“You didn’t see this before?” Charlie asked.

She shook her head.

“So, then, I’m guessing there weren’t two different samples?”

Both scientists were speechless as they stared at the TV monitor. The fuzzy black and white image was unmistakable.

“No. No, Charlie. There weren’t,” she said. “We’re looking at some sort of herpesvirus that contains a living, breathing, bacterial infection around it as well.”

“So it’s a virally infected bacteria?”

“No... it seems that they have some sort of symbiotic relationship with one another. I can’t really explain it, but they both seem to need the other to exist.”

“But that’s impossible,” Charlie said. “There’s no way for the virions to provide livable conditions for the bacteria, and the capsid would need to have access to the world around it. And a bacterial cell is so much larger than —”

“I know,” Dr. Torres said. “But we’re dealing with something completely different here; something outside the realm of what either of us has studied before.” As she spoke and stared at the screen in front of her, Dr. Torres grew increasingly confident that what she was looking at was in fact, exactly what she had said it was.

Impossible or not, what they were looking at was a virus, fully functioning and living inside of and supporting a bacterial cell.

“How is that possible? It’s against the laws of nature.”

Diana Torres looked up at Charlie. “It’s possible because I don’t think nature had anything to do with it.”

Six Months Ago

Dr. Malcolm Fischer gasped. Sucking in a huge breath of air, he tried to swallow. It was painful; somehow, something wasn't right. He tried to look down, but had a hard time moving his head.

Weird.

He tried moving his hands instead. Nothing.

His fingers, maybe?

Nope.

Malcolm felt glued down, lying on his back. At least it was comfortable.

What do I have control over, then? he wondered.

He opened his eyes, blinking once, twice. He moved his eyeballs around; at least he could see.

He tried to make sense of his surroundings. Bright lights, fluorescent. The kind used in offices and commercial buildings. Whitish walls, some sort of sterile color.

That was it.

Okay, what does that mean? Malcolm tried moving his body, his limbs—anything. Nothing would give. It was as if he were—

Am I paralyzed?

He considered it a moment. He didn't remember taking a fall, or any type of accident. Actually, now that he thought harder, he couldn't remember anything. There was...

A helicopter.

Oh, God.

The memory roared back into Malcolm's mind in a flash. The students...

He remembered being forced into the chopper at gunpoint, being pushed down into a seat and strapped in, then the gentle upward motion of the pilot's expert takeoff. They ascended only a few feet off the ground.

The gun.

The horrid sound of hundreds of miniature explosions rocking the gunman back and forth on the side-mounted machine gun.

The one he'd fired into the students. His students.

Intense pain seized him, but he couldn't tell if it was merely psychological. He closed his eyes again, breathing. Still, his hands and legs and arms wouldn't move; everything, was frozen in place.

Where am I?

Just then, he heard a beeping sound. It had grown louder—or had he just now noticed it?

He pushed his eyelids apart and tried to look for the source of the sound. As his eyes opened, the beeping grew more intense; quicker.

He heard footsteps. Running.

“...Patient experiencing some sort of shock. Possible reaction...”

Voices drifted in and out. They were in the room.

Who were ‘they?’

Malcolm was growing agitated. He wanted answers, and he wanted to be able to move.

“He’s awake!”

More footsteps.

Now he could hear multiple people—three?—moving around his bed.

I'm in a hospital. It must be. I'm paralyzed.

“He’s no longer comatose?” one voice asked.

“No, he’s got his eyes open. The new cocktail they sent down must have done more than just keep his muscles from atrophying.”

The voices were hurried; frantic.

“Okay, let’s get some Codeine into him; he’s probably going to be a little rough around the edges.”

“Got it. We’re keeping him up?”

“No, no. That’s just to hold him over until he goes under again and his musculature calms down. It shouldn’t be long.”

Malcolm heard a popping sound, followed by the smell of something bitter. Some sort of chemical. A bag of liquid suddenly passed directly in front of his face. He saw a strange assortment of letters and numbers, then a few letters that his brain computed as words.

Global. D-something Global.

“Ok, right. Medesinsk is going to be here tomorrow morning, and we need to get him back down.”

Another pop, followed by a sloshing sound, reached Malcolm’s ears.

He tried to speak, but he wasn’t sure he had control of his vocal cords. It didn’t matter anyway, as he realized he couldn’t even open his mouth.

A small hand pulled his chin down then placed a hand over his throat gently, another hand reaching for his shoulder. He felt two — three — hands on him, and then saw someone placing a needle into his IV line.

“It won’t matter —I’ve already reported that we’ve achieved success.”

“Yes, I know, I read the report,” the first voice said. “Still, they won’t want to see him awake. They’ll need him under for the final round of testing, so there’s no reason to let him become too aware.”

Malcolm tried to piece things together. He was paralyzed. Waking from a coma, anyway. His body felt... good. Weakened, but usable.

“How’d he wake up?” the second voice asked. It was a woman.

“It’s a standard reaction to the chemical; almost like developing an immunity. Most subjects awaken after four to six months. He made it to five and a half.”

“Can we up the dosage?”

“No, a higher dosage will likely kill him. Keep the mg count steady; just track it closer. Any increase in heart rate or changes in sleep cycles, have someone come in and check it out.”

“Got it.”

Malcolm heard them finish up, then leave the room. He was left to his own thoughts and the slow, methodical beeping noise.

He suddenly felt the pricking of thousands of nerve endings flaring up in his neck and head, as if needles just below the surface of his skin were trying to poke their way out. It was painful, but it meant something else.

He could move his head.

It was the same feeling he’d had when a body part fell asleep. He could feel the line of nerves crawling up and around his face. Slowly, painfully, he tried to move the outer muscles in his face—cheeks, lips, ears. He thought he could feel the slightest of motions.

His face continued to “wake up.” He’d have preferred the traditional feeling of being awake, rather than the feeling of millions of ants crawling over his skin, but he didn’t argue. He moved his mouth.

Using an unbelievable amount of energy, he tried lifting his head. Yes! It was moving. His head was lifting up from the bed, slowly, surely...

It fell. He could hold it no longer. His head fell back into the pillow.

With a deep exhalation, he recovered and tried again. A little farther this time.

Now he could see his body covered in a sheet, his feet poking out from the bottom. Beyond that, there was the door to the room he was stuck inside. It too was that skeletal white color.

Again, his head fell back into the pillow.

This is good, he told himself. I'm getting stronger each time.

As Malcolm tried for the third time, however, he realized they'd injected him with something. No doubt multiple things.

He was probably only minutes away from passing out again.

I need to get out of here.

He lay back for a few extra seconds, summoning energy, then tried once more to lift his head.

He wanted to scream. Pain seared through his skull, worse than any migraine he'd ever experienced. Don't. Stop. He chanted to himself over and over again. Don't. Stop.

Through sheer will, he forced his neck to articulate, and glanced down at the maze of tubes that were inserted into different parts of his body. He had no idea what they did or what human bodily function they were intended to perform. Some appeared empty—maybe those were waste tubes?

Others had clear liquids running through them, and a few had deep crimson liquid coursing through them.

He didn't have much choice. He could still only move his head, and he didn't have the luxury to wait around for more of his body to wake up. He looked down and to his right, noticing a small clear tube that had been inserted into the soft skin underneath his upper arm, just below his shoulder.

If I can reach that...

He struggled again, forcing his head forward and down. A little more...

His lips were on the tube now, but there was no way his teeth were going to reach that far. He needed a little more. Millimeters more.

Come on, Malcolm. He willed himself to push forward again. The pain was unbearable, his face flushed.

Just a few millimeters more. It had to be.

Don't. Stop.

He exhaled the last of the air that was in his lungs, and his face inched forward just enough. He felt the cold steel of the IV line's end hit his mouth, and he clamped down. He didn't care what he yanked out, as long as he disconnected something.

Yes!

He bit down as hard as he could, tugging on the tube with his teeth. His shoulder throbbed, but he didn't stop. Until—his head fell back. He waited a moment, letting his body regroup. Finally, he lifted his tongue up and felt for his prize.

It was there, cold steel and clear plastic tubing. It bumped up against his mouth as it fell, and he was ecstatic.

He'd done it.

He could see the plastic tube out of the corner of his eye, disappearing off the side of the bed and around the room somewhere, its contents no longer able to enter Malcolm's body.

He smiled—or what he thought was a smile—and closed his eyes again.

Only a matter of time...

He waited for the drug's effects to wear off; waited for the prickling line of needles to expand their reach, overtaking his body with the beautiful gift of motion. Any moment now, and he'd be able to move again.

What was that?

He felt something, or rather, understood something. It wasn't a feeling as much as a sort of knowing. His body was crashing, falling again. He felt the line of needles receding, going back down into the surface of his body.

No!

Just a little more time.

But it was not to be. Malcolm's body was going to sleep again. He could do nothing but lay, helpless, as his eyes closed out the world around him. He could hear his breathing, feel the rising and falling of his chest, but it was odd, as if it were not his own body that was controlling it.

To be sure, he tried lifting his head again. Nothing.

He couldn't cry out, couldn't make a sound. His mind was shutting down, sending him to sleep once again, and he couldn't think...

“Anything yet?” Dr. Torres said, her frustration really starting to fizz as she waited on Charlie to return with the results of their latest test on the sample.

“Not yet,” Charlie muttered under his breath. They’d put the sample through a battering ram of tests—the standard lab-required composition, attributes, and plausible generation tests, as well as a few others Dr. Torres ordered hours ago. Charlie was still finishing up the last of these—a test to determine any possible effects external forces might have on the sample.

Charlie returned to the table carrying a Petri dish with a swab of the sample inside. Transferring the sample from an observation plate to the dish had made prescribing tests so much easier.

“I don’t understand why you won’t just send an email to Levels 4 and 8,” Charlie said as he set the dish down on the table in front of her. “What can possibly go wrong by getting more people involved?”

Dr. Torres grabbed the dish. “Come on, Charlie, you know the rules. This one isn’t company sanctioned, so there’s no way we’re doing that.”

“Yeah, but don’t they encourage us to take on private jobs?”

“They do, but only if they can maintain the standpoint of plausible deniability for any of their scientists’ clients’ work,” she answered.

“Seems like a backwards way of doing business, in my opinion.”

Dr. Torres sighed. “Well, in my opinion, it seems like a good way for them to stay out of trouble. You and I both know that there’s enough non-sanctioned work going on here that’s ended in all but disaster. One of those leaks, and we’ve got incriminating evidence on our hands. For all of us.” Dr. Torres gave Charlie a look that was supposed to mean the conversation was over, but Charlie continued.

“I get it. The company won’t take credit for anything unless it ends in dollar signs for them.”

“Welcome to America, Charlie.”

Charlie let the insult slide. He’d been raised in Idaho and had lived in just about every small town there was. Hope, Irwin, Twin Falls, and his parents now lived in Mud Lake. Now that he worked in Twin Falls, it seemed like Charlie was going to spend the rest of his life inside the borders of his home state.

He’d grown up like most normal American boys. Street hockey in the summer, pond hockey in the winter, with other random sports thrown in during the off-season. He was of average build, not tall but not short either, making him an ideal candidate to fill out a team roster for just about any sport he tried out for.

Much to his father’s dismay, however, sports were not Charlie’s strong suit. Before football practice and after school during the fall semesters, Charlie spent his time in the science club at his local high school. What his parents thought—and hoped—would be a just a phase, turned out to be a career choice for the young man. He enrolled in night classes at the local university while only a junior in high school, convincing his parents that it would be good for his future. While it was certainly useful later in life, the truth of the matter was that Charlie was actually just interested in studying robotics, something his local high school did not have a program for.

He ditched the robotics studies after his first semester in college, opting instead to study microbiology. After graduating summa cum laude, he was quickly tapped for an internship at a local clinical research firm, then a pharmaceutical company, and finally as an assistant to Dr. Torres.

Charlie enjoyed the job; Dr. Torres was a good boss, and she treated him appropriately—hard enough that he was challenged to continue learning, but friendly enough that he knew she still cared about his education. It was because of this relationship, and Dr. Torres’ leadership, that he was able to succeed in the role while gaining worldly experience at the firm. As even-keeled and mild-tempered as he was, however, it was on nights like these that Charlie wished he were working somewhere else.

Dr. Torres just wouldn’t stop. They’d been at it for over six hours straight now, with no end in sight. He enjoyed discovering and learning just like any other scientist, but he also enjoyed sleep. Furthermore, he could already feel himself growing hungry again.

“Hey, chief, it’s getting late,” Charlie said. He hated to play that card, but he was long past his ability to be effective.

“Huh?” Dr. Torres said softly as she stared down at the sample and the associated report. “Oh, right, I guess it is getting a little late.”

She looked at her watch.

10:57 PM.

She pushed her glasses back onto her nose and straightened the pile of papers in front of her as she stood up from the table. “Are you heading out?”

Charlie had worked with Dr. Torres long enough to know what the question really meant. Had enough? Can’t handle the grind of real science?

He had also worked with her long enough to know how to handle the situation. “Yeah, exactly.” He laughed. “We’ve done every test in the book and all the reports are there in front of you. I’m happy to stay and read them to you, but I’m pretty sure you’ve got it covered on your own.” He half-smiled from the left side of his mouth. It was enough to tell Dr. Torres that he was seriously tired, but not serious enough to tell her that he didn’t care. “Plus, you know that I’m only an email away.”

She nodded. “Let me finish up here, and I’ll be on my way out, too.”

• • • •

WHEN CHARLIE LEFT, Dr. Torres found herself alone in the sprawling state-of-the-art laboratory. Just another specimen amid the gadgets, tools, and instruments that she could only guess were used by others in the building.

The laboratory she worked for had been around for over forty years, and from stories she’d heard, it had been successful from day one. Operating in the black each and every fiscal year. They could afford sparing no expense for their top-notch scientists. Dr. Torres was no exception and she knew it.

There were scientists working here she had never met, who had been published in every month of every trade journal she subscribed to. There were also scientists who had spoken at every conference she had ever heard of. These were her peers, and nothing less was expected of her too.

Dr. Torres enjoyed her position at the company. While she was certainly not the most tenured, nor the most esteemed scientist in the building, she knew that the only way she could improve was by challenging herself. World-renowned or not, working somewhere where you were only a number among many other numbers caused you to strive for more than you thought you were capable of. Most days, Dr. Torres felt this way. It was the reason she had come this far in her career, and it was the reason she was not slowing down yet.

She grabbed a stack of papers and the small Petri dish from the table and carried them down the hall to her office. Charlie had affixed a lid on the Petri dish and taped it shut, complete with a label signifying what the sample contained.

Unknown s.248—sample 248.

The viral/bacterial infection that she'd been sent to study.

Back in her office, she placed the sample on the far wall next to her personal microscope kit and took the report to her desk. She placed it on the stack of papers that she had scattered all over her desk, careful not to cause any to fall to the floor. She moved a few Styrofoam cups and plastic takeout trays to the trash next to her chair and sat down in front of her computer.

Her email was still front and center on the screen. She clicked on the last message she'd received and replied.

>To: Harvey 'Ben' Bennett <hbennett1419@yahoo.com>

>From: Diana Torres <diana.torres@focalresearch.org>

>Subject: Re:

>Body: I think we've figured part of this out. Report attached; p-protected. Use my bdate with his first name.

Miss you. Are you ok?

She read through the email to make sure it included the attachment and the information he would need. She was still surprised by the recipient, though not as overwhelmed as she had been when she'd first heard from him.

It must be more than ten years, she thought. She couldn't actually remember the last time they'd spoken on the phone. Still, it was amazing to hear from him. These weren't exactly the best of circumstances, but she knew that if he was contacting her, it must be something important.

Just then, she heard footsteps coming down the hallway. Was Charlie coming back?

No, she thought, Charlie was wearing sneakers all day. These footsteps were clearly made by either a heeled woman's shoe or a man's dress shoe. Her ears perked up as she listened to the sound, now growing louder.

It lacked the purposeful quickness of a woman in high heels, and it seemed heavier. Who was visiting her?

She knew for a fact that no one else on her floor was currently in. After three or four trips to and from the lab on the fourth level, she could tell in a quick glance up and down the hallway that there were no other lights on besides her own.

The footsteps continued toward her open door. She stood up from the computer, forgetting about the email for a moment and turning toward the door.

Just as she turned, a man entered the space inside the doorway.

"Dr. Torres?" The man asked. His voice raspy; not quite that of a lifelong smoker, but one that seemed tired or weary with age.

She nodded.

The man stepped in and took a long, slow glance around.

"Can I help you?" Dr. Torres asked.

The man's eyebrows abruptly lifted, as if he had forgotten that he shared the room with another occupant. "Ah, yes. Dr. Torres, it's great to meet you." He extended his right hand forward. She reluctantly reached for it and allowed him to grasp it. His hand completely enveloped her own, though he did not squeeze tightly. "I'm here from the CDC, which, as you know, is currently operating in a crisis mode."

"Well, I—I didn't exactly know that," Dr. Torres said, still caught off guard. "Do you mean the explosion at Yellowstone?" Charlie had filled her in about the day's events when he came in this morning, though she still hadn't checked for an update.

The man smiled. He retracted his hand and placed it in his pants pocket.
“Yes, in fact, that is exactly why I’m here.”

"What's your name?" she asked.

Rather than answer her question, the man simply put both hands in his pockets. "We're following this thing as well; trying to stay ahead of it."

"Do you know what this thing even is?" Dr. Torres asked. She sat back down in her leather desk chair and steepled her fingers thoughtfully.

"We're guessing it's some sort of bacteriophage; T4, Coliphage, something like that." He motioned to a chair. She nodded once, and the man pulled it out and sat across from her. "But the lab results haven't come in yet. That's why I'm here. I wanted to know if you'd figured anything out yet."

Dr. Torres couldn't even begin to fathom how he knew she'd been working on it.

The man smiled. "The package that was delivered. A colleague of yours received it and sent it to you, but was prudent enough to document your research and testing phases as well."

Charlie, she thought. She swallowed her anger, remembering that her assistant had only been doing his job. All of the lab techs and assistants at the company had been instructed to keep a record of any and all testing done on-site on any materials that could be considered "potential threats." While she'd wanted to keep their work quiet until she could prepare a final report, she hadn't considered asking Charlie to bypass this security step.

"It's okay, Dr. Torres. This type of thing happens all the time. You don't want to make any mistakes in the research phases and potentially damage your career. Even if you had kept this one hidden from us, I'm not here to reprimand you."

Dr. Torres nodded. "May I ask why you are here?"

"Information," the man said without hesitation. "Like I said, we need to keep ahead of this one, especially if it's some sort of bacter—"

"It's not."

"I beg your pardon?"

"It's not a bacteriophage," Dr. Torres said. "Actually, it's exactly the opposite."

"What do you mean? The symptoms we're seeing in patients suggests that it is some sort of bacterial-viral combination."

"Well, you're right about that," Dr. Torres said, turning around in her chair and opening a file on her computer. "It's bacterial and viral, but not in the sense of a bacteriophage. Rather than a virus attacking and piercing a bacteria, we've recognized the exact opposite. A bacterial infection within a larger virus."

The man stood up and began pacing the office. Dr. Torres chose to continue.

"It's a standard form of a spirillum bacteria, only crammed inside the shell of another body. I've never seen anything like it before, really. It's quite ama—"

The man spun on his heel. "And who else has been working on this project with you?" he asked.

"J—just my assistant, Charlie Furmann."

"I see. And do you have the sample here with you?"

Dr. Torres fidgeted in her chair, suddenly feeling uncomfortable. Her eyes flicked to the test tube on the table, then quickly back to the man. "I'm sorry—can I ask again why you're here?"

The man had already begun moving to the table. He reached down and grabbed the small glass vial just as Dr. Torres stood up from the chair.

Dr. Torres stumbled backwards, stunned. Tears welled in her eyes. She gasped. The man continued moving, retrieving a pair of latex gloves from his pocket. In one fluid motion, he stretched them on over his thick fingers and walked to the small lab sink.

“What are you doing?” Dr. Torres asked as she regained her balance. “Wait!”

The man threw the vial containing the sample down into the sink. It shattered with a loud crash, launching glass into the air. The man was already moving toward the open door. He reached for the handle and stepped out into the hallway.

Dr. Torres watched him reach into his coat pocket and remove another vial, this one containing a clear liquid. He held the tube up in front of her.

“Dr. Torres. I am sorry it came to this. However, rest assured your research and time will not go to waste.” He threw the sample down. The hard floor obliterated the glass vial, and the clear liquid bounced upward and onto Dr. Torres’ feet. Before she could react, the man slammed the door shut, and Dr. Torres heard the clicking sound of his shoes retreating down the empty hall.

She ran to the door and tried to open it, fumbling and slipping over the now-wet floor. Finally, the handle gave, and she nearly fell into the hallway. Her breathing labored heavily, but she pushed on down the hallway regardless, following the sound of the man’s shoes. Just as she reached the elevator, it dinged.

The doors slid open. A shocked Charlie Furmann stared back at her. “Dr. Torres—are you okay?”

Her eyes were wide and wild. She backed away from the elevator, putting space between herself and Charlie.

“I—I...” she stammered. “Yes, I’m... I’m fine. Go home, and I’ll call you tomorrow,” she said. She turned away from Charlie and the open doors of the elevator, and stumbled to the stairs at the end of the hallway.

Juliette Richardson and Harvey Bennett drove to the other side of town leaving Julie's office behind. Julie behind the wheel. Ben cooped up in the passenger seat. Just as they passed the city limits and left the metropolitan area, the high-rise apartments and multi-floor office buildings slowly changed into larger, flatter buildings and individual houses on suburban streets.

"I moved out here after living in the big city for ten years," Julie said.

"Big city?"

"San Francisco. I was right in the middle of everything," she said. "It was great at first, but it wears on you after a while."

"Yeah, I bet," Ben said.

Julie laughed. "Well, sure, I guess any city's big to someone like you."

Ben thought about that for a moment before responding. "I didn't always live out in the middle of nowhere," he said. Before Julie could interject, he added, "But I guess I always wanted to."

They drove on, passing yet another neighborhood filled with one- and two-story houses painted either brown, tan, or beige. White picket fences separated them from one another, and perfectly manicured lawns signaled a strict HOA governed the neighborhood.

"So the park is a great job for you," Julie said.

Ben nodded, looking out the window. For the first time during their trip, he was only a passenger in the vehicle. Julie had offered to drive from the office to her apartment.

"It is," Ben said. "I guess, I mean it was."

"It's going to be fine," Julie said, trying to convince herself more than anyone else. "We'll figure this out."

After passing the neighborhood stretching over the road on their right and left, Julie turned onto a smaller country road, and Ben could see the houses and white fences receding in the distance. Fields and farms now replaced the neighborhoods on each side of the road.

"I thought you lived in an apartment," Ben said, noticing the herd of cows.

"I do," she answered, "but it's just the upstairs room of a converted barn. I rent from the family that owns it."

While she spoke, she took the next turn down a gravel road. Up ahead, a crop of tall pines surrounded a house and a few out buildings, among them a large barn which didn't look like it had been kept up for many years.

"It looks worse on the outside," Julie explained apologetically. "They stopped using it as a barn in the '70s, but converted it back in 2003. It's completely renovated inside, and has everything I need."

Ben shrugged. "You don't owe me an explanation."

Julie pulled into the long driveway that led to the farmhouse and barn, and the truck lurched over potholes strewn over the single lane. "It's quiet and it helps me relax."

Ben's phone buzzed in his pocket. When he reached for it, he stared down at the number for a moment before answering. "Hey. H—How's it going?"

A few moments later, "What? Are you okay—how long ago?" He listened again. "Where are you now?"

Julie looked over at her passenger as the truck slid onto a gravel driveway in front of the barn. She shut off the engine and waited for Ben to finish his conversation.

“Don’t be ridiculous. I’m coming—I’ll leave now.” He hung up and stuffed the phone back in his pocket.

“Where are we going now?” Julie asked.

“We’re not. You’ve got work to do here.”

“Like hell I’m not.”

“I have to get to Twin Falls.”

“We’re in this together, remember?”

He didn’t actually remember when they’d decided they were in this together, but he let it go.

“Listen, that was Diana Torres, the person I sent that sample to. Something’s gone wrong.”

Julie remained quiet.

“She’s infected, and I need to get to her...” his voice trailed off.

To her credit, Julie didn’t intrude by asking more questions. “Ben, I’m sorry. I’m going with you. Let me get some stuff from the house, and then we’ll get to the airport.”

“No, I don’t fly.”

“Your friend’s in trouble, and you won’t fly?”

“I—I can’t.”

“Don’t be a baby.”

“I don’t need this right now, okay? Besides, it’s less than a day’s drive from here. Plus, it doesn’t sound like there’s much I can do about it.”

Julie looked like she wanted to ask, in that case, why it mattered that they go visit her. Again, she was quiet.

“That’s fine, you can come. Hurry up in there—we need to get on the road.”

Six Months Ago

Dr. Malcolm Fischer gasped again.
I'm alive.

His eyes were open, blinking, as if trying to clear a veil from in front of them. The room was the same, but it was darker now. The ceiling lights were off, but some light source from outside was trickling in under the door.

He lifted his head to see. Yes, that's where it's coming from.

And then: I just lifted my head.

Malcolm wondered if he was dreaming. How do we check that? Then he remembered. He lifted his right hand and pinched his left.

He could feel it.

There were no pins and needles this time, no probing behind his skin. He was awake, and fully conscious. He blinked a few more times and tried to sit up.

He let out a groan as his right arm pushed off the bed. He looked down at the location of the pain—his shoulder. There was a large purplish welt where he'd ripped out the needle with his teeth, and he could see that he hadn't done a great job: the small metal needle was still resting on his skin, the end slightly poking into his arm.

He reached with his left hand and gently slid it back. It came out easily, leaving a spot of blood behind.

He swung his legs off the table, waiting for the slightest noise.

No beeping. No instruments in the hospital room seemed to be trying to alert their masters that their subject had awoken.

He put his feet on the ground and tried to stand up. Malcolm's body collapsed immediately. He laid prone on the floor for a moment before trying to stand up again.

How long have I been here? He tried to remember. The last time he'd woken up, he'd been asleep for six months. Not enough time to have completely atrophied. Plus, didn't they say they injected something that would help my musculature?

He forced himself to stand again. Shaky, but he was balanced. He focused on the tubes that were mainlining into his body. He noticed a reader on his finger—wasn't this the one that tracked his heart rate?

If he removed everything, he knew the machine would start beeping again, sending the alarm that his heart had stopped.

What to do?

He couldn't start switching off the machines, either. They were obviously going to be tracking the data, if the machines suddenly went offline one after another, they'd be in here in seconds.

He looked around. Nothing to use as a weapon, really, unless he was James Bond.

And he wasn't James Bond.

Besides, what could he do? There were at least three doctors around, and possibly the beasts who'd brought him in. Three- or more-on-one didn't sound like good odds.

He did have the element of surprise, though. Unless there was a silent alarm emanating from one of the machines, they—whoever they were—had no idea he was awake.

What had they said? “The chemical usually renders the patient comatose for around four to six months” or something like that?

He thought about it for a moment. They had also said Medesinsk was coming tomorrow morning. If they had come, they surely would have noticed the giant welt on his arm, and the misplaced needle that should have been sticking properly out of it.

That meant he had only been asleep for a few hours.

He'd done it.

Malcolm did a small fist pump, more to test the motion of his right arm than anything. He was awake, but he still needed to get out of there, and fast.

At least before tomorrow morning. Hopefully long gone by tomorrow morning.

Again, though: what could he do?

He took another look around the room. The many computers and instruments hooked up to him wouldn't all alert anyone if he started fiddling with them. The ones that would, he could only guess at. Then he noticed the computer connected to one of his fingers. It was on a rolling cart, and he couldn't see it plugged into anything.

He hobbled over to it, using the bedrail as a support. Sure enough, it was a standalone machine. Battery powered.

He looked at the screen. It looked like a heart rate monitor, from what he could tell. There were numbers flashing on every inch of the screen, but the majority of it was a continuous graph, with peak appearing every second on the right side.

Well, what do I have to lose?

He started taking the rest of the trackers and monitor tubes off his body. Disgusting.

Next were the needles poking through his chest, arms, and legs. Finally, the clip-like things that were connected to his fingers.

All except the heart-rate monitor.

He hoped that was the only one that would alert his captors. Why wouldn't it be? They expected him to be completely comatose, after all, not an alert, mobile prisoner.

He checked the wheels on the cart and began pushing it toward the door. Malcolm checked the handle, found it unlocked, and pushed the door open. He hobbled behind the cart, careful to not let the tube fall to the floor for him to trip on.

It looked like a hospital wing, except one with no one else in it. It was a little creepy, actually, he realized. Not a soul was anywhere to be seen, and the only lights that were on were the emergency lights that ran up and down the hall between the brighter fluorescents.

He wheeled the cart to the end of the hallway. Unlike what he'd expected of a “real” hospital, there was no T-intersection here. The hallway ended in what seemed like a janitor's closet in front of him. He checked the door. Locked.

He needed a plan, and fast. He couldn't exactly wheel the heart monitor computer out and down the front steps, but he had no idea how to disable it without sounding an alarm somewhere. If he shut it off, he was almost positive an alarm somewhere in the building—no doubt where the nightshift was still working—would sound, and his jig would be up.

Unless...

He thought for a moment. It might work...

But where?

He hobbled along, faster now, turning the cart around and pointing it back the way he came. He pushed past his old room, noticed the door open, and pulled it closed. Can't be too careful.

He continued to the center of the hallway and found his T-intersection. He was in the top of the “T,” and this stretch of hallway in front of him was short—likely just a bridge or covered walkway to another section of the hospital. He entered it, noticing the floor curve up in a gentle arc.

He walked slightly uphill until he reached the center of the bridge, then stopped in front of a door. Electrical 2-A.

He was on the second floor, and this was the electrical closet for building A, which was either the one he’d just come from or the one he was about to enter. He hoped he’d chosen correctly as he tried the door. This one was unlocked, and he pushed the cart inside.

A light switch on the wall next to the door flicked on a single overhead bulb, enough to light the space in a dim yellow bath of light. Finding nothing at first besides a few mop buckets, some brooms and dust pans, and a shelf of cleaning supplies, he was about to leave. When on the right-hand wall he found an electrical panel, the kind that housed the fuses and breakers, The whole unit was easily as tall as he was.

Okay, he thought. Let’s get to work. Whatever he tried, he couldn’t disable the monitor from signaling that he’d been tampering with it. But he could, however, try to disable the system on the other end, so that it wouldn’t receive the signal.

He opened the panel and looked inside. Standard stuff—each of the breakers was labeled with cryptic text that would only make sense to the electrician who’d installed them.

46-49B + J34.

It was a good thing he didn’t need to understand any of it. Was there a master anywhere?

There. At the very top of the panel, right at eye level, was a large breaker that reached almost across the entire width of the panel. He pulled it as hard as he could and felt the pop as the breaker handle hit the other side of the panel. He thought he could hear a deeper pop from somewhere outside the room.

The light in the closet stayed on.

He looked around nervously. What if it hadn’t worked?

He made up his mind. He reached up and started flipping off each of the individual breakers, one at a time, as fast as he could. If the master hadn’t actually turned anything off, this certainly would.

He reached the bottom of the left side and started in on the right, this time working bottom to top. He got faster as he went, now using the palm of his right hand to flick sections off all at once. Somewhere in the middle, he hit the power breaker for the closet he was in, and darkness fell around him. He waited for his eyes to adjust, but they didn’t. It was dark. Even the greenish glow of the heart rate monitor was useless.

Malcolm reached out again and felt for the rest of the breakers, using his left hand as a guide until he’d turned off the remainder of the switches. Satisfied, he looked down at the monitor waiting patiently next to him, like a pet. He ripped the clip from his finger, and a beeping sound immediately echoed from the machine. He spun the cart around, looking for a power switch.

There, on the top of the back panel, he found it. A standard I/O computer button. He pressed it, letting out a deep breath as the machine died. For good measure, he tried to hide it behind the mops and buckets that stood in a corner. It wasn’t spy-worthy, but it at least wouldn’t be immediately noticeable.

Now, he had to get out of the building. He assumed doctors and other night staff would be around soon, checking in on him until the backup generators turned on. He guessed he had less than a minute to get out.

Voices called out in the hallway.

“Yeah, I’ll check it out. Probably a brownout or something.”

“Okay, holler if you need anything.”

Malcolm waited until footsteps raced past the closed closet door. Just as they receded up and over the bridge-like walkway, he opened the door and looked out. A balding man jogged down the other side, into the hallway to the room where Malcolm had slept for the past six months. The man was only seconds away from realizing that his patient was no longer there.

Malcolm grabbed a mop, stepped out into the hallway and ran, trying to disconnect the mop head from its handle as he went. As he reached the entrance to the other building, the mop head fell off.

He burst through the open doors, only pausing to get his bearings. The electricity was out here, too—a good sign, at least until the generators kicked on.

“Anything?” he heard another man ask. The sound came from just ahead, around the corner.

Malcolm heard the clicking sound of a walkie-talkie, then the notoriously poor sound quality of another voice from the other end.

“Nothing. Lights off down here, too.” A pause, then heavy breathing. “Checking in on 0-10-7... what the...” The voice continued breathing, then it shouted. “He’s not here! 0-10-7-5-4 is gone! I repeat—”

Malcolm had heard enough. He had no idea if there was one man around the corner or twenty, but he took his chances. He flung himself around the end of the hallway, relieved to not have the burden of the heart rate monitor cart.

A lone young man in his thirties had his back to Malcolm behind a circular desk situated in the middle of an open atrium. This man was not a doctor, Malcolm realized. He was wearing a navy blue suit and black belt.

Rent-a-cop.

Malcolm kept running. Through the darkened atrium, shafts of moonlight piercing the darkness through skylight leaving a odd silvery tint on the plants, and marble-art work with its sharp light, like a modernist’s interpretation of film noir.—Shadows cut through everything crisscrossing the pristine lobby.

Malcolm ran past a glass elevator and caught a glimpse of a sign glued to the side of the elevator shaft.

Floor 2.

Drache Global—something clicked in Malcolm’s mind. That had been the label on the bag.

By now, Malcolm was sure the man could hear him coming, but he didn’t turn around. Instead, the rent-a-cop flicked the button on the walkie-talkie and asked again, “Hey, you hear me? What’s up?”

The doctor tried to respond, but the connection either cut in and out or the doctor was inept at the use of walkie-talkies. The voice flickered. “—Patient... need assistance...” The cop tried to respond again, finally realizing that there were loud footsteps behind him.

It didn’t matter. Malcolm was now within range of the cop, and he brought the mop handle up and over his head. He felt the burn in his right shoulder as his muscles voiced their discomfort, but he ignored it.

Malcolm felt a rage building inside him. Six months. My team; my students. Their faces flashed through his mind as the mop handle crashed down on the cop’s head just as he spun around.

The handle connected with the man’s temple, and a look of shock appeared on both the men’s faces. The act of violence was unlike Malcolm, but he followed through. The mop handle broke in half, but the damage had been done.

The cop's head crunched sideways, and he fell from the stool he was on. He managed a quick gurgle of pain, but was silent as he fell to the marble floor. Malcolm dropped his half of the mop handle.

Without checking to see if the man was alive, Malcolm turned to the elevator. There has to be...

There. Stairs. Off to the left of the elevator shaft, he saw a small open entrance.

He went down the stairs two at a time, his body at once excited for the movement it was now allowed as well as struggling to provide it. He reached the bottom and found himself in a similar lobby.

Floor 1.

Drache Global.

No one was at the desk, but he didn't take any chances. He found a door to the left of the stairs that was labeled L1-Garage, and pushed it open.

A sharp snap of air hit him in the face. Six months since I've felt fresh air, he realized. He'd been asleep for just about all of that time, but his body knew. He drew in a deep breath and ran outside.

The parking garage sloped upward, and he now felt the strain on his muscles as he reached freedom. Ahead, he saw cars zipping by. The building must be on a busy road.

He ran, daring not look back. Closer.

The edge of the street was tantalizingly close.

Closer.

"Hey!"

He heard the doctor's voice yelling from behind. "Stop!"

Closer.

He reached the exit of the parking garage, thankful that the gate was an unmanned, automated machine. He dodged around it and continued running, forcing his legs to move faster.

Closer.

He'd made it. He reached the street, not pausing for traffic. Cars honked and swerved as they sizzled by, but Malcolm didn't notice.

He reached the other side, then kept running. Up another busy street.

On his left, cars raced past him. He held up a hand, waving—pleading.

Finally a car stopped. Malcolm slowed to a walk as the car's window rolled down.

"Need a lift?"

The voice from inside was that of a middle-aged woman, raspy from a lifetime of smoking. Her hair was tousled, but she wore a huge grin and unlocked the passenger door.

"P—please." He didn't know what else to say. "I... I don't know where to go."

The woman smiled larger. "I'd guess that. I'd say we get you some clothes, first."

Humiliation surged through Malcolm as he looked down at his body.

He was utterly naked.

For what seemed like the hundredth time in two days, Ben drove the truck while Julie snoozed in the passenger seat. As he pulled into the driveway that he'd known so well for so many years, he realized his hands were shaking. He raised one of them to his face, resting it near his eye, as if he were expecting to wipe away a tear. He parked the truck just in front of the closed garage door and stepped out.

Julie rose, yawning, as she opened the passenger door and stretched on the front lawn, she and the truck casting long late-afternoon shadows on the house.

"Is this her place?" she asked.

Ben was already moving toward the front door.

"So how do you know her, anyway?"

It was the second time she'd asked the question during their time together, and the second time he'd dodged it. "She moved here from St. Louis," He said, as though that answered anything.

He knocked but didn't wait for a response. The door was unlocked. He stepped inside, Julie following on behind. The house was dim, with low ceilings that sported 1970's style texture.

"Hello?" he called out.

A woman's muffled voice came from somewhere at the back of the house, so the pair walked down the narrow hallway until they came to a closed bedroom. Ben took a deep breath before knocking again.

"Stay away from the bed," the woman said when he opened the door. "The contagion is extremely potent."

Ben rushed forward, coming to his knees at the edge of the bed. He reached for the woman's hand and held it in his own.

"You never were a good listener, Harvey Bennet." She nodded her head but smiled at the same time. "How are you?"

Ben swallowed, trying to find his voice. "I—I'm good, Mom. What's going on?"

"Some sort of viral-bacterial combination, not unlike a bacteriophage," she said, glancing over at the doorway. "Who's your friend?"

—"This is Julie. She's with the CDC."

Julie's eyes widened as realization swept over her. She, too, approached the bed.

"Stay close to the door," Ben warned. "We can't have you getting infected with this stuff."

"It's okay," Dr. Torres said. "I can't explain it yet, but I believe it's safe... under some circumstances. Something about the dosing, though I haven't yet cracked it."

"Still," Ben said. "Not worth the risk."

"Dr. Torres? It's... nice to meet you." Julie waved awkwardly from the corner of the bedroom. She stared at the large man beside the bed, doing all he could to not burst into tears.

"Mom, what happened? Was it the sample?" And then, just now realizing that there was bruise across her face, "Why aren't you in a hospital?"

"Slow down, Harvey. No, nothing like that. And you two both know a hospital can't do anything about this. It wasn't your sample." She took two breaths, each sharp and staggered. "I mean, it was the same strain, I believe, though not the sample you sent." Again, a breath. "There was a man. Said he was with the CDC too." She looked through pained eyes toward Julie. "Which, I now know, was a lie."

Ben stood and dropped his mother's hand. "Did he do this to you?"

Tears squeezed from his eyes, and Ben felt his face flush with anger. His eyes narrowed. "Mom. Who was it?" The words were clipped, on edge.

She shook her head again. "I don't know. I didn't recognize him. But that's why I think you're safe. It's... it was meant for me, and me only. He walked into my office and emptied your sample in the lab sink, then... then..." Her eyelids fluttered. She took another sharp breath and tried to continue. Ben suddenly noticed how red her skin appeared. He examined her neck and arms and found. They were covered in the same shiny, bubbling rash he'd seen back at Yellowstone.

"He threw it at me. A test tube full of something much more lethal." She took a breath again. "Listen, Harvey, I don't have much time."

"Stop it."

"No, listen. You know this by now but listen anyway. There's more to this than just a freak virus. The explosion, men pretending to be from the CDC—"

"Mom, we're going to—"

"Harvey, knock it off." The words were more intense than they had been, and Ben fell silent. "I don't care about any of that. I can't. I've got hours to live. You listen to me, okay?"

He nodded.

"Harvey, I love you. It's been over ten years since I've even heard from you, and you need to know that I love you."

A single tear fell down his right cheek. He couldn't bear to let Julie see him cry, so he kept his eyes glued to the bed and didn't wipe the tear away.

"I love you, and I never stopped loving you. After your—your father..."

"I love you too, okay?" He felt his voice shaking. Was it noticeable? He whispered. "I do. I'm sorry."

His mother's eyes were closed now, and she was trying to breathe peacefully.

"I'm sorry for everything."

He stood up from the bed and left the room.

Julie caught up to him in the hallway and followed him into the dining room, where he collapsed on an old leather sofa.

"—I don't know what to say..." she stammered.

Ben stared blankly at the flat-screen television that sat on a stand in the corner of the room.

"Ben," Julie said. She waited for him to look at her. "Ben, I know how this sounds, okay? But if we stay here, we might die."

"I'm staying here," he insisted. "You heard what she said. She thinks it's safe, that the stuff she was —"

"Ben! There's no way she could know that for sure. Listen to me. You know what's about to happen. If you're not infected yet, you soon will be. And then I will be. It's only a matter of time."

Ben knew she was right, but he didn't move from the sofa.

Julie finally came around the couch and sat next to him. "Can we at least go somewhere we can talk, okay? Somewhere we can figure this out together?"

She reached over and placed her hand on his.

This time, he nodded.

“Anything else?” The frazzled server gazed down at the couple in the booth with disdain. Juliette Richardson shook her head. “We’re good, thanks.” The server was gone before she could finish.

“I thought diners were supposed to have great service,” Julie said to Ben over two plates of waffles and cups of coffee.

He shrugged, taking a huge bite of syrup-covered waffle. “They’re known for their cheap food, I guess. Maybe good service is extra.”

The diner sat just outside of town on the state highway they’d taken into Twin Falls. It was called The Family Diner, and Ben and Julie—the only two guests—weren’t sure yet whether the play on words was meant to be taken seriously or not. So far, they assumed it was meant as satire. There wasn’t a “family”—or even another person, besides their waitress—in sight.

“At least the food’s good,” Julie said, cramming almost half a waffle into her mouth. She guzzled coffee to wash it down, and only then noticed Ben staring at her. “What?”

He grinned. “As hard as this is...” he stopped.

“Yeah?”

“No, just... as hard as this is... I’m glad you’re here.”

Julie swallowed. “Me too. I mean, I can’t imagine... I’m sorry, Ben.” She took another bite of waffle, and this time added a forkful of sausage to it. “By the way, what’s up with ‘Harvey?’”

“That’s my name,” Ben said.

“Well, yeah, I picked up on that,” she said. “But you don’t go by that anymore. Why?”

He shrugged again. “I don’t know. Dropped it after high school. Seemed like sort of a nerdy name, I guess. Ben’s easier.”

Julie considered this. “I like Harvey.”

Ben stared blankly at her.

“I like Ben too,” she added.

He looked down again at his plate, comparing his plate to Julie’s. She can really put it away, he thought. He was almost embarrassed by how little he’d eaten.

“Hey, I have another question. Did Diana—I mean, your mom—did she have any assistants or anything? Anyone we could contact?”

“Always working, huh?” Ben’s response was blunt.

“Oh my God, no, Ben... I’m sorry —”

He shook his head. “It’s fine. Really. I’m shaken up, but this is good. Let’s keep moving; figure out what’s next.” He thought for a moment, using the lull in the conversation to take a deep sip of jet-black coffee. He winced.

“Too hot?” she asked.

“Too crappy.” He swallowed, feigning choking. “Where’d you find this place, anyway?”

“Google Maps. Never steered me wrong so far.”

“Bout time to start using something else. Anyway, uh, I have no idea about her work. I’ve been in the park for over a decade. Man, it’s been a long time.”

A solemn look came over his eyes.

“Ben, it’s okay. If you need —”

“No, I’m fine. Yeah, I can’t think of anything. Hell, I don’t even really know what she does. I remember she worked for a chemical company when I was a kid, but she took this job not too long ago.”

“You spoke with her?”

“No, she’d email me quite a bit. I never responded more than once or twice, I think. I kept the email account open, though. Is there any way to figure out who she was working with?”

“I tried looking it up in the company directory, but they’re pretty good about keeping their work and employees protected. I might be able to get some help from my tech guy, though.” She took a sip of coffee, this time not using it to wash down her meal. From the expression on her face, she could clearly taste it better this time around. “Wow, you weren’t kidding. This is rough.”

Ben smiled, and he caught her gaze. He could almost feel her examining him, exploring the leathery-brown contours of a face that had rarely gone a day without being exposed to the sun and elements.

“Hey,” she said quickly. “I have a question.”

“Shoot.”

“Why’d you leave?”

She didn’t need to explain it; he knew what she meant. It was a fair question, but also the forbidden one, and she didn’t dance around it or build it up.

He took a deep breath. No one asks me that, he thought. It had been years since he could even remember talking about it.

A light flashed in front of the diner. Another visitor had parked and was getting out of their vehicle.

Without realizing it, Ben was suddenly engrossed in the newcomer. He watched as the rectangular, boxy headlights flicked off—it was an older sedan—and the driver stepped out. Tall, thin, can’t see what they’re wearing. No passenger.

The visitor walked quickly, heading directly to the entrance. The man—Ben could now see him clearly—pulled the door open and walked inside.

“Good evening, go ahead and sit anywhere,” the monotone voice of their waitress called from somewhere in the back of the restaurant.

Julie realized Ben wasn’t paying attention to their conversation and turned to see what he was looking at. The man continued walking toward them. Ben locked eyes with him and began to stand up.

As he did, the man sped up. Ben’s heart raced. The man was now only fifteen feet from their table and closing the distance fast. Who is this guy?

He watched the man reach into the pocket of his coat. Ben saw out of the corner of his eye another flash of lights, then another. Two more cars. He reached down and grabbed the closest thing he could find.

A salt shaker.

From the man’s pocket, a gun. Small, compact. .380. Enough to do some serious damage from this range.

Ben didn’t wait. He jumped to the side, throwing the salt shaker. It struck the gunman in the forehead, knocking him backwards a few steps. He dropped the gun, instinctively raising his hands to protect his head from further attack.

“Julie! Run!” Ben called out. He’d landed beneath some bar stools set alongside the counter of the diner. He struggled to his feet, feeling the painful throbbing in his hip.

Julie was on her feet, running toward the door, but the man was chasing after her. He overtook her at the diner's second exit, grabbing her waist with one arm. His other hand weaved up and around her left underarm. Julie was helpless, her arm completely pinned away from her body. She tried madly to swing it at him, but the man dodged the blows with ease.

Ben rushed forward, aiming for the attacker's lower back. Just before Ben collided with him, the man turned, exposing Julie's belly to Ben's tackle.

Ben was moving too fast to stop, and the three of them fell backwards out the diner's doors. They collapsed in a heap on the concrete sidewalk, but their attacker was on his feet almost immediately. He pulled Ben up and shoved him up against the tall glass window. Ben held onto the man's wrist, trying to wiggle free, but the man landed a solid punch to his gut.

He felt the wind get knocked out of him, and he caught a glimpse of Julie running toward the man before he was released and fell to the sidewalk. The man anticipated the attack, grabbing Julie's hands just as they fell toward his head. He twisted them sharply, and Ben heard her abrupt cry of pain. The man twisted harder, hugging her body close to his and moving his hands to her neck.

She was turned around, her back to his, so her punches had little effect. She danced around, trying to shove her heel onto the top of his foot, but the man was prepared for this line of defense as well.

The man's grip on Julie's neck grew tighter.

Ben blinked a few times, sitting up against the wall.

Get up. Come on, move.

He willed his body to work. His hip wasn't broken, but it was obviously badly bruised.

He heard Julie gasping for breath, her arms and legs flailing wildly.

Get. Up.

He forced his lungs to accept a deep breath of air. It was painful, as if someone was stabbing him in the chest.

Not as painful as getting choked to death, he thought.

He stood up. Julie's raspy voice broke through the gasps. "H—Help," she said.

He ran forward. His footsteps were heavy.

The man could tell he was coming. He was expecting it.

As Ben got within a foot of the man's back, an elbow caught him directly in the nose. Searing pain shot up his face, tears coming to his eyes. Ben stumbled backwards, nearly losing his balance again.

Just then he heard a shout. The lights from the other two vehicles became clearer.

Truckers.

Two men ran toward the trio, one of them shouting. "Hey! What the hell's going on over here?" One of the truckers saw the man choking Julie. He ran toward them, and the attacker released her neck. She sucked in cold air, falling to her knees on the rocky parking lot ground. Tears fell from her eyes.

The attacker was too late to protect himself. The first trucker had reached him and landed a blow across his face. He followed the attacker backwards as he struggled to keep his balance, but before he righted himself the larger truck driver punched him in the side. He doubled over, and the man kned him as hard as he could.

The second truck driver had reached Julie, and he bent down to help her. Ben crawled forward, trying to regain his balance.

He watched as their attacker jumped to his feet and began to run away. He ran toward a field, chased briefly by the larger truck driver. When it was clear to the trucker that he was being outrun, he turned back to the others.

“You okay?” he asked Ben. Ben was on his feet now, swaying, still trying to catch his breath.

“I’m good. I need to get back to my truck; see if I can find him.”

“You won’t find him,” the second trucker said. “He’s fast, and he’s probably got a ride somewhere nearby. Best call the cops and let them handle it from here.”

Ben was seething. He walked over to Julie, letting his arm fall to her side. He pulled her close to him, wanting to protect her. It’s too late for that.

She was sobbing, but she looked at him. “Are you okay?”

He realized what he must look like. He could feel blood draining from his nose, and he was having a hard time catching his breath. “I’m fine. What about you?”

She swallowed hard. “It hurts, but I’m okay.” She turned to look at the two truck drivers. “I owe you my life. Thank you.”

“Don’t mention it. Isn’t my first bar fight, but…” he looked at the now-empty diner. “I guess it is the first one I’ve broken up in a place like this. Why don’t you two get inside, get something to eat?”

She shook her head. “We’re fine, really. Thank you, both of you.”

The first trucker spoke up. “You two need anything? A phone, a ride?” He paused. “A drink?”

Ben nodded. It was time to ditch their truck. “We could use a ride.”

He knew the attacker—or someone—would be back. Whoever it was, they were going to be looking for them. They had to get away from there, and fast.

“What do you mean, you failed?” Valère asked.

He tried to steady his voice, to make it sound stronger than it was, for the other two men.

Roland and Emilio. Both were standing behind him, their meeting with Valère interrupted by this fourth man.

“I am deeply sorry, Mr. Valère,” the man said. “I encountered them in a small diner, and when I —”

“Them?”

“Yes. The target was with another man. Large, built, but not much of a fighter. I was able to —”

“Then why is the target still alive?” Roland asked. His voice boomed out over Valère’s shoulder, causing Valère to shudder. If only I had his commanding tone, he thought.

The man standing in front of him wasn’t sure what to say. “I—I think...”

“And that is the problem,” Emilio said. “You think, when we have simply asked you to act.”

Emilio placed a hand on Valère’s shoulder and leaned down, whispering.

“Your contingency is failing us, Mr. Valère. I suggest a prompt resolution to this matter.”

Valère shook again and clasped his hands. His nervousness had been with him his entire life. It began as a slight tick in his boyhood years, growing into a noticeable oddity by his teens. As a young adult, Valère had learned to control it, forcing it down to a subtle, hardly noticeable level that didn’t manifest itself physically.

But it was still there.

Valère was constantly reminded of his weakness. The sweating, the shuddering, the teeth-grinding. All of it was a form of nervousness, a simple reaction to excitement.

Whether positive or not, any exciting stimuli in Valère’s life caused him to relive these moments, waiting until they passed. He dared not speak too loudly, or grow agitated, for fear that his weakness would once again wield its power over him.

He nodded. “Yes,” he said, softly. “I do agree.”

The man’s eyes widened. “Wh—what is... what can I do...”

Valère held up a hand, and the man stopped.

“Please do not talk. You have already upset my partners, and I fear you will only upset me if you continue.”

“B—but I can make it up. I swear. You don’t need to kill me —”

“Enough!” Valère yelled, slamming his fist on the table in front of him. He felt the nervousness growing within him, quickly superseded by the calming sensation of knowing he’d even startled his partners standing behind him.

He saw in his periphery each man take a step back.

The man—the failure—in front of him swallowed.

“Now,” Valère continued. “What makes you think I am going to have you killed?”

The man turned his head slightly.

“No, my friend. I don’t reward complete and utter failure with a swift and merciful death. It really isn’t my style, anyway. The messiness of it all, it... well, it disturbs me.

“I have a better idea. SARA?”

“Yes, Monsieur Valère?”

The man’s eyebrows arched when he heard the voice coming from the walls around him.

“I would like you to transport Mr. Olsen here to our facility in Brazil.”

“Of course, Monsieur Valère. Is there a certain destination you have in mind?”

Valère nodded. “I do. Please alert NARATech of a possible test candidate currently preparing for stasis.”

“Stasis?” Roland asked.

The man in front of them closed his eyes. “Please, Mr. Val —”

Valère shook his head, but SARA took over. “Mr. Olsen, please refrain from additional comment. Your scheduled stasis prep will begin in exactly fifteen minutes. I have alerted security, and they are en route for escort. Please follow the green arrows I will illuminate on the walls.”

The man, resigned, left the room and slumped down the hall.

“Valère, what is stasis?” Roland asked again. “Emilio—what are you not telling me?”

Valère turned to his partners, scrutinizing the fat man that stood at his left. “Mr. Jefferson, I believe I have waited much too long to reassert my authority over this little project. Please —”

“Reassert your authority?” Roland Jefferson yelled. “What are you talking about, Valère? This project was given to us by —”

“No, Roland,” Emilio said. “That’s where you’re wrong. This project was given to Mr. Valère and myself, and we brought you along because of your... assets, which we found valuable.” Emilio turned to Valère to continue.

“Yes, Roland,” Valère said. “We are excited to say that the Company no longer requires the use of these assets. Our investments elsewhere have performed admirably, and your lack of leadership so far on this project has informed our decision.”

“Your... decision?” Roland Jefferson’s enormous frame had moved out from behind Valère’s desk, and he stood, looming, in front of him. “You can’t... you can’t do this!”

“Your investments are in nothing but corporate bonds and shady real estate, Mr. Jefferson. Most of it is drying up as we speak, thanks to the work of our investments. Your companies are our companies, and your prized real estate holdings around the globe are now being scuttled or revamped, to make way for our next phase.”

“This is an outrage!” he roared, fuming.

“It is, Roland. It truly is. For you. For us—for the Company—it is a natural progression. We all eventually outlive our usefulness, and need to be redirected.”

“I will not be spoken to like a child! I have not outlived my usefulness!”

“Correct,” Valère said. “SARA, are you still with us?”

“Always, sir.”

“Perfect. Please arrange for Mr. Jefferson to join our friend Mr. Olsen in stasis.”

“Absolutely, Monsieur Valère. And shall I arrange for his delivery to Brazil as well?”

“No, actually,” Valère said. He watched Jefferson’s eyes grow wide. “Please arrange for Roland’s delivery to our holdings in Antarctica. He will preempt our facilities there, but our stasis research has proven to be quite effective in long-term storage.”

“Very well, Monsieur Valère. Mr. Jefferson, your scheduled stasis prep will begin in exactly fifteen minutes. I have alerted security and they are en route for escort. Please follow the green arrows...”

Crack! The sound of the rifle shot pierced the air and reverberated as it bounced over the calm, open water. Randall Brown sat up taller on the picnic table and offered advice.

“Good shot. You hit it, but it wasn’t centered.”

His wife grinned next to him, laughing at Randy’s instruction.

His teenage son nodded, reloading the .22 caliber Remington rifle. “At least I hit it.”

Randy smiled. “True. If it had been alive, it wouldn’t be anymore.” He took in the peaceful scene, watching the small pieces of clay disc disappear beneath the surface of the lake and the sunlight diffract over the gentle waves.

Way better than being at the office. He checked his watch. Late afternoon. He would normally be checking the server temperatures and running any final diagnostic tests, then getting ready to head home. Randall Brown had worked for the CDC for four years, moving to the Montana offices only a year ago. He’d had a brief stint in tech startups before realizing that he was considered a “dinosaur” in that world—at a mere forty-six years old. His world of IBM, mainframes, networking, and accreditations had been replaced in the past decade or so by a new world, one of sleek laptops, blogging, cloud platforms, and agile development. It wasn’t that he wasn’t needed, or useful; it was just that he wasn’t appreciated.

No one seemed to know, or care, what kind of experience and knowledge he could provide as an IT consultant, network administrator, or general “tech guy.” At the two startups he’d worked for, he was usually no more than an afterthought.

At first he didn’t care. The jobs always paid well, thanks to a mix of youthful overconfidence and arrogant market predictions, but Randy knew better. He’d worked a year at a startup that was trying to bring simple image manipulation to tablets and mobile devices, only to see the writing on the wall a few months into it. The company had a long list of deep-pocketed investors who knew next to nothing about the computing world, and they had an equally impressive amount of VC funding. The trouble was, the product wasn’t profitable. Worse, the college-age owners of the company didn’t seem to care about the future of the company’s product line.

Randy jumped ship to another company, finding many of the same problems and none of the solutions. After realizing his career would be all but over if he stayed on board, he decided to find a more stable position.

That position was found in the CDC’s Threat Assessment division, as the Director of IT for a new department. It was a laid back job, never causing too much stress or overwhelming work duties. Keep email running, dust off the servers that provided intranet support through their SecuNet portal, and keep the coffee in the main office hot.

But while the job itself was decent, it was the boss that he couldn’t stand. David Livingston. The man was more callous, abrasive, and downright rude than anyone he’d ever met.

Crack! Another rifle shot snapped Randy back to the real world. Vacation, one week, a friend’s lake house. There was nothing in the past year Randy had looked forward to more than this moment.

He saw his son smiling back at him, and only then noticed the crumbling bits of clay skeet falling into the lake. All equal sizes, all the same relative shape.

“Wow—did you get it?” he asked.

His son nodded. “Right in the center.”

Randy stood from the picnic table and clapped his hands, rotating them around in a large circle. A “round of applause.” His wife groaned. A “dad joke,” but, well, he was a dad.

“Seriously, dad?” his son asked. “You’re still using that joke?”

“What? It’s still funny.”

“It was never funny.”

“Hey,” Randy said, walking toward the edge of the lake where his son stood holding the rifle. “You know what would be funny? If I took that thing from you and out-shot you with it.”

The gun was a gift for Drew, something he’d wanted for quite some time. The three of them, Randy, his wife, Amanda, and Drew, had taken the trip to the lake house for a short vacation, and to celebrate Drew’s seventeenth birthday.

“You’re welcome to try, old man,” Drew said. He handed the rifle to Randy. Randy eyed the weapon, admiring the craftsmanship and build quality. Before he could lift it to his shoulder, his cell phone rang.

“Your phone works out here?” his wife asked. “Looks like it’s work.” She grabbed the phone from the table and walked it over to her husband.

Randy saw the number and shrugged. “Government’s paying for it, so I guess they’re using the best network.” The number came up on the screen just below the name of the caller. Juliette Richardson. Well, at least it wasn’t Livingston.

He poked at the phone to answer it. “Hello?” he handed the rifle back to Drew and walked back toward the table.

“Randy—hey, it’s Julie. Sorry, I know you’re on vacation. You have a minute?”

“Of course, what’s up?” Unlike David Livingston, everyone liked Julie. She was fun, pretty, and adventurous, never waiting around for the red tape.

“Thanks. Listen, I don’t know if you’ve been keeping up with the news, but something’s going to break, and I’m trying to stay in front of it.”

Randy hadn’t been keeping up with the news, which was part of the family covenant of their vacation. As he was constantly bombarded by technology, industry news, and media during his job, his wife had made him promise to give it up for the week they were out of town. No TV, no internet, no computer. Just them, the lake, and peace and quiet for a week.

He glanced over at her now. She did not have a happy expression on her face, knowing that Randy’s cellphone breached their covenant. He shrugged apologetically.

“Uh, yeah, okay. What’s the deal?” The CDC often had something they were “trying to stay in front of,” so it wasn’t out of the ordinary for Julie to be asking for a work-related favor. But the fact that she’d called his cell directly seemed odd to Randy.

And her hurried tone of voice.

“Sorry, I can’t explain it all right now. Can you get me access to a computer?”

“Sure—is it connected?” Randy didn’t hesitate to answer. Even though it was an explicit part of his job description, he considered it to be “hacking” when he needed to gain access to another CDC machine. And he loved hacking.

“Uh, yeah, it is, but it’s not onsite.”

“What do you mean? It has SecuNet access, right?”

“No, sorry, I mean, it’s connected, like to the internet, but...”

“Aw, geez, Julie, you’re asking me to hack an outside machine?” Randy asked.

“Not hack, just... gain access. I need to get some information on—”

“That’s called hacking, Julie. That’s literally the definition of hacking.”

Randy heard his wife let out an exasperated sigh from next to him on the picnic table bench. He looked at her, covering the phone's microphone with his palm. "Sorry... I... it's just something real quick."

"Hello? Randy? Hey, come on. This is a serious request. Can you help me out?"

Randy didn't know what to say. "Julie, this is... you can't. It's not legal, and I could get fired for even trying. Why can't Livingston put in a formal seizure of data request?"

"You know how long those take, Randy. And come on. Livingston? I haven't even seen him for the better part of a week."

It was true. Their boss had been enjoying a series of "work related" excursions, including golf, four-hour lunches, and strip clubs. How he managed to expense everything to the company's accounting division was beyond Randy's comprehension.

"Okay, fine. I assume you're on to something big, but I still can't—"

"It's a matter of national security, Randy."

"Seriously?" Randy almost laughed out loud. "You're going to try to guilt me into this with that line?"

"Randy, turn on the news. You can't honestly be that out of touch. After the bomb at Yellowstone, there was—"

"What? A bomb at Yellowstone?"

"Yes, Randy, a bomb. And it released something into the air. Some sort of virus that's killing everyone who came into the area close to the explosion. It's contagious, highly deadly, and we need to find out if anyone has anything on it."

Randy stared out at the water in shock. Never, in his year of employment with the CDC, had Julie ever seemed so... frantic. She was always calm, pleasant, and laid back, albeit in a hard-driving, get-it-done sort of way.

He wasn't sure how to respond. "I... I guess..."

"Okay, great. I need it quick, too. Can you get it, Randy?" She paused. "Randy? You there?"

Crack! Drew fired the rifle again, missing the skeet shot. He immediately prepared a second shot and launched the disc from the skeet launcher next to him.

"Sorry, yeah, I was thinking. I don't know, I have my laptop but I'm—"

"Randy, I'm sorry, but there's no time. I can't wait on this. Really. Please."

Crack!

"Randy, what is that? God, it sounds like a gun."

"It is—sorry, it's fine. My son's skeet shooting—" he took the phone off his ear. "Drew! Knock it off for a second, alright? I'm on the phone!"

"Randy, you know I wouldn't ask you this unless it was serious. Trust me." Julie paused on the other end of the line.

Randy sighed. "I know. I do trust you. It's a pretty big deal, that's all. But I get it. Yeah, I think I can do it. Give me until tomorrow afternoon—"

"I have less than a day, from what I can tell. I need to get going on this before it's a media craze, and I'm waiting on more information from you now."

"Okay, okay. I can do it. I need to head into town, find a coffee shop." He thought for a moment. "It's not going to be secure, but what are you looking for? I'll email it over."

"Randy, thank you. I owe you one. Her name is Diana Torres. We need to track down anyone this person was working for, or with. I'll send you an email with her name, email address, and the company she was with. She's the only person we know who was studying the virus, and she might know what it is. Anything she found out will be on her computer, at that company."

Randy thought about the next question he was about to ask. Did he really want to know the answer? "Why can't you just ask her yourself?"

Julie anticipated the question and responded immediately. "We tried. She died a few hours ago, and we think her company was behind it. They sent someone to find us, too. Randy—I need this information, and I need it now."

Randy confirmed, but Julie had hung up already. Seconds after he disconnected and left the call, the phone dinged with a new email from her.

He turned off the phone's screen and placed it in his pocket, standing up from the picnic table again. "Sorry, babe, I, uh..." she glared at him. "I think I'm going to need to break the rules for a few hours."

The hotel was, thankfully, better appointed than The Family Diner. Situated in the suburbs of Twin Falls, Idaho, it had been purchased from an out-of-business chain and updated to reflect a lodge-like style. The street sign, front entrance, and two connected buildings that made up the hotel had a consistent wood paneled exterior.

The eighteen-wheeler and its three passengers pulled into the parking lot half an hour after the incident at the diner.

Ben shook the driver's hand before he slid down the steps of the truck. He offered the man a tip, reaching for his wallet. Their driver refused, instead asking the pair if they needed money or any more help.

"You've been more than kind," Julie answered. The man was a career truck driver, working for two main shipping companies and picking up other driving jobs in between. He had a family in Rhode Island, two kids and a wife, and was working his last year before he retired early. Ben appreciated him for another reason: he talked a lot and got along with Julie well. Their conversation had so little empty space that Ben spent most of the ride staring out the passenger window.

"Listen, here's my card," the trucker said, handing Julie a beat-up business card that he'd pulled from somewhere under the dashboard. "If there's anything else you need, you let me know."

"We will, thanks, Joe," Julie responded. She smiled and shook the man's hand, thanking him again as she hopped out of the truck. She stood next to Ben as the truck pulled away.

"Ready?"

He nodded and stepped up to the grand entrance of the lodge hotel.

"I still can't believe what happened. You sure you're okay?"

Ben nodded again. "Just tired. You?"

"Yeah, me too," she replied.

They reached the front atrium, where a young woman welcomed them from behind a chandelier-lit log desk. Everything looked warm and comforting, no doubt built and designed with those exact goals in mind.

"Do you two have a reservation?" the woman asked.

"We do," Ben replied. "I called earlier today to set it up. Sorry, we're a little late."

"No problem," the woman smiled as she grabbed the ID from Ben's outstretched hand. "Did you run into some weather? There were some thunderstorms in the area earlier."

Ben frowned, considering what to say. "No, uh, we just... got a little held up."

Julie smiled, trying to sell it as well. The woman looked them both over and grinned. "I understand. Not a problem." She winked at Ben.

Ben wasn't sure what the woman thought she understood, but he didn't press it. They hadn't called the police, though when the lady from the diner had finally come out to the parking lot, she'd offered to call for them. She may have still called after they'd left, possibly to report the truck they'd left in the diner's parking lot.

The plan was to rent a vehicle the next day and have it delivered to the hotel. After they felt certain they were no longer being followed, they'd return to the diner and pick up Julie's truck.

The woman at the counter finished typing something into her booking system and looked up again, still smiling. "I actually have you down for two full-size beds in room 201. I apologize, I can—"

“No,” Ben said, interrupting her. He didn’t mean to sound so forward, but it was too late. “Sorry. I know, I booked it that way on purpose. We’re…”

He didn’t know how to explain their relationship. He most definitely wanted them in the same room, in case something happened. They were adults after all, but there was no reason to share a bed.

“Oh.” The woman seemed disappointed. “That’s fine—we’re good to go, then. Do you have a credit card you’d like to leave on file? I’ll need one for a deposit.”

“Would you take cash?” Julie asked. It was a long shot, but they weren’t about to use a credit card that was linked to either of their names.

“I’m sorry, Ms. Richardson,” the young woman said. “We need one in case of damages. We would accept a debit card, however.”

Julie handed her a credit card. “This is my company one; it should be fine.” Ben saw that the name on the card was, in fact, the name of her office at the CDC. It wasn’t much, but it might provide a tiny layer of protection for them.

“Very good.” The woman typed some more and handed the card back to Julie. “Thank you. Here are your keys, and will you need anything else this evening?”

Ben shook his head and took the packet of room keys.

“Do you have any wine? Red, maybe? Something, uh, sort of… romantic?” Julie asked.

Ben felt his face immediately flush a bright red. His eyes widened as he saw Julie’s smile, quickly matched by the woman behind the desk. “Well, I guess we could bring something up. We actually don’t have room service, but as you probably know, we have a fantastic menu at our restaurant.”

The woman pointed to a hallway just off the main atrium, beneath a sign that said Le Petit Paris—French-American Cuisine.

“You two get situated, and I’ll bring you a bottle in a few minutes.” She turned back to the computer as the pair walked away, a smug look on her face.

As they neared the elevator, out of earshot from the front desk, Ben pulled a still-grinning Julie to the side. “You want to tell me what the hell that was?”

“You should have seen your face!” When she realized Ben wasn’t laughing, she put on a fake-pouty look. “What? It’s not like we’re ever going to see her again. Besides, she seemed so disappointed when she thought we weren’t together.”

“We’re not together!” Ben stormed into the open doors of the elevator, Julie trotting behind.

They rose in silence, then exited the elevator to find their room directly to the left. Ben inserted the key, then swung the door open. “I’m going to run down to the desk and pick up some toiletries. Do you need anything?”

“I have everything I need,” Julie said, wheeling the suitcase she’d packed at her farmhouse into the room. “You can use my toothpaste and stuff, if you want.”

He glared at her and let the door swing shut.

When he returned to the room a few minutes later, he found Julie sprawled on one of the beds, gripping a glass of red wine and wearing a pair of pajama bottoms and a worn t-shirt. She looked up as he entered, still wearing the cheesy grin. “It’s good,” she said, swirling the glass a bit. “You should try some.”

Ben shook his head, but found that he was smiling—just a little. He threw the small bag of toiletries he’d just purchased on the bathroom counter and sat down on the empty bed. Julie had apparently done some quick cleaning up. Her hair looked like it had been combed, falling gently around her shoulders and toppling over the pillow behind her. Ben watched her drink the wine for a few seconds until she turned to look at him.

Again, he felt his face flush. Come on, Harvey, get it together.

Julie laughed. “What? Been awhile since you’ve had a girl in your room?”

It had been.

“Shut up,” he said, reaching for a wine glass and the bottle of Merlot that rested on the nightstand between the beds. He poured himself a glass and took a sip. When was the last time I had a glass of wine? Most of his coworkers drank beer, if they drank at all. Ben preferred a glass of bourbon or whiskey, single malt on the rocks.

They looked at each other for a moment, each trying to decide what to say next. Julie lost interest first, turning back to whatever was on the television.

Ben wanted to ask her about her life. Who was she, really? Where was she from?

Was there anyone else in her life?

As someone not terribly interested in other peoples’ lives, he was surprised at his train of thought.

But instead, he asked about their plans. “What’s next? After tonight, I mean?”

Julie looked confused for a moment, then turned back to him. “Randy will probably get back to me soon, and he’ll tell us where to go next. Whoever was working with your mother probably lives in the area, and we can track them down pretty easily from there.”

Ben nodded. “Makes sense. You think Randy will get anywhere?”

“He always does. He’s a genius with computers. He’s pretty new at the CDC, but we get along well. He’s probably not stopped working on it since I called him earlier. The real question is if Diana shared any of her findings with anyone else or not.”

“No idea. I hadn’t spoken to her in over a decade. She was never the secretive type, so I imagine she’d be open to working with someone else.”

Julie took in the information, and both lay silent for a few minutes.

“Okay, well, I need to get some sleep,” she said. “I’ve got my phone on, in case Randy calls. We can figure out anything we can from whoever might be around here, then I’ll get us some plane tickets back to Billings for tomorrow night.”

Ben shook his head. “I’ll take the rental back. You go ahead.”

“You won’t fly?”

“No.”

“Why?”

“I just won’t. I don’t like it.”

“Come on, it’s perfectly safe. It’ll be much quick—”

“I’m not going to fly, Julie.”

“Ben, what’s the big deal? You won’t —”

“Knock it off, alright? I already told you, end of story. Drop it.” The words came out harsh, stressed. He regretted it, but the damage was done.

“What the hell, Bennett? Why the attitude?”

He didn’t respond.

“Seriously, Ben, what’s up? Why are you like this?”

“Julie...”

“No, I’ve had it. You barely speak to anyone, you treated me like dirt, and you’ve been off the grid for ten years. What is it about you that makes you so cold?”

Ben looked up sharply. He thought he could see Julie’s eyes welling up.

He didn't know what to say. Didn't want to say anything. Hell, what am I doing here? he thought.

He stood up from the bed and walked out of the room, slamming the door behind him. Julie remained, a shocked expression on her face.

They were the only patrons in the restaurant. Le Petit Paris was frequented only by guests of the lodge, and this particular week was a very slow one for the hotel.

Ben and Julie sat at the corner booth, enjoying a platter of waffles, sausage, bacon, eggs, and toast. Apparently the restaurant leaned heavily on the American part of “French-American cuisine.”

“Sorry about last night.” Ben said the words slowly, meticulously, speaking through a mouth full of breakfast food.

“Don’t worry about it,” Julie said. “I went too far. I shouldn’t have —”

“You didn’t do anything wrong,” Ben said, stopping her. “I’m uncomfortable around people, if you haven’t already guessed. I don’t do well with confrontation and, well, feelings in general.”

Julie laughed. “You wish you were a robot?”

Ben thought for a moment and grinned. “Yeah, kinda. That would be okay.”

“Really? No tasting food, no feeling joy, no, uh, more pleasurable emotions?”

“No feeling pain, either.”

“Pain’s not a bad thing, Ben. It makes the good stuff that much better.”

He scoffed and grabbed another waffle. “Ever eat these with peanut butter?”

“Gross. Are you serious?”

“Oh yeah. You have no idea. It’s the only way to eat them. My dad —”

He caught himself, choosing to take an extra-large bite instead.

“Your dad what?” Julie pressed.

“Nothing. He, just, liked it. I must have gotten it from him.”

Julie swallowed. “Can I ask you something?”

Ben looked at her. “Maybe.”

“What would you be doing if this bomb hadn’t gone off? If there was no virus, and it was just you, at Yellowstone?”

“You mean besides hauling nuisance bears around the park?”

“Yeah, I mean after work. What does Harvey Bennett do in his spare time?”

Ben considered the question. “Well, I’ve been working on buying a place of my own, actually.”

“Yeah?”

“Yeah. Some land way up in Alaska. I want to build a cabin on it someday. I’m in the last stages of the deal, but I’ve been waiting for the bank to finalize things.”

“Wow—Alaska?”

“I’ve actually never even been there.” He laughed. “I saw the land online, saw what they were asking for it, and called them that afternoon. It was dirt cheap because of its location. Used to be owned by a trapper who passed away a few years ago. The land went up for auction and a local bank bought it, hoping to turn a profit.”

“You strike me as the kind of person who needs to be around a lot of people and live in a city, probably in a high-rise.”

“Yeah?” Ben smiled. “Seems like me.”

Julie paused to take a few bites, and Ben sipped his coffee. He knew what was coming next. Julie deserved the truth.

“Your mom. Diana Torres. You didn’t tell me she was your mom, and you called her ‘Diana Torres.’ Why?”

He shrugged. “We got in a fight a long time ago. She never really forgave me. I guess we both never forgave each other.”

“What happened?”

Julie wasn't one to waste time. Ben liked that about her, but it terrified him all the same.

“It was the same time I ran away from it all. Thirteen years ago, right before I started at the park. I was camping with my dad and my kid brother. He was nine at the time, and he wandered out of camp and got stuck between a bear and her cub. My dad went to get him, and the bear attacked him.”

Julie covered her mouth with a hand.

“He got hit, hard, and went unconscious. My brother was pretty scraped up, but okay. My dad was airlifted out and spent a few months in a coma, then died.”

“God, Ben, I'm sorry.”

He waved it off. “My mom—as tough as she was—she never really forgave me. It was really Dad, though, I think she was mad at, for letting it happen. But she couldn't express that, you know? And she tried to forget about it, I think. She changed her name back to her maiden name, Torres. We sort of walked on eggshells for a while afterwards, until I gave up. I got some odd jobs, finished school, and just... left.”

“I had no idea,” Julie said. She was tearing up again.

“Why would you? I don't talk about it for a reason, Julie. It ain't something I'm proud of, and I don't particularly like thinking about it.”

“So why Yellowstone?”

“Makes sense, for a guy like me. No education, loves being outside, and hates people. Seemed like the logical thing, really. It's a great organization, too, so I actually enjoy the people there.”

Enjoyed, he thought. He looked up and saw that Julie was shaking her head.

“What is it?” he asked.

“It's—it's just that I still don't get you. I am sorry, I truly am, but you don't really hate people. You just said it, you know? You like those guys you work with, and you know it. You care for them, but you won't let them in. Right?”

Ben felt again, for the third time in many years, his face redden. “Yeah, I get it. Listen, Julie, here's what people like you—people who have that weird hope in humanity—don't get. You know what causes pain? True, real pain? People do. You get rid of people, you get rid of pain.”

“That's stupid.”

“Stop thinking that the world works some other way, Julie. Stop trying to make it work the way you want it to.”

The waitress came around and refilled their coffee, while Julie and Ben sat silently at the small table. Julie held back tears as she gazed out the window. Ben simply faced straight ahead, not making eye contact with the waitress.

When he finally looked up, he found the woman staring down at him knowingly, eyeing him strangely. “Let me know if you two need anything,” she whispered. Ben nodded.

“Come on, Julie, what's wrong?”

Julie turned her head. “You need to grow up, Ben.”

He frowned.

“People care about you. People love you, and you push them away because you got hurt once. I get it, but you've got to let it go.”

He stood up to leave, but she reached out and grabbed his arm. “Stop. Don't walk away again, Ben. You need to hear this, talk through it.”

He wanted badly to continue, to walk out of the room. Then keep walking.

But he didn't. He wasn't sure why, but he agreed with her. He needed her to call him out. Or was it more than that?

Before he could consider an answer, Julie's phone rang. She held it up and read off the name: Randall Brown.

“Dad! Breakfast is ready!”

Randall Brown heard his son yell while sitting in his office, checking in on things at work. His wife had clearly told their son to get him for breakfast, and this was his interpretation. Seconds later he heard his wife, Amanda, yell back.

“Come on, Drew, get him. I could have yelled myself.”

Randy smiled to himself, knowing exactly what came next:

“Then why didn’t you?” Drew asked.

Randy shook his head. Knowing Amanda, Drew was risking his rifle-shooting privileges, or worse, with such a show of disrespect.

When do they grow out of it? he wondered. Drew was a good kid, but Randy was regularly surprised by the fleeting attitudes and phases of teenage boys. Drew kept them on their toes, and Randy was positive that Drew was the cause of the majority of the gray hairs on his head.

“I’ll be right there!” Randy called back. Surprisingly, he didn’t hear his wife reprimand their son. She must have decided it wasn’t worth the trouble. Still smiling, he turned back to his cellphone and dialed Julie’s number.

It rang three times before she picked up. “Hello?”

“Hey, Julie, it’s me—Randy.”

“Hey, Randy, good to hear from you. We’re just finishing up breakfast. Anything good?”

“Might be helpful, but I don’t know if it’s good.”

“We’ll take anything you’ve got, Randy.”

“By the way, who’s we? You working with Stephens on this one?”

“Uh, no, a guy I met at Yellowstone actually. Stephens is back home. What did you find?”

Randy considered this for a moment. Some guy? Julie wasn’t careless but he didn’t question her. “Oh, uh, I found her—Diana’s—assistant. Charlie Furmann, lives in Mud Lake, Idaho, with his parents and has an apartment in Twin Falls.”

Julie paused a moment. He assumed she was taking notes. “Mud Lake? Is that a real place?”

“It is. Town of about four hundred people from what I gather. Shouldn’t have much trouble finding him there.”

“Ok, great. Anything else on him?”

“Not much. He was a PhD candidate in something called ‘molecular modeling’ and worked with Diana as a sort of work-study.”

Again, a pause.

“Listen, Julie. I really need to go.” He thought about his son in the dining room, waiting with Amanda to start breakfast. Amanda. She was already upset that he was gone for a few hours yesterday, and she wouldn’t be happy with him for this, either. At the very least, he could tell her what had happened at Yellowstone and hope that it explained why he had been absent.

“Right, yeah, sorry. Randy, thanks for this. Seriously.”

“No problem.” He began to hang up but heard Julie’s voice again from the small speaker.

“Oh, hey. Have you heard anything from Stephens?”

Randy placed the phone back up to his ear with a frown. “Stephens? No, why?”

It wasn’t abnormal for Randy to not be in contact with Benjamin Stephens. Randy was the office IT specialist, not a regular team member. Most of the time he was in charge of setting up and maintaining the company's intranet server, SecuNet, and setting up email addresses and providing other IT support. In some cases, he had played a more active role by providing on-the-fly information updates and logistics, but his was mainly a hands-off job.

"I just haven't heard anything from him either," Julie explained. "He usually swamps my inbox but..."

"Weird. No, I haven't heard anything."

"Okay. Is the server up, do you know? Any major downtime?"

Randy was almost insulted. "Of course not. Why would there be? You know I've got 24/7 alerts that would get to me even if I was trapped in an Afghani cave."

"Whoa, chill. Can't hurt to ask, right?" Julie said. "I know you're on top of it. It's just weird, that's all."

"Yeah, it is. Give me a minute. I'll remote in and see if there's anything wonky going on. I'll text you in five."

"Thanks, Randy. I owe you one."

"Buy me a beer sometime, and we're even." He clicked off the phone and walked out to the dining room. He eyed his wife and son. "You know the bomb that went off at Yellowstone? Something was released into the air and it's killing people."

His wife's eyes grew wide. Drew's mouth hung open.

"We're fine here, but the CDC has people in the field, and I need to keep checking in every now and then."

His wife nodded, still taking in the horrible news.

"Okay, then. Give me five more minutes and I'll be back out."

He left the room and used the remote desktop application on his phone to access his terminal at the office.

Everything checked out—servers were up and running, intranet cabling didn't appear to have any glitches, and the inbound internet connection was functioning properly. He scanned through the list of configuration files, finding no problems.

Lastly, he clicked on the email server link and browsed the inbound and outbound connections. Through this portal, he could see every email sent and received by every member of his access group—twenty-five people in total. It was a security protocol, one that had required him to maintain a level of security clearance to remain employed. He browsed the list, reading the names of the senders and receivers of each email.

He saw names of other employees sending and receiving emails from other members of the staff regarding the current state of affairs at Yellowstone. He saw emails from Stephens sent to Julie's email address, and he saw emails to David Livingston.

Nothing out of the ordinary.

Except...

He didn't see any received emails with Julie's name or email address. Though Stephens had sent them, they seemingly had never reached her inbox.

Randy grimaced. This was his area, his responsibility. If there was something wrong with the mail server...

Then he saw something even more puzzling.

For every sent email from Stephens to Julie, there was a duplicate received email with Livingston's address on it.

Definitely puzzling.

He opened the configuration file for the mail server, just to see if there was anything strange going on with the routing. Everything checked out. He found nothing wrong in the name server settings, either.

There was one more place to check. Randy opened the forwarding section of the SecuNet admin portal and read down the list. Most entries were auto-responders set up for staff who were on vacation, working remotely, or otherwise wanting to receive their email through another provider's account. But one was a specific forwarding address that he recognized.

Benjamin Stephens.

Why was his address being forwarded? And where was it going? Shocked, Randy clicked through until he found the answer. Benjamin Stephens' mail was being forwarded to David Livingston—at Livingston's instruction.

Livingston himself had set up the forward on the SecuNet server for all of Stephens' mail. Anything the man sent out was instead received by his superior.

And it was poorly done, to boot. Randy couldn't find any sort of encryption on the forwarding record, nor was the address masked in any way to a vanity email address. It was as if the man didn't care who was watching, or more likely, didn't care why anyone was watching.

It was certainly like Livingston to be so distrustful of his staff that he'd set up an email forward on an account, but why Stephens? And why not just ask Randy to monitor it for him?

Randy suspected why: Livingston wanted the power trip. He wanted to feel in charge; letting Randy into his little game was like inviting someone else aboard to watch him drive the train. Randy was immediately disgusted, but he was now faced with a bigger dilemma: should he remove the forward?

If he did, Livingston would know soon enough that the forward was no longer working. But if he didn't, Livingston could just log in to SecuNet and see that 'rbrown' had recently logged in and seen the forwarding page.

It was a tough decision, but he had a little time to think through his options. There was, however, one decision he'd already made.

He closed the remote desktop application on his phone and called Julie back.

“Seems like all we’re doing is driving,” Julie said from the passenger seat of her truck. The road they were on had narrowed to a two-lane highway surrounded by farmland.

“You mean all I’m doing is driving,” Ben answered. They’d left the hotel that morning, heading toward Mud Lake, Idaho, just as soon as Julie had received the tip from her computer guy, Randy Brown.

“I told you earlier I don’t mind—just let me know when you want to switch.”

Ben shook it off. “It’s fine, really. Enjoy the scenery.”

“Yeah, I just love cornfields as far as the eye can see.”

“They’re soy beans.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

“Huh.”

They came to a cross street and turned right onto a farm-to-market road that apparently led farther into the great expanse of fields and farms. According to Ben’s map, they were about ten minutes from Mud Lake. Julie had chided him for almost an hour about the map—a Rand McNalley road atlas he’d purchased at the hotel’s gift shop—but if he were in a laughing mood, he would have gotten the last one now.

Never one to trust technology, Ben had purchased the map “just in case,” having a hunch that neither of their cellphones would pull a decent enough data connection to get them to Mud Lake, and then to Charlie Furmann’s parents’ place outside of town. As of about thirty minutes ago, he was proven correct.

“You’d like the CDC. They hate flying too, since it happens to be one of the most efficient ways to spread airborne diseases.”

“I’m not afraid of flying,” Ben shot back. “I just don’t... prefer it.”

“Oh, right. Just like I don’t prefer spiders.”

“That’s different. I just don’t like feeling so... helpless.”

Julie thought for a moment, looking out the window. “I get that. Makes sense—all those tons of metal, breaking the laws of physics—”

“Hey, I don’t need to be reminded of it.”

“You are afraid of flying! I can’t even mention flying without you getting all bent out of shape.”

“You’re relentless, you know that?” Ben said.

“I do. How much longer?”

“Ten minutes, I think. Check the map.” Julie grabbed the open atlas spread out on the center console and looked it over for a few seconds.

“What? Haven’t had to go tech-free in a while?”

“Shut up. I can use it. I just need to get my bearings.”

“North is up.”

“Be quiet.”

“I literally outlined the route we’re on. Just look at the red line—we’re toward the end of it.”

Julie contemplated the map for a few more seconds, then threw it back down and looked back out the window.

“Well?” Ben asked.

“Yeah, about ten minutes.”

Ten minutes later, they saw a lone silo stretching up over a field of deep green, leafy plants. As the silo grew larger, they could see a few smaller buildings spread out over the expanse of soy fields, including a yellow farmhouse. But it was the vehicles in front of the farmhouse that made Ben’s skin crawl.

“Are those police cars?” Julie asked.

“Yeah. Four of them.”

“Oh, man, this just keeps getting better.”

Ben navigated down the road a little farther until he saw a dirt road leading to the farmstead. He started to slow the vehicle, preparing to turn, but Julie stopped him.

“Don’t. They’re not going to let us just walk around there, and if something did happen, we’re not helping ourselves by showing up on the doorstep.”

Ben knew she was right.

“Besides, the police aren’t going to give us anything until they’ve figured it out. Especially if there was a crime. Let’s head back into town and see if anyone knows what’s going on.”

Ben sped up again and grabbed the atlas. “This road intersects with another farm road that runs parallel to the main highway. Should take us back toward Mud Lake.”

They found their road in another minute, and ten minutes after that, they were on the outskirts of town.

Town, however, was too strong a word. Mud Lake, Idaho, seemed like not much more than a rest stop on the way to something bigger. A few stoplights, a general store with a few gas pumps, and a large industrial facility of some sort was all the small town’s main street offered.

Ben pulled the F450 into the small lot in front of the general store and parked.

“Is it open?” Julie asked.

“No idea. Let’s find out.” They got out and walked to the front door. Ben grabbed the handle and was surprised when it gave easily. A series of dings sounded from a group of bells hanging on a string attached to the door let the owner know they’d arrived.

“One minute!” a voice called out from somewhere in the back. They waited at the counter for a moment before a short, rotund man with reddened cheeks and wispy white hair appeared from around a corner. He shuffled along, appearing almost weightless as his upper body hardly moved. He wore an impressive smile, aided by his large, jolly eyes, and his overall impression told the couple they’d found the right place to ask for help.

“How may I help you?” the man asked. His voice matched his appearance in every way. Crisp, light, and nuanced in a way that only an older man with years of communication experience could portray. His demeanor was disarming.

“We’re looking for some information. About someone who lives here,” Julie said.

The man nodded slowly, eyeing each of them for a brief moment. “It’s a small town, as you’ve no doubt gathered,” he said cheerfully. “We do tend to know one another quite well.”

Ben sensed a bit of hesitation in the man. Maybe this was a bad idea...

“His name’s Charlie Furmann,” Julie said. “I think he lives here with his parents, just outside of town—”

The man held up a hand, halting Julie. Ben watched as the man’s expression and stature changed almost instantaneously, going from a peaceful, inviting shop owner to a ruffled, bothered old man. “Get out. Now.” He pointed to the door. “Please leave.”

“Sir—we’re just—”

“No. Out.”

Ben clenched his teeth and tried to interpret what had just happened. The man clearly knew Charlie or knew of him. Maybe he knows his parents?

“Sir, we’re sorry to intrude. Really. But we’re with the CDC... the Centers for Disease Control.” The man’s face softened slightly, but he still looked about three seconds away from grabbing a broom handle and shooing them out of the store. Ben said. “There’s been an outbreak of something, and we’re trying to figure out what it is. We think Charlie might know something about it—”

“It doesn’t matter what he knew,” the shopkeeper said.

“Wait,” Julie said. “Knew? As in past tense...?”

The man nodded.

“My God,” she said. “We’re so sorry. We drove by his parents’ farm and saw the police cars... How?”

The man sighed, realizing that he wasn’t going to get rid of these patrons as easily as he once thought. “He was found in his apartment, in Twin Falls. Had that rash on him—the one that’s been going around east of here.”

Julie nodded, taking it all in.

“Terrible thing. You people know anything about that rash?”

“That’s what we’re working on now,” Julie explained.

Ben added. “It’s killed a lot of people who were around that blast in Yellowstone. We think it’s related, that Yellowstone was the epicenter.”

The storeowner’s faced drained. “I sure hope not, son. Seems like this country’s already gone to hell in a hand basket. Kid hadn’t been home in something like five years, too. All focused on his work in the city. The Furmanns are beside themselves.”

Ben and Julie thanked the man and left. They walked in silence back to the parking lot and the truck. Ben slid into the driver’s seat.

Julie waited until the truck was on the main road through town before she spoke. “Twin Falls is outside the blast radius by hundreds of miles. And the virus is not technically an outbreak yet—it’s not contained, but it hasn’t been spreading outside of Wyoming. Much slower than a traditional epidemic.”

“Right,” Ben said. “My mom wasn’t anywhere near it either. Whoever got to her also must have paid Charlie a visit...”

They both let that information sink in. What it meant, what it might mean, was even more terrifying. Someone had brought the virus to them intentionally.

Julie decided it would be best to check in with her office and see if they had anything new. As they drove in silence, she checked her phone again to see if she had service.

“Anything?” Ben asked.

“Not yet,” she said. “I think I had bars outside Twin Falls.”

“We’re only a few miles out. Keep checking.”

Soon enough, a single bar of service grew to two, then three. Then her phone vibrated. She had a waiting voicemail from Randall Brown. She played it over the phone’s speaker so Ben could listen in.

“Hey Julie, it’s Randy again. I checked SecuNet. Everything’s working properly, but I did find something odd. Livingston put a mail forward on Stephens’ email account—anything he’s sent in the past forty-eight hours went straight to him. That’s probably why you haven’t heard anything.”

Julie looked up at Ben, shocked.

“Anyway, I didn’t delete the forward. Livingston would know that I was in there right away if he stopped getting Stephens’ updates. Still, if he decides to log in to SecuNet again, he’ll see my timestamp there. I’m kinda between a rock and a hard place on this one, Julie, so let me know what you want me to do.”

“You’ve got to be kidding me,” Julie said.

“What’s your boss paranoid about?” Ben asked.

“—Everything and anything, but this crosses the line. To prevent the flow of information like this during an active investigation...” She shook her head, staring down at the phone.

“What do you think he’s up to?” Ben asked.

“He’s always had a problem with me, but this is weird even for him.”

Julie looked out the window. The sign for Twin Falls read: 135 miles.

“How far are we from Idaho Falls?”

“I’d guess about an hour, maybe less. We’re coming up to Highway 26, which goes back that direction. Why?”

“There’s a regional airport there. I can hitch a ride on one of the smaller jets if there are any going out today.” Julie started. She caught Ben’s eyes. “Don’t worry. I’ll fly back to Billings and get things straightened out at the office, and you can drive the truck back.”

Ben kept one eye on her as he continued driving down the highway.

“Only if you ask me nicely.”

She rolled her eyes. “Would you please drive the truck back for me?”

He sighed. “Sure. What’s another five hours of driving, anyway?”

“Actually, six. You’ll want to go around Yellowstone.”

Just then, her phone rang. Stephens. She answered it, again placing the phone on speaker.

“Stephens?”

“Yeah, hey Julie, how is everything going?” The muffled voice asked.

“Good, I guess. Have you been getting my emails?”

“I have. Are you getting mine?” he asked.

She hesitated. “Uh, no, I actually haven’t had time to check.” It was a poor lie, but it would buy her time. Stephens paused on the other end.

“Okay, right. Hey, how did that last contact work out? Any information?”

Julie had emailed her itinerary to Stephens before they visited Mud Lake, and in it she'd included the information Randy Brown sent along.

"It was... not fruitful." She changed the subject. "We're still working on where to go next, but I think I'm heading back to the office later today."

He paused. "Okay, sounds good. Uh, listen, we got some news I wanted to call about."

Julie exchanged a glance with Ben. "Okay."

"Livingston and some higher-ups at the CDC and the Department of Homeland Security called in a team of excavators to check out the area beneath Yellowstone Lake and the West Thumb areas, at the park."

"Where the bomb went off?"

"Right. They know there are a few caves that run around that area, though none of them are very long or deep. But they checked them all out just in case."

Ben scratched his arm while he listened.

"What did they find?" Julie asked.

"A tunnel, cut into a wall of one of the caves."

"Manmade?"

"Yeah. Cut recently, too," Stephens said.

Ben scratched his arm again. Julie looked like she'd seen a ghost.

"What's their thinking? That's where the bomb was placed?" she asked.

"No, or it would have collapsed the tunnel."

"But it could have been a staging area," Ben cut in. "Away from prying eyes."

"Correct." Then the realization that he wasn't talking to just Julie must have sunk in. "Wait—Julie, was that Ben? That guy from Yellowstone?" Stephens said.

"Yes, don't worry about that," Julie said.

Ben grew increasingly annoyed with the itch in his arm. What is that? He finally looked down at his forearm. A red rash had begun to spread down and over his hands.

His breath caught in his throat. "Julie," he whispered.

Julie didn't hear him.

He began yanking his sleeves down to cover his arms. Reached into his jacket pocket and pulled out a pair of leather work gloves without running off the road.

"What do they think is going on, then?" She continued. "Do they know?"

"They don't know," Stephens replied. "But they have an idea. They're thinking the first bomb was a warning, to get our attention."

Julie tried to take it all in. "From who? Wait. What do you mean the first bomb?"

"Julie." Ben said her name louder, hoping she'd look over at him. Instead, she held up her pointer finger. Wait.

"They think there's a second bomb," Stephens said. "Bigger than the first. It may or may not have a viral payload this time, but regardless, if it detonates..."

"Julie!" Ben barked. His voice easily filled the truck's cab, and she jumped.

—Her eyes widened as she saw what Ben had grown so frantic about. His hands and forearms were covered, but he wasn't looking at his own arms. Instead, he was pointing at hers.

She dropped the phone on her lap and stuck her arms out in front of her.

A rash was blossoming across her skin.

Ben gunned it, pointing the large gray F450 down the narrow highway that twisted through Billings, Montana. An alarmed family in the car next to him swerved out of harm's way.

Ben didn't care. The rash had spread and was continuing to do so. He could feel it creeping up to just below his shoulders, though it was still only visible on his hands and arms. It was moving much more slowly than he'd seen back at Yellowstone, but it was definitely moving. He could only hope that Julie's own rash was moving even slower.

He sped ahead of another eighteen-wheeler, this one carrying a load of brand-new vehicles to some dealership. The driver flipped him off. Ben hit the gas in response. He had to get to the hospital. To Julie.

When they'd reached the regional airport in Idaho Falls, she'd nearly convinced him to keep driving, terrified of what might happen to everyone around her while she carried such an extremely contagious disease.

The argument, however, was settled for her when Livingston called. The very man who had been intercepting her communications with Stephens. He voiced surprise when he heard her news but had a plan in action within minutes.

"I'll have a private plane waiting for you," he'd said. It turned out to be owned by a business tycoon who golfed with Livingston often. It was ready to leave as soon as they'd arrived—they could even drive directly onto the tarmac to save time. Julie was overjoyed, thanking Livingston profusely and promising she'd pay him back someday.

They tried to get Ben to go too, as a precaution, just in case he'd caught it. Ben refused to reveal that he did, in fact, have a rash, silently convincing himself that Julie's was worse. He'd rolled his sleeves down and spoke as little as possible.

"He doesn't like to fly," Julie kept telling the team. It was the only excuse they had, and besides, there was technically nothing they could do to force him to. So, they'd given him a card and asked him to call if he experienced any symptoms, and they warned him to limit his interactions with other people as much as possible.

Ben told them he would, stuffed the card into a back pocket of his jeans, and was on the highway toward Montana before they could send someone to tail him.

He didn't trust a single one of them.

His phone had buzzed about an hour ago, the number an unknown caller. When he'd answered it and heard Benjamin Stephens' voice on the other end, he knew it could only mean bad news.

"Julie's here," Stephens reported.

"What?" Ben said. "Why is she at the office? She got the virus thing, and —"

"She's not," Stephens said.

Ben breathed a sigh of relief, then remembered his own rash. It had grown a bit, but it hadn't gotten any itchier. He took that as a good sign. "Okay. Where is she now?"

"Quarantined at a local hospital that's converted a wing for the virus outbreak. She's sedated now and being fully monitored."

"How is she?" Ben had demanded. "Don't bullshit me."

"The rash has spread. It's up to her neck and is beginning to cover her torso. It's still in its early stages, from what the doctors can tell, but it's not stopping," Stephens said.

Ben swallowed hard. Shit.

“Okay, I’m coming there. Where is the—”

“You can’t, Ben. The hospital wing is completely off-limits, and—”

“Where is the hospital?” he yelled into the phone.

Stephens paused, and Ben could hear him sigh on the other end. “Listen, I’m only doing this because she told me to call you.” He gave Ben the address of the hospital, then added one more thought. “If the staff catches you in there, Ben, hell’s going to break loose. This is a completely unknown force we’re dealing with, and you’d better believe there are going to be suits from every branch there, trying to figure out what the deal is. It isn’t just the CDC anymore.”

Ben understood his meaning. If you aren’t careful, you might get thrown in jail. Or worse.

“I understand.”

Ben hung up and an hour later he was pulling up to the parking lot in front of the hospital. The small, early 1900’s building sat on an acre of green manicured lawns. A tall iron fence with brick towers at the corners ringed the property. Picnic tables were sprinkled here and there, each shaded by massive, centuries-old oak trees. The hospital itself featured a grand entrance and lobby, adjoined on each side by two five-story hospital wings.

He parked in a visitor parking spot and looked at the clock. It was getting late, but he knew there would still be a night staff. The problem was, he didn’t know what time the switch would happen; when most of the day staff would go home for the night. He took a few deep breaths to relax himself and surveyed the surrounding area.

He saw a few unmarked vehicles parked together in a clump behind his truck. Each had deeply tinted windows and seemed to be brand new. He assumed they were government, but he had no idea what department. He couldn’t tell if they were unoccupied.

He watched the pedestrian traffic in front of the old hospital. An elderly couple walked through the grounds, the woman holding onto and supporting her husband as he shakily moved down the sidewalk. Another couple, younger, sat beneath one of the oak trees, laughing.

A few people wearing scrubs walked into the building using a side entrance. He watched them swipe a card and enter, the door slamming shut behind them. That’s it. If he could gain access to one of their cards, he could get in without drawing too much attention to himself.

It would never work. What was he supposed to do, beat up some poor old doctor and steal their ID card? He almost laughed out loud. This is ridiculous. I’m trying to break into a hospital.

He knew he couldn’t pull that off—he was a park ranger.

Instead, he opened the car door and walked purposefully toward the entrance. If the government suits were, in fact, watching him from their recon vehicles, he needed to look like a visitor. He walked up to the front entrance and opened one of the doors.

“Good evening, sir,” a young man at the front desk announced. “How may I help you?”

Ben panicked. What do I do? His thoughts became mush. “Uh, hi, yes. I’m here to see someone I, uh, know.”

The man’s smile faded a little. “Okay, sure. Visiting hours are actually over, but—”

“That’s okay, thanks anyway.” Ben started to sweat. He turned quickly and walked back toward the front door. You fool.

As he neared the exit, he stole a quick glance over his shoulder. The receptionist was on the phone, hunched over his workstation. A few other nurses and doctors walked across the expansive lobby, but none seemed to notice him. He saw a skinny door against the wall, wallpapered to look like the lobby’s striped two-tone wall, and he reached for the knob.

It twisted fully, and he pushed it open. He closed the door behind him and looked around. A small orange bulb hanging from the ceiling illuminated the room enough to give him what he needed: it was a small janitorial closet, filled with mop buckets, brooms, and cleaning chemicals. He found an upside down five-gallon bucket against the wall. Sitting down on it, he recapped his plan.

There wasn't much to recap: enter lobby, find a place to hide.

Wait.

Wait for what?

He had no idea. He knew he needed to see Julie, to make sure she was okay, but he was in over his head. He was a large, lumbering park ranger, not a spry little covert operative.

He waited for a few minutes, trying to gauge the activity outside the little closet. He couldn't hear much. Footsteps here and there, telling him nothing other than the general location of the person on the other side of the door.

Another five minutes passed, and he heard footsteps again making their way past his closet.

No, they're not moving past.

They were moving toward him.

Ben waited, praying the footsteps would recede into the distance.

The footsteps stopped. Someone was directly outside the door now.

Please go away.

The handle turned, and he reached for something—anything—to use as a weapon. There was nothing but a bucket of mops sitting within arm's reach. He grabbed one and untwisted the handle from its base.

A second later, the door slid open. Light pierced the dim room.

Ben raised the mop handle, wincing.

A man's frame was silhouetted in the doorway, but he didn't step into the room.

“You must be Harvey Bennett. Ben, I believe?”

“Who are you?” Ben growled.

The man took a step forward, and Ben raised the mop handle higher.

The man raised a hand. “Whoa there, son. I’m not going to hurt you.” He paused, taking another step into the closet. He looked at the mop handle. “Works better than you might think, too.”

Ben frowned but didn’t release his grip on the weapon.

The man was now fully in the room, and the light from the lobby was enough to give Ben some idea of who had entered.

A janitor.

Dressed in crisp blue overalls and a matching blue cap, the man was older than Ben, but about as tall and built similarly. Wisps of whitish hair fell from around the cap, and Ben could see he was not exactly smiling, but close enough.

An ironed-on name badge stared back at Ben from the man’s chest pocket.

Roger.

“You—you’re a janitor?” Ben asked.

The man nodded. “We prefer ‘sanitation engineer,’ but yeah, janitor works too.”

“How do you know who I am?” Ben asked.

“I saw you run in here after your harrowing encounter with Junior.”

Junior must be the kid from the front desk.

“That still doesn’t explain how you know who I am.”

“Right. There’s more to it than this, obviously, but Julie filled me in.”

The mention of Julie’s name sent a chill down Ben’s spine. “Is she okay?”

“She’s fine. In the quarantined ward, but they’ve got her on some sort of sedative that dulls pain and slows her blood flow. It’s not enough to, uh, stop the virus, but it’ll help.”

Ben was growing more and more confused by the second. Standing in front of him was a man—a janitor—who knew who he was, who Julie was, and apparently what sort of outbreak was going on in the hospital’s quarantine.

“She told me you’d be coming here. Gave a pretty good description too. I was in there when they brought her in. There’s a hazmat chamber set up just outside the entrance, but only staff and facilities, like me, can go in.”

Ben shook his head. “Listen, that’s great. I need to get to her. Can you help me or not?”

“Slow down, slow down,” the man said. “We’ll get in there. Mind dropping that mop handle, though?”

Ben didn’t realize he was still poised for an attack. He relaxed a bit and dropped the wooden stick.

“So... you were just cleaning in there, and happened to start talking to her?”

The man’s half-smile disappeared, and Ben could see him grow serious. “Oh, no. You don’t understand. I’ve been working on this for quite some time. It is certainly a coincidence that fate brought her here, but it’s not fate at all that did the same for me.”

Ben had no idea what he was talking about. “Working on what?”

“The virus. Trying to figure out what it is. I’ve been studying it—as much as I can, anyway, for months. This hospital has to be involved, somehow, but I’m not sure exactly how. I was starting to lose hope, but then a few days ago they transformed the first floor of the east wing into the quarantine, and I heard whispers that they were helping with the Yellowstone Virus.”

Ben thought about that for a moment. The Yellowstone Virus. He hadn't tuned in to what the media was touting, but he was sure the moniker owed its existence to some marketing-minded news editor.

“As the virus spreads there are bound to be other hospitals in the area gearing up for similar quarantine efforts, too, right?” Ben reasoned.

The man shook a finger at him. “But this one is different.”

“How different?”

“This hospital is part-owned by a company called Rainbaucher's, which itself is mostly owned by another company, Dragonstone Corp. There are also two pharmaceutical companies, one in Norway, called Drage Medisinsk, and one here in Canada called Drache Global.”

All Ben could picture was a crazy guy in his basement, Beautiful Minding bits of red string all over a map.

“Dragonstone is the organization behind these attacks,” the man said.

That got Ben's attention. “There's a company behind this?”

The man nodded. “I am just following the breadcrumbs.”

Ben thought for a moment. “How'd you know where to start? How did you even find out this information?”

“The smaller companies, like this hospital, have to file public financial statements. They're obviously convoluted and circuitous enough to be nothing short of useless, but it at least gave me a glimpse into what other companies were behind them. I had enough prior knowledge about all of this to know where to start looking.”

Ben didn't know what that meant, but right now he didn't care. “If you know where to look, help me get to Julie.”

The man nodded and held out his hand. “I'm glad I found you, son. You two can help stop this thing.”

Ben reached out to shake the man's hand, before having second thoughts. The rash. Even with gloves on he was still infected.

The janitor, Roger, laughed and grabbed Ben's hand anyway. “Don't worry about that. Doesn't matter anymore. Nice to meet you.”

Ben frowned. “Good to meet you as well, uh... Roger.”

The man laughed. “Ha! I forgot I had this on.” He flicked at the small patch on his overalls. “I had to sort of go ‘undercover’ a bit when I started here. You can call me Malcolm.”

“Malcolm?”

“Dr. Malcolm Fischer. Professor of Archaeology.”

There was a crawlspace-like attic above the corridor close to where Julie was being kept, supported by a metal catwalk. Used for electrical conduit, plumbing for the upper floors, and the modernized HVAC system, it was primarily intended to house cables and pipes, not people. When Malcolm showed Ben the small space he wanted them to squeeze into, Ben thought he was joking.

“You can’t be serious.”

“If I can do it, you can,” was Malcolm’s reply.

Ben wasn’t claustrophobic, but this was cutting it close. The space measured about a foot tall by three feet wide. Enough for a dog or small animal to pass through easily, but a large male human? It would be tight.

“I’ll go first, you follow behind. There will be an air vent directly above her room, but we’ll need to reopen it. The CDC crew that was in here sealed up all the airflow points and redirected them so they could keep everything contained.”

“Right.” Ben was still eyeing the small crawlspace. “Lead the way.”

Malcolm squeezed himself up and into the space, surprising Ben with the older man’s strength and speed. He followed behind, catching a face full of shoe rubber when he entered the shaft.

“Might want to wait until I get a little bit ahead.”

“Yeah, I got that,” Ben said.

They slid slowly through the shaft, crawling over lines of electrical and networking cables, PVC pipes, and other forgotten infrastructure. It was hot inside the tunnel, and they quickly worked up a sweat. “How much longer?” Ben asked.

“Not much farther. We can pop in and out of her room without anyone seeing us. Worth it.”

Malcolm stopped over a grate. “This is it. I’ll unscrew the panel, but I need you to hold it up. We can’t let it fall on her.”

Ben followed his instruction and slid up next to Malcolm’s legs. The man’s upper body was contorted and twisted back around, allowing him the freedom to work a small screwdriver while giving Ben room to squeeze up next to him.

Ben felt the grate pop with the last screw and held it in place. It was heavier than it looked, but it didn’t fall. Together, the two men turned the grate on its side and pulled it up through the ceiling. When it had cleared the hole, Malcolm pushed it up above his prone body, farther into the shaft.

A cool wash of air hit Ben, and he breathed it in. It made his skin itch, especially the area around his neckline, chest, and arms, right where the rash covered his skin. He popped his head through the open hole in the ceiling and looked into the room.

Julie.

She was there, eyes closed, on a bed in the center of the room. A few IV lines ran into her arms, and Ben could see the purplish rash on her skin, but she seemed otherwise unharmed. No one else was in the room.

He sighed in relief and looked back at Malcolm. “Give me a hand when you’re down there, I’m not built for this.”

Malcolm nodded and swung his feet down and through the hole. He dropped gracefully from the ceiling catwalk and into the room. “Ready,” he called up.

Ben dropped through the hole until he felt pressure on his feet. He lowered himself slowly, letting Malcolm help him down. When his feet hit the hospital room floor, Julie’s eyes fluttered open.

“Ben?”

“Julie! Hey, how are you feeling?” He rushed to her side.

“I—I’m good, I think,” she said. “A little groggy, but I’m okay. It’s mostly the drugs. The rash—is it gone?”

Ben looked at her. She had been changed into a light blue hospital gown and placed under a bed sheet, but her neck and arms were outside the blanket. The rash was now purple, deepening into the start of boils and blisters just under the surface of her skin.

“Uh, yeah. You look great,” he said, smiling.

“You’re a jerk,” she said. Her voice was shaky, but she seemed to be more alert. “Get me out of here.”

“Julie, we can’t. I’m sorry—you’re not strong enough...”

“Knock it off. Look at you. If you can get in here, I can get back out.” She sat up a little and started pulling at the IV lines in her arms. “What are these, anyway?”

Malcolm stepped forward. “They’re keeping you sedated,” he said.

She frowned, trying to remember where she’d seen him.

He reached out a hand and placed it on her shoulder. “My name is Dr. Malcolm Fischer, remember? We met when you were brought here.”

She nodded, slowly.

“I met your friend here a few moments ago in a janitor’s closet.”

She raised an eyebrow. “Finally came out of the closet, eh, Ben?”

“Really? Right now?”

She laughed, turning again to the IV lines. “Well I appreciate your grand plan to come see me, but you honestly thought you’d just waltz in here, say ‘hi,’ then leave?”

He was stumped. What was his plan?

“You’re the one who wanted Livingston’s help,” Ben said.

“Not like this,” Julie replied. “They started treatment on the plane, but... it seemed wrong. As if they were testing something else, not actually trying to heal me.”

“But you’re alive,” Ben said.

“For now. Get me out of this hospital, take me somewhere we can talk, and you,” she pointed at Malcolm, “tell me what you know.”

Malcolm smiled. “I like a girl with spunk.” He nudged Ben and winked. “Sounds like a plan.”

Julie pulled out the two needles from her arm and sat up higher in the bed. Ben hoisted Malcolm up and into the ceiling vent hole and turned to help Julie. She was standing now, gaining her balance. Her hair was a tangled mess, and her eyes were sunken. She ran a hand through her hair in vain, then gave up and turned back to Ben.

She stepped in front of him, her bare feet lining up directly in front of his shoes. Standing there with no shoes on, a head shorter than Ben, wearing only a hospital gown, he noticed just how small she seemed. She looked up at him with her big brown eyes.

“What are you waiting for, ranger?” she asked. “Let’s do this.”

She grabbed his hands and placed them on her sides. He felt his face flush.

“You got a crush on me, ranger? Stop freaking out. This isn’t your middle school dance. Lift me up.” She cocked her head to the side, waiting.

He swallowed hard. “That gown doesn’t cover much. I’m going to get a real good look.”

She blinked, bit her lower lip and stared at him, letting him stew in his own embarrassment for a few seconds.

He tightened his grip on her sides, preparing to launch her upwards, and...

She leaned forward and kissed him. Long and slow, the type of kiss he'd never experienced.

His ears suddenly felt hot. She pulled her head back slightly but slid her body closer to his. Then she leaned in, close to his hot ears, and whispered.

As Ben withdrew his foot from the hole in the ceiling and went to replace the air vent panel, he heard someone open the door to Julie's room.

"Code zero! We've got a breach in the quarantined sector!"

No one needed to speak paramedic to crack that code. The whole place would be on lockdown now. They needed another escape plan.

"They'll figure out where she went pretty quickly," Ben whispered. "It's not like Die Hard is a secret. Malcolm, is there any other way out?"

"Sure, but we'll have to unscrew the grate again, like we did for Julie's room."

"Do it."

Malcolm didn't stop shimmying moving forward until he'd reached a ceiling grate over another hospital room. Julie slid up next to him to help, but when Malcolm had unscrewed two of the four screws holding the grate in place, he apparently changed his mind.

"Slide back a little. I'm going to do this the fast way." He slid forward, over the grate, letting his shoes come to rest directly over it. He lifted his foot as high as it would go in the small space and slammed it down.

Ben could see the grate twist and fall through the hole, one of the remaining screws having popped under the force. The fourth and final screw was all that was holding the grate in place, but Malcolm bent it out of the way and hopped down into the room.

Julie and Ben followed.

"They're going to search each room, but they'll probably be slow since they need to put on the suits and keep things contained," Julie said. "They won't take that chance."

The two men nodded and looked around. They were in another hospital room, as small as Julie's, but this one had two beds—both empty. Apparently, 'quarantine containment' didn't mean the same thing as 'luxury quarters' to the hospital staff.

Ben rushed to the door and opened it a crack. "There's no one out there yet."

"They'll be coming, though," Malcolm said.

They followed Malcolm out into the hall. A set of double doors stood at the end of the long hallway. They sprung open and three men in containment suits and two others wearing tighter, clear protective suits over their normal clothes came bursting through.

They were armed.

"Stop, or we'll shoot!" one of them yelled.

Julie immediately turned and ran the other direction. Malcolm and Ben had no choice but to follow. Ben waited for bullets to slam into their backs, but they didn't come. Instead, he heard heavy footsteps as they ran after them.

"Sir, should we engage?" one of the men asked.

"Negative. Only if there's danger of a breach," another answered.

Julie ran for the single door at the opposite end of the hallway. Malcolm pressed the horizontal bar to open it. It pushed in, but the door wouldn't budge.

"Of course it's locked," he said, cursing.

"In here!" Julie shouted from the right. Ben turned to see where she was and found her inside a large office room, full of cubicles and computer stations. The men followed her in, and she closed the door behind them.

“It was cleared out when they quarantined this whole area,” Malcolm explained. “There’s another entrance a little ways back. We’ll need to block that door, too.”

Julie ran to the other end of the room and Ben came over to help her. While they slid a couple of the tall filing cabinets against the door, Malcolm did the same at the entrance they came through.

“What about this door?” Ben asked, pointing to a third exit.

“No idea,” Malcolm said.

Ben didn’t wait around. Marching over, he hammered on the horizontal bar. Locked. “Well, there goes that option.”

From a speaker on one of the desks a soft, reassuring voice, sounding like Alexa’s long-lost cousin, suddenly announced, “Nine, Nine, Two, Eight, Five. Black. Nine, Nine, Two, Eight, Five. Black.”

“It doesn’t matter, now,” Julie said. She slumped down into an office chair that had rolled into the gap between two cubicles.

99285. Black.

“What does that mean?” Ben asked, frantic.

“It means we’ve defaulted to another protocol.”

“What other protocol?” Ben said.

99285. Black.

“It means they’re operating according to CDC Threat Assessment standards. If there’s a possible breach in a contained facility—like this one—they move to contain the threat. If they can’t, or they believe the threat to be ‘imminently plausible,’ as it’s written, they move to eliminate the threat. Since these doors probably lead outside, they’ll move to close down our escape routes.” Julie explained, exhausted.

“In other words, those guys are going to start shooting us as soon as they get these doors open?” Ben asked.

As if on cue, a pounding bounced through the small office.

“Yes,” Julie said. “I’m a threat. And now you two are risk vectors.”

It was a tough reality to accept. Ben suddenly took a serious interest in their defensible position. “There has to be something in here we can use as a weapon.” He looked around but couldn’t find anything worth trying. Computer mice, keyboards, monitors...

“Okay,” Malcolm noted. “They’ll probably split up—five in all, three armed. So expect one, maybe two guys with guns to come through each door.”

99285. Black.

The pounding intensified, now coming from behind each of the two hallway doors. Ben stationed himself near one door, with Malcolm and Julie close to the other. Julie reached up and flicked the light switch, plunging the room into almost complete darkness.

When his eyes adjusted, Ben saw his door bow and buckle. The filing cabinets edged back until—The door crashed open and one of the men in hazmat suits fell through.

He didn’t see Ben.

That’s my edge, Ben thought.

The man’s suit blocked most of his peripheral vision.

Ben snuck around the filing cabinets, stopping when he was almost behind the open door. The man recovered his balance and brought his gun up, searching for a target as he stepped through...

...Just as Ben smashed the door forward as hard as he could with a solid kick. The door rocketed back, catching the man in the hazmat suit in the back of the head. The man grunted, dropping his gun and falling to the floor.

A second armed man lunged forward, but Ben had the drop on him. He stood up just as Ben pointed his gun back at him.

“Stay there, sir. I will shoot you.”

The man’s eyes were visible through the suit, and Ben focused on them. He steeled himself, not daring to flinch. The man finally relented, dropping his gun on the floor and raising his hands above his head. Ben heard another crash behind him—the third gunman had broken into the room.

The man in front of Ben flicked his eyes up and away from Ben, then back.

Shit.

Ben anticipated the shots, not a moment too soon. He dove toward the unarmed man in front of him and fell to the side, just as two shots rang out behind him.

“Ben!” he heard Julie yell from the other side of the room.

He was on the ground, groping around in the dark, looking for the gun he’d felt slip out of his hands. The second man was on him in a heartbeat, wrestling Ben to the ground.

Helpless, Ben felt like a turtle on his shell. The man on top of him was larger, heavier. He wrestled Ben’s hands behind his back and grabbed a fistful of Ben’s hair.

Another gunshot.

Ben flinched, but the man’s hand released his head, and he felt the weight lifted off his back.

He rolled over, raising his arms to defend a blow he knew would come, but instead he heard another gunshot.

This time, a cry rang out from the third gunman who’d entered, and he watched as the man fell to the ground. A third and fourth gunshot sent Ben’s wrestling partner into the filing cabinets against the wall.

Ben looked up to see Julie standing over the third gunman’s body, her jaw clenched in rage, holding a gun.

“You okay, ranger?” she asked.

He did a mental check of his muscles and bones. Finding everything to be in working order, he sat up and nodded. “Yeah, I’m good. Thanks.”

“No, thank you,” she said. “And thanks for throwing the gun my way. Good thinking.”

He stood. “Uh, yeah. No problem. Where’s Malcolm?”

“The door hit him when that guy busted it open. I think he just got knocked out.”

“Same thing happened to this guy. He’s probably going to wake up soon, though. We’d better get out of here before he does.” Ben counted the bodies sprawled on the floor. “I count three. What happened to the other two?”

“We have to go after them,” Julie said.

“Are you crazy? We’re leaving. Now.”

“Didn’t you see who they were?”

“No. I didn’t. Let’s go.”

“Ben,” Julie snapped, enraged. “It was Livingston. And Stephens.”

They checked into a hotel near the hospital under the name ‘Roger Ebert’ and paid cash.

It was Malcom’s idea and elicited only a shrug from him. “I always thought his reviews were terrible anyway,” he said.

Their plan was to stay there until they formulated a better plan.

Malcolm and Ben stared across the table at Julie.

“We need to get a bomb crew out to Yellowstone,” Malcolm said.

“Whatever other departments are on this have most likely already done it, so it would be a waste of time to try to call it in and set one up ourselves,” Ben said. “Julie can call and make sure on the way.”

“On the way where?” she asked.

“We need to get you help. Obviously, we can’t go back to that hospital, but there has to be somewhere else that’s set up a quarantine.” He rubbed his forehead. “And someone is going to have to come here and hose this room down now too, I’m guessing.”

“You need help too,” she said, flatly.

Ben thought about feigning ignorance, but what was the point? He pulled his shirt sleeve back and scratched his forearm. “How did you know?”

“It’s crawling up your neck.” Julie looked at Malcolm. “Hey, what about you?”

Malcolm blinked. “What about me?”

“You’re fine. No virus, no rash. Why?”

Malcolm sighed. “Yes, you are correct, Ms. Richardson. I have no rash, and I won’t get it. I believe the virus, while highly contagious, is non-recurring.”

“Non-recurring?”

“It means it won’t come back,” Julie said. “Like chickenpox.”

Ben rolled his eyes. “I know what it means. I want to know how...”

“I’ve already had the virus,” Malcolm explained. “I believe I was subjected to the virus a year ago. I believe I contracted it and they used me to test a treatment. I’m not sure they succeeded, but I did overhear them say the virus had ‘run its course through my system,’ and that I was immune.”

Julie was bewildered. “What are you talking about? Yellowstone only just happened.”

“Well,” Malcolm began, “about a year ago, I was on a research trip with some students from my university, up in the Northwest Territory—”

“You’re that professor!” Julie said. “Those students that went missing...”

“Yes. The team disappeared, and news agencies rode the media wave for months after we disappeared, but no one from the expedition was ever found, as you recall.”

Julie’s eyes were wide as Malcolm continued. “It wasn’t an innocent accident, like many thought. We didn’t fall through a frozen lake or get eaten by bears. My students were murdered.”

This revelation took Ben by surprise. Appalled, he asked, “Murdered? Why?”

Malcolm swallowed, trying to summon the words. “We made a discovery. An important one. I’ve since come to believe that one of the students may have been working against me. They must have alerted these murderers to our location. A helicopter came. It was... horrific.”

“What did you find?” Julie urged.

Malcolm tensed as he recalled the archaeological site. “Some kind of shrine. A place of some religious significance. There were offerings. Coins. Strange coins we’d never seen before. My guess is that they were tokens of some sort given to the indigenous tribe from that area, likely the same people who created the powder. The powder,” Malcolm added, “was the real discovery. White. Sandy. We assumed it was some medicinal herb offered to a god of some kind.” Malcolm looked her directly in the eye. “It was no such thing.”

“What was it?” Julie asked.

“The remnants of a native plant, dried leaves that had been left to decay before being ground in a pestle to form this powder. After so many years undisturbed, I believe it served as an incubator...”

“You think it’s somehow related to the virus?”

“I believe it is the virus, or at least the medium in which the virus was able to grow,” Malcolm said.

Ben recalled the news stories as well, vaguely. “No one mentioned a dig site on the news. They said you went looking and wound up lost.”

“Yes, because whatever company massacred my team did a good job of cleaning up after themselves. They staged our tents and equipment miles away at a different location. They left nothing that would have pointed to any suspicious activity.”

“But the whole thing was suspicious,” Julie said. “It was a big deal. Every news outlet in the country was reporting on it, and there were conspiracy theories about it too.”

“I know, I know. But like I said, the company did their job well.”

“You keep mentioning a company,” Ben said. “How do you know?”

Malcolm nodded. “They took me somewhere that had state-of-the-art medical facilities and questioned me. They didn’t torture me, as I doubt they thought I would ever leave the facility, but they weren’t satisfied that I knew next to nothing about this powder. They put me in a medically-induced coma, only bringing me out of it after months of being under.”

“My God,” Julie whispered.

“I did have plenty of time to think—it was odd, being in that state. I could sort of form thoughts and run through the things that I could remember, though it was a slower process than if I had been lucid. But it was when I was awake, or at least mostly awake, that I tried to piece together the information. The doctors working in my room each wore the same logo on their coats, and they worked in regular shifts—a large operation. Eventually, I caught a glimpse of the company’s name. ‘Drache Global.’”

“Drache?”

“Yes,” Malcolm said. “Drache Global. A pharmaceutical company based in Canada. I’d never heard of them, but I promised myself that I would get out of there and figure out who they were. I had plenty of time, remember, as I was lying on a hospital bed for months. I formulated a plan, and I got out one night.” Malcolm looked at the wall, examining the lattice-shaped wallpaper.

Ben could tell there was more to the story behind the man’s escape, but he didn’t press him about it.

“I got out, and I ran. I ran for my life. I wanted to hide, but I wanted more than anything to right the wrongs done to my students and their families. I had to figure out what Drache Global was.”

“What did you find?” Julie asked. Ben noticed she had placed a hand on Malcolm’s forearm on the table.

“That this hospital you were brought to, Julie, is part of it. Drache Global, like the hospital, is owned by a group of shareholders. It’s a corporate conglomerate. Publicly listed, but not easy to piece together who the real owners are. I researched and cross-referenced as many of their board members as I could manage, but found very few promising leads.

“I spent many hours in the depths of libraries and scouring the web, and all I was able to figure out was that they’re semi-legitimate, at least on the surface. They’ve worked on countless grant proposals, major nonprofit medical research projects, and more public goodwill campaigns than a politician. But I think there’s a simple thread connecting them to some other organizations with bipolar personalities.”

“What thread is that?” Julie asked.

“They have the same names,” Ben said.

“Yes,” Malcolm said, smiling. “Very good. Dragonstone, Drache Global, Drage Medisinsk. They are all very similar, using different languages that all mean ‘dragon.’”

“Why would they broadcast that? If they were trying to operate under the radar, why share a common name?” Julie asked.

“Plenty of companies borrow that name. It’s not particularly unique, even within the medical and pharmaceutical research industries. And I believe it’s more like a calling card. A brand, if you will.”

“So, you think this ‘dragon’ company is working across its sister organizations to create some worldwide virus?” Ben asked. He scratched his forearms. While still somewhat itchy, it did in fact seem like the virus had slowed to a halt. Weird.

“No,” Malcolm answered. “I believe it’s the work of a handful of people, not a worldwide corporate effort. Secretive or not, I cannot believe something that large-scale could go unnoticed by world governments. I also believe they aren’t targeting the entire world, but the United States. Through the spreading virus, the bomb at Yellowstone.”

“For what purpose?” Julie asked. “It doesn’t make any sense.”

It made sense to Ben. “To sell a cure.”

“By using a bomb at Yellowstone as a delivery method for the disease? That’s insane,” Julie objected.

Yet there was virus. And there had been an explosion. Those were indisputable facts.

Ben shrugged. “Yet here we are.”

Malcolm nodded. “I think it’s worse than we’re contemplating.”

“What do you mean?”

“Yellowstone is the largest active volcano in the entire world.”

“He’s right,” Ben agreed. “The Yellowstone caldera lies directly underneath the park. That’s a fact. It’s a supervolcano. We’ve been arguing about it exactly when it’s scheduled to erupt again for years. If there were a bomb placed at just the right spot, underground, anywhere in that area, and it went off..”

Julie thought about this for a moment. “What would the blast radius be?”

“The last time it blew, it shot ash about twenty miles into the air, and was around 1,000 times more powerful than Mt. St. Helens. It would instantly wipe out half of the United States. Followed by a volcanic winter for years afterwards.”

Julie went pale. “Total destruction.”

Ben nodded. “Total destruction.”

Julie whistled. “So, we’ve got a mystery organization trying to blow up Yellowstone and half the United States, while also working on spreading a virus to the rest of the United States.”

She had summed it up pretty well. Malcolm nodded. “It’s the destruction of an entire nation, within the span of mere days. Possibly the collapse of society as we know it.”

“And you think Stephens and Livingston are somehow involved?” Ben asked.

“I don’t know. They were just following protocol back there. Trying to keep it contained. But Livingston’s actions from earlier—blocking Stephens’ emails from getting through, preventing me from getting them altogether—that doesn’t sit well with me.”

“You did say he’s a bit paranoid.” Ben said.

“He is,” Julie answered, “but he’s not crazy.”

The two men shared a glance. “Julie, how well do you know him, really?” Malcolm asked.

Again, she paused before speaking. When she did, her jaw was set and her eyes steady. “Not well enough, I guess.”

Her phone vibrated on the table in front of her. Unknown. She frowned but answered it anyway.

“Hello?”

She waited.

“Randy! My God, are you okay? I’ve been trying—”

She turned on the phone’s speaker function so Malcolm and Ben could hear.

“—Fine. I didn’t want to call on my phone in case it’s being tracked. I saw an email thread between Livingston and Stephens. They said you were in a hospital. Are you okay?”

“I’m okay. It’s the virus, but it seems to have slowed down for the moment. I’m with Ben...” she wasn’t sure how to explain Malcolm’s presence, so she moved on. “Listen, Randy, I—I don’t know for sure, but I think Livingston might be involved in all of this somehow.”

No response.

“I know you’re already under fire for this, but I really need eyes on him. And keep sending me anything you find on Diana Torres and what she was working on.”

“Got it.”

“I owe you one.”

“You owe me more than one.”

She hung up.

David Livingston flicked off the 95-inch curved television in his living room. Brand new and still priced like the novelty it was, the Samsung was his pride and joy, at least for this month.

He had satellite and cable television, Netflix, and an action movie collection of over one-thousand titles, and he still couldn't find something to watch. He tossed the remote control to the other side of the couch. Unsure of how to satiate his desire for entertainment, Livingston sat in silence for a minute.

Juliette's involved in this, he thought. He knew it. It was stronger than the standard pang of paranoia that constantly plagued him about each of his employees; this was real. He had proof.

Stephens believed him. Both men had been at the hospital, planning to interrogate her after she'd failed to turn over the information she'd acquired during her "stint" in the field. And after Livingston had discovered that Randall Brown, his own IT technician, had helped Julie, it was enough for Livingston to convict her.

He didn't know exactly how, or why, but he knew Juliette Richardson was involved in this mess. He'd spent enough time in government to know that careers were made or broken by the men who went the extra mile to prevent mutiny within their ranks.

And his career would be made. He just needed a little more proof, and a motive wouldn't hurt, either. He had ordered Randall Brown to record and send over to him any conversations Julie had with him, but he'd also placed a few IT bugs of his own on Brown's network. Any calls the IT tech made or received would be immediately recorded and emailed to Livingston.

It was these types of plays that Livingston knew would eventually get him noticed in Washington. He wasn't naive enough to think that those in power got there by cashing in on their good deeds.

He rose from the couch, pacing before heading to his office. The foyer of his house was immaculate, smaller than he would have liked but impressive nonetheless. He paid a few hundred dollars a month to a maid service to keep the place clean enough to meet his standards, and another couple hundred on the side to the maid herself for "on the side"-type activities. It had taken a few months to find a woman agreeable to his terms, but as he'd discovered in his own career, a little cash went a long way. The companionship did nothing to satiate his loneliness, but it helped make his large house feel more like home.

He entered the great office at the front of his house, admiring his decorating job. A huge bust of an elk or moose—he wasn't sure which, and he hadn't shot it anyway—smiled down at him from the far wall, hanging directly above a large fireplace with an ancient-looking mantle. He'd placed a few picture frames, the stock photos still inside, on the mantle and around the room on floating shelves.

But his prize possession, the pièce de résistance, was the huge Scottish coat of arms hanging above his desk. The placard was enormous, stretching almost four feet across and six feet tall. It was red, yellow, and green, and didn't match anything else in his house. But it was him. His history, his name, his origins.

It represented him, and all that he stood for, and he stood a moment in front of it, admiring the wooden shield.

He walked behind his desk, grabbing the decanter of whiskey and pouring himself a glass. He stood face-to-face with the coat of arms for another moment, enjoying the warm liquid. Finally, he sat.

And saw a man standing in the center of the room, staring at him.

Recognition washed quickly over Livingston, but he was angered that the man had caught him by surprise.

“Oh—my God,” Livingston said, nearly dropping his glass of liquor. “You scared the shit out of me. What are you doing here?”

He made a mental note to call his security company to set up perimeter alarms. The HD motion cameras were enough to turn over footage to the police after a break-in, but they obviously weren't meant as an early-warning system. He grunted and sipped on his whiskey.

The man continued staring.

“Well, what do you need? You seemed to enjoy sneaking up on me. What is it?”

The man finally looked Livingston up and down and shook his head. Livingston sat down behind the desk, acting preoccupied with a stack of papers. As he picked up the stack and began to rummage through them, he heard a clunk on the desk.

At the edge of the desk, Livingston saw a small, compact 9mm revolver. His visitor had placed the gun there, and now stepped back from the desk to the middle of the room once again.

Livingston felt his blood run cold. His nostrils flared, and anger flashed through his body. Still, he was calm. He took another sip of whiskey, this time deeper, letting the heat sting the back of his throat.

“Trying to intimidate me?” he asked.

“Is it working?”

Livingston snorted through a mouthful of liquor. He swallowed and blew out a breath of alcohol-laced air.

“This is a waste of time,” Livingston said. “I don't know anything, or anyone.”

“I didn't say you did,” the man replied immediately.

“You want answers, talk to Julie, or that thug she's running around with.”

“I don't need to.”

Livingston's anger grew. “What the hell are you here for, then?”

The man blinked.

Livingston looked down at the pistol, then up at the man, catching his eye. He looked to the large bust of the moose-elk, across the mantel at the pictures of someone else's family, and then back down at the gun again. He picked it up slowly, delicately.

He'd actually never held a gun before.

It was heavier than he'd imagined, surprising for its compact size. He examined it. The barrel, trigger, and hammer—is that what the back thing is called?

He felt its weight beneath his fingers. The man didn't say a word as Livingston pressed the safety release back and forth, locking and unlocking the gun's firing pin.

Livingston wasn't going to let himself be intimidated. He wouldn't be humiliated, especially not in his own home. He felt his lip turn upward into a slight sneer. This asshole.

He stood up, gaining confidence. “Get out.” The words were cold.

The man didn't move.

“Get out,” he said again. He lifted the gun quickly and pointed it at the man's chest. “Don't make me repeat it.”

Still, the man didn't speak. His expression was stoic, but Livingston could see a glint of something—amusement?—in the man's eyes.

He felt his right arm shaking, and he tried to force it to stop. He aimed the revolver and closed his eyes just as he pulled the trigger.

He heard a tiny click.

That wasn't right.

He tried again.

Click.

Shit.

He looked down at the gun, as if silently arguing with the metal contraption, but nothing happened. When he looked up, the man standing in front of him was shaking his head.

"You're too predictable, Livingston. Always have been. All of you."

Livingston frowned, but the man was already moving. He closed the distance between them in less than a second, and Livingston saw him pull his arm back.

He smashed his fist into Livingston's face. Livingston felt his hands open, dropping the empty gun and the glass of whiskey. They both tumbled and fell to the top of the desk. The glass shattered, whiskey and shards of crystal exploding around him. He was immediately in a daze, his mouth opening and closing as his brain tried to offer some sort of help.

The man, however, didn't stop to wait for Livingston to recover. He grabbed a wad of Livingston's thick, dyed hair and yanked up on it. He met Livingston's eyes for a brief moment, then slammed Livingston's head down on the top of the desk. Hard.

Livingston's face and ears exploded in pain, only to be followed by a much more penetrating ringing pain that lanced through the inside of his mind. He felt as if his entire head had been lit on fire from the inside out.

He flailed his arms wildly, but the man was still in control. Once again, he brought Livingston's head up, held tightly by the tufts of hair, then smashed it back down on the desk.

Livingston groaned, and his body went slack. His eyes were blurry, but he was still conscious. He felt a trickle of drool escape the corner of his mouth, but he made no motion to wipe it away.

He collapsed downward, his rear end somehow finding the chair as his torso and upper body sprawled forward onto the desk. He lay still, wondering why he hadn't already blacked out.

"You've been a cancer to this organization for years, Livingston," the man said. Livingston heard a scrape and felt the desk vibrate slightly. He turned his face to the side, trying to will his eyes to focus.

The man had picked up the gun and was now reaching into his jacket pocket. He withdrew something—something small, shiny.

A bullet.

Livingston was unable to panic, or perform any other voluntary function, but alarm sirens erupted in his brain. Or was it still the pain? He was unsure—everything was blurred together, one giant smear of pain and confusion.

"You're predictable, useless, and spineless. I can't think of a greater waste of air than the breath you breathe."

Livingston was surprised to discover he was still capable of feeling anger. He relished the anger, though he was unable to act on it. He grunted again.

The man loaded the bullet into the chamber and Livingston heard a succession of clicks.

"This has been a long time coming, Livingston. Sorry it had to be this way, but like I said—you're predictable."

Livingston didn't hear the explosion of the bullet as it raced out of the barrel and found its target.

Julie was adamant. “Go! Stop being ridiculous—I’ll be fine!”

Ben shook his head, planning to stage a resistance. Malcolm grabbed Ben’s arm and pulled him out of the hotel room. “It’s fine. We’ll only be gone for a few minutes.”

She had insisted that the two men go pick up some supplies and takeout Chinese for the three of them. After a few minutes of arguing back and forth, Julie had prevailed, and the two men left for the F450 parked outside.

When they were gone, Julie opened her laptop. She initiated a few searches, first inside the SecuNet database and the rest of the private CDC intranet, then through Google. She tried numerous combinations. Livingston CDC, David Livingston, David Livingston CDC, and more, but each result was merely a bare-bones biographical entry that was obviously written by Livingston himself.

David Foster Livingston is a successful leader and proven manager in many corporate settings. He is currently head of the Biological Threat Research division of the Centers for Disease Control. A growing list of Livingston’s accomplishments include successfully restructuring the BTR division for efficiency and efficacy, increasing employee retention, and streamlining data systems for cost effectiveness at BetaMark, Inc., where he was previously employed. He has one daughter and resides in Minnesota.

Julie saw the same paragraph pasted onto every page that referenced Livingston. Each of the surrounding articles only mentioned the man, too. A project he co-sponsored, a few articles written by a team Livingston had served on, and a few shots of the man on a company softball team years ago. Livingston was certainly paranoid, as the verbatim biography on each site suggested that he’d been successful in forcing each of the article’s writers to update his information with the same paragraph.

She shook her head and reached for her phone.

“Hey Randy, it’s me again. Anything yet?”

“Julie, it’s been like ten minutes. Are you serious?”

“I know. I’m getting a little antsy.”

“I get it. What do you want now?”

“I’m trying to find something on Livingston—just in case.”

“Don’t bother,” Randy said. “I already tried. It’s pointless. The man’s got the PR team of a celebrity.”

Julie laughed as she read the first line of the Livingston biography. “David Foster Livingston is a successful leader and proven...”

“...Manager in many corporate settings,” Randy finished. “Ugh. You’ve got to be kidding me. What a joke.”

“Okay, well, thanks for checking. Let me know if you come up with anything else.”

“Will do—.”

“Hey, one more thing,” Julie said into the phone.

“What’s that?”

Julie paused. “Uh, don’t worry about it, actually. Let me see if I can dig something up first.”

She hung up the phone and woke up her computer’s screen. She started a new search and began browsing through the results.

Eventually one result jumped out at her.

Teenaged Hero Rescues Father and Brother was the headline.

She clicked the listing and waited for the slow hotel Wi-Fi connection to load the advertisement-riddled page. It was a newspaper article that had been scanned and transcribed for the news site's archives, dated thirteen years ago.

"...The Bennett men were camping in a southern region of Glacier National Park when the youngest Bennett, nine-year-old Zachary, wandered to a clearing where he accidentally stumbled between a mother grizzly bear and her cub..."

"Johnson Bennett ran to his son's aid, but the mother grizzly struck Johnson, knocking the man unconscious..."

"...Shooting the larger bear first with two rounds from the father's rifle and scaring away the cub. Harvey pursued the smaller animal and eventually shot it, bringing it down with one round..."

Julie covered her mouth as she read the account.

"...Zachary and Johnson Bennett were rushed to St. Andrews Memorial Hospital, where they were both treated for severe trauma, and the elder Bennett for a concussion. Zachary Bennett is expected to make a full recovery. Johnson Bennett is currently comatose in a stable condition, however, doctors are unsure of the possibility of recovery..."

The door to the hotel room opened, and Julie quickly slammed the laptop shut.

"Julie!"

It was Ben.

Startled, Julie nearly tripped over the chair as she stood and turned toward the door. Malcolm Fischer entered the room just behind Ben, breathing heavily.

"Julie, I got an email from Randy. Just now."

Julie looked at him. "Randall Brown? My IT guy?"

"Yeah, he wanted to send it over directly, since he thought there might be an issue with your emails or something. But you should have gotten it too."

She started to check her email but stopped herself. "Okay, well what did he say?"

"It was a forward of my mother's email draft. She must have tried to send it, but it never went out."

Julie's eyes widened.

"It has information in it, Julie, about the virus. The night... the night she died, she must have been writing it. It's got everything she was working on, and everything she and her assistant discovered. For one, it's not a virus."

Julie narrowed her eyes. "Go on."

"My mother's research seems to prove that the virus is a mutated bacteria—"

"No, that's not possible. The contagious spread, the outbreak pattern, the—"

"It's a virus inside a mutated bacterial infection."

Julie's head snapped up. "Come again?"

"That's right, Julie," Malcolm explained. "Dr. Torres is postulating that the reason this strain has been so difficult to model is due to its uncharacteristic qualities. Map it as a virion, and it fails many of the chemical application tests. Map it as a bacteria and it doesn't appear to be living—immediately disqualifying it from the ranks of bacteriophages."

"Did she figure out a way to combat it?" Julie asked, hopeful.

Malcolm and Ben shared a knowing glance.

"No," Ben said.

"But," Malcolm added. "She did find that the infection will naturally die out, after running its course. It reaches a certain point and just vanishes."

“Not until after it kills its host,” Julie said.

“We’re not dead yet,” Malcolm said. “And I’m still here.” He stepped forward, his voice calm and steady, “We need to get to a research lab. If there’s any way you can find out exactly why none of us in this room are dead, you must.”

Julie started pacing. “We’re not going back to the CDC. Livingston and Stephens might be there.”

“What about the bomb back at the park?” Ben added.

“Can’t you call someone there? Someone who might—”

“Julie.” Ben’s voice was firm, but he looked her right in the eyes until she understood. “There’s no one else.”

She hesitated, thinking through it. “You’re right. There’s no one there who can help anymore. The government agencies involved are going to wait until they know it’s not dangerous to their staff. It’s what I’m supposed to do—wait until someone presents some compelling research as to why it’s safe for us to go in, then send a bomb squad in hazmat suits to find anything unusual.”

“That will take much too long,” Malcolm said.

“It will,” Ben answered. “But there’s a lab at the park—it’s not much, but it’ll have to do. I’m going back there, to figure this out.”

As if remembering the dire situation they were all in, Ben looked down at his hands and arms.

“Does it hurt?” Julie asked.

“No. It hasn’t really done much at all, and it’s not itching at the moment.”

“Neither is mine,” Julie said, examining her own arms.

“So,” Malcolm said, calling them to attention. “I guess it’s just us, then?”

“Dr. Fischer, you don’t need to come along,” Julie said. “If what we’re saying is true, we’re going into an infected quarantine, looking for a massive bomb hidden below the surface somewhere. It’s not exactly a risk-free project.”

Malcolm lifted his chin. “Julie, I understand that you are concerned. And you are right to assume that this is extremely dangerous. But I will not sit idly by and do nothing to right the wrongs done to me, or my students.”

His monologue over, he tensed his jaw and waited for the others’ response.

Ben looked over and shrugged. “I feel you, Doc. I wouldn’t make you sit on the sidelines.”

Julie smiled.

“Let’s get to Yellowstone.”

They sat down at the table in the small hotel room, ready to plan their trip back to Yellowstone, when Julie’s phone rang again. She grabbed it before it rang a second time.

“Randy—what’s up?”

As she listened, the muscles in her face tightened and her back became rigid. She swallowed a few times, her mouth suddenly dry.

When she hung up, Ben and Malcolm were perched in their chairs, awaiting the news.

She blinked a few times, as though suddenly embarrassed that she might cry.

“—Livingston,” she said. “He’s dead.”

“Monsieur Valère, the conference is now available,” the voice said. It sounded metallic and hollow, detached, yet it was the most lifelike computerized voice system Francis Valère had ever heard.

“Merci,” Valère responded. He waited for the computer system to check the Ethernet connection, test internet speed, and finally ping the waiting room of the online web conferencing service. Within seconds, the voice emanated from the walls of Valère’s office again.

“Connection speeds are exceptional, Monsieur.” The voice had an eerily attractive component to it, Valère realized, as he waited for the two other participants’ faces to appear in front of him. She had also been upgraded to a human-like level of what they were calling “AI hyperbole,” which was, as far as Valère could tell, just a library of phrases that replaced the usual metric and clinically precise statements that plagued most artificial voice systems.

SARA—Simulated Artificial Response Array—was the Company’s latest alpha release they were testing in their offices. At this point, it was nothing more than a computerized artificial intelligence, more advanced than anything on the market, but far from deployment-ready.

The plan was, Valère had been told, to get SARA to beta and then release the code and sound sample library, alone more than ten terabytes of information, to a few universities for further development and testing. Eventually, they would either use the application for internal purposes or sell the final design schematics to the highest black market bidder. As SARA’s development was about as removed from Valère’s professional expertise as possible, he wasn’t entirely sure what she would finally become. But if the previous applications their affiliates had released were any measure, SARA would be nothing short of miraculous.

Valère was involved in a number of startup tech and pharmaceutical businesses. He was independently wealthy, thanks to the benefit of a long line of rich relatives who’d left a startlingly large inheritance, as well as his own knack for choosing investment opportunities. A few had bombed, but he had invested far and wide, amassing a fortune of interests in just about every sector related to computer intelligence and medical advancement.

“Francis, are you with us?” a man’s voice spoke from inside his computer screen.

Valère cleared his throat. “Oui, I am here. I apologize for my tardiness—I have been following the latest developments in the United States.”

“As have I,” the second voice answered. The man’s face in front of Valère was enlarged on the gigantic screen. The sound emanated from the walls themselves. Audio-Enhanced Surfacing, if Valère remembered correctly. The walls of his Quebec office space were essentially made of thousands of speakers, each implanted with a computer chip that made them “intelligent”—allowing them to emulate a natural sound environment. He could play music that followed him throughout the room, providing a sonically perfect artificial surround-sound in an acoustically exceptional environment.

For now, the man’s voice, in crisp and clear stereo, was all Valère cared about. The man inside the window continued. “It appears as though our initial plan has been delayed. After your dismissal of Mr. Jefferson—”

“Nonsense,” Valère said. “Our placements were sound. Each of the departments is operating smoothly, according to their protocols, and taking no unnecessary risks or making any rash decisions.”

“Francis,” the first man, Emilio Vasquez, said, “while I admit our infiltrated agencies are doing exactly as we had hoped; you cannot deny the existence of a few rogue operatives. The CDC’s department head has been removed, but it still seems as though a few members of its lower ranks are curious.”

Valère thought about this for a moment. “Do you honestly believe they have become a threat?”

“Hardly,” Emilio responded. “It is merely in our best interests to ensure that these possible threats stay just that.”

“And how exactly do we ensure that?” Valère asked.

The other man paused for a moment. “I believe it’s time for the contingency plan.”

“I—we—don’t need a contingency plan,” Valère responded. “This plan is sound—it always has been.”

“I’m not saying it hasn’t been, Valère. But there’s always room for improvement.”

“But these rogue operatives have been working outside of our target organizations. They are no more a threat to us than the local police.”

“But you’re wrong, Valère. They are far more of a threat to us, especially now. They are mobile, and we are still unsure of their capabilities. Borders mean nothing to them, nor do their organization’s standards. We’ve worked far too long on this project to lose the investment entirely.”

Emilio’s face was growing slightly red, though his voice betrayed no raise of emotions. Valère knew the man was moments away from growing indignant, but the man stopped himself just short.

Valère sighed. “These deaths are unnecessary,” he said. “They are inevitable, but must they come from our hands?”

“Valère,” Emilio said. “As you know, these deaths are nothing when measured against what we will accomplish.”

“I agree, but—”

“And their deaths will not be ‘by our hand,’ as you say. Far from it.”

Valère nodded.

“Let us see this through to the end, Valère. Let us complete our mission.”

He nodded again.

No one spoke at first. Finally, SARA’s voice boomed through the walls. “We will need your verbal commitment, Monsieur Valère. Please provide verbal confirmation of your agreement to the chosen contingency.”

Good Lord, she was remarkable. SARA had parsed, compiled, and transcribed the conversation, as she had been instructed, but she had also extrapolated from the silence that the other man was waiting for Valère’s confirmation, as per the contract, as well as the fact that he didn’t want to specifically ask for it.

Technology. Incroyable.

“Yes,” he stammered. “Yes, I confirm. We shall commence with a contingency that merely supports our overall direction, as discussed in previous communications. SARA, please transcribe, encrypt, and archive this discussion into your database, and remove all references therein.”

“Oui, Monsieur Valère,” SARA said. As Valère stood from his computer desk, the woman’s computerized voice followed the location of his head with pinpoint accuracy, causing Valère to feel as though she were inside his head, not just talking to it. “I will alert you of any updates.”

He nodded, knowing SARA could see that, too.

“We’re almost at the park border. Lab’s about another half hour,” Ben explained.

Julie sat with her feet up on the dash of her F450, focused again on her laptop. Malcolm sat in the back seat, reading a stack of papers Julie had printed at the hotel’s business center, all on infectious diseases, viral outbreaks, and bacterial infections—internal CDC documentation and reference material.

Malcolm was specifically looking for research into anthrax-type infections, where the originating material was powdery, dry, or airborne. A fast reader, he had almost made it through the entire stack when they finally reached the gates of Yellowstone’s northeast entrance, with nothing intriguing to show for his efforts.

Outside, the wooden Welcome to Yellowstone National Park sign drifted by, sitting atop a log display, surrounded by a freshly manicured garden of flowers, shrubs, and small trees. Behind it, the sprawling wilderness that drew three-million-plus visitors a year.

Except today.

The road narrowed, pointing them toward a service building where police officers and park rangers were operating a road blocking and turning tourists away. A white tent had been erected off to the side and Julie could see that it was meant for hazmat teams from her own organization for the mobile treatment of any infected individuals found inside the park.

“If they see we’re infected they’re going to pounce on us,” Julie warned.

“They may have been advised to watch for us anyway,” Malcolm remarked.

“Ten Most Wanted?” Ben said. “Great. That’s a comfort.” He fished his wallet out and held it up. “Well I’m still a ranger here. They better have a damn good reason to detain me.”

Ahead, one of the police officers had spotted their truck approaching and had walked into the road, standing in front of his police vehicle. He held up his arms and waved them down.

“They may not need a reason,” Julie muttered under her breath.

Ben slowed the truck to a stop and rolled down the window.

The police officer almost had to stand on his toes to see into the truck’s high window, but he removed his sunglasses and spoke loudly over the rumble of the engine. “Park’s closed,” he said. “No access in or out.”

Ben displayed his ID badge from his wallet. “I work here—”

“Doesn’t matter.” The police officer cut him off, curtly. “No one in or out. You can turn around right here, then head back on this road...” His voice trailed off as he pointed in the direction from which they’d come.

“Officer, I’m going to need to get into the park. We’ve got information on this virus, and—”

“Son, I’m not going to ask you again. Park access is prohibited. Go home, stay inside, and keep watching the news.”

Ben gritted his teeth and revved the engine. As the officer stepped backward, Ben spun the truck around him and accelerated onto the north-bound side of the road.

“At least he didn’t arrest us,” Julie said.

Malcolm called up from the back of the truck. “Now what?”

Ben didn’t answer. He drove another mile and turned left onto a dirt road leading back to the southwest, and sped up again. They bounced over the uneven, rocky road and swerved between trees that jutted out over their heads.

“Where are we going?” Julie, said, alarmed.

“Private access road,” he snapped.

“Won’t they still find us? There are probably hazmat and outbreak teams from every branch of government and local police forces inside the park.”

“Probably.”

“It doesn’t matter,” Malcolm answered. “They’ll know soon enough that we’re here, but if we don’t get to that lab and figure out what makes this thing stop, it will be too late anyway.”

As a confirmation, Ben poked at the radio until he found a news station. It didn’t take long—one station was playing a prerecorded commercial, but the second he tried was broadcasting a nationwide message. He turned the volume up as an anchor’s voice solemnly read the latest update.

“...Reports are in that the viral outbreak has extended as far south as Albuquerque, New Mexico, and as far east as Wichita, Kansas. Experts from the CDC and other sources suggest that if the outbreak can be contained, the death toll will rise to around 10,000 people, but if not, that number could skyrocket to more than a million. Estimates predict that number to be far too conservative, especially if the trajectory of the disease places it anywhere near the western seaboard.

“As a reminder, please stay inside, try not to interact with anyone outside of your immediate family, and stay tuned to news and radio updates.”

The anchor signed off, promising another update in an hour, and went to a commercial break. Ben punched the power button.

None of them said anything for a while.

The truck bounced over ditches and through a stream until, taking the short cut to another dirt road. Once on level ground, Ben smashed the gas pedal, sending the already fast-moving truck hurtling over potholes and bumps as if they were no more than pebbles on the road.

Minutes later, they reached the lab facility. A brownstone building, painted to blend into the surrounding forest and not stick out to any vacationers camped nearby. Ben pulled the truck into a spot outside the main entrance. The windows were dark. It appeared unoccupied.

Julie’s phone rang before they could get inside.

“Stephens? You want to explain to me what the hell happened back—”

“Julie, listen. I’m sorry. That was Livingston’s decision, not mine. Just ask him.”

But she couldn’t ask him. Had Stephens heard the news? It didn’t sound like it.

“Where are you now?”

“We’re at Yellowstone. We’re trying to—” She felt a hand rest on her arm. Ben was shaking his head.

“Trying to what, Julie? What are you up to? You need to get away from there, before this gets out of hand.”

Julie dithered, but Ben was insistent. Again, slowly, he shook his head.

“Sorry—Benjamin, I can’t. We’re close. I can’t give you an update right now, but I—”

“Julie! You can’t afford to keep gallivanting around. If Livingston finds out...”

The words tumbled from her mouth before she could control them. “Stephens, where have you been? What are you doing?”

There was a pause.

“I’m—I’m... working on this, too, Julie. What do you mean?”

She waited a moment, then said. “Don’t worry about Livingston. Listen, I need to go. I’ll check in tonight, after we leave.”

“Okay...” the voice was shaky, uncertain. “Okay, you’re right. Keep at it, Julie. Let me know what you need.”

She thanked him and hung up, then looked at the other two passengers in the truck.

“He doesn’t know already?” Malcolm asked.

“I... I guess not.”

Ben put the truck in park and opened his door, still shaking his head. When he caught sight of his hand on the door handle looked up sharply and caught Julie’s attention.

“What is it?” she asked.

“Look,” Ben said. He held out his left arm and pulled his sleeve up. The rash had disappeared from his exposed hand, and his arm looked almost completely normal, replaced by his natural skin tone. His right arm looked similar. Julie checked out her own rash and found the same to be true.

“It’s gone,” she said.

“Almost. Come on, we need to get in there. Whatever’s left of the virus in our systems is the only hope we have left to figure out what this is.”

“But why’s it going away? I feel fine, too.”

Malcolm jumped out to take a closer look too. “It appears to have naturally run its course. I think it’s dying out on its own.”

“Is that what happened to you?” Julie asked.

“No,” he replied. “I don’t know if I had a rash. I was sedated—comatose.”

Hurriedly, they head into the laboratory building.

“They built this place back in the ‘80s for onsite research,” Ben explained. “No one uses it much now. It’s not much of a lab but it’s all we’ve got.”

“Looks very, um, ‘high school,’” Malcolm noted.

“That’s why no one uses it much. It’s not specific enough to be considered a chemistry lab or a biology one. It’s also not quite big enough to be helpful for our geologists, geographers, or animal scientists. So, it’s a backup.”

Malcolm muttered something under his breath and continued exploring the small room.

Julie zeroed in on a collection of microscopes and immediately began preparing one, searching the drawers for glass slides. “It’ll have to do,” she said, setting up the standard issue compound light microscope on a table in the corner of the room. “Damn.”

“What’s wrong?” Ben asked.

““This is a compound scope, and there’s no way there’s enough power to magnify anything smaller than a bug. I wish there was a transmission-electron in here. Even an LVEM or something would be fine.”

Ben simply stared back at her.

“This will have to work,” she said. “It’s not going to get us all the way there, but it might be enough to measure chemical reactions and test for an antidote. Come here.”

Ben stepped forward, and she reached for his arm. He pulled back, reacting involuntarily.

“Chill. I’m not going to bite.” She rolled up his sleeve. “Dr. Fischer, would you mind helping me?”

Malcolm came over as Julie whipped out a strand of latex she’d found amongst the assortment of scientific equipment. She handed Ben’s arm to Malcolm, who held it precariously in front of him. As he held it, she tied the latex band around Ben’s upper arm, causing the veins to bulge as the blood became restricted.

Taking a small syringe, she poked it into one of the veins. The chamber began to fill with a deep crimson color.

“Geez,” Ben said. “You didn’t test it for rabies or anything.”

“Rabies is the least of your worries,” Julie answered, focusing on holding the syringe straight. “Besides, I doubt that would be the problem with these needles. God knows how long they’ve been here.” As a sort of flourish, she blew on the latex band and the syringe that was plunged into the vein. A thin veil of dust sprung from their surfaces, causing all three to blink and look away.

“Ah, right. Seems perfectly safe.”

She shushed him, and withdrew the syringe slowly from his arm.

“How much do you need? Seems like overkill,” Malcolm said.

“I don’t know how many units are left inside the bloodstream or if we’ll be able to see it at all. Plus, the virus is wearing off, as we saw earlier. I may not have time to extract more later, since the units might be working their way out.”

She placed the cap on the syringe chamber and loaded another. This one, she stuck into her own arm, not bothering to check for a vein or tie off her upper arm.

“Units?” Ben asked.

“Like chickenpox,” she answered.

Malcolm and Ben still didn’t understand.

“I’m developing a hypothesis about it, but it’s pretty simple. Imagine a kid has chickenpox—the varicella zoster virus—and has a birthday party. Some kid comes to the birthday party and gives the birthday boy one unit of the virus. That unit multiplies—as viruses do—to a certain point, until the virus has physically manifested itself in the host’s body.”

“Little red bumps all over his skin.”

“Yes, exactly. But that’s it. It doesn’t ever really get worse than the bumps, though as you might remember, those bumps are bad enough. The virus has reached its ‘critical mass’ in the kid’s system. The units have reached their maximum exposure ratio, and they won’t—can’t—proliferate any more. But he’s still very contagious, too. Since the virus is at critical mass, every kid who comes over will probably get it, right?”

“Unless they’ve already had it,” Malcolm said.

“And then they’ll do the oatmeal baths and stuff and eventually the virus goes away,” Ben added.

Julie nodded, removed the full syringe from her arm, and continued. “Well, this virus-bacteria is a bit different. Let’s say the kid was infected with a unit of this... stuff. Whatever it is. That one unit would reproduce and multiply into ten units, become contagious, and spread to other people, just like the chickenpox. They’d all get infected, it would grow to ten units in each of them, and they’d all be contagious—but still alive.”

“So far, so good,” Ben said. “Except for the life-threatening rash.”

“But, if the kid is infected with more than ten units initially, it’s over. He’s quarantined, but the effect is devastating—the virus is too much for the body to handle and will begin to shut down.”

“The body can’t handle more than ten units?” Malcolm asked.

“Well, ten is an arbitrary number, but in this scenario, yes. Whatever number of units our virus needs to reach critical mass is the amount of virus that can ‘safely’ infect a person. Anything over that, and the host dies. Below that—”

“And it reproduces itself up to that number but doesn’t go over,” Ben finished.

Julie nodded. “That’s my hypothesis. After that, the virus naturally works its way out of the host’s system, rendering them immune to further attack.”

Ben and Malcolm thought about this a moment. It made sense—hypothetical or not—and both men nodded their approval.

“I’m guessing that whenever we were exposed to the disease, it was only a small amount,” Ben said. “Less than critical mass. It’s run its course and is now working its way out.”

They heard the laboratory door slam shut, and all three turned to look. A tall, thin man stepped into view, smiling. “That’s exactly right, Mr. Bennett. What a precise deduction.”

“Stephens?” Julie asked, jumping up from her perch near the table and microscope. “What—how are you here?”

Benjamin Stephens drew closer. “I was already on the way,” he replied. “When I called, I was already in the area. I thought I’d check in with you in person, since our tech communication seems to be consistently ineffective.”

Julie didn’t respond.

“Don’t worry, Julie. Ben—” he turned to look at the third man in the room, hesitated for a split second, and frowned. “Mr.—I’m sorry, I don’t believe we’ve met.” Stephens walked over to Malcolm and stretched out his hand.

“Right. Dr. Fischer. My apologies.” Stephens had the room completely focused on him, and he savored the moment. “Sorry for my intrusion. As I mentioned, I merely came to help. Julie, what can I do?”

Julie thought about it for a few seconds. “You agreed with Ben when you walked in. Why? What do you know about the virus?”

“Well, for starters, as I’m sure you’ve already discovered, it’s not actually a virus. Or, to be specific, it’s not only a virus.”

“We’re past that already, Stephens,” Julie said. “How do you know that?”

“Julie, my job is to collate and organize information. Every disease prevention authority in the country is working on the same thing you are. I saw a report yesterday that confirmed your theory of a viral-bacterial strain.”

Stephens had stopped in front of a square table in the center of the room. He pulled out a folding chair from beneath it and sat down. He placed his arms on top of the table as he spoke. Trying to appear submissive, Ben noticed.

“I also found out where the strain originated.”

At these words, Malcolm stepped toward him, before stopping himself.

“The virus is the byproduct of an ancient extinct plant that was found inside Native American baskets in a Canadian cave. An unlucky Russian expedition found it and thus became the virus’s first modern casualties.”

“Who told you that?” Malcolm asked, his voice low, almost a whisper. Ben reached out and held the man’s shoulder.

“Again, it’s just some of the information that’s come across my desk.” Stephens turned and looked directly at Julie. “Julie, that’s why I’m here. I’ve been sending this stuff to you for days, but I know you haven’t been getting it.”

She shook her head.

“I sent it up to a lab, and they’ve been processing it with the CDC as well. From what we can tell, someone found that original strain, put some sort of protective ‘shell’ around it, and created the ‘super virus’ we’re now dealing with.”

Stephens stood up, and Julie saw Ben cross his arms.

“But like I said, I couldn’t get through to you. It seems like Brown found some sort of redirect on my account, but he didn’t set it up. Maybe Livingston—”

“Livingston’s dead,” Julie said.

Stephens was about to continue, but Julie’s words stopped him in his tracks. “Excuse me?”

“Livingston,” Julie repeated. “He’s dead.”

“But...”

Stephens’ face seemed to scrunch a bit around the eyes, for the briefest amount of time. But as soon as Julie noticed it, it disappeared. She must have taken him by surprise.

“You—you can’t be serious,” he said.

“Why would I joke about this?” She watched Ben and Malcolm react. Both men stood still, stoically gazing toward Stephens. They were watching his reaction, she realized.

Stephens seemed to falter a bit, taking a step back. He grabbed the corner of a table and steadied himself. “But... but that...” his voice trailed off.

“Stephens.” Julie’s voice was strained, but she tried to pull him back in. “Benjamin. I know it’s insane, but we have to keep moving forward.”

He nodded.

“Can you tell us the rest? What else do you know about the virus?”

He swallowed, but began to speak. “Well, as you already know, our organization isn’t exactly swift when it comes to handling crises, but there have been a few departments that have had a little success modeling the strain and calculating its progression.” He walked back to the chair and sat back down at the table. Julie found a bottle of water and brought it over to him.

“They found out that the agent works by infecting the bloodstream, but also the air around its host. It sort of ‘festers’ inside the host, releasing particulates through the skin—likely the reason we see a physical manifestation in the outer epidermis.”

“The rashes and boils,” Julie said.

“Yes. It’s airborne—it doesn’t need direct contact with blood or fluids, just time and close proximity. Once it’s in the bloodstream, it moves to the internal organs, where it proliferates and reaches viral titre for contagion.”

“What’s viral titre?” Malcolm asked.

“Viral load. It’s like a concentration of the actual virus. The point at which the virus will infect enough cells to become contagious.”

“The critical mass,” Julie added, explaining it to the two men standing next to her.

“Exactly. The lab reported that anything below around 8,000 copies per milliliter of the virus is considered below the danger line. Above it, the host can’t contain the virus in its own body, and the strain tries to jump to another host within range. If it doesn’t jump and proliferate there, the initial host’s systems will shut down. If it can jump, it will, causing the titre to drop by half in both hosts.”

“Does proliferation continue from there?” Julie asked.

“It does, but only to that magic line of viral load—somewhere around 8,000 copies. If the load is higher than 16,000 when it jumps, though, both hosts have a concentration of higher than 8,000 cpm. The virus will continue to spread inside their systems, consuming cells and antibodies mainly, but also overloading vital organs.”

“So the answer is to find a third host?” Malcolm asked. Ben was nodding along, trying to piece it together as Stephens explained.

“Right. And then a fourth, fifth, and so on, until the virus has equally spread through these hosts and the titre count drops below 8,000 in each.”

“What happens then?”

“We don’t know,” Stephens said. “Initial tests have shown that it starts to clear up within a day or two, and works its way completely out an infected host within a week.”

“Ok, so we don’t have an antidote for it, yet. But we know that it goes away on its own?”

Stephens nodded. “It does, but like I said, only when the concentration in the host is low enough. Under load, it will increase to the point of becoming contagious to others, but then stop, immunizing the host.” His eyes flicked to Malcolm. “Over the viral load, however, and it will completely destroy the host’s internal system.”

“That’s good news, Stephens,” Ben said. “But we’re running out of time. This thing’s spreading around the country, and it’s not slowing down. Plus—”

“The bomb,” Julie finished.

“Right,” Stephens said, nodding. “The bomb. Any ideas as to where it is?”

“No, not yet.”

“Okay, well I can help. Julie, why don’t you and I—”

“You’re not going anywhere with her,” Ben said, stepping forward.

“Excuse me?”

“You’re not leaving.” Ben said again.

“Ben,” Julie said, coming up alongside him. “What’s the deal?”

Stephens stood up from the chair again, frowning. He looked at Ben, scrutinizing him.

Before he could react, Ben took another step forward and punched Stephens in the gut, hard.

Stephens doubled over, trying to catch his breath.

“Ben!” Malcolm ran toward him, but Ben held up his arm to halt his approach.

“Stop—let me deal with this.” He turned back to Stephens. “What else do you do, Stephens?”

“Wh—what are you talking about?”

“You know exactly what I’m talking about. Who are you working with?”

Julie panicked, her attention shifting between the two men standing in front of her. “Ben, wait, just —”

Ben grabbed Stephens under the chin and hoisted him up straight. He delivered another blow to the man’s side. “It’s not just that you were suspicious of me from the beginning,” he said. “You came in here, somehow finding the road without, apparently, outside help. These back roads aren’t on any map, and we’ve specifically removed them from GPS data feeds to make sure wandering tourists don’t end up finding a back entrance to the park.”

Julie watched the exchange, mouth agape.

“I—it was the IT... Randall. He got me here. He helped me find—”

“That’s not true,” Julie said. Ben looked at her, surprised. “Randy didn’t even know we were coming here. I didn’t tell him where we were going, and even if he tried to track me through my phone somehow, he wouldn’t be able to do in time to send you our coordinates until we were here. You showed up minutes after we arrived.”

Stephens’ eyes grew wide. “Seriously? You don’t think—”

“Explain how you know so much about this virus,” Ben said. “You’re a research assistant, right? You collect research and deliver it to Julie?”

Stephens’ nostrils flared, and he gritted his teeth.

“And I saw the way you looked at Dr. Fischer when you mentioned ‘immunization.’ How did you know that he was immune?”

“I didn’t!”

“Of course you did. I saw it in your eyes. You knew exactly who he was the moment you walked in here, didn’t you? You’ve seen him before!”

Stephens’ eyes darted back and forth from Julie to Ben to Malcolm. Ben grabbed him again and started to swing his arm back. A slight smile escaped the side of Stephens’ mouth, and just as quickly, it vanished.

Ben stopped, shocked. “You do know something, don’t you?”

A look of anger washed over Stephens’ face. He spat.

Ben punched him in the jaw, sending the man’s head hurtling backward as it absorbed the blow. Ben winced in pain, opening and closing his fist.

Stephens didn’t react. He stared coldly back at Ben.

Ben hit him again. Julie ran forward and grabbed his arm, trying to stop the attack.

When Stephens’ head came back up this time, Julie saw a trickle blood dripping just next to his mouth.

His smiling mouth.

Stephens spat out a mouthful of blood. “You just couldn’t figure it out, could you?”

Julie was stunned. “What are you talking about?”

He laughed. A chuckle, slowly rolling out of his bleeding mouth. “It’s too late anyway. Too late.”

Ben looked at Julie, silently asking her what to do. She shook her head, and Ben dropped his hand.

“Too late for what?” she yelled at Stephens.

“You can’t save them. Couldn’t save them. Diana Torres, Charlie Furmann, David Livingston. And the others. You can’t save them now.”

Ben took a step back. Stephens. It was him—the man who had killed them all. Including his mother.

Julie couldn't believe what she was hearing. Not just what Stephens was confessing to, but the unbelievable scope of what Stephens claimed he'd done. Following Julie's threads of evidence and research to Diana Torres' door, then to Charlie Furmann and Livingston. Anyone who'd gotten in his way had paid the ultimate price.

Not to mention however many others they didn't know about.

Julie was beside herself. She'd worked with Stephens long enough to trust him, to even grow fond of him. He was a smart kid, and he worked hard.

But he'd betrayed her.

He'd betrayed them all.

She didn't know how to respond. Malcolm was also shocked, still recovering from Ben's attack on Stephens. He slumped in the corner, leaning on the table Julie had been using as a lab table.

Ben, however, did know how to respond. Julie watched him as he laid into Stephens, landing punches as fast as his arms would allow. They weren't targeted well, and many brushed Stephens' head and shoulders. Ben lacked control, and he wasn't putting much force into the blows. It was an emotional reaction; one Julie and Malcolm were both astonished to see.

But it made sense.

The man in front of her had killed Ben's mother. He had been the cause of her infection and eventual death, all while Stephens led them through a dead-end maze.

But why?

The question nagged at her. She hadn't noticed it the first time, focused instead on overcoming the initial shock of Ben's accusation, and the subsequent revelation that he'd been right.

Still, the question was there, and she had to know the answer.

"Why?" she asked, softly. Then again, louder. "Why, Stephens?"

He looked up at her. Ben stopped swinging.

"Why?"

Ben stepped back, his breathing labored from the exertion. He looked at Julie.

Waiting for the answer.

But Stephens only laughed, gurgling blood that had filled his mouth. He spat, a wry smile on his face. "It's too late," he said.

"You mentioned that already. But I'll make that decision for myself," Ben said. "Where's the bomb, Stephens? I know it's in the park somewhere. In the caves, like you said on the phone?"

"You'll never find it," he replied.

"Stephens, please," Julie said. Stephens just shook his head.

"Like I said," Stephens said, looking at each of them in turn. "It's too late. America isn't united enough to save itself."

Julie cocked her head. Where had she heard that before?

"This country values freedom, but you and I both know that 'freedom' is a joke. We're somewhere between a third-world country with a corrupt government and an overbearing corporation on the scale of how free we really are. Americans now hold on to every scrap of 'freedom' they can find, including their own individuality—"

Ben stepped forward and punched Stephens again. "Where's the bomb?" he yelled.

Stephens staggered backward, nearly losing his balance. He seemed dizzy, but remained standing. Then he looked up sharply. He started to laugh as he withdrew something from his coat pocket.

A small glass cylinder filled with a liquid of some sort, and a large hypodermic needle. They glinted in the fluorescent light of the lab room.

Without warning, Stephens shoved the syringe into his own arm.

His eyes rolled back into his head, before eventually returning to their proper position. He sniffed, like a drug addict. “As I said, Harvey, it’s too late. America is not united enough to save itself. It doesn’t matter now, whether you find your bomb or not.” His mouth began to leak saliva, foaming around the edges. “I would leave, if I were you,” he continued. “This is a highly concentrated specimen of the strain, and I estimate there is less than a minute before I’m contagious.”

Julie winced as the virus visibly tore through the man’s body, ripping it apart at the cellular level.

Highly concentrated specimen.

Ben lunged forward, throwing Stephens’ back against the far wall. Even with the virus destroying the man’s body, he still didn’t fall.

“We’re immune, Stephens,” Ben said. “Remember?” He pulled the sleeve of his left arm up and held it up to Stephens’ face. “You took too long. The virus has already died out of our systems. We’re inoculated. And Dr. Fischer—” Ben nodded toward the professor. “He’s been immune, but you already knew that, didn’t you?”

Julie watched the exchange, piecing everything together. She thought through Stephens’ explanations; she considered the specific words he’d used.

“Ben...” she tried to coax him backward, but Ben wasn’t listening.

“You led us here, to our deaths, for what? For your amusement?”

Stephens was smiling again. He reached back into his pocket. “No,” he whispered.

Ben frowned.

“It was an experiment. My experiment. I told them no one would be able to figure it out, and that it was an embarrassment on our part to accomplish something so miraculous and not have the satisfaction of watching it unfold. Up close.”

“So you let us figure it out?” Ben asked.

“There will be nothing left,” he said. “America will be a barren wasteland, Harvey. The end is justified, but what about the means? What about my reward, knowing that my role has been fulfilled?” The man’s voice began rising, his face showing more and more emotion. “I was groomed—born—for this role,” he continued. “And I must get the satisfaction of knowing it was foolproof. I had to finish it here, to watch you die, just like the rest will.”

Julie’s eyes widened as Stephens’ hand came out of his coat.

“And no one is immune from death,” Stephens said, holding a gun up to Ben’s chest. He flicked off the safety, staring into Ben’s eyes the entire time. “You’ve performed your role admirably, Mr. Bennett. Now let me perform mine.”

He pulled the trigger.

Everything became a blur. Julie felt herself brutally shoved aside as a dark form rushed past her. She stared, helpless, as Ben’s body flew sideways toward the tables in the center of the room. Nothing made sense. Instinctively, she screamed, rushing Stephens as he aimed the second shot directly at her.

She collided with Stephens headfirst, sending her forehead into the man’s sternum. She felt his lungs expand rapidly, involuntarily gasping for air. She kept moving forward, now back on her feet. She ran full-speed through the man’s slender body, lifting it off the floor and smashing it into the wall. Glass vials and beakers, along with a stack of neatly filed papers, exploded from their location along the back table and down onto the hard floor. The sound of breaking glass and chaos almost blocked out the sound of her own screaming.

Almost.

She reared back with her fists and pummeled Stephens, who was lying haphazardly across the table. She aimed for the same spot Ben had hit him earlier—just below his eye where a gaping wound was forming. She punched, again and again, and he eventually stopped moving.

She took a step back, breathing heavily. Benjamin Stephens' skin had begun to stretch and rise, as if being filled with water like a balloon. She knew that the virus had moved completely through his body, but she was astonished at how quickly he'd reacted to it.

There must have been a very heavy concentration of the virus inside that vial. The realization terrified her.

Purplish welts formed on his exposed skin. Rapidly changing hue within seconds from from a purplish tint to a lighter red, until finally she noticed that his breathing had stopped. She waited another few moments and then checked his vitals.

Dead.

Ben heard Julie say his name from somewhere behind him.

“Ben...” it was forceful, yet hesitant. A warning.

Ben plowed forward anyway. He hadn’t felt emotions like these for over a decade, ever since his dad had been taken.

“You led us here, to our deaths, for what? For your amusement?” he asked the questions pointedly, as if he already knew the answer. Did he?

Stephens smiled. “No. It was an experiment. My experiment. I told them no one would be able to figure it out, and that it was an embarrassment on our part to accomplish something so miraculous and not have the satisfaction of watching it unfold. Up close.”

Ben asked the next question carefully. He wanted to get closer, to try to subdue Stephens. “So you let us figure it out?” He took a step forward. Careful. He treated the situation like his many encounters with wild animals. Don’t approach directly when possible, but don’t move too quickly.

Another step.

Stephens kept talking, but Ben had already tuned him out. He was focusing on the hunt, trying to sneak his way into Stephens’ personal space. He knew Stephens wasn’t an animal, but that was to Ben’s benefit. Stephens was acting emotionally, based not on animal instinct but human perception. Ben could rely on a slower reaction time from him because of that.

But as he planned his move, he caught sight of Stephens’ arm. It swung upward, cradling a weapon.

“You’ve performed your role admirably, Mr. Bennett,” he heard Stephens say. “Now let me perform mine.”

Ben tried to lunge forward, but he couldn’t get his mind to form the direction and send it out to his body. It was all happening so glacially, as if he were watching a movie in slow motion. He felt his feet move, imperceptibly at first, then more quickly.

But not quickly enough.

He’d never make it to Stephens in time. The gun rose a little more, now pointing at Ben’s chest.

He thought he saw the muzzle of the pistol flash, a small bristle of fire lancing from its barrel, but his vision suddenly went white. He felt something too, a crashing pain that hit him from his side, knocking him off his feet.

He was flying. Blinded and in pain, but he recognized the sensation of vertigo. He tried to reach his arms out to stop the fall, but he had no idea if his arms had registered the order or not.

Then he heard the explosion from the gun. It was louder than he thought it would be—he’d almost always been on the sending end of a gun barrel. It deafened him.

Blind, in pain, and now deaf.

And still falling.

• • • •

BEN HIT THE GROUND hard.

He felt another pain, similar to the first, shoot through on his arm and shoulder, and into his hip and leg.

This can’t be right.

It was a point-blank shot—how could Stephens have missed? Ben should have felt something in his chest.

Right?

He tried to blink, trying to convince his senses to return.

Nothing but pain.

A dull pain, admittedly—throbbing, but manageable. What happened?

He breathed, now realizing he'd been holding his breath. His lungs struggled with the weight, trying to push it off.

Why was there a weight on top of him?

His vision returned. Narrowly at first. The lights of the lab crept into his periphery, followed by a darker shadow.

A man's face.

Malcolm Fischer's face.

The professor was lying on top of him.

Ben gasped, pushing upward with his throbbing hands, trying to heave the weight of the man's body off to the side. He struggled until he was free.

Ben sat up, blinking.

When his vision fully returned, he found Malcolm's body lying next to his in a crimson pool of blood.

No...

Ben reached out and felt behind the professor's neck.

Come on, he willed. Wake up.

He noticed the professor's brown coat, wrapped around the older man, a ragged hole almost dead center in the man's back.

The exit wound.

Ben heard sobbing. In a daze, he looked up. Julie stood over him, tears falling from her face.

"B—Ben," she muttered. "I thought you..."

Her voice trailed off as she finally saw Malcolm lying next to him.

"Oh my God," she whispered. "He—he saved you."

Ben simply nodded. "Where's Stephens?" Anger flashed behind his eyes, and he stood.

He saw Stephens lying across a table against the wall, unmoving.

"I have his blood on me," she said.

Ben didn't care. He stepped over Malcolm's body and gently reached for Julie, pulling her close. He wrapped a hand around the back of her head and slowly pressed her to his shoulder. He stroked her hair while she sobbed.

The truck bounced over another pothole in the dirt road.

Julie again in the passenger seat, staring out the window, holding back tears that she knew would eventually come.

They'd left the lab a mess—two dead bodies, one extremely contagious, and both bleeding onto the white tiled floor.

Julie couldn't decide what had been worse. The true extent of Stephens' double-crossing, or the hard realization that nobody came to help. Gunshots had rung out in Yellowstone and the reaction had been silence.

They were alone.

Chaotic as it was, Stephen's execution to this point had been flawless. From the initial blast to the spreading virus, down to Stephens' own arrogant desire to watch it unfold from a front-row seat.

He'd told them everything. It was cryptic and difficult to understand, at best, but it was complete.

He'd wanted it that way—to watch them suffer through the pain of searching, only to see their helpless eyes as he unleashed his weapon.

His final move.

Checkmate.

She looked at Ben as he drove. "I can't believe he knew, Ben. The whole time."

Ben nodded slowly. She saw his knuckles turn white as he gripped the wheel. "I know," he said softly. "But there's still something I don't understand. The syringe—why'd he do it? I mean, inject himself with the stuff? He could have just shot us."

"No, that's just it." She said. "I figured it out right before he tried to shoot you."

"Really?"

"Yeah. Ben—he's the endgame. He's the final piece."

"I know. He orchestrated the whole thing, and—"

"No, Ben—he is part of the bomb."

Ben didn't understand. "Say that again...?"

"Stephens had to make sure he was in the park because he's supposed to be the final piece of the puzzle. Remember what happened when the first bomb went off? It sent a payload of the virus into the air, which contaminated a lot of the area. But this second bomb can't carry that payload—it'll be too big. And if it's going to go off anywhere around that caldera—"

"Then the eruption from the volcano beneath us will more than eradicate the strain."

"Right," she said. "A bomb too small won't destroy the underground structure enough to cause an eruption, but a bomb too big will just incinerate the payload."

"So," Ben said, thinking aloud. "To make sure you get both the volcanic eruption and the virus to be spread, you have to place the viral payload far enough away from the initial blast that it's safe from that explosion, but close enough to the caldera that the resulting eruption will send the payload into the atmosphere.

"And Stephens is the viral payload."

Julie sighed. "Like I said, he's part of the bomb."

"Then I need to find that bomb," Ben said, "and you need to get out of the park." He pushed the accelerator to the floor, and the truck swerved, barely missing a deep hole in the road.

She looked over at him. "Excuse me?"

“You heard me. I’m not letting you get anywhere near that eruption.”

Julie stiffened her jaw, annoyed.

“Ben, listen to yourself,” she said. “You’re not making any sense. You explained it to me, remember? If that bomb goes off, it starts a chain reaction. There’s no place in two hundred miles that’s safe.”

Ben shrugged. “Still—”

“No, Ben. Stop. Forget it. Where are you going to drop me off? Ten miles from here? Twenty? How much time are you going to waste trying to get me away from the blast zone? And how long do you think you have before the bomb actually goes off?”

Ben wanted to answer but flipped the radio on instead. The news report was already in progress. He upped the volume. It was a computerized message, reading a pre-written response.

“...Local police and SWAT teams on high-alert for riot activity, including looting. Please stay indoors, and remain out of contact with anyone outside of immediate family. Contaminated areas include as a southern border Las Cruces, New Mexico. Western border, Kansas City. Eastern border Reno, Nevada. CDC and FEMA have prepared quarantine stations at many metropolitan areas. Please visit www...”

He yanked the volume down again as Julie spoke.

“It’s not true,” she said.

“What?”

“The report. The CDC can’t mobilize that many quarantines that fast. They’re just not set up for it. And FEMA... There’s just no way.”

“At least they’re doing something,” Ben said.

“What? What could they possibly be doing?” Julie asked, her voice growing emotional. “Stephens kept me in the dark the entire time, and he murdered the man who’s supposed to be at the front of this thing, keeping the investigation moving forward.”

“Okay, well what do you want to do, then?” Ben asked. He tapped the brakes.

Julie thought for a moment. “We’re it, Ben. We’re the only people close enough to do anything about it. We have to find that bomb, and fast. And don’t get any ideas about ditching me on the side of the road somewhere.”

Ben looked at her for a minute, considering the offer. He nodded, then sped up again.

Julie checked for updates on the spreading virus, and sent a few emails up the chain of command at the CDC.

It was a long shot, the CDC was already doing everything they could to stop the spread of the virus, and their ability to provide research support had been extremely stifled by Stephens' handiwork, but their options were limited. After a few minutes of clicking around, she closed the computer.

"Try calling again," Ben said.

"There's no point," she replied. "Anyone there is already deployed at a waypoint or helping with disaster relief. We need to get to an actual location—"

"Julie, we've talked about this," Ben said. "We don't have the time to drive all the way there. We have to get others involved somehow."

"I know, I know!" Julie snapped, exasperated.

"Think," Ben said, talking as much to himself as to Julie. "Where would he put a bomb that size and not be noticed."

"This is Yellowstone," Julie remarked. "All he has to do is zip it up in the right gear and looks like any other camper."

Ben shook his head. "Not camp grounds. No one just leaves their stuff behind."

"Not even a cooler?"

"Only if there was an accident and it fell of a boat into the—"

Julie squirmed in her seat. "In the lake?"

"Under the lake," Ben answered, his voice confident. As he said the words, a sign flew past on the right side of the road with the words "Yellowstone Lake—1 Mile" printed on it.

"Ben, Livingston's already checked there. Remember? He sent a team of geologists and excavators through most of the caves in the region, and found that tunnel. If there was something there, he would have—"

"Julie, Livingston didn't tell you that."

"He did! He called, an—" she suddenly remembered what Ben was getting at.

Livingston hadn't called—Stephens had.

She bolted upright in the seat. "Stephens called, not Livingston. He only said Livingston had sent the team in, and he didn't have any reason to be communicating with Livingston, which means..." She thought for a moment. "Which means he was lying. Ben, if he was lying, we could be heading in the wrong direction."

"But we're not. We're going exactly where Stephens told us to go. So far he's double-crossed us at every step, but it's been his information that's gotten us this far. He even told us why—he wanted to watch us try to figure it out." Ben looked at Julie. "If that bomb is actually somewhere in Yellowstone, we're going to find it exactly where Stephens told us to look."

Julie knew he was right—it had to be right. "Yeah, why wouldn't he just tell us exactly where it is? As insane as he was, he believed it was too late to do anything about it."

She hoped Stephens wasn't right about that.

"So where is this cave, anyway?" she asked.

Ben shook his head. "I don't know. But there's only one cave I can think of that's long and deep enough to be a good spot. It has to be close enough to the surface that an explosion would penetrate, but deep enough to affect the magma area below the caldera. It's a few miles around the lake, once we get there, but the cave isn't terribly long."

"But he cut a tunnel into the side of it, right?"

"Right, and we have no way of knowing how deep that is. It's wide enough that we can crouch or slide most of the way through, and there aren't any major forks. We'll know right away if we see a manmade tunnel."

Ben pulled the truck to the left as the road took a dogleg turn, then he sped up again. This section of the road was considerably better than the one they'd been on, with a gravel base and fewer potholes and bumps. As he aimed the vehicle down the center of the one-lane drive, he couldn't help but notice the immense beauty of the surrounding country.

This land had been his only home for over a decade. Diana—his mother—had tried for years to bring him and his brother together again under one roof, but she'd failed.

Or, rather, he'd failed her.

After his father died, Ben did the only thing that felt right. He ran away. At the time it hadn't felt like running away, though, as much as it felt like running toward something. This something was staring down at him as he drove through it.

The trees, pine and spruce, scraping at the ceiling of the sky, their tops ripping into the vast blue and white. The forest floor, which had acted as his bed for so many nights he couldn't count them, and the soft prickle of the needles that littered the ground and crunched when he walked.

And the smell.

That forest, deep-green, fresh, alive smell.

The smell was the biggest reason he'd settled here, and he swore he'd never live another day without it. Whether it was a mountaintop in Colorado, the sweeping forests of Yellowstone, or his secluded cabin in Alaska, as long as that smell was there when he arrived, he could live anywhere.

And now this madman, dead as he was, wanted to take all that away?

This was his home and he was going to defend it.

Home.

He looked again at Julie and saw her gazing back at him.

Something's missing...

The question rose again.

What's missing?

He silently tried to answer it, to make it go away. But it didn't—it wouldn't. He tried again, and failed.

Ben suddenly realized it wasn't a question he was asking about his own life—that question had already been answered. Instead, this question was about the task at hand.

What was missing?

As he posed the question again, emphasizing different beats, different syllables of each word, the answer struck him at once.

The reason.

He turned his head sideways, chewing on that answer. The reason was missing.

The reason Stephens had done it. He wasn't being paid—he'd given his life for the cause. It couldn't have been about money, at least not for him. And he wasn't just a murderer, a basket case with a chip on his shoulder.

There was something more.

Something, Ben realized, they should have already figured out.

A chill came down the back of Ben's neck as he gripped the steering wheel tightly, all of the possible solutions to the problem suddenly pouring through his mind.

The plan was, Ben had to admit, all but perfect. If Stephens hadn't fed them every scrap of information they currently knew, they'd be no better off than the CDC and the rest of the population. They'd be lost, looking for a needle in a haystack.

No, they wouldn't even know to look—Stephens was the one who'd told them there was a second bomb. Why had he gone through all the trouble to stage a massive terrorist plot against an entire nation, to then simply die alone?

Even if he was working with a larger organization, as Malcolm had suggested, why make it a point to have witnesses for his suicidal last stand?

To simply die alone?

“Shit,” he whispered. He whipped the truck around, barely coming to a stop. Gravel flew out from the truck's tires, spraying the trees and bushes growing next to the road and sending birds clamoring out of the way.

The computer on Julie's lap slammed against the car door as she shrieked and grasped at the ceiling-mounted handle.

“What the hell?” she shouted, trying to fight the centrifugal force of the truck's rotation. “Ben, what's going on?”

To die alone.

That was the reason. That had always been the reason.

No, the answer.

That had always been the answer.

Stephens was talking to him, communicating to them still, from beyond the grave.

“Ben?”

He wanted them to feel his pain—the very real, human, pain. Isolated, gripping, terrifying pain.

Alone.

“The lithosphere of the Earth, consisting of the Earth’s crust and upper mantle, is normally just under one hundred miles thick. The outer shell of crust makes up what our entire planet lives on, either on land, in the air, or beneath the sea.”

The Indian man’s voice crackled through the station’s tube TV, the color long since faded. Officer Darryl Wardley wondered why no one had bothered to change it out, or at least have it fixed.

Could you even fix tube TVs anymore?

He thought about the question, finding it genuinely more interesting than this Dr. Ramachandran fella with his thick black glasses and even thicker accent, droning on about stuff Wardley hadn’t thought about since high school. He’d pulled the desk shift this evening, but with the mass hysteria keeping everyone insanely busy lately, it was a welcome rest. He blinked, once again concentrating on the TV.

“This shell is typically between three and five miles thick beneath the Earth’s surface, and closer to thirty-five miles thick on land.

“The crust section of the lithosphere below the Yellowstone caldera in Yellowstone National Park is less than two miles thick, meaning that the upper mantle, full of molten rock and magma, is extremely close to the surface. This ‘hotspot’ is one of only a dozen on Earth, and means that the extreme temperatures found within the Earth are much closer to the surface.”

Again, boring. He wondered if there was a game on—maybe baseball, since they always played. If not, there might be a decent hockey game rerun on ESPN, but he’d have to get up to change the channel. Why can’t we afford a Universal Remote Control? He’d been around long enough to know that it wasn’t anyone’s job, so it had probably just never gotten done. He made a mental note to pick one up at Walmart the next time he was there.

“The last time this caldera erupted was over 640,000 years ago, and the blast was large enough to send ash as far away as the Pacific coast, some of the plains states, and even the Gulf of Mexico.” As the professor spoke, the station had superimposed a slide showing a map of the western United States, covered by a red oblong shape—the volcano—and a lighter shaded section labeled “Ash Zone.”

“Yellowstone has experienced a massive volcanic eruption just about every 600,000 years, and the prior eruptions—1.3 million and 2.1 million years ago, respectively—were even larger. Actually, because of this fantastically large land area, the Yellowstone supervolcano is considered to be the largest active volcano in the world.”

Officer Wardley frowned. Volcanoes were huge smoking mountains, he thought. But as he considered the park’s many geologic features, including geysers, hot springs, and smoking fissures in the ground, he changed his mind. Maybe there was a volcano under there after all. His family—wife and three kids—and he had spent many summer vacations there, since it was so close. Only a few hours away, and they’d had numerous friends over the years to travel with.

Dr. Ramachandran continued explaining the seismic activity that could be found at the park. “It was extremely lucky that this bomb went off where it did, and not closer to the caldera’s center, and that it was not larger. The right explosion could do more damage than a simple blast—it could potentially fracture the already delicate infrastructure of the plates holding the magma below at bay. In fact, since many scientists believe that Yellowstone is due for an eruption, a blast of a certain size could jumpstart this timeline.”

Wardley sat up in his chair, no longer daydreaming. He saw for the first time another person on the television, this time a woman in a red dress, obviously the interviewer. She asked a few questions, which the man answered one at a time.

“To put in perspective how large this volcanic eruption will be, consider the Mt. St. Helens eruption in 1980, which we no doubt all remember. Yellowstone’s volcano would be on a force magnitude of 2,500 times that size. It would send ash more than thirty miles straight up into the atmosphere, blocking out the sun and most likely causing the planet’s global temperature to plummet.

“But this ash would be a long-term problem. For the people within five to six hundred miles of the actual eruption, all life will be either incinerated instantaneously or consumed by pyroclastic lava flows that move at high speeds. The western half of the United States might simply cease to exist, but the effects to the global economy and that of humanity in general will be devastating.”

The woman made a remark about the man’s dire explanation, calling into question the confidence he had in his prediction.

“This is not speculation, mind you. It is scientific fact. Volcanologists and geologists have long been hard at work predicting not if this eruption will take place, but when. There is a strong possibility that we will be without an eruption for the next 1,000 years, and even 10,000 years, but there is no definitive way to understand the dynamics at play beneath the surface of the Earth.”

The woman turned away from the man and spoke to the camera.

“You heard it yourself. Dr. Ramachandran is an esteemed volcanologist and the author of numerous books on the subject. With the increased interest surrounding the explosion at Yellowstone National Park only days ago, and of course the terrible virus that is spreading throughout the United States that is believed to have been initiated by that same explosion, we wanted to bring you a special edition feature for tonight’s newscast that examined the Yellowstone caldera.

“In a moment, we will return to your regularly scheduled programming after a brief update from our disaster relief team regarding the Yellowstone Virus.”

The show cut to a square-jawed cliché in his mid-fifties, with perfectly combed salt-and-pepper hair. He was smiling, but Officer Wardley had worked with people long enough to know the man on the television was holding onto a certain amount of fear. Maybe even panic.

“The Yellowstone Virus is still eluding the nation’s best researchers, though we are told that a breakthrough is imminent. As you have no doubt already heard, please stay indoors, lock your house, and do not venture out for any reason. Stay isolated, and do not physically interact with anyone other than your immediate family...”

Wardley scoffed at the guy on TV. The anchor was stuck at work, just like him. How many others were out there, stuck at their jobs, explaining their own demise to the rest of their species? Wardley had already fielded calls from three of his fellow officers—two accounts of looting and one small riot gang making its way up and down the main street of town. Even for a small city, the crazies somehow seemed to be the majority.

He got up to refill his coffee—he’d need another pot of it before the night was over—when the phone rang.

He growled and sat back down. “Officer Wardley, Sheridan County Police, how may I assist you?”

He frowned as he heard the explanation on the other end of the line. “Excuse me, you’re going to need to slow down. You said you’re in Yellowstone right now?”

The voice yammered on. “Son,” Wardley said, his voice stern. “You need to get out of the park. There’s a virus—”

But the voice continued. Wardley’s heartbeat rose slightly. He was not fond of being yelled at, especially by a civilian. “Listen, Bennett, I don’t care if you’re a park ranger or not—you need to get out of that area.”

He started to explain their protocol regarding a refugee from a disease-infected area as he pulled out a regional map that had the quarantine checkpoints and stations marked in highlighter, but the man on the phone interrupted him again.

He was starting to get really angry.

“Bennett, I’m not going to ask you—”

He paused.

“Sorry, what?”

Bennett spoke again.

“There’s another bomb?” He listened to Bennett explain, for the third time, what he wanted Wardley to do. “And you’re sure about that?”

Yes, apparently Bennett was decidedly sure, before he slammed the phone down onto the receiver.

Officer Darryl Wardley's police cruiser, a decade-old Dodge Charger, raced down the highway at ninety miles an hour. He would have gone faster if it wasn't for the handful of stray vehicles disobeying the now government-mandated house arrest for every citizen spread out on the open road.

Wardley's comm squawked out just about every excuse in the book as he'd listened in on his fellow officers' 11-95s. Most of the civilians were panic buying last-minute supplies, or checking in on family and friends who hadn't responded to their phone calls. One deranged individual even admitted he was on a joyride; he'd never seen so little traffic on the highway, and he wanted to take advantage of it.

Most civilians, with the exception of the wannabe race car driver, were let off with nothing but a warning and a stern reminder that they were supposed to be inside. The federal government, after all, hadn't issued a formalized process notice explaining what the local officers were supposed to do with 11-95s out and about against mandate. Wardley's comrades were driving blind, simply pulling people over, asking them for their license and registration—nothing but a formality these days, anyway—and then letting them go after they heard the driver's excuse.

Wardley was glad he wasn't on patrol duty tonight. Nothing but a bunch of crazies and nut jobs taking advantage of the fact that most of the United States government was busy trying to figure out this virus.

Still, driving ninety miles an hour down an almost-abandoned highway felt an awful lot like being on duty—holy crap he looked tired.

Catching sight of his own deep-set brown eyes, and eyebrows that could use a trim, in the rearview mirror took him by surprise. Whose face was that staring back at him? He looked so exhausted. And old. So old. He'd slept just before his shift, no more than five hours ago. But he felt physically, emotionally, and mentally drained.

He adjusted the mirror to remove his face.

After the call from Bennett at Yellowstone, he'd called a his superiors at the station, including two that were out on patrol already. He told them what he'd learned from Bennett, explaining that he had no proof that any of it was true, then waited for the inevitable tongue-lashing as his commanding officers showed him all of the reasons why the madman in the park was just looking to start a fight, and there was no bomb.

Surprisingly, Wardley met little resistance. It seemed as though the officers wanted to do something other than drive around the area, looking for idiot grocery shoppers and insane joyriders. They all agreed to meet him at the park, and one told him to place a general wide-band call to ask for even more backup.

It must be the solitude, Wardley thought. The virus was all anyone was talking about lately, and they all knew that driving around the area just outside the infection zone was the equivalent to suicide, whether it was part of their job description or not. Maybe playing a more active role in figuring out all of this mess helped assuage their fears.

Or maybe it was just their ego, their testosterone-laden desire to do something, even if that something was guided by a guy they never met, begging for help at a park they had no jurisdiction entering.

Five miles later, Wardley was entering that exact park. He slowed the cruiser a bit and caught up to another officer in his department, rolling down his window as he pulled up.

“Think we’ll get sick going in here?” Hector Garcia asked, before Wardley even stopped.

“If we were, we’d have gotten it thirty miles ago. The radius is growing, even this far north.”

“Yeah, so I heard. Crazy stuff, man. I hope this Bennett guy isn’t messing around.”

Wardley looked down the road at the park, wondering if Bennett was right. It could be that easy.

Wardley realized that an easy answer was probably the real reason his fellow police officers had jumped at the opportunity to get their hands dirty. They’d all signed on for different reasons, but one they all had in common was the simple desire to right wrongs.

And finding the viral payload delivered by a second bomb was certainly in the category of “righting wrongs.”

“I don’t think he is,” Wardley said. “I had Jones pull a background check on anyone matching the ID he gave, along with his job title at the park. It’s a long shot, but if the match he found is, in fact, our guy, he’s clean as a whistle. Pretty much off the grid as long as he’s been alive.”

“Yeah, I don’t see what could be in it for him, if there’s something else going on. I’d bet he’s telling the truth.”

“Let’s get inside, then. As crazy as it sounds, if what he said is true, we need to get moving.”

“Roger that. I’ll keep the radio open in case we get some more volunteers.” Officer Garcia paused, then met Wardley’s gaze. “If I don’t see you on the other side, man, take care.”

Wardley knew what he meant, but he corrected him anyway. “If we go anywhere, we’ll be on the same side, Garcia.”

Garcia chuckled. “Hopefully it’s the good side, then.”

Wardley rolled his window back up and accelerated. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Garcia do a quick cross sign with his fingertips, then pull out to follow on behind.

He hoped Bennett was right.

They needed him to be right.

“Ben, what are we looking for?” Julie asked. They’d now been in the truck for almost two hours, first heading toward the massive lake that made up the central area of Yellowstone National Park, then back toward the edge of the park where a string of campsites sat.

Julie’s back hurt. She shifted in the seat and tried, in vain, to get comfortable. She felt like she’d never spent so many hours in one place, much less in a vehicle. Every passing minute was excruciating.

She almost wanted the bomb to go off just relieve—

No. That wasn’t true. A little discomfort in exchange for fixing this terrible massacre.

It was a fair trade, she decided.

She watched Ben drive. That severe look on his face. What had gotten into him?

“Ben,” she said again. “What’s up?”

He finally glanced over, but only for a brief instant before the rough terrain forced him to focus on the road.

“Sorry,” he said. “I—It’s just...” His mood seemed to darken.

“What?”

“Nothing... I mean, I don’t know yet. I have a theory, but I need to check some of these campsites first.”

“I thought you ruled campsites out?”

“I know.”

He said the words flatly, almost commanding, as if he felt the conversation was over.

Julie felt the opposite. Why did they need to find a campsite? What was the theory? And why was it important enough to abandon their plan to find the bomb?

She didn’t ask any more questions. She’d never seen Ben focus so intently on his goal, and she didn’t want to distract him. She examined the man sitting next to her. His forehead glistened with sweat, bloodied knuckles over the steering wheel. As they drove, Ben pulled up an internal list of registered campers who’d booked a campsite for that week, using his phone. He scrolled through a few pages and clicked off the screen when he was satisfied.

They reached the first of the line of campsites spread around both sides of the road, each marked with a short driveway and a wooden sign with a number painted on it. These sites, Julie realized, were meant for glamping. People who thought roughing it meant sleeping in a pop-up trailer or RV, spending the evenings by a controlled fire inside a ring of rocks, with running water piped in through the park’s small but reliable water supply. Many of these sites even had electricity, meant to plug the RVs into a power source that didn’t need to run on batteries.

Julie wasn’t much of a camper, and it looked like it would have been rough enough for her, even with the RVs and pop-ups. Ben wasn’t like most people. He would have been happy sleeping on a bed of pine needles.

Ben slammed on the brakes in front of the first site and hopped out of the truck. The tree cover cast shadows over the road and campsites, making it nearly impossible to see far into the sites. He ran to the fire ring, spinning in a circle as he searched for whatever he was looking for.

Julie opened the door to help, but Ben was already running across the street to check the second site.

“Ben, what are you looking for?” she asked. She knew better than to expect an answer, but was surprised when he yelled back to her.

“Anything. I’m looking for anything that doesn’t belong. In these first three sites.”

She shrugged and ran to the third site. I can find that.

The third site differed from the first two, and she noticed it right away. Here, the driveway had tire tracks in it from a large vehicle. She wasn’t nearly good enough to tell what kind of vehicle, but she could easily see that the car or truck had exited the driveway quickly. The tracks widened as they hit the street, a sign that the vehicle had slid on the loose gravel as it sped up and turned. She turned to the rest of the site.

The ring of rocks at the center were a deep black, as if smoke had blackened them as a fire inside died out. There were no coals or bits of wood, but she thought she could smell the faint scent of charred ash from a recent fire. She walked over to it, examining everything in sight.

There.

“Ben,” she called out. She stepped around the ring and walked toward a picnic table that sat at the far side of the campsite, right where the site ended and the line of thick pines began again.

She heard footsteps behind her and turned to see Ben running toward her. She pointed at the picnic table.

He nodded, continuing past her, and stopped at the bench of the table. Sitting atop the two planks of wood was a small picnic cooler.

“Were you able to talk to Randy?” he asked.

She was surprised by the question—they were searching for something in the campsites, and he wanted to know about Randall Brown? She’d called just after they left the lake and left a message.

“Yes, he sent me a text a few minutes ago. He said he’s fifteen minutes from here, and he’s got the maps.”

Ben whipped around to look at her. “What? He’s here?”

She nodded. “I guess he wanted to help...”

He stiffened a bit but didn’t say anything. Julie guessed the thoughts that were going through his mind—they were the same ones that she had been struggling with when she got the text. Why are you coming to a highly contagious outbreak area, risking your life to find something we don’t even understand? Not to mention the bomb...

But she knew Randy well enough to know that he couldn’t sit back and watch as the world came down around him. He’d stepped up before for far less important cases. Julie knew his wife would be beyond upset with his rash actions, but she also knew Randy wouldn’t take no for an answer.

If he said he was coming to help, they’d better be ready for him to help.

“You did say people would notice if someone left something behind like a cooler,” Julie remarked. “Well, I noticed.”

Focused on the cooler, Ben did not reply. Slowly approaching it, his chest rose and fell. His breathing sounded labored. Julie wondered if all the action had finally gotten to him.

“Ben,” she said, then stopped. What was she going to say? “Be careful?” What did she expect to find in the cooler? A bomb?

He ignored her. The cooler was like one of the small six-pack coolers that Julie owned, with a zippered lid and a few pockets around the sides.

Slowly, he unzipped the lid.

Julie stared at him.

“Far enough away from the blast, but still close enough to be affected by the eruption.”

Julie looked down at the top of the cooler as Ben pulled it open.

He stepped back as a cloud of white powder rushed out of the vessel, filling the airspace in front of their heads.

“Shit,” she said. The powder—no doubt the contagion mechanism itself—packed inside the cooler, filling it halfway to the top. The dusty substance crept up out of the container, like smoke from yesterday’s fire.

“Yeah,” Ben said, closing the lid again. He stepped back another step and turned to Julie. “That’s what I thought. I’d bet there are more—a lot more.”

“Dotted around the other campsites...” she realized.

He nodded. “All around the lake, not to mention miles of open land for backpackers and survivalists to set up camp. I don’t know how much of this stuff they planned to release into the air, but I’d guess you’d want more than a half-cooler full to get the job done right.”

“And it’s far enough away from the bomb’s blast out here?”

“That’s my guess—leave the cooler here when you leave the campsite for the evacuation and...” He stopped to look back toward the road. “You can’t see it from the road, meaning my crew would have just driven past, not looking for anything but people and vehicles that stayed behind. You only found it, because we were looking for it.”

The picnic table would be all but invisible from the camp road, and even if you were looking for manmade objects like the cooler, it would be sheer luck to see it perched on the bench from the inside of a moving vehicle.

“I’m guessing when the bomb blows out the bottom of the lake and the top of the caldera, the eruption will pick up the coolers and spread the virus that way,” Ben said.

“Maybe,” Julie replied. “But a large enough eruption will incinerate anything within miles.”

“I agree. That’s why they packed it cooler insulation, just enough to keep the payload safe through the blast.” He picked up the cooler and zipped the lid shut.

Ben marched back to the truck, and Julie followed. “What now?”

“Tell the cops what to look for and make sure they don’t open the containers when they get here.”

Julie thought about their own situation. The virus had fully run its course through their bodies, rendering them both immune to its effects. But the police officers weren’t as lucky. They knew what they were getting into, and that it was likely a one-way trip for them.

They all met at the road that stretched between the lake and the campsites where Ben and Julie had found the first cooler. Five officers, Ben, Julie, and Randy. As they gathered, Ben introduced himself.

“Thank you all for being here. I won’t take any time to explain the dire situation, as I know you all are fully aware.” Nods all around. “Second, this is likely the end of the road for us. I’m not much of a speech guy, so I’ll just leave it at that. Feel free to turn around and head back the way you came.”

No one moved.

“Okay, then, here’s the deal,” Ben continued. “We found a cooler containing about two pounds of powdered viral agent under a picnic table at a campsite 17. Not far from here.”

Ben went on explain why they believed it was placed where it was, and why he thought there would be more around the park. “We’re dealing with a literal ticking time bomb, literally, and the largest outbreak of a deadly disease since the Spanish Flu. If you have anyone you can call for support, get them here. We need bodies, and we need them fast.”

Some of the officers were nodding in approval, and others were already taking their phones out of their pockets and preparing a string of text messages to their groups.

“Start with the list I emailed to Officer Wardley. It’s a list of the registered single campers and their designated sites. Julie and Randy will split up with two of you,” Ben said, ignoring Julie’s surprised and upset expression. “I’m going to find that bomb.”

Two officers spoke at once, suspicious. “You know where it is?”

“Nope. But I have an idea,” Ben answered. “Randy brought me some maps he pulled from our staff web access point of the underground cave systems below Yellowstone Lake and the surrounding area. Most aren’t very big, if I remember correctly, but a few could be deep enough and long enough to be a good spot to set up a bomb.”

“You know anything about bomb disposal?” Wardley asked.

“No.”

“So you’re just going to walk in there and switch it off?”

“No.”

“Then I think we need to go with you, don’t you, sir?”

Ben turned it around. “Do you know anything about bomb disposal?”

“No,” Wardley admitted. “But we’re trained for this sort of thing.”

“But not bomb disposal.”

“No.”

“Look,” Ben said. “I’m not here to disarm it. I’m not even going to touch. I’m going to find. You’re going to get someone here who knows how to take care of it. And in the meantime we need all hands on deck identifying these caches around the park. It’s a lot of land to cover—over one hundred individual sites, and I have no idea how much time we have left. If I can’t get to the bomb in time, this place turns into a lava field within seconds. We have to make sure that that’s all it is—not a contagious spawn point for a massive disease as well.”

Again, some of the officers nodded. “What do we do with the caches?”

Julie stepped in. “Don’t touch them. Keep your distance. Just call them in and mark them on GPS —”

Ben disagreed. “No.”

“What, do you work for the CDC now?”

“Dump them in the lake,” Ben insisted.

“But that’s ground zero.”

“Exactly,” Ben said. “If we can’t get this thing diffused, the least I can do is bring it up to the surface and drive it into the lake. That alone will lessen the impact and vaporize the viral agent.”

Julie stepped back, suddenly realizing the full extent of Ben’s plan. “That’s suicide.”

“Okay, that’s it. Keep your radios on and check in when you can,” Wardley said. Someone threw Ben a walkie-talkie, and he set it to their designated channel. “Let’s go!”

Immediately, the small crowd dispersed, each heading back to their vehicles. Randy tagged along with a short, portly officer and stepped into the man’s passenger seat.

“Ben, I’m going with you,” Julie said.

Ben was already walking the other direction, trying to ignore her. Her stubborn nature immediately sprang into life.

“Ben! I’m going with you,” she said again.

“You’re not.”

“I am. And if you try to stop me, I’ll—”

“What?” Ben yelled, whirling around to face her. His face was red, his eyes bloodshot. He looked a mess, and it stopped Julie in her tracks.

“I…” she started again.

Ben’s nostrils flared as he tried to control his emotions. He looked at Julie, a few inches shorter, standing in front of him. “What?” he said. His voice wavered slightly.

She didn’t speak.

Ben grabbed her by the arms and pulled her toward him. He leaned down and kissed her, not letting go. She stood dead still for a few seconds, taken by surprise, then gently fell into him.

She tried to say something, but he pressed his lips harder to hers. She felt warmth crawling up her spine, taking over the steel resolve she’d felt moments ago. He released her arms, and she quickly entangled them around his waist, hugging him tightly.

Finally, he pulled back and looked into her eyes. She saw tears forming in his, and he blinked them back.

“You’re coming back, Ben,” she said. “Understand? You’re coming back.”

He took one last look at Julie, then jumped in the truck. He revved the engine and drove away, leaving Julie standing in the road.

In the rearview mirror, he saw a police cruiser pull up beside her and wait for her to open the passenger door. As she got into the vehicle, she looked once more at the trail of dust behind her truck as it disappeared over the rise.

Ben reached the first cave on his list in record time. He wasn't sure anyone had ever driven that fast over the weathered roads crisscrossing the park. He sure hadn't. It was all he could do to keep the truck on the center of the road, hoping that no wildlife jumped in front of the moving battering ram.

The cave was off to his left, and he could easily see the markers from the road. A few stakes in the ground with brightly colored plastic strands marked the location as one of the park's future tourist attractions. It hadn't been fully excavated yet, nor had it been assessed by the park's surveying crews.

Ben didn't care about any of that. He needed to find the actual cave, get inside, and find that bomb.

What would it even look like? He wasn't sure he'd ever even seen a bomb in real life. And it certainly wouldn't look anything like they did in the movies. Would it? As he exited the vehicle, he grabbed a heavy flashlight he'd borrowed from one of the cops and tested it.

He found the entrance behind a large bush, and he brushed the prickly stems from his face as he crouched down and lowered himself into hole below the rocks. It was a tight fit. His large frame was going to have a difficult time navigating the cramped space, not to mention the sharp protrusions of rock he felt jutting out of the walls.

He sighed. Julie would fit.

He forced the thought out of his mind and slid through the entrance.

It was much tighter than he'd initially thought. His shoulders scraped against the rocks as he sucked in his gut and slid farther. He breathed in slowly, feeling the space narrow. When he exhaled, he slid once more, gaining another six inches.

This could take a while.

He repeated the inhale-exhale-slide process another a couple dozen times and suddenly found himself in a larger hole. Still small, but he now had room to maneuver through the cavern. Still, he found it hard to believe someone could cram a body and a bomb through this tunnel, but it didn't matter. He had to find it. If it could even possibly be in this cave, he would search the entire thing.

A few more feet and the space opened up again, this time large enough for him to crouch. He crawled forward on his hands and knees, careful to dodge the small rocks and sticks that had collected on the cave floor, ready to stab his knees as he slid past.

For an eternity, he slid, crawled, and hunched his way through the tunnel, hoping there were more than an eternity on its countdown clock.

"Har— nett." The radio he'd clipped to the back of his belt crackled to life. "—Ennett. Do— read, over."

He stopped, grabbed the radio and tried to send a response. "This is Bennett. You're breaking up, but I read you, over."

He waited for a response, but none came. Ben checked the radio for battery—less than a quarter remaining, but enough to receive and send a signal—and the antenna. Everything seemed to be in working order, so he clipped it back onto his belt and continued on down the gently sloping decline of the cave.

If it's important enough, I'll hear it when I get back to the surface. We have to find this bomb.

But another ten minutes of slowly moving downward proved to be useless. Eventually, the cave narrowed to a funnel shape, and he found forward motion growing more and more impossible.

Shit, he thought. This can't be it.

He'd wasted thirty minutes, at least, searching for this cave and diving down it headfirst. There was nothing in front of him suggesting that the roof had fallen in, nor was there any sign of prior human contact with the rocks and walls of the cavern. For all he knew, he was the first person ever to set foot in the place.

He shimmied backward, painstakingly moving uphill feet-first, waiting until the cave widened enough for him to turn around and exit.

It had been a massive waste of time. But worse than that, there would never be enough time to spend thirty minutes in each of the caves.

He couldn't hail the rest of the team and pull any of them off their search, either. If the bomb detonated, he had to hope the contagion would be close enough to the lake to be incinerated by the blast.

It took longer climbing back out of the tunnel than it did going down into it. Ben was exhausted, frustrated, and—a new feeling now began to wash over him—fear.

Fear of not getting to the bomb in time.

Afraid for the officers and volunteers racing throughout the park to find the virus caches.

Fear of losing Julie.

It was a thought that rattled through his mind like a runaway train.

There was something between them, but didn't know what to call it.

They were attracted to each other, obviously. But it felt deeper somehow. More important than lust.

Did she feel the same way? How could he ask her if he ever got the chance?

He'd had a few flings here and there, mostly with other park staff, many of whom were seasonal and changed every summer. None were serious, and none made him feel the same way Julie did.

And what way is that? he asked himself.

The shaft of sunlight leading to the surface beckoned up ahead. Pushing up off the rock floor he shimmied, trying to move faster. The radio broke his concentration—

“—Bennett, report —Hear me?”

Ben pulled the radio from its clip and answered. “Hey, I'm here—just finished exploring the first cave, and nothing.” He took a breath. “Over.”

“You're cut— out...” then, “We've—three caches in about—sites.” Ben resorted to interpretation. They found three virus caches? It was a start. More importantly, he was right about there being more of them in single-camper sites. This was no wild goose chase—they were on track.

Now, to find that bomb and clean up this mess.

He peered up at the lip of the hole and the surface beyond. Just a few more feet.

“Ben, do you copy?” It was Julie.

He immediately brought the walkie-talkie back up to his mouth. “I read you.”

“Hey, I have an idea.”

“I'm all ears,” he replied. They'd quickly abandoned the radio protocol of saying ‘over’ every time, and Ben didn't miss it.

“Listen—I need to get with Randy to figure it out. Randy, if you're on this frequency, let me know...”

“Right here, Julie. What's up?” Randy's voice sounded hollow on the police radio, and Ben wasn't sure if he was farther away from them or if the police officer was holding it up to him in the car.

“Guys, I need to get out of this hole. My battery's going down on this radio, too.” To be sure, he checked it. There was a light next to the battery charge symbol, and it was now flashing. That can't be good, he thought. “I'm going offline for a few, but I'll jump back on when I'm out. Try calling me on my cell if you can't reach me.”

“Roger that, Ben. Stand by.”

Ben spent the last few feet scraping his head and back against the jutting rocks until he was able to haul himself out of the hole. He rolled onto his back, sucking in a lungful of fresh air.

He checked the radio. The battery low indicator light was still blinking away. No telling how long he had left. He should have checked it before he set out. He clicked it on, just in time to hear a broadcast from Julie.

“—Back on? Ben, can you hear me?”

“I’m here,” he said, winded. He stood, stretching to his full height for the first time in over an hour. He could feel the deep muscle pain in his lower back already beginning to creep over the area, and he made a mental note to himself to work out more often.

“Okay, great. I’ve got something for you. Check out the cave on the northeastern side of the lake. There are a few, but the one farthest north should be right.”

Ben reached the truck, simultaneously fumbling with the ignition and rifling through the maps spread on the passenger seat. The western side of the lake, with a few caves—including the one he’d just emerged from—No, not that one. He threw it back and grabbed the second map.

There. The blown-up view of the northern and northeastern sides of the lake, a dozen or so winding caves traced over. Larger lines extended into the body of water itself, signifying that at least a portion of the cave traveled below the lake.

“Got it,” he said as he put the truck into gear and sped up onto the road. He could already see the lake glistening back at him, catching light and bouncing it back into his eyes. He took a quick look back down at the map to confirm. “I’m looking at it. Seems to be one of the only ones that goes under the actual lake, and not just stop before it gets there.” He waited for a response, but none came. “How’d you find this one?” he asked.

Still nothing.

He held the radio up to examine it. No blinking lights. It was completely dead.

Crap.

He hoped Julie was right.

This cave was significantly larger than the last one. Thank God. Hopefully he wouldn't need to crawl around on his hands and knees this time.

He parked the truck, left the keys on the seat, and jumped down. He unclipped the radio and left it on the stack of maps on the passenger seat too—. It was dead weight now.

The cavern ceiling ran high enough that he had more than enough headroom as he followed its twisting curves. It descended much slower than the first, but he was able to almost jog through it, making up for lost time.

He kept the beam of the flashlight in front of him, avoiding pitfalls, rocks, and branches as he went. Yet still he completely missed the sudden step that almost swept his foot out from under him. His foot hit the ground hard and he almost bit his tongue.

“Goddamnit.”

He swept the flashlight over it. How had he missed that? He quickly moved on.

As the tunnel bottomed out, it grew wider, into a main artery large enough for two or three people to walk side-by-side, until it took a steep drop and the real descent began, forcing Ben to slow to a walk.

He calculated that this shelf must be the point where the cave twisted beneath the lake's bottom, a cavity carved from millions of years of water dripping through cracks and fissures in the ground.

The precarious drop shallowed a bit as he descended, and he was able to pick up the pace once again. After a while, he came to a fork, but barely slowed as he chose the left passage. It was arbitrary but there was no time to dither.

The right side was larger and seemed to continue beneath the surface of the lake, while the left was a bit smaller and had a shallower decline. But it was the way the tunnel had been cut that made it the obvious choice.

Instead of being smooth from years of water and weather, the left tunnel had an unnatural sheen to it, along with a rugged, scratchy look.

As if it had dynamited out like an old railroad tunnel.

All along the trail, he could see the slight hint of depressions in the rock, small half-cylinder horizontal pathways, dead straight and spaced out about two feet apart, up the wall and over his head. The spots where they'd placed the sticks of Nobel's fortune.

It would have been a low-grade explosive, with enough in each channel to blow the rock to bits and allow it to be cleared, but weak enough that it wouldn't cave in on itself.

Still, it was a massive amount of work, and Ben grew livid as he walked. They did this right under our noses.

Whoever “they” were, they had done a fantastic job, too. The lines were straight; the tunnel was well-defined and appeared stable. There were no support beams.

They had brought in their tools, dug this place out, cleared the mess, and no one knew about it.

Ben couldn't remember the specifics of the numerous park restoration and construction contracts he'd heard about over the years, but this one had to have been one of them. Most likely, this one had been part of a larger operation, masked as a standard safety excavation and then piled with paperwork to become lost in a bureaucratic mess.

Still, it had been done, and it had taken a long time—perhaps started before Ben was even hired on.

He stifled his anger, focusing instead on reaching the end of this manmade nightmare.

The tunnel bent to the right and down, and suddenly came to a stop. There, in the dim light of the flashlight's glow, Ben saw it.

The bomb.

It was... not what he expected. Then again, he had no idea what to expect. Not really. He remembered the newscasters explaining that the first bomb had been a... hyperbaric bomb? Something like that. Is this the same kind?

The device looked strangely like a beer keg, the kind he'd seen at a few of the park's staff parties at the end of their summer seasons. It was silver, and stood in the middle of the room. The sides bulged out, rounded, but the top and bottom were flat, perfect circles. It wasn't huge, maybe rising to his waist.

On top of it sat a tablet computer hardwired into the top of the barrel, a mess of cabling that Ben wasn't about to try and fiddle with.

He stared at the cold metal object, wondering what to do next.

I don't really have a plan for this part, he realized. He'd just assumed he'd find the bomb, take it back up with him, and throw it in the lake.

Or, he had secretly hoped it would be like an old western—a single fuse, lit and burning its way down the cable until it reached the payload. A simple snip with a knife or a deadeye shot with a six-shooter would have taken care of that.

But this wasn't the wild west, and Ben stood motionless for a few moments. What now, genius?

He stepped closer to examine the cables. All of them were black—no guessing “blue” or “red” and pulling one of them out. They were wrapped in a thick bundle with electrical tape after protruding from two sides of the tablet, and spread out again at the other end, before heading into the large metal canister.

As he examined the device, a plan began to form. It was primitive, but it was something.

The bomb is cylindrical. Which means it can be rolled.

He had no idea how heavy it was, or how delicate. But he was beyond waiting around for something else to happen—it was just him, a bomb, and not much time left.

Did it have a motion sensor? Would it blow if he moved it?

Only one way to find out.

He gently grasped the top lip of the barrel-like container and rocked it back and forth. It seemed heavy, which made sense, but not completely stationary.

It didn't blow. He was still here.

This might work.

He rocked a little harder, testing both for weight and, as he suddenly realized, to simply see if he could get it to explode.

If I get out of this, there's no way anyone's ever hiring me to be part of a bomb squad.

Trial and error didn't seem to be a factor in examining an explosive device, but then again, there was nothing else he could do.

Thankfully, no fiery blast wave ripped him to shreds as he played with the bomb-keg, so he continued with the plan.

Rock gently. Rock a little harder. A little harder... harder —

He lost his grip on the barrel, and the whole mess crashed to the floor. It clanged as it bumped on the hard rock and began to roll down the slightly sloping cavern until it smashed into the wall at the bottom of the chamber.

Instinctively, Ben cowered when it fell, as if holding his head in his hands back would have saved him.

Yet it still didn't exploded, and though he wouldn't purposefully repeat the experiment, he now knew that a little tumbling around wouldn't be enough to detonate it.

Ben calmed his nerves, breathing in and out a few times before stepping back up to the bomb and noticing a dim bluish light emanating from the barrel's top. He pointed the flashlight away and saw that the dim light remained.

What the —

The top of the barrel, now on its side, faced away from him. The light was casting shadows in the room, fighting with the beam of his flashlight. He walked around the device and saw the cause of the blue glow.

The screen.

The tablet computer was on, with nothing but a blue screen and white text scrolling around. It was code, no doubt some sort of computer program that the creators of this device had installed on it.

But at the top right of the little screen appeared a few strings of numbers as well, and it didn't take a genius to figure out what they represented.

A countdown.

Ben read the numbers, afraid of finally learning the truth. There were four two-digit spaces, and he assumed what each meant. Days, hours, minutes, seconds.

He felt a chill run down his spine as he saw that the first two places held only zeroes.

00:00:52:37.

52 minutes, 37 seconds.

52 minutes, 36 seconds.

If crawling out of the first cave had been exhausting, it was a piece of cake compared to this.

Like Sisyphus pushing his rock up the mountain, Ben rolled the heavy device with everything he had. Shallower parts of the cave floor were hard enough, but the steep sections were nearly impossible. Sweat dripped for him every pore, making his hands slippery and only adding to the challenge.

This thing had a weight a hundred pounds, easily. Maybe more.

Every bend and change in grade only exacerbated the agony. Ben couldn't help but wish that he'd taken someone—anyone—with him.

Why was I trying to be such a hero?

He knew it had been the smart thing to do at the time. Mitigate risk, spread out, stretch their resources to their capacity, and get as many people away from ground zero as possible.

But now, struggling to roll a tin can up a cave floor with wet hands, all while running out of energy and time, he was having second thoughts.

Maybe I can leave it here, call for help, and then wait for someone to come by.

He shook his head, reminding himself of his dead radio. Even his cellphone was worthless down here. He'd never had great service in the park, and certainly not in this area. The closest tower was near the ranger station and base areas, a small pocket of civilization in an otherwise vast—and remote—wilderness.

He'd found the blasted thing and he couldn't tell anyone!

So he kept pushing, rolling the device up and over sticks and rocks. Many of them were small enough that he could push the object over them without hesitating. Larger rocks forced him to hold the bomb still with a knee while he grabbed the obstacle and threw it to the side.

In this way, he'd covered most of the ascent. It was slow going, but he was making decent time.

Until he reached the step.

He'd forgotten about the step—the rock lip in the cave floor that almost wiped him out when he first entered the cave.

The first thought he had was that he was close to the exit. But that wasn't what mattered to him right now.

The cylinder bumped into the rock, and Ben crouched behind it, stuck, both supporting himself and trying to hold the weight of the rolling explosive device from plummeting back down the cavern.

So far he'd been able to work in the dark, keeping the flashlight in his back pocket. But now he needed a better plan. He reached around and grabbed the light, flicking it on and examining his predicament.

The ledge wasn't large, just as he remembered it, but it presented an extremely frustrating problem—the bomb would need to be lifted completely up and over the lip, then set back down on the cave floor above it, all without losing control of it.

There was no way around it, literally or figuratively.

Ben stuck his knee behind the bomb and flashed the light in a full circle around him just in case he'd missed something, his heavy breathing calming slightly as his body took advantage of the short break.

As he brought the flashlight back to his right hand and prepared to put it away, he felt his knee sliding sideways.

“Nononono—”

He shrieked at the metal cylinder, but still it rolled backwards. Ben fell on his rear, then on his side, panic suddenly setting in. His hands were no use, covered in sweat and sliding as easily on the smooth cave floor as they did on the metal surface of the bomb’s casing.

This is not good.

The bomb rolled faster, and Ben knew it was going to roll right past him.

It gained speed, and he did the only thing he could think of.

He stuck his leg out and shoved it in front of the runaway cylinder, praying it wouldn’t bounce right over and keep going. As it approached, Ben slid his upper body around quickly so that it was downhill, right in the path of the bomb’s getaway.

The heavy object rolled over his foot, and he felt its weight slam down on his shin. He roared in agony and instinctively tried to pull his foot back, but the bomb was already up to his knee. He could feel the pressure exerted by the weight, crushing as it sailed over him.

It slowed, the angle of Ben’s leg stalling it, and it rolled backwards. It bounced a little and then came to rest on his left foot, a crunching sound in his ankle causing Ben to gasp and almost pass out.

The initial impact of the device and the final crushing blow as it bounced and stopped on his foot rendered Ben completely immobile. He lay upside down, his head farther down the path and lower than his feet, one of which was pinned beneath the metal cylinder.

He groaned, pain lancing up his leg, as he tried to wriggle his foot free. He sat forward, resting on his elbows, so he could examine the situation. Every time he even thought about moving his foot, his brain seemed determined to disobey the order. Still, he struggled against it and tried to force the foot free.

It was no use. The pain was too much to bear, and the device wouldn’t budge.

He fell back.

37 minutes, 13 seconds.

This is it. It's over. I'm going to die in a hole in the ground, waiting to blow up.

Ben's foot was on fire. The pain had grown worse, surprisingly, and he was now nearly hyperventilating as he tried to breathe in and out, focusing his mind on other thoughts.

But the thoughts that came weren't helpful.

I failed. I let everyone down, and I let Julie down.

I lost her.

He tried again to force his mind to other thoughts, but the only other thing that came to mind was to check the time on the bomb. The screen hadn't shut off and as he slid sideways a bit he caught a glimpse of the countdown clock.

36 minutes...

He watched every second tick down, the display mesmerizing him, calming him.

35 minutes...

This really is it, he thought. The seconds ticked by, and all he could think about was the bomb, the countdown timer, and Julie.

Julie, I'm sorry.

He wished he had the radio and that it had a little battery left. Not to call for help, but to hear her voice again.

Just one more time.

"Ben!"

He shook his head. Great time to start hallucinating.

"Ben?!"

Not, that was real. As real as the screaming pain in his leg. He fell back to the floor, but managed a weak response. "I—I'm here!?" he cried.

"Oh my God, Ben! We're almost there! Don't go anywhere!" she called again.

It really was her. She was some ways off, probably at the mouth of the cave, but she was here.

"Wasn't planning on it," he said, trying not to burst into tears. Christ this hurt.

He could see a flickering light now dancing above him, casting shadows on the walls around him.

"I'm coming down—are you hurt?"

He didn't answer, instead waiting for her face to appear. How do you explain an idiot move like this?

"Ben! What happened?"

He wanted to yell what do you think happened? But he was just thankful to be found. "I got attacked by a barrel. Came out of nowhere. Like an ambush."

Julie did not look amused. "You think you're funny?"

"Funnier than you," he replied, the sarcastic twinge of his voice downplayed by the obvious pain he was feeling.

"Let's get this thing off of you." She examined the bomb, noticing the countdown timer, but not saying anything about it. "Hang on a minute."

Ben's eyes grew wide as Julie turned and ran back up the cave, leaving him and the bomb in complete darkness. "Hey!"

No response. Ben waited impatiently. A minute ticked by, then another. He wished he didn't have a way to tell exactly how much time had passed, but he did.

Three minutes, on the dot.

"I'm here," he heard her say. He saw the light again, and she raced around the corner and over the step, this time holding a large stick.

"It's not going to be strong enough to lift it all the way over—"

"It doesn't need to be," she responded, cutting him off. "Shut up and hold that thing steady."

He did as he was told, and Julie propped the end of the stick underneath its bulk, careful to keep it away from Ben's foot. She wiggled it deeper, pushing it around until it cracked a little. She met Ben's gaze. "Let's hope that was just the very end of it," she said. "Ready?" She reached behind her and grabbed a sizable stone lying next to the cave wall. She jammed it beneath the stick, right in front of the bomb, forming a lever.

Ben nodded, and Julie heaved downwards with all of her bodyweight. A strained noise escaped her mouth, and Ben couldn't help but notice how cute it sounded. Of all the the things to rush through his brain at a time like this—

He snapped his attention back to the situation at hand and placed his hands on the bomb's casing. He held it steady as Julie pushed again. The metal canister shifted a little, and Ben felt the immediate sensation of freedom. He ripped his leg back, the terror of having his foot crushed greater than the pain of moving it that quickly.

He put more weight on the bomb, and nodded. Julie took a well-earned breath and released the lever. The bomb slid back a little but stopped as it hit the rock and the force from Ben's hands.

"Okay, now what?" she asked.

Ben looked up at her. "You didn't think to bring any of those cops down with you?"

She shook her head unapologetically. "I didn't tell them I was leaving. A few of us met up, and I, uh, sort of borrowed one of the cars."

"You stole a police car?" Ben asked incredulously.

"You stole mine," she responded.

He almost smiled. "Whatever. I guess you get to help me with this. Here—" He moved his hands over to the side of the device, and she crouched down to help him, placing her hands on the right side. "My bum leg is going to slow me down," he warned.

"We can do this," she said, and started lifting.

Ben felt the bomb move a few inches up toward the shelf, and he struggled to keep up. He added his strength, and together the pair lifted the metal tube up the side of the short rock step, using the vertical section of rock as support.

With a final push, they lifted the barrel over the edge and onto the flatter section of cave above.

"Whew, how the hell did you get it this far," Julie said.

"I figured I'd go out on a limb," Ben said.

Together, they moved it along, hand over hand, inch by inch.

"That was funny," she said, breathless. "A real dad joke."

"I do my best work in caves" Ben shot back.

"Now I know why you don't talk much," she said, a smirk forming at the side of her mouth.

"You know I don't know what hurts more, the pain in my foot, or the pain in my a—"

"Uh-Uh. Don't go there. I can you leave you behind."

Ben laughed, forgetting momentarily not to put all his weight on his bad foot. "Jesus Christ!" he yelped.

“Probably a hairline fracture,” Julie surmised. “In my expert medical opinion.”

They reached the end of the cave and rolled the device over the grassy land between the cave and the truck. They stopped when they reached the road, letting the bomb come to a rest in front of the truck’s high tailgate. Ben sat down on the grass, letting his leg relax.

“Hey,” he said. He wasn’t looking at Julie, but instead up at the sky, which was growing darker as the sun prepared to set.

“What’s up?”

“Thanks for coming back for me.” He finally looked back down, turning his head to catch Julie’s eye.

“You knew I would,” she said, smiling, as she stood up. “Now let’s get this thing out to the lake.”

18 minutes, 28 seconds.

Ben sad he was shocked Julie even knew how to drive; she'd done so little of it. Julie told him to shut up and get his keys out. She drove the Dodge Charger police cruiser that she'd "borrowed" from the officer earlier, leaving Ben to drive her F450. He tested his leg, finding it in pain but not broken, and he walked in a few circles outside of the cave before continuing.

Together, they'd lifted the bomb up and over the tailgate of the truck and slid it against the cab, opting to stand it up on its base rather than leave it to roll around. Julie didn't have any tie-downs or rope in the truck, so Ben asked her to follow behind and make sure the bomb didn't fall over. If it did, and Ben couldn't hear or feel it himself, she'd agreed to flash her headlights a few times to let him know.

In the end, it didn't matter much. The road around the lake was paved and almost entirely free from potholes.

The plan was to find a spot to dump the bomb into the lake, trying to get it as far out onto the water as possible, and that meant they'd get to higher ground and find a hill or raised location from which they'd roll the bomb down and out over the lake.

As plans go, it was meager, but it was still a plan. Ben had been at a loss for what to do after he found the explosive device, and only after they'd secured the bomb in the back of the truck had he realized why.

He hadn't really expected to find it in the first place.

It was a miracle they'd stumbled across the bomb's resting place, and even more of a miracle that it hadn't yet detonated. Though he wasn't holding out hope that this next phase of their hacked together plan was going to work.

Still, he pressed on. What good is a plan if it isn't tried? he thought to himself. He wasn't sure if that was a real quote or just something that seemed to make sense, but he held on to it.

He now knew what it felt like to truly hope. Too long for something to happen; to wish with all he had to accomplish something.

He'd felt pangs of it when his father had been in the ER, and then later as they stabilized him, but he'd forgotten the feelings of hope, longing, and even true despair.

This, he knew, was desperate.

They were racing at a breakneck pace, carrying a who-knew-how-massive explosive device that was guaranteed to blow in a matter o minutes, trying to find a place to dump it in a lake.

In a lake.

The thought struck him as funny for some reason, and he couldn't help but laugh out loud.

We're dumping a nuclear warhead into a lake.

He didn't know if the bomb was actually nuclear or if it was something else entirely, but semantics didn't matter to him at this point.

I've gone off the deep end, and I've taken Julie with me.

But as soon as he thought of Julie, his mind seemed to relax just a bit. They were still on a mission that would change the course of their nation's history, but knowing that she was with him—even in a separate car—made him feel better for some reason.

He hoped they'd get through it.

Flashing lights in the rearview mirror snapped Ben back to the real world.

Shit.

She flashed the lights again, and Ben stretched up a little to try and peer out the mirror and window into the truck bed.

He slowed the truck, trying to get the fallen bomb to roll around. He couldn't see anything out of the ordinary, and he didn't feel anything bump against the sides of the bed.

What's going on?

He slowed further, rolling to a stop. Julie pulled the police car up beside him, and he pressed the button to roll down the passenger-side window.

"What's wrong? You okay?"

"I see a boat down there."

Ben hadn't been paying any attention to the water. "Where?"

"At the shoreline," she said. "Instead of rolling it in from higher ground, why don't we just dump it overboard?"

"I like the way you think," he said, chiding himself for ever trying to rid himself of her. "But this only works if we can get it running. We don't have time to start rowing."

She nodded, already trying to find a road that led down to the lake. "I'll bet there's a turnoff up ahead. Keep your eyes peeled."

Ben nodded and began to roll up the window.

"Hey," she said.

He stopped and looked over at her.

"What's the time?"

He'd almost forgotten he'd been tracking the bomb's countdown timer with his watch's built-in timer, and he suddenly felt a wave of anxiety wash over him.

15 minutes, 14 seconds.

"15 minutes," he called to the other vehicle. Saying it aloud made him even more nervous.

They'd decided that they would try to allow for a five-minute window before the countdown timer reached zero, as a "safe zone." It was an arbitrary number, but Ben didn't want to take any chances that Stephens—or whoever else was behind this—hadn't programmed the timer to detonate the bomb before it reached zero.

That meant they had about ten minutes to get the bomb out onto the water.

He pulled away from the police car, suddenly aware of the one-way trip they were both on.

They didn't have time to get to the boat and get to a hill or raised area over the lake.

If they chose the boat option, it was their only option. Either the boat had fuel in it or it didn't, and if it didn't...

He didn't waste energy computing the outcomes of that scenario. Ben focused on the road in front of him, watching for a left turn that would lead them to the lake.

Another variable I've got to get right.

They didn't have the time to search multiple roads.

Luckily, the road they wanted was the first one that appeared in front of them. Ben wasted no time turning the truck and bouncing over the dirt ruts, all the while accelerating as the truck sped up downhill. He barely even checked behind him for Julie's car—it wouldn't matter much now if she was there or not.

The road ended by the water's edge at the put-in.

Mud and rocks made up the bottom half of the ramp as the road disappeared into the gently lapping waves of the lake, and Ben made sure to stop the truck well enough in front of the ramp so as not to have any trouble leaving the location when they were finished. Time was working against them, more than he'd ever imagined.

He hobbled to the small, green fishing boat moored at the shoreline. It has even smaller two-stroke engine and stick rudder attached at the rear.

At least that was good news. Let's hope there's gas in it.

He untied the boat, and immediately began pulling the cord to start the engine. Julie had parked her police cruiser haphazardly in a patch of mud on a steep incline off to the side, and she ran up next to him.

"Need help?"

"The keys are still in the truck!" Ben yelled over the sound of the sputtering motor. "Back it up here as close as you can."

She ran to the truck, and immediately kicked up gravel and mud when she threw it in reverse. Ben yanked the cord once more, hearing the engine cough to life. He just about had a heart attack when he looked up again. The truck was mere feet away and still moving quickly.

He jumped, ready to dodge the moving vehicle, when it stopped on a dime.

Julie stepped out and ran to him.

"Wow. You can drive that thing," Ben said.

"Who said I couldn't?"

"Here, help me get it off the truck." He released the latch of the tailgate and let it fall down, hopping onto it as soon as it lowered completely. He slid the heavy cylinder back to the gate and got back down, careful not to smash his injured foot into anything.

Together, he and Julie lifted the metal barrel, each holding the bottom with one hand and placing their other hand along its side, and set it on the boat's floor.

"I didn't realize that boat was so flimsy. I hope it doesn't fall through the bottom."

"Too late to worry about that now."

"How much time do we have?"

Ben glanced at his watch, then at the bomb's display screen. "I've got eight minutes, and that thing says thirteen."

She didn't respond. Ben understood what she was thinking. He was feeling the same way.

Doesn't seem like enough time.

"Ben! Look!"

Ben saw Julie pointing at a flashing set of police lights in the distance. The officer must have turned on the lights to ensure anyone around would see them coming.

"Get back in the truck. I'll be there in a sec," he said.

She seemed puzzled for a moment, but did as he said. Ben, meanwhile, aimed the boat at the center of the lake. He slid the bomb to the back of the small vessel. It would help get the boat on plane when it reached the proper speed, but he was more interested in steadying the rudder.

He made a snap decision and placed the cylindrical container on the left side of the rudder stick, preventing the boat from turning too far to the right. The way the lake was shaped, if he remembered correctly, was such that there was more open water to the left, where there was nothing but shoreline to the right.

Satisfied with his work, he took a final glimpse at the countdown timer.

11 minutes, 4 seconds.

He really hoped Stephens wasn't playing them for fools one last time.

He'd forgotten something.

The boat was, literally, dead in the water. He needed a way to hold the throttle down to get the motor to engage and push the fishing boat out onto the lake.

Come on, Ben. Think!

He pulled off his shirt and began spinning it into a long, spiraled rope. When he finished, he looped the shirt around the throttle section of the stick, careful to not cinch it tight just yet.

10 minutes, 31 seconds.

He ran one final check over their handiwork. The bomb was situated in the back-left side of the boat, standing on end and silently awaiting its detonation orders, and the engine was roaring, ready to engage. He had formed a loose granny knot with his shirt, now looped over the stick, and he abruptly pulled the knot tight. The tightening engaged the throttle, and Ben jumped backwards on the dock as the boat pulled away from its station. It accelerated, the small but powerful engine doing what it was made to do.

Ben watched the boat for only a moment before he turned back to the truck and police charger. Julie was already at the cruiser, and he yelled over to her.

“Get in the truck!”

He hobbled quickly back to the driver’s seat of the truck and slammed the door after he climbed in. Julie joined him on the passenger side, and he hammered the accelerator to the floor, hitting the top of the small ridge of the adjoining road and turning onto it without slowing.

The police cruiser’s lights receded into the distance, but Julie wasn’t watching them anymore. Instead, she was staring directly at Ben.

“I, uh, wanted to make sure we’d both be able to get out of here,” Ben said.

Julie looked at him oddly.

“You know—that police car... the way it was parked in the mud, and... I didn’t, uh, there’s a lot of mud, and stuff...” his voice trailed off as he realized how weak the excuse must have sounded.

I wanted to be with you.

“Whatever, Casanova,” Julie said, a hint of a smile forming on her lips.

9 minutes, 11 seconds.

Ben couldn't get a signal. Julie's phone was useless out here as well, but she had a radio that worked.

"This is Julie Richardson. Anyone copy?"

She asked again.

"Officer Wardley. I copy. We've still got quite a few out and about looking for these caches, but there have been at least ten we've dropped into the lake already. Where are you?"

Ben grabbed the radio from Julie and gave him the update. "Wardley, we're around the Butte Overlook, heading northeast. We need to get everyone out of the park."

"Copy that, Ben. What about that bomb?"

"Heading into the middle of the lake. It goes off in nine."

"Nine minutes? Are you sure?"

Ben didn't respond, instead switching the radio to another open-frequency channel he knew a few of the officers were on. He repeated the message, much to the same reaction. He handed the radio back to Julie, who immediately called for Randy.

"Randy. Randall Brown, you out there?" Julie asked.

"Copy, Julie, I'm here. We're heading toward a rest stop a few miles from the lake. It's got a nice brick shelter and all, for what that's worth."

She looked over at Ben. He simply gave her a quick update. "I know where that is. Probably get there in six or seven minutes."

"We'll be there in a few," she said through the walkie-talkie. Randy confirmed, and told her he'd continue to track down the others and corral them together at the rest stop. Julie thought about what he'd said. That brick structure will be useless against a volcanic eruption. She appreciated the man's optimism, however.

"If that bomb reaches the center of the lake, we should be fine," Ben said, somehow reading her thoughts. "It'll detonate at the surface, which will obliterate the shoreline, but it should otherwise go straight up." He stopped for a second before adding, "Assuming it's not, you know, a nuclear holocaust."

Julie spied Ben's watch showing his altered countdown at less than three minutes, and she hoped it was an unnecessary precaution to have subtracted the five minutes from what was on the bomb's display screen.

She also hoped that this was all some sick dream; that she'd wake up in bed with a headache and only fading memories of the nightmare that had unfolded. But she knew that was probably an even longer shot than getting out of this alive.

"How'd you know, anyway?" Ben asked from the driver's seat of the truck.

"Know what?"

"Which cave it was in. How did you just guess the right one?"

Julie paused a moment before answering. "That's what I worked out with Randy, right after you left the first cave. He got me a map of the seismic activity below the lake, and how the hotspot's moved every year."

"Moved?"

“Well, like less than a centimeter, but yeah, over the course of millions of years, the hotspot has moved slightly northeast. Or to be more specific, the plate we’re on has slid southwest, while the hotspot’s remained stationary.”

“And this hotspot,” Ben began, “is what’s caused all of the eruptions in the past, right?”

“Right. But it’s also the reason there’s a Yellowstone park at all. It’s the source, generally, of all of the park’s geologic activity. The Earth’s crust is very shallow directly above it, and the lake is over a portion of that section. All I did was find where the crust was thinnest, where there was a known cave through that area, and then mapped those variables on top of the hotspot.”

Ben nodded along, trying to follow her logic.

“I just figured that Stephens, or whoever he was working for, wanted to take the smallest risk of failure as possible, and that they’d want the location of their bomb to be directly above the most vulnerable section of crust.”

“Preferably underground, so no one would see it,” Ben added.

“Well, that, but also because the deeper it is, the more likely it’ll cause a fracturing quake that would rip up the crust and cause the volcano. It turned out to be the only reasonable option when I looked at all the data, so I sent you down there.”

“That all sounds pretty nerdy,” Ben said. He shot a quick smile toward her.

“Yeah, well, it saved your butt.”

Ben turned the truck onto a larger camp road, probably a main road toward the gate, and Julie saw him check his watch.

1:30.

6:30, if the bomb’s countdown timer is accurate.

She noticed the truck’s speed, how close they still must be to the lake, and wondered exactly how large this bomb blast would be.

2 minutes, 0 seconds.

“Everyone behind the wall!” Julie heard Officer Wardley shout.

There were seven others at the rest stop when they pulled up, including Wardley, Randy, and the officer he’d ridden with.

A few stragglers rushed way over to the rest stop’s building, a simple men’s and women’s restroom with an outdoor water fountain, covered by a slanted roof. A brick wall stood at the other end, forming a short breezeway that Wardley and a few other men and women were now huddling behind.

Ben followed Julie as she stepped up onto the concrete floor of the pavilion and restroom.

“Glad you made it, you two,” Wardley said as they approached.

With two minutes left, Julie thought. Maybe less. She wondered if it would have been wiser to just continue driving, see how far away they could get. But she knew it was irrational. Nothing they did at this point was going to change the outcome—either the bomb detonated with or without causing a cataclysmic eruption as well.

A few other officers were wide-eyed, as if they were staring at an apparition, and Julie knew they had questions—question about the bomb, where it was hidden, how Ben knew it would safely erupt over the water, and more. But Ben didn’t seem interested in entertaining questions. He waited for Julie to press in to the group and stood stoically right at the edge of the pavilion.

She moved back a few steps to join him, and her hand found his. He turned to meet her gaze.

“You think this will work?” he asked.

“Stephens—they—seemed to have it all pretty well figured out,” Julie said. “But I can’t imagine the bomb’s blast being enough to open a major fissure in the Earth’s crust. The water will absorb much of the downward blast. This place has been here for 600,000 years without a major catastrophe like that, so I have to believe it’s stronger than that.”

“Right,” was all Ben said.

“I have a question for you, now,” Julie said. She noticed a few officers, as well as Randy, slowly making their way over to the pair at the edge of the concrete step.

“What’s that?” he asked.

“How’d you know about the single occupant campsites? Why did it just suddenly hit you that Stephens or his cronies would be stashing the payloads at those sites?”

Before Ben could answer, Wardley spoke up. “Yeah, and why not just dump the powder in the woods, where no one would ever find them?”

Ben looked at each of the others in turn before he answered. “I took a guess.”

The reactions were incredulous. “That’s it?”

“You wanted more?”

Wardley shrugged. “Wouldn’t hurt.”

“Stephens was a loner. Livingston was a loner. Furmann was a loner. My mother, Diana Torres, preferred to be alone ever since my dad... left,” Ben said, his voice hitching in his throat. “Stephens used that fact to murder her.”

One of the officers stepped forward, looking confused. “That’s a pretty wild guess, Bennett. I don’t mean to sound accusatory, but I wouldn’t be able to stand trial with evidence like that.”

He seemed to be waiting for a response, as did everyone else, and Julie seemed surprised when he gave them one. “I thought about it long and hard, and the reason it was so compelling to me is that it lines up perfectly with my theory about this virus. About how to beat it.”

Everyone’s eyes, if they weren’t already, were now riveted on Ben. Julie stared at him, too. They all waited for him to reveal his theory, but he wasn’t given the opportunity.

A flash of light washed over Julie’s eyes, and she took a stumbling step backward. Through the white haze, she saw the treetops of the forest bend and crunch under some unseen force, followed closely by a massive shockwave of dust and debris.

She tried to blink the light away, but it was almost immediately replaced by the loudest noise she’d ever heard. The cracking sound was like standing on a lightning bolt as it ripped open the earth, but it lasted longer.

Eyes bled. Eardrums rang.

Yanked off her feet, she found herself careening backwards and smashed against the brick wall. The roof above her was gone in an instant, and she saw the blue sky above her head. Dust filled every bit of the empty air in front of her face, and she felt it mingle with the saliva at the back of her throat, causing her to hack and cough.

Still, the force beat down on them. The bricks at the very top of the wall were the first to go, then she watched in horror as a larger section flew away entirely, like birds fleeing from a predator.

And just as quickly as it had started, it was over. She felt a heavy arm covering her, and it relaxed a little as the owner also realized the blast was finished.

“You okay?” she heard Ben’s muffled voice whisper—or was he yelling?—into her ear. She nodded and stood up.

The others recovered from the shock quickly, and soon each of them were examining the wreckage and destruction. Julie struggled to her feet, looking in the direction from which the blast had come.

A large, blossoming, mushroom-shaped cloud, probably ten times the size of the one she’d seen only days earlier, had formed and was reaching up to the sky. It was a whitish-gray color, and she could see that toward the bottom of it, a layer seemed to be peeling off.

“It’s the water,” Ben said. He still had his arm around her and was now holding her close. “It probably offset a million gallons of water, but it doesn’t seem like —”

A massive tremble directly below their feet caused Ben’s words to be clipped short.

Julie panicked, running back onto the concrete slab, unsure of what to do.

“Julie—get away from the building!” she heard Ben yell. For some reason, she obeyed, though her mind felt like mush. She ran off the step just as the brick wall they’d been standing under collapsed.

And still the ground shook. She saw jittery images of a police officer screaming as the wall came down directly on top of him and another image of a stand of trees not a hundred feet from them simply disappearing into the earth.

The earthquake stretched on, growing more and more violent, but there was nowhere to go.

Ben held her, and together they waited out.

She thought every bone in her body was going to be shaken loose, and only then did she remember Ben’s leg injury. She glanced up to him and saw that he was clenching his jaw, trying to steady himself. He was leaning almost completely on his good foot, doing his best to ignore the pain.

And then it stopped.

Just like the bomb’s initial blast, the earthquake just stopped. It was as if the Earth was resetting itself, shaking itself off from a fight.

The entire brick structure was rubble, reduced to bits of brick and metal rebar. Trees had toppled; more felled there were still standing. A large crater had formed just on the other side of the road.

“Is it over?” she heard someone ask.

“No idea. I think if it was going to blow, it would have done so by now!” another voice yelled in response.

They waited for almost an hour, riding out the aftershocks.

And yet Yellowstone held.

Whatever was brewing beneath its surface had chosen not to incinerate life today.

As Julie and Ben headed to the truck, ready to return to civilization, a group of officers came over.

“Bennett,” Wardley said. “You mentioned something about figuring out the virus earlier. What was that about? Did you figure it out?”

“Once Julie’s hears back from her people at the CDC, I’ll let you know.”

Wardley’s expression softened. “Ben, you’ve gotten us through this far. You were right about the caches, and you were right about the bomb.”

Another officer standing nearby smiled. “Yeah. You know, you’re either working for the bad guys or you’re just smarter than you look. Tell us what you’re thinking, man.”

Julie saw Ben sigh. “Okay, maybe you can help me piece it together. Basically, Stephens—that guy we thought was on our side—had been leading us on this whole time. He wasn’t just doing his job, though. It was personal to him, for whatever reason. He had more investment in this thing than we know. I think he was trying to make a point.”

“What kind of point? That hates the United States? Point made, my friend.”

“That’s just it, back at the lab, I heard him say something like ‘America isn’t united enough...’

“...To save itself,” Julie finished. “I heard him say that, too.”

“I’ve been thinking about what it all means,” Ben continued. “We already know he wanted us to figure it out—he admitted that much himself. So I had to ask myself why he’d do it that way, when it would have been far easier to just blow the park and caldera silently, without taking us along for the ride.

“And that led me to thinking about the virus. Julie and I both had it—we were covered in the rash; they even put her in quarantine.”

“But it worked its way out of your system, right? After it killed itself off?” Officer Wardley asked.

“It did, but when Julie and I were together, like physically close to one another, it didn’t get worse. Only when we were separated was when it grew in each of us.”

Julie was now confused as well. “Are you saying this thing can be beaten just by getting people to stand closer together?”

Ben shrugged. “It’s worth looking into.”

For Julie, the answer was too simplistic to be possible. She looked around at the others, and many were nodding. But the science...

“So what do we do?” she asked. “Get everyone together in a room and hope that it spreads, like chickenpox?”

“Maybe. I’ll leave that up to your people,” Ben said. “But I’d bet it’s a start.”

Ben and Julie spent the remainder of the day quarantined inside a massive white CDC tent set up just outside Yellowstone National Park. Her email had reached the highest levels of government, and each of the departments involved with the investigation of the Yellowstone Virus weighed in, including the CDC.

In the end, Ben's ideas were deemed sound enough to be fully tested and researched, and new quarantine locations were launched and data was gathered. Across the United States, each zone was given an updated protocol that included instructions based upon Julie and Ben's findings, with the expectation that each area would send their research back to corporate headquarters in Atlanta.

The tent outside Yellowstone was no different, and Ben and Julie found themselves helping with anything and everything to get the station set up and prepared, only to become the first test subjects. They'd explained everything that had happened so far, including Stephens' involvement, how Ben and Julie discovered where the caches and the bomb were hidden, and what they thought might be the way to defeat the virus.

Each of them had been assigned a separate bed, but because of their discovery of the "close proximity" rule, each bed was arranged close to another bed, and all of the infected patients were placed into the same large room, allowing the disease to proliferate and spread among them. Within a matter of hours, the CDC confirmed Ben's prediction that the proximity effect had a massive impact on slowing the spread of the virus, and within another few hours, they'd all but confirmed the suspicion that extended exposure to the virus led to an eventual recovery and inoculation.

They were released shortly after verifying that they were virus-free, and the research continued, using patients gathered from cities and towns in the surrounding two hundred mile radius around the camp.

Within days, news of the virus's weakness spread to major media outlets over television, radio, and internet sources. The key was proximity, and "recovery stations" were set up inside or near every major metropolitan area, including parks, arenas, stadiums, and larger government buildings. Smaller, more rural areas had similar stations, utilizing VFW posts, public meetinghouses, and judicial centers.

Large or small, the goal was the same: get as many people under one roof as possible, each with enough supplies to last a week. FEMA, Red Cross, and a dozen other agencies and organizations were simultaneously instructed to provide infrastructure support and training for the massive relief effort. And thanks to the efforts of large telecommunications companies, many of the relief locations were provided Wi-Fi access and secure data points, allowing work to continue without major conflicts.

Wall Street found little interruption in their operations, using mobile and wireless access points to continue trading and prevent any slowdowns in the US economy, and was able to ensure that losses in the major indexes were kept to a minimum. The government itself, operating for so long on pre-internet technology, seemed to be completely capable of keeping itself afloat without outside help.

Overall, the disaster relief efforts, while long and far-reaching, were successful. The nation watched as day after day, more public services were restarted, businesses were reopened, and municipal governments were resumed. Due to the staggering effect of healing the virus in phases throughout the population, as well as the increased desire to see America united again, many people were faced with nothing more than a week or two of vacation time while they were immunized against the disease.

Within a month, the Yellowstone Virus was deemed to be ‘a minor threat’ by the Centers for Disease Control, citing the work done by Ben and Julie as well as the data gathered by each of the quarantine stations. The virus/bacteria was expected to reveal itself in less than five percent of the population over the coming year, and while an actual cure was still out of reach, plans had been made to control the infection by forced exposure and proximity, eventually leading to full immunization against the disease.

“Valère, what happened?” Emilio asked through the screen.

Valère paced around the office, the speakers broadcasting the other man’s voice directly to his ears, as if Emilio were not behind a computer monitor but instead right there in the room with him.

“I have sent over a detailed analysis of the events that transpire—”

“Not now, SARA,” Emilio yelled. “I know you ‘sent over’ your little AI understanding of ‘these events,’ but I’m not asking that. Hell, it’s all over the news! I know exactly what happened. I’m asking Mr. Valère.”

Valère looked up, his eyes narrowed as he focused on the monitor. “Mr. Vasquez, I apologize for causing you undue stress. I assure you, our investments remain sound, as does our plan.”

“Our plan?” Emilio shouted. SARA automatically reduced the sound level before it was sent to Valère’s ears, so as not to cause any undue auditory discomfort. “Our plan has failed miserably. This was supposed to cripple the nation, not create a more patriotic and united one!”

Valère let the man continue, uninterrupted.

“Stephens failed, thanks to that escaped specimen Fischer, and those two CDC—”

“One CDC agent, Mr. Vasquez. The other was merely a park ranger at—”

“SARA, enough!” Emilio yelled.

Valère turned to the screen, noticing the rage building in his partner’s face. He held up a hand just as Emilio was about to start again. “Please, my friend, give yourself room to understand the true depth of what we have accomplished here.”

Emilio sneered but remained silent.

“Our plans have failed, perhaps, when seen through the narrow lens of the project’s parameters. But the Company remains strong, stronger than ever, perhaps, and that is in no small part due to the events that have transpired in America.”

Emilio nodded.

“In addition, the Company has confirmed that research continues in Brazil, and preparations are underway in Antarctica. We remain beneath the radar and will continue operations while the governments involved clean up the mess.”

“But at what cost, Valère? We failed. There is nothing we have accomplished by—”

“By what?” Valère asked. He steeled himself, pushing down the creeping anxiety snaking upward through his body. “There is nothing we have accomplished by failing? That is true. But what, exactly, do you think we were supposed to accomplish?”

Emilio frowned.

“Your parameters and objectives were the same as mine, and according to them, we have failed. Stephens was a loose cannon, and we have shown a lack of control over many of our contingencies. But what do you think the purpose was?”

“Of the failure?”

“Of even the success, were we to achieve it?”

“I—I don’t understand where you’re going with this, Francis.”

Valère paused. “Of course you don’t, Emilio. You were tapped for this project, and this one alone. But the Company has other interests, as I’m sure you’re aware. So what could they possibly expect to gain from a project such as this?”

Again, Emilio frowned.

“Nothing, my friend. Nothing directly. This project is busy work. It was something that seemed large enough to matter, though not crucial enough to place the entire weight and infrastructure of the Company behind it.”

“You mean...”

“Yes, Emilio. The Company needed us to create a distraction. One that would raise few eyebrows, regardless of success or failure. One that required little in the way of resources and management yet caused all eyes to focus inward.”

“So the project—”

“The project was just that, Emilio. A project. A test, really. And we failed, but only in the sense of the direct mission. In this overall game, I believe we have achieved success. Massive success.

“Every eye in the developed world has been watching America, watching to see how they react. America is in fits, recovering, trying to stabilize itself. Whether it shall will be an interesting drama to watch. In any event, the Company was working on a much larger project when we discovered the enigma strain. The Yellowstone Virus is a side effect, a wonderful addendum to our research. I wrote the project’s overview and had it approved as a way to divert more attention away from their larger goal.”

“And may I ask what that goal is, Mr. Valère?” Emilio asked.

Valère smiled, his eyes heavy, as he reached for the control to switch off the monitor.

“No, Emilio. You may not.”

The cold had been creeping in for the past few hours, and Ben's jacket seemed to be doing no more good. He sighed, watching his breath hang in the air and crystallize, the tiny specks sparkling as they collected and fell to the snowy ground.

He raised the long-handled axe and swung it once more. A satisfying crack reverberated around the tall pines, eventually getting lost in the white landscape. The block of wood split down the middle, sending the two halves in opposite directions, where two piles already lay. Ben examined his work, before heaving the axe up onto his shoulder, and walked slowly toward one of the piles. He filled a wheelbarrow and rolled the heavy load up a narrow dirt path.

As he exited the thick stand of trees, the sight in front of him almost stopped him in his tracks. The deep mocha-colored wood of the cabin's exterior stood out in stark contrast to the surrounding forest. A thin chimney piped out a few wisps of smoke from a fire he'd left unattended hours ago, but he could still smell the faint odor of burning logs.

He started up the path again, stopping only when he reached the front door. He set the wheelbarrow down on its mounts and stacked the wood in careful lines on both sides of the door. As he worked, he tried to calculate the fruits of the day's labor. Half a cord, maybe more.

Not enough, but not bad either, considering how slow he'd been lately thanks to his healing foot.

Finished with the wheelbarrow, he leaned it up against the wall of the cabin and reached for the door handle.

It opened before he got a grip on it.

"Took you long enough—it's getting a little chilly in here."

He smiled as he tried to think of a witty response.

"You know what? Think about it over dinner. You'll freeze if you stand there and try to get that brain of yours working again."

He stepped inside, immediately wrapped in the warmth of the dry air, and shut the door behind him.

Julie just watched. "Slowing down a little in your old age? Yesterday you got more than that, and you were done by four."

This time he wasn't caught off guard. "At least I'm doing something useful. What was that you tried to feed me last night?"

Julie's mouth hung open. "Oh, really? Good thing you're cooking tonight, then. We'll see how you do."

He removed his gloves and scarf and was now working on his boots as Julie came over and sat down on the bench next to him. He took off one shoe. Felt her arm slide underneath his when he went to remove the other.

She leaned her head on his shoulder, and he sat back against the wall. Ben felt her squeeze his hand, somehow causing the room to grow even warmer.

He smiled and closed his eyes.

Unfortunately, all he saw behind his closed lids was terror — the memory of what had happened in the United States, and the man behind it.

No, he told himself. The company behind it.

Drache Global.

Whatever it was — whatever they were doing — they were the true cause of the bomb and the virus that had killed so many. They were the reason Ben’s life was now very different.

And they were still out there, somewhere.

“You okay?” Julie asked.

He looked down at her, examining her eyes for a moment.

He nodded, slowly. “I’m okay,” he lied.

But he wasn’t. Not by a long shot.

He made a promise to himself, right then. A promise to find them — to find Drache Global and the people behind it.

He would find them, then bring them to justice.

Or he would die trying.

An Introduction by Blake Crouch

---

THE FIRST JOLT OF INTEREST was the cover...

Ominous gas mask, and the silhouette of a man running across a desert.

Then the title...SICK...one word, powerful, provocative, intriguing...

But it was those first pages that hooked me.

A man roused from sleep in the middle of the night by the cry of one of his children. What parent hasn't experienced that? And, while stumbling toward their child's room in that confused blariness between consciousness and dreams, who hasn't had that secret fear in the back of their mind, that maybe something is wrong? That maybe their son or daughter isn't merely coming down with a cold, or in the wake of a nightmare. But something much, much worse...

SICK didn't just hook me. It hit me with a devastating uppercut on every primal level as a parent, a father, and a human being.

Brett Battles has fashioned a blistering page turner that is destined to become a classic. This is a novel of paranoia, of fear, of a family blown apart by circumstances none of us could imagine, and ultimately, hope.

This is exactly the kind of novel I love to read, and it reminded me in the very best way of David Morrell's iconic TESTAMENT.

Trust me, you will love it, too.

SICK is absolutely unmissable.

Blake Crouch, April 2011

A cry woke him from his sleep.

A young cry.

A girl's cry.

Daniel Ash pushed himself up on his elbow. "Josie?"

It was more a question for himself than anything. His daughter's room was down the hall, making it hard for her to hear his sleep-filled voice in the best of circumstances. And if she was crying, not a chance.

He glanced at the other side of the bed, thinking his wife might already be up checking on their daughter. But Ellen was still asleep, her back to him. He'd all but forgotten about the headache she'd had, and the two sleeping pills she'd taken before turning in. Chances were, she wouldn't even open her eyes until after the kids left for school.

Ash rubbed a hand across his face then slipped out of bed.

The old hardwood floor was cool on his feet but not unbearable. He grabbed his T-shirt off the chair in the corner and pulled it on as he walked into the hallway.

A cry again. Definitely coming from his daughter's room.

"Josie, it's okay. I'm coming." This time he raised his voice to make sure she would hear him.

As he passed his son's room, he pulled the door closed so Brandon wouldn't wake, too.

Josie's room was at the other end of the hall, closest to the living room. She was the oldest, so she got to pick which room she wanted when they'd moved in. It wasn't any bigger than her brother's but Ash knew she liked the fact that she was as far away from Mom and Dad as possible. Made her feel independent.

Her door was covered with pictures of boy bands and cartoons. She was in that transitional stage between kid and teenager that was both cute and annoying. As he pushed the door open, he expected to find her sitting on her bed, upset about some nightmare she'd had. It wouldn't have been the first time.

"Josie, what's—"

His words caught in his mouth.

She wasn't lying in the bed. She was on the floor, the bedspread hanging down just enough to touch her back. Ash rushed over, thinking that she'd fallen and hurt herself. But the moment his hand touched her he knew he was wrong.

She was so hot. Burning up.

He had no idea a person could get that hot.

The most scared he'd ever been before had been when he'd taken Brandon to a boat show in Texas and the boy had wandered off. It took Ash less than a minute to find him again, but he thought nothing would ever top the panic and fear he'd felt then.

Seeing his daughter like that, feeling her skin burning, he realized he'd been wrong.

He scooped Josie off the floor and ran into the hallway.

"Ellen!" he yelled. "Ellen, I need you!"

He knew his voice was probably going to wake Brandon but, at this point, he didn't care. Josie was sick. Very sick. He needed Ellen to call an ambulance while he tried to bring their daughter's temperature down.

"Ellen!" he yelled again as he ducked into the bathroom.

Using an elbow, he flipped on the light then laid Josie in the tub. He wasted several seconds searching for the rubber plug, then jammed it into the drain and turned on the water, full cold. To help speed up the process, he pulled the shower knob and aimed the showerhead so that it would stream down on her and cool her faster.

Where the hell was Ellen?

He put the back of his hand on Josie's forehead. She was still on fire.

"Ellen!"

He was torn. He wanted to stay with Josie, but the pills Ellen had taken must have really knocked her out, so that meant it was up to him to get help.

"Hang on, baby," he said. "I'll be right back."

He raced into the hall and back to the master bedroom. The nearest phone was on Ellen's nightstand, next to their bed.

"Ellen. Wake up."

He shook her once, then picked up the phone and dialed 911. As he waited for it to ring, he glanced back at the bed.

Ellen hadn't moved.

"Nine one one. What is your emergency?" a female voice said.

He reached down and rolled Ellen onto her back, thinking that might jar her awake. But her eyes were already open, staring blankly at nothing.

He flipped on the light. The skin around her mouth and eyes was turning black, and there were dark drying streaks running across her face from her eye sockets where blood had flowed.

"Nine one one. What is your emergency?"

"Oh, God. Help," he managed to say.

"Are you hurt, sir?"

He touched Ellen's face. It was as cold as Josie's had been hot, and instantly he knew no breath would ever pass her lips again.

"Send help! Send help, please!"

He dropped the phone, not bothering to hang it up. It didn't even dawn on him that he hadn't given the operator an address. He was barely holding on to his sanity.

Back in the hallway, he tried to shove the image of Ellen's cold and lifeless body into the back of his mind. He looked into the bathroom. Josie was still propped up in the tub, the water now several inches deep. He knew he should go see if she was cooling off, but he had to check Brandon first.

He threw open his son's door and flipped on the light. Brandon had one of those beds that were raised in the air like a bunk, but instead of a second mattress underneath there was a desk.

Ash rushed over to the bed. His son was a long lump covered by a Spider-Man comforter. As was the boy's habit, even his head was buried beneath the blanket.

Ash could feel the muscles around his heart tightening. With the yelling and the running and now the light on in the room, he was sure his son should have woken, but Brandon hadn't moved at all.

He grabbed the comforter and pulled it back.

His son was lying on his side, his back to him.

Just like Ellen. Oh, God. Please, no.

Holding his breath, he put a hand on Brandon's shoulder and pulled him onto his back.

His son's eyes fluttered. "Dad?"

For the first time since Josie's cries had awakened him, Ash was unable to move.

"Dad, are you okay?"

Maybe this was the dream part. Maybe this was the final blow. Maybe in a few seconds he'd realize that Brandon's voice was only in his head, and his son was as cold and dead as his wife.

He touched Brandon's forehead.

Warm.

Normal warm.

"Brandon?"

"You're scaring me, Dad," his son said, inching back a little. "What's going on?"

Ash quickly pulled Brandon off the bed and held him tight against his chest as he ran out of the room.

"What's going on?" Brandon asked again.

"No questions right now, okay, buddy?" Ash told him, trying to keep his voice calm. "You're going to be fine."

It was a lie, of course. How would either of them ever be fine again?

He carried his son into the bathroom and sat him on the closed toilet lid.

"What's Josie doing in the tub?" Brandon asked.

"Not now."

The water was nearing the halfway point and was covering Josie's waist and legs. Ash touched the side of her face, hoping her temperature had come down a few degrees.

Not only had it come down, it had plummeted.

No! No, no, no!

He yanked her out of the tub without turning off the water, and began stripping off her drenched nightgown.

"Brandon, get some towels!" he yelled.

"Dad, what's going on? What's wrong with her?"

"Just get the towels!"

By the time Ash had her clothes off, Brandon had retrieved three towels from the cupboard under the sink. Ash used the first to quickly wipe off what water he could, then wrapped the other two around her. Though she was dangerously cold, unlike her mother she was still breathing.

"Get behind her," he told his son as he laid her on the floor. "Hug your body to hers. We need to help her get warm."

Brandon surprised him by not arguing. He stretched out behind his sister and hugged her tight. Ash did the same in front, creating a cocoon of warmth with Josie in the middle. It was the only thing he could think of doing.

"She's so cold," Brandon said.

"I know."

"What's wrong with her?"

"I'm not sure."

"Where's Mom? Does she know?"

"I let her sleep." Brandon would find out the truth soon enough, but at the moment Ash needed him to focus on helping his sister.

Though Josie's breathing was shallow, he could still feel her chest move up and down.

"It's okay, baby," he whispered over and over. "It's okay."

"She's not getting any warmer," Brandon said after a few minutes.

"Just keep hugging her."

They were still holding her like that when the front door of their house smashed open. Ash could hear people running into their living room.

“Who is it?” Brandon asked, fear in his voice.

“I called the paramedics before I woke you,” his father said. “Let’s just hold on to your sister until they tell us to move. Okay?”

“Okay, Dad.”

Ash expected the EMT crew to come into the bathroom at any moment. But when no one appeared, he yelled out, “We’re back here! In the bathroom! We need help!”

Footsteps pounded in the hallway, but still no one came.

“We need help! We have a sick girl here!”

Finally, he could hear them approaching the bathroom door. He tilted his head back so he could see into the hallway.

First one person appeared, then two.

But the relief he should have felt was overshadowed by confusion. The people moving into the bathroom weren’t dressed in EMT uniforms. They were wearing biohazard suits.

What happened after that was a blur of images.

His daughter rolling out of the house on a gurney under a plastic tent.

Ellen leaving, too, only the plastic that covered her was a black bag.

And people, dozens of them, all dressed in the same biohazard outfits.

He didn’t know how long he and Brandon had sat on the couch while all this was going on, but it seemed like hours.

Three things he did clearly remember from after that point.

He recalled being led with Brandon out to a truck that had some sort of isolation container on the back. As they crossed the front yard, he heard another cry, this one not of pain or fear, but anguish. Loud and uninhibited. Looking up, he realized theirs wasn’t the only house with an isolation truck out front. There was one parked in front of every home on their block.

The second thing he remembered came several hours later, after he and Brandon had been separated and he’d been put in some kind of cell.

“Captain Ash.” The voice came out of a speaker in the ceiling.

“Where are my children?” Ash asked. “They need me!”

“I’m sorry to inform you, Captain,” the voice said, still calm, “but your daughter died three minutes ago.”

“Josie?” he whispered. “Take me to her! Please, let me see her.”

There was no response.

“I have to see my daughter!”

When the voice next spoke several hours later, it was to inform him that Brandon had also died.

That was the third thing he remembered.

DR. NATHANIEL KARP stood with his arms crossed, watching the center monitor. There were three other people in the room with him: two technicians and a guard, all of whom had the highest-level clearances within the project.

The feed in the monitor came from cell number 57. Inside the cell, Captain Daniel Ash continued to pace back and forth, his temper seeming to swing from angry to desperate to devastated and back again with each crossing.

Overlaid across the bottom third of the monitor were Captain Ash's vital signs. Dr. Karp noted that the captain's heart rate was elevated, and that his temperature had risen half a degree, but that was understandable given the circumstances. What interested the doctor more was that the captain seemed to be showing no signs of the illness.

The doctor glanced at the other video screens. Seventeen additional cells were currently occupied by neighbors of the Ash family. When they'd first been brought in, they were all like the captain—agitated, but healthy. Now, though, every single one of them was displaying symptoms of infection.

Dr. Karp looked back at Ash's monitor.

So what makes your family different, Captain?

Ash had been as exposed as anyone else when the spray was released on the three streets that made up the Barker Flats Research Center housing area. But it had not affected him at all. Just like it had not affected his son.

Brandon, was it?

The immunity had obviously been passed down through Ash's ancestors, and not his wife's. Preliminary results indicated she was one of the first to succumb. Unfortunately, whatever gene was in play within the Ash family, there was an apparent gender component to it. The fact that Captain Ash and his son had remained immune, while the captain's daughter had not, was definitely something that needed to be investigated.

In many ways, the girl, Josie Ash, was the most interesting. By all accounts, she had gone through the same stages of the infection as the other victims, but not long after she'd been brought in, she had started to show improvement. And now, seven hours later, her temperature was almost normal.

Still, it bothered Dr. Karp. If the immunity affected the sexes differently, any vaccine they might be able to develop from the Ash family could potentially have the same drawbacks. He was sure the female population of the project would be far from excited if they had to go through the same hell the Ash girl had. There was also the very real possibility that, though the girl was now getting better, she might have suffered some internal damage to her organs while the disease had a hold of her. That would be unacceptable.

No, the gender component would have to be identified and eliminated. If that turned out to be impossible, then KV-27a would not be the answer and further testing would have to take place.

"Dr. Karp," one of the technicians said.

The doctor acknowledged the man with a look.

"We've lost the patients in cells 18 and 31. Five other cells are trending toward termination in the next thirty minutes, and the remaining ten sometime over the following two hours."

Dr. Karp nodded once, then looked back at Captain Ash. He was sitting on his bunk now, his head in his hands. His heart rate had come down a bit, and despite the fact they had been pumping the virus directly into his cell since he arrived, there was still no sign he was getting sick.

“Call me if anything changes,” the doctor said.

“Yes, sir.”

Dr. Karp walked out the door and down the hallway toward the rooms where the children were being held.

As soon as the girl was stable enough, they would move the two Ash kids to a facility outside San Francisco, where observations could continue and the doctor’s team could do more extensive testing to determine the source of the immunity. A day, maybe two at most.

Their father, on the other hand, would not be making the trip. A team would continue to keep him under observation there at Barker Flats, waiting to see if the virus broke through and compromised his system. Dr. Karp was convinced it wouldn’t, but they had to do their due diligence. If in a week, maybe ten days tops, Ash was still healthy, he would be terminated and his body thoroughly examined.

Dr. Karp reached the boy’s room first. The guard at the door opened it without being asked, then stood aside.

Brandon Ash was sitting at a small table, an untouched bowl of cereal in front of him.

“You should eat,” the doctor said.

“I’m not hungry,” Brandon mumbled.

The doctor approached the table. “I have good news.”

Instantly, the boy brightened. “My father?”

“Your sister, Josie.”

“Oh,” the boy said, unable to keep his disappointment completely out of his voice.

“She’s getting better. You’ll be able to see her soon.”

“Good. I’m...I’m glad. But...” He hesitated. “What about my dad?”

Though the doctor was often short and gruff with those who worked for him, he knew how to turn on the bedside manner when needed. He knelt down next to Brandon and put a hand on the boy’s shoulder. “I’m not going to lie to you, Brandon, he’s not doing well at the moment. But we’re hopeful that he’ll be better soon, just like Josie.”

“Can I see him?”

“That wouldn’t be a good idea right now. There are a lot of doctors and nurses working on him, and I’m sure you don’t want to get in their way.”

Brandon looked down at the table and shook his head. “No. I don’t want to do that.”

“As soon as you can see him, I’ll let you know. Okay?”

Brandon tried to smile. “Thank you.”

Dr. Karp patted him on the shoulder again then stood up. “Now, eat your breakfast. We don’t want you getting sick, too.”

THAT NIGHT WOULD be burned forever in Ash's mind. He knew there would be no escaping it. His wife, his daughter, his son—all dead. But as utterly painful as that realization was, it was actually the good memories that made him want to curl into a ball in the corner.

Wrestling with Brandon in the backyard.

Reading to Josie as she leaned against him, hanging on his every word.

Kissing Ellen. Holding Ellen. Loving Ellen.

There was a trip they had all taken once that started out badly, but it turned out to be the best vacation they'd ever had. He'd been stationed at Fort Irwin then, outside Barstow, California—ironically only about a hundred miles south of Barker Flats. They'd meant to go to the Grand Canyon but only made it as far as Needles, California, when the van they'd borrowed from a neighbor broke down. Repairs would take several days, which pretty much ruled out sticking to their plan.

The owner of the auto shop was a former Marine. When he found out Ash was in the service, he made a few calls and was soon driving the Ash family the forty or so miles to a vacation house on Lake Havasu his brother-in-law owned.

They spent the days swimming in the lake, the evenings barbecuing, and the nights playing games. Ash became the king of Chinese checkers that trip, while Josie was crowned Miss Monopoly.

One day they even rented a Jet Ski, and Ash took turns taking the kids out on the water. Ellen was a nervous wreck every time she watched them head away from shore, but by the end, even she was smiling and laughing. Ash never did get her on that Jet Ski, though. She'd claimed someone had to stay on shore in case something went wrong, but he knew that wasn't the real reason. She had a fear of water, something she'd had since she was a kid.

He missed that about her.

He missed everything.

Over a week he had been in his cell, a week of talking with no one but the voice from the speaker, and not actually seeing anyone at all. When he woke each morning, he found a day's worth of food sitting against the wall. He tried pretending to sleep a few times so he could catch whoever was bringing it in, but he could never keep his eyes open long enough. He suspected they were giving him some sort of sleeping drug, either through his food or, more likely, through the air.

The cell that was his world consisted of a cot, a toilet, a sink, and four thick cement walls. The only door was opposite the toilet, but there was no handle on the inside, just a smooth metal surface.

He figured he'd been put in the cell on the chance he'd been infected. It was probably the nearest isolation room available. After all, he'd held his daughter in his arms. Brandon had, too. He'd been healthy when Ash last saw him, but he'd apparently contracted whatever it was before they were taken from the house. So, logically, Ash should be next.

Only, despite the fact that everyone he loved was dead, here he was still breathing.

He felt despair and guilt and loss, but none was as strong as the hatred he felt toward whoever had done this to his family, his friends, his country. There was no way he would ever believe this was not a planned attack. Someone had targeted American soldiers and their families. Families, for God's sake! Whoever it was needed to pay.

Perhaps they already had. But if that were the case, no one had told him. In fact, no one had told him much of anything.

Each day, the man on the speaker would ask him questions like: “How are you feeling?” “Do you have any pain?” “Headaches?” Or the voice would give him instructions such as: “Stand with your arms out, then raise them above your head,” or “Walk heel to toe across the room in a straight line.” He felt like a drunk.

But when Ash asked questions back, they were ignored, and the anger he felt toward the terrorist who’d perpetrated this disaster started to leak a little toward the voice in the ceiling. He just wanted to get out and bury his family. He wanted to sit by their graves and grieve. It was his right.

“Good morning, Captain,” the voice on the speaker said.

Ash opened his eyes. It was the beginning of his eighth day in the cell.

“Are you feeling anything unusual? Aches? Pains?” the voice asked.

Ash looked up at the speaker. To him it had become the face of the voice. He could almost see eyes now, and a nose. And, of course, the big round mouth.

The speaker had become his own version of Wilson the volleyball from that Tom Hanks movie, Cast Away. Only Wilson had been Hanks’s friend. Ash wasn’t so sure the speaker was his.

He gritted his teeth. “How much longer?”

“Please answer the question.”

“Answer mine first. How much longer until I can get out and deal with my family?”

For more than a minute the cell was silent.

“Are you feeling anything unusual? Aches? Pains?” the voice asked again.

“Go to hell.”

“Captain, you are not at liberty to choose whether you will answer the questions or not. It’s your duty.”

Ash rolled onto his side, as if turning away from the speaker would make it disappear.

As he lay there, he could smell eggs and bacon, and knew a tray with his breakfast was waiting for him by the door. It was the only hot meal he got each day. Lunch and dinner would be in boxes next to it. Sandwiches, most days.

“Are you feeling anything unusual? Aches? Pains?”

The captain let out a snorting you’ve-got-to-be-kidding-me laugh. “Unusual? Yeah, I’m feeling something unusual.”

“Please explain.” There was a note of concern in the voice.

Ash just shook his head. If the voice couldn’t figure out there was something unusual about his situation, he wasn’t going to enlighten him.

“What are you feeling?” the voice asked.

No response.

“Captain, please answer the question.”

Ash sat up, suddenly having the urge to eat. He retrieved the tray then returned to his bunk. In addition to the bacon and eggs, there was also a container of orange juice and a cup of coffee. He opened the OJ and downed the contents.

“Captain, if there’s a change in your condition, you need to tell us.”

Ash lifted the plastic top that covered his plate and picked up his fork. He was just about to scoop up some egg when he noticed a small, folded piece of paper tucked under the bacon. He hesitated for a moment, then placed the lid back down as if he’d decided he wasn’t ready to eat yet, and turned his attention to the coffee.

“Captain, are you going to cooperate?”

Ash took a sip of the coffee and made no indication he had even heard the question.

“Captain?”

It was another five minutes before the voice finally fell silent. Still, Ash waited, knowing that after a while their interest in him would wane, and those watching him through the surveillance cameras would no longer be paying as close attention as they had been.

Finally, he lifted the lid off the plate again. This time he grabbed both the piece of paper and a strip of cold bacon. He tucked the paper against his palm, then raised the bacon to his mouth and took a bite. While he chewed, he casually slipped the paper under the blanket.

He ate everything on the plate, even though the eggs had gone rubbery and the bacon had lost much of its flavor. When he was done, he set the tray by the door as he always did, and commenced his daily exercise program.

This consisted of push-ups, sit-ups and running in place, the perfect exercises for the confined man. Outwardly, he maintained an aura of blank detachment, but on the inside he could think of little else but the scrap of paper waiting for him in his bed.

After sixty minutes, he'd worked up quite a sweat. He removed his clothes, then used the cup the coffee had come in to give himself a sink bath. Still sticking to his routine, he toweled off with his shirt and pulled the flimsy cloth pants they'd given him back on.

For the next twenty minutes, he paced the room. This was his cool down, also part of his new daily habit.

As he walked back and forth he began to wonder if he was making a big deal out of nothing. Maybe the paper was just trash, something accidentally dropped there when his food had been prepared. If so, he was getting himself worked up over nothing.

Once his palm touched the concrete wall at the end of his last lap, he returned to his cot and lay down. After a few minutes he closed his eyes, then twisted around so his back was to the vent where he assumed the camera was. As he turned, he slipped his hand under the blanket and grabbed the paper.

Though he kept telling himself that it was nothing, he could feel his heart race as he silently unfolded it. Keeping it close to his chest, he held it out at an angle, lowered his head and opened his eyes.

In the center of the paper, written in pencil, was a single word:

TONIGHT

THE MAN RUNNING the show in Dr. Karp's absence was Major Frank Littlefield.

The major had left his previous posting three years earlier for a special assignment. After a year in which a whole new world had been opened up to him, the assignment became permanent. It was on that day that the Army—and the U.S. Government, for that matter—ceased to be his true employer. He was a member of the project now, and as such, that's where his loyalties lay.

Major Littlefield was sitting in his office sipping a cup of coffee. Via the monitor on his wall, he had access to all the same feeds as the observation room two doors down, but was limited to watching only one at a time. That wasn't such a big deal anymore since there was just one cell still occupied.

Cell number 57. Captain Daniel Ash.

The captain was taking what had become his usual post-workout morning nap. But this morning there was definitely a change in him, a defiance that had only been a spark in the previous couple of days.

As the major stared at the screen, his phone rang. He pressed the speakerphone button and said, "Major Littlefield."

"I just read your report." It was Dr. Karp. The major had been expecting the call, waiting for it, actually. "Has there been any change in attitude?"

"No, sir."

"What about physically? Still no reaction?"

"None whatsoever, sir."

The doctor was silent for a moment. "I had hoped to give it a few more days, but I think it's safe to assume the results won't change. Where are we with the current dosing cycle?"

"It's scheduled to complete at two a.m."

"All right, we might as well let it run. Once it's complete, pull the plug, Major."

"Yes, sir."

"I want the autopsy performed immediately. Once you have obtained all the required samples, and the body has been eliminated, you and your team are to report to Bluebird."

"Understood."

"Good," the doctor said, then hung up.

As Major Littlefield replaced the receiver in the cradle, his gaze returned to the napping form of Captain Ash.

"Enjoy it," the major said to the TV. "It'll be your last one."

TONIGHT.

It could mean so many different things.

Was it a warning? Was tonight the night they changed the sleeping gas to something stronger? Or was the sender going to try to contact him? Or was it just a joke and didn't really mean anything at all?

Ash wasn't sure if he should be looking forward to finding out or dreading it. But there was one thing he couldn't do—stop it from coming.

He kept to his schedule. Eating lunch when he usually ate, exercising again in the afternoon, then pacing until his stomach began to growl, signaling it was time for dinner. Twice the voice had asked how he was feeling, and twice he had ignored it.

When the lights flicked off then back on, he knew the wait was almost over. In ten minutes they would go off and stay that way until morning. Again, he did what he always did, brushing his teeth using only his finger and water from the sink, then relieving himself in the toilet. The only change was the ripped-up note he slipped into the bowl just before he flushed.

As he lay on the cot, he felt tense, suddenly sure the message had been a warning. He tried to stay awake, fearful that if he closed his eyes, he might never open them again. It wasn't that he was scared of death, or that the thought of being with his family again didn't appeal to him. But it was because of his family that he needed to live. He had to find who had done this to them. He had to make sure whoever it was had been properly dealt with, and if they hadn't, he had to do it himself. After that, he didn't care.

But then the gas must have come, because his eyelids grew heavy, and then the next thing he knew someone was shaking his shoulder.

“Wake up, Captain.”

The male voice seemed distant, as if it were coming from another room.

“Give him a second,” a second voice said, also male and muffled. “The shot takes a moment to kick in.”

Shot?

Ash peeled open his eyes, but could see nothing in the darkness. His hand slipped as he tried to push himself up and he fell back onto the bed.

“Easy there, Captain,” the first voice said.

Ash turned toward it. “What's going on?”

“Later. Right now we have to get you out of here.”

“Out of here? I'm...what?” He knew he wasn't making sense, but they weren't making sense to him, either.

“We can talk later. Right now you need to do exactly what we say and keep quiet.”

“I don't under...?”

What was this guy talking about? All Ash wanted to do was put his head back on his pillow and shut his eyes. But gloved hands were under his arms now, lifting him to his feet. As he staggered, someone grabbed him and kept him from falling.

“We'd love to give you a few seconds to wake up, but we don't have time,” the second voice said.

Ash looked to his right and could barely make out a dark shadow of an oddly shaped person. Suddenly, he felt an arm wrap around his back.

“Just hold on,” the man said, his voice still sounding farther away than it should have been.

They exited the cell into a dark hallway. That seemed odd to Ash. Surely, there should have been some lights on.

“Clear,” the first voice called out from the distance.

“We’re going to move fast, Captain,” the man at his side said. “So keep a hold of me.”

As Ash grabbed the man’s back, the material of the guy’s shirt confused him. It was thick and kind of rubbery. But Ash barely had time to register this before the man began half-pulling, half-dragging him down the corridor. It was all Ash could do to keep from slipping to the floor.

After what he guessed was probably thirty seconds, they mercifully stopped. He heard a knob twist, then a door open, but he still couldn’t see anything.

“Straight ahead a couple feet, then we go to the left,” his human crutch said.

As they eased forward, Ash asked, “Why are all the lights off?”

“Quiet.”

Once they’d made the turn, they picked up speed again, moving quickly down the new corridor and through another door.

“Can you stand on your own?” the man whispered to Ash.

“What? Uh, yeah. I think so.”

“Okay. Stay here.” The man let go of Ash and stepped away.

“Wait. Where are you going?” the captain asked.

“Don’t move, and you’ll be fine.”

“I don’t understand. Why are you—”

A torrent of thick liquid engulfed him from every side, the flow so strong he could hardly breathe. There was also an overwhelming disinfectant smell, which didn’t help. He coughed several times and tried to step away.

“Don’t,” the first voice ordered. “You’re covered with the bug. It’s either this way or we will be forced to terminate you.”

Terminate? Ash stayed where he was.

Soon the spray stopped.

“Remove your clothes and throw them behind you.”

Ash hesitated for only a second, then stripped.

Once more the flow commenced, followed by a strong stream of odorless water.

As soon as it shut off, the first voice said, “There’s a wall three feet to your left. Follow that toward my voice about ten feet. There you’ll find a towel and some clean clothes. Please hurry.”

Ash did as instructed. As he was toweling off, he heard the sprays come on again. Judging by the sound, though, it wasn’t flowing over flesh.

Decontamination suits, he realized. Like the ones the people who’d come into his house—so long ago, it seemed—wore. That’s why the guy’s shirt had felt so strange.

The clothes waiting for him were not the flimsy garments he’d been given while in his cell. There was a pair of jeans, a T-shirt, a pullover sweater, socks, and a pair of sturdy but flexible ankle-high boots.

“Ready?” the first voice asked a minute later, no longer muffled by what must have been the hood and mask of the suit.

“Yes,” Ash said. He finished tying his last shoelace and stood up. “Are you going to tell me what’s going on now?”

“Not until we get out of here,” the other voice said.

A door opened, but the lack of light remained unchanged.

The two men led Ash away from the room, one always keeping a hand on the captain’s arm.

They’d been fast-walking for nearly three minutes when the guy in the lead let out a very low “shhhh.”

They stopped in the middle of the hall.

“Over here,” the lead guy whispered.

Ash was ushered through a doorway, into a space that was barely big enough for the three of them. The door then clicked shut.

A moment later, the sound of a single pair of running footsteps rushed by outside without stopping.

“It’ll be okay. I’ll take care of it,” the other one replied. “You get him out of here. You remember the way, right?”

“Are you kidding? This place is a maze.”

There was silence for a moment, then, “Okay. I’ll show you, but then it’ll be up to you.”

They headed back into the hallway, picking up their pace to a near run. They passed through two more corridors and made a hard turn to the left.

After another few moments, the one in the lead said, “It’s just up—”

Without warning, the emergency lights kicked on.

The guy who’d been holding Ash’s arm let go, then ripped something off his head. Night vision goggles. Both of the men had been wearing them. With the lights on, they had become useless.

“Come on,” the lead guy said. “We’re almost there.”

He had a short military haircut and was wearing an officer’s uniform with no insignia. The man next to Ash was dressed in clothes more like the blue jeans and sweater he was now wearing, and while this guy’s hair was also short, it had a distinct civilian look to it.

They ran down the hallway, took a quick bend to the right, then the lead man skidded to a stop in front of a heavy-looking metal door. As Ash and the other man ran up, he pulled it open.

Chilled air seeped into the hallway.

“Quick, quick!” he said, then pointed at an angle out the door. “Head in that direction. It’ll get you to where we were earlier.”

“Maybe you should come with us,” his partner said.

The first guy shook his head. “I can do more here.”

“They’re going to know someone on the inside helped.”

The lead man’s face grew hard. “Go. Now. You don’t have time.”

He shoved Ash and the other man outside then shut the door.

Ash’s escort seemed disoriented for a moment, then he took a deep breath and said, “Keep low, and follow right behind me.”

He took off across a wide space of leveled dirt, not waiting for Ash to respond. Though he was tired of not knowing what was going on, Ash was smart enough to realize now wasn’t the time to push, so he headed after his rescuer.

The man led him into a narrow ravine that had been carved into the desert. It was deep enough so that they could stand up without being seen by anyone at ground level.

They followed it for thirty minutes, finally stopping when they reached a rocky overhang. There, the man fell to his knees, reached underneath, and pulled out a cloth bag. He unzipped it and removed something.

“Here,” he said, tossing it to Ash.

It was a worn-looking leather jacket with a padded lining inside, and a stocking cap and gloves in the pocket. While it was definitely a cool desert night, it wasn't that cold.

“Put it on,” the man said. “You'll need it later.”

“For what?”

“To stay warm. What do you think?”

Next he pulled out a messenger bag and slung it over his shoulder. He then shoved the empty cloth bag back under the overhang. “All right. Let's go.”

Ash didn't move.

The man took a few steps down the riverbed before he realized this. “Look, we don't have much time. If you miss the connection, you're out of luck. So let's move it.”

“No,” Ash said.

The man stared at him. “All right, fine. Then you can stay here and let them find you.”

“Why are you doing this?”

The man looked away, obviously not happy. When he turned back, he took a couple steps toward Ash. “If we'd left you in your cell, you wouldn't have woken up tomorrow morning. You were no longer any use to them alive.”

“You saved me because they were going to kill me?”

“We saved you because...” He paused, then took a deep breath. “Yeah. That's as good a reason as any. You can either trust me or not, but I can guarantee you one thing. Those people back there...” He pointed in the direction they'd come. “They don't care a thing about you. It's what's inside you that's most important to them. And they can't get to that while you're still breathing. Get it?”

He turned around and started walking, this time without looking back.

Ash stood where he was a moment longer, then followed.

MAJOR LITTLEFIELD WAS in the cafeteria when the power went out.
“What the hell?”

He'd made himself a late-night sandwich as he waited for Ash's final cycle to complete. It was already obvious that, once more, the bug would fail to take hold. The captain was as immune to KV-27a as a person could be.

From Littlefield's understanding, the testing of the Ash children was proceeding slowly. But now Dr. Karp would have samples from an actual body he could take a closer look at and hopefully speed up the process.

The plan for that evening was simple. Once the cycle finished at two a.m. and the captain's vital signs remained unchanged, the air to his cell would be slowly cut off and within an hour, he would take his last breath. This method would eliminate any chance of contaminating the body with whatever poison they would have had to use otherwise.

But now the lights had gone off, and the stupid backup power had yet to kick in.

He pulled his radio off his belt. “Control, this is Littlefield.”

“Control,” a voice replied. It sounded like Brewer.

“What's your power situation there?”

There was a slight pause. “Sir, we're in the dark. Literally.”

“Backup?”

“No, sir. Nothing.”

Littlefield stood up. “All right, I'm coming to you.”

“Sir, where are you?”

“The cafeteria.”

“I think you're going to have a problem getting here.”

Littlefield pulled his cell phone out of his pocket, using it as a flashlight as he weaved his way out of the room. “Why do you say that?”

“When the power cuts off, the facility entrance automatically locks down until the electricity comes back.”

“Well, what about one of the emergency doors?”

“Those can only be opened from the inside.”

“Then get off your ass and go open one!”

There was no response for a moment. “The observation room door also locks down. Jones and I are, uh, stuck in here.”

“Jesus.”

Littlefield stepped out of the cafeteria and jogged quickly toward the entrance to the containment facility. There was absolutely no one else around. Not surprising since Littlefield had been left with only a bare-bones crew of five men including himself, more than enough to deal with the single person under their supervision. The rest of the team that had been at Barker Flats had either left with Dr. Karp and the children, or had relocated to Bluebird already. So with the exception of his team and Captain Ash, there was no one else anywhere on the decommissioned base.

“Are you telling me there's no manual override?” he asked.

“No, sir.”

“Well, where are Causey and Ellison? If they’re not in there with you, they must be somewhere in the facility. They can let me in.”

“Not sure, sir. I’ll try to locate them.”

Littlefield reached the main door. Sure enough it was locked tight. He made his way around, trying each of the three emergency doors, but they were sealed shut, too.

“Control, have you found Causey or Ellison yet?”

“No, sir. Neither is answering his radio.”

A sudden chill ran down the major’s back.

“What was the status of Cell 57 when you were last able to check?”

“The captain was sound asleep. Vital signs unchanged.”

“Are you sure he was asleep?”

“Absolutely.”

That was good, but it still wasn’t enough to ease Littlefield’s mind. “There’s got to be a way for me to get in. Something—”

“Sir?” a new voice came over the radio.

“Who is this?” the major asked.

“It’s Jones, sir. I believe if you go to emergency door B, you might be able to get in there.”

“I’ve already tried each of the emergency doors. No go. All closed tight.”

“Yes, sir, but...”

“What is it, Jones?”

“Sir, I believe...if I remember correctly, there is a manual override outside door B.”

“I didn’t see anything.”

Littlefield began running back toward emergency door B. “How do you know it’s hidden?”

There was a pause. “One of the other men, sir. He left with Dr. Karp last week. He found it and showed it to me. We’d used it when we needed a smoke.”

That was a potentially serious breach of security. Jones should have known better. It would have to be dealt with later but at the moment, the major could take advantage of the rule-breaking.

“Okay, I’m here,” he said half a minute later. “Where is it?”

“If you face the door, you’ll see a little panel low and to the right, about three feet from the entrance.”

“I see it.”

“Open the panel, sir.”

Littlefield did. There was a lever inside in the down position, and above it, a series of six tumblers with numbers on each barrel.

“Okay,” he said. “I see the lock. What’s the combination?”

“Are all ones still showing, sir?”

“Yes.”

“Then you just need to pull the handle, sir.”

“The combination is all ones?”

“I...think it’s just waiting to be reset when the next permanent operation moves in.”

Good God. How easily they could have been compromised if someone had snuck onto the base.

He pulled the lever and the door sprang open.

Inside the facility, he couldn’t see his fingers even if he tried to poke himself in the eye, so once again he resorted to using his cell phone as a flashlight.

"I'm in," he said as he took off running down the hallway. "I'm going for the emergency power first, then I'll check the cell."

When he got to the emergency panel, his worst fear was confirmed. This wasn't just a simple fault. Someone had tampered with it. Thankfully, it wasn't enough to put it out of action permanently.

He spent several annoying minutes getting enough of it back online so he could engage the backup system. The moment the emergency lights flared on, he began sprinting toward Cell 57.

His radio crackled. "Major Littlefield?" It was Brewer again.

Littlefield raised his radio without slowing his pace. "What?"

"He's not there."

The major didn't have to ask who "he" was. "Are you sure?"

"Yes, sir. The emergency power gave us some limited camera access. Cell 57 is empty."

Littlefield nearly tossed the radio down the hall ahead of him. "Dammit!"

"Sir, where are you?"

"Approaching the cellblock-50 corridor."

"Stop, sir! Stop and get out now!"

The major skidded to a halt. "What is it?"

"The door to Cell 57 is open and the cycle is running again. The cellblock corridor will be contaminated."

The major stared ahead. Not just the cellblock corridor, he realized.

Fifty feet in front of him, he could see the open door to cellblock 50. Soon the whole facility would be contaminated. There was no question his own life was already over.

"Contact Dr. Karp. Inform him that the subject is missing, and that we are conducting a full facility search. Tell him upon completion we'll be initiating Protocol Thirteen."

"What? There's no reason for—"

"Can you access the camera outside cellblock 50?"

"Uh, I think so."

"You should look."

The pause that followed lasted about ten seconds.

"Dear God," Brewer said.

"The main corridor's your only way out, and it's been compromised." What the major didn't have to add was that the door to the observation room was not biosafe-rated. "We're dead one way or the other."

It was nearly half a minute before Brewer finally responded. "I'll call Dr. Karp."

Suddenly, Littlefield heard someone running farther back in the facility. Thinking that it might be Ash, he took off in pursuit, but whoever it was got out at one of the emergency exits before Littlefield could reach them. As much as he wanted to continue tracking the person into the night, in his contaminated condition it was no longer a possibility.

He spent forty minutes searching the building for Ash, but the only person he found was Sergeant Causey. He was lying unconscious in a supply closet near cellblock 30. The major decided not to wake him just to tell him he was about to die.

Ellison, though, was nowhere to be found, making it a pretty damn good bet he'd been involved in freeing Captain Ash. No matter. They'd both be tracked down soon enough. Dr. Karp would make sure of it. Littlefield was just disappointed he wouldn't be there to pull the trigger when it happened.

He walked all the way down to Cell 57 and sat on Ash's cot. He then had Brewer patch him through to Dr. Karp.

“I can’t say that I’m pleased,” the doctor said when Littlefield finished his report.

“I can’t say that I am, either.”

“Is that it?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Then finish things.”

“Yes, sir. I will, sir. Good luck.”

Dr. Karp grunted a reply, then was gone.

“Brewer?” Littlefield said.

“I’m here.”

“Initiate Protocol Thirteen.”

FIVE MINUTES BEYOND the rock overhang, Captain Ash and his escort came to a tall chain-link fence. There were several rows of razor wire mounted to brackets across the top, meant to discourage anyone from climbing over.

His guide pulled a small, rectangular device out of his pocket and stared at it for a few seconds before nodding to his right.

“That way,” he said. “Seventy-five feet.”

As they walked along the fence, Ash caught sight of the building he’d been freed from. It was really no more than a distant, half-lit blob. That surprised him. He hadn’t realized they’d traveled so far.

What was even more surprising, though, was that there were no helicopters flying around looking for them, no vehicles racing across the desert hot on their trail, no apparent interest in them at all. Was it possible the Army didn’t even realize he was gone?

“Found it,” his guide said as he dropped to his knees beside the fence.

The man undid a couple of temporary ties from the chain-link fence then pulled open a slit that had been previously cut into it.

He shoved the messenger bag through first, followed it, then pulled one of the edges back as far as it would go. “Your turn.”

As soon as Ash passed through, the guy hemmed up the fence, then said, “Not long now.”

“And then what?”

Ash got no response.

The desert on this side of the fence was no different from that on the other, save for the fact that it wasn’t under direct military control.

They found another ravine, this one only deep enough to cover them from the waist down. They followed it for several minutes before they climbed out and veered off to their right. In the sky, there was definitely something brewing in the East that would challenge the night for control before too long.

They walked for five more minutes, then the guide said, “Wait here.”

A minute passed. Then two.

Ash was just starting to wonder if the guy was going to come back when—

Light flashed, and a tremendous roar raced across the desert as the ground shook for what seemed like several seconds, knocking Ash down.

He pushed himself up and stared, dumbstruck, toward the middle of the valley. The building that he’d been held in was gone, replaced by flames so bright, his eyes hurt looking at them even at this distance. Above the inferno, a giant cloud of smoke rose into the air, lit from below by the flames.

“You’ve got to go now!”

Ash whipped around. He hadn’t heard the other man return.

“Did...did you guys do that? Did you blow up the building?”

The man glared at Ash for a moment. “We were there to rescue you, not blow up anything. Whatever happened, they did it themselves. Now come on.”

“But why would the Army blow up their own building?”

“You think the Army did this to you?” He pointed toward the distant blaze. “The Army didn’t do that, and they weren’t the people who were holding you. You’ve gotten in a mess here you didn’t even realize you'd been pulled into."

"What are you talking about? If they weren't Army, then I need to report in, let them know what's going on."

"You don't get it. Anything you report will get right back to the people who did this to you. You can strike out on your own and find out if I'm right, or you can take the help I'm offering and find out the truth." When Ash didn't immediately respond, the man added, "Don't forget, that guy who helped me get you out was still inside when we left. There's a pretty good chance he just gave his life to save you. So what's it going to be?"

It was all too much for Ash to take in. Not the Army? If not, who were they? And why would reporting in get him in trouble? Almost none of it was making sense. About the only thing he knew for sure was that the man and his partner had gotten him out of the building before it exploded.

Finally he nodded. He didn't have to trust them forever, but for now it seemed like the best option he had.

"Let's go, then," the man said. A few minutes later, they were standing at the edge of a blacktop road. The man pulled the messenger bag off his shoulder and handed it to Ash. "You'll find another change of clothes inside. There's also a driver's license and a credit card under the name Craig Thompson. Don't try using the card. It's just for appearances and won't work. But you'll be Thompson only for the next leg. When you transfer again, you'll be given a new ID. At that point, destroy these."

"Transfer again?" Ash asked.

"There's also two thousand dollars in cash," the guide said, ignoring his question.

"Two thousand?"

"It should be more than enough in case of an emergency along the way."

"Along the way to where?"

The man looked at him for a moment, then opened the flap of the messenger bag and pulled out a seven-by-seven-inches square, half-inch-thick package that had been wrapped completely in brown packing tape. "This is for your contact at your end station. He'll know what to do with it."

"Contact? End station? You're not making any sense."

The man stuffed the package back in the bag then pointed down the road. "A hundred yards that way you'll find an abandoned gas station." He looked at his watch. "In ten minutes, a car is going to stop there. The driver will ask you if you know where the nearest town is. You say it would be easier if you showed them. They'll agree and you'll get in."

"Who is it?"

"I have no idea."

"Where are they supposed to take me?"

"I have no idea."

"So I'm supposed to just trust them?"

"You trusted us."

"I didn't have a choice."

"Seems to me you don't have much of a choice now, either."

"Please. You've gotta tell me what's going on!"

The man looked at his watch again. "You're down to nine minutes. If you're not there when your ride arrives, they won't wait. Then you'll be on your own." He stood up and held out his hand. "Good luck."

Not knowing what else to do, Ash shook it, then watched the man disappear back into the night.

Finally he turned and started jogging down the highway.

JAMES ELLISON WAS a dead man, and he knew it.

After guiding Captain Ash and the other man—a man whose name he never knew—to the exit and making sure they got out, his plan had been to return to the supply closet where he'd left Sergeant Causey after he'd drugged the man's coffee. He had a second, weaker dose that he was going to take himself so that they'd both be found unconscious together.

He had been on his way there when he heard Major Littlefield's voice in the distance. He pulled out his radio and turned it up just loud enough so he could listen in on the conversation.

What he heard made his blood turn to ice. The door to cellblock 50 had been left open. He'd been sure he closed it, but apparently the lock hadn't engaged. It was his biohazard suit—it made it hard to hear the click of the latch.

Though Ash and the other man had still been in the facility when the emergency power came back on and the dosing cycle started again, they were so far away at that point, there was no chance the bug could have reached them before they got outside.

He, on the other hand, was toast.

He told himself the reason he needed to get out of there was because someone had to report in the fact that Major Littlefield was no longer in the picture.

His cell phone was in his bag in the observation room, and therefore permanently unavailable, so he would have to find an out-of-the-way pay phone. After he made the call, he could stumble into the desert and die, hopefully from exposure before the bug took him down. That was the best plan he could come up with.

But while the information about Major Littlefield was important, it would also be something the others would learn soon enough without him.

The coming Protocol Thirteen firestorm—that was the real reason he turned and ran.

THE GAS STATION was right where the guide had told Ash it would be. It was an old, adobe-style building with a low concrete pad out front where the pumps used to sit. By the look of it, it had been left for dead a long time ago.

Ash raced across the highway, thinking that whoever was going to be picking him up must already be there, perhaps parked out of sight. But when he got there, no one was around.

Had his ride already come and gone? Had he missed his opportunity to get away from the base? Or, he wondered, had the driver been scared off by the explosion? It certainly wouldn't be out of the question.

Just then he heard a whine, low and from the South. Tires on asphalt. It had to be.

He peered down the highway. Everything was dark. No headlights, no sign that anyone was coming, except the whine.

He didn't see the car until just before it turned off the road, its headlights off. He watched as it pulled in like it was going to fill up with gas.

For a few seconds, he considered making a run for the desert and disappearing. He had no idea who these people were, and had no clue as to why they were helping him. What he did know, though, was getting a ride in a car was considerably better than wandering through the desert.

He stepped out from the building and walked toward the sedan. As he neared, the driver's-side window slid down.

"Morning," a female voice said from inside. She sounded nervous.

Ash leaned down so he could see her. In the darkness, she wasn't much more than a shadow, with shoulder-length hair he thought was probably blonde.

"Could have sworn there was a town around here," she said. "Know of some place I could get a little breakfast?"

"I...I can show you."

His response was a lot less polished than her question, but it served the purpose of identification as her door locks clicked up.

"Hop in," she said.

He moved around to the passenger side. But as he opened the door, the woman shook her head.

"No. In the back."

He hesitated a moment, then shut the door and opened the one behind it.

"Lift the seat," she told him before he could climb in.

"What?"

She pointed at the seat cushion. "There's a latch in the back near the center. Pull and lift."

He did as the woman instructed. The only thing under the bench was the metal body of the car. He looked at her, confused.

She reached under the car's dash. A second later there was a dull thud, and the metal under the backseat popped upward several inches. Not needing to be told, he pulled it open as far as it would go, revealing what could best be described as a storage area. It was identical in length to the back seat, maybe a foot wider, and about two and a half deep.

"Get in," the woman said.

"You've got to be kidding me. I'm not getting in there."

“You get in there or you don’t get the ride.” She glanced toward the fire that was still burning in the valley. “You’re lucky I stopped at all. Please tell me you didn’t have anything to do with that.”

He started to speak, but she shook her head and held up a hand. “Never mind. I don’t want to know.” She looked back at the secret compartment. “It’s vented, so you’ll get plenty of fresh air, and the lining’s padded.” She grabbed a water bottle off the front passenger seat and held it out to him. “You’re not going to want to drink this all at once. You won’t be getting out for several hours, so taking a leak can get a little messy.”

“I’ll just sit in the back seat if it’s all right with you.” He started to close the metal lid.

“It’s not all right with me!” she shot back. “I don’t know who you are, or why you need to get away from here, but I do know if we get stopped and they find you, I’m going to be in as much trouble as you are. Now you can either get in the hole or start walking. It’s up to you.”

She stared at him defiantly, the bottle of water still in her outstretched hand.

He looked at the compartment, then at the water, then at the woman. “I don’t know who you are, either.”

“And you won’t,” she said.

He stood there a moment longer, then took the water and awkwardly lowered himself into the hiding space. Once he was in position, the woman leaned back and started to lower the lid.

“I didn’t start that fire,” he said.

“I told you. I don’t want to know.”

She shut him in.

• • • •

FOR THE FIRST HOUR, he was sure they would be stopped at a roadblock and the car inspected. But as the road kept passing a few feet beneath him, he began to think they might have made it away undetected. Eventually, he dozed off.

When he woke again, he could hear other vehicles surrounding them—semi-trucks mostly, cruising at high speeds. He figured they must be on an interstate. Which one, he had no idea. Having just recently been transferred to the Barker Flats Research Center, he didn’t know this part of the country that well and had no clue which highways were within a few hours’ drive away.

Both he and Ellen had grown up in the Midwest—Ash in Ohio and his wife in Indiana. They’d met at college where he was going through ROTC training and working on an engineering degree, and she was studying to be an accountant.

For him, at least, it was one of those instant attraction kind of things. Ellen had always said it was the same for her, too, but he was never sure if she was joking with him or not. Their bond grew infinitely deeper after her father passed away from a heart attack while they were sophomores. Her mother was already gone—cancer. Several years earlier, Ash’s parents had also passed away. No diseases in his family, just bad timing with a tire blowout at seventy miles per hour. His brother was with them, too. Jeff didn’t die but, well, the condition he was left in often made Ash wonder if it would have been better if he had.

The fact was, Ash and Ellen really only had each other after that. They were married their senior year, and Josie was born exactly ten months later.

And now here he was alone again, his whole family gone.

He had no idea how long they’d been on the road when he felt the car ease to the right and slow down. Outside, the sounds of the other vehicles grew distant as the sedan came to a near stop, then accelerated again through a sharp right turn.

A couple minutes later, the car slowed once more and veered to the right. The now-familiar hum of tires on asphalt was replaced by the crunch of dirt under treads. Then the car stopped and the engine shut off.

Ash waited, anticipating that the woman would soon release him. A few moments later he heard the seat cushion being lifted above him, but as he waited for the hidden metal flap to open, nothing happened.

“Come on, come on,” he said under his breath.

He'd had enough of the secret compartment. It was small and cramped, and though he wasn't claustrophobic, he was starting to sympathize with those who were. It didn't help that since they'd stopped moving, the air seemed to be growing stale, too. He wanted out, and he wanted out now.

He thought about pounding on the lid and screaming, “Open up!” But he had no idea where they were or who might overhear him.

He twisted, trying to get more comfortable. As he did, his shoulder brushed against the lid. There was a click as the metal roof of his box rose slightly in response to the pressure.

What the hell?

He placed his hand on it and pushed upward. A thin seam of light grew along the length of the lid. Though it couldn't have been more than a quarter-of-an-inch wide, it was blinding after hours of pitch darkness. He blinked several times, then squeezed his eyelids together so that only a fraction of the light could penetrate them. Again, he pushed on the lid. The crack of light grew an inch wider, then two, then three.

He paused, listening for anyone who might be in the car, and letting his eyes adjust to the daylight. Finally, having heard nothing, he pushed the top all the way open and sat up.

For some reason, he thought he was going to find that they were parked behind one of those giant truck stops, and that the woman had just gone to use the facilities or maybe even grab something to eat. But there was no truck stop. In fact, there were no buildings of any kind, just wilderness, broken only by the distant ribbon of the interstate about two miles away.

The car appeared to be parked in a small valley. While there were a few trees here and there, most of the vegetation was lower to the ground. It was what his dad used to call high chaparral country.

A deserted, two-lane road ran out from the highway in his direction, passing the large dirt lot his ride was parked in and heading off into the hills. Apparently the woman had turned off on one of those exits only a handful of locals would use.

The most surprising thing, though, was that she was nowhere to be seen. Where she'd gone, he had no idea. But unless she was crouching right next to the car, he was entirely alone.

He pushed himself out of the box, threw open one of the doors and climbed outside. The air was cool, almost brisk. He reached back in and retrieved the jacket his guide had given him. He was tempted to pull on the stocking cap and gloves, but instead he just stomped around a little to warm up. Then, after a moment of unnecessary self-consciousness, he relieved himself behind the car.

Not knowing what he was supposed to do now, he decided to see if the woman had left the keys. Maybe the idea all along had been for him to take the sedan and get lost. Maybe that's what this had been all about. They got him away from trouble, and now he was on his own.

He opened the driver's door and leaned in. The keys weren't in the ignition, tucked above the sun visor, or lying in the seat. What was in the seat, though, was a white legal-size envelope with MR. THOMPSON typed on the front. It took him a couple seconds before he remembered that Thompson was the name on the false ID he'd been given earlier.

The flap of the envelope was only tucked in, so he flipped it out and removed a single sheet of paper from inside. Like his faux name on the envelope, the note inside was typed. It was short and to the point.

Wait here. Once it's dark, someone will come for you. Before then, burn this and your IDs. There is a lighter in the trunk, along with some food if you get hungry.

Good luck.

He read it twice. It was just another mysterious piece in his ultra-bizarre day. But the mention of food did remind him that it had been almost twenty-four hours since his last meal.

He pulled the trunk release, then moved around back and looked inside. In a brown paper bag, he found a couple of apples, a bag of trail mix, a few energy bars, and three bottles of water. Not exactly the juicy hamburger his stomach was hoping for, but it would do.

There was also one of those long-nosed lighters people used to light campfires and barbecues. But he wasn't really sure if he wanted to burn his IDs. He'd begun to entertain the idea of taking off on his own. If he did that, the IDs could come in handy. He decided to eat first, then figure it out after.

Within ten minutes, he'd devoured both apples, two of the energy bars, and a good portion of the trail mix. The remainder he wrapped inside the brown sack and slipped into his messenger bag.

He moved to the end of the car and stared at the highway for several minutes. At a fast walk, he could get there in no time then hitch a ride to the next town.

What then, though?

Go to the police? Back to the Army?

The man who'd gotten him out of the building had said if he went back to the Army, the people who'd held him would find him again. Ash wasn't convinced there were "people" yet. It still could have just been the Army doing what they thought was best for the greater good. But he couldn't deny something very strange was going on. And if he wanted to find out why Ellen and the kids had been killed, his best bet at the moment was to stay free until he had more answers.

His mind made up, he retrieved his fake IDs and placed them on the ground with the note and envelope from the car. They burned easily, and soon were no more than ash and melted plastic. He mixed what was left into the dirt, then climbed back into the car and waited for the sun to go down.

“HE’S OUT,” PAX said over the phone.

There was no need for anyone to reply. So far, this was only a one-way conversation.

“Grabbed his coat...taking a piss.”

Silence again.

“A lot of looking around...checking the car now.”

This should be it, Matt thought.

“He found the letter.”

Yes. Good. Now what are you going to do, Captain?

“He’s read it, and now is checking the trunk. Looks like he’s going to eat something.”

The silence stretched for nearly ten minutes.

“Looking at the highway again.”

Are you walking or are you staying?

“Still looking...still...wait. He’s going back to the trunk...got the lighter...he’s burning everything.

That’s a confirm. He’s moving back inside and...sitting in the car.”

“Janice, Michael,” Matt said into the phone. “Pickup is a go. Jordan, get ready to disable the satellite.”

Welcome to the team, Captain Ash.

THE WATCH ASH'S wife had given him on their fifth anniversary had been taken away the night he was put in the cell, so he wasn't exactly sure what time it was when he saw a pair of headlights exit the freeway and head in his direction.

As they neared, he realized they didn't belong to a car, but an old Winnebago motor home. It slowed to a crawl as it turned off the road, then stopped in front of his sedan.

After a few seconds the side door opened, and a man and a woman emerged. They looked maybe ten years older than Ash, and smiled as they walked in his direction. When they neared his car, the woman stopped several feet away, but the man came right up to Ash's window and leaned down.

As soon as Ash lowered it halfway, the man said, "Sorry we're late."

Ash made no reply.

The man rubbed his arms with his hands. "It's a little chilly out. So if you're ready to go, I'd love to get back in the 'Bago."

Ash hesitated a moment. The thought of going it alone once more passed through his mind. But the conclusions he'd come up with before hadn't changed, so he grabbed the messenger bag off the other seat and got out. Immediately, he pulled his jacket tight around his neck. Though it had been cold in the car, it was near freezing outside.

"We've got coffee in the motor home, if you'd like," the man said, then nodded toward the woman. "Janice just heated up a pot before we turned off. If you're hungry we can cook you up something, too. There's plenty of leftover chili from lunch. I'm Mike, by the way."

He held out his hand. Ash shook it.

"Coffee sounds good. My name's—"

"Whoa, whoa, whoa. I already know who you are. You're Sam Wolverton. I'd recognize you anywhere."

Apparently Craig Thompson was out, and Sam Wolverton was in. It was as good a name as any, Ash thought.

Mike and Janice led him over to the Winnebago, then inside where the temperature was a wonderfully bone-thawing forty degrees warmer. Ash slowly stretched his stiff cold fingers then rolled his shoulders, trying to bring his muscles back to life.

Janice pointed at a table in the rear. "If you want to have a seat, I'll get that coffee while Mike gets us back on the road."

"Thanks," Ash said.

He pulled off his jacket and sat down. Between the heat and the feel of movement and the calm exuded by Janice and Mike, some of the tension he'd been holding on to began to ease away.

It's going to be okay. It's going to be okay.

The next thing he knew Janice was touching him on the shoulder.

"You all right?"

He jerked in surprise, then looked up. "I'm fine. Thanks. Just...trying to warm up."

She set a cup of coffee in front of him. "This'll help."

"Thanks again."

The coffee mug had a lid on top that allowed a person to drink without the liquid inside sloshing out while traveling. Ash took a sip. It was hot and delicious. In fact, it was the best cup of coffee he'd had in a long time.

The Winnebago took a turn to the right and began increasing speed. Ash could see they were transitioning back onto the interstate, but he missed the sign so he still had no idea which one they were on.

He took another, longer sip.

“Mind if I join you?” Janice asked from over at the stove.

“Not at all,” he told her.

She poured herself a cup of coffee then took a seat across the table from him.

“Do you...do this often?” he asked.

She cocked her head. “Do what?”

“Pick up strangers on deserted roads.”

A half-smile graced her lips. “You’re not a stranger, Sam. We’ve known you for years.” She lifted her cup and took a drink.

“But we just—”

“We just what? Pulled off the highway so we could stretch our legs?”

He studied her face for a moment. “Who are you people?”

“Mike and Janice Humphrey. Your old friends from college.”

“I don’t care about any cover story. There’s no one else around. I’d just like to know who you are, and why you’re helping me.”

“You sure want a lot for someone whose life is being saved.”

“How do you know that? I thought you didn’t know anything about me. How do you know you’re saving my life?”

“How do I know? I don’t. It was just an educated guess, and by your reaction, a fairly accurate one. And you’re right. We don’t know anything about you. But even if we’re not saving your life, we’re saving you from something. I would think you’d be grateful for that.”

“I am,” he said quickly. “Very grateful. I’m just...confused. I don’t know what’s going...what’s going...”

His vision suddenly blurred.

“Are you all right?” she asked.

He opened his eyes as wide as he could, but was unable to focus on anything. As he raised a hand to rub them, vertigo raced through his head like a wave. He no longer knew which way was up and which was down. He reached out for the table to try to steady himself, but he missed and fell sideways, dropping onto the floor. Janice was immediately at his side, her hand moving under his head. But her touch seemed distant and disconnected.

“Relax.” Her voice was a million miles away. “You’re going to be fine. You just need a little sleep.”

He tried to speak, to tell her he wasn’t fine. That nothing was fine. But his lips refused to move.

A moment later, the unfocused world he’d been seeing turned black.

IF ELLISON HAD been in a humorous mood, he would have thought it ironic that the car he escaped in belonged to Major Littlefield, but he knew humor would never enter his life again.

The whole time he was hotwiring it, he was sure the major would come charging out and find him, then drag him back into the facility before initiating Protocol Thirteen. But the engine finally roared to life, and he sped away without seeing the major or anyone else.

Just before he reached the far end of the valley, the building exploded, lighting up the sky. Even though he'd been expecting it, it still caught him by surprise. He jerked the wheel to the right and nearly ran off the road.

At least the explosion meant that he was safe for the moment. With the major and the small team at Barker Flats no longer in the picture, anyone the project would send after him was at least a few hundred miles away.

All he had to do was find a pay phone before that.

And torch the car.

And die.

It was an easy enough plan in theory, but after an hour of driving through the empty desert, he was having a hard time keeping his eyes open. He needed to get some rest. He couldn't afford to crash. Not only would he be unable to deliver the message, but anyone who came to his aid would be in danger of being infected.

Just a couple of hours—a nap, really—that was all he needed.

About five minutes later he spotted an old dirt road. He turned onto it and drove far enough that his car wouldn't be spotted from the highway, then crawled into the back seat.

When he woke, the sun was high in the sky. Panicked, he pushed himself up but immediately dropped back down. It felt like his brain was trying to push out of his skull. Even his eyes ached.

More slowly this time, he rose into a sitting position. As he tried to take a deep breath, it caught in his throat and he began to cough.

Ellison was not the kind of man who would delude himself. Sure, he could have pretended he'd only caught a bad cold or maybe the flu. But the truth was he was infected with the KV-27a virus, and unless he had an immunity that worked like Josie Ash's had, he was going to die.

He forced himself to get back behind the wheel. His time was severely limited now. He figured he had no more than two hours to find an isolated pay phone. If he failed to locate one in that time, he would have to forget about the call and concentrate on eliminating his chance of infecting anyone else.

“Should have stayed in the building,” the disease in his head said. “Should have let the fire take you.”

He ignored it and used every ounce of concentration to keep the car on the road. Even then, he often found himself veering dangerously close to the opposite lane and then overcompensating by weaving back the other way and onto the shoulder. God forbid he came across a highway patrol car. They'd pull him over for sure.

He passed a few possibilities, wide spots in the road with two or three restaurants and a gas station, but there were always too many people around. After ninety minutes, he started to think he would have to give up the idea of reporting in. But then he saw a little gas station along an otherwise deserted stretch of the highway.

Though it looked like it was open, there were no customers out front.

He slowed, then turned into the large dirt lot next to the building, his eyes scanning left and right, looking for...

There.

The pay phone was mounted to a wooden pole a good twenty feet away from the station.

He pulled to a stop and stumbled out of the car, then cursed himself for not having gotten closer to the phone. When he finally got to the pole, he leaned against it and caught his breath. Closing his eyes, he focused on the number, trying to make sure he remembered it correctly. His headache wasn't helping, but once he repeated the number several times, he knew he had it.

He fished some coins out of his pocket, then picked up the receiver and dropped several quarters into the slot on top. His strength waning, he punched in the number, making sure he made no mistakes.

One ring. Two.

Then a click and a beep.

"This is Ellison," he said. "Barker Flats blown. I repeat Barker Flats blown. Littlefield initiated self-destruct. When the power came back on, the virus they were pumping into the target's cell leaked into the rest of the building. Littlefield and three others eliminated with the facility. Target already freed at that point, but Littlefield discovered the escape and planned to report it to Karp. No confirmation if he was able to do that, but it seems likely." He paused. "I'm...I'm infected, so this will be my last message."

He hung up.

The phone was going to have to be destroyed, too, but that would be easy enough. He would just need to move the car right up against the pole before he lit everything on fire.

He went around to the trunk of Major Littlefield's sedan. Inside he found more than he had hoped for. Not only were there flares that he could use to help get the fire going, but there was also a hard plastic case containing a Colt .45 automatic pistol.

It was a lot more power than Ellison needed, but then again, it wouldn't matter when he pulled the trigger. At least he wouldn't have to crawl out into the desert now.

He stripped off his shirt, then fed as much of it as he could into the gas tank. Once he had the car in position, his plan was to use a flare to light the shirt on fire. He would then get into the car and throw the flare into the back seat to ignite the interior. As soon as he saw the fire catch, he would put the gun to his head and pull the trigger.

What he hadn't counted on were the three sedans that raced off the road and skidded to a stop twenty feet away, before he could get back behind the wheel and move the car into place.

Men jumped out of nearly every door, most with guns pointed directly at him.

"Stay right there, Mr. Ellison."

"They know who you are," the disease whispered in his mind. "They found you. See? You should have just stayed."

"Get back!" Ellison yelled at the men. "I'm infected. Doesn't matter if you shoot me or not. You come near me, your life is over."

None of the men flinched.

"I'm not going to be a problem," Ellison told them, then coughed. "Just let me take care of this, and it'll all be over."

He stepped around the back of the sedan and headed for the driver's door.

"Stop. Now!" someone shouted.

But Ellison couldn't stop. He had to finish.

"Stop!"

Ellison put his hand on the door handle and started to pull it open.

The first bullet caught him in the shoulder, knocking him into the car. The second went through his kidney and exited just below his ribs. He slipped to the ground, rolling onto his back as he did, and ended up looking at the group of armed men.

They parted in the middle, and two new men dressed in protective gear stepped through. Not biohazard suits, though—something different. Then Ellison saw the thin rifles in the men's hands, rifles with hoses attached to one end running around to tanks on the men's backs.

Not rifles. Flamethrowers.

Oh, thank God.

There was a whoosh, then short flames flickered at the end of each nozzle.

The two men took a few steps closer to the car and raised their weapons.

"The phone," Ellison whispered as loudly as he could. "Don't forget the phone."

But his words were lost as long streams of flames roared out from each weapon.

"STOP THERE, STOP THERE," Chuck said, pointing down the road at the lonely gas station.

"Why?" his friend Len asked. They were supposed to be meeting some other friends for a couple nights of camping, but somewhere they'd made a wrong turn. Neither of them could get a signal on their cell phones so using their GPS wasn't an option.

"I gotta go."

"Again?"

"What do you mean, 'again'? That was like two hours ago. I've drank two sodas since then."

Len pulled into the station, figuring while Chuck did his business he could at least find out where they were. As he got out of the car he caught a faint whiff of barbeque. Maybe they were selling sandwiches inside. He could use something to eat.

Chuck raced ahead like his bladder was about to burst.

"Next time, don't drink so much!" Len yelled after him.

Without looking back, Chuck flipped him off as he entered the store. Len reached the door a moment later, and was starting to pull it open when his friend came running back outside. He looked at Len, opened his mouth like he was going to say something, then quickly bent over and threw up on the asphalt.

Len jumped back. "What the hell? I didn't know you were sick." As soon as his friend seemed to finish, he said, "Are you all right?"

Chuck breathed deeply, but said nothing.

Len could see his friend's face was a mess, so he said, "I'll get some napkins." As he reached for the door, Chuck grabbed his arm.

"Don't go in there!"

"Why not?" Len asked.

"The guy's dead. Somebody shot him."

"What guy?"

"The attendant! He's slumped over the counter, blood all over the place."

"Is the person who shot him still there?"

Chuck's eyes widened. "I...I don't know. I didn't hear anybody. Jesus, do you think maybe he is?"

Len glanced around. The only other car he could see was an old truck parked against the side of the store, right where someone who worked there would probably park.

“I doubt it,” Len said. “I’m going to go take a look, okay?”

“I don’t think that’s a good idea.”

“Did you check his pulse to make sure he was dead?”

“No,” Chuck admitted. “But he looked dead.”

“We should check to make sure, don’t you think?”

Reluctantly, Chuck nodded.

“Why don’t you call the police while I go inside,” Len suggested.

“Okay. Good idea.”

Len pushed the door open with his shoulder in case there were fingerprints on the handle the police could use, and stepped inside.

Immediately, he covered his nose to block out the overwhelming smell of blood. The counter was just inside on the left. Lying face down across the top was a man with gray hair. There was no reason to check his pulse, though. He was dead for sure. Len could see two bullet wounds: one between his shoulder blades, and one in the back of his head. The cash register was open, and whatever money had been there was gone.

A robbery, out in the middle of nowhere.

“Len,” Chuck called from outside.

Grateful for a reason to leave, Len rejoined his friend.

Chuck held up his phone and shrugged. “I still don’t have a signal.”

Len pulled his cell out. No bars for him, either.

He looked back at the store. There was probably a phone inside, but chances were it was on the counter next to the body, which would mean stepping on the bloody floor to find it. Beyond the fact that doing so wouldn’t make the police happy, the creep-out factor was way off the scale, so as far as he was concerned, it wasn’t an option.

“We’ll have to go to the next town,” he said.

“And just leave him here like this?”

Len thought for a moment. “No. You’re right. We can’t do that. One of us should probably stay.”

“I ain’t staying.”

“Fine. You take the car. I’ll stay.”

Chuck didn’t look happy with that solution, either, but then he started rocking on his feet and said, “I gotta pee.”

He headed toward the side of the building.

“Where you going?” Len asked.

“I’m not going back inside!” Chuck disappeared around the corner. But it was only a couple seconds before he yelled, “Hey, Len!”

“What?”

“There’s a pay phone over here. If you have change you can call the police.”

“You don’t need change to call 911.”

“What?” Chuck’s voice had grown distant.

“You don’t...never mind.”

Len headed around the side of the building and saw that his friend had moved out into the desert. The phone was off to the right just a bit, hanging on a wooden post.

Good, he thought as he walked over. At least now he and Chuck wouldn’t have to split up.

ASH WOKE WITH a pounding headache.

He must have gasped or something, because a hand was suddenly on his shoulder, rubbing it softly. Then a voice said, "It's all right. You're okay."

It was a woman's voice, but it didn't sound like Janice's.

"My head," he grunted.

He tried to raise his hand to his temple, but his arm would only move a few inches before it stopped. He opened his eyes just enough to see what the problem was. There was a tube or something coming out of his arm, and what looked like a leather strap around his wrist.

He tried his other hand. It moved without opposition.

"Sleep some more," the voice said. "You've been through a lot."

"Are we stopped?" he asked, realizing he felt no motion.

"Stopped?" A pause, then, "Just sleep."

And as if it were a command, darkness overtook him once more.

• • • •

THE NEXT TIME HE WOKE, his headache was gone.

When he opened his eyes, he realized he was not, as he'd previously thought, still in the RV. Instead he was lying on a bed in a wood-paneled room, soft sunlight seeping in through the window on the far wall.

There was a dresser to his left and an armoire in the corner beyond the foot of the bed. Below the window was a writing desk. All the surfaces were empty.

He tried to prop himself up so he could look out the window and get a sense of where he was, but his right arm caught on something. No, he quickly realized, not caught. Restrained. Hadn't he been immobilized the last time he'd woken?

Around his right wrist was a padded leather cuff attached to the frame of the bed. The apparent reason for this was the IV line attached to his arm. His left, though, was completely free.

He had no idea what he was being fed from the bag hanging on the stand, but being both restricted and drugged did not appeal to him. He quickly worked the cuff open, turned the IV flow off, and pulled the tube out of the port on his arm.

His first stop was the dresser to see if there were any clothes to go with the T-shirt and underwear he'd been sleeping in. He found several pairs of jeans, more underwear, socks, and a whole drawer full of colored T-shirts. The bottom drawer even had two dark wool sweaters and a hooded pullover sweatshirt. The biggest surprise was that not only was everything new, it was all in his size, too. He got dressed.

Inside the armoire he found the boots he'd worn during his escape, and beside them, the messenger bag. A quick check of the bag showed that the only thing left was the money. What did he care, though? None of the contents had been his in the first place.

He pulled on the boots, laced them up, and walked over to the window. What greeted him was a surprise. It wasn't the chaparral country where the mysterious Mike and Janice had picked him up, or even the desert. Instead, there was a mix of grassy fields and groves of evergreens. In the distance was a row of mountains.

The only structure in sight was way off to the left and only partially visible. It was big, though. Maybe a barn or large equipment shed. No way to tell for sure.

As for people, he saw none.

Where the hell am I?

He walked over to the door, put his ear against the wood, and listened. In the distance, he thought he could hear a low muffled conversation but that was about it.

He glanced back at the room. He could wait until somebody showed up, but he was done waiting so he opened the door.

“Thought I heard you moving around in there.”

Directly outside was a hallway about as wide as the room he’d been in. Sitting on a wooden chair against the far wall was a tan-faced man with the gentle creases of someone who’d spent more than his fair share of time outdoors. He had a full head of salt-and-pepper hair and a short mostly-salt goatee. Ash guessed he was in his fifties, early sixties at most. He was outfitted in jeans and a green flannel shirt.

The man pushed himself off the chair. “So how are you feeling?”

Ash glanced down the hallway. “Where am I?”

“You’re safe, that’s where you are.”

“Yeah, that’s not really an answer.”

The man snickered. “No. No, I guess it’s not.” He paused. “You’re on the Hamilton Ranch. I’m Rich Paxton, but I go by Pax, mostly.” He held out his hand. “I help keep things running around here.”

Ash kept his hand at his side. “You’re the one in charge?”

Pax shook his head. “No, that would be Matt. Matt Hamilton. It’s his place. Well, his and Rachel’s.”

“I want to talk to him right now.”

“That’s convenient, because he wants to talk to you, too. Supposed to bring you to him when you finally got up. Which I guess is now.”

“Let’s go,” Ash said, ready to follow him.

Pax glanced down at the IV port still attached to Ash’s arm. “Should probably have Billy take a look at that first. Get that thing off you.”

“I’m fine.”

“Sure you are. But Billy’s on the way, and it’ll only take a minute.”

Pax led him through several hallways, a large sitting room, up one flight of stairs, and past a dozen closed doors. Whatever kind of building this was, it certainly wasn’t small.

Finally, Pax stopped in front of an open door and stuck his head inside. “Billy?”

“Back here,” a voice replied.

Pax signaled Ash to follow him in.

The room was set up like a doctor’s office, complete with examining table, cotton swabs, blood pressure cuff, tongue depressors, and all the other medical items you’d expect to find. There was also a computer monitor and wireless keyboard on the counter.

A door on the left led into another room. Since there was no one in the room they’d just entered, Ash assumed this Billy must be in the other.

“The new guy needs his tube removed,” Pax said.

“I need a few minutes,” Billy called out. “Just have him sit tight, and I’ll be down as soon as I can.”

“He’s not in his room. I brought him with me.”

There was the dull thud of a stack of paper being set down, then the sound of footsteps. A second later, a guy a few years younger than Pax entered from the other room. He walked over to Ash, grabbed his arm, and looked at the port. "You shouldn't have done this by yourself."

"No one else was there."

"That's not the point. What about the fluid? Did you close the tube, or is it running all over the floor?"

Ash narrowed his eyes, not liking the tone of the man's voice. "I cut the drip before I disconnected it. I hope that's okay with you."

Billy frowned. "You should have just waited. You have no idea what was in the fluid. It could have been very dangerous."

"Was it?"

"No, but it could have been."

Billy got to work removing the dock from Ash's arm. When it was out, he used some gauze and a bandage to cover the wound. He then looked at Pax. "Can I get back to what I was doing now, or do you have any more emergencies?"

"Have at it. I think we're good."

Billy forced a smile then said to Ash, "Welcome to the ranch." With that, he headed back to the other room.

Ash half expected Pax to give him an excuse for Billy's behavior once they were in the hallway again, but, to his credit, Pax said nothing. He led Ash to a closed door at the far end and knocked.

"Come," a muffled voice said from inside.

Pax opened the door and let Ash pass through first.

It was a big room divided into two areas. The far end was dominated by a large oak desk with a matching credenza behind it, while the area nearest the door was set up with a couch, chairs and a low-lying table. There were several windows, but wooden blinds prevented any clear view of the outside.

The only person in the room was a man sitting in one of the stuffed guest chairs in front of the desk. He was probably about the same age as Pax, only with a little less hair on top and no goatee. Though the man was sitting, Ash could tell he was big. Long legs and a broad chest. Somewhere in his past he'd probably been a high school linebacker. The man had angled his chair so he could watch a TV hanging on the wall.

Ash glanced at the screen just in time to see the Prime Cable News logo in the corner before the picture went dark.

"Glad to see you're up," the man said, rising to his feet. He was tall. Six-foot-three on the low end, maybe as much as six-five. His grin was friendly and welcoming as he extended his hand to Ash. "I'm Matt Hamilton. Welcome to the ranch."

Ash hesitated only a second before shaking. "I'm..." He stopped himself, unsure what he should actually say.

"You're Captain Daniel Ash."

"Yes," Ash said with a sense of relief.

"Welcome, Captain. Why don't you have a seat?" He gestured toward the couch.

Ash held his ground. "Excuse me if this sounds rude, but I'd like to know what the hell's going on."

"Of course you would. I would, too, if I were you. What would you like to know first?"

"Let's start with why I am here."

Hamilton shrugged. "Easy enough. You needed someplace safe to hide."

"And what am I hiding from?"

"That one is not so easy."

Ash's nostrils flared as he drew in a long breath.

"Hold on, Captain," Hamilton said. "I'm not avoiding your question. It's just that there are several different answers, and I'm trying to figure out which is the one you're interested in at the moment."

"That's bullshit."

Hamilton said nothing for a moment, then looked at Pax. "Can you give us a few minutes? Maybe make sure the captain's quarters are ready?"

"You got it." Pax nodded to Ash and left.

Once they were alone, Hamilton said, "You can stand, but if you don't mind, I'm going to sit."

Hamilton favored his left leg as he headed for the couch. He caught Ash looking at it as he sat down.

"I'm told a knee replacement will take care of the problem," Hamilton explained. "Someday, I guess. When I have the time."

Ash walked over. He thought about remaining on his feet, but it seemed a pointless protest so he took the seat across from the couch.

Neither man said anything for several seconds. Finally, Hamilton leaned forward. "By all rights, you should be dead."

A faint sneer grew on Ash's face. "I'm having a hard time believing anyone was planning on killing me. I only went with your people for one reason—to find out who murdered my family and why." He hesitated, then added, "They did get me away from the explosion, so I owe you thanks for that."

"You misunderstood me," Matt said. "I wasn't talking about the fact the order had been given to eliminate you before you woke, which it had been, or about the explosion, which wouldn't have happened if you'd stayed."

"Then what are you talking about?"

"The disease. It should have killed you, too. But it's my understanding that you never showed any effects of the illness. There were seventeen families living at Barker Flats. Seventeen families, all recent transfers to a base that, until two months ago, had been in mothballs. Of the sixteen families besides yours, none had any survivors. So what made you different?"

Ash stared at Hamilton in shock. "None? They're all dead?"

A pause. "They are."

Ash began breathing rapidly, his anger boiling just under his skin. He pushed himself up. "How many people?"

"There were fifty-seven total in the other families."

"Fifty-seven?" With Ellen, Josie, and Brandon, that made an even... "Sixty total. My God." He turned to the television. "It must be all over the news."

Matt hesitated for a split second before saying, "It hasn't been all over the news. There's been no report whatsoever."

"What?" Ash couldn't believe it. He began pacing in the space in front of the door. Maybe the government didn't want to cause a panic. The country took a pretty big hit after 9/11. Sure, everyone had rallied together, but there'd been so much confusion, too. "Do they know who did it? Have they found them?"

Matt took a longer pause this time before answering. "Captain, I will always tell you the truth. That's the promise we make here. Sometimes, though, there are things that need to be held back. Perhaps someone isn't ready to hear it yet, or perhaps the information is just too sensitive. When these situations arise, we won't lie about it and try to cover it up, but the information will not be shared, either." He paused. "There are things you don't know and don't understand. As soon as we're completely sure we can trust you, you will be told. Just not now."

"Trust me?"

"Just like you're unsure whether you can trust us."

As true as the statement was, Ash didn't like hearing it. "What couldn't you trust me with?"

"Is that a trick question?" Matt said. "Okay. How about this? The truth about what happened at Barker Flats."

Ash stared at Hamilton. "Whatever happened killed my family! I have every right to know the truth!"

"I would feel the same as you," Hamilton said calmly.

"Then tell me!"

"When the time is right."

Ash stood motionless for several seconds then said, "Mr. Hamilton, I appreciate your hospitality, and whatever you did to help me get away from Barker Flats. There's money still in my bag. Yours, I assume. I'll leave it in the room. I don't have any of my own to cover whatever expenses you might have incurred. I apologize for that." He took a step toward the door. "If someone could show me the way to a main road, I'd be grateful."

Hamilton considered him for a moment, then stood up. "It's late. Spend the night and you can get an early start in the morning."

"You'll lock my door and keep me from leaving."

Hamilton shook his head. "No. If you want to leave, we won't stop you. But we also won't be able to protect you."

"I can protect myself."

Hamilton nodded. "I'm sure you'll do the best that you can. I only ask when they do track you down, you don't mention the ranch or any of us here."

"They won't track me down."

Matt remained silent for a moment, his expression blank. Finally, he said, "I'll have Pax show you to your quarters. If you decide to stay the night, you're welcome to join us for dinner at seven."

Ash answered with a single nod.

"One more thing," Hamilton said.

He limped back over to his desk and pulled a package out of the credenza. It was the same package Ash had been given in the desert. One end was open now. Hamilton reached in, pulled something out, then walked back over to Ash.

"I believe this is yours."

He held out his palm. In it was a watch.

Ash tried not to shake as he lifted it up. It wasn't an expensive brand, but it was priceless to him. He turned it over. Engraved on the back, just as he knew it would be, was:

Happy Birthday,
All My Love,
Ellen

He had assumed the watch was destroyed in the explosion. He had thought he'd never hold it again. "This was in the package?"

Hamilton nodded.

"What else is in there?"

"That was the only personal item of yours."

"Are you lying to me?"

"I told you, we have no room for lies here."

Ash stared at the watch a moment longer, then put it on.

For the first time since the night that life as he knew it ended, he cried.

BY THE TIME Len and Chuck found their friends Jimmy and Walt at the campground, it was well after dark but they had the excuse of a lifetime.

They joined the other two at the campfire and recounted the afternoon's events. Chuck played it up to its morbid best, while Len exaggerated his friend's freak-out at finding the body.

"He threw up everywhere! If I hadn't jumped out of the way, I'd have been covered in it," he said. "Then he refused to go back inside, like he thought the guy was going to jump up and come running after him."

"Yeah," Chuck said, smiling. Jokes at his expense never bothered him. "Like a zombie, man. Hey, you never know."

Someone threw an empty beer can at him as the rest laughed.

By the time their fire died down to a few coals, they'd retold portions of the story half a dozen times.

"I'm beat," Len finally said, getting up. He swayed a little bit, and had to steady himself by putting a hand on Walt's shoulder.

"Whoa," Jimmy said, laughing. "Drink a little too much?"

Len scowled at him. "Ha ha."

He'd actually had only two, but it had been a long day—the driving, the dead body, the police—so it was a wonder he could even keep his eyes open.

"If you guys are going to stay up, keep the noise down," he said. "I want to get some sleep."

"No guarantees," Walt told him as he popped open another beer.

"You guys suck," Len said.

He headed over to the tent he and Chuck were sharing. As he unzipped the door, he coughed and then cleared his throat. Stupid dry desert air, he thought. He grabbed a bottle of water out of the cooler and crawled inside.

THERE WAS A KNOCK AT Dr. Karp's door. Without looking up, he said, "Come in."

The door opened and Mr. Shell entered. He was a lean and muscular six-foot-two with sandy blond hair, and a nose that had been broken at least once.

Karp had been expecting him, so he waved to one of the chairs in front of his desk. "Have a seat." Once Shell was situated, he said, "Pleasant trip?"

Shell's mouth moved up and down in a quick smile. "Pleasant enough."

"Any further update on this afternoon's...action?"

Karp had to be careful in his phrasing and tone. Shell was not his subordinate, nor was he Shell's. They worked in completely different branches of the project, their jobs only overlapping when circumstances such as those that happened in the last eighteen hours occurred. Shell was part of the security arm, his specialty emergency situations.

"How much have you been informed of already?" Shell asked.

"That Ellison was neutralized by your team. And the scene was being staged."

"Then you know enough." Shell leaned forward. "What I'd like to do is talk about Captain Daniel Ash."

"Have you found him?"

“Not yet.” Shell paused, then set his briefcase on his lap and opened it up. From inside, he extracted a thin stack of photographs and set them on the desk.

Karp studied the image. There were only two things that showed heat, both very near to each other, and the rest of the image was basically black.

Shell pointed at a thick line just a half shade lighter than the surrounding area. “This is the highway.” He moved his finger to the larger of the two bright spots. “And this is a car. As you can see, it’s not on the road. We’ve been able to determine that it is in the process of pulling up at an abandoned gas station. This other bright spot is a person waiting by the building.”

He moved the picture to the bottom of the stack. The revealed image was similar to the first. The only change was that the car was now on the road.

“You’ll notice the person who had been waiting at the gas station is no longer there.”

“Ash?”

“Yes.”

“How do you know for sure?”

Instead of answering, Shell laid all the photographs out on the desk. There were eight total, including the two he’d already shown the doctor.

Shell touched the photo to the far left. “Here. That’s the Barker Flats facility, seven minutes after the power outage.”

There were two small, bright dots in the desert not far from the building.

Shell moved his attention to the next photo. The building was no longer in the picture, but the two dots were still there. “Fifteen minutes after. They’ve gone just over a mile.” The next photo was similar to the last. “Twenty-five minutes. Two and a half miles.” Next photo. “Thirty minutes. They paused here before moving on.” Next photo. “Forty minutes. They’re standing next to the road.” And the last photo. “They’ve separated here. One has stayed where they were, while the other is heading to the gas station.”

Karp stared at all the photos. He touched the solitary dot standing by the road in the last shot. “Couldn’t that be Ash?”

Shell shook his head. “As soon as Ash reaches the gas station, this person heads three miles south where he is picked up by a separate car forty minutes later. It’s clear whoever it was knew exactly where he was going. You had Captain Ash under your control for over a week prior to the breakout. Before that, records indicate that in the few weeks he and his family had been living at the base, they had yet to leave. Ash would have no knowledge of this area. The man picked up at the abandoned gas station had to be Ash.”

The logic was sound, but Karp didn’t like the accusatory tone Shell was taking. “Were you able to follow the car the captain was in?”

“Only as far as the Nevada border. It pulled into the parking garage of a casino there. Once it was out of sight, there was no way to know if it left again.”

“I thought these satellites are supposed to be good enough to make out the license numbers on cars.”

Shell said nothing for a moment. “In daylight, if the angle’s right. But it was still dark when the car entered the parking garage. Plus it was a Toyota Camry, the most popular car in the country. So no,

Dr. Karp. We lost it.” There was a pause. “What I need to know is how troublesome this Ash is. Could he be a problem? Or do we just let him go?”

“What does Bluebird think?”

Shell stared at him. “Naturally, Bluebird is concerned, but they’ve left it up to me to determine what happens next. So I need to know from you whether you think he is a problem, or just someone we can ignore.”

Karp thought for a moment, knowing he had to tread carefully. “I would prefer if he were eliminated, primarily because it would aid our research if we had his body. But is he a threat?” He shook his head. “Ash knows nothing that can hurt us.”

“Unless your man Ellison told him something.”

Though Dr. Karp knew it was true, Shell’s accusation annoyed him. “There’s absolutely no proof that Ellison had anything to do with Ash’s escape. He found out Littlefield was going to engage Protocol Thirteen and ran due to fear. He was found alone in the major’s car, for God’s sake, not some Toyota Camry. All that proves is that he was weak, not a traitor.”

Shell paused a moment before responding. “Doctor, your position within the project is safe. Your skills are needed and you are in no danger. So don’t embarrass yourself by ignoring the obvious. The only way Ash could have been freed was if he’d had help on the inside. There is no other way. You know it, and I know it. So drop the bullshit. Is Ash dangerous to us or not?”

Backed into a corner, there was really only one answer Karp could give. “Maybe.”

WHEN LEN WOKE UP THE next morning, he was the only one in the tent. He staggered outside, his head pounding, and found the others sitting at the campfire.

“About time,” Chuck said. He stared at his friend for a moment. “How much did you have to drink last night?”

Len dropped into the only empty chair. “What time is it?”

“Nine-thirty,” Walt said.

“We’ve been up for two hours,” Chuck told him.

Len coughed a couple of times.

“Dude, are you all right?” Walt asked.

“I think I might be getting something.”

“Great,” Jimmy said. “I swear to God if I get it, too, I’m going to kill you.”

“Is there any coffee left?” Len asked.

Chuck poured him a cup and handed it over. “We were just waiting for you so we could hike the dunes.”

“I..I don’t think I’m up for it.”

“Yeah, I can see that.”

“You guys go. I’m just going to lie down.”

Chuck eyed him for a moment. “Maybe we should just head home.”

Shaking his head, Len said, “I don’t want to ruin your fun.” He tried to smile. “I’ll be fine. I just need to sleep it off.”

The others protested a bit more, but in the end they headed off for the dunes, and Len crawled back into the tent to rest.

When they got back four hours later, all three of them were more exhausted than they should have been, and two were already sniffling.

Chuck didn't even check Len as he climbed into the tent to take a nap. It wouldn't have mattered anyway. Len had been dead for nearly an hour. Chuck would follow seven hours later, and Walt thirty minutes after that.

Jimmy was the only one still alive, if barely, when the Ranger service found them.

"I'm going to kill him," he kept whispering. "I'm going to kill him."

But, really, it was the other way around.

ASH'S NEW QUARTERS weren't quite as nice as the room he'd woken up in the day before, but they were more than adequate. All the clothes that had been in the other dresser had been moved to his new room, as had the messenger bag that surprisingly still had the money inside.

He had slept with the watch on, not a habit he used to have, but one he was determined to start. It had still been on California time when Hamilton gave it to him, but Pax had told him when he showed Ash to the room that it was an hour later here. Where "here" was, Ash still didn't know.

It was because of the watch that he skipped dinner. He was in too much of an emotional state, and didn't want to end up saying something he'd regret later. Pax had brought him a tray of food around eight p.m. and Ash surprised himself by devouring it all.

When morning came, the decision to leave didn't seem as clear as it had twelve hours before. Yes, the conversation with Hamilton had annoyed him, but there was too much he didn't know or understand, and it was clear that many of the answers could probably be found right there on the ranch.

Still unsure of what he was going to do, he packed a few extra shirts, some underwear, and socks into the messenger bag. He then left the bag in the room and went in search of breakfast.

The building he was in was a kind of dormitory just down a wide stone pathway from the main building. It was two stories and held maybe twenty rooms, but if anyone else had been staying there, Ash hadn't heard them. The outside of the building was stone halfway up the first floor, with wooden timbers the rest of the way to the top. It was definitely built to last, but while it had the appearance of having been built decades before, Ash got the sense it was actually recently constructed.

Heading down the path, he could hear birds chirping in the distance, and felt a breeze blowing softly through the tops of the trees. The tranquility of it all was almost overwhelming. It was so at odds with the turmoil going on inside him.

As the trail turned and went up a gentle rise, the main building came into view. It was an impressive structure—old and wooden and huge, with wide, sloped roofs and half a dozen chimneys. It looked like a ski lodge that should have been at the bottom of a hill rather than in a quiet clearing.

There was a workout area off to the left with pull-up bars, sit-up stations, and resistance-training machines. A woman was at one of the machines, using it to work her shoulders. She glanced over at Ash, then quickly looked away as if she'd been caught doing something she shouldn't have.

As Ash neared the main building, he spotted Pax on his hands and knees examining a set of stairs that led up to the wide porch surrounding the structure. When Pax saw him, he got to his feet and brushed off his hands.

"Morning," he said.

"Good morning," Ash replied. "I was wondering if there was someplace I could get some breakfast."

"Sure, sure." Pax turned to the building. "That third door there, that gets you into a short hallway that'll take you into the kitchen. You'll find Bobbi in there. She can whip you up something."

"Thanks." Ash glanced at the stairs. "Is it safe?"

"What? Oh, sure. Just be careful on that second step. The backboard's starting to give a little. I'll have one of the boys replace it this afternoon."

Again, Ash hesitated before moving on. "Can I ask you something?"

"Of course."

“What kind of business is this ranch in? Can’t believe you make a lot of money off of people like me.”

Pax laughed. “No, that would drive us broke, I think. We have cattle, beef mostly, and a small herd of buffalo.”

“Buffalo?”

“You’d be surprised at the size of the buffalo meat market. But Rachel wants us to keep them for historical sake, let them live out their lives here.”

“So you only make money off the cattle then.”

“When we need to.”

It wasn’t really an answer, but Ash decided not to push and headed into the house.

Bobbi was a tall woman with short red hair who turned out to be an excellent cook. In no time, Ash was sitting at one of the tables in the restaurant-sized kitchen, working his way through a large plate of eggs and sausage.

“Morning, Rachel,” Bobbi said several minutes later.

Ash glanced up. Another woman had entered the kitchen—Rachel, presumably. She was shorter and leaner than Bobbi, and had long silver-streaked blonde hair that was pulled back into a ponytail.

“How about a cup of coffee?” Rachel asked.

“You got it.”

While Bobbi filled a mug, Rachel walked over to Ash’s table.

“Mind if I sit with you?” she asked him.

“Not at all.”

She smiled, took the chair opposite his, then held out her hand. “I’m Rachel Hamilton.”

They shook.

“You’re Matt’s wife?”

She laughed. “Hardly. I’m his sister.”

“Sorry. When Pax told me this place was yours and Matt’s, I just assumed...”

“Don’t be sorry. A lot of people make that same mistake.”

Bobbi came over, set the mug in front of Rachel, then glanced at Ash. “And how’s your breakfast?”

“It’s good. Thank you.”

“If either of you need anything, just holler.” With that, she headed back to the prep table where she’d been cutting up vegetables.

Rachel took a sip of her coffee then said, “How’d you sleep?”

“Fine,” he said. “I appreciate you letting me spend another night here.”

“We’ve got the beds. Someone might as well use them.”

“You do have a lot of space, but I’ve only seen a handful of people.”

“It’s an ebb-and-flow kind of thing around here. Sometimes the ranch is packed, and sometimes it feels like just Matt and me.”

“Pax tells me that this is a cattle ranch.”

She took another sip, then shrugged. “Yeah, we have cattle.”

Like Pax, she seemed hesitant to get into the business of the ranch.

“I hear you told Matt you’re intending to leave us this morning,” she said as he put a piece of sausage in his mouth.

He shrugged.

“I’m sure you have a lot of things to do,” she went on. “Starting with trying to find out what happened to your family. If I were you, it would be the first thing I’d want to do.” She paused. “But before you go, there are a few things you need to know.”

“What?” he said.

“You finish your breakfast first, then we can talk.”

He swallowed the sausage, then pushed his plate away. “I’m finished now.”

THE ROOM SHE LED HIM to was on the second floor near Matt’s office. It was a conference room decorated to keep with the mountain-lodge feel of the place—big pine table, wooden handcrafted chairs, and a fireplace at the far end. There was also a large television hanging on the wall that was currently off.

Ash hadn’t even sat down yet when the door opened again, and Matt and Pax walked in.

“Morning, Captain,” Matt said. “Trust you slept well.”

“I did. Thank you.”

Pax gave Ash a nod.

“Where’s Billy?” Matt asked.

Pax seemed to take this as his cue. He picked up the phone on a cabinet under the TV and punched in a number.

“Why don’t we sit?” Rachel suggested.

While Matt went around to the other side of the table, Rachel took the chair next to the one Ash sat in.

“So what’s this all about?” Ash asked.

Before anyone could answer, the door opened and Billy rushed in.

“Sorry,” he said. He made his way around to sit with Matt, and placed the notebook he was carrying on the table.

Pax hung up the phone the moment Billy entered, and took the chair next to Rachel.

Matt looked around at everyone, then focused his attention on Ash. “I’ll come right to it. We think it would be a mistake for you to leave right now.”

“If I want to leave, I’ll leave,” Ash said, suddenly wary. “You already said you wouldn’t try to stop me.”

“And we won’t,” Matt told him. “But I’m hoping what we have to say will convince you to stay.”

When he didn’t elaborate, Ash asked, “So what is it you have to say?”

Matt considered him for a moment before saying, “What happened to the families at Barker Flats didn’t occur simply by chance.”

“Of course it didn’t,” Ash said. “It was an attack. Some terrorist organization trying to stir up fear.”

Matt hesitated, then stood up. He began walking toward the far end of the room. “How well did you know your neighbors?”

“My neighbors? Not well. We’d just transferred in.”

Matt stopped near the center of the table. “Hadn’t everyone just transferred in?”

“Well, yes. The base had been closed for a while, and we were there to get it up and running again.”

Matt touched a finger to the table. Instantly, a wooden flap rose and disappeared into the surface edgewise, revealing a control panel underneath.

“You’re going to want to turn around,” Matt said. He hit a button and the TV came to life.

Ash shifted his chair so he could see the screen. Rachel and Pax did the same. The image remained black for a moment, then a picture of a family cut in.

“Do you recognize them?” Matt asked.

“That’s Manny...Captain Diaz and his wife. Carol, I think. I don’t remember their kids’ names.”

“They lived next to you, didn’t they?”

“Yes.”

As Ash stared at the picture, he remembered the scream he’d heard that night while he and Brandon were being led away. It was Carol, wasn’t it? And now, if what Matt told him was true, Carol and Manny and their kids were all dead.

The picture changed to one of a man and woman.

“Lieutenant Cross and his wife,” Ash said without prompting. The Crosses lived on the other side of them.

Another picture, a couple and a teenage boy.

“The Parsons, I believe.” He looked at Matt. “What’s the point of all this?”

Matt nodded at the screen. More pictures came up. This time there was no pause for Ash to identify them, but he recognized the faces of many of those he’d seen around the base.

The last image was a collage of all the photos.

“These are the sixteen families that you lived with, the ones that were exposed to the same disease as you and your family. They all have something very important in common.”

“You’ve already told me they’re dead.”

The picture of the Diaz family replaced the collage.

“Manny Diaz,” Matt said. “His father died when he was seventeen, and his mother a month after he received his commission. He was an only child. Carol Diaz, maiden name Yeager. Mother died when she was eleven, father two years later. She was an only child.”

The picture of the Diaz family was replaced by one showing the Crosses.

“Martin Cross. Parents killed in a car accident when he was a freshman in college. He was an only child. Emily Cross, maiden name Vernon. Adopted by an older couple, both of whom died of natural causes within one year of each other while Emily was in high school. She was their only child.”

Matt continued to go through the pictures, telling the basically same story every time. The final picture was one that hadn’t been shown before.

“Daniel Ash. Parents died in an auto accident when he was twenty. Not an only child, but his brother Jeff sustained brain damage in the accident and lives in a nursing home. Ellen Ash, maiden name Walker. Mother died of cancer when she was—”

“Stop,” Ash whispered. “Please.”

The screen went black, and the room fell quiet.

After a few moments, Rachel put a hand on Ash’s arm. “We know this isn’t easy. But we needed to show you the truth.”

“The truth of what?” he asked, shaking her off. “That everyone I used to live around lost their parents? It happens. It’s probably not as unusual as it sounds.”

“It’s not just the parents,” Matt said, still at the center of the table. He gestured at the screen. “None of your former neighbors had any close relatives at all. They were isolated.”

Ash gritted his teeth. “I have someone.”

“You do,” Rachel said. “But I think you understand the point Matt is getting at.”

He shot her a look, then let out a breath as his gaze fell to the table. “Okay. Fine. So we were all isolated. So what?”

“So that makes all of you the perfect test subjects,” Matt said.

“Test subjects?”

“If any of you died, it would be fairly easy to cover that up, don’t you think?”

“Wait. Are you trying to tell me what happened at Barker Flats was done to us on purpose as a test?”

Matt looked at him, saying nothing.

“That’s ridiculous,” Ash said.

Matt changed the picture on the screen. Now, instead of a photo, there was an online news article.

“This appeared on a local Ann Arbor, Michigan, news website five days ago,” Matt explained.

LOCAL MAN, WIFE DIE IN HOUSE FIRE

First Lieutenant Martin Cross and his wife Emily were killed tragically last night in a fire that consumed their home. Army investigators at the base in South Korea where they lived believe the fire was started by faulty wiring, though an investigation is ongoing.

“South Korea?” Ash said.

Matt brought up two more articles, both for families that had been at Barker Flats. Their deaths were being called accidents, too. One family was said to have died in a car accident in Germany, while the other apparently had been caught in a storm while on a fishing trip off the Philippine coast.

“These are the only articles that have appeared so far, but we have no doubt that within the next three to four weeks, the rest of your neighbors will get their obituaries, too.”

“They’re very real. If you want, I’ll take you to a computer and you can search whatever site you’d like.” When Ash didn’t say anything, Matt hit another button. “Do you recognize this man?”

Ash looked back at the screen. The photo that was now displayed was a head-and-shoulders shot of a man in his late fifties with thinning gray hair. He was wearing gold-rimmed glasses and didn’t look happy. It had obviously been cropped from a larger picture and blown up.

Ash’s first thought was that he’d never seen the man before, but there was just the hint of recognition—something in the man’s expression—that made him unsure.

“I...don’t think so,” he said.

“Not at Barker Flats?” Matt asked. “Maybe in the distance or in passing?”

Ash studied the photo again, but nothing new came to him. “I just don’t know. Who is he?”

“His name is Dr. Nathaniel Karp. He’s the man who infected your family.”

JIMMY WAS DOA when the ambulance arrived at the Sage Springs Hospital emergency room. The drive from the camping area at the dunes took nearly an hour, but Jimmy would have died even if the hospital had been right next door. Still, the two doctors who were on duty that night, Dr. Fisher and Dr. Morse, made a valiant attempt to bring him back, but to no avail.

Sage Springs boasted a population of only 12,347. And while the hospital was the best medical facility within a seventy-five-mile radius, it was by no means a top-of-the-line operation. That meant the staff it employed, while dedicated, often consisted of doctors and technicians who had graduated at the lower ends of their classes.

Drs. Fisher and Morse were no exceptions. That, of course, didn't mean they lacked the skills to do their jobs. They were intelligent, caring men who, on that night, made a critical mistake.

The assumption they made, based on the information radioed to them from the ambulance, was that the incoming patient was suffering from either a severe case of the flu or pneumonia. Unsure of how contagious the patient might be, they had ordered all staff that would come in contact with him to wear masks and gloves at all times. They couldn't have known it, but the bug was airborne and able to infect new hosts through eyes, ears, and any other entry point to the body, such as a cut. This was unforeseeable, and not their mistake.

Their mistake came once they'd pronounced Jimmy dead. Seeing how his body had been ravaged by the disease, and hearing from the ambulance attendants that others at the campground had reported Jimmy and his friends appeared fine earlier in the day should have made them realize something unusual was up. If they had recognized that, they could have immediately declared a quarantine on the entire hospital and limited the deaths to just those in the building.

But when the declaration finally came, it was several hours too late, and the town of Sage Springs paid a heavy price.

DR. KARP WAS SHAKEN from his sleep at 5:26 a.m.

Standing beside his bed was Major Ross, the man who served as his military liaison.

"There's a problem," the major said. "We're set up in Conference Room D. Be there in five minutes."

"What is it?" Dr. Karp asked.

But the major had already walked out of the room.

The doctor pushed himself out of bed, swearing under his breath. Ross had never given him an order before. That wasn't the nature of their relationship. But an order was certainly what it had sounded like, and Karp didn't like it.

Just to remind the major who was in charge, he let seven minutes pass before stepping into the conference room. Given that Ross had said "We're set up," Karp expected more than just the major waiting inside, but no one else was there.

"What's going on that you couldn't tell me in my room?" the doctor asked.

"Dr. Karp?" The voice came out of a speaker in the middle of the table. The doctor immediately recognized it as belonging to the Project Eden Director of Preparation (DOP).

"Sir, I'm sorry," the doctor said. "I didn't realize you were involved in this meeting. Major Ross gave me no information."

“Because Major Ross has no information,” the DOP explained. “He was merely doing exactly what I told him to do.”

Feeling suddenly uncomfortable, Dr. Karp said, “Of course,” then took a seat a couple of chairs away from Ross.

“Major, have you been able to reach Mr. Shell yet?” the DOP asked.

“He’s on hold, sir. I can connect him now, if you’d like.”

“Please.”

Ross leaned forward and pushed a couple of buttons on the conference phone. “Mr. Shell, are you there?”

“I’m here.”

“Director, we’re all present,” the major said.

In the silence that followed, Karp wondered if the major had accidentally disconnected the DOP, but then the man’s scratchy voice came out of the speaker again.

“At 6:22 p.m. Pacific Time last night, park rangers serving the Mesquite Dunes Recreational Area responded to a call from a camper concerned that someone using the campground had overdosed on drugs. The party in question was seen stumbling through his campsite before collapsing onto the ground. As a precaution, an ambulance was dispatched to the scene. The rangers arrived first, though. What they found was not a camper who had OD’d, but rather one camper who appeared to be very sick, and three others who were lying in their tent, dead.

“The surviving man was rushed to the hospital in Sage Springs, but died before reaching the facility. At 2:37 a.m., two of the nurses on duty started to become ill. A check of the other eighteen people in the building revealed that all but three were experiencing similar symptoms. These included headaches, body aches, and a general sense of exhaustion. One of the nurses had been on duty when the dead man arrived in the ambulance. She was smart enough to put two and two together, and immediately made calls to her county health department and the Center for Disease Control.

“I received a copy of the alert the CDC put out thirty minutes ago. This is not a public alert, and no media has been notified as of yet. CDC officials are on their way to the scene. In the meantime, the hospital has put itself under quarantine.”

The doctor frowned at the speakerphone. “What are you trying to suggest, sir? That this illness has something to do with us? That’s not possible.”

Silence again, then, “The gas station where your man Ellison was found and eliminated is only thirty miles from the campground at Mesquite Dunes.”

That gave the doctor pause. “Still,” Dr. Karp finally said. “Mr. Shell’s team burned the body and the car he’d been in. There’s no way he could have been the source.” Then a terrible thought hit him. “Unless he talked to someone first. But I find it hard to believe he would have done that.”

“There is another way,” the DOP said.

“What?” Karp asked, not seeing what it could be.

“One of the victims at the campsite was a man named Len Craddock.” The DOP let the name hang out there as if it should mean something to the doctor.

“I don’t know who that is.”

“I do,” Mr. Shell said through the speaker, a hint of dread in his voice. “He’s the person who discovered the body of the gas station attendant.”

Dr. Karp could feel the skin tighten across his arms. The station attendant had been killed because he’d witnessed what was done to Ellison. His death had been made to look like a robbery and having someone find his body had been part of the plan.

“But it’s my understanding that precautions were taken,” the doctor said. “The car and the body were removed. There was nothing there to infect him.”

“Records indicate that the call Craddock made to the police was placed through a pay phone outside the station,” the DOP told them. “The only other call on that phone that day happened minutes before Mr. Shell’s team arrived on scene.”

“Oh, dear God,” Karp said.

“Mr. Shell?” the DOP asked.

Shell took a moment before he spoke. “There was obviously an oversight, sir. I will deal with it.”

“Yes, you will. You will also help ensure this does not spread. Dr. Karp, Major Ross, you, too, if necessary.”

“Perhaps it would be best for an immediate quarantine zone to be set up,” Major Ross suggested.

Dr. Karp frowned. “I’m not sure if that—”

“What?” the DOP asked. “Necessary? It’s an excellent suggestion, Major. Our people are already on it. We cannot afford mistakes. The only way we will succeed is to control events, not have them control us.”

“Sir, if I may ask,” Shell said. “Has anyone tried to trace the number Ellison called?”

“Why?”

“It could help in locating Captain Ash. Given this new development, I think it’s even more critical that we bring him in. He can link this outbreak to Barker Flats. And while a connection from that to Bluebird would be impossible, it could raise concerns and interfere with some of our future work, creating unnecessary delays.”

“Yes, Mr. Shell. We have discussed that here. In addition to helping with the outbreak, you need to continue hunting for Ash. Any additional men you need, please request from your department head and they’ll be immediately assigned to you. As for the phone number, it was to a disposable phone purchased in Milwaukee, and no longer seems to be in service.”

The doctor was relieved. He’d dodged a bullet with the outbreak, since most of the blame seemed to be falling on Mr. Shell. He was still vulnerable on the Ash issue, but there was a way he might be able to improve that situation, too.

“Director? I have an idea about how we might be able to flush out Captain Ash.”

ASH PUSHED HIMSELF out of his chair and moved over to the monitor, his eyes firmly affixed on the image of Dr. Karp.

In rapid succession, he asked, “Is he some kind of spy? Who does he work for? Does the Army know?”

“Dr. Karp is an American citizen,” Matt explained. “Until three years ago, he worked for the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases. He was then transferred to a classified assignment. That assignment eventually brought him to Barker Flats.”

Ash looked at Matt, confused. “Are you trying to say that the U.S. Government did this to my family?”

“We’re saying that Dr. Karp and the people he’s involved with did this to your family.”

“But you just said he works for the Army.”

Matt paused, then said, “The Army pays him a salary, yes.”

“So you are saying the Army did this to us. There’s no way I’m going to believe that.”

“The Army didn’t do this to you.”

Ash stared across the table. “You’re not making any sense.”

“Captain,” Rachel said, her voice soft. “You have unfortunately found yourself in a situation that is much, much larger than you can imagine. We have been...following this for many years, and sometimes it’s too much for even us to grasp.”

“Oh,” Ash said, taking a step back from the table. “Oh, I get it. You’re one of those conspiracy groups, aren’t you? What is this? Some kind of indoctrination? Trying to recruit me? Well, thanks for your help, but it’s time for me to leave.”

He turned for the door.

“If you’d stayed in your cell in California, you’d be dead now,” Matt said. “That much you can’t deny. We got you out. We saved your life. The least you could do is give us a few minutes to hear us out.”

“I think I’ve already heard enough.”

Matt started to speak again, but Rachel silenced him with a look as she stood up and moved between Ash and the door.

“Captain, I understand your doubts and concerns. You are free to go, of course. But we don’t think that would be wise.”

“And staying here would be? With a bunch of crazies?”

She studied him for a second. “Just give me one moment.”

She walked over to a cabinet along the wall. From Ash’s angle he could see the envelope he’d brought from the desert sitting on the shelf inside. But if that’s what Rachel was retrieving, she didn’t get a chance to pull it out.

As she bent down, the door suddenly thrust open, and a man Ash hadn’t seen before rushed in.

“PCN,” he said quickly.

Matt touched the controls, and the television switched from the image of Dr. Karp to the Prime Cable News network. A Breaking News banner was running across the bottom of the screen, while the rest was taken up by a female anchor at the network’s New York studios.

“...confirm twenty-two deaths at this point. Roadblocks have been set up around the town, and no one is being allowed in or out.” The image changed to a shot of a desert highway. Parked across the road about fifty feet from the camera's position were several military vehicles and a couple highway patrol cars. In the distance beyond them was what appeared to be the edge of a town.

"Residents of Sage Springs have been advised to remain in their homes until otherwise instructed. We're told that a first-response CDC team is on scene now, and that more medical personnel are en route. To repeat, there has been a report of a severe outbreak of what looks like a deadly version of the flu in the town of Sage Springs, California." The anchor put her hand to her ear. "All right. We have Tamara Costello now just outside the roadblock. Tamara, can you tell us what's going on there at this moment?"

The voice changed but the picture remained the same. "Catherine, we have just been asked to tell anyone who has been in the vicinity of Sage Springs or the Mesquite Dunes Recreational Area in the past twenty-four hours to call a special hotline the California Department of Health has set up. I believe that number should be on the screen now."

As if she were running the control room, the Breaking News banner was replaced by a new graphic that read Crisis in the Desert on one side, and had a phone number on the other.

"Though there has been no official announcement," the reporter went on, "speculation, confirmed by unofficial sources, is that this is not some naturally occurring outbreak, but has been caused by the deliberate release of a virus. One source I talked to believes this is a terrorist attack."

"Tamara, if it is a terrorist attack, why was it done in such an underpopulated area?" the anchor asked.

"Our viewers might be surprised to learn, Catherine, that this part of California boasts a lot of military installations such as Fort Irwin, the China Lake Naval Air Weapons Station, and, closer to Los Angeles, Edwards Air Force Base. There was a report of an explosion two nights ago at a small military facility less than a hundred miles from here that we are checking out. I should stress, though, that event remains unconfirmed, and any connections to the outbreak are unknown at this point."

"Tamara, I understand officials are looking for someone in particular. Is that correct?"

The guy who'd come running into the conference room suddenly said, "Here it is."

"Yes, Catherine. That's correct."

Ash stared at the television, stunned, as the image of the desert was replaced by a photo of him.

"Daniel Ash is believed to be a carrier of the virus, though apparently immune himself. We're told that if anyone sees him they should call the hotline or their local authorities, but should not, under any circumstances, approach him."

"Is there any indication that Ash is one of the people responsible for releasing the virus in the first place?" the anchor asked.

"No one is saying that, at least not officially. They are only saying he is a person of interest and ___"

Matt turned the TV off.

"Thanks, Jordan," he said to the man who'd come running in. "Record it."

"Already going."

Jordan left.

Ash gazed at the blank screen, numb. A person of interest?

Rachel put a hand on his shoulder. "Are you all right?"

He continued to look at the TV a moment longer, then turned to her. "I...I should turn myself in."

"That's the last thing you need to do."

Suddenly realizing her hand was still on his shoulder, he pulled back. "What if they're right, and I am contagious? What if I've infected all of you? Oh, God! And those people who helped me get out of there, drove me here, they could be sick already.”

Billy leaned forward. “The incubation rate and course for this particular virus is extremely quick. From infection to death—anywhere from eight to twenty-four hours. The point is, Captain, if you were a latter-day Typhoid Mary, most of us would already be dead, and the rest dying.” He looked around. “Everyone looks pretty healthy to me.”

“How do you know that? How can you possibly know anything about this...this virus?”

“The only way we could have gotten you out of that facility was if we had someone on the inside,” Matt said. “The truth is, the only reason we even knew about you was because of him. The same person was also able to feed us information about the virus.”

The size of the rabbit hole Ash had fallen into was cavernous. If he were to believe they had a man on the inside, it would mean he had to accept the idea that what had been done to his family and his neighbors was perpetrated by this Dr. Karp, an Army employee, and that all the families had been moved to Barker Flats specifically for the purpose of testing this virus. It was ridiculous. Completely unbelievable. Yet, if he didn’t believe there was a man on the inside, then how did they get him out?

Finally, he said, “If you did have someone there, how did he let this happen? How could he stand by and watch all those people die? My family? Our neighbors?”

“He wasn’t aware there was going to be a live test until it was too late,” Matt said. “But don’t read too much into that. Even if he had known, he couldn’t have done anything anyway. He would have been killed, and stopped nothing. At least this way he was able to get you out before he died.”

“Died?” Ash said, surprised. Then he remembered. “The guy who stayed behind so we could get away. The one who got caught in the explosion—he was your inside man.”

“Yes. But the explosion didn’t get him. He fled before it was set off, so he could get us one last report. Only...” Matt paused. “He said he was sick, and that he didn’t have long. The phone he called from was thirty miles from...from Sage Springs.”

Ash’s eyes widened. “The outbreak. He’s responsible?”

“It would seem so.”

“Then I must be contagious,” Ash said. “How else could he have gotten infected?”

Billy shifted in his chair. “Your immunity was of great interest to those running the test. The entire time you were in that cell, they were bombarding you with the virus, trying to see if it could break through your system.”

“Are you serious?”

“Absolutely. Our man reported that when the power came back on in the building, the system spraying the virus into your cell started up again, and the bug leaked into the main corridor.”

Ash finally sat back down, the weight of everything too much.

“Under the circumstances,” Matt said, “I think we’re going to have to insist you stay.”

“You mean you will stop me.”

“No. But we won’t help you either. And we’re a long way from anywhere out here.”

Rachel took her seat beside Ash, shifting her body so they were facing each other. “You’re a fugitive now, Captain, and the whole country knows it. Within twenty-four hours, they will finger you as one of those responsible. I guarantee it. You won’t be able to go anywhere without someone recognizing you. You won’t be able to talk to anyone. Here, you’re safe.”

“I don’t care about my safety. I only care about making those who did this to my family pay.”

“That’s a goal we would be more than happy to help you achieve,” she said. “But you can’t just blunder off and think you’ll be able to deal with this on your own. Information is power, and at the moment, there’s a lot going on that you don’t understand.”

He was quiet for a moment. "You'll help me understand?"

"We'll give you what you need," she said.

He looked at the others, and they all nodded.

"Okay. I'll stay for now. But the minute you deny me anything I think I need to know, I'm gone."

"Fair enough," she said.

"Then let's get started," he said.

Rachel exchanged a look with Matt, then focused once more on Ash. "The first thing you need to know is about your children."

His eyes narrowed slightly. "What about them?"

"They're alive."

TAMARA COSTELLO WAS getting frustrated. The only new information she'd been able to find was that a food truck would be serving lunch about a mile back along the highway. Not very broadcast-worthy stuff.

Without anything new, her network, and all the other twenty-four-hour news channels, would just keep playing the same crap over and over, eventually venturing into areas of wild conjecture. It's what always happened, and even though she was a part of the system, she hated that. This was supposed to be the age of information, not recycled garbage.

That's why, after she completed her update with the brain-dead Catherine Minor at 11:10 a.m., she found a quiet spot and called her brother in San Francisco.

"Look at you getting all that air time," he said as soon as he answered.

She couldn't help but smile. "You've been watching?"

"Riveted. So, really, how bad is it?"

"No way to know for sure. They've got the whole town blocked off. I've tried to call people who live there, but all I get are busy signals. Even the cell towers are down. Thank God for my sat phone." The network gave all its field reporters satellite phones in case they found themselves in areas that weren't covered by mobile phone companies despite those fancy maps they were always bragging about.

"The whole town? Man, it must be bad. Gives me the creeps just thinking about it."

She snickered and shook her head. "What are you? Ten?"

"Seriously, Tam. Think about it. Something so small you can't even see can kill you just like that."

She thought she heard his fingers snap. "Look, Gavin," she said, trying to get back on track. "I was wondering if you could do a little research for me."

"Ha! I knew that's why you called. You want to know more about the flu? The town? Give me five minutes and I can pull together enough info to fill up an entire hour."

While Tamara had chosen a life in the spotlight, Gavin preferred one that was more private, and spent most of his time in his apartment doing freelance software programming.

"No. The network can find that stuff out on its own. I'm interested in this Daniel Ash guy."

"The man the CDC's looking for?"

"Yeah. Who is he? Why is he important? Where are some of the places he'd go? If you can actually find him, I'll owe you big for the rest of the year. An exclusive interview would be incredible."

"From a distance, though."

"What?"

"From a distance. I mean, if he's infected, you don't want to get anywhere near him."

"Right. From a distance." She paused. "Think you can dig up a phone number?"

"If he's got one, I'll find it," Gavin said.

"And anything else you can learn?"

"Sure, sis. I'm waiting to hear back from a client, so I've got some time."

"Thanks, Gavin. You're my secret weapon."

GAVIN COSTELLO HUNG up with his sister then sat back down at his desk. Most of his non-computer geek friends were surprised by his setup. They expected multiple monitors, couple of high-end tower computers, and peripheral hard drives and gadgets stacked to the ceiling. What he really had was a 13-inch PC laptop and a backup hard drive that ran automatically in the background over his Wi-Fi network. This gave him mobility on those rare occasions he worked away from his apartment.

Deciding to go the easy route first, he pulled up his current favorite search engine and typed in the name Daniel Ash. Not surprisingly, there was more than one. From the picture he'd seen on TV, the Ash his sister was looking for couldn't have been more than thirty-four or thirty-five, so that helped eliminate several of the possibilities. Then he tried to see if any of the remaining had a California connection. Two did, but the picture on the Facebook page that one of the links led to was definitely not the guy. The other lived clear up in Eureka and appeared to own a plumbing business. What would he be doing in the middle of the desert involved in a flu outbreak?

Gavin heard his sister's voice from his TV. The screen was placed so that all he had to do was swivel his chair around to see it. It looked like she'd moved to the opposite side of the highway, but what she was saying was pretty much the same thing she'd been saying most of the morning. Still, it always gave him a kick to see her work.

He grabbed his cell phone and typed in a text:

Maybe you should report from the middle of the road next time. HA!

He sent it to her, muted the TV, then returned to his computer.

Five minutes later, as he was still trying to narrow things down, his phone rang. Expecting his sister again, he answered the call without looking. "Hey."

Though the line sounded open, no one said anything.

"Tammy?"

Still nothing. He looked at the display. Blocked.

"Who is this?" he asked.

A click, and the line went dead.

"Whatever, man." He dropped his phone on the table and returned his attention to his laptop, all but forgetting about the call.

Forty minutes later, he hit pay dirt.

It was a picture of a group of Army officers in a Fayetteville, North Carolina, newspaper from a few years earlier. The officers were from nearby Fort Bragg and had given a presentation to the local high school. One of the men in the photo was identified as Lieutenant Daniel Ash, and the more Gavin looked at him, the more he was sure it was the same guy in the photo shown on PCN.

"Nice," he said, congratulating himself.

Several minutes later, he located information indicating that prior to being stationed at Fort Bragg, the lieutenant had spent a short time at Fort Irwin outside Barstow, California—less than sixty miles from Sage Springs. Where Ash had gone after Fort Bragg, Gavin wasn't able to discover yet. Still, he knew Tammy would want to hear what he'd learned so far.

He grabbed his phone to call her, but for some reason he didn't have a signal.

"What the hell?"

He always had a signal at home. It was one of the reasons he'd picked this apartment. In his business, he couldn't afford to live in a cellular dead zone.

He decided to copy the links into an email and send them to her. He wasn't sure if she could retrieve email on her sat phone, but she'd get it at some point. A split second after he hit SEND, he got an error message telling him his cable modem was not currently connected to the Internet.

“You’ve got to be kidding me.”

Now he was really annoyed. He glanced at his TV. With the exception of a blue box across the center of the screen that read Channel Currently Unavailable, the screen had gone black. Apparently, the whole cable system, or at least the part that came into his building, was out of commission.

Just his luck that both it and his cell phone would go out at the same time. Maybe they were tied together somehow. A massive communications glitch. That should make the news. Well, if anyone was still getting a signal so they could watch it.

He set the email to send as soon as the connection returned, and got up to grab a soda out of his refrigerator. As he was deciding whether he wanted to make a sandwich to go with his Dr. Pepper, someone knocked on his door.

He was barely out of the kitchen when whoever it was pounded again, more urgent this time.

“Just a minute,” he yelled.

He looked through the security peephole in his door, but the person outside seemed to be covering it up. Had to be Dustin. He was always doing asshole things like that.

“Hilarious,” Gavin said loud enough so Dustin could hear him. Donning a reproachful smirk, he opened the door. “What the hell are you bothering me for at this—”

“Not a word.”

It wasn’t Dustin. It was a man holding a gun pointed at Gavin’s face.

“Sure,” Gavin said, then realized he’d broken the rule and added, “Sorry.”

The man stepped toward him, backing Gavin into the room. There were two others behind him, both big like the first man, wearing similar dark suits, and also armed.

Once everyone was inside, the last man in shut the door.

“Anyone else here?” the first guy asked.

“No,” Gavin said, shaking his head vigorously from side to side. “Just me.”

“Don’t lie.”

“I’m not lying.” Gavin’s voice cracked a little, and he could feel his hands shaking at his side.

The two other men headed into the hallway that led back to the bedroom. They were only gone about thirty seconds before they reappeared.

“Clear,” one of them said, then stepped carefully into the kitchen with his partner.

There was another “clear” and they both returned.

“Your name’s Gavin Costello?” the first guy asked.

“Yes.”

The man touched a Bluetooth headset mounted on his ear. “We’re secure. You can release the building.” He looked at Gavin, then nodded toward the desk. “That your only computer?”

“What? Uh, no. I have a Dell in my closet.”

“Is the laptop the only computer you use?”

“Yes. Yes, it is. You want it? It’s all yours.”

Who the hell were these guys? If they were trying to rob him, they were the best-dressed home invaders in history. Whoever they were, though, if they just wanted his computer, great. They could take it and their guns and leave.

The main guy glanced at the other men. “Grab it.”

The slightly smaller of the two took the laptop from the desk. “Phone,” he said, then raised Gavin’s cell into the air so the others could see it.

“Bring it,” the main guy said. “That your only phone, Gavin?”

“Yeah. Yeah, only one. I don’t even have a landline.”

“All right. Let’s go.”

Gavin tried not to show his relief. They’d be gone in just a second. And he was going to be okay.

But then the man grabbed his arm and pushed him toward the door. “You, too.”

“What? Why me? What do you need me for? You got my computer. You’ll get good money for that.”

“No more talking or I pull the trigger.”

The man said this so matter-of-factly that Gavin bit his lip to keep from saying anything.

• • • •

THE MAIN GUY SAID, “We’re secure. You can release the building.”

Five seconds later, two doors down the hall, Mrs. McFadden’s cable came back on.

Good thing, too. One of the local stations showed reruns of Perry Mason every day at noon, and she hadn’t missed an episode in over a year. The moment the TV signal had gone out, she’d tried calling the cable company, but there’d been something wrong with her phone, too. Now all was right with the world again, and Perry would be on in just a few minutes to embarrass that stuck-up Hamilton Burger like he always did.

Of the eighteen other apartments in the building, there was only one additional person home, a man named Frank Bushnell. He worked graveyard dispatch for the police so he was sound asleep. The outage passed without him ever knowing anything was wrong.

In apartment 11, Gavin Costello’s apartment, as soon as the cable kicked back in, the laptop’s Wi-Fi reconnected with the Internet. While the main guy was telling one of his associates to grab the computer, the email program was going through its normal cycle. This time, after confirming that it was once more connected to the cyber world beyond Gavin’s walls, it sent off the single message waiting in the queue, finishing its operation just seconds before the associate slammed the screen shut.

A FEW HUNDRED MILES southeast, Tamara Costello’s sat phone pinged with an incoming email. At that moment, though, Tamara was on camera and didn’t hear it arrive.

THE MOMENT RACHEL said that Josie and Brandon were still alive, Ash's vision went gray. In his mind, he could hear Josie's cry, and feel how cold she'd been as he tried to keep her warm. He could even sense Brandon's fear as they were being led out of the house at Barker Flats.

But most of all, he could remember the numbness, the horror, the disbelief, and the total devastation he'd felt when the voice in the ceiling had told him his children were dead.

When he finally regained his senses, he was on the ground, one leg tucked under him, with no idea how he'd gotten there. Rachel was kneeling on one side, while Pax was doing the same on the other.

"Are you telling me the truth?" he whispered.

"Let's get you back in your seat," Rachel said.

She and Pax lifted him to his feet and helped him into the chair.

While they were doing this, Matt walked over to the cabinet and pulled out the tape-covered envelope. From inside, he removed a folded legal-size envelope and a thumb drive. He handed the envelope to Rachel, and took the drive over to the control panel.

"We've already watched these," Matt said. "They might not be easy to look at, but you need to see them, too."

He stuck the drive into a port and hit several buttons.

The television screen was black for a moment, then gray, then...

A room, not too dissimilar from Ash's cell at Barker Flats. Only this room had a door that was open, and a window that Ash got the sense didn't look to the outside. The shot was from up high and angled down.

Lying on the bed was Brandon.

Ash couldn't help but lean forward. Here was his son. He hadn't seen Brandon's face since they had been separated. He remembered now what he told his son at that moment. "Go with them. It'll be okay. You'll see me in just a bit."

He'd believed it then, because that's what they had told him. But it wasn't true, so the last thing he had told his son was a lie.

"I made some time notations on the back of the envelope," Matt said to Rachel.

Ash could hear her flip the envelope over, but he didn't look. He couldn't tear his eyes from the screen.

"Oh-six twenty-seven," Rachel said.

The image started scrolling quickly forward, then slowed back to real time.

"This is six-thirty in the morning, just a few hours after you were both brought in," Matt explained.

Brandon looked like he was asleep. Suddenly the door pushed all the way open, and someone in a biosafe suit came in. The person knelt down next to the bed and put something on Brandon's forehead.

A few moments later, a voice said, "Temp, ninety-eight point five."

Ash thought back. Six-thirty meant he'd been in his cell for at least four hours. By that point, he'd already been told that Josie was dead. But Brandon? He didn't know for sure, but he didn't think so.

"Next," Matt said.

Rachel read off another time code. "Ten twelve."

That, Ash knew, was definitely after when he'd been told about his son. No way it was later than that.

Once more the picture raced forward before resuming normal speed. The time stamp in the lower left read 10:12. The boy in the bed was still Brandon. And he was very much alive.

“Stop,” Ash said.

Matt hit pause.

“Skip ahead.”

“How far?”

“Nowhere in particular. Just let it run.”

Ash just wanted to see Brandon move, Brandon alive, Brandon definitely there longer than the voice had led him to believe. One hour, two hours, three, four. It was all the same, all revealing the lie he'd been told.

“Stop,” he finally said. “Is there video of Josie?”

“There is.”

“Show it to me.”

Her footage was more painful to watch. She was still ill. But she wasn't dead. Ash made Matt speed through the footage like he had with Brandon's, this time not stopping until Josie sat up.

“Play it,” Ash said quickly.

The image snapped to normal time. Josie had a hand on the wall, steadying herself.

“Hello? Hello?” she said. “Where am I?”

Dear God, he never thought he'd hear her voice again.

He could feel the tears gathering in his eyes, and the breath quivering in his lungs. But he sucked in deeply and forced himself to remain under control.

Matt turned the video off.

“What are you doing?” Ash said.

“I'll give you the drive and have a computer set up in your room. You can watch as much as you want there. But if I were you, I wouldn't. There's nothing else that will mean anything. The most important thing was for you to see that they're still alive.”

Ash glanced at the envelope in front of Rachel. “You said you had different times marked. There must be something you thought I should see.”

“Moments, only. Things I thought might help convince you. But you don't need convincing.”

Ash hesitated, then asked, “Were they told anything about me?”

Matt looked at him for a moment. “Yes. At first they were told you were sick, then later that you had died.” He paused. “I can show you that if you really want.”

A spike of pain shot through Ash's heart. His children, how they must be suffering thinking both of their parents were dead.

He shook his head. He would have to watch at some point, but he wasn't sure he could take it right now. It was enough to know they were alive, that they had survived the mysterious illness that had apparently taken everyone else around them. That he would be able to—

His head whipped around, his eyes finding Matt. “They survived the disease, but...but the explosion!”

“No,” Matt said quickly, shaking his head. “They weren't there. They were moved as soon as your daughter could travel, two days after they took you in.”

“Moved where?”

“Some place where they...”

“Where they what?”

Matt glanced at Billy, so Ash did the same.

“What?” he asked. “What is it?”

Billy cleared his throat. “Captain, you have an immunity to this particular virus. They’ve been looking for someone like you. What happened at Barker Flats isn’t the first time some variant of this virus has been tested. But we’re pretty sure you and your children are the first to survive. It’s obvious you’ve passed your immunity on to them. We think they are...running tests on your kids. Using them to pinpoint this immunity.”

A mix of anger and horror flashed in Ash’s eyes. “Tests?”

“Mostly with their blood, would be my guess,” Billy said in his nonchalant way.

“The good news,” Rachel said, jumping in, “is that it means they’ll want to keep Josie and Brandon alive.”

“I need to find them,” Ash said, pushing himself up. “I need to go now. I have to get them back.”

Rachel touched his arm. “If you go now, you won’t get within a hundred miles of them. Your face is all over the television. You’ll be caught, then all three of you will be lost.”

Clenching his teeth, he said, “I can’t just stay here and do nothing.”

“We’re not asking you to do nothing.” Matt walked down the table until he was directly across from Ash. “We’re asking you to let us help you get them back.”

Ash was almost shaking now, his anger at those who had taken Josie and Brandon growing with each second. “How can you help me?”

Rachel smiled. “Let us show you.”

HECTOR MENDEZ ARRIVED home at ten a.m. He lived alone in an old house on the outskirts of Victorville, California. The place had belonged to his mother, but she'd been dead for three years so it had been his since then.

That had also been around the time he and Lucy finally went their separate ways. It was his fault, and he knew it. He'd been a long-distance trucker when they were together, away from home for weeks at a time. He'd made some big stink about this being who he was and how he wasn't going to change. But staying home by herself wasn't who Lucy was either.

The irony, of course, was that not long after she left him, he gave up the long-distance work, and took a local trucking job for a regional bakery that had him home every day just about the time everyone else was going to their jobs.

His daily route started at midnight and took him from Victorville through Barstow, up to Sage Springs, around to Trona, then Ridgecrest, Johannesburg, Adelanto and finally home. His employer supplied mostly hotels, a few restaurants, and a couple of hospitals.

As was his habit, he and a few of the other drivers had breakfast at the local diner and then he'd driven home. Once there, he had his usual pre-sleep beer, watched one of the shows he'd recorded the night before, and went to bed.

He woke at three p.m., two hours earlier than usual. The reason was simple. He'd coughed himself awake. He headed into the kitchen where he hocked up what was in his throat, spit it into the sink, then got a glass of water.

Great, he thought as he chugged the liquid down. He hated being sick.

He decided to take a couple of cold tablets, the non-drowsy type since he'd have to be up and moving around in a few hours, and went back to bed.

When his boss called at 12:10 a.m. to find out why he was late, the ringing of his phone reached his ears but his mind barely registered it. Thirty minutes later, when Karl, a friend who also drove for the bakery, knocked on his door, he didn't hear anything at all.

Hector was dead.

TAMARA COSTELLO DIDN'T see the email from her brother until after lunch. She wasn't used to checking for them on her sat phone. Ninety-nine percent of the time she relied on her smartphone for email. But finally she noticed the tiny icon glowing dully on her display, indicating she'd received something.

She'd actually become annoyed with Gavin. She'd been trying to call him, but kept going straight to his voice mail. The email, however, more than made up for his lack of communication.

Daniel Ash was in the Army. Could it be that this was some kind of military accident, and not an act of terrorism like officials were starting to characterize it? She couldn't help but make the connection to the still unconfirmed report of an explosion at a military installation two nights ago. Had that been an Army base? It was something to check.

She had another live spot coming up in one minute. She tried her brother one more time, wanting to see if he'd learned anything more. Voice mail.

"Dammit, Gavin. Where the hell are you?" she said.

"Tamara, thirty seconds," her producer, Joe, announced.

While she did consider trying to get independent confirmation on Gavin's information, the thought passed so quickly through her mind it was almost like she hadn't had it at all. The several times she'd relied on her brother in the past, his information had always proven to be accurate. And there was no question that the Ash in the picture from one of the links Gavin sent was the same man in the photo authorities had given to the media.

As she got into position, Joe checked the mic clipped to her shirt. The moment he stepped away, she looked at the camera.

"How's this?" she asked.

Bobby, the cameraman, kept his eye on the viewfinder and gave her the thumbs up.

"Okay, we're coming up," Joe told her.

As she put her earpiece back in, she could suddenly hear Greg Roberts in the studio. He'd taken over anchor duties from Catherine a half hour earlier. Tamara took a deep breath, put the appropriate concerned look on her face, then gave Joe and Bobby a nod.

She was ready.

• • • •

"...THAT TIME UNTIL THE CDC was notified," the PCN anchor said. The graphic at the bottom of the screen identified him as Greg Roberts. "The situation seems to have settled into a kind of wait-and-see. We should learn more at the next press conference scheduled for two hours from now." He paused. "Okay, we're going to go back out to our reporter on the scene, Tamara Costello. Tamara, how's the mood there?"

Dr. Karp frowned at his television. Mood? Where do they get these people?

The picture switched to the same desert shot beside the roadblock the network had been using most of the morning. Centered in the frame was Tamara Costello, their on-scene reporter.

"The high level of tension we noticed when we first arrived at the western roadblock has become more of a simmer as we await word of what's actually happening in town," she said.

"I've talked to several members of the highway patrol who are manning this post with a squad of Army personnel, and I can truthfully say no one has any more information concerning the residents of Sage Springs than we do here."

The image on the screen split in two, with a shot of the in-studio anchor on the left, and Tamara in the desert on the right. "There's been a report that at least twenty-five people have died in town," Greg said, "and somewhere between seventy-five and one hundred are feared infected."

"We heard that, too, Greg. Unfortunately, we have not yet been able to confirm any numbers. I can say that twenty minutes ago, a convoy of vehicles, mostly Suburbans, passed through the roadblock and headed into town at high speed." As she spoke, footage of the caravan replaced the two talking heads. There were five vehicles altogether, their windows blacked out. "Our producer, Joe, heard from someone on the roadblock that these were part of a CDC team here to help the situation."

The picture switched back to the double shot.

"Are there any concerns that the virus could reach where you are currently situated?"

Dr. Karp rolled his eyes. Ten miles away through a warm desert? His skills were excellent, but they weren't that excellent.

"Greg, we've been told that our position is completely safe. In fact, one of the officials who stopped here earlier made a point to say that even if the roadblock were just a mile out from the town, there would still be no problem. A source has told me that the extra distance gives the authorities enough room to spot anyone crazy enough to try and sneak into or out of Sage Springs. As we already know, two people have attempted this and have been arrested.”

“Thanks, Tamara. We’ll check back with you—”

“I do have one piece of new information that I can share with you, Greg. It concerns the man authorities have deemed a person of interest.”

Dr. Karp leaned forward. Beside him, Major Ross did the same.

“Daniel Ash?”

“Yes. According to my information, Ash is either in or was in the U.S. Army. We know that three and a half years ago he was a lieutenant at Fort Bragg in North Carolina, and before that, he was stationed at Fort Irwin, which is less than eighty miles from Sage Springs.”

“How the hell did she learn that?” Major Ross said.

Greg, the anchor, looked equally surprised by this new information. “That’s certainly something we haven’t heard yet. Is there more?”

“That’s all I have at the moment, Greg, but as soon as I know anything else, I’ll let you know.”

“Thank you, Tamara. You and your crew be careful out there.”

“We will, Greg. Thank you.”

As the image switched to a one-shot of the anchor, Ross picked up the remote and hit MUTE. He then quickly punched a number into the conference-room phone, making sure the speaker was engaged.

One ring, then, “Yes?”

“Were you watching that?” Ross asked.

“If you’re talking about the Costello woman, then yes, I saw it,” Shell said.

“How the hell did she find that out?”

“Apparently her brother sent her the information in an email.”

“Her brother? I thought you had her brother.”

“We do. We only learned twenty minutes ago that the email had gone out before we were able to fully secure his equipment.”

“Twenty minutes ago? You could have stopped her then!”

Shell was silent for a moment. “There was no reason to. The information was going to come out eventually. It’s not going to do any harm.”

Dr. Karp, who’d been content to let the other two fight it out, finally said, “I think we can use this to our advantage.”

Major Ross glanced at him doubtfully. “You want to explain that?”

“We’ve already been putting the pressure on Captain Ash. A little more can only help. I say we identify him as a mole. People will already be thinking that’s a possibility anyway.”

“So change him from a person of interest into a suspect,” Shell said, the hint of a smile in his voice.

“Not a suspect,” the doctor said. “The suspect.”

It would either flush Ash out or get him killed. Either way, he wouldn’t be a problem anymore.

THE ONE THING Ash was very good at was going all in when he decided on a course of action. The only goal he had in his life now was getting his children back. Rachel, Matt, and the others described a plan that, even a few hours earlier, he would have found crazy. But not only was his face plastered all over television, it was now being openly speculated that he was responsible for the virus outbreak, exactly as Rachel had predicted.

Give it another day and he would be branded a terrorist, something they were all convinced would occur. And when it did, not only would he be in danger of being arrested if anyone recognized him, there was a good chance some “concerned citizen” would try to kill him.

If he was going to save his kids, the Ash he saw every morning in the mirror had to go.

“Watch your step,” Matt said as he opened a door that led down into the basement of the Lodge—the name that apparently everyone called the ranch’s main building.

Matt went down first, with Ash following and Billy bringing up the rear. When they reached the bottom, Ash saw that the space was mainly being used for storage.

Matt headed straight to the south wall, stopping in front of a clear spot between two shelving units. For several seconds, he didn’t move. Ash looked over at Billy, his eyebrow raised in question, but Billy was looking at the wall, too.

A sudden thunk caused Ash to look back around. Nothing had changed as far as he could see. Then Matt reached out and pushed on the wall. A door-shaped panel of stone moved inward, and a light in the space beyond came on.

Matt started to go through the opening, but Ash hesitated. “You’re not going to lock me in down there, are you?” He’d had his fill of confinement.

Matt paused. “Absolutely not. Besides this, there are two other ways out—one that exits in the dormitory where your room is, and another in the ruins of an old barn in the trees. We’ll show you both, and I promise no doors will be locked behind you.”

The two men watched Ash until he nodded and said, “Okay.”

Stepping through the door, Ash found himself in a five-foot-by-five-foot room. As soon as Billy closed the secret panel, Matt put his hand on the wall. A small square section surrounding his palm lit up for several seconds. As soon as it went dark, the wall to their right slid open, revealing a set of stairs.

These were at least double the length of the ones that led down from the first floor into the regular basement. When the trio reached the bottom, Matt palmed the wall again, and a door popped open.

The only thing about this new level that said basement to Ash was the lack of windows. Otherwise, he thought it was very much like a high-tech military facility. There was a long corridor running down the middle, with rooms and other hallways leading off to the sides.

“How big is this place?” he asked.

“The footprint’s about twice as large as the Lodge,” Matt explained as they walked down the corridor. “We can comfortably house fifty people down here for several months, if necessary. There are actually two more levels below this, but both are smaller and used only for storage.” He pointed to the left, down an intersecting hallway. “There’s a firing range down there, and our armory. That room..” He pointed at a door just ahead. “That’s the IT room, where all our servers and other computer equipment live.” He nodded at another hallway. “We have a small cafeteria down there, and several dorm rooms just on the other side of it.”

“I thought bomb shelters went out with the fifties.”

Matt glanced at him. “There are a lot more things to be scared of than just bombs.”

“Like what?”

“Like viruses that get out of control,” Billy said.

“Or, more importantly, the people behind them,” Matt added. “Here we are.”

He opened a set of double doors, then ushered Ash in. Billy’s examination room upstairs was nothing compared to the full-on operating room they’d just entered.

Billy pushed past both of them, heading straight for a sink against the wall. “There’s a shower and some gowns back there,” he said to Ash, pointing at a door in the far corner. “When you’re done, come back here and I’ll throw a couple ideas at you.”

Ten minutes later, they were all standing in front of a computer screen on a counter not far from the surgery table.

“If we had time, I’d do a lot more, but for now we need to achieve the biggest change we can with the minimum amount of downtime for you. Now, this is what I was—”

“I don’t care what you do,” Ash said.

“Don’t you want to have some say?”

“I just want my kids back.”

No one said anything for a moment.

Matt gave Ash’s shoulder a pat. “I’ll choose for him.”

Billy looked at Ash, silently asking if that was okay, but Ash said nothing.

The ranch’s doctor shrugged. “All right, then. Let’s mark you up.”

• • • •

RACHEL WAS SITTING next to Ash’s bed when he woke, a book in her lap. “How are you feeling?” she asked.

His whole head throbbed. “I’m fine. What time is it?”

“Nine.”

“Evening, or...or morning.”

“Evening. You haven’t been out that long.”

It had been two p.m. when the surgery began, so he’d been unconscious for seven hours. He tried to touch his face, but it seemed to be covered in bandages.

“You’re a mess right now,” she said. “But in a couple of months it’ll all look normal to you.”

He tried to push himself up, but couldn’t. “I can’t...wait a couple of...months.”

“Of course not. We talked about that, remember?”

Did we? Maybe.

“Two days only, and we’ll use that time to get you as prepared as possible.”

Two days also seemed like too long. But what choice did he have? Without the new face, there was no chance he would ever even get close to his kids.

“Do you want to go back to sleep? Or get started?”

“Get started,” he said, his voice still weak.

“Excellent.” She picked up a folder that was on the stand by his bed. “Who are you?”

He squinted at her. “What?”

“You can’t be Captain Daniel Ash anymore, so who are you?”

Now he understood what she meant. A false name. “I don’t care. Anything. John Smith.”

“I think we can do better than that. Besides, you’re not just choosing for yourself, you’re choosing for your kids, too.”

He started to shake his head, but it only made it pound harder. He gave it a few seconds, then said, “Once people know what happened...we can go...back. Be ourselves again.”

She gave him a sad, knowing smile. “I tell you what. Why don’t we just pretend it’s important for right now? Better safe than sorry, right?”

“Sure. Whatever,” he replied, thinking he’d just choose the first name that came to mind. “How about—”

She touched his hand, stopping him. “I have some choices for you.” She opened the folder. “Tell me which one of these grabs you. Tyler Wright, Harold Boyce, Adam Cooper, William Keys, or Samuel Hunter. Anything stand out?”

He honestly didn’t care at all. “The third one,” he said.

“Adam Cooper?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

He was silent for a moment. “Because I like the number three.”

She raised an eyebrow, then laughed softly to herself. “You’re sure?”

“Yes.”

She shrugged, rifled through the papers in the folder, and pulled one out. “All right, Mr. Cooper. Let’s see exactly who you are.”

KARL TRAINER COULD have just let it go, but he wasn't that kind of friend. Besides, his route took him near Hector Mendez's house anyway, so stopping for a quick check to see why his friend hadn't shown up for work wouldn't be that big of a deal.

When he got there, the first thing he noticed was Hector's car still parked out front. He'd been hoping that maybe they'd just missed each other on the highway, and Hector was already at the warehouse. Of course, it could have been that his friend was having car troubles and had gotten one of his neighbors to drive him in. That would definitely explain why he was late.

Sure, that had to be it.

Karl almost drove off, but, hell, he was here anyway. Might as well check. He went up to the door and knocked.

No answer.

"See? Not home," he said to himself.

As he took a step off the porch to head back to his rig, the nape of his neck began to tingle.

"Dammit," he said.

His wife called it his whoodoo-vooodoo. He'd get it every once in a while, a feeling that something wasn't right. The feeling itself wasn't always right, either. Still, there were enough times it was that he'd learned not to completely ignore it.

With an exasperated sigh, he decided to have a look around.

He'd been to Hector's enough times that he knew its layout. Contrary to most of the houses he'd lived in, the living room in Hector's place was in the back. Up front were the spare bedroom and the kitchen.

He skipped the window to the spare bedroom because he knew Hector only used it to store his mom's old stuff, and glanced into the kitchen. There was nothing unusual there. An empty beer bottle on the counter, but what house didn't have one of those now and then?

Hector's place was far enough out of town that he didn't need a fence. So Karl simply moved around the house and looked through the sliding glass door into the living room.

Nobody there. Nothing out of the ordinary. But that damn tingle wouldn't go away.

He moved along the back to the window that looked in on Hector's bedroom. The shade was pulled down, but the window was open about four inches so air could get inside.

"Hector?" he called through the gap.

Silence.

"He's not here," he said, trying to convince the tingle this was one of those times it was wrong. But it just kept burning away back there, in no apparent hurry to leave.

The screen over the window was loose, so it was a simple matter to pull it out a few inches, slip his hand behind it, and move the shade out of the way so he could take a look.

The room was dark, full of shadows, but the glow from the clock radio on the nightstand was bright enough that Karl could see someone lying on the bed. By the guy's shape, Karl was all but positive it was his friend.

"Hector, is that you? Buddy, what are you doing? It's after midnight. Hector. Hector! Wake up."

Hector didn't even twitch.

Karl's first thought was that his friend had had a heart attack. Hector did love his greasy burgers so it wouldn't be a huge surprise.

“Goddammit. I swear if you’re dead, I’m going to be pissed!”

Not knowing what else to do, Karl pulled the screen all the way off, pushed the window out of the way, and climbed through the opening. There was a dresser just on the other side, and as much as he tried to be careful, he ended up knocking a few things onto the floor before his feet reached the carpet.

“Sorry,” he said automatically.

Hector was lying on his side, facing away from him, so Karl moved around the bed, flicking on the bedroom light as he passed the switch.

It was Hector all right.

Karl put a hand on his friend’s shoulder, and was surprised at how cold Hector felt.

“You okay, man?” he said, shaking him.

He touched his friend’s neck, searching for a pulse. But there was nothing.

“Oh, God.”

He was too late. Hector had already passed. As he started to pull his hand back, he noticed a whole pile of tissues, half on the bed, half on the floor below it. Without even thinking about it, he leaned down to take a closer look, then suddenly stopped himself and took a step back.

The previous night had been his off night, which meant he’d gone to bed a lot earlier and gotten up around noon. While he’d been sitting around the living room, flipping through the channels on the TV, he couldn’t help but get sucked into the news about the deadly flu outbreak in Sage Springs. Some of the reporters were saying that so far anyone who caught the disease had died. By the evening, after his wife had come home and they were watching the news together, the reports gave the impression that the situation was under control.

But here was Hector, dead from what looked like the flu to Karl. And didn’t Hector’s route take him through Sage Springs?

He stumbled back further, falling to the floor, his hand touching something moist. Quickly, he pushed himself back to his feet, not taking the time to see what it was.

“Oh, Jesus. Oh, Jesus. Oh, Jesus.”

Facing the bed as if he expected Hector to rise out of it and attack him, he moved back to the window and scrambled outside.

There, he doubled over and rubbed his face as he tried to catch his breath. After several seconds, he stood up, knowing he had to get out of there. He raced to his truck and reached up to open the door. That’s when he saw it. The damp spot on the side of his hand. Water or...

...mucus. Hector’s snot.

Instantly he thought about the moist spot he’d touched when he fell.

Eyes wide in panic, he dropped to the ground and wiped his hand against the asphalt, but he knew it was already too late. He’d rubbed his hand across his face. It could have gotten in his eyes, his nose, his mouth. Hell, chances were he’d been infected the moment he stepped into the room.

“Unofficial sources have told me that, so far, no one who has caught this flu has survived.”

I’m a dead man.

Karl’s mother had been a saint, at least to him. She’d been the nicest, kindest person he’d ever known. “Just doing what’s right,” she’d say. “Don’t know how to live any other way.” Karl had learned from her example and tried to live that way, too. He was a good son, then later a good husband, and a good friend, as was evident by his trip to check on Hector.

Kneeling there beside his truck, he knew there was only one right thing he could do now.

He made three phone calls as he drove away. The first was to 911, reporting Hector’s death and warning them that it appeared to be related to the Sage Springs flu. The second was to work, telling them that Hector was sick and would be staying home, in case they were thinking about sending someone else out to check on him. He didn't mention his own plans, that he wouldn't be finishing his route, or, in fact, wouldn't even be starting it.

The third call was to his wife's cell phone. At that time of night, she would have turned it off, knowing if he were going to call, he'd use their landline. But he didn't want to talk to her. He just wanted to tell her he loved her one last time, so he said it to her voice mail, then turned off his phone and shoved it under his seat.

After that, he drove into the desert, away from the highway, and down a side road he was pretty sure no one would be on for several days. After he parked, he found a couple scraps of paper in the glove compartment and wrote two identical notes:

DEATH FLU VICTIM INSIDE DO NOT OPEN DOORS
CALL CDC

He then put them on the windows of both doors, and settled in.

If he were still feeling okay by noon the next day, he'd drive back into town and take whatever punishment the company decided to give him.

But punishment was unnecessary. Karl Trainer never did drive back into town.

UNLIKE KARL, THE THREE guys who'd had breakfast with Hector—Luis Chavez, Diego Ortega, and Al Rangel—were not blessed with the foreknowledge of what happened to them. So the virus that was believed to be contained in the small town of Sage Springs gained more and more of a foothold in Victorville with every person the three men came into contact with. This included, but was not limited to: the waitress and hostess at Kerry's Diner where they'd eaten, the customers at Ralph's supermarket between 11:41 a.m. and 12:03 p.m., Al Rangel's neighbor Charlie Fisher, and their respective spouses.

The disease then spread further through the eastern part of the city, clinging onto new hosts wherever it could. It was only by pure chance that none of those touched were heading over the hill into San Bernardino or Riverside or Orange County or Los Angeles. If that had happened, things could have gotten a whole lot worse.

Once again, Karl proved to be a hero. His call to 911 about Hector led to the entire town being shut down before sunrise, and the quarantine zone being expanded to a roughly triangular area that went from Victorville in the West, to China Lake in the North, to Barstow in the East.

When the calls of more sick and dead started coming in, at least it didn't catch anyone by surprise. And by luck and the quick work of the National Guard, the Victorville branch of the outbreak ran its course without spreading further.

Unfortunately, health officials in Victorville weren't the only ones who started receiving calls.

WHEN ASH WOKE the morning after his surgery, the pain in his head had become more of a throb—a huge, pounding throb. Pax was asleep in a chair in the corner. Apparently he'd been given the late shift.

Carefully, Ash swung his legs off the bed, then walked, painful step after painful step, to the bathroom. When he finally came back out, Pax was awake.

"I'd have helped you if you needed it," Pax said, getting out of his chair.

"I didn't need it. Where are my clothes?"

"You should lie down. Take it easy."

"Where...are they?"

Pax frowned and shook his head. "I'll get 'em." He opened the closet next to the bathroom, pulled out a set of clean clothes, and laid them on the bed. "I'll wait for you outside."

It took Ash fifteen minutes to get dressed. When he walked out of the room, he found Pax leaning against the wall in the hallway. "Looks like you'll live," Pax said, giving Ash the once-over. "Come on. Everyone's in the cafeteria."

Ash knew he wasn't a pretty sight. He'd taken a look at himself in the mirror, not because he was curious, but because he wanted to remember what the people who'd done this to his family had forced him to do. He wanted to remember the bandages, and the swollen face, and the bruises. He wanted to remember it all.

The cafeteria was more like a wide spot in the corridor than a room to itself. There were four long tables and, at the back, a counter that opened into a kitchen.

Matt, Rachel, and Billy were sitting together at one of the tables, while a woman Ash hadn't met before was sitting at the next one over, alone. She had coffee-colored skin and long, black hair. After a moment, he realized she might very well be the woman he'd seen doing shoulder exercises outside the day before.

In front of the tables was a TV on a cart. As soon as Ash and Pax walked up, Matt muted the volume, and the others got up and walked over to greet them. Everyone, that was, except the unknown woman.

"You should still be lying down," Billy reprimanded Ash.

"I think he looks fine," Rachel said. "How do you feel?"

"Sore," Ash told them. "But I'm not going to spend the day in bed."

Billy moved in close, examining the bandages and touching Ash's face. Twice, Ash winced.

"I can give you something for the pain," Billy offered.

"No."

Matt smiled. "You look fine to me. Well, except for your face. Come. Sit down."

As Ash took a seat, he glanced at the TV. They'd been watching the news.

"What happened while I was out?"

Rachel said, "Daniel Ash is officially a suspected terrorist."

He took a breath, trying to keep his anger in check, then nodded. "Just like you said."

On the screen, there was a shot of the desert. It was flat and brown and looked very much like the desert he'd seen on TV the previous day, and the desert he'd lived in for a month or so before...it happened.

The only difference today, though, was that instead of a steady shot, the picture was wildly jumping around. In the upper corner was a small graphic that read Earlier Today.

“What’s going on?” he asked, nodding at the screen.

Matt grabbed the remote and deactivated the mute.

Out of the speaker came the sounds of pounding feet, cloth rubbing against cloth, heavy breathing, and wind whipping across a microphone. Whoever was carrying the camera was running.

“Watch out! Bobby, Bobby. Watch out!” a female voice said.

The camera tilted quickly to the ground, revealing an offset crack in the asphalt. The cameraman seemed to take a hop step, then the image moved back up.

“This way,” the woman said.

As the lens turned to the left, the back of a young woman came into view. She glanced over her shoulder at the camera. It was the reporter Ash had watched on TV the day before.

“Just carry it, Bobby. You’re going to fall otherwise.”

The picture swung wildly for a few seconds, catching sky, then ground, then feet, before stabilizing at a lower angle. The girl was still in the picture, running just a few feet ahead. Visible now beyond her was a military helicopter. As the image moved a bit to the right, Ash realized there wasn’t just one helicopter, but several.

The woman looked back again, this time her gaze moving well beyond the camera. “Joe! Hurry up!”

There were uniformed soldiers standing outside the open doors of the helicopter. As soon as the reporter got there, one of the soldiers grabbed her arm and helped her up.

“All the way in, ma’am. All the way in,” he ordered.

When the cameraman got there, the procedure was repeated. Once more the image became chaotic, then settled back down and angled out the door the cameraman had just come through.

There were several dozen people running through the desert toward the helicopters. In the distance, Ash could see cars and media vans parked along the highway, and the same large military trucks that had been blocking the road since the previous day.

Seven people seemed to be heading for the cameraman’s helicopter. One of the soldiers took a few steps toward them.

“Only room for four more! Only four!” he yelled, holding up four fingers. He then pointed at the three people farthest away. “You, you, and you! Over there!” He directed them to a neighboring helicopter, but none of the three changed course. “No more room here! You’re over there!”

The four who were okayed to get on reached the helicopter and climbed aboard.

“Glad you could join us,” the reporter said to one of the men. Ash guessed he was probably the Joe she’d been yelling to earlier.

The other three were still coming, so the soldier who had been trying to redirect them got between them and the helicopter, then moved the rifle that had been slung over his shoulder into his hands. He wasn’t exactly pointing it at them, but he was making it clear he could.

“No. Room. Here. That one!” He tilted his head at the other aircraft.

This time the three stragglers got the message.

The soldier and his buddy who’d been outside with him jumped through the door, then yelled up front, “We’re good to go.”

Almost immediately the helicopter lifted off. There was a final bird’s-eye shot of the desert, with Sage Springs laid out in the distance, then the image on the screen switched to the anchor in the studio.

“Those startling images were taken by cameraman Bobby Lion. With him was PCN reporter Tamara Costello and their producer Joe Canavo. The video was shot earlier this morning as they were evacuated out of the expanded quarantine zone that now stretches over a large portion of the Mojave Desert in Eastern California. As a reminder, if you are watching us from within the quarantine zone, you are asked to stay in your homes until further advised and avoid contact with anyone other than those who are already in your home with you.”

“It’s spread?” Ash asked.

“Several cases reported in Victorville this morning,” Billy said. “That’s just northeast of L.A. They’re also calling it the Sage Flu now.”

“My God.”

“You’ll want to watch this,” Rachel said, still looking at the TV.

“...alert for this man.” The anchor had been replaced by the same picture of Ash the networks had already been showing. “Daniel Ash, a captain in the U.S. Army, is now thought to be behind this terrorist attack. His motives are unknown at this time, but sources do tell us he’d been showing signs of instability since returning from a tour of duty in Afghanistan. As we learned earlier this morning, this tragedy was made worse by the discovery that Ash apparently killed his own family prior to releasing the lethal virus.”

The image changed to a picture of Ash with Ellen, Josie and Brandon.

All Ash could do was stare at the screen. Any doubts he may have had about what Matt and the others had told him—gone. Completely.

“That’s enough,” he finally said, then stood up. “I want to get to work.”

“Sure,” Matt said. “But why don’t we get you some breakfast first?”

“I’m not hungry.”

“You’re going to need to eat something,” Billy said.

“I said I’m not hungry. So what’s next?”

Matt shared a look with Rachel, then glanced at Pax. “Weapons?”

“Sounds good to me,” Pax said. He rose to his feet and smiled at Ash. “How about a little target practice?”

“Lead the way.”

• • • •

THE DOOR PAX STOPPED in front of not only had two deadbolts, but also a thumbprint-recognition screen that released steel rods holding the door in place from above and below. Inside was the armory. Weapons hung on all the walls, while more were stored on shelves.

“Most of these never get used,” Pax explained. “They’re here more for education, so we’re familiar with anything we might come up against.”

“Are you guys like some sort of militia? Is that what this is?”

Pax was silent for a moment. “That’s really a hard question to answer. I guess in some people’s minds we might be called that. But our purpose isn’t to create our own little country, or take on the government, per se. But you should really talk to Matt about that. He’s the explainer. Me, I’d just mess it up.” He flashed a quick smile. “When was the last time you fired a handgun?”

“I don’t know. Four or five months ago.”

“How good are you?”

“Good enough. Better with a rifle.”

“Probably gonna want to avoid rifles for a while,” Pax said. “If that butt’s in your shoulder and it kicks off and hits you in the face, you will not be happy. Of course, you could have the same problem with a pistol if you can’t control the recoil.” He smiled again. “Break your nose all over again. That’s not my idea of fun.”

“Don’t worry. I can control the recoil.”

“Thought you could.” Pax smiled. “How about a little pistol refresher? Sound good to you?”

“Sure.”

Hanging on one wall were at least a hundred different handguns.

“The Army issue you an M9?” Pax asked.

“Yeah.”

“I could pull down one of those, if you like, but I prefer one of these three here.” Pax removed three pistols from the wall.

“I’m not married to the M9, so if you’ve got something better, great.”

Near the door were two floor-to-ceiling cabinets.

“Here,” Pax said, handing the guns to Ash.

With his hands free, Pax pulled a couple boxes of ammunition out of one of the cabinets. He then motioned Ash back into the hallway, and led him to the door on the opposite wall.

“Right in here,” he said as he unlocked the door and pulled it open.

Ash could sense the depth of the room even before Pax flipped on the lights and revealed a space that moved out from the door for at least fifty yards. Not too far in was a row of narrow dividers, and tracks along the ceiling that ran the length of the room. A classic indoor firing range.

Pax set the boxes of bullets on the shelf of the middle divider, then took the guns back. “As you might have noticed, we’ve got three compacts here, all nine millimeter like your old M9.” He set two of the guns down, then held up the third. “This one’s a Smith & Wesson M&P Compact. Twelve rounds plus one in the chamber. Trigger pull at six and a half pounds.” He put it down, and picked up the next one. “Glock 19. Fifteen rounds standard. Five and a half pounds on the trigger pull.” He replaced it with the last. “And this one’s the SIG SAUER P229. It holds thirteen rounds. Single-action trigger pull at four-point-four pounds. So, which would you like to try first?”

Ash decided to take them in order, starting with the Smith & Wesson. Although he had no problem controlling the kick, he could feel the first few shots all the way up his arms and into his head. Once he got going, though, the pain became more background noise than anything else.

Next he went to the Glock, then the SIG. After he took the last shot, Pax said, “So?”

Ash looked at the gun in his hand. “I like the feel of this one.”

“Good choice. One of my favorites. Of course, I’m partial to all three of them, so you couldn’t go wrong whichever way you went. You want to shoot some more?”

“Yes.” Ash popped the mag out and handed it to Pax. “I’d like to tighten up my groupings.”

With Pax’s help, by the time Ash had polished off the last round in the second box of ammo, his groupings at fifty feet could be covered by a dollar bill.

“It’s a good start,” Pax said.

“Get another box.”

Pax looked at him, surprised. “Don’t want to take a break?”

Ash released the mag into his hand. “No.”

As he plowed through the third box of bullets, he pictured the face of Dr. Karp on the target.

This time, his groupings were much better.

THE MEMBERS OF the media who'd been covering the roadblock at Sage Springs were flown to Fort Irwin Army base outside Barstow, California. Technically, they were still in the quarantine zone, but so far there had been no known cases in Barstow or on the base.

There, Tamara was able to learn that contingents of soldiers had been sent east on I-40 and northeast on I-15 to turn back motorists coming in from Arizona and Las Vegas. She'd also had an interesting, off-the-record conversation with one soldier who'd said the roadblocks had already dealt with several irate drivers insisting that they didn't have time to drive all the way to the I-10 to get to L.A. so they should be let through. Many promised to "keep their windows rolled up" and "not make any stops," while a couple of people had even gotten out of their cars and tried to physically intimidate the highway patrol officers who were handling most of the problems. Needless to say, those individuals had been arrested and taken east to a jail just on the other side of the Nevada border.

Even having learned all that, Tamara was frustrated. The Army was not allowing them to go anywhere. It was like the media were prisoners on the base, stuck with whatever news the Army decided to give them.

To add to her annoyance, her brother still hadn't gotten back to her. He'd given her that great lead then poof—disappeared. She'd just tried to call him again, but when she got his voice mail once more, she'd hung up and called her parents.

"Tammy, please tell me everything's fine," her mother said. The last time Tamara could call them had been the previous day right after the news broke. "We've been glued to the TV every second we've been awake. They keep showing that part where you and your friends are running to the helicopters. I wish they'd stop that. It nearly gives me a heart attack every time."

"Mom, just turn it off when it comes on," Tamara said. "Or just switch to another channel."

"I couldn't do that. Your ratings."

Tamara's mom had it in her mind that every single household was monitored and counted in a network's ratings. Even if that were true, PCN's ratings wouldn't have suffered from the temporary loss of one viewer. Especially not now, when Tamara was sure that if a TV was on somewhere, it was tuned to one of the news channels.

"Mom, have you heard from Gavin?"

"No, dear. But you know your brother. He gets tunnel vision. Probably working on a project."

Tamara frowned. He did get tunnel vision at times, but he'd never let her down like this before. "Okay. Thanks. That's all I wanted to know."

"Tammy?" her dad said. He'd obviously been listening in on the other line. "Have you talked to your boss? They need to get you out of there. You're right in the middle of everything."

"I'm a news correspondent, Dad. I'm always in the middle of things. Besides, everything's fine here. The closest outbreak is at least fifty miles away."

"But you never know, sweetie. The sooner you get out of there, the better your mother and I are going to feel."

"Don't worry so much. I'll be fine." She noticed Joe trying to wave her over to where the majority of the media was hanging out. "Look, I've got to go. I love you."

"We love you, too," her mother said.

"Very much," her dad added.

“Okay. Bye.”

She hung up, then hurried over to her producer. “What’s up?”

“Just got off the phone with Irene,” he whispered. Irene was their boss in New York. “She says they’ve been negotiating with the Army to get us taken out to the I-15 roadblock.”

“That’s great!”

“What’s great?” Peter Chavez, a reporter with one of the wire services, turned and asked.

“Uh, nothing, Peter,” Joe said, then smiled. “Just...telling Tammy about what I’m getting my wife for her birthday.”

Peter didn’t look convinced. “Really?”

“Yeah,” Tamara said, trying to cover her mistake. “He’s taking her to Paris. Isn’t that cool?”

Peter frowned. “Guess salaries are nicer over there at Generic Cable News.”

“I guess they are,” Joe replied. He then grabbed Tamara’s arm and moved her away from the crowd. “What an ass.”

“When will we know about going to the roadblock?” she whispered.

“I’m not sure. Soon, I hope.”

Not too far away, a TV had been set up under a canopy so that people with nothing to do could watch. The screen suddenly filled with some jumpy, low-quality video, catching Tamara’s eye.

“What’s that?” she asked.

Joe looked over and shook his head. “I don’t know.”

Quickly they both made their way to the back of the group watching the television.

“Bobby,” Tamara said, noticing her cameraman a couple people ahead of her.

When he turned, she motioned for him to join them in the back.

As soon as he moved in beside her, she asked, “What is that?”

“Somebody just uploaded it to the Internet,” he said. “Some sort of skirmish at a roadblock just east of Tehachapi.”

Tehachapi was west of the town of Mojave, which was in the quarantine zone, and east of Bakersfield, which was not.

The footage looked like it had been shot on a camera phone. There were several dozen people pushing and shoving. Most were civilians, but there were a few people in uniforms, too.

This went on for several seconds, then a face flashed across the screen that caused Tamara to jerk back, startled.

It was Gavin, or someone who sure looked a hell of a lot like him. She pushed her way through the crowd so she could get closer to the screen.

Whoever was holding the camera seemed to be moving slightly away from the crowd. She could see the whole mob now, pushing and shoving at each other. She tried to find the guy who looked like Gavin, but didn’t see him.

A voice cut over the video, distorted by the poor quality of the camera’s microphone.

“Most of these guys...I think have family...in the...zone.” The speaker’s voice was punctuated by deep breaths. “They want to get in...but...the soldiers are...trying to push them...back. It looks like some...people are getting through.”

The shot zoomed in on a small group that was trying to go around the end of the roadblock while the soldiers were busy with the larger crowd. Suddenly several members of the big group saw what was happening and took off after the others, no doubt hoping that they, too, could get through. The trickle became a stream, then a river.

At the edge of the pack, two soldiers went down. As soon as their colleagues saw this, they opened fire.

“Oh, my God!” someone standing near Tamara yelled out as civilians started falling to the ground.

But Tamara couldn't even speak. She had seen Gavin again. He was wearing one of the shirts she'd given him for Christmas. And when the chaos was at its height, it looked very much like a bullet had hit him, too. Only unlike the others, he hadn't fallen away from the roadblock, but toward it, like he'd been shot from the other direction. And then there was the look on his face a moment before he went down, a look of disorientation and confusion.

Like he had no idea what he was doing there in the first place.

The pressure in her head built until she could almost take it no more. How she didn't scream, she had no idea.

THERE WAS ANOTHER CONFERENCE call at noon. Since this one had been arranged ahead of time, they were connected via video chat. Though both Dr. Karp and Major Ross were at the Marin County location, each was in his own office. Shell was in a hotel room somewhere near the quarantine zone, and the Director of Preparation was at Bluebird. Of course the DOP's feed was blacked out. The project's number one guideline was that the members of the Bluebird Directorate were to remain anonymous.

“Dr. Karp, do you have the latest statistics on the outbreak?” the DOP asked.

The doctor leaned forward a few inches. “I talked to our source at the CDC five minutes ago, so the numbers I'm about to give you are as up to date as possible. Dead—three hundred and twenty-one. Currently infected—five hundred and seventeen. This information, of course, has not been released to the public yet. But I doubt they will be getting any—”

“That's enough for the moment,” the DOP said, cutting him off. “Mr. Shell, your update, please.”

“Yes, sir,” Shell said, adjusting himself in his chair. “On the quarantine front, state and military officials have a pretty good handle on containment for the majority of the population. Fortunately, the outbreak occurred in an open and underpopulated area.”

“It was not fortunate, Mr. Shell,” Dr. Karp broke in. “It was by design. Why do you think we chose Barker Flats in the first place?”

“Thank you, doctor,” the DOP said. “Mr. Shell, please continue.”

Shell took a loud, annoyed breath, then said, “As you know, our strategy is one of plugging the holes the official response can't handle. With your help, Director, I have my main team using Fort Irwin in Barstow as its base. Thank you for making that happen.” He paused, but the DOP said nothing. “I, uh, also have a team set up at a private airfield north of Victorville. Using thermal satellite imagery, we have been able to track in real time individuals who've tried to get out of the zone over the open desert. So far there have been twenty-eight attempts, and my people have stopped all of them.” There was no need for him to say what stopping meant. They all knew he was tasked with removing problems, not jailing them.

“Do you have any idea how many of those were actually infected?”

“Obviously, we wouldn't be able to know that without proper tests, but I can say with confidence that six showed outward signs of KV-27a infection. My teams continue to monitor the intel, and are ready to move on any new escape attempts at a moment's notice.”

“It's critical that no one gets out,” the DOP said.

“Yes, sir. Of course.”

“Please continue.”

“Yes, sir. There was the matter of the reporter’s brother.”

“Yes. Gavin Costello. A mistake to pick him up in the first place.”

Shell looked uncomfortable. “Yes, sir. Things were a little fluid at that point, and there was no telling what he might dig up for his sister.”

“Mr. Shell, I’m not fond of glossing over mistakes. There was nothing for him to dig up that would have harmed us. It was a mistake from the beginning.”

“Yes, sir.”

Dr. Karp kept his expression neutral, but inside he was laughing as Shell squirmed.

“Continue your report.”

“Concerning Gavin Costello. Unfortunately, we couldn’t just let him go, especially given his sister’s high-profile job. Elimination was the only answer. We started spreading a rumor among people who were stranded in the Bakersfield area that the roadblock east of Tehachapi was going to be opened. When they arrived and found that it was still closed and would remain so, with the prodding of some of my men scattered within the group, they rioted. As soon as the military opened fire, one of my men eliminated Mr. Costello. When he is finally identified, his presence can easily be explained as concern for his sister.”

“And Ash?” the DOP asked.

“As you know we traced the original car to a parking garage at a casino in Nevada. I then gave a team instructions to trace the paths of every car that left that garage in the following four hours.”

Shell’s face was replaced by a thermal satellite image. Along the left side was a busy freeway running basically from bottom to top. It was covered with dozens of bright, warm blobs indicating vehicles.

“Please notice the spot near the midpoint of the picture. This is the most likely candidate.”

The spot in question was down an empty road that led off from the freeway. It was faint, but definitely warmer than the surrounding area.

“We were able to trace this car from the casino to this point. The heat signature you are looking at was generated by a person sitting inside a car. When it arrived here, there were two people, one up front, and one lying in the back. The driver got out, walked to the road, and was picked up three minutes later.” He then explained how the person in back got out, and eventually took a seat up front. He showed another picture. In this one, a larger vehicle was parked next to the smaller one. “The man transferred to the new vehicle and they left.”

“Were you able to follow it, too?” the DOP asked.

Shell hesitated. “We were able to follow them south for about twenty minutes. But we experienced a transmission problem that took us off line for an hour. In that gap, we lost them.”

“So you’re no closer to finding him now than you were earlier.”

“We are very hopeful that Dr. Karp’s suggestion of exposing Ash through the media will work,” Shell said, surprising Karp with his implied praise. “At the very least, it will be a long time before he can ever show his face again. Which means he’ll be unable to cause us any problems.”

“We don’t want that to be a reason for you to stop looking, though,” the DOP said.

“Of course not. It’s a top priority.”

“Have we figured out yet who was behind his escape?”

“By the level of organization involved, I think we’re dealing with the same people who aided Lauren Scott last year.”

Lauren Scott? The doctor hadn’t thought of her in a while.

“Thank you, Mr. Shell. You and Major Ross are excused.”

“Yes, sir,” Major Ross said.

“Thank you, sir,” Mr. Shell replied.

A moment later, Connection Terminated appeared where both of their faces had been.

“Dr. Karp,” the DOP said.

The doctor straightened in his chair. “Yes, sir?”

“First, progress on the vaccine?”

“As I’ve stated before, these things take time, but we feel like we’re getting very close now.”

“And the problem with the different reactions between the sexes?”

“We’re confident that we’ll have that solved shortly.”

“Good. See that it is,” the DOP said. “Now, about the virus. I do not want Mr. Shell privy to any of the...safeguards. Is that understood?”

“Yes, sir,” the doctor said, a bit unsure. “May I ask why, sir?”

There was no response for a moment, then, “Let’s just say that your virus is not the only thing that’s being tested.”

Before Dr. Karp could say anything else, the black screen that represented the Director of Preparation was suddenly replaced by the words Connection Terminated.

THE ORDERLY WAS glad that they'd finally decided to room his two patients together. It had decidedly improved both their spirits, and made keeping an eye on them easier for him.

He watched them in the monitor, talking to each other.

The boy was sitting on his sister's bed. He usually did that. The girl, while markedly improved, was still taking her time fully recovering. She tired easily, and still wasn't eating enough to remove the IV from her arm.

The orderly turned up the volume so he could hear.

"...mise?" the boy asked.

"Of course."

"Then I promise, too."

She held out her arms and he fell into them, letting her hug him tight.

A few tears rolled down the boy's face, but the orderly could see that he was attempting to be strong, attempting to be an adult years before he should even think about it.

"If they try," the boy said, "I won't let them."

"I won't let them, either," his sister told him. "We only have each other now, so we have to stick together."

The boy nodded. Several moments passed, then he said, "Do you really think there's a heaven?"

She stroked his head. "Yes, of course."

"So Mom and Dad are there? Thinking about us?"

"I think they're thinking about us as much as we're thinking about them."

"I'm thinking about them all the time."

"Exact—"

The orderly turned the sound down, wishing he had done so sooner.

PAUL UNGER AND NICK Regan were half-brothers and best friends. Paul was a year older than Nick, and though he had an on-again, off-again relationship with his birth father, he really considered Nick's dad his, too.

While they lived in Randsburg, California, Paul and Nick attended high school twenty-five miles away in Ridgecrest. That meant they had to get up earlier every morning than most people in town so they could catch the bus.

The morning of the quarantine, their mom, as she always did, flipped on the TV to catch the news while they ate breakfast. Even at that early hour, the quarantine had already been enlarged.

"Sarge!" their mom had yelled. "Sarge, quick! You have to see this."

Their dad—Nick's biological and Paul's chosen—rushed into the kitchen, pulling a robe over the gym shorts and T-shirt he usually slept in.

"What is it?"

She turned up the television, and the four of them watched with growing horror as the news reported the expanding outbreak and the new quarantine zone. When a map showing the actual boundary lines of the zone appeared on the screen, the true realization of their situation hit home.

"That's us, Dad," Nick said. "We're in the zone."

On the screen, the anchor said, “The CDC is asking all those in the Sage Flu quarantine zone to remain in their homes, and to avoid contact with anyone else. If you have questions, or are in need of medications, medical attention, or do not have enough food in your house, an 800 number has been set up to provide assistance.” The promised number appeared on the screen.

Nick smiled. “I guess this means the bus isn’t coming.”

“Even if it does, you’re not getting on it,” his mother said, taking him more seriously than he meant.

Paul glanced at his stepdad. “The people who are sick are a long way away from here. Why are they making us stay inside?”

Sarge had come into marriage and family after spending twenty years in the Army, so he was a bit older father than most of the kids had. He was also a bit more experienced, having traveled the world and worked in, among other places, several base hospitals. So although Sarge didn’t have a medical degree, Paul knew his stepdad might actually know the answer, or at least have an educated guess.

But if he did, he kept it to himself, because he only said, “They’re probably just being cautious.”

In a way, that answer scared Paul more than something concrete would have.

With little else to do, they, like most of the people in the zone, stayed indoors glued to the television. So they were all sitting in the living room in the early afternoon when the video of the Tehachapi roadblock riot was played. As soon as it ended, Sarge picked up the remote and turned the TV off.

The others looked at each other, confused, then Nick said, “Dad?”

Sarge stared at the television screen, saying nothing.

“Dad, what is it?”

After another moment, Sarge took a deep breath, then looked around at his family.

“Boys, can you give your mother and me a moment, please?”

“Why?” Paul asked. “What is it?”

“Please,” Sarge said again.

“Sure,” Nick said, standing. “Sure. No problem. Come on, Paul.”

Paul hesitated a second, looking at Sarge, then rose and followed his brother into the hallway that led to their shared bedroom. Nick was going to head all the way back, but as soon as they were out of their parents’ sight, Paul grabbed his brother’s arm, put a finger to his own lips and said, “Shhhh.” He pulled Nick down to the floor, and they crawled back to the open end of the hallway to listen.

“You can’t know that,” their mother said, sounding scared.

“Vonda, this is going to get worse before it gets better, maybe a lot worse. They want us to stay in our homes, but we’re still sitting ducks here. The only way we can insure the boys don’t get sick is to get them out of here, out of this zone.”

“They’re shooting people who were trying to get in. They won’t even think twice about doing the same to someone trying to get out.”

“I’ve been thinking about that, and I think I might know a way.”

“What way are you talking about?” she asked.

“Better if I tell them at the same time.”

“I don’t know. I’d rather they just stay here.”

“Sweetheart, we can’t argue about this. It’s our boys’ lives we’re talking about. If they stay here, I think there’s a good chance they’re going to die.”

There was silence for a moment, then, “Okay.”

Sarge suddenly raised his voice. “Boys?”

Paul motioned for Nick to crawl back down the hallway with him.

“Boys! Come back out here!”

Once they reached the door to their room, Paul said, “What?”

“Come out here,” Sarge said. “Your mother and I need to talk to you.”

A few seconds later, they were all sitting around the living room.

“I think the news people aren’t telling us everything,” Sarge began. “My guess is they probably haven’t even been told themselves. Here’s the thing. I think this illness is a lot worse than they’re making it out to be. The reason we’re in the zone now is because someone who was sick must have passed through this area at some point. That means there’s a chance someone right here in town is infected, maybe more than one.” He looked down at his hands for a second, then back at the boys. “The bottom line is, you can’t stay here. If you do, you might die. Part of our jobs as parents is doing everything we can to keep our kids alive. So I want you two to get out of the quarantine area.”

“What about you and Mom?” Nick asked. “You’re coming with us, right?”

“My hip would never make it,” Sarge said. It was something that had bothered him for years. “And your mother...”

He seemed unable to finish, so their mom said, “I’d only slow you down.”

“No, you wouldn’t,” Nick argued.

But they all knew she would. Their mom had put on some weight over the years. Not enough to be called fat, but enough to make her winded after a long walk.

“She’s staying with me,” Sarge said. “That’s not open for discussion.”

He pushed himself out of his recliner and went over to the desk in the corner. He searched through several of the drawers before he found what he was looking for and came back.

It turned out to be a map of Eastern California. He unfolded it and spread it out on the coffee table.

“You’ll take your dirt bikes. We’ll top off the gas from the tank in the car. Then you’ll head out this way.” He drew a path east across the map, toward Nevada.

“There’s no road there,” Nick said.

“I think that’s the point,” Paul told him.

“They’ll be expecting people to head west or south,” Sarge said. “That’s where the cities are. And you can’t go north because China Lake’s right up there. The Navy will have that whole area blocked off. They’ll never think anyone would go east.” He tapped the map. “When you get past this point, you’ll be out of the zone. Get on the first road you see, and keep going into Nevada. When you get there, keep a low profile, and don’t let anyone know where you’re from.”

“I’ll put some food together,” their mom said, already heading toward the kitchen. “You can carry it in one of your backpacks.”

“You’ll need some money,” Sarge said. “I got about five hundred dollars stashed away. I’ll give that to you. But I don’t know how long you’re going to be out there on your own, so make it last.”

“We will,” Paul said.

Nick stared at his brother. “We’re really going to do this? We’re going to leave them?”

“Yes. You are,” Sarge said before Paul could reply. “Now go get changed. You’re going to need some warm clothes. The nights still get cold.” As they headed toward the back, he added, “And bring your sleeping bags.”

SARGE DECIDED THEY should wait until just after sunset to leave. When the time finally came, the boys rolled their dirt bikes out of the garage. Paul's was an old Honda, while Nick's was an even older Yamaha, both 125s. Each boy was wearing two T-shirts, a sweater, a jacket, a pair of jeans, and long johns.

"Promise me you won't ride without your helmets," their mother said.

"We won't," Paul told her.

"And you'll call us once you're out."

"Yes. Yes."

Though they were carrying their cell phones, chances were they wouldn't have a signal out in the middle of the desert. But even if they did, Sarge told them not to use the phones until they were out of the zone, in case someone could track them.

Nick and Paul both hugged their mom.

"Remember, walk your bikes through town," Sarge said. "Don't start 'em up until you reach the other side of the highway. Better if nobody knows you've gone."

"Yes, sir," Paul said.

Sarge shook hands with his sons. "You guys take care of each other. Now, get a move on it."

Their house was on the western edge of town. The boys walked their bikes to the street, turned and gave their parents a long, final wave before heading east.

Randsburg was deathly quiet as they moved through town. It wasn't a big place to begin with, but there was usually someone outside at this time of the evening. But if not for the lights in several of the windows, it would have seemed like the place was deserted.

As they neared the western end, Paul said, "I need to make a stop first."

Nick looked at him for a moment, then his eyes widened in understanding. He shook his head. "Dad said no stops."

"I don't care. I'm not leaving without telling her goodbye."

"I don't think that's a good idea."

"Then keep going, and I'll catch up to you."

Nick stopped. "I'm not going without you."

"And I'm not going without talking to her," Paul said, halting beside him.

They stared at each other for several seconds, then Nick said, "Fine. But make it quick, okay?"

Paul smiled, and started pushing his bike again. "Sure. No problem."

As they walked up to Lisa Jennings's house, Paul sent her a text telling her to come outside, but not to tell anyone. Less than sixty seconds later, the kitchen door opened and she stepped out.

As soon as she saw Paul, she ran over and threw her arms around him.

"I'm so scared," she said.

"We all are," Paul told her.

They held each other for a few minutes, kissing a couple times, but mostly hugging. Finally, she noticed that Nick was there, too, then she saw the motorcycles and her face scrunched in confusion.

"What are you guys doing with your motorcycles? You heard everyone's supposed to stay home, right?"

"Uh, yeah," Paul said. "We know."

"Then what are you doing?"

"Come on. We got to go," Nick said.

"Go where?" Lisa asked.

Paul glanced at Nick.

Nick shook his head, then leaned toward his brother and whispered, “Dad doesn’t want anyone to know we left, remember?”

“She won’t tell,” Paul said, not bothering to lower his voice.

“Tell what?” Lisa asked.

Paul hesitated only a moment before he spilled the whole plan to her. If he couldn’t trust Lisa, whom could he trust?

As soon as he finished, she said, “I’m coming with you.”

“I don’t think that’s a good idea. It’s going to be dangerous.”

“As dangerous as hanging around here waiting for the Sage Flu to get me?”

Nick stood silently by his bike, saying nothing, but the look on his face clearly showed he didn’t think Lisa coming along was a good idea.

“What about your parents?” Paul asked.

“Dad’s not even here. Got stuck in L.A. when this thing happened.” She tilted her head toward the house. “Mom doesn’t have to go to work at the motel tonight, so she’s been drunk off her ass all day. Finally passed out thirty minutes ago. She won’t notice.” She looked over at Nick. “I don’t want to stay here. I don’t want to die.”

Nick frowned, but then he nodded and said, “Okay.”

Five minutes later, as the three of them were walking down the road toward the highway, Lisa’s mother, still passed out on the couch, coughed.

ASH WOKE THIRTY minutes before dawn. In the bathroom, he peeled off most of the bandages that covered his head. His face was still swollen, though much less so than it had been the previous day. Bruises still encircled his eyes and covered his cheeks. Those, he knew, would be with him long after the swelling disappeared.

He studied himself in the mirror, trying to figure out what he would look like once trauma caused by the surgery had passed, but his imagination failed him. He'd have two eyes, two ears, a nose, and a mouth. Ultimately, that was all that was important.

After shooting practice the previous day, Pax had given him an extensive tour of the subterranean facility, and set him up with access to the computer room and the well-equipped gym.

The gym was where he headed as he exited his room at 5:45 a.m.

He was surprised to find someone else already there. It was the woman from the day before, the one he'd seen in the cafeteria but hadn't met yet.

She'd been doing stomach crunches as he walked in, but the second she heard him her head whipped around like he'd scared her.

"Sorry," he said. He took a few steps in her direction. "I'm Ash."

As she got off the bench, he thought she was going to walk over and shake his hand, but instead, she headed quickly to the wall, made her way around him in as wide an arc as she could, then exited the room without saying a word.

He stared after her, confused, but ultimately she wasn't important. There was work to do.

He had to be selective in what exercises he did so he wouldn't rupture the stitches that seemed to cover his head, but he was still able to get in a good workout.

After a shower, he went back to the firing range and spent two hours working with the SIG. His groupings had gotten to the point where they were consistent from set to set.

His next stop was the cafeteria for breakfast. Bobbi was in the kitchen, apparently on temporary assignment from upstairs. She made him an omelet with bacon and toast on the side. As he was finishing up, Pax arrived, holding a sweatshirt in his hand.

"Just took a look at your work on the range," Pax said. "We're going to have to offer you a place on our target shooting team."

Ash glanced at him, then returned his attention to his food.

"Bobbi, you got some more eggs back there?" Pax called out.

"You already had your breakfast upstairs," she told him.

"Doesn't mean I'm not still hungry."

"Doesn't mean I have to cook for you again, either."

Pax made a sour face toward the kitchen. "It's not like I have time to eat anymore anyway." He looked at Ash's plate. "You done?"

"Why? You want this?"

There was still half a piece of uneaten toast, but Pax shook his head.

"No. I need to take you up to see Matt."

As they walked toward the stairs, Pax handed the sweatshirt to Ash. "Put this on."

The sweatshirt was zip-up style with a hood. Ash figured it must be a little cold topside, so he did as Pax instructed.

"Hood, too," Pax told him.

“Why?”

“In case anyone’s watching.”

“Watching?”

“You’d be surprised how good surveillance is these days. Can see right through a window from miles away.”

“That sounds a little paranoid.”

“Welcome to our world.”

At Matt’s office, Pax opened the door for Ash, but didn’t go inside with him.

Matt was the only one there, sitting at his desk and writing something in a hardbound notebook.

He looked up. “You’re looking better today.”

“Not as good as I’d like,” Ash said.

“I can understand that. Have a seat.”

Matt wrote something else in the notebook, then closed it and leaned back, considering Ash.

“What?” Ash asked. “Has something happened?”

Two quiet seconds passed. “The guy who helped you get out of Barker Flats wasn’t our only inside source.” He paused, then put his forearms on the desk and leaned forward. “We got a message this morning from another one of our people that appears to indicate time might be getting short for your kids.”

“What was the message?” Ash asked quickly.

“The number four.”

Ash furrowed his brow.

“It’s simple code,” Matt went on. “It means danger.”

“Can you find out what kind of danger?”

“It doesn’t work that way. This was all he was in a position to tell us.”

“At the very least, can he give us their location?”

Matt was silent for a moment. “We’re pretty sure we already know where they are.”

“What? You know?”

“You’ll leave in three hours.”

Pushing his chair back and standing, Ash said, “I need to leave now!”

“That’s as soon as our plane can get back here. If you leave now, you’d still get there quicker if you wait. I know it’s not easy, but we can use the time to finish prepping you as best we can.”

Matt pressed a button on his desk phone.

There was a single ring, then Rachel’s voice said, “Are you ready?”

“Yes. Bring her in.” He hung up, then looked back at Ash. “Sit down. Please. I promise you we’re doing everything we can.”

It took all of Ash’s effort to lower himself into the seat. Moments after he did, the door opened, and Rachel and the girl from the gym entered.

The girl’s long black hair had been pulled into a ponytail when she’d been working out, but now, except for a strand she twisted nervously in her fingers, it hung free over her shoulders.

Rachel had a hand on the woman’s back, urging her across the room. As they neared, Ash stood. Instantly, the woman took a quick step back.

One of what? Ash wanted to ask, but he held it in, not wanting to scare the woman again.

Finally, Chloe gave Rachel a nod.

“Good,” Rachel said in a calm voice. “Chloe, this is...” She stopped and looked at Ash. “What do you want to be called? Adam? Cooper?”

“Ash, if it’s all right by you,” he said.

She smirked. “Your call.” To Chloe, she said, “His name is Adam Cooper, but he apparently goes by Ash. Ash, this is Chloe White.”

“Hello,” he said, trying to keep his voice gentle.

Chloe cringed a bit, but didn’t retreat. “Hi.” There was a momentary lull, then she said, “You’re not one of them, are you?”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

Chloe motioned at Rachel and Matt. “They say you’re in the Army.”

“Yes...well, I don’t know now. Maybe.”

“Some of them are in the Army. Not a lot, but some.”

Ash looked her in the eyes. “I’ve only been in the Army. Nothing else.”

“You’re sure?”

“Absolutely.”

She nodded to herself several times. “Okay, okay. I’m sorry. I just...I don’t want to...go back, you know?”

“Go back where?” Ash asked.

“It doesn’t matter. I don’t want to think about it. Please don’t make me think about it.”

“Come on, Chloe,” Rachel said quickly. “There are a few things we need to take care of before you leave.”

Chloe allowed herself to be led back to the door. Once there, she turned to Ash and said, “Nice to meet you. I’m sorry. I’m not...I’m not always like this.”

As soon as she and Rachel were gone, Ash looked at Matt. “What was that all about?”

“She’ll be going with you.”

“Her? Why?”

“She’s your guide.”

Ash stared at him. “Did you not just see her?”

“She’s the only one familiar with the facility your children are in.”

Ash glanced back at the door. “This girl can really help me?”

“Yes. She can.” Matt paused. “You need to understand that these people did something to her while she was with them. She used to be strong, uncompromising, but they broke her before we could get to her. Piece by piece she’s putting it back together, but it’s slow. Most of her life...well, let’s just say that it’s like she’s starting out again. Sometimes she slips. Maybe we shouldn’t have told her you were in the Army, but it was better it came out now than later. She’ll be okay.”

“If she’s taking me to where these people are, isn’t there a danger she’ll slip again?”

Matt hesitated. “Perhaps. But you were a surprise to her, an unknown. She already knows what to expect where you’re both going.”

“Are any of the rest of you coming?”

“I wish we could. This...outbreak has stretched our resources. We’re already working with a skeleton crew here. If any of us leaves, it’ll make it all that more difficult to support the rest of our organization, and many are in just as much danger as you will be.”

Ash couldn’t help but frown. “I’m having a hard time understanding just what your purpose is.”

“Do you want to know? Because we’ll tell you if you do. It’s pretty heavy stuff, though.” He paused, thoughtful for a moment. “Your children are your goal right now. Anything we tell you will only distract from that. It's your choice.”

Several silent seconds went by.

Matt was right. Until Josie and Brandon were with him, Ash didn't need anything else clouding up his mind.

“Tell me about where they're keeping my kids.”

THE DESERT WAS tricky, even more so in the moonless night with their headlamps off. But Paul, with Lisa sitting behind him, and Nick didn't have much of a choice. The only thing they could do was keep their speed down, and hope they didn't hit any of the random holes and ruts too hard.

At midnight, they found a small canyon and stopped. About fifty feet in was a rock overhang, so they decided to use it as shelter and get a few hours of sleep.

Because none of them thought to set an alarm on their cell phone, those few hours turned into almost seven. By the time Paul opened his eyes, the sky was blue, and the warmth of the early spring day had already pushed back the cold of the night.

"Ah, crap!" he yelled, then nudged Lisa, who was sharing his sleeping bag with him. "Hey, baby, we got to get up."

She groaned, but didn't open her eyes.

"Come on, Lisa. It's already late."

"Just a little longer," she said, her voice low and raspy.

He gave her a kiss. "One minute. That's it."

"You're so generous."

He crawled out of the bag without unzipping it, then scrambled over to where Nick was sleeping and shook his shoulder.

"Time to get up."

Nick tried to turn away from him.

"Come on, Nick. We overslept."

His brother opened one eye halfway. "It's morning already?"

"We should have been gone four hours ago," Paul told him.

Nick grunted and rolled onto his back.

Now that Paul knew the other two were basically up, he went over to his backpack, took out one of the sandwiches his mom had made, then all but inhaled it. Since their water was limited, he was careful to drink only a few ounces.

Nick and Lisa were both sitting up now, neither looking particularly eager to get going.

"Come on," Paul said. "We've got to move!"

"All right, all right," Nick said. "I'm up."

He unzipped his sleeping bag and rolled out.

"Me, too," Lisa said.

"I don't want to stop for a while," Paul told them, "so eat something. I'm going to go see if I can get above the rim and figure out where we are."

Nick gave him a halfhearted wave of acknowledgment, then held out a hand to help Lisa out of her bag.

Paul scanned the canyon. Near the back he saw that part of the wall had crumbled down, creating a difficult but not impossible ramp to the top. He jogged over and carefully climbed up the slope.

He was just nearing the top when a rhythmic noise began, echoing through the canyon. He looked around, trying to spot the source, but though it kept getting louder and louder, he couldn't see anything that might be causing it.

Nick stepped out from under the overhang, looked up at Paul, then lifted his shoulders and held out his hands, silently asking what was making the noise. Paul, having no answer, repeated the gesture back.

He was about ten feet from the top of the ramp, and thought maybe he could see whatever it was from up there. But the moment he started to climb again, two helicopters streaked low across the sky just beyond the edge of the canyon. As soon as they passed the open end, they turned and descended to the ground.

There was no question in Paul's mind why they were here.

"Hide!" he yelled down at Lisa and Nick.

There was no way they could hear him above the whirl of the helicopters, but they'd obviously had the same thought. They began running through the canyon toward the crumbled ramp.

Paul looked quickly around, then slipped into a crack between two large clumps of dirt, keeping his head elevated just enough so he could see over the top.

Six men piled out of the helicopters, three from each, and began running into the canyon. Paul wasn't sure what was scarier: their rifles, or the full bio-protective suits they were wearing.

He looked down the ramp for Lisa and his brother, but it was too uneven, so while he could hear them scrambling on the slope, he couldn't see them.

Two of the armed men stopped near the bikes by the overhang, while the other four continued toward the back of the canyon.

"Stop!" one of them yelled, his voice distorted by his suit.

Paul heard Lisa and Nick stop climbing, and knew they'd been caught.

Dammit! Sarge was not going to be happy.

He watched the men, expecting them to move in and herd Lisa and Nick away, but instead, two of them raised their rifles.

No! No! No! They've stopped! They've stopped!

Paul started to open his mouth to yell exactly that, but before the words could even reach his lips, the men fired. The double boom ricocheted off the canyon walls, but what Paul didn't hear was more upsetting. Neither Lisa nor his brother yelled out.

As the men lowered their guns, Paul felt as if the earth had just swallowed him up. He watched all four men walk over to the ramp, then pass out of his line of sight. He could hear them moving around and talking quietly amongst themselves. When they reappeared on the canyon floor, two had Nick slung between them, and two had Lisa.

His brother.

His girlfriend.

Both of them clearly dead.

Paul stared down at them, hardly able to process what he was seeing.

No one was going to believe this. No one would ever believe helicopters had found them in the middle of the desert and—

His hand snapped down to his pants pocket, and he pulled out his cell phone. He turned it on, and worried for a moment the people would disappear before it started up. But he was in luck, if you could call it that. They set the bodies down near the base of the ramp, while one of the two who'd stayed near the motorcycles ran back to the helicopters. The man returned a few moments later with a clump of black plastic.

As soon as Paul's phone was ready, he accessed the camera, flipped it to movie mode, and began recording.

The man with the plastic gave half to the guys standing near Lisa, and the other half to the ones next to Nick. As they unfolded their pieces, Paul realized they were bags—body bags—just like ones he'd seen in some of the Military Channel documentaries Sarge liked to watch.

He had zero doubt this had been a killing operation from the beginning. There had been absolutely no intention of simply bringing any of them in. Why else would they have the bags with them?

“That’s my brother, and my girlfriend,” he whispered next to the camera, hoping that the suits the people below were wearing would make it hard for them to hear anything. “Those...those men shot them. We weren’t doing anything, but they shot them.” He opened his mouth to say more, but decided he’d already pressed his luck enough.

Once the bodies were sealed up, the men started carrying them out of the canyon. They all stopped for a moment near the motorcycles and seemed to have a quick conference. When they were through, the two men not carrying the bodies picked up the backpacks and sleeping bags, and carried them to the helicopters.

As soon as everything was aboard, the helicopters rose into the air and flew off in the direction from which they’d come, the thumping of the blades fading until silence descended on the canyon.

Paul didn’t move. There was a part of his mind that said if he stayed right there, none of this had really happened. That pretty soon Nick and Lisa would walk up the ramp looking for him. It would all be fine. They’d get on the bikes and get the hell out of there.

But there were no footsteps, no voices, no nothing, because the girl he loved and his brother were dead.

That’s when Paul lost it.

It was ten minutes before he finally pulled himself together, his face streaked with tears, and climbed out of his hiding spot. The first thing he did was crawl the rest of the way up to the ridge of the canyon.

There, he looked everywhere to make sure the helicopters had really gone. There wasn’t a speck anywhere, not even a cloud. Just blue, empty sky. The wrong sky for the kind of day it had turned out to be.

He hurried down the ramp, pausing for only a brief second as he passed the spot where Nick and Lisa had been killed. What blood he could see looked like dark stains against the dirt. It was...unreal.

When he reached the canyon floor, he ran to the overhang, wanting to get under the cover of the rock. It had occurred to him that the only way the men in the helicopters had known they were there was if he, Nick, and Lisa had been spotted from above. There must have been planes circling around that he and Nick hadn’t noticed. He was going to have to expose himself eventually, but, for the moment, he wanted them to think no one else was there.

Thank God the bikes had been too bulky to put on the helicopters. He would never make it if he had to walk out, but the bikes gave him a chance.

Using a hose off of the engine on Nick’s bike, he siphoned the remaining gas from Nick’s tank into his to give himself the best chance for escape.

His first inclination was to wait until dark, hoping that would make it harder to spot him. But the problem with that was the same problem they’d had the previous night. He would have to keep his speed down so he didn’t kill himself. If he left now, in broad daylight, he could race through the desert and that might be the difference between survival and a bullet in his head.

A bullet.

The rifles. The echo of the shots. The lack of any screams.

He shook himself. He couldn't think about that right now. He needed to go. He needed to get out. No one would know what happened to Nick and Lisa if he didn't.

He wheeled his bike to the edge of the overhang, then took a last look back at the earthen ramp where his girlfriend and his brother had died. Unconsciously, he touched the cell phone in his pocket, making sure it was secured. He couldn't lose that, no matter what.

He pulled on his helmet and hopped on the bike. There was no reason to stay any longer.

With a sudden roar, the motorcycle shot out of the canyon and into the desert.

BEFORE THE SUN CAME up that morning, the Army finally caved to media pressure, and flew several people back to the roadblock outside Sage Springs. These were the people who had driven their particular network's vans to the location before the quarantine had gone wide. They were now allowed to drive the vans back to Fort Irwin under the escort of four Army Humvees and three helicopters flying above. Each had a soldier equipped with a radio riding inside with the driver. No one was to get out of their vehicle, and they were to stop only if the escorts stopped, too. If there were any problems, the soldier with them would radio it in.

Since the roads were empty, they made it back to Fort Irwin just after sunrise.

Tamara and Joe were both up and waiting when Bobby parked the PCN van in their newly assigned spot.

"Were you able to get any shots?" Joe asked as the cameraman climbed out.

Bobby gave him a quick shake of the head, then motioned to the other side of the van with his eyes. There, the soldier who had ridden with him was getting out. With an expression that conveyed tolerance at best, the soldier waved to Bobby and said, "Have a good day, Mr. Lion."

Bobby smiled broadly. "You, too." As soon as the soldier walked away, the smile disappeared. "I told him I just wanted to get a couple of shots from inside the van, but he made it very clear that we were only there to drive. Hell, he wouldn't even let me get in back to check the equipment before we left."

Tamara knew Joe had been hoping to get the shots, but, personally, she didn't care. Her mind was on something else.

"Can we check now?" she said.

Both men looked hesitant.

"Are you sure you want to do this?" Joe asked.

"Absolutely."

"Come on," Bobby said.

He led them around the van to the side door, then opened it up. Not only was the van used to haul equipment, but it was also a mobile editing facility, allowing them to put stories together, record voiceovers, and transmit everything back to the network. Via their uplink, they also had a speedy Internet connection.

Using this, Bobby accessed the website where the footage from the incident at the Tehachapi roadblock had been uploaded. He clicked around for a bit, then said, "Found it."

He downloaded the video and transferred it into the editing software.

Before hitting PLAY, he looked back at Tamara. "You're sure?"

"I'm sure," she said quickly. "Play it."

Together they watched the video all the way through. Tamara had told Bobby and Joe what she believed she saw, but had said nothing to anyone else. Every time the network replayed the video, she had watched it, pointing out to them the man she was sure was her brother.

Bobby and Joe tried to reassure her by saying things like “you can’t tell for sure,” and “the resolution isn’t the best so you could have made a mistake,” and “why would he even be there?”

As sure as she was, she wanted to believe them, so she had stared at the video every time it came on, but every time she came to the same conclusion. It was Gavin.

The reason she couldn’t be absolutely positive, though, was that she had no control over what she was watching. She hadn’t been able to stop it or start it or reverse it. She had to watch it all the way through, then wait until the network decided to show it again. But now that the truck was here, she had access to the equipment that would allow her to take a better look.

“Go back to the part right before he’s shot, and hold it,” she said.

Bobby scrolled back, then hit pause. The problem with video, especially lower resolution video, was that the clarity of the picture came from the motion. A single frame often looked blurry, with less detail. Such was the case here. The man she was sure was her brother wasn’t much more than an indistinct human figure when paused on the screen.

“Can you go back a second or two,” she said, “then scroll back and forth through this section until I tell you to stop?”

“Sure,” Bobby replied.

He took it back to where the man in question turned in the direction of the camera, then he started moving forward through the footage at half speed. They had just passed the point where they’d originally paused when she said, “Stop.”

The image on the screen froze again.

“You see that?” She pointed at the man’s left arm.

“It’s an arm,” Joe said.

“On the arm. Those dots.” There were three dark spots visible on the exposed underside.

“That could just be digital noise,” Bobby said.

She pointed again. “Gavin has a tattoo on the inside of his left arm. One big dot, and two smaller. He was on the swim team in high school. It’s the molecule model for water.”

The two men looked at the screen again. Bobby then played that portion back and forth a couple of times. It was clear the dots were not digital artifacts, but were indeed on the man’s arm.

“Jesus,” Bobby said.

A tear began rolling down Tamara’s cheek. There was no denying it now—Gavin was the one who’d been shot.

“Play it ahead some,” she said. “Let’s see if we can figure out who did this to him.”

Bobby moved the video forward.

In all the times Tamara had watched it at normal speed, she had been unable to spot anyone who might have shot her brother. Her fear was that slowing the footage down wouldn’t change that.

“Wait, wait,” Joe said. “Play that last part back.”

“What did you see?” Tamara asked. Whatever it was, she had missed it.

“It may have been nothing.”

Bobby played the segment again, this time going super slow.

“There,” Joe said. “That guy.”

He was pointing at a man behind Gavin. The guy’s eyes were clearly fixed on Tamara’s brother. Something bright popped into view near the man’s waist for just a couple of frames, then the man disappeared behind Gavin. Two seconds later in real time, Gavin would be shot.

“What was that?” Tamara asked, referring to the bright spot.

“Gun, I think,” Bobby said.

“Then that’s him.”

Bobby froze the video. “This is right before your brother gets shot.”

“The man’s barely on screen,” Joe said. “No wonder we didn’t notice him before.”

The video didn’t actually show the man shooting Gavin, but it was clear to all three of them he had.

The question for Tamara now was, what was she going to do about it?

THE PLANE ARRIVED two and a half hours later, landing on a private airstrip on ranch land about a half-mile from the Lodge. It was a Gulfstream G250 business jet, outfitted for four passengers plus crew. After it was checked and refueled, Matt led Ash and Chloe aboard.

The main cabin was separated from the cockpit, so while Ash knew the flight crew was up front, he had no idea who they were. The cabin itself boasted four comfortable-looking leather chairs. The forward two had tables in front of them, while the back two did not. Chloe immediately went for one in the back, while Ash chose a seat up front, tucking the messenger bag that now served as his suitcase under it.

Ash was cleaned up as best as possible, but still looked like he'd been in a major accident. Rachel had cut his hair so it was now a uniform quarter-inch all the way around. She then did a quick bleach job making it and his eyebrows about three shades lighter than they'd been. The final touch had been contact lenses that changed the color of his eyes from blue to brown. He had two extra pairs in his bag as backups.

One thing was for sure: No one who used to know him would recognize him now.

"Pax will fly out with you, but this is as far as I go," Matt said, holding out his hand. "You're a good man, Ash. Get them back."

As Ash shook with him, he said, "Thanks for all the help you've given me."

"I've posted a message for our person on the inside, telling him you and Chloe are coming. He might get it, he might not. Even if he does, he might not be able to do anything to help, but...well, I'm sure he'll try." He paused. "Pax will give you a number to memorize. Any time you get in trouble, you call that, now or in the future, and we'll do what we can to help." Matt smiled, then glanced toward the back of the plane. "Chloe, good to see you again. Stay safe."

"No such thing," she said.

She was calmer than any of the other times Ash had seen her, but he could still sense a cloud of nervous tension hovering around her.

"The window shades will be automatically lowered before takeoff," Matt told him. "It's not that we don't trust you, but we have certain procedures we need to stand by."

Ash shrugged. He didn't really care where Matt and Rachel's ranch was. He was focused on his destination. On his children.

Matt hung in the doorway as if he had something more he wanted to say, but he finally just gave Ash a nod and got out.

When Pax climbed in a few minutes later, he was carrying two cases—one a normal-sized briefcase, and the other a metal-sided container that could have easily fit a small microwave oven inside. He stored the metal container in a cabinet up front, then put the briefcase on the seat next to Ash. After securing the outer door, he gave the entrance to the cockpit a double tap and returned to his seat.

"Hold this," he said, handing the briefcase to Ash.

As he buckled himself in, a low hum filled the cabin, and hard plastic shades lowered over the windows. To compensate for the loss of sunlight, the interior lights brightened.

Pax leaned over to take the case back, but then stopped. "Might as well do this now."

Outside, the dull roar of the engines grew in intensity.

"Open it up," Pax said.

The plane started rolling down the runway. It was slow at first, but quickly picked up speed. There was no taxiing here, just get on and go.

Ash popped the latches on the briefcase and flipped it open. Inside was a padded envelope and two file folders.

As Ash removed the envelope, the vibration caused by the runway suddenly ceased, and like that, they were in the air. He leaned back for a moment as their angle of ascent increased.

A year earlier, he had taken his family to a small amusement park in Virginia. The park had one of those rides where you were basically in a box that went up and down and side to side, but didn't really go anywhere. The sense of travel was conveyed by the combination of the movement and a video that played on a front screen. While they'd been on the ride, something had gone wrong with the projection system, and for several seconds they only had the walls to look at while the box kept jumping around.

Taking off with the windows closed reminded him of that.

As soon as they were settled into a comfortable climb, Ash opened the envelope and emptied the contents into the briefcase. The thing that stood out first was a small stack of cash. He quickly thumbed through it. Three grand. With the money he already had, that made five thousand total. Not exactly a windfall these days, but it definitely could come in handy.

"Thanks," he said.

"You run out, you call us. We can get you more."

Not that Ash was looking for an answer, but he wondered for the umpteenth time who these people really were.

"I'll...I'll pay you back."

"No need."

Ash didn't argue, but he wasn't conceding the point, either.

He looked back into the briefcase. The other two items from the envelope were a piece of paper and a wallet. He picked up the wallet first. Inside were three credit cards, a membership card for AAA, and a Florida driver's license, all under the name Adam Cooper.

"The credit cards are all good," Pax said. "But use each only once. If I were you, I'd avoid using any of them at all. Cards leave trails."

Ash thumbed out the license and looked at the picture. It could have been him, or it could have been someone else entirely.

"We had to do a bit of fancy Photoshop work on that," Pax said. "But it'll pass for now. When that new face of yours settles in, you can get a real picture taken."

Ash put the license back, then picked up the piece of paper.

"Why is this here?" he asked. It was the pink slip for a 2009 Honda Accord.

"You don't want to walk everywhere, do you?" Pax asked. "It'll be waiting when we land. Registration will hold up even if you get pulled over."

Ash stared at the cash and the cards and pink slip. "What do you guys want from me? You can't be giving me all this for free."

Pax was silent for several seconds. "The hope is you'll come back and help us when your personal business is settled. But that'll be up to you. It's not an expectation. We'd do this for you no matter what."

"Come back and help you do what, exactly?"

Pax leaned back in his seat. "That's something you'll have to hear from Matt, when you're ready." He closed his eyes like he was going to take a nap.

Ash transferred the items into his bag, then pulled out the two files from the briefcase. The first folder contained a set of grainy, five-by-seven photos, eight in all. Five were of men, and three were of women. A note was attached to the front picture.

If you see any of these people, or someone you think looks like any of them, I'd appreciate it if you would contact us.

Matt

Ash looked at the pictures again. None of the faces were familiar to him. He put the photos back in the folder and set it aside. The second folder contained newspaper clippings. There was also a note with these.

Some things to think about.

This one was not signed, but the handwriting was the same as the other.

Ash looked through the clippings, reading the headlines: Earth Population Hits 7 Bil, Oil Spill Devastates Gulf Coast, Darfur Genocide Sees No End, Ethnic Cleansing a Worldwide Epidemic, Vanuatu Sees Territory Shrink As Oceans Rise.

Cheerful stuff.

"Those you can keep."

Pax's voice surprised him. Ash looked over, but Pax was still lying back with his eyes closed.

"The only things I need to take back are the pictures and the briefcase."

"Are these articles supposed to mean something to me?" Ash asked.

"Didn't cut them out. Don't know what they are. Was just told you could keep them."

Ash wasn't sure he wanted to keep them, but he slipped the folder into his bag. He could always throw them out later.

"How long are we going to be in the air?" he asked.

"A couple hours."

"Is there a bathroom on this thing?"

"In back."

As Ash passed Chloe, she eyed him warily but didn't pull back.

He had almost forgotten about her as he looked through the things Pax had brought him. Matt had said she would be valuable to him, but Ash was doubtful that whatever value she brought would outweigh the negatives he felt she had. It would probably be best to part ways once she pointed him in the right direction.

Because if she got in his way...

RACHEL GOT OUT OF THE car and joined her brother at the edge of the runway. Together they watched the Gulfstream gain speed as it rushed away from them then lift off into the air. It wasn't until the plane was a little dot in the distance that either of them spoke.

"What do you think his chances are?" she asked.

"You know I'm not good at figuring out odds. But if you pushed me I'd probably say not a chance in hell."

"We've had people beat that before."

“Yes, we have.”

She smiled. “You once said there was no way we would ever be able to defeat them.”

He took a breath. “I’m still inclined to believe that.”

“Yet we’re still here. Still fighting.”

“It’s a war that should have started a lot earlier than it did. All we’re doing is damage control and catch up.”

They fell silent.

“Do you think he’ll come back?” she asked.

“You mean after he beats no chance in hell? Maybe.”

“We could certainly use him.”

“We already are,” Matt said.

Rachel knew he was talking about the vials of Ash’s blood their off-site team was already working with. Their resources and facilities weren’t as impressive as the organization they were up against, but they weren’t working with kids’ chemistry sets either, and their people were both dedicated and motivated.

“I think he will be back,” she said.

Silently, they both looked west, in the direction the plane had finally disappeared. For the moment, there was nothing more to say.

CONFIRMATION CAME AT noon when Tamara's mother called, wailing, and told her that someone from the California Highway Patrol had just notified her that Gavin was dead. Thirty minutes later, a list of the Tehachapi casualties was handed out to the media at Fort Irwin.

Tamara knew Gavin's name would be there, but when she saw it, it was as if the breath had been ripped from her lungs.

Joe put an arm around her. "I'll call the network and let them know. You won't have to do any more reports."

"No," she said. "Don't call."

"You don't need to be a hero."

"I need to do this, okay? I need to have this right now. Understand?" What she didn't say was that while Joe had been off at a logistics briefing elsewhere on the base, she and Bobby had been working on a piece about her brother's death that she wanted to work into one of her upcoming reports.

"Seriously, Tammy. Your brother died. Don't push yourself."

"She'll be fine," Bobby said.

Joe frowned. "I don't know."

"What else is she going to do out here?" Bobby asked, looking around. "It'll give her something to take her mind of things until she can go home."

Joe thought for a moment, then looked at Tamara. "If that's what you really want."

She nodded. "It's what I want."

She allowed herself a quick glance at Bobby while Joe was distracted by a couple of helicopters landing nearby. "Done?" she mouthed.

He nodded.

Good. As soon as she could figure out how to work it in, the report would be ready to go.

"Who are these guys?" Joe asked.

Tamara turned around. The two arriving helicopters had settled down about fifty yards from where the press was camped out. The only other time helicopters had landed in that area was when they were all evacuated here. Though these were dark green, they had no markings on them, military or otherwise.

Three men jumped out of each helicopter, then gathered on the tarmac. After about half a minute, two of the men broke off and headed over to a waiting Jeep. The helicopters, though, had not powered down, giving the impression their stay was going to be short.

"I have no idea," Tamara said. "National Guard?"

"Could be, I guess."

They were just turning away when Bobby said, "Oh, crap."

Tamara looked over. Bobby, always looking for images they could use, had his camera on his shoulder, shooting the helicopters.

"What is it?" she asked.

He stepped back into the shade of the canopy and said, "Come here."

Tamara walked over, with Joe right on her heels. As soon as she got there, Bobby handed her the camera.

"The four men," he said.

She aimed the lens at the men on the tarmac.

“The guy on the left.”

She centered the picture on the guy in question.

“Here,” Bobby said. “Let me zoom it in for you.”

He pushed a button on top of the camera, and the image of the man rushed at her.

“Whoa, whoa,” she said. “Too much.” The picture had pushed past the man, and into the passenger area of the helicopter. There was something yellow clumped on the seat, but she barely registered it. “Let me do it.”

Bobby showed her where the button was, and she eased the zoom out a little, then adjusted the angle so she could see the man’s face. He was in profile, and though he looked a bit familiar, she couldn’t place him. Maybe one of the guys who’d flown them out during the evacuation?

She was about to ask Bobby what was so special about the guy when the man turned, suddenly bringing his whole face into view.

For several seconds she forgot to breathe. Finally, she pulled her eye from the viewfinder and allowed Bobby to take the camera from her.

“What is it?” Joe asked.

Bobby gave him the camera.

“Oh, my God,” Joe exclaimed once he’d gotten a look at the man.

They had all made the same connection.

Standing a little over a hundred feet away from them was the man who’d killed Tamara’s brother.

THE ORDERLY CHECKED on the children one last time. Their vital signs were stable, and their breathing deep and even. He made sure the IV tubes would not get caught on anything when the beds were moved, then exited the room.

His colleague had finished packing up the pharmaceutical supplies and their workstation, so the orderly did a final walk-through to make sure they hadn’t forgotten anything. They hadn’t.

He picked up the radio from their desk and said, “Station K. Ready and awaiting removal.”

“Roger, Station K. Removal team should be there in two minutes.”

“Copy that, Control.”

Together, he and his colleague double-checked all the latches on the containers to make sure everything was secure.

“I think we’re good,” his colleague said. The orderly was just starting to nod in agreement when the other man blurted out, “Wait.”

“What’s wrong?”

“Did you check the room at the end?”

The orderly shook his head. As far as he knew, there’d been no reason to go in there.

“I used the bathroom in there this morning,” the other man said, already starting off down the hall. “I think I might have left a tissue on the sink.”

“Jesus. Get it. We’re not supposed to leave anything.”

“I know. I know.”

His colleague headed quickly down the hall and disappeared into the last room on the right. When he came back out several seconds later, he held up his hand. In it was a couple of unused tissues.

The orderly was about to read him the riot act for being sloppy, but right then the removal team arrived and he soon forgot.

“WHAT SHOULD WE DO?” Bobby asked.

Though Tamara barely heard the cameraman speak, the only thought she had was that she was looking at the man who had put a bullet through her brother’s back. Without even realizing it, she started walking toward him.

“Hey, where are you going?” Joe asked.

She didn’t answer.

“Tammy. That’s not a good idea,” Bobby said.

Still, she didn’t reply.

Footsteps ran up behind her, Bobby on one side and Joe on the other. Each grabbed one of her arms, stopping her.

“Snap out of it,” Joe said. “Going over there isn’t going to accomplish anything.”

She struggled to pull free. “I want to know his name.”

The four men on the tarmac seemed to realize something was going on. They glanced in the PCN team’s direction, but then, as one, their gaze swung to the left. The two men who had separated from them earlier were jogging rapidly toward the helicopters. One of them was waving the other men toward the aircraft.

“No!” Tamara yelled as the man who’d killed her brother disappeared inside the helicopter.

Bobby grabbed her around the shoulders, holding her back.

The last man had barely gotten on board when both helicopters rose into the air and shot off toward the North.

“No!” she repeated.

“It’s okay,” Bobby said. “You wouldn’t have been able to do anything.”

“But he shot my brother. I...I don’t even know his name.”

“I got him on tape. If there’s a name on his uniform, I probably got that, too.”

“Hey, you guys all right?”

The three of them turned and saw Peter Chavez stepping out in their direction from under the canopy.

“We’re fine, Peter,” Joe said.

“You sure?” Peter asked.

“Yeah. Thanks.”

As soon as the wire-service reporter returned to the shade, Tamara whisper, “I want to check the video.”

Bobby nodded.

As they walked quickly back to where Bobby had set down the camera, she touched his arm, slowing him and putting a little distance between them and Joe.

“I want you to cut a shot of the guy into the story,” she whispered.

He pulled back a little. “I don’t know if that’s a good idea.”

“I don’t care if it’s a good idea. Will you do it?”

He grimaced, but then nodded. “I’ll do it.”

PAUL WAS COVERED IN dust. It had even gotten under his helmet and into his month. He tried spitting out what he could, but he was already parched. What he really would have loved at that moment was a nice long drink of water, but that would have to wait until he found civilization. His bottles had been in his backpack the men from the helicopters had taken.

So far he'd been able to make pretty good time. The roughest part had been right after he left the canyon. The gentle slope there had been deceiving. Decades of rainwater had carved out gullies that seemed to appear out of nowhere. If he had hit one of those too hard, he would have wrecked and broken his arm or worse.

But now he was on smooth, level ground so he was able to ramp up the speed. He figured the area was probably the bed of the ancient ocean that used to cover this part of the desert. Sarge would have known for sure.

He allowed himself a quick look around. Brown for as far as he could see. He glanced at his gas gauge. He had maybe another sixty or seventy miles left. Reluctantly he backed off on the accelerator. If he kept his speed down a bit, he might be able to squeeze out another ten or twenty miles. That could make all the difference in the world.

He let his eyes settle on the hills in front of him. Another fifteen minutes and he'd be there. If he figured it right, once he reached the top he'd be out of the quarantine zone. The thing he didn't know was how far he'd still have to go to reach anyone after that. The map his dad had given them was also in the backpack.

To this point, he'd focused all his thoughts on surviving—going as fast as he dared, keeping the bike upright, looking for holes in the ground. But the thought of the map brought everything back.

Mom and Sarge. Leaving home after the sun went down. Racing through the dark desert.

Nick.

Lisa.

The girl who meant everything to him and his best friend in the world—both dead.

The thing he kept coming back to was that he'd sat there and done nothing. He had watched the men raise their rifles. He had watched them fire.

And he had done nothing.

Maybe he could have created a distraction. Maybe it would have been enough for Nick and Lisa to get away. Would it have worked? Probably not, but, dammit, he should have given it a try. He should have—

He didn't see the rock.

One moment his eyes were tearing up with anger over his inaction, and the next he was flying over his handlebars, landing hard against the desert floor.

He lay on his back for a moment, groaning with the pain. The worse of it seemed to be coming from his left knee. He pulled off his helmet then felt his leg, checking if it was broken.

When his hand reached his knee, he nearly jerked back. It felt wrong. He tried to sit up, but that just made the pain worse, so he only raised his shoulder and tilted his head so he could see what was going on.

Immediately, he knew what had happened. He'd seen something similar before, during P.E. at school. They'd been playing soccer, and Ryan Young had tried to kick the ball but had stepped awkwardly and fallen to the ground.

Like Ryan's had been then, Paul's kneecap was sticking out like a shelf off the side of his bent leg, dislocated.

His eyes slammed shut as a new wave of pain washed over him. He took several deep breaths, trying to regain a little control. When it happened to Ryan, the school nurse had come down to the field and slipped it back into place while the rest of them stood around and watched.

Paul didn't have anyone to put it back in place for him. He was going to have to do it himself.

"It's okay. It's okay," he said out loud. "Two seconds and it's over."

He arranged his leg so that the back edge of his shoe's heel was on the ground. He then put his left hand on his kneecap, and his right on his thigh. Taking several quick, deep breaths, he tried to calm himself. Then, before he could talk himself out of it, he pushed down on his thigh and in on his kneecap. As the leg straightened, the cap moved back into place.

He yelled out, not so much in new pain, but in memory of the old. Because while his knee was indeed throbbing, the sheer intensity of the pain he'd been feeling had subsided.

He lay against the desert floor, panting.

It was several minutes before he finally pushed himself up. His bike was about ten feet away. At first glance, it didn't look like it had suffered much damage. He took a tentative step toward it, but immediately his left leg howled in pain. There was no way it was going to be able to hold his weight for any length of time, so he hopped as best he could to the bike.

As he pulled it off the ground, he smelled gas. There was a wet spot on the dirt under where the tank had been. He looked at the bike, checking for a hole, a loose hose, anything.

It was the cap. It had come loose somehow. He tried to think back to when he'd siphoned the gas from his brother's bike. Had he not made sure the cap was on tight? There was really no other explanation.

He took it off now and looked inside. There was still some gas sloshing around in there, but how much had he lost?

"Dammit!" he yelled. I'm such an idiot.

He put the top back on, making sure it was secure this time, then wheeled the bike over to where he'd left his helmet.

Once he was re-outfitted, he got on and started up the bike. His left leg was already starting to stiffen and was going to be a problem. With more than a little pain, he bent it enough to get his foot on the peg.

He coughed a couple times, and he couldn't wait until he could drink some water and get the dust out of his system.

Then he resumed his journey to freedom.

IT WASN'T UNTIL they landed that the window shades rose again.

Ash looked outside. They seemed to be at a small airport. He could see a few planes parked off to the side and a hangar in the distance.

"Where are we?" he asked.

Pax glanced out the window. "Well, unless we got lost on the way, this should be Sonoma County, California."

Though Ash had been stationed twice in California, he only had a vague idea that Sonoma County was somewhere in the North.

"This is where my children are?"

"As close as we can get." Pax tilted his head toward the back. "Chloe will take you the rest of the way."

Though they were still taxiing, Pax unbuckled himself and got up. He retrieved the metal case from the cabinet, then set it on the floor between his and Ash's seats. He undid the clasps and lifted off the top. Protective foam lined the box, while another thick sheet covered whatever was inside. Pax pulled this away, revealing a small arsenal.

"You liked the SIG so much, I got you three," Pax said as he touched the hilt of one of the three SIG SAUER P229 pistols inside. "You have four boxes of ammo, three extra mags...well, five if you only use one gun. I also packed a pair of binoculars, and something we call little bangs."

"Little bangs?"

Pax moved a few things around, then pulled out a hard plastic rectangular box about an inch thick, and opened the top. The inside was divided into two parts. On one side was a device that looked like a cell phone, complete with a touch-screen display. On the other side were a couple dozen half-inch squares lined up like crackers in a box, the majority of which were gray.

Pax pulled out one of the squares. In the center was a smaller black box that barely rose above the surface. Running out from it were tiny wires that spread over the gray square.

"See the number?" Pax asked.

Ash took a harder look. On the black box a number had been painted in gray. Hard to read, but not impossible. This square was numbered one.

"I see it."

Pax turned the gray square around. "This other side will stick pretty much anywhere. But you've gotta remove this first."

He flicked his finger across the edge, and Ash could see there was a clear plastic sheet covering the back.

"Put this wherever you need it. Then you use this thing here." He pointed at the black cell-phone-looking device. "This is your trigger device. Interface is easy. You input the unit number, then either set it off manually or set up a timer. These things don't create a lot of damage, but they're quite the noisemakers. Good for diversions if you need them."

"I'll bet."

"Careful, though. You see these four here?" He touched four tiles that were grouped together. Unlike the others, they were white. "These do more than just make a noise. They're what you use if you do need damage. They'll blow a hole in pretty much anything you'll come across. There's only the four, so don't confuse them with the others."

He closed the box and tucked it back in the case. He then gave Ash the emergency phone number Matt had mentioned, making him repeat it several times. It was an easy number. Ash knew he wouldn't forget it.

As soon as the plane stopped rolling, Pax said, "I believe this is your stop."

There was no one around as they stepped out of the jet. In fact, the whole airport seemed quiet and deserted. It was tucked between several green hills, and though Ash could see a few houses in the distance, there was no town visible.

Pax nodded toward the hangar. "Your ride's right over there."

Parked near the closed hangar door was a silver Honda Accord.

The metal case went in the trunk, while Ash put his messenger bag in the back seat. Chloe had a dark green backpack. She tossed that into the footwell up front before climbing into the passenger seat.

"You got GPS in there," Pax told Ash. "It's already preset to get you to the highway. Chloe will take over after that."

He held out his hand, and Ash took it.

"You've been put in a terrible position, Captain," Pax said. "Most people would have given up already. Think they crossed the wrong man when they found you."

"Yes," Ash said. "They did."

Pax stepped back. "Don't be a stranger."

By the time Ash got the car to the airport exit, the jet was already racing down the runway and taking off.

He let the voice of the GPS guide him through the countryside. In his other life, he would have appreciated the beauty of the area, mainly because Ellen would have loved it.

I should have brought her here.

I should have brought her a lot of places.

He gritted his teeth and continued to drive.

When they finally reached the highway, the GPS stopped giving directions. Ash looked over and saw that Chloe was staring out the window.

"Which way?" he asked. It was the first thing either of them had said since they'd gotten in the car.

She didn't move for a second, then she pulled up her head and looked over at him. "What?"

"Which way? Pax said once the GPS stopped, you'd know where to go."

"Oh." She leaned forward, looking out the window again, and seemed to notice their surroundings for the first time. "Where are we?"

"At the freeway. North or south?"

She started nodding. "South. Definitely south."

He headed for the on-ramp. "How far?"

She glanced at him again, then returned her gaze to the window. "Fifteen-point-seven miles."

"Serious?"

"Why wouldn't I be?"

He hesitated, then said, "Okay. Fifteen-point-seven miles."

"Almost point-six now."

SINCE ASH KNEW HE'D be shedding Chloe as soon as he didn't need her any more, he was content to let the miles pass by in silence and avoid forming any kind of bond. For whatever reasons of her own, Chloe seemed fine with not talking, too.

The first thing either of them said came from Chloe at exactly fifteen-point-four miles from where they'd entered the freeway. "Next exit." Once they were on the off-ramp, she said, "To the right."

They were in a rural area, probably about fifty miles north of San Francisco. The area immediately surrounding them was hilly and green from recent rains. As they headed west the hills grew larger, and the trees started changing from scattered oaks and a few cottonwoods to a growing forest of evergreens.

"How far are we going?" Ash asked.

"At this speed, we'll turn in nine minutes."

Ash was tempted to go a little faster, but the road was only two lanes and had become winding with plenty of blind turns.

After a few minutes, Chloe said out of the blue, "They changed my face, too."

Ash glanced at her, then back at the road.

"I'd be dead now if they hadn't," she added.

Unable to stop himself, he said, "Is that why you're helping me?"

For several moments, she said nothing. Then, "I have to help. I have no choice."

Ash frowned. "Are you telling me that Matt forced you to be here?"

"No. Of course not. After you get your children, if someone else needs help, you'll have no choice, either. We have to fight them. We have to stop them."

"You mean this Dr. Karp? Don't worry. I'll deal with him."

"You don't understand. You just don't understand." She shook her head, then looked back at the road. "There," she said, pointing ahead. "Turn there."

The new road was narrower and obviously less used. The centerline looked like it hadn't been repainted in decades, and had become more of a faded suggestion than an actual demarcation. The road was dark, too, the sun hidden from view by a thick grove of conifers.

"Five miles," Chloe announced.

Ash glanced at the odometer and noted the mileage.

"I'm sorry they took your children," she said.

Ash didn't respond.

"They took someone from me, too. But I can never get her back."

Ash remained quiet for a moment longer, then said, "There's someone I can't get back, either."

Again, silence descended.

After a bit, Chloe said, "Slow down."

Ash checked the odometer, and saw that they had come almost four and a half miles. He reduced their speed.

The area was quiet. They hadn't seen a single car on this road, nor had there been any houses or buildings alongside it.

Chloe patted her hand against the air. "Slower."

Ash eased back on the gas some more.

Finally, she pointed at a spot just ahead and across the road. "There. Do you see it? Between those two trees."

Where she indicated he could see the ghosts of two tire ruts running into the woods. They were mostly filled with dry pine needles, and looked as if no one had driven on them for a long, long time.

Ash pulled across the road and stopped just short of the ruts. He stared into the woods. As far as he could see, there was nothing back there but more trees.

He grimaced skeptically, then looked at Chloe. "My kids are back there somewhere?"

She hesitated. "The building where I'm supposed to take you is back there."

"This isn't even a road. It's a path that no one's used for God knows how long."

She narrowed her eyes. "Would you rather I take you down the road they do use? Maybe right up to the front door so you can ring the bell? I can do that if you'd like. Except I'd probably just point the way and let you go on your own. I don't want to die today."

Of course she wouldn't do that. What was he thinking? And if this really was a way in, wasn't it a good thing it looked completely untouched?

"Right," he said, then added, "I'm sorry."

He turned the Accord onto the path.

Chloe guided him through a slalom course of trees, taking them deeper and deeper into the woods. Keeping their speed to a crawl, Ash still managed to scrape the sides a few times.

After they'd been going like that for about fifteen minutes, Chloe said, "You should turn the car around here. I'll get out and guide you. Then we'll walk the rest of the way."

It took a little effort, but with Chloe's help, Ash was able to get the sedan pointed back in the direction they'd come.

Once out of the car, he went around to the trunk and opened the weapons case Pax had given him. He grabbed one of the guns, then spent a few minutes filling its mag and the three spares. When he was done with that, he almost shut the case. Instead, he reached in and grabbed the box of little bangs before closing it up.

Chloe had been standing nearby the whole time, watching him. He wasn't sure if she'd been expecting him to give her a gun, but she didn't ask and he didn't offer.

"Let's go," he said.

They hiked for a quarter of an hour, then as they approached a ridge, Chloe motioned for him to get down on his hands and knees. When they reached the top, they dropped to their stomachs and looked down into the tree-filled valley.

At first, Ash thought it was as empty as the forest they'd just come through, but then Chloe pointed down and to the right. About a half-mile away he saw part of a roof jutting out from the side of the hill, like the structure was built right into the earth. If there was anything else around, he couldn't see it through the trees.

She then pointed at one of the evergreens about ten yards ahead of them, then at another about the same distance to the left, then at another and another.

"Twenty feet up," she said.

It took him a couple seconds to see what she was talking about. Attached to each tree at the height she'd indicated were some sort of electronic devices that had been colored to blend in. If Chloe hadn't pointed them out, he would have never noticed them.

"What are they?" he asked.

"Motion sensors. They circle the complex. You can't see it, but another fifty feet beyond that point is a fence."

Ash studied the area for a moment. "I take it there's a way through there."

Chloe shook her head. "Not that I know of."

"But Matt told me you could get me in."

"That's true."

He stared at her for a moment. "You want to stop being so cryptic?"

Several seconds passed, then she said, “This used to be an old mental hospital. It was closed sometime in the nineties and the land was turned over to the government, but don’t expect to find it in any of their records. The...others took it over and fixed it up for their own needs. It’s not one of their main facilities so they don’t always use it. But according to Matt, this is where your kids were taken.”

“You still haven’t told me how I get in.”

“There used to be a separate building where the mental hospital kept...problem patients. The building’s gone, but the foundation is still there.” She looked at Ash. “It’s outside the motion detection zone.”

“How does that help us?” Ash asked, still not following.

“They might have torn down the building, but they didn’t remove the tunnel that connected it to the main hospital.”

THE THROBBING IN Paul's knee had become so constant he almost didn't notice it any more. He wished the same could be said for his growing thirst. His dry mouth and chapped lips were constantly nagging at him.

He'd reached the summit of the hill that marked the boundary of the quarantine zone thirty minutes earlier, but any elation he might have felt had been tempered by the miles of open desert that still stretched before him.

He coughed a couple times, then glanced down at his gas gauge. The needle was hovering just above E. He'd be walking soon, and in his condition, he wouldn't be walking far. If only he could find a road, hopefully someone would drive by and see him. Or perhaps it was his lot to die out here like his brother and his girlfriend. The only difference being that his fate would be delivered by the elements, not a slug of lead.

The ground was rising again in front of him like a gentle swell in the middle of a dirt ocean. As he did every time he neared a crest, he prayed that he'd finally see a road on the other side, anything that would give him a chance.

"This time," he began repeating. "This time. This time. This time."

Just before he actually reached the top, he steeled himself and prepared to see nothing. He was so sure that was exactly what would happen, that even as he stared at the distant highway, it took a moment before he realized what it was.

He stopped the bike, his good foot planting on the ground. Was the highway real? Maybe the pain and the dust and the lack of water were making him see things. He wanted to believe, but...could he?

His eyes followed the road, then his breath caught in his throat.

Not five miles away, he saw a handful of buildings grouped together. Parked around them appeared to be several cars and a couple of buses. He blinked. The buildings were still there. The cars and the buses were still there.

Finally allowing himself a smile, he started down the hill. He was tempted to open the bike up all the way, but he knew even five miles might be too far for the fumes left in his gas tank. So he eased all the way back on the accelerator and let the bike roll free down the hill.

He was laughing as he neared the bottom, his hand poised to feed the rest of the gas into the engine as soon as his speed started to slow. That's when he heard it. The thumping.

He didn't need to look back to know what was there, but he did anyway.

Two helicopters, like black blots against the western afternoon sky.

There was no doubt in his mind that these were the same two that had come to the canyon that morning, that had brought the men who had killed two of the people he loved most. And though he was out of the quarantine zone, he knew they were here to kill him, too.

He jammed on the gas and shot toward the buildings, already knowing they were too far away and that the helicopters would reach him first.

If only he hadn't stopped at the top of the ridge. If only he hadn't fallen off the bike and hurt his knee. If only he hadn't delayed himself a half dozen other times. But he couldn't change any of that now.

The only thing he could do was ride.

MARTINA GABLE AND THE rest of the Burroughs High School softball team were doing what they'd been doing for the last day and a half. Nothing.

They'd been heading home in a school bus from a tournament in Reno, Nevada, when the quarantine had been imposed over much of the Mojave Desert, including their hometown of Ridgecrest. Unfortunately, one of the girls was pumping a steady mix of pop from her iPod through the bus's sound system, so no one had been listening to the radio at the time. But why would they have done that? They'd come in second in the tournament, much better than they'd hoped, so they had reason to enjoy themselves on the way home.

Ten miles past Cryer's Corner, they reached the roadblock and learned for the first time what was going on. Initially, there'd been panic and fear, of course. But when they went back to Cryer's Corner—not much more than a wide spot in the road with a café, a gas station, and a small convenience store—they were able to use the land phones there to contact their families and find out that everyone was fine.

They'd talked about driving back into Nevada to find someplace to stay, but when Coach Driscoll called around looking for a motel, everywhere she tried was full. Apparently the quarantine was stranding people all over the place.

The Cryer family owned all the businesses at Cryer's Corner. They offered to let the girls sleep on the floor of the café, so that's what the coach decided they'd do.

As the day progressed, a few other cars drove in—a couple of families and some solo drivers. They, too, were offered places to sleep.

The coaches tried to organize a practice out behind the café that first afternoon to distract the girls, but it didn't work out too well. So this second day they'd pretty much let everyone do what they pleased, as long as they didn't cause any trouble.

Martina had played catch with her friend Noreen for a while, then had thumbed through one of the gossip magazines another girl had brought along. After lunch, she'd found a spot on the side of the gas station, and was idly tossing rocks at a dumpster, wishing the damn quarantine would be lifted so they could go home. This put her at a good angle to see the helicopters the moment they popped over the hill.

Immediately, she got up and went around to the front of the station where several others were hanging out.

"Helicopters," she said, pointing.

Since everyone on the softball team lived next to the China Lake Navy base, they were used to the sight of jets and helicopters. But having already spent a day of monotony on the side of the road, seeing them now felt like something new.

"From the roadblock?" Cathy Thorwaldson asked.

"I didn't see any out there," Martina said. "Did you?"

"Maybe they flew in during the night while we were sleeping." This came from one of the drivers who'd arrived alone, a college-age guy. Cute, too.

"Hadn't thought of that," Martina said.

"Do you hear that?" their catcher, Jilly Parker, asked. She'd been standing near the pumps but had taken a few steps toward the desert.

Martina listened. There was a very faint whine in the distance. "The helicopters, probably."

Jilly shook her head. "Doesn't sound like helicopters."

A couple seconds later, they all heard a rhythmic thump-thump-thump.

"That's the helicopters," Jilly said.

She was right, Martina realized. The whine was still there, too. Its volume had increased a bit, and it seemed to be coming from ground level as opposed to the sky.

• • • •

SIMS WAS CROUCHED JUST behind the two front seats of the helicopter, trying to spot the motorcycle below. The satellite images had gotten them this far, but now it was a matter of eyeballs.

“There, sir,” the co-pilot said, with a quick nod out the window. “Running along that old wash.”

Sims adjusted his position, then immediately saw movement about a mile ahead.

“Get us down there.”

“Sir,” the pilot said. “We’re already twenty miles outside the containment zone.”

“I don’t care where we are. If the person on that bike is infected, we could have a new outbreak on our hands. Our job is to make sure that doesn’t happen.” Yet, he thought, but didn’t add.

The other thing he didn’t voice was his desire to clean up a situation that they had created themselves. The person on the motorcycle had come from the canyon they’d visited that morning. Apparently there hadn’t been two riders, but three. This third person must have hidden from Sims and his men, and that annoyed him.

It should have never happened. They should have checked for additional people but they hadn’t, and it had been his fault. Two bikes, two sleeping bags, two people. Logical, but wrong.

“Hang on, sir,” the pilot said.

A second later, the helicopters dipped in unison toward the fleeing motorcycle.

• • • •

JILLY AND MARTINA USED a stack of barrels to climb up on top of the gas station, then moved to the back edge so they could see what was going on.

“That whine’s a motorcycle. I’d know that anywhere,” Jilly said.

Martina had recognized it, too. It was a common enough noise in the desert around Ridgecrest. But though she was looking toward where she thought the noise was coming from, she couldn’t see anything.

Jilly suddenly pointed repeatedly at the desert. “There, there, there!”

Martina put a hand on her forehead, shading her eyes. “I don’t see it.”

“It’s there! Along that wash.”

Something glinted in the distance, sunlight on a helmet, Martina realized as she finally spotted the motorcycle rider. For a few moments, she watched him—she assumed it was a him—heading in their direction.

“Is that one of the people who lives here?” she wondered out loud.

“I didn’t hear anyone leave earlier, but I guess it could be,” Jilly said.

Until that moment, Martina had thought the helicopters and the motorcycle had had nothing to do with each other. But suddenly both helicopters dove down toward the bike.

“What are they doing?” she asked.

• • • •

UNDER SIM’S DIRECTIONS, the helicopters bracketed the motorcycle, his aircraft coming up on its left, the other on its right.

“We’ll take the shot,” Sims said into the radio. “If he doesn’t go down, you’re up.”

• • • •

PAUL FELT THE THUMPING of the helicopters in his chest. He allowed himself a quick glance back, and was surprised to see they were approaching him from either side.

There was movement at the open door of the helicopter to his left. He turned forward, checking the terrain ahead, then chanced another glance back. A man stood in the doorway now, held in place by what looked like a strap. In his arm was a rifle.

Without even thinking about it, Paul released the accelerator and pulled on the brakes.

Just then he heard something whiz by him through the air. Involuntarily, he jerked the handlebars to the side. The front tire of the bike turned with it, catching the edge of a sagebrush. Before Paul knew it, he was once more tumbling through the air.

• • • •

“IS THAT A HIT?” SIMS asked. “Is that a hit?”

There was a brief delay. “I’m not sure, sir. But he is down.”

“Get us back there.”

• • • •

MARTINA ACTUALLY SCREAMED when the driver of the motorcycle flew off his bike.

“Did they...shoot at him?” Jilly asked.

“I’m not sure,” Martina replied.

“I thought I saw a flash.”

Below them, one of the cars in the lot started up. Almost immediately, they could hear tires spinning for a moment on the dirty asphalt, then catching hold. Martina glanced over the other side, just in time to see the cute college boy race away from the gas station in his Jeep and head into the desert toward the downed driver.

• • • •

THE HELICOPTERS HAD both swung around and were now hovering above the motorcyclist. Sims was pretty sure it was a man.

“Does anyone see any movement?” he asked.

“No, sir.”

“No, sir.”

“All right, then everyone suit up, and let’s bag him—”

The radio crackled. “Sir, civilian approaching.”

Out of reflex, Sims looked over at the other helicopter. “What?”

“Just ahead, sir,” the man in the other aircraft said. “A Jeep. There are also a couple people standing on one of the buildings at the roadside stop along the highway, looking this way, and several more doing the same from ground level.”

“You’ve got to be kidding me.”

“No, sir.”

Sims looked out the open doorway and spotted the Jeep. He quickly realized it would get to the motorcycle rider only seconds after they landed. What would they do then? Kill the Jeep driver, too? What about the people in town watching? He was pretty sure Mr. Shell did not want that kind of bloodbath.

Dammit!

He looked down at the motorcyclist again, then tapped the pilot on the shoulder. “Head back to base.”

Even before they made the turn for home, he had his satellite phone out. The quarantine zone would have to be expanded to include that little bit of nowhere in case the motorcyclist was infected. But even if he wasn't, and those in the town didn't actually die from the disease, the quarantine would make it easier for Sims and his men to go in and deal with the witnesses.

It was an aggravating problem but fixable.

It didn't even dawn on him that he should have also requested a communications blackout of the area. He thought that was already a part of the quarantine. Why wouldn't it be?

It was another lesson they'd learn for next time.

PAUL REMEMBERED FLYING off his bike, but didn't remember landing. That was because the impact had knocked him unconscious. So the next thing he was aware of was a man lifting him off the ground.

"What...what's going on?"

"Just relax," the guy said. "You're going to be fine."

Where had the guy come from? The helicopter? But they were going to shoot him, weren't they?

Then he saw the vehicle he was being carried to, a dark red, old-model Jeep, not a helicopter.

Someone passing by on the road, maybe? Did it really matter?

As the man helped him into the front seat, Paul knocked his injured knee against the dash, which caused him to wince in pain, which in turn caused him to cough a couple of times.

"Sorry," the guy said.

"I'm...okay."

The man got behind the wheel and started up the Jeep. As they turned around, Paul caught sight of his motorcycle. It was lying half in a creosote bush, its handlebars skewed. He could see a hole in his gas tank, but nothing was dripping out.

Just enough, he thought with a smile. Just enough.

MARTINA AND JILLY climbed down off the roof as the Jeep returned. By then, many of the rest of the people stranded in Cryer's Corner had come outside to see what all the noise was about. Word of what had happened spread quickly.

When the Jeep pulled to a stop, several people crowded around. The guy who'd been on the motorcycle was a mess. He looked like he'd been rolling in dirt for weeks, then had the side of his head dipped in blood.

There was something familiar about him, but Martina couldn't place it. This thought, though, was soon forgotten as the cute college boy came around and helped the motorcycle rider out of the Jeep.

"I don't suppose anyone here's a doctor?" College Boy asked.

"My dad is," Amy Rhodes said.

"Yeah, but he's not here, is he?" Jilly asked.

"Isn't Coach Delger a nurse?" someone asked.

"Yeah, I think she is," Martina said. "Where is she?"

"Last I saw her, she was in the café," Amy told them, no doubt trying to redeem herself.

When no one moved right away, Martina said, "I'll get her."

She raced over to the café and rushed inside. There were only three people there—an old woman behind the counter, and Coach Driscoll and Coach Delger in one of the booths. The coaches both had their backs against the window, with their legs stretched out, and seemed to be asleep.

"Coach Delger?" Martina called out as she ran over.

Both coaches cracked open their eyes.

"What is it, Martina?" Coach Driscoll asked. She was the head coach. Coach Delger was a volunteer from town.

"Someone's hurt. And we thought...well, Coach Delger, you're a nurse, right?"

Both of the women sprang to life and pushed themselves out of the booth.

"Where?" Coach Delger asked.

"Outside. Some guy on a motorcycle got thrown to the ground."

Coach Delger raced ahead and shot out the door.

"Medical student," Coach Driscoll whispered to Martina as they followed. "Her residency starts after the end of the season."

"A student? Oh, uh, maybe we should ask around and see if anyone else is a nurse."

"She'll do just fine," Coach Driscoll told her.

As soon as Martina stepped back outside, she saw that the college boy had an arm around the motorcyclist and they were both walking toward the café. Coach Delger ran up beside them and took a quick look at the injured rider. She then glanced over at Martina.

"Open the door," she called out.

Once they were inside, the college boy helped the rider to a corner booth. It was one of those circular kinds that could fit a lot of people and had a correspondingly large table. Coach Delger had the injured kid sit on the table, then told Martina to get everyone else outside.

"You heard her," Martina announced to the group who'd followed them in. "Everyone out."

Soon she had the place cleared, but since the coach hadn't specifically told her to leave, she returned to the table.

She'd barely walked up when Coach Delger said, "Martina, I need you to look for a first-aid kit. There's got to be one here somewhere." Before Martina could leave, she added, "And I'll need some warm water and towels to clean him up, too."

Martina found the old woman in the kitchen already filling up a large bowl with water.

"I heard her," the woman said, then nodded toward the back of the room. "First-aid kit's hanging on the wall by the bathroom. Just lift it and it'll come right off."

The kit was a large metal box. Martina got it off the wall and carried it back into the dining area. When she got back to the table, the coach was examining the rider's head where all the blood was.

"Not too bad," Coach Delger said. "A cut and a little bump. I'm guessing you were wearing a helmet, right?"

"Yeah," the boy said.

"Some of the cushion missing on the inside?"

"A little."

Smirking, she said, "Get a new helmet and that won't happen next time."

The old woman came out of the kitchen with the water and some towels.

"Susan," Coach Delger said to Coach Driscoll. "Can you clean up his head? I'm going to check if there's anything else wrong."

"Sure," Coach Driscoll said. She grabbed a towel and got it wet.

"My knee," the boy said.

"Which one?"

"Left. From before."

"Before?"

He gave a little shrug. "Not my first crash today. Dislocated it."

While Coach Delger used a pair of scissors from the first-aid kit to cut away his pants leg, the boy looked at Martina.

"What are you guys doing here?" he asked.

"We were at a softball tournament. Got stuck outside the quarantine zone on our way home."

"Did you win?"

She figured he was just trying to distract himself from his pain. "Second place out of sixteen teams. Not too bad."

"Go Burros," he said.

She smiled for a second, then looked down. She wasn't wearing one of her school shirts. Maybe someone outside was. That must have been it.

"Yeah, go Burros."

"Who did most of the pitching? You or Sandra?"

Martina wasn't the only one who was suddenly staring at the rider. Both coaches had stopped what they were doing and were looking at him, too.

"Do I know you?" Martina asked.

"Do I look that bad?"

She squinted her eyes, studying him. "You look familiar, but..."

"Spanish class," he said.

"Paul?"

"Hey, Martina."

"I'm sorry, who are you?" Coach Driscoll asked.

"This is Paul Unger," Martina said, surprised. "He goes to Burroughs, too."

“What were you doing out there on a motorcycle?” Coach Driscoll asked.

Paul got a faraway look in his eyes, and the small smile that had been on his lips disappeared.

“Trying not to die.”

THEY GOT THE WHOLE story out of him.

As soon as Coach Delger realized he'd come from the quarantine zone, she immediately segregated everyone into two groups: those who had come in contact with Paul, and those who hadn't.

The hardest part of the story to believe was the deaths of Nick and Lisa. That was until he showed them the video.

It was Martina's idea, however, to post it on the Internet.

CHLOE GUIDED ASH through the woods, circling around to the top of the rise behind the building, just beyond the line of motion sensors. After crossing a small clearing, she walked on for another dozen feet, then stopped under the cover of the trees.

Without a word, she got on her knees and started digging. At first Ash couldn't figure out what she could possibly be doing, but after she removed a thick layer of needles and branches, she exposed a manhole cover.

"Where does it go?" he asked.

"I have no idea. Just thought I'd randomly show it to you." She stared at him for a second as if he were an idiot. "Where do you think it goes?"

She was right. It was a dumb question.

"How do we get it open?"

"That's a better question than the last one, at least," she said.

She got off her knees and walked over to a tree a dozen feet away. Jumping up, she grabbed one of the low branches and pulled herself onto it. She reached to the branch above her and moved her hands around for a moment. When she dropped back to the ground, she was holding a long metal rod that had an L hook at the bottom.

With a smirk, she stuck the hooked end through a hole in the cover and yanked the disk off, surprising Ash with her strength.

He took a step closer and looked down through the opening. The filtered afternoon light was only able to penetrate a few feet into the dark hole, illuminating just the concrete sides of the tube and the first rung of a built-in iron ladder.

He thought for a moment. Perhaps it was now time to part ways with his guide. "Is it just down and follow a tunnel?"

She scoffed. "No, it's not just down and follow a tunnel."

"Okay," he said, revising his plan. "I was just asking."

Chloe went first, pulling a flashlight out of her pocket he hadn't known she'd brought along, and he followed. At the bottom was a large, damp tunnel running perpendicular to the entrance tube.

"This leads back to the main building?" he asked.

Chloe grimaced, annoyed. "Do you not listen to me? I already told you it doesn't." She huffed out a breath, then said, "Come on."

She headed to the left, the glow of her flashlight leading the way, then stopped after forty feet and said, "Here."

She turned her flashlight toward the wall and revealed a big V-shaped break. Ash examined it for a moment. There was an opening through the dirt on the other side of the concrete, not really a tunnel, more of a rift through the earth. Just at the furthest reach of the light he thought he caught a glimpse of more cement.

"This happened during the Loma Prieta earthquake in 1989," she said. "You know, the one that took down that freeway in San Francisco?"

He vaguely remembered that from when he'd been a kid. "What's on the other side?"

Instead of answering, she climbed into the rift and started working her way through the cramped space. Ash knew it was going to be even tighter for him, so instead of crawling as she had, he got on his stomach and pulled himself forward.

The distant cement turned out to be a wall, the break in it not a giant V, but a lopsided oval. As he slipped through the opening and got to his feet, he found himself in a wide space that fell quickly off into darkness beyond the spill of the flashlight.

“Welcome to the Palmer Psychiatric Hospital’s special patient facility. Or what’s left of it,” Chloe said.

She moved the flashlight through the room. There were piles of wood and old office furniture and what appeared to be mattresses. Trash was strewn throughout.

“When they tore down the building, they left the basement,” Chloe explained. “They threw some dirt over the top and let the earth reclaim it. Above us is that clearing we walked through.”

“Why leave the basement?” he asked.

“You ask me like I was there. I wasn’t. I do know, though, that they tore the building down not long after the earthquake.” She paused. “You want my guess?”

He shrugged. “Okay.”

“The hospital was still open then. The people who were running it would have known about the tunnel, and probably thought they could still use this place. It’s nice and hidden from the view of anyone. I wouldn’t have put it past them.”

That was a bit on the conspiracy side of things for him, but then again, hadn’t his whole life slipped firmly to the conspiracy side? God, what was happening to him?

“Show me the tunnel into the hospital.”

“Follow me.”

She led him to a door in the far corner. Inside was a staircase leading down.

“There’s two underground levels?” he asked.

She shook her head. “Just the stairs,” she said as she started down. “And the tunnel.”

Directly left of the stairs at the bottom was a wide opening. Chloe shined the light into it, but it revealed nothing more than walls on each side before the darkness took over again.

As she started to walk into it, Ash said, “Wait.”

She turned back.

“This isn’t your fight,” he said. “I appreciate you getting me here, but I think I should go on alone from this point.”

She stared at him, then said, “Really? Do you know how to get out of the other end of this tunnel?”

“Is it that hard?”

“It depends on your definition, I guess.”

He shrugged. “If you tell me how to do it, I’ll manage.”

“And what are you going to use for light? You’re not taking my flashlight.”

“Actually, I am,” he said. “You can wait here until I get back.”

She took a step away from him, toward the tunnel. “You want to leave me here in the dark? Are you kidding me?”

“It’ll be safer.”

“Yeah, until I go crazy because I keep hearing things, then I run straight into a wall and knock myself out. I’m sorry, Mr. Not-In-The-Army-Anymore, but no way in hell I’m staying here in the dark.” With that she turned and started down the tunnel.

Once more he found himself in the position of following her.

The tunnel between the buildings was a good six feet wide and at least eight tall, with a gentle downward slope. Ash realized that explained why the stairs from the annex basement had been built.

If the tunnel had been dug directly from the main building up to the annex, it would have had a considerably steeper incline.

After they'd gone nearly fifty yards, Chloe whispered, "We're getting close, so best to stay quiet." Ten yards further on, they came to a stop in front of a cinder-block wall that closed off the tunnel. "I thought you said this went all the way through," Ash said, feeling suddenly panicky. "You're such a downer."

She knelt by the wall and worked her fingers into the gaps on either side of a block on the bottom row. Within seconds, she slid it out. Peeking through, she shined her light into the opening then sat back up. Four more blocks came out. When she was done, she'd created a hole big enough for them to snake through.

"This was apparently put up when the hospital finally closed. They were supposed to fill in everything on this side of it." She shrugged. "I guess they didn't have the money."

"How did you find out about it?" he asked.

She was silent for a moment. "Matt's people, when they got me out. They showed me."

Before he could ask another question, she disappeared through the wall. Ash, left in the dark, had to feel his way down to the opening then slip through and join her. On the other side, the tunnel went on for another twenty feet, then T-boned into a wide corridor.

"Where exactly are we?" he asked.

"This is the main hospital. The part that was built into the side of the hill," she said. "We're on the top floor, but still underground."

Ash tensed. "Where will my kids be?"

"Two floors down," she said without hesitation.

Once more he thought about leaving her behind, but she'd proved more useful than he'd expected. So instead, he said, "Show me."

"There are five stairwells," she told him. "One at each corner, and a fifth along the south wall." She pointed off to their left. "We're actually on the fourth floor. Your kids'll be on the second, in the northeast corner." As she said this, her jaw clenched a little. She was quiet for a moment. "The quickest way is by either of the north-side stairwells, but there's an excellent chance the others will hear us before we can even get close."

"So we use one on the south side," he said, eager to move.

"Yes, but not one in the corners," she told him. "The one in the middle. This floor used to be where the doctors' offices were. The middle stairway is attached to the old hospital director's office. It was his private way of getting in and out."

"Fine," he said impatiently. "Can we just go?"

She glanced at him without moving. "You might want to get your gun ready."

• • • •

THE MIDDLE STAIRWAY creaked a bit as they went down, but not enough, Ash hoped, to draw attention. When they reached the closed door at the second floor landing, Chloe stopped and listened.

"I don't hear anything," she whispered.

"What's on the other side?"

"An examination room. Or at least I think that's what it used to be."

"Do they use it?"

"No," she said, shaking her head. "There was a stack of old wheelchairs there when I came through. That was about it. They only use a small area in the back of the building."

As she reached for the door handle, Ash grabbed her arm, stopping her.

“I’ll go first.”

Holding the SIG in one hand, he grabbed the knob with his other and eased the door open.

Indirect sunlight filtered into the examining room from a window on the south wall, providing more than enough illumination to see the stack of wheelchairs Chloe had mentioned. From the dust on the floor it was clear no one had been through here in a long time. Ash stepped inside, and moved quickly across the room to the main door. There was only silence on the other side.

He hesitated for a moment, then turned to Chloe. “There’s light here. If you want, you can wait until I come back.”

She raised an eyebrow. “If I want? You’re not telling me to stay?”

Shaking his head, he said, “It’s up to you.”

“Let’s go, then. You’re going to need me.”

He nodded reluctantly, then opened the door. The hallway on the other side was dark, but not pitch-black like the tunnel or the basement. The scant bit of illumination was courtesy of sunlight spilling out of a couple open doors to the left.

“I assume we go right?” he asked.

She nodded.

“Mind if I carry the flashlight now?”

She hesitated for a moment, then handed it to him.

The hallway got darker and darker as they headed back into the section that was embedded in the mountain. There were doors along both sides. The few that were open led into rooms that Ash sensed hadn’t been used in decades.

They’d been going for just over a minute when Chloe touched his back and pointed ahead at an opening to another hallway. He stopped at the corner, listened, then peered around it. There was a very dim light at the far end, but that was it.

“If they’re here, that’s the part of the building where they’ll be.”

If...

He was beginning to wonder. So far there had been no sign of anyone else in the building. Surely by now, they would have heard at least one of these mysterious people who were supposed to have his children. It was just too damn quiet. The condition of the building didn’t help his mind, either. It was a dump. Why would they have brought his kids here in the first place?

He turned down the hall, knowing the only way to find out for sure was to keep going.

Silence continued to reign as they got closer and closer to the other end. With each new step, Ash couldn’t help but think that Matt’s information must have been wrong. There was no way anyone was here. He moved all the way to the end of the hall, then stopped for another check.

Stone. Dead. Silence.

Even in places with just a few people around, there was always a sense of others. Ash didn’t have that sense now.

He stepped out into the intersecting hallway without checking first, knowing no one would be there. And he was right.

“We’re alone,” he said, not bothering to whisper. “Matt was wrong. They’re not here.”

Chloe was more tentative as she stepped out to join him. She looked one way down the hallway, then the other, her face full of confusion. “He was sure of it. I know he was.”

“Maybe he was just—” He stopped himself and shook his head.

“Just what?”

“Nothing.”

“What did you mean? Just what?”

“I didn’t mean anything, okay?”

She stared at him, obviously waiting for more. When he remained quiet, she said, “I’d be dead if it wasn’t for Matt and Rachel. There’s no question about it. And you’d be dead, too, if they hadn’t changed how you look and given you a new name. So if you’re questioning whether Matt was lying to you or not, don’t. He wasn’t. He never would.”

Without another word, she turned and walked down the hallway to the right, fading into the black.

“Are you coming?” she called out. “I can’t see anything without the flashlight.”

“What’s down there?” he asked.

“If your kids were here, they would have been kept down this way. We should check.”

Doubting they’d find anything, he walked down the hall and joined her.

WITHIN FIFTEEN MINUTES of being posted online, video of what appeared to be two teenagers murdered by soldiers somewhere within the quarantine zone had been picked up by several blogs, and spread through the Internet via Twitter, Facebook and a half dozen other social networking sites.

Its first television appearance was on a German network, thirty-five minutes later. Another hour passed before the American networks finally started showing the footage. While some immediately dismissed it as phony, others pointed not only to the effort that would have been needed to intentionally create something like it, but also to the footage's incredible realism.

Network researchers worked feverishly to find out who had posted the video. The account had an ID made up of numbers and letters that, on the surface, meant nothing to anyone. When the video-hosting site was contacted, they denied requests for the user's true identity, citing privacy guidelines. The only information that had been uploaded with the video was the line: Shot by my friend this morning in the Mojave quarantine zone, so sad!

While the search for the poster was going on, the Army vehemently denied any connection to the events in the video. They, too, pushed the idea that the footage was staged.

The breakthrough came in the form of a phone call from a teenage girl named Frances Newcombe of Ridgecrest, inside the quarantine zone, to her cousin John working at Glitz, an entertainment-focused cable channel based in Los Angeles. John was a producer on the long-running show Tinseltown Tales, which, in his case, meant he spent most of his time in edit bays making sure the shows were fast-paced, exciting, and made at least a little sense.

"I don't know what you're talking about," he told her when she said she knew who had uploaded the video. He'd been tied up most of the day on an episode about a recently failed celebrity marriage, and was unaware of the latest developments concerning the Sage Flu.

"How can you not know?" Frances said. "It's been on the news, like, nonstop for the last hour."

"What has?"

"The video of the soldiers carrying away the bodies of two people they'd killed in the quarantine zone!"

The producer frowned. Sure, there was the unfortunate incident in Tehachapi, but soldiers openly firing on civilians? Not likely. Besides, his cousin was sixteen, an age when kids easily jumped to conclusions and felt everything was the end of the world.

"Hold on," he said, then put his hand over the phone. "Tony, you know anything about some footage on TV of soldiers and dead bodies in the quarantine zone?"

Tony, the editor, spun around in his chair. "Yeah. It's wild, isn't it?"

"You saw it?"

Tony nodded. "When I went to get more coffee a few minutes ago. It was on the TV in the break room."

"Who shot it?"

"They don't know. They're trying to figure that out. Someone uploaded it to the Internet but didn't give their name."

John took his hand off the phone. "You know who shot this video?"

"That's what I've been trying to tell you," Frances said. "Okay, I don't know who actually shot it, but I do know who put it up. It's my friend Martina's account."

“You’re sure.”

“One hundred percent positive.”

“Have you asked her about it?”

“I tried calling her cell, but I couldn’t get through.”

“Give me a second,” John said. If his cousin was right, and this video was generating a lot of buzz, then this could be a very, very big moment for him. “Okay. Give me her name and her number.” She did. “What about her home? If we can’t get through to her cell, maybe we can find her there.” His cousin gave him that, too.

“Don’t forget I’m the one who gave it to you,” she said.

“Don’t worry. I’ll pass this on, and maybe someone will call you to find out more.”

“You mean like one of the reporters? Will I be on the air?”

“You never know. I’m glad you called me, Frances. I’ll talk to you later.”

He hung up before she could ask anything else.

“What was that all about?” Tony asked.

John just smiled, then ran out of the room. He didn’t stop running until he reached the door of the network president, who, it turned out, was watching the desert canyon footage on their sister network PCN at that very moment.

• • • •

WHEN THE VIDEO OF THE desert shooting first aired on PCN, Tamara and Joe had been arguing about the story she and Bobby had put together about the riot at Tehachapi, and, specifically, what they thought had really happened to Gavin.

“I’m telling you,” Joe said. “The minute that goes on the air, we are all fired.”

“You saw what I saw,” she argued. “I could tell. It was in your eyes. You know it was the same guy.”

“We all think it was the same guy. We don’t know one hundred percent. But that’s not even my point.”

“Oh, come on, Joe. How can you say that? That man killed my brother.”

“See, that’s what I’m talking about. You aren’t objective on this. Even if it is the same man, and he did kill your brother, you are too emotionally involved to be the one reporting it.”

“Of course I’m emotionally involved, but I’ve kept myself in check and you know it! That’s a damn fine report and we need to air it.”

“Oh, we do, do we? And when whoever’s anchoring comes back to you, that is, if they haven’t fired us already for airing something we haven’t warned them about, when he comes back and asks you questions about the report, you’re going to keep your cool? You won’t show any emotion? What if he questions the connection? What if he just hints that maybe there’s another explanation? You going to be able to hold it together then?”

She clenched her teeth together. “It’s the truth, and you know it.”

“No. I don’t know it. Not for sure.”

She gawked at him. “What? You saw the same thing I—”

“Hey, guys!” Bobby called from inside the van.

“—did. You know it’s the same guy. You know he—”

“Guys, seriously! Get in here!” Bobby yelled.

Tamara glanced over at the van, then back at Joe. “We’re not done,” she told him, then headed over to see what the other member of their team wanted.

Bobby was sitting in the chair in front of the mobile editing station. On one screen was footage he'd been shooting around the base. He was supposed to be putting together a report about the conditions the media had to work under since being moved to the base. On the other screen was a live feed from the network of some amateur footage shot in what looked like a desert canyon. Tamara could see several people in biohazard suits, and, during a brief second when the camera tilted up just a bit, at least one helicopter outside the canyon.

The suited people were standing next to a couple of bodies.

"What is this?" she asked.

"More Internet video," Bobby told her. "Network's played this one a couple times already."

As she watched it, Tamara couldn't help but feel the sense of something familiar.

Whoever was doing the filming seemed to be above the action. As the bio-suited people began bagging up the two bodies, a voice said in a haunting whisper, "That's my brother, and my girlfriend. Those...those men shot them. We weren't doing anything, but they shot them."

"My God," Tamara said.

The image zoomed in, intending, it seemed, to identify the people in the suits. But the angle was making it difficult, and the suit masks weren't helping. Still, the camera operator was able to hold on two of them just long enough to get an idea of what they looked like.

Tamara tensed. "You're recording this, right?"

Bobby nodded. "Every second."

She said nothing for a moment, willing herself to remain as calm as possible. "Bobby, can you bring up that video of the soldiers from the helicopters that landed here?"

He gave her an odd look but said, "Sure."

He punched a few buttons, and the report he'd been working on earlier disappeared from its monitor, replaced by the requested shots.

"Scroll ahead to that part where you were trying to zoom in for me," she said.

He sped up the footage.

"There," she told him a few seconds later. "Back it up a little bit, then let it play."

He did. On the screen they watched the soldiers talk together, then the picture zoomed in quickly, rushing past Gavin's killer and focusing for a few moments on the interior of the helicopter. Just like she remembered, there was a clump of something yellow on the seat.

"Freeze there," she said. Once the shot stopped moving, she looked at the other two. "Am I seeing things?"

Both men stared at the screen, then looked back at the network feed.

"Son of a bitch," Bobby said under his breath.

The yellow clump looked very much like one of the bio-suits worn by the people in the desert canyon.

"Hold on," Joe said, shaking his head. "I'm sure all crews have been outfitted with these kinds of suits. They probably all look alike."

"I'm sure you're right," Tamara said. "But then that means you're also conceding those people in the video are part of the military."

Joe didn't have a response to that.

"There's something else," she said.

Once the network finished playing the desert clip, Tamara had Bobby go back to where the kid whose friends had been shot zoomed in on the biohazard face masks. Bobby paused on the image she requested, then went back to the footage he'd shot of the men outside the helicopter there at Fort Irwin. Once more, she had him pause on an image.

She didn't have to say anything.

The features and expression of the man on the left screen were exactly the same as the features and expression of the man on the right.

"I want to talk to whoever shot that footage," she said.

Without looking away from the screen, Joe said, "Let me see what I can do."

THE DOOR CHLOE opened led into a dark section of the building that was obviously built into the side of the hill. Ash moved past her into the room, swinging the light around to get a quick take on the space. But he barely registered anything before the overhead lights came on.

He whirled around. Chloe was standing by the door, her hand next to a switch.

Power in this decrepit building?

It seemed odd, but then, as he looked around, he realized the room he was in wasn't decrepit at all. It was clean, almost sterile—white walls, black-tiled floors, no dust, no mud. Even the air smelled pure. It was as if they'd been transported out of the abandoned building they'd been in, and into a brand new hospital a million miles away.

The room wasn't particularly large. There were benches against two sides and a row of empty bins along the wall.

Chloe pulled open the only other door in the room and passed through. As Ash followed, she switched on a light in the new space. They were in a corridor, with a dozen doors leading off it in either direction.

"They're gone. Definitely," she said.

"If they were here at all."

She looked at him. "Let's check."

She began opening doors. Behind each were shorter hallways with what appeared to be a nurse's station near the front, and anywhere from three to five doors on either side. These spaces were as immaculate as the first room had been.

Starting at the far end, Chloe and Ash entered each hall and went door to door, checking inside. Each door opened onto an empty room. It wasn't hard to imagine the rooms were designed to hold a bed, and that each of these small hallways was like a hospital ward.

"What do they use this for?" he asked.

Chloe said, "Whatever they want."

That seemed to be all the answer she was willing to give. Ash noticed that with each new ward they entered, she seemed to draw more and more into herself.

So far, they had found nothing. As Ash approached the door for the next ward, Chloe said, "Not that one."

"Why not?"

She walked past him to the next door down. "We'll try this one."

But it was as empty as the others, and so were the final two after that.

"We haven't checked that one yet," he said, nodding at the door they'd skipped.

She stared across the hall at it for several seconds, then finally said, "Okay."

When he opened the door, the new ward looked exactly like all the others. He walked in and checked the first room. Empty. As he stepped back out, he noticed that Chloe was standing in the ward doorway, her feet not having crossed the threshold.

"You okay?" he asked.

She gave him a quick nod, but didn't say anything.

He knew this must have been where she'd been imprisoned. He wondered what they'd done to her, what had affected her so deeply.

He walked over to the room directly across the hall and looked inside. It was a mirror image of the first room. He moved to the room next door—same again—then crossed over to its opposite.

When he flicked on the light this time, he got a surprise. The room was furnished. There were two hospital beds, two tables that could be rolled into position so a patient could use them, a padded chair by the door, and a cabinet between the beds.

He walked all the way in.

“What is it?” Chloe called out.

“This one’s not empty.”

There were no sheets on the beds, but the mattresses themselves looked new. He leaned down to take a cautious sniff. Neither smelled of age or decay.

He checked the cabinet, then searched the rest of the room to see if anything had been left behind. The only thing he came up with was a hair, thin and brown and long, that had fallen between the mattress and the headboard of one of the beds. It could have belonged to a million different people, a billion even, but it could have also belonged to Josie. Had his children really been here? Was it possible?

He carefully rolled up the hair, put it in the change pocket of his jeans, then continued searching the room but found nothing else. When he turned to leave he was surprised to see Chloe standing at the door.

“I..I had the same kind of bed,” she said, her eyes flicking to the left down the hall, unconsciously looking in the direction of the room Ash assumed had been hers. “But it was...it was only me. Your kids are lucky they have each other.”

“There’s no way to know if they have each other,” Ash said. “I don’t even know if they were really here.” He looked back toward the beds, trying to hold himself together. “The only thing we know for sure is that they aren’t here now.”

When he looked back, Chloe wasn’t in the doorway any more. He exited the room, assuming she’d be back at the ward door, but instead she was standing in the middle of the hall, staring at the last room on the right.

“Let’s go,” he said. “There’s no reason to stay here.”

But as he took a step toward the exit, she didn’t move.

“Chloe?”

Without looking at him, she said, “Matt’s...Matt’s inside person...is the same one who helped me.” The words were obviously causing her a great deal of distress, but Ash couldn’t understand why. “He would...leave me...messages. You know...so I’d know I wasn’t...alone. That helped me to survive.”

“You don’t need to torture yourself like this,” Ash said. “Come on.”

“Matt told him I was coming with you,” she went on as if she hadn’t heard him. “If something...changed, he...might have left me...a note.”

Ash took a step toward her, suddenly hopeful. “A note?”

She continued to stare at the door. “We don’t even know if...he got Matt’s initial message...but if...if...if he did...”

“If he did, what, Chloe?”

She took a couple of deep breaths. “He would probably leave it somewhere only I would know.”

“Where?”

The silence stretched out for a dozen seconds, then she said in a barely audible voice, “In my room.”

“It’s okay,” Ash said, trying to calm her down. “Just tell me where it is, and I’ll check.”

Her head began shaking left and right. “No. I have to do it. It’s my spot. My place only.”

Her breath shuttered in and out one more time, then she took a step toward the door, then another step and another, each coming quicker than the last. When she reached the room, she went inside without hesitating.

Ash wasn’t sure what to do. Should he let her look on her own or should he help? When half a minute passed and she hadn’t reappeared, he decided he needed to see what was going on.

As he opened the door, he could hear her sobbing.

“Chloe?” he said, rushing in.

She wasn’t there.

“Chloe?”

Another sob, this one from his left through the doorway to the bathroom. He found her inside on her knees in the middle of the tiled floor.

He dropped down beside her. “Are you hurt?”

She jumped when he touched her, surprised that he was there. “I can do this. I’ll be okay.”

“Just let me help.”

“I can do this,” she repeated, but didn’t move.

Her put his arm around her shoulders. She tried to pull away again, but then she took another breath, this one longer and slower, and she let him leave his arm where it was.

“What did they do to you?”

She said nothing for several seconds, then finally turned and looked up at him. “I don’t remember.”

“Well...that’s probably...good, right?” he said, realizing he shouldn’t have asked in the first place. “Maybe it’s best that way.”

“No,” she said quickly. “You don’t understand. I don’t remember. Anything.”

“What do you mean, anything? From when you were here?”

Again, her head shook. “From before. I remember waking up here. I remember being strapped to the bed. I remember the needles and the pills and the tests. I remember all that. But anything that came before in my life? I don’t remember.” She looked around the room. “This place took my past from me.”

Good God, Ash thought. “You don’t...know anything about your past?”

“I know about it. My name used to be Lauren Scott. Matt and Rachel showed me family pictures, articles in the local paper where I apparently grew up, my college diploma. I even sat in a car down the street from my...my parents’ house, and watched them walk along the sidewalk. If I hadn’t been shown a photo of them, I would have never recognized them. They were just two people I didn’t know. I had no feelings for them whatsoever.” Her eyes narrowed. “These people took that from me. They took me from me. That’s who I can’t get back.”

Ash wasn’t sure what to say. Was it better to remember that his wife was dead, and that he had two children who were in need of his help, or to be conscious of the fact you could remember nothing at all?

She wiped a hand across her cheeks. “I’m sorry. This isn’t helping. We’re here to find your kids, not watch me break down.”

“Don’t worry about it. You have every right to be upset.”

She tried to smile, but failed, then said, “Help me up.”

Once they were back on their feet, Ash asked, “Was there a note?”

“I...I haven’t checked yet.” She stepped toward the shower. “It’s over here.”

“I can get it.”

“No. I’m okay now.”

Whether she was or not, she was at least more in control of herself as she stepped into the shower stall. Water for the shower was controlled by a handle that could be moved left or right. Behind the handle was a concave metal plate that curved into the wall. Chloe pressed her fingertips around the edge of the plate, then twisted it to the left. It moved about two inches, then slipped out of whatever clamp was holding it in place. She moved it as far out as the still-attached handle would allow, then reached into the gap behind it. When she pulled her hand back, there was a piece of paper between her fingers.

Ash tried to temper his anticipation. The paper could still be nothing. A note from when she’d been here before, perhaps, or...or...

She unfolded it, read what was there, then showed it to him.

There was a date at the top, that day’s date, and a time, ten a.m., with the word “gone” after it. That meant as few as six hours before, Josie and Brandon had still been there. The next part read:

Kids still alive. Taking to NB7.

Alive. They’re alive. But what did he mean by “still”? Did that mean their time was almost up?

“What does NB7 mean?” Ash asked.

“It’s the way the others refer to their different facilities. They each have alpha-numeric designations.”

“Do you know where this place is?”

She shook her head. “I’ve never heard of it.”

Ash felt his world start to crumble. He’d been so close. He put a hand over his eyes, and could feel the pressure in his head building. He had to do something, but he didn’t know what.

Chloe touched his back. “Hey. We’re not done yet. There’s someone who might know.”

He looked at her. “There is?”

She hesitated. “Yes. A woman named Olivia.”

“Can we call her?”

Chloe shook her head. “We can’t call. We need to go see her.”

“Where is she?”

“Not too far, I think. Maybe an hour, hour and a half away. Matt’s the one who knows exactly where she is.”

Without even hesitating, Ash pulled out his phone and called the emergency number Pax had given him.

RACHEL ENTERED MATT'S office as he was finishing up his call with Ash. "Did they find the children?" she asked when her brother hung up.

"The place had already been cleared out."

"Oh, no."

"It's not as bad as it could have been. Winger was able to leave a message. They've taken the kids to someplace called NB7."

"Is that on our list?"

"No. I checked while we were talking." He paused for a moment, then looked at his sister. "Chloe suggested Olivia might know where it is."

"Olivia?" Rachel frowned. "Even if she does, she might not tell them."

"You don't think it's worth trying?"

Rachel looked out the window. Her history with Olivia was not a particularly pleasant one. "Does it matter? You've already sent them to the Bluff, haven't you?"

He adjusted himself uncomfortably in his chair. "If you can think of any other way to find out in a hurry, I'm more than open to it. But, yes, I've already sent them there."

Rachel stared at the distant hills, knowing her brother had done the right thing, but also not sure if she would have done the same if it had been up to her. Of course, truth be told, if it had been up to her, Olivia would have been dead a long time ago.

Finally, she turned back to him and set the paper she'd been carrying on the desk. "We have another situation."

Matt read the message. "Damn."

"I think there's a better than fifty-percent chance we're going to have to perform an extraction," she said.

He glanced through the message again, then nodded. "Keep a close eye on it, and get everything in place."

"I have a truck already on its way."

He eyed her suspiciously.

"It's going in with a CDC pass," she said. "There won't be any problems."

"Still, an extraction's going to be tricky, given the location."

"But not impossible."

"No. Not impossible."

AT BLUEBIRD, A SIMILAR high-level conference was being held. The Director of Preparation—who, among other things, oversaw Dr. Karp's work and the operation Mr. Shell was heading up to keep a lid on things—and two of his counterparts were meeting in a small room specifically designed for these kinds of quick, private meetings.

"It's getting out of hand," the Director of Recovery said. "We are dangerously close to exposure."

"I don't think we're even near that point yet," the DOP said.

"Don't you? What about that video that the networks are blasting all over the place today? Those weren't military troops doing the shooting. Those were our people."

“Yes, they were. And even if they weren’t covered in bio-suits, there would be no possible way for the connection to be made back to us.”

“What were they doing out there anyway?”

“Their job.”

The DOR didn’t look as if he liked the answer.

“Is there a problem?” The DOP asked.

“Given the safeguards of KV-27a, it just seemed...unnecessary.”

The DOP looked at his colleague for a moment. “Are you worried about the deaths of two people?”

“Of course not,” the other man said quickly. “There just seems to be a lot of...glitches with this particular operation.”

“You’re right. There have been several glitches.”

“Starting with KV-27a reaching the public in the first place!”

“True, but I think that has actually been a benefit to us. As have these glitches. They’ve exposed areas of concern that are much better for us to know about now than later, don’t you think? If we had to do it all over again, I think I would have pushed for something like this to occur by design as opposed to by accident.”

“You’ve got to be...” The DOR fell silent.

“What? Kidding? Is that what you were going to say?” The DOP’s eyes cooled to hard steel, his voice cutting the air as he spoke. “The stakes we’re playing with are enormous. I can’t worry about two kids being killed in the desert. They’re not even a drop in the bucket of what’s to come if we’re to achieve what we’ve set out to do. The future of humanity is in our hands alone. That’s the oath we’ve all taken, or have you forgotten? Perhaps you think we need to change the parameters of the entire project. Perhaps you think we need to go easy.” He paused. “Tell me, how are you going to react when implementation day comes? Are you going to raise your concerns then, too?”

The DOR tensed. “Of course not.” He stood up. “Perhaps I was...hasty.”

The DOP immediately became calm and conciliatory. It was one of the abilities that made him an excellent leader within Project Eden. “We’re all under a lot of pressure. Don’t worry about it.” He offered his hand.

The DOR shook it, nodded at the silent third man in the room, then left.

As soon as the door closed, the DOP said, “He needs to be replaced.”

The third man, the Director of Survival, rose to his feet. He was smaller than the others by a foot, and one of the most dedicated members of the project. “Yes, he does. But he also has a point about the mistakes.”

“I know.” The mistakes were good learning tools, but the ones who had made them would need to be dealt with.

“What about the KV-27a safeguards? Any word?” the DOS asked.

“I’m told everything is on schedule.”

“Excellent.” Changing the subject, the DOS said, “Where are we on the vaccine?”

“Almost there. We should have a working batch within a few weeks.”

“Then we’re on to the next phase.”

The Director of Preparation smiled. “Yes, we are.”

BY LATE AFTERNOON IT was clear to Martina and the others in the segregated group at Cryer's Corner that Paul Unger was not just suffering from his wounds, but was also ill.

Coach Delger had said that if he only had the increased fever, then it could have been explained by his injuries. But there was the cough, too, and the growing congestion, all symptoms that had been previously reported in connection with the Sage Flu.

Martina was a smart girl. She knew if things played out the way they had everywhere else, she and the others in the segregated group would all be dead within a day or so. It scared her more than she wanted to admit, but she tried to stay calm because a few of the others were totally freaking out already, and someone had to keep their head.

It didn't help that the news reported the virus had spread throughout the entire quarantine zone, including their hometown of Ridgecrest. And even though the correspondent had said the new outbreaks seemed to have been contained to a handful of people here and there, the sense of doom that hung over the café was stifling.

There was no report, though, on the fact that the quarantine roadblock had been moved from ten miles west of Cryer's Corner to ten miles east. Perhaps they were the only ones who knew about that. And given the fact that the phones, and therefore the Internet, had stopped working not long after Martina uploaded Paul's video, there was no way they could share that information.

The only good news as far as she was concerned was Ben. That was the name of the cute college boy. He was from San Mateo in the Bay Area and had been driving home from a skiing trip in Colorado. Luckily for Martina, he wasn't one of the people flipping out so, naturally, they had gravitated toward each other.

At that moment, they were sitting in a booth at the far corner of the café, absently watching the TV. The reporter was a woman who'd been caught inside the zone, and was now at Fort Irwin near Barstow with several other members of the media. Martina wasn't paying her much attention, though. The woman had pretty much been saying the same thing over and over all day.

"This sucks," Martina blurted out.

"The news?" Ben asked.

She glanced at the screen. "Well, yeah. That, too. But all of this. It completely sucks. We can't even call our families to see how they're doing. It's like we're in prison."

"At least this prison has cushioned seats," he said, smiling.

"Ha ha." She turned her attention back to the TV, but could only take it for another minute before she said, "I wish I'd just start coughing and get it over with, you know?"

Ben didn't say anything.

"Did you hear me?"

She looked at him. He was staring out the window at something in the distance. Finally, as if on delay, he said, "Sorry." Then, with a sudden burst of energy, he scooted out of the booth. "I'll be right back."

"Where are you going?" she asked, but he was already halfway toward the front of the café, so she got up and followed him.

He stopped at the counter near the register and looked around.

"What are you doing?" she asked, walking up.

"Have you seen Molly?"

Molly Cryer was the older woman who, it turned out, owned the café.

"Maybe in back?" Martina suggested.

With a nod, Ben passed through the opening in the counter and back into the kitchen. More curious than ever, Martina continued to follow him.

Molly was sitting on a little stool in back, watching a DVD of some old black and white movie on a small TV set on a desk. She had a soda in one hand, and an unlit cigarette in the other.

“The gas station across the street,” Ben said. “There’s a big rig behind it.”

“Yeah,” Molly said without taking her eyes off the screen.

“Whose is it?”

“The rig? That’d be Eddie Jackson’s truck.”

“Is he around?”

“Nah. He’s in…” She paused for a moment. “Reno, I think.”

“Who has the keys?”

“I assume Lance does over at the station.”

“Great. Thanks.”

As Ben headed back out, Martina said, “Tell me what’s going on.”

“I don’t want to get your hopes up.”

“About what?”

He said nothing.

“Whoa! Where are you two going?” Coach Driscoll asked as Ben and Martina reached the front door.

“I need to check something,” Ben said.

“Well, just stick around right out front. Don’t want to expose anyone else.”

Most of the unexposed group had been hanging out at the mini-market just down from the café. No one had really laid claim to the gas station on the other side of the road yet, because there really wasn’t much to claim other than a couple of pumps and a greasy garage.

Once he was outside, Ben started jogging straight for the station.

Before he reached the road, Martina said, “I don’t think we’re supposed to go across.”

“Then you don’t have to come.”

Though she’d bent one or two rules in her life, she wasn’t a big one for breaking them, but given the fact that by this time tomorrow she’d probably be dead, what did it matter? She picked up her speed and caught up to him midway across the asphalt of the empty highway.

“Still not going to tell me what you’re doing?” she asked.

“Still not.”

No one seemed to be around as he led her into the gas station’s small office. He then started pulling desk drawers open, and slamming them closed when he didn’t find whatever it was he was looking for.

After a few minutes, he moved into the garage and took a quick scan around. His gaze locked onto a black cabinet on the wall.

He pulled the door open, then let out a yelp of triumph.

Martina moved around so she could look inside. There were several rows of hooks. Most were empty, but a few had keys hanging from them. Ben moved his finger along the sets that were there, pulling off several.

“Come on,” he said. “Let’s see if I’m right.”

As they stepped out of the garage, a voice yelled out, “What are you doing in there?”

Lance Cryer, the guy who ran the gas station, was standing near the highway looking at them. He’d been in the group deemed unexposed.

“Just borrowing some keys,” Ben said.

“Dammit. You shouldn’t have gone in there. That’s my place. Now I can’t use it until someone washes it all down.”

Ben grimaced. “I’m sorry. I wasn’t thinking about that.”

“Too late now, isn’t it?” Lance said. “What are you going to do with those keys?”

Ben looked down at the sets in his hand. After a second, he seemed to come to some decision. “Tell Eddie Jackson I’m sorry, too.”

“What?” Lance asked, confused.

Ben touched Martina on the arm. “Come on.”

They circled around the gas station to the semi truck parked in back. The first set of keys didn’t work, but the second opened the door.

“Go around to the other side,” he told her. “I’ll open it up for you.”

By the time she got there, the passenger door was unlocked.

“Okay, so are we going to make a run for it?” she asked, smirking, as soon as she was inside.

“Not a bad idea. But I kind of think I’d rather die of a cold than a bullet.”

That wiped the smile off her face.

“Sorry,” he said. “I was trying to be funny. But...”

Shaking her head, she said, “It’s okay. Don’t worry about it.” She glanced at him expectantly. “So why are we here?”

Ben put the key in the ignition and turned it enough to get the electricity inside working.

“That,” he said, pointing at a device mounted in the dashboard.

“What is it?”

“CB radio. If we can get it to work, we might be able to get you in touch with your mom.”

Martina looked at him. “You...you think so?”

“That’s the hope.”

It took him a few minutes to get the hang of it, but soon he got it working.

“Hello, hello. Is anyone out there?” he said into the mic. Static. “Hello. I’m calling from Cryer’s Corner inside the quarantine zone. Can anyone hear me?”

Static again, then, “...hear you.”

Martina hit Ben’s arm excitedly.

“This is Ben. Ben Bowerman. Who’s this?”

“...ame’s Marty Zimmerman. Everyone calls me...ee.”

“Sorry, you faded out. Calls you what?”

“Zee. Everyone calls me Zee.”

“I can’t tell you how great it is to hear your voice, Zee.”

“Where’d you say you are?”

“Cryer’s Corner.”

“Kinda near Death Valley?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Hell, I know where that is. Tiny speck of a place. Did you say you’re in the quarantine zone?”

“Uh, yeah. Where are you?”

“Sitting in the parking lot of a casino just east of the Cal border along I-15. Stuck here with a load of potato chips I was supposed to be taking to Barstow, while I wait to hear where I’m being rerouted. But better stuck here than inside the zone, I guess. What’re you hauling?”

“I’m...not a trucker. There’s a whole group of us stuck here at Cryer’s Corner.”

It took a few minutes to explain everything, then another as Zee made the requested call on his cell phone before Martina heard the voice she thought she would never hear again.

“Hello?” her mother said, her voice distorted by the fact it was coming out of a speakerphone on a cell that was then being transmitted over the CB.

“Mom?”

A slight delay. “Martina? Is that you?”

“Yes, it’s me,” she said, her eyes welling with water.

“This connection is horrible, sweetie. Can you try calling back?”

“No, no!” Martina yelled. “We don’t have any service here. I’m on a radio.”

“You’re on a what?”

Martina loved her mom dearly, but there were some things she didn’t get right away. “Just don’t hang up, okay?”

A moment later, her dad joined in on another extension. They talked about missing her and wishing she were home. She tried to sound upbeat, and was careful not to say anything about being exposed to the virus. Let them have one more night of peace, she thought.

“I want to know about this video you apparently put on the Internet,” her father said.

“It’s so horrible,” her mother cut in. “Please tell me it’s not true.”

“How did you know I put it up?” Martina asked, confused. Her video account name was a completely random series of numbers and letters.

“We’ve had several calls from people at PCN, including that reporter out in Barstow. They apparently learned about it from your friend Frances.”

Frances, of course.

“Did you really put that up?” her dad asked.

“Yes, Dad. I did.”

“But it’s fake, right?” her mom said. “That didn’t really happen.”

Her dad said something, but the static on the line covered most of it up.

“Dad, can you say that again? I couldn’t understand you.”

“...wants to talk to you, sweetie.”

“Who wants to talk to me?” she asked.

“The reporter. From PCN? She gave us her number and wants you to call. I’m not sure you should or not, though.”

Martina looked at Ben. “They want to talk to me?”

He shrugged. “It makes sense. That video must be a big thing right now.”

Over the radio, her dad said, “Sweetie, are you there?”

She moved the CB mic back to her mouth. “I’m here, Dad.”

“Do you want us to give you the number?”

“I’d talk to her, but I can’t call from here.”

Zee cut in. “I could do it for you, if you want.”

“Who’s that?” Martina’s dad asked.

“That’s Zee, Dad. He’s helping us with the radio connection.” She looked at Ben. “Should I talk to her?”

He shrugged. “I don’t see why not. Someone needs to get the word out about what happened to Paul and his friends.”

She thought for a moment, then keyed the mic again. “Dad, go ahead and give Zee the number. I’ll talk her.”

MATT HAD CALLED the place where Ash and Chloe were going the Bluff. It turned out to be two and a half hours away from the old Palmer Psychiatric Hospital, not one.

The directions took them into the Sierra Nevada Mountains, east of Sacramento. Ash was surprised by how light the traffic was until he realized it was probably due to the outbreak down south. Though there had been no reports of cases up here, that didn't mean the fear didn't stretch well beyond the quarantine zone. Better to play it overly cautious and keep your family at home than to risk infection.

They left the interstate behind as they entered the mountains and proceeded up a narrower, windier road into the thickening forest. From there it was down a series of smaller roads. Ash carefully followed Matt's instructions, but even then he almost missed the gate in the darkening twilight.

It wasn't anything special, and in fact looked like a half dozen others they'd passed on the way up. Metal-pipe frame, three twelve-inch-wide planks running from side to side, and that was it. The fence it was connected to was made of wood posts with barbed wire strung between, the majority of it covered by vegetation.

Though Ash was tempted to climb out and push the gate open, Matt's instructions had been clear. "When you reach the gate, stay in your car and wait."

Two full minutes passed before the gate swung open on its own. Once it was completely out of the way, Ash drove through.

The road on the other side was narrow, the feeling reinforced by the pine trees that grew right up to the edge and the overarching canopy created by their branches. This went on for nearly a hundred yards, then suddenly the trees fell away, and they entered a grass-covered clearing at the top of a hill.

Chloe drew in a surprised breath. "It's so beautiful."

At the far edge of the clearing was a house, and beyond it an amazing view of the Sierra Nevada Mountains.

In many ways, the house looked like a smaller version of Matt and Rachel's lodge. Wood-stained sides and large windows and warm outside lighting. This Olivia person obviously lived pretty well.

There were two cars parked out front—a pickup truck and a decade-old Cadillac. Ash pulled in behind them then cut the engine.

"Are you staying here or coming with me?" he asked Chloe.

"I'm certainly not staying here."

They both got out and headed over to the house. As they stepped up onto the porch, the front door opened and Ash got his first shock. The smiling couple who came out to greet them was the same couple who had picked him up in the Winnebago out in the middle of nowhere when he'd been fleeing Barker Flats.

He glanced quickly side to side, thinking he must have missed the RV, but it was nowhere to be seen.

The man, Mike—if that hadn't been a fake name—thrust his hand out at Ash. "Great to see you again," he said. As Ash shook his hand, Mike pulled him into a quick hug. "Simply great." He turned to Ash's companion. "And Chloe, it's been far too long."

"Hi, Mike," she said.

They hugged with genuine affection.

Janice came over next and gave Ash a coy, contrite smile. "I'm sorry about the coffee. I hope you'll forgive me, and know I was only trying to help you."

A day or two earlier, he might have still been mad at her, but now it didn't seem important. "It's fine. I know you were doing what you were supposed to."

Her smile widened in relief, then she gave him a hug. When she stepped back, she said, "Your face looks horrible."

"Janice!" Mike said.

"Are you going to try to tell me it doesn't?" she asked.

Ash touched the bandage that covered his nose. He'd almost forgotten about the surgery. "She's right," he said. "I wouldn't even want to look at me."

"Oh, I didn't mean that," Janice said, then turned away. "Chloe, you are as beautiful as ever."

The women hugged.

"Come, come," Mike said. "We've got a fire inside."

Mike ushered them indoors and led them into a living room.

"Would anyone like coffee?" Janice asked. She looked at Ash. "I can guarantee you this pot is completely harmless."

"Are you Olivia?" he asked.

"Me? God, no. I'm Janice."

"Sit," Mike said. "She'll bring us coffee."

Ash remained on his feet. "I don't mean to be rude, but I'm not here for coffee or small talk. I'm here for someone named Olivia. Matt said she'd be here."

Mike and Janice shared a look, then Mike said, "She is."

"Then I'd like to talk to her now."

Mike's smile disappeared. He nodded. "Of course. This way."

He crossed the living room and entered a small hallway near the back corner. As Ash followed, he realized Chloe was behind him.

"Just me," he told her.

"I'm coming, too."

"This isn't your business. It's mine."

"I'm coming, too," she repeated.

He stared at her for a moment, then said, "The second you get in my way, you're out."

They found Mike standing halfway down the hallway, in front of an open door.

"Inside," he said.

They crossed the threshold into what turned out to be a large bathroom.

Ash looked at Mike, confused. "We're in here because...?"

"You've been allowed to come to the Bluff only because Matt trusts you. He thinks you might be able to help us someday. If that trust is misplaced, and you try to betray us, you won't last very long. I'm not threatening you, I'm just telling you. So before we go any further, I need to know if he's wrong about you."

Ash took a moment, then said, "Matt and the rest of you saved my life. And you've all been very generous in helping me try to find my children. I have no intention of ever telling anyone about him or his ranch or even your little house here. But if you do try to block me from getting my kids, all bets are off."

"Good. Then there's no misunderstanding between us," Mike said.

He stepped over to a closet with accordion-style doors and opened them. Inside, there was nothing earth-shattering or unusual, just a washer and dryer and a stack of towels. Mike reached behind the washer and touched something. There was a subtle click. Then, with a simple, one-handed push, the dryer moved to the side, and a section of the wall behind it slid open. Mike motioned for Ash and Chloe to pass through.

The space beyond was dark and not particularly large. As soon as Mike joined them, the wall slid shut. The moment it was fully closed, a light came on, and the small room they were in began moving downward.

An elevator.

There might have been more than a little bit of crazy in these people, but they were certainly well funded, Ash thought.

The car continued downward for much longer than he'd expected. When it finally came to a stop, the door opened onto a brightly lit room. There were two men standing just inside, both armed.

"Please step out of the elevator and raise your arms to shoulder height," one of the men said, demonstrating what he wanted them to do.

Ash was surprised to see that he and Chloe weren't the only ones who needed to follow the instructions. Mike, too, had his arms out, as he let one of the men first use a metal detecting wand on him, then pat him down.

When they were all through, the man who'd spoken originally said, "Follow me."

The door on the other side of the room buzzed and he pushed it open. They then entered a long, wide corridor that was as brightly lit as the space they'd just left. About twenty feet from the door was a see-through wall of either glass or Plexi, dividing the area in two. There was a very elaborate-looking security door inset on the right-hand side of the wall.

Prior to this divider, there was a room off to the side that also had a clear wall along the front. Inside, Ash could see at least five more men. Two were standing right at the wall, looking out. Like the guys who'd been waiting outside the elevator, they were armed. The other three were sitting at desks looking at screens, their faces lit by their computers.

The guide led Ash, Chloe, and Mike over to this wall, then said, "Adam Cooper and Chloe White cleared for entrance."

"Cleared for entrance," one of the men inside repeated, his voice coming out of a speaker somewhere nearby.

The elaborate security door on the large divider began to hum as locks disengaged. Finally, there was a slight sucking sound before it swung open toward them.

"Through here," the guide said, leading them to the other side.

There were twenty doors in the back half of the corridor, ten on each side, paired in twos. Down the center of the space were three more armed men, walking back and forth as if they were protecting something.

"What is this place?" Ash asked Mike.

"I'm sorry," the guide said. "No talking here, please."

Frustrated, Ash fell silent as they continued down the hallway.

The pair of doors their guide finally stopped in front of was the second to last on the left side. He opened an eye-level panel on the left door, looked through it, then closed it again. He gave Mike a nod, then opened the door on the right.

This time it was Mike who took the lead, with their guide staying outside.

As if the whole facility wasn't odd already, this new room was even stranger. The first part was a narrow passageway that took a jog to the right, then turned back to the left before opening into a wide space with five comfortable chairs sitting side by side. The chairs were facing the wall on the left, which seemed to be made of opaque, black glass.

"Take a seat," Mike said.

"Where is she?" Ash asked.

"You'll see her in a moment." He gestured at the chairs. "You should take the one in the center."

Once they were seated, Chloe to his right, and Mike to his left, Ash said, "So what now?"

"Now we talk to Olivia. But I want to warn you first, don't buy everything she tells you. Are you ready?"

"I'm ready." Though ready was probably not the right word. He had no idea from which direction she was going to enter. And where would she sit? Down at one of the ends? How could he talk to her there?

Mike pushed a button on his armrest.

A voice came out of a speaker. "Station one."

"This is Mike. We're ready."

"Copy that, Mike."

Suddenly, it was as if the wall in front of them melted away. The opaque black was gone, replaced by clear glass, a window into another room.

Not just a room, Ash realized. A cell.

There was a bed in the back and a sink on the wall next to a toilet. Hanging from the ceiling in the corner, enclosed by a wire cage, was a television that was currently off. But the most striking thing in the room was the woman sitting on a plastic stool just a few feet on the other side of the wall, facing them.

Her blonde hair was short, maybe no longer than half an inch. She had an angular face with high cheekbones and eyes that seemed to smirk. She'd barely moved since the wall became transparent, staring at it, a smile resting on her lips.

"Can she see us?" Ash whispered.

The woman suddenly laughed. "Yes. I can see you. Hear you, too."

"This is Olivia," Mike said. "Olivia, we have some guests who need to ask you a few questions."

"So I've been told." Her gaze shifted to Chloe. "You look kind of familiar. We've met before, haven't we?"

Chloe said nothing.

The woman shrugged, then turned her attention to Ash. "You're one ugly son of a bitch, aren't you? Someone throw you in front of a train?"

Ash ignored her comment. "I'm looking for a location, and I'm told you might know where it is."

"Hold on. You know my name. I don't know yours."

He paused for a second, then said, "Ash."

"As in cigarette?"

"Do you know the location of something called NB7?"

Her eyes widened a fraction of an inch, as if he'd actually surprised her. "What are you? One of their hunters?" she asked, nodding toward Mike. "Out to bag you a big-name baddie, is that it?" She smiled, then leaned forward, her elbows resting on her knees. "Have you ever considered for a moment that maybe you guys are the black hats?"

“I don’t care about sides,” Ash said. “I’m just trying to find...some people who are important to me. I’ve been told they’ve been taken to NB7. I just need to know where it is.”

“Look, honey. You might as well stop what you’re doing right now. If they’ve been taken to NB7, then they’re probably already dead. Time to move on.”

Ash tried to maintain his composure. “Just tell me where it is.”

“Out of the goodness of my heart? I don’t think so.”

Ash couldn’t hold back. He jumped up and slammed his fist against the wall. “Tell me where it is!”

“Oh, touchy. Who’d they take? Your girlfriend? Wife, maybe? Your mom?”

“Dr. Karp took my kids!”

Olivia stared at him, once more looking a bit surprised.

“Please,” he said. “Where is this place?”

“Even if I told you, do you think they’d just let you walk out with them?”

“I’ll do whatever it takes.”

She leaned back. “Really? Because that actually makes it interesting. Whatever it takes?”

“Yes.”

“Hold on,” Mike said. He pressed the button on the armrest. “Cut audio.”

“Audio off,” the voice from earlier said through the speaker.

Ash twisted around. “What?”

“She’s tried to make deals before,” Mike explained. “The one time someone actually took her up on it, it was a trap.”

“I don’t care. If it gets me close to my kids, that’s all I’ll need. I can take it from there.”

“If you’re dead, that’s not going to help your kids at all.”

“And if they’re dead, there’s no reason for me to live. Switch the sound back on.”

Reluctantly, Mike did.

“Can you tell me where my kids are or not?” Ash asked.

“Oh, you’re back. Mikey there telling you not to trust me?” Olivia said.

“Answer my question.”

She held up her hand and wagged a finger at him. “You know very well how this works. Trade-off.”

“There’s nothing I can do for you.”

“Isn’t there?”

He stared at her for a second. “You obviously have something in mind. What is it?”

Her upper lip curled in a faux pout. “I get so little entertainment in here, and you deny me even a little negotiation. Fine. Here’s all I want you to do. When you find the fabulous Dr. Karp, just before you put the bullet in his head, because I know that’s exactly what you want to do, I want you to tell him hi from me, and ask him why he gave up on me. One more thing. If he says anything after that, tell him he’ll be heading to the afterlife before me.”

“That’s it? That’s all you want?”

Her smile was back. “It would mean the world to me.”

“That, I can do.”

“I thought you probably could.”

THE ONLY THING that kept Ash from speeding down the mountain was the fear of skidding off the side and plunging down the slope. Not only would he and Chloe die, but he'd be effectively killing his children, too. Still, it was hard to keep from pressing the pedal to the floor.

"I'd wish you good luck," Olivia had said after she gave them the location of NB7, "but I'm guessing you're already too late." She stood up and walked right up to the glass, directly in front of Ash.

"Stand away from the wall," the voice from the speaker ordered. "Stand away from the wall."

She locked eyes with Ash, her feet firmly planted where she was.

"Stand away from the wall."

"But just because they're dead," she said, "doesn't mean you can't deliver my message to Dr. Karp."

She obviously hoped that whether his children were dead or alive, Ash would want Dr. Karp to pay for what had been done to his family. And though he wasn't about to accept the possibility that Brandon and Josie were gone, she'd been right.

The biggest problem now was that NB7 was in Eastern Oregon, 370 miles away from the Bluff.

The jet Matt had sent them west on wasn't an option. Mike had checked. The plane was apparently somewhere in Texas, and wouldn't be able to get to an airport close to them for nearly four hours. Add on the flight time, and the fact that the closest place they could land would still be an hour away from NB7, and the balance decidedly tipped in favor of driving.

Mike had suggested they get at least a few hours' sleep at the Bluff before they left, but that was out of the question. Every minute saved could be the difference between Ash's kids living or dying.

According to the car's GPS, the trip should take them six and a half hours. Ash planned on slicing at least an hour to an hour and a half off that once they hit level ground.

"You going to hold the steering wheel like that the whole time?" Chloe asked.

He shot her a quick look. "What?"

"You're gripping it like you want to tear it out of the dash. You're wasting energy."

He glanced at his hands. His fingers were wrapped around the wheel so tightly his knuckles had turned white. Now that he was aware of it, he could feel the stress running up his arms and into his shoulders. He forced himself to relax, then looked back at the road.

"I can drive, if you want," she said. "I'm pretty good." She paused. "I didn't forget how, if you're worried about that."

"I'm fine," he said.

"Sure, whatever you want. I'm here though, okay? 'Cause, you know, I think you'd want to be at your max when we get there. But that's your choice."

He didn't respond, but he knew she was right. It would be after midnight when they arrived and he'd need to be sharp. Maybe after they got out of the hills, he'd let her drive for a couple of hours while he slept.

"What did you think of Olivia?" Chloe asked.

Ash shrugged. "I just wanted the location from her. I didn't think about her otherwise."

"Last time I saw her she was mad as hell because we'd just caught her, like a cornered wild animal." She paused. "She used to work with Dr. Karp on the experiments. Yours wasn't the first, you know. Not even close. But probably their most successful, huh? Not only did they find something that worked, they found you and your kids, too.”

Without looking at her, he said, “What do you mean?”

“The experiments. You know about that, right? Matt told you?”

“He just said we were part of a test.”

“Oh. Well, then...maybe...I shouldn’t...I mean it’s not my place. Oh, dammit. Just forget it.”

The silence lasted for nearly a minute.

“He was going to tell me,” Ash said. “Back at the ranch, but I just wanted to focus on getting my kids. That first day, he started talking about things that were bigger than I could imagine, like I’d been caught up in some sort of...of...”

“Conspiracy?” she asked.

“Conspiracy,” he said, nodding. “That’s exactly what it sound like to me. Some nut-job theory like NASA faking the moon landings or the U.S. Government being behind 9/11.”

“NASA landed on the moon?” she asked.

He looked at her, his eyes narrowing in concern.

“I’m kidding,” she said. “I forgot about who I was, but things that I learned, things that weren’t about me, I remember most of those.”

“How is that possible?”

She shook her head and shrugged. “Maybe we can ask Dr. Karp when we see him.”

“He did this to you?”

“Not him directly. One of his colleagues.”

“Now we’re back to the conspiracy theory,” he said.

“Yeah, except this one isn’t a theory. It’s conspiracy reality.”

Once Ash had realized his kids were still alive, the only thing he’d concentrated on at the ranch was them. He hadn’t cared one way or the other what Matt and his friends were really involved in, but he was beginning to think maybe that was a mistake. Maybe he should care, maybe there was something to whatever it was they seemed to think was happening.

“Who are they?” he asked.

“Who are who?”

“These people you all seem to be fighting, who are they?”

“I...I don’t know. It’s not my place.”

“Maybe it’s not, but Matt’s not here.”

“You’re going to think I’m crazy.”

“I already think you’re crazy.”

They glanced at each other, then she laughed.

“All right,” she finally said. “Are you buckled in?”

He rolled his eyes, then smiled. “Yeah. I’m buckled in.”

“I’m serious.”

He held up a defensive hand. “Okay, sorry.”

She was quiet so long that he looked over to see what was wrong. She had twisted in her seat and was studying him.

“What?” he asked.

“I’ve never been the one to tell anyone before. I’ve only listened as others have done it, so I want to get it right.”

“Okay,” he said, drawing the word out. “Just let me know when you’re ready.”

He heard her take a breath, then she said, "I'm ready now."

Outside, the mountains had finally started to fall behind them, and the road started to straighten out.

"The end of our world is coming. And it's happening on purpose."

“CAN YOU HEAR me?” Tamara said into her phone. She was sitting in the front seat of the van, with the door closed so that no competing reporter might overhear the conversation, trying to figure out who she was talking to.

“Yes, I can hear you,” the female voice replied.

Tamara glanced into the back of the van where Bobby was sitting at the editing console. “Is it okay?” she mouthed.

He gave her the thumbs up, nodding. Often phone conversations needed to be recorded, so they had a device that hooked Tamara’s phone into the van’s equipment, only this time the setup was a little stranger than other times, as the voice of the person on the other end was coming via another phone being held up to a CB radio.

“Can you please give me your name?” Tamara asked.

“It’s Martina Gable.”

Tamara gave it a beat so that Bobby would have a place to cut out the first part of the audio, then said, “Martina, can you tell us where you are, please?”

“Yes. We’re in Cryer’s Corner, California.”

“Who’s we?”

“Well, I’m here with the Burroughs High School softball team. We were headed home from a tournament when we got stuck here.”

“Because of the quarantine?”

“Yes.”

“And there are others there, too?”

“Yeah, there’s the people who live here, and a few others who showed up in cars and got stuck, too. And Ben, of course. Ben Bowerman. He’s the one who figured out the CB.”

“And that’s how you’re talking to us?”

“Yeah. All the phones and the Internet stopped working. And there hasn’t been any cell service here since we arrived.”

Now that Tamara had gotten the basics out of the way, she started in on the more important questions. “It’s our understanding that Cryer’s Corner is in the quarantine zone. How did you get there?”

“Well,” Martina said. “It wasn’t in the zone when we arrived. Until this morning, the roadblock was west of us.”

Interesting. “And then they moved it east?”

“Yes.”

“Any idea why?”

Martina didn’t respond right away.

“Are you still there?” Tamara asked.

“Yes, I’m here. We think they moved it because of Paul.”

“Who is Paul?”

“Paul Unger. He’s the one who took the video your channel’s been playing.”

Tamara smiled. This was exactly what she wanted. “And you’re the one who uploaded it?”

“Yes.”

“How long after this did the Internet go out at Cryer’s Corner?”

“Maybe an hour or two.”

“So, after it started playing on television.”

“Yeah.”

“I’d like to talk to Paul about the video. Is that possible?”

A pause. “He was...injured just as he got here. He’s in the café across the street.”

“How bad is he hurt?”

“Messed up his knee and hit his head when the guys in the helicopters took a shot at him.”

Tamara froze for half a second, stunned. “Can you repeat that?”

Martina did.

“Can you tell me exactly what happened?”

“Sure. I saw most of it from the roof of the gas station.”

The girl then proceeded to tell Tamara about Paul’s escape. After that she relayed the story Paul had told her about his brother and his girlfriend, and their murders in the desert canyon. Through it all, Tamara and Bobby kept sharing shocked looks.

“There’s...there’s something else, too,” Martina said as she finished Paul’s story.

“Yes?”

“Coach Delger thinks Paul might be sick. You know, with the Sage Flu. We’ve split into two groups. One that was exposed to Paul and one that wasn’t. No one else has shown signs of anything, though, so maybe he just has a cold.”

Tamara had already been feeling a strong connection to the girl, but now she felt her stomach sinking. “Which group are you in, Martina?” she asked, afraid she knew the answer.

“I...I was exposed. That’s how I found out about the video. Bu please don’t put that part in your story. I don’t want my mom to know yet.”

“Sure. We’ll keep that part out,” Tamara said, meaning it. “Can we talk again in the morning?”

“We’ll have to come back to the truck where the radio is. What time?”

“Eight?”

“Zee?” Martina asked. “Is eight okay for you?”

“As long as I’m still sitting here, which looks pretty likely,” the trucker who’d connected them said.

“Great,” Tamara replied. “We’ll talk to you then.”

As soon as she hung up, she turned to Bobby. “Oh, my God.”

“Oh, my God is right,” he said.

“I’ll bet you that the helicopters that shot at this Paul guy are the same ones we saw. The same ones who killed his brother and his girlfriend.”

Bobby didn’t reply, but the look on his face said he was thinking the same thing.

There was a knock on the passenger window beside her. Joe was standing right outside. He’d been on lookout to make sure nobody got near the van while she was on the phone. She motioned for him to climb into the back.

“So?” he asked, once he’d joined them.

“You’re not going to believe it,” she said.

“Tell me.”

While Bobby worked on cutting the important parts of the interview into their already prepared piece, Tamara filled Joe in.

“I think we should go up with it on my next spot,” she said once she was done.

She could see the hesitation in Joe’s eyes.

“Come on. It’s great stuff,” she told him.

“It is,” he said. “I would just feel a bit more comfortable if we sent it to the network first, so they know what we have.”

“I think we should just go for it,” Tamara argued. “I don’t want them messing this up.”

“You know that’s not the way we’re supposed to do things. Network has the right to see all this first.”

“Oh, I see. You’re Mr. Corporate-Rule-Follower now?”

“No,” he said, his face hardening. “But I am a man with a family who would like to keep his job. We do this on our own, there’s a very good chance we get fired. You’ll have no problem finding something else. Me, it won’t be so easy.”

She looked out the window, annoyed, but knowing Joe was right.

“Fine,” she said. “But if the network tries to change any of this, our version gets posted to the Internet.”

MR. SHELL HAD BEEN right to keep his eye on the reporter. Perhaps taking her brother had been a mistake, but it had revealed that she was a problem.

If people would just let things go, they had a much better chance of living.

He had watched the report the woman and her editor had just sent to their bosses in New York, and knew it was time to do something about it. But given the slapdown he’d gotten over the death of the girl’s brother, he decided to cover his ass first.

The Director of Preparation called five minutes after Shell sent him an email with a link to the video.

“Tamara Costello appears to be very good at her job,” the DOP said as soon as Shell answered.

“Unfortunately for her, sir.”

“Yes.”

Shell hesitated a moment. “I assume you’d like her removed.”

“Mr. Shell, I believe part of your job is making those decisions yourself. I don’t have time for you to run every little aspect of your operation by me first.”

Shell gritted his teeth, but pushed his frustration down and said, “I’m just bringing this particular case up in light of what happened concerning the subject’s brother.”

“Well, he was a mistake. You should have seen that from the beginning.”

“Yes, sir. You’re right, of course.”

“I’m sure you’ll make the right decision this time, Mr. Shell.”

The line went dead.

THE DIRECTOR OF SURVIVAL was sitting across the table from the DOP. They had both been eating their dinner when the email from Shell came in. Together they had watched the video, then the DOS listened as his counterpart talked to Shell.

“So he was looking for guidance, then?” the DOS asked once the other director had hung up.

“Yes, he was.”

“Disappointing.”

“It is, but given recent history, not necessarily surprising.”

The DOS cut his asparagus into three parts. “Better to know now.”

“Very true.”

“Is his replacement ready?”

“Of course.”

With nothing more to say on the subject, they both began eating again.

“ON PURPOSE?” ASH asked.

Chloe was still watching him. “I know it’s hard to believe, but yes.”

“I’m not really sure I know what you mean by that.”

“What I mean is that this group of people we’re up against, the group you’ve unintentionally become entangled with, is working toward bringing about the end of civilization as we know it.”

He tried hard not to laugh as he shook his head. “You’re starting to make the idea of a fake moon landing sound reasonable.”

“I warned you,” she said.

“You did.” He should have known better than to ask questions. Whatever delusions these people were operating under were their business, and obviously had little to do with his kids. But as he watched the road his curiosity got the best of him. “Just exactly how are they supposed to be bringing about the end of mankind?”

“I didn’t say the end of mankind. I said the end of civilization as we know it.”

“What’s the difference?”

She was silent for a moment, then said, “How many people are on Earth right now, at this minute?”

With a smirk, he said, “Well, I’m not sure I have the exact number.”

She frowned at him. “Roughly.”

“I don’t know. Four or five billion?”

“Over seven.”

“Okay, seven.”

“When do you think we reached one billion?”

“I have no idea. Why is it—”

“The early eighteen hundreds. Just a little over two hundred years ago. That means it took over a hundred thousand years for us to reach that number. Do you know how long it took to reach two billion? Just over one hundred and twenty years. Three billion, thirty-three years. Four, fifteen. You see the pattern?”

“So are you saying we’re growing so much it’s going to bring about the end of civilization?”

“These people, the ones that Dr. Karp works for, they believe exactly that. They believe the end of civilization is impossible to avoid. But they also believe that if they can control how things end, they can create a new beginning without sacrificing the resources the planet still has.”

“Okay, so how are they planning to do that?”

“You ready? This is the good part, relatively speaking. They’re going to eliminate over 99% of the current population.”

Ash snorted a laugh. “Right. Sure. They’re going to kill off 99% of the planet.”

“More than ninety-nine. We don’t know the exact target number, but we think they want to end up with around ten million people. They start again, only without losing any of the knowledge the human race has already obtained.”

Ash shook his head. This was ridiculous. Chloe, Matt, Rachel, and the others had been more than helpful, but they were clearly operating on the fringe of reality. Check that, beyond the fringe.

“What do you think was going on at that base where you and your family lived? You said Matt told you, right? It was a test, Ash. They’re trying to find the best method to get rid of everyone else.”

And when they do finally unleash whatever it is they come up with, you better believe that those they've chosen to remain behind will have been immunized against the disease by a vaccine developed from someone who had true immunity." She paused. "Someone like you and your children."

The sneer that had been on his face disappeared.

"No one ever believes it the first time," she went on. "I didn't. So I don't expect you to, either. But you've heard it now. It's there in your mind. In time, you'll see that everything I've told you is true."

See that everything you've told me is crazy, more like it. But even as he thought that, there was a small kernel of doubt tapping at the back of his mind.

He took the next exit, then switched places with her and tried to get some sleep. But each time he started to drift off he would see the same emergency vehicles that had been parked on his street the night Ellen died. Only they weren't parked just on his street now.

They were everywhere.

NIGHT HAD DESCENDED over Fort Irwin, the sky filling with the arcing band of the Milky Way. But Tamara wasn't looking at the sky as she paced impatiently near the lights Bobby had set up for her next report. Joe had disappeared fifteen minutes earlier. She had been under the impression he was taking a call from the network, but how long did it take for them to say, "Yes, play the video"?

The three of them had already been waiting for over an hour for a response. An hour! It was enough to make her want to punch the side of the van over and over. Couldn't the network see how important this was? Couldn't they understand she needed to do this for her brother? The reporting was good, and the evidence was there. She just needed the damn go-ahead.

Maybe she should have just ignored Joe, and had Bobby send it up live during her spot. Maybe they should still do that.

Not maybe.

With a renewed sense of determination, she headed around the van to tell Bobby to get the report ready, but before she reached the door, the sound of multiple helicopters cut out any ability to have a conversation.

She moved to the end of the van. Over the past several hours, there had been a drastic increase in the amount of helicopters landing near the media area. Every time they arrived, Tamara would check, hoping they'd be the two helicopters from earlier, the ones with the man who'd killed Gavin. But they hadn't returned.

Until now.

"Bobby!" she yelled.

Realizing he couldn't hear her over the noise, she ran back and grabbed his arm, then pointed at the camera. As soon as he picked it up, she pulled him to the end of the van. When he saw the helicopters, he raised the camera and turned it on.

Like earlier, several men climbed out of each helicopter, then gathered together. When they finished talking, they started heading as a group in the general direction of the media area.

"What are they doing?" Bobby asked.

"I don't know," Tamara replied. "But try to get a shot of each of their faces."

"It's a little dark." While the landing area was flooded with bright light, the media area had to make do with a few scattered floodlights on poles.

"Do what you can."

As the men got closer, she could see the two in front scanning around, looking for something. Then one of them seemed to settle on the PCN van. He said something to the other man, then the whole group veered slightly to the left and headed straight for Tamara and Bobby.

"What the hell?" Bobby said.

The men were still a good hundred feet away when someone grabbed Tamara and Bobby's arms from behind. They both turned quickly. It was Peter Chavez.

"Come on," he said. "We've got to get you out of here."

"What are you talking about?" Tamara asked.

"I'm talking about saving your lives."

"Saving our lives?" She tried to pull her arm out of his grasp, but he didn't let go.

Moving his face close to hers, he said, “Those soldiers? They’re here to kill you. Just like they killed those two kids out in the desert. Like they killed your brother.”

“What? How did you—”

“Come on!”

He pulled at her until she was running along with him. Bobby, who’d heard it all, fell in beside her. Chavez led them on an angle that kept the van between them and the approaching soldiers until they were able to duck around the back of a transmission truck belonging to a Los Angeles network affiliate.

“How do you know that’s what they’re here to do?” Tamara asked, shaken.

“They know about your report. They’ve killed it in New York, and they’ve already got Joe, but you’re still a loose end.”

“Joe? But how—”

“It doesn’t matter,” he said, cutting her off. “We have to keep moving.”

He pushed off the truck, and ran toward the building the media had used to sleep in. Tamara shared a quick look with Bobby, then they both took off after Chavez.

“All the way through,” Chavez whispered once they were inside.

The large room in front still had cots set up all over the place, so they had to weave around them to get to the door on the far wall. Passing through it, Tamara glanced back at the building’s entrance, sure that soldiers would rush through and pursue them. But, so far, they hadn’t shown up.

Perhaps Chavez was wrong. How did he even know the soldiers were after them in the first place?

“Are you sure—”

“Come on, come on!” he yelled.

They were in a corridor now that seemed to run the rest of the length of the building.

“Peter, please,” she said, desperately trying to convince herself that everything was all right. “How do you know they’re really after us?”

Peter kept looking toward the door that led back into the main room, obviously anxious to keep moving. “I have a friend at your network. Dean Gaboury. Do you know him?”

“Dean? Yes, sure.” Dean was one of the suits in charge of afternoon news coverage.

“He told me your story’s been killed, and that Joe’s already been detained. He said they were coming after you, too, and asked if I could hide you someplace safe, until they can get this worked out. Your network doesn’t like the idea of its reporters being arrested.”

“Arrested for what?”

“Does it matter?”

“Jesus,” Bobby said.

“No kidding. Now, let’s go,” Chavez said.

Just as they passed through the door at the end of the hall that led back outside, a voice called out from behind them. “Stop right there!”

Tamara’s fear level skyrocketed.

“Over there,” Chavez said.

He moved across a short expanse of concrete, and pulled open the door of a building that looked very much like the one they’d just exited. Tamara was the last one to pass inside, but Chavez was still able to get the door closed before the soldiers exited the other building.

Halfway through, Tamara stopped. “Hold on, hold on. We can’t keep running like this. What’s really going to happen if they find us? They’ll put us in a room and ask us some questions?”

“You know what they did to those kids in the desert, to your brother.”

Her eyes widened. “But...but we’re on a base. People have seen us, right? They can’t do anything like that to us.”

Chavez stepped over to her and grabbed her shoulders, looking her in the eyes. “All right. The truth. Those men are not in the U.S. Army. They are something else entirely. They operate on a whole different set of rules. Their only goal is to get rid of loose ends. Joe is dead, and if you don’t come with me, you’ll both be next.” He dropped his hands to his side.

“Joe’s dead?” Bobby asked, shocked.

Tamara stared at him, unable to speak.

“Blue pill or red pill,” Chavez said. “Blue pill, you stay in your ignorant world, go out there and talk to your soldier friends, and stay happy for maybe another hour until they put a bullet in your brain. Red pill, I save your lives.”

“I’m taking the red pill,” Bobby said quickly.

Tamara’s lower lip trembled slightly as she licked it. “Okay.”

Chavez nodded once, then continued down the hallway.

When they exited the building, they found themselves in a small parking lot. There were half a dozen cars, a couple pickups, and a medium-sized, white cargo truck. Chavez led them over to the truck. The back was already open so he jumped inside, then held a hand down to help them up.

“This is too obvious,” Tamara said. “They find us in here for sure.”

“Trust me. They won’t.”

Bobby climbed up on his own, then Tamara reluctantly took Chavez’s hand. Once she was on board, he went to the front of the cargo area and touched two of the screws holding the panels in place. A small section of the wall popped open about a quarter inch. He put his fingers into the gap, then pulled it all the way open like a door.

Inside was a three-foot-wide space that ran the width of the truck.

“It’s not a ton of room, but you’ll be safe. The walls are insulated. Still, I wouldn’t talk very much. There’s food and water, and a pot in case you need to relieve yourself.”

“How long do you think we’ll be in there?” Bobby asked, surprised.

“I don’t know.”

“Whose truck is this?” Tamara asked. “I don’t remember it from the roadblock.”

“Don’t worry about it. It’s safe. Once you’re inside, there’s a latch. Close that and no one can open it from out here. Don’t undo it until you hear someone knock three times like this.” He tapped lightly against the metal, knock-knock, then paused a second before adding the final knock. He looked out the open end of the truck as if he’d heard something. “I know you have questions, but now’s not the time. Just get in.”

Bobby immediately went inside.

Tamara looked Peter in the eyes. “You’re not lying to us, right?” she asked, already knowing he wasn’t.

“I’m not.”

“And Joe is dead?”

He nodded. “Yes. I’m sorry. Now get in quickly. Please.”

She took a breath and passed through the opening, then watched with a nightmarish sense of the unreal as Peter closed the door behind her.

IN THE DEAD of night, the landscape of Eastern Oregon didn't look much different than that of the Mojave Desert surrounding Barker Flats. Perhaps it had a bit more scrub covering the ground, but like the Mojave, neither the flatlands nor the nearby mountains had any trees.

Chloe had done well, and had already saved them an hour by the time Ash took over driving again. Their destination was approximately fifty miles north of the Nevada border, in the southeast corner of the state. That was, of course, if Olivia had told them the truth.

What buildings they'd seen so far had been few and far between. There were stretches where it seemed as if this part of the country had either been abandoned or never claimed in the first place. None of it served to boost Ash's confidence.

"Should be five-point-two more miles," Chloe said, her gaze never leaving the road.

Ash glanced at the odometer. She was right. "How do you do that?"

She shrugged. "It's just the way my mind works, I guess."

They drove another tenth of a mile before he asked, "Do you think you could do that before? When you still had your memories?"

"I have no idea."

More silence. "Do you think they did that to you?"

"Can we not talk about this?" she asked, obviously uncomfortable.

"Sorry."

He looked over at her, but she had her back partially turned to him, her eyes staring out the side window. He started to say something else, but decided it was best to leave it alone. Besides, they were closing in on NB7, and he needed to focus so that he didn't miss anything.

According to Olivia, just ahead they would find a road that led to the West.

"It's more asphalt than dirt," she had said. "But not by much."

At the forty-nine-mile mark, Ash started scanning the left side of the road in case Chloe's mileage estimate had been wrong, but it hadn't been. The road was right where she said it would be. It had the forgotten look of having been abandoned to the elements long ago, as if its construction had been well intended, but its promise never fulfilled. Given the fact that it was literally in the middle of nowhere, Ash wondered why it had been built at all.

Even if Olivia had not cautioned them that the road would be watched, Ash would have still kept driving by just like he was doing. She had told them their only chance was if they hiked in. He didn't like the idea of following her instructions precisely, but there didn't seem to be much of a choice.

He drove on for another half mile, then pulled the car to the side of the road. In the wide open landscape, there was really no place to hide the vehicle.

As he turned off the engine, he looked at Chloe. "Stay with the car."

"No way."

"I want to make sure it's still here when I get back with my kids."

She looked outside, scanning both ways down the road. There were no other headlights in sight. "Where would it go?"

"Just stay here."

He got out and circled around to the trunk. From the weapons case, he removed another gun, filled its mag, then set it on the floor of the trunk. He grabbed his spare mags and the container of little bangs, and distributed them between his jeans and his jacket. Picking up the spare pistol, he shut the trunk, then walked around and knocked on the passenger window.

Chloe stared at him for a moment, then lowered it.

“Here,” he said, handing the SIG to her. “Just in case.”

She pulled back as if it might bite her, but then reluctantly took it.

“You know how to fire that?” he asked.

“I’ll figure it out.”

He nodded, then said, “I’ll be back as soon as I can.”

Her only response was to roll the window back up.

He checked both ways before he crossed the empty highway, then angled into the desert on the other side, paralleling the access road that was supposedly being watched. Olivia said NB7 was about a mile and a half in, on the side of the road Ash was currently on.

His eyes quickly adjusted to the moonless night as he made his way through the scrub-covered land. At one point he thought he heard something in the brush. He paused, listening, but the sound didn’t return. He decided it was rabbit, perhaps, or whatever other types of animals might choose to live in this nothingness.

As he passed the mile mark, his jaw tensed. Mike had warned him to be careful about believing anything Olivia said. Maybe this was just a lie. Maybe he was the only thing out here. Maybe Josie and Brandon were hundreds of miles away, and would die because he had chosen to follow the directions of an obviously deranged woman locked up in a secret prison.

If that turned out to be the case, he would go back to the Bluff and kill her.

He slowed his pace. If NB7 was here, he had to be close. Better to sneak up on it than to stumble.

Again, he heard something in the brush. It came from behind him, maybe thirty yards. He crouched down, then looked back the way he’d come, letting his eyes focus on nothing in particular.

There. Just off to the right of the line he’d been following, a shadow hovering above the brush and moving in his direction.

A lookout, he thought. If he’s already seen me, I’m done.

If that was the case, half a dozen others were probably closing in on him from different directions, and he was going to get taken down before he even got to NB7.

Should he run? Stay where he was? Or what?

He looked at the shadow again. It had moved to about forty feet away, then stopped. Carefully, he turned, scanning around, looking for others, but the only thing he could see was more brush. If there was anyone else out there, they had to be lying on the ground.

If he’d had time to play games, he would have kept moving to see if the shadow was really following him. But time was something he didn’t have.

He pulled out his gun, and made a beeline straight for the shadow. Before he’d even gone halfway, it disappeared. Not moved to the right or the left, or any other direction, just disappeared. But he didn’t slow until he was within a few feet of where it had been.

He was sure whoever it was had dropped to the ground, blending in with the brush, but there was no one there. He swung his gun around, angling it toward the ground, knowing the person had to be close.

“I could have killed you if I wanted to.”

He whipped around. Standing directly behind him, her gun at her side, was Chloe.

“I told you to stay with the car,” he whispered.

“And I never said I would. You need me,” she whispered back.

“I don’t need you. I can do this myself. Now just go back.”

He turned and started walking in the direction he’d been headed. After only a couple of seconds, he could hear her following him.

“Chloe, it’s not safe,” he said, turning back.

“And going into the psych hospital earlier was?”

“That was different. You were the one who knew the layout. I had no choice. But you don’t know this place. I’m not going to put you in a position where you might get hurt.”

“Not your decision,” she said. “I’m here, and I’m coming with you. Now let’s go, unless you want to stand here all night arguing.”

Short of carrying her back to the car and locking her in the trunk, he saw there was nothing he could do to stop her.

“Okay,” he said. “But you do everything I say.”

He took her silence for assent, though deep down, he knew it wasn’t.

For the next five minutes, his concerns that Olivia had been lying continued to grow. There was nothing but dirt and brush. No buildings at all.

“What’s that?” Chloe whispered a couple minutes later.

She was still behind him, so he had to look back to see what she was talking about. She pointed twenty degrees to their right. It took him a moment, but then he saw it, too.

Just ahead, the terrain dipped into a shallow wash, then rose on the other side, perhaps not high enough to be called a hill, but definitely higher than this side of the wash. At the very top was a post or, maybe, the trunk of a small tree. It appeared to be less than a half-foot in diameter, and stood two feet above the brush.

She was right. After that, it was easy to pick out others. They spotted seven in all, stretching in what looked like a line blocking their path.

“A fence?” she suggested.

“Seems kind of low.”

They walked through the wash, then up the embankment, finally stopping ten feet short of the first post Chloe had seen. Though it was hard to judge color in the darkness, Ash got the sense the pole had been painted to blend in with its surroundings. Why? There didn’t appear to be anything attached to it, or anything sitting on the flat top. It was just...a post.

Chloe pulled out her flashlight and flicked it on.

“Turn that off. Someone will see it,” he whispered.

“Anyone who can see this probably watched us walk up the hill,” she told him, then pointed the light at the post.

Instead of wood, it appeared to be fabricated out of a plastic-like material. Near the top, a thin slot ran all the way around the post with what looked like curved, tinted glass covering it.

“Any idea what this is?” he asked.

“Motion sensor?”

“Could be,” he said. “Let’s see how far it goes.”

They went approximately seventy-five feet to the right before the row of posts took a sharp left turn. As they followed the new section, the hill fell away and they were on level ground again. Three hundred feet this time, then another turn to the left.

They’d gone twenty feet down this third part when Chloe touched Ash’s arm.

“There it is,” she said.

Ash had seen it, too.

Land had been carved out of the hill across from them and leveled off. Built exactly in the center of this area was a one-story, commercial-style building with no visible windows. On a large concrete slab next to it were several satellite dishes.

Exactly how Olivia had described NB7.

From their current angle, they could only see the back and west side of the building. There were no cars visible, but given the helicopter that sat on another concrete pad closer to the front of the building, maybe cars weren't necessary. The aircraft was big enough to probably carry up to ten people, not including the crew.

There was a hundred feet between the line of posts and the building, or, as Ash saw it, a hundred feet between him and his children. They had to be there. It was the only possibility. To think otherwise would be pointless.

He continued down, following the odd-looking fence until he could see the front of the building. There were still no windows, but there was a door, and in front of it sat two cars.

He was contemplating walking all the way around to get a look at the east side of the building, the only part they hadn't seen, when two people stepped out the door.

"Get down, get down," he whispered as he crouched into the brush.

They watched the two men walk over to one of the sedans, get in, then drive toward the front of the property. Along that end was a traditional fence with a gate across the entrance road that opened automatically as the car neared. A few seconds later, the vehicle was heading down the half-asphalt, half-dirt road.

That was a problem.

Figure a mile and a half on a bad road would take them two to three minutes tops to reach the highway. If they turned right, no problem, but if they turned left, once they drove another thirty seconds, they'd pass Ash's car parked suspiciously off the side of the road.

So, two and a half minutes plus the time it took to call back to the building, and those inside would know someone was there. He and Chloe had to move before then.

He was pretty sure the posts were motion detectors, perhaps triggered when something passed between them. But while breaking their invisible beam would betray his and Chloe's presence, it would come as a surprise to those inside, and they would be on the defensive as opposed to being on the hunt because they'd been warned by their friends in the car.

A hundred feet. In college, Ash could run the forty-yard dash in four-point-seven seconds. He'd been younger then, and in slightly better shape, but he thought he could still do it in five and a half. And forty yards would actually get him all the way to the front door. Even if there wasn't any kind of delay before the alarm went off, he should still be able to get there before anyone inside had the time to react.

"How fast can you run?" he asked Chloe.

"Fast enough."

"Then that's what we're going to do."

He moved over to the imaginary line of the fence.

"Wait," she said. "What's the plan?"

"The plan? Get my kids back."

He put his head down, then started to run.

THEIR NEW ROOM wasn't that much different than their old one. There were two beds and a bathroom, just like before. The only difference this time was that the door was locked.

Brandon knew the people watching over them had done something to put him and Josie to sleep before they switched rooms, but he had no idea why. The thought that the room they were now in was in an entirely different building in an entirely different state hadn't even crossed his mind. He thought they were still on his dad's base, just down the hall from the room they'd been in before.

His biggest concern at the moment was his sister. She had yet to wake up. He, on the other hand, had been awake for at least a couple hours, maybe even more.

The same guy who'd been bringing them food from the beginning had brought in dinner a while ago. He was the nice one, the guy who always smiled, and seemed to really care about them.

When Brandon asked him if he knew why Josie was still asleep, the man had said, "Because she's still getting over her illness."

That only made Brandon more worried. What if she was getting sick again? That happened sometimes, didn't it? He was sure he'd heard that before. Would she be even sicker this time? Would she even...die?

Thinking that terrified him. His mom and dad were already gone. What was he going to do if Josie wasn't around, either? He'd have no one. No one at all.

He sat on the edge of her bed, wiping her head with a damp towel from the bathroom. He didn't think she had a fever, but he wanted to make sure it stayed that way.

"It's okay, Josie. I'm here."

Ten minutes later, he fell asleep beside to her.

NB7 WAS NOT CONSIDERED a high-priority location for project security. Its isolation was believed to be its best defense. That didn't mean there wasn't a security staff on hand, but it did mean other resources such as constant satellite observation were considered unnecessary. It was, by design after all, mainly a storage and backup shelter facility.

What additional security the building did have consisted of a state-of-the-art motion sensor grid surrounding the perimeter, video surveillance along the road that led to the property, and a car recognition system set up on the highway.

The way this last item worked was that cars traveling on the highway would trip an electronic beam twelve miles either to the South or to the North. This would trigger a hidden camera to take a picture of the car and its license plate, then, in a completely automated process, determine the make, model and year of the car. The vehicle would then be checked off when it crossed the opposite electronic eye on its way out of the area. There was leeway built in to the system to account for slower drivers, and for those who might stop to take a few pictures—something that happened more often than those at NB7 may have expected. But once these items were taken into consideration, if a car failed to trip the second beam in the allotted time frame, an alarm would be activated, and a team would be sent out to check.

Just such an alarm went off at 12:58 a.m. for a 2009 Honda Accord with Florida license plates. It was probably nothing, the head of security thought. He bet the driver had just pulled to the side of the road to take a nap. That had happened, too.

Still, protocol was to dispatch a team.

So he did.

DR. KARP WAS FEELING particularly pleased with himself. He'd been in touch with his research team, and was told all indications were that the new vaccine would work exactly as they'd hoped.

This was the fifth time they'd tested KV-27a, and only the first in which they'd run across someone with immunity. What a bonus that had been. They'd been working on a synthetic vaccine to that point and having multiple problems, but the blood running through the veins of Captain Ash and his children had proved most useful, and the previous problems quickly disappeared. Even the issue of how females versus males reacted was on the cusp of being solved.

The doctor had all but given up hope that they'd find someone like the three surviving members of the Ash family. Between the tests in Tanzania, Bangladesh, Tajikistan, Alaska, Barker Flats, and the unintentional victims of what the media was calling the Sage Flu outbreak, there had been 3578 subjects, of which 3575 had died. That was a success rate of 99.9%, even better than their targeted goal of 99.85%. Which would mean there should be even fewer genetically immune survivors when the official implementation occurred, and thus making it easier for those survivors chosen by the project to control those chosen by nature.

Of course, thinking like that was getting ahead of the game. There were still many obstacles to overcome. But his part was all but done. He was sure of it. Once the vaccine was in production, he could relax and act as consultant for the others as he waited for the great day.

His most immediate task was the children. What he had to do wasn't pleasant, but he was smart enough to understand this was not a task he could delegate. These children would be giving their lives so that he and the others could make things right. In many ways, they were as important to the future as he was. Well, almost.

He would take care of them first thing in the morning before they woke—that would be best. Right now, he was content to let them have one more night of dreams.

Why not? Everything was going so well. Even the outbreak in California had given them more data to back up his work.

Yes, very well, indeed.

“WHAT TIME IS it?” Tamara asked.

Bobby turned the camera back on, its display screen lighting up their tiny room. It was the only clock they had. His cell phone was sitting on the editing console in the van, while hers was in her purse along with the wristwatch she had for work but seldom wore.

“Eleven fifty-three,” he said.

He switched the camera off to save its battery, plunging them back into darkness.

Tamara dropped her chin to her chest. Eleven fifty-three p.m. They’d been in the truck’s secret compartment for over five hours. And who knew how much longer they’d have to stay?

After the first ten minutes in the box had passed, she’d had a moment when she started to think that maybe Chavez was wrong, that maybe the soldiers weren’t there to kill them. But then an image of her brother’s face appeared in her mind. Gavin looked confused and unsure at first, then suddenly his eyes went wide and he started to scream. The bullet. It had been fired by one of the soldiers who were now chasing her.

“Should...should we check?” Bobby had asked. “Maybe they’re gone.”

“No,” she said quickly.

Another silent minute went by, then, as if to confirm Tamara’s response, the sound of several boots running on asphalt could be heard approaching the truck, then stopping at the back.

“Clear!” one voice called out.

“Clear!” a second one chimed in.

There was some scuffling around, then a new voice said, “Team one, recheck the buildings along that row. We’ll take these over here. They’ve got to be in one of them. Say whatever’s necessary to get them into the helicopter, but let’s get this done now.”

Several voices replied, “Yes, sir,” then immediately there was the sound of at least half a dozen people running off.

Say whatever’s necessary to get them into the helicopter...

The words stuck in Tamara’s mind. Any lingering doubts that the soldiers just wanted to talk to them were gone.

As the hours passed, they could hear groups of people running by the truck on five separate occasions. Whether they were the soldiers or not, it was impossible to tell, but it was more than enough to reinforce the idea she and Bobby were better off in their box than anywhere else.

Then an hour passed with no one running by. It was the longest gap there’d been yet. Tamara hoped the others had finally left, and that the next sound she and Bobby heard would be the three knocks on the side of the truck, telling them it was safe to come out.

But the night remained silent.

“Why don’t you stretch out on the floor?” Bobby suggested in a whisper.

Their hidey-hole was set up with cushion-topped metal boxes they could sit on at either end. In the boxes, as they’d found out by touch, were food and drink, and on the floor near Bobby’s side had been the pot for relieving themselves. So far both of them had been able to avoid the need to use it. Between the two metal makeshift seats was an area plenty long enough for either of them to lie down, just not both at the same time.

“I’m fine,” she said softly. “You can use it.”

“I know you’re not fine, because I’m not fine. Now get some rest. The sooner you’re done, the sooner I can lie down.”

“Bobby, seriously. You can go first.”

“Absolutely not. You first, or neither of us go.”

Even though she knew he couldn’t see her, she rolled her eyes, but as soon as she lay on the floor, she was thankful he’d forced her to do it. She was completely drained. The time since they’d arrived outside the roadblock at Sage Springs seemed to have blurred into one long, living nightmare.

“We probably lost our jobs,” she said as she closed her eyes.

“They won’t fire us. They’ll make us stars. ‘The reporter and the cameraman forced into hiding by...’”

“ ‘...a rogue military force,’ ” she finished for him.

“Oh, that’s good. I like that.”

They fell silent for a moment.

“Who do you really think they are?” he asked.

“I wish I knew.”

He asked her another question a moment later, but though she could hear his voice, she couldn’t make out the words as exhaustion took over, and she fell into a deep sleep.

THE LOW TONE of the motion sensor alarm suddenly pulsed out of the speaker in the security room right off the lobby at NB7. The head of security had been sitting at the monitoring desk, talking to one of his men. The moment the alarm went off he whirled his chair around and looked back at his computer.

His first thought was that the two men he'd sent out to check for the missing car on the highway had somehow triggered the motion sensors.

By the time he took a good look at the warning screen, six seconds had passed.

Cameras covered the entire grounds, but there was no sense in constantly watching them since the system would alert security to any problems, at which point the video could be reviewed.

Though he immediately saw the others weren't there, the head of security wasn't worried. They'd had these alarms in the past, and all had turned out to be animals wandering in from the desert. The beams were supposed to be elevated high enough to cut out this kind of false alarm, but it still happened.

As he tapped the link to the video, he said, "Luke, go out front and check."

The other man got up from his chair and went into the lobby.

By the time the head of security was looking at the video feed from the west side of the building, ten more seconds had gone by.

There was nothing on the screen but the same monotonous desert he'd been looking at since he'd been assigned to this post. Apparently whatever had triggered the alarm had wandered back out. As he hit the button that would take the video back a full minute, he heard Luke open the front lobby door and go outside. He almost called out to stop him, but realized he was too late.

He shrugged—no big deal.

Eight more seconds passed.

The video started playing again. He watched in real time for several seconds, then tapped on fast-forward, making the footage go at double speed.

Suddenly, he slapped the keyboard, pausing the image. "What the hell?"

Just then, out in the lobby, the front door opened again.

• • • •

ASH DIDN'T HAVE A STOPWATCH, but he was pretty sure he reached the sidewalk near the front door in less than six seconds. Not as good as he hoped, but good enough. As he stopped, he looked back and saw that Chloe was still right behind him.

The entrance was actually a double metal door that opened outward. It was taller than normal and a little bit wider, obviously designed to accommodate large items. There was a security card reader mounted on the wall next to the door, which was a pretty good sign that the door was locked.

The wear marks indicated the right half of the door was the one used most. Ash moved over to the hinges, then pulled the box of little bangs out of his pocket. His intent was to use one of the white crackers along the edge, and hoped it was enough to blow the door loose. But just as he was lifting the lid off the box, the knob turned and the door swung out.

There was no way Chloe could get out of sight, so she froze in place.

The man who stepped through the doorway saw her immediately, but hesitated for a second, caught off guard. That was all the time Ash needed to put the barrel of his gun against the man's back.

“Nothing stupid, agreed?” Ash said, giving his gun a nudge.

“You shouldn’t be here,” the guy said.

“Is that a yes or a no?”

“Sure. Nothing stupid.”

“Good.” Ash glanced at Chloe. “Check him.”

Chloe stared at the man, not moving.

“You said you wanted to help,” Ash said.

She took a breath, then nodded. She first took the man’s gun from the holster on his belt, then frisked him quickly as if he might explode at any second.

“Just the pistol,” she said when she was done.

“What’s inside?” Ash asked the man.

“Lobby,” he replied.

“Anyone there?”

“No.”

“You’re lying.”

The man hesitated. “Not in the lobby. In the security office next to the lobby. One guy.”

Ash shoved the man toward the reader on the wall, then pulled the guy’s security card from his belt and touched it to the pad.

The latch clicked, and Ash pulled the door open.

“Let’s go.”

• • • •

THE HEAD OF SECURITY activated the general alarm then jumped out of his chair. His hand was moving to the gun at his side as he pulled open the door to the lobby.

“On your knees.”

A woman with milk-chocolate skin and fire in her eyes stood just on the other side of the door, a pistol in her hand pointed straight at his chest.

“Now,” she said.

Beyond her, he could see Luke kneeling on the floor. Standing behind him was a man with a bandaged face, and a gun very much like the one the woman was holding.

“This is private property,” the head of security said, buying time. NB7’s security force was small, but more than adequate to handle the man and the woman, even given the fact that twenty percent of his force was out on the road at the moment, looking for the lost car. “I’d advise you to put your guns down and lie on the floor.”

“Your. Knees,” the woman said again.

He moved his hands in front of him, holding them palms out. “Hold on. I don’t think you fully appreciate the situation you’re in. There’s more than just the two of us. It would be best if you’d—”

“Chloe, switch,” the man holding the gun on Luke said. “I’ll deal with him.”

“No,” the woman, Chloe, replied. “I got this.” Her gaze bore into the man’s eyes. “Knees.”

He grinned and started to shake his head. “Now that’s not going to—”

The bullet tore through his leg just above his knee. The pain was so intense he didn’t even realize he’d fallen to the ground.

“That wasn’t so hard, was it?” she asked, as she removed the gun from his holster.

DR. KARP HAD JUST STARTED to drift off when the general alarm began to pulse. In his half-asleep state, it had at first confused him. He reached for the clock he assumed was on the nightstand to turn it off, but there was nothing there. That's when his eyes popped open and he sat up.

The alarm.

NB7 had always been considered a safe location, its whereabouts known only to a handful of project members. The only reason Dr. Karp and his team were there was because the outbreak in California meant there was a microscope on the state, and the Directors had felt moving the assets—the Ash children—out of state was a good idea. NB7 was the closest and most logical location. Since the doctor had used the facility a few times in the past, he had no problems with the plan.

But now the alarm was going off. Why?

He grabbed the room phone and pushed the number for Security. After the fifth ring, he hung up. His confusion was now turning to concern. He hoped it was just a false alarm, but what if it wasn't?

He pulled his clothes on as quickly as he could. If this was real, and the facility had somehow been breached, then he knew exactly what he had to do.

The children. He had to dispose of them.

Now.

• • • •

“WELL, IF THEY DIDN'T know we were here before, they do now,” Ash said, as the low pulsating alarm droned through speakers in the lobby.

“Here,” Chloe said.

She tossed him a couple of long, plastic strips she'd taken out of a pouch on the wounded man's belt. They were ties that could be used as handcuffs. As Ash bound his man's wrists and ankles, Chloe did the same with her guy.

“My leg,” the man pleaded. “I'm going to bleed to death.”

“Yeah,” Chloe said. “You probably will.”

Ash came over and looked at the man's leg. It was a mess. “You want me to tie that off?” he asked.

“Yes. Yes, please!”

Ash crouched down. “Then tell me where the children are.”

“The...the children?”

Without hesitation, Ash placed the muzzle of his gun against the man's other leg. “I'm not going to ask again.”

“They're inside. Bottom level.”

“How many kids?”

“Two,” the man said quickly. “A boy and a girl.”

They're here, Ash thought. We found them.

He ground the muzzle into the man's leg. “Where on the bottom level?”

Behind them, a door that led into the rest of the building flew open, and several men poured out, opening fire. Ash was in a poor position with his back to them, so he dove through the doorway into the security office. Chloe had been better situated, and was able to get a couple of shots off before she joined him.

“How many?” he asked her.

“I counted four.”

He was tucked right up against the doorjamb. “Hit any?”

“One down for sure. Maybe two.”

“You’re pretty good with that.”

“Yeah. Bet you’re glad I came along now, aren’t you?”

Instead of answering, he peeked around the edge, his gun ready. Apparently, the men who’d come rushing in hadn’t known exactly in which direction to fire. There was plenty of damage all over the room, not the least of which were the two now dead men Ash and Chloe had just tied up. Wherever the others were, though, they were staying out of sight.

“Here,” Ash said, handing Chloe his gun.

He retrieved the box of little bangs, pulled out four of the gray crackers, and checked their numbers. He then activated the controller.

“You in the office,” a voice called out. “There’s only one way out of that room and we’ve got it covered. Toss your weapons out here, then step out with your hands where we can see them.”

The man had asked for weapons to be tossed out, so that’s exactly what Ash did. He threw the four crackers into the room, trying to arc them around so that they wouldn’t all fall in the same place.

“You have ten seconds to toss your guns out here,” the voice said.

“We’re not going to wait that long,” Ash told him.

He set off the little bangs, mentally crossing his fingers that they did what Pax had promised.

They did, and then some.

Even from behind the wall where he was, the bangs were so loud Ash immediately threw his hands up over his ears. Chloe tried to do the same, but was holding the two SIGs so was less than successful.

“Gun,” he yelled.

She didn’t seem to hear him, so he grabbed his pistol from her and raced through the door.

While the lobby looked basically untouched, the four men who’d been there were all on the ground. Two were unconscious, while one looked like he wanted to be. The fourth guy still had enough wits about him to try to aim his weapon at Ash, but Ash’s bullet hit him in the forehead before the guy had a chance to pull his trigger.

Chloe found some more ties and secured the other three men.

“You all right?” Ash asked her.

She touched her ear. “Ringing. But I can hear you now.”

Ash grabbed a security card off the nearest man’s belt, then used it to open the door to the rest of the building.

• • • •

DR. KARP HAD JUST LEFT his room when a loud explosion reverberated down from the ceiling.

“What the hell was that?” someone said.

Several of the doctor’s technicians were in the hallway because of the alarm. Now most looked truly scared. Although their jobs were ultimately concerned with death, they were not interested in putting their own lives on the line.

Neither was the doctor, but he knew he couldn’t show that. There had always been the possibility his life might need to be sacrificed. It was something he understood from the very beginning. It was also expected that in the face of sacrifice, a full project member would still keep the goals of the project in mind, and carry out whatever tasks were necessary to protect it.

So, despite whatever the explosions on the floor above might mean, he knew he still had work to do.

“Learner, Ramos, I need you to come with me.”

Two of the technicians broke from the crowd and followed the doctor to the elevator.

MOST EVERYONE AT Cryer's Corner was asleep. The Flu Crew, as the segregated group had come to call themselves, was spread throughout the café. The only two who still seemed to be awake were Martina and Ben. They were lying on the floor next to the booth in the back corner.

Understandably, blankets were in short supply. The residences of Cryer's Corner had been able to scrounge enough so most of the girls had one, but the men had to sleep in jackets and whatever else they could find to wear.

Thankfully, though, the heater in the café worked well enough that no one had to dress like they were spending the night in the Arctic.

"Do you think this might be the last night we remember?" Martina asked.

"God, I hope not. I'm supposed to go to Europe this summer. I hate to think of all those Italian girls I wouldn't be able to meet."

"Ha ha. Funny. I'm serious. This flu is supposed to come on quick, and, and...that's it."

"Paul's still around," Ben said.

"Yeah, but he's sick."

"I'll bet you a glass of orange juice he's still here in the morning."

She couldn't help but smile. Ben had been optimistic since she'd watched him drive into the desert to get Paul. He was always trying to keep things light and put a good spin on what was happening. Too bad he was three years older than she was, and in college. Of course, she'd be in college in the fall...

Well, not of course, she realized. She wasn't likely to be anywhere in the fall.

"What's it like being on your own?" she asked.

He glanced at her. "You'll find out soon enough."

"Tell me."

He looked back at the ceiling. "Well, I'm not as good a cook as my mom. And you get bills every month from all these people for water and electricity and your cell phone and your rent. I don't like that part."

"Yeah, but you get to set your own schedule. Stay up as late as you want. Go wherever you'd like."

"True. That is nice. It's a balance, like everything else, you know? You just hope the side with the good things is heavier than the side with the bad."

She snorted. "Seems like the bad side's pretty heavy right now."

"It ain't light, that's for sure. But there are some good things."

"Doubtful."

"You learned how to use a CB. That's a skill you never had before."

Despite herself, she laughed.

"You got to climb up on top of a gas station."

"You saw me?"

"Of course. You got to meet me. That's gotta count for something."

She held her tongue, worried she'd say something stupid.

"I promise," he said. "Tomorrow won't be the last morning you wake up."

She looked at him.

"Second to last, maybe. But not the last," he told her, then smiled.

She knew he was just trying to make her laugh, but suddenly an image of her mom's face appeared in her mind. Her mom who'd been so proud of her, such a big supporter of everything she did.

Martina couldn't help the tears that began to flow, nor could she stop them.

Ben immediately moved over to her, putting his arms around her. "Hey, it's okay. I'm sorry. It was a bad joke."

"No," she said, her head tucked in his shoulder. "It was funny. I just...I just started thinking about...home."

She continued to cry as he stroked her hair, whispering, "Everything's going to be okay."

Her strength drained away with her tears, and she could feel sleep taking hold. Maybe it would be all right. Maybe it would all be fine.

She heard a noise right before she fell asleep. It didn't completely register, but somewhere in the back of her mind she knew what it was.

A cough.

ASH WAS UNDER no illusion that the six men they'd left in the lobby were the entire security contingent at NB7, but he also didn't want to waste time tracking down the other ones. He'd deal with them as they showed up.

The lower level was where he needed to get to, but how?

The hallway on the other side of the lobby door seemed to run from one end of the building to the other. To the left there were four doors, and to the right, two.

"This way," he said to Chloe, heading left.

Three of the four doors were on the same side the lobby was on. The first they came to was one of these. Ash tried the knob, expecting it to be locked, but it wasn't. The space inside was dark. He reached around the jamb, located a light switch, and flipped it on. The room was about twice as wide as the lobby. Set throughout were rows of heavy wide shelves that went all the way to the ceiling, but were all empty.

They checked the other two rooms on the same side and found identical spaces.

They then went to the door on the right. It was locked, but clicked open as he touched the security badge to the pad on the wall.

This time they didn't find a storage room with empty shelves. They found a spacious warehouse that took up the entire back two-thirds of the building. It was clean and empty, with only half the lights on, probably so that security could walk through without running into anything.

"My God," Chloe said. "It's a depot."

"A depot?" Ash asked.

"Matt said they're set up all over the place for, you know, after. To store whatever the others think they're going to need. Probably a good thing it's not full yet. Humanity's got a little more time before the plug gets pulled, I guess."

Ash wasn't sure what to make of the space, or what Chloe had said, but he'd save that for later. "Do you see a way down?" he asked.

They both scanned the warehouse.

"What's that?" she asked, pointing across the room.

There was another one of the security pads mounted on the wall, but there didn't seem to be any doors in the vicinity.

"I don't know."

They ran over to it, then Ash touched the ID to the pad. Nothing happened. He touched it again. Still nothing.

"Whatever it's for, I don't think it can help us," he said. "There's got to be a way down some—"

The sound of an electronic motor caused Ash to whip his head around. The floor just to the right of the ID pad lifted into the air like a blast door. It was thick and heavy, and had fitted so seamlessly into the floor that neither Ash nor Chloe had noticed it.

He stepped over, getting there before the door was halfway up, then smiled.

Below it was a set of stairs.

DR. KARP AND THE TWO technicians, Learner and Ramos, took the elevator to level four, the lowest level of the facility.

Since their arrival the previous afternoon, Dr. Karp had requested that two security guards be stationed on level four at all times. He really didn't think there would be a problem, but with the escape of the children's father from Barker Flats, and the earlier experience a colleague had had with Lauren Scott's disappearance, he didn't want to take any chances.

The two security men were standing just outside the elevator, guns drawn, when the door opened. As soon as they recognized the doctor, they dropped their weapons to their side.

"Do you know what's going on?" the doctor asked as he stepped out of the elevator car.

"No, sir," one of the guards said. "No word from up top yet. They're probably busy dealing with whatever the situation is."

"Did you hear the explosion?"

The men glanced at each other.

"What explosion, sir?"

"Maybe three or four minutes ago, on the top floor."

"Do you think one of us should go up and check?" the second guard asked.

"I'd rather you both stay here," the doctor said, which made it an order.

"Yes, sir." The first guard paused for a moment, then said, "With your permission, sir?"

"Yes?"

"When the alarm went off, per procedure we stationed ourselves here. But if it's okay with you, one of us could go to the substation down the hall, and bring up the security cameras so we can determine what's going on."

The doctor thought for a moment, then nodded. "Good idea. Report to me as soon as you know. I'll be with the subjects."

"Yes, sir."

THE STAIRS ENDED IN a brightly lit room, approximately fifteen feet square. The only things there were an elevator door and a call button. As soon as Chloe joined him, Ash pushed the button.

Almost immediately, the heavy door at the top of the stairs began swinging down again, closing them in.

"I'm not sure I like that," Chloe said.

"They're probably designed so both doors can't be open at the same time," he guessed.

"I hope you're right."

The door thudded shut.

Chloe stared at the elevator, then glanced nervously at Ash. "I don't think it's coming."

"It'll be here."

She began rocking slightly back and forth. "Are you sure? Maybe this is just a trap."

"Too elaborate for a trap."

She looked around, her gaze darting from one spot to another.

"What's wrong?" he asked.

She said nothing for a second, then, "I don't like enclosed spaces."

"You were fine in those tunnels at the hospital."

"There was always a way in and out. We're locked in here." Her breathing began to increase.

"Are you going to be okay?"

She gave him a single nod, but he could see it was an effort for her. Then, soundlessly, the elevator door opened. With a relieved gasp of breath, she raced in.

“This is an enclosed space, too,” Ash said as he entered.

“Yeah, but it’s going somewhere.”

There was a row of five buttons, and another security pad on the control panel. The top button was lit up. Ash touched the one on the bottom, figuring that would take them to the lowest level, but nothing happened. He tapped the security pad with the badge, then touched the button once more. This time the button flashed red, and the car remained stationary. He used the badge again, then tried the fourth button down. Flashing red, no movement. The third button down received the same response. He did it once more for the second button.

This time it lit up green, and the car began to move.

Great, he thought. He’d taken the badge of someone limited to only the first lower level. He hoped to God he’d find something there that would get him to the bottom.

As the car began to stop, he said, “Move to the side and get ready.”

She went left, and he went right, positioning himself so he could see out but duck quickly for cover if need be. He raised his gun, then tensed as the doors began to slide open.

There were half a dozen people just outside. None, though, was holding a weapon. They froze as a group. All, that was, except one in the back who started running down the hall away from them.

Ash stepped out quickly. “Stop!”

The man skidded to a halt.

“Don’t hurt us!” one of the others shouted.

“Walk back here now, and I won’t shoot you.”

The runner turned around, then began retracing his steps back to the group, his arms in the air.

“Who are you?” a man standing in the middle asked.

Ash moved his gaze quickly over them. “How many of you have access to the bottom level?”

No one moved.

He pointed his gun at the guy who ran. “How many?”

“We...we all do,” the man said.

“Good. You have your badge?”

The man nodded. “Yes.”

“Then you’re coming with us.”

The man’s eyes widened as Ash reached out and grabbed his arm.

“No,” Chloe said.

Everyone looked at her, including Ash.

“I want that one.” She pointed at the man in the middle who’d asked who they were.

“Why me?” he said, sounding frightened.

“Sorry, buddy,” Ash said. He moved over and grabbed Chloe’s choice. “You’re with us.”

DR. KARP STOOD IN THE entrance to the room, watching the children. The boy had fallen asleep beside his sister, his arm lying protectively over her shoulder.

Such a waste, the doctor thought.

In the morning, he had planned to take sections of their vital organs before their bodies were disposed of, but now there would be no time for that. They needed to disappear to prevent any potential connection to the project.

Like most of the project’s facilities that Dr. Karp used, this one had something that could handle just such a problem. There was a biosafe level-four laboratory on this very floor. It had three specialized chambers for the most delicate work. In the case of an emergency, a code could be entered into the system, and the chamber in question would go through a series of events designed to render whatever was in the room harmless. First, fire would be blasted into the room at temperatures exceeding 2,370° F. Though this would ensure nothing survived, the project Directors didn't want to take any chances, so next a quick hardening polymer, stronger than most metals, would be pumped into the room, filling it to capacity and sealing away forever anything that was in the room.

The chambers were not meant to serve as tombs, but the doctor knew the Directors would approve of his improvisation.

In the hall outside the patients' room, he heard two gurneys being rolled in his direction. He moved to the side just as Ramos brought the first one in. Learner followed right behind him with the second.

The doctor watched to make sure the children didn't wake up while they were being transferred, then said, "I'll meet you in the lab."

He had to stop by the medical supply room first to pick up something that would let the children slip away before the first flame licked their skin.

Such a waste.

AS SOON AS the elevator doors closed, Ash said, “Take us all the way down.”

“No problem,” the man said.

He touched his card to the pad, then pressed the button for the bottom floor.

Ash shoved the man against the wall. “Where are the children?”

“Your kids are in one of the rooms in back. I can take you there.”

It took Ash a second to realize the man had not said “the kids,” but “your kids.”

“You know who I am?” he said, pressing his gun against the man’s stomach.

“You’re Daniel Ash, right?” The man shot a quick look at Chloe. “You got my note.”

Note? Ash took a step back.

“Yes,” Chloe said. “Thank you.”

Ash stared at the man. “You’re the guy who—”

“Why do you think I picked him?” Chloe said.

Ash dropped his gun to his side. “Sorry. I didn’t know.”

“It’s okay. I get it,” the man said.

“What’s your name?”

The man hesitated for a moment, then said, “Winger.”

“Thank you, Winger.”

Matt’s inside man nodded uncomfortably, then glanced over at Chloe. “They did a good job on you. But I still recognized you. It’s your eyes. They can’t change that.”

Chloe said nothing.

“Are my kids all right?” Ash asked.

“Last I saw them, yes. But Dr. Karp headed down here when the alarm went off. I don’t know what he’s planning on doing.”

Ash’s anxiety rose as he considered the possibility that he might still be too late.

But before anyone could say anything else, the elevator began to slow.

• • • •

ON SUB-BASEMENT FOUR, the arrival of the elevator was always preceded by the soft whoosh of air moving around the car as it reached its lowest point. Unlike when Dr. Karp arrived, there was only one of the security men standing in the elevator lobby, a guy by the name of Montrose. Wyle, his partner, hadn’t returned yet from checking the surveillance footage.

As soon as Montrose heard the whoosh, he drew his gun and tensed. From down the hall he thought he heard footsteps, but his attention was focused on the door, so he paid them little attention.

The elevator settled in place, then paused for half a second before the doors slid open.

Montrose let out a breath and relaxed a little. It was just one of Dr. Karp’s orderlies. He’d probably been called down to give the doctor a hand.

“They’re back with the subjects,” the guard started to say, but the only thing he got out of his mouth was, “They’re back—”

It seemed unnecessary to go on, given the two guns that appeared from either side of the open door, aimed directly at his chest.

• • • •

“GUN ON THE GROUND,” Ash said softly.

The security guard dropped his pistol by his foot.

“Kick it over here.”

The man seemed reluctant, so Ash wagged the SIG’s barrel to remind the guy who was in charge. The gun skidded across the floor a moment later.

“Now on your knees.”

Again, there was a hesitation, but before Ash could repeat the command, the man complied.

Carefully, both Ash and Chloe came out from the protection of the elevator. Ash motioned for her to bind the man’s hands and legs while he stood back a few feet. Once she was done, he put a foot on the man’s chest and pushed him all the way to the ground.

“Where’s Dr. Karp?” he asked.

“I don’t know,” the man replied.

Ash put his foot on the man’s neck and pointed his gun at the guy’s head.

“I will kill you.”

“He...he said he was going in back. To the holding rooms.”

Ash glanced at Winger. The orderly nodded once, confirming that’s where his children were.

“You here alone?” Ash asked the guard.

“Yes,” the man said quickly.

Ash immediately knew he was lying. He leaned down and put the SIG’s muzzle against the man’s forehead. “Those kids your Dr. Karp has back there? They are my kids.”

The man’s eyes widened in surprise.

“Don’t think for a second I won’t pull this trigger,” Ash continued. “How many other guards are there?”

“One.”

Ash pressed the gun into the man’s skin.

“I swear! Only one.”

“Where is he?”

“He...went with the doctor.”

Ash stood, then looked at Winger. “Which way?”

• • • •

MONTROSE’S PARTNER WYLE heard most of the conversation from just around the corner. Though only one person other than Montrose had done the talking, Wyle could tell there was another person with him.

“Where is he?” the voice said from the elevator lobby.

“He...went with the doctor,” Montrose said.

Wyle couldn’t help but smile. Montrose had held it together, and given him a chance to deal with the situation.

As quietly as possible, Wyle took several steps backward.

“Which way?” the voice said.

“Around and to the left.” This was a new voice, confirming that there was definitely more than one unfriendly.

Wyle raised his Beretta, his finger poised on the trigger.

• • • •

ASH WALKED TO THE EDGE of the lobby. Just beyond was a corridor that went left and right. He listened, but the only thing he could hear was a steady hum of the ventilation system.

“How far down?” he asked Winger.

“About thirty feet. Then we take the hall on the right. That’ll get us all the way back.”

“Okay. Stay close behind me.” He glanced at Chloe. “Ready?”

She nodded.

Leading with his gun, Ash ran into the hallway.

He saw the other guard a split second before he heard the double tap of the man’s gun. Just as Ash pulled the trigger of his SIG, searing pain flashed up his arm as a bullet pierced his skin. The hit caused him to twist to the side, sending the shot from his gun well to the left of its intended target.

Not missing a beat, though, Ash pulled his trigger again, moving his arm in an arc and sending five quick shots in the direction of the guard. Chloe, kneeling around the corner from the lobby, fired several rounds at the same time.

The guard was only able to get a single wild shot off before he was caught in the barrage and tumbled back onto the floor.

Ash rushed forward, his gun ready if the man even twitched. But it was unnecessary. The man wasn’t going to move, not now, and not ever again.

Ash allowed himself to look at the wound on his left arm. The bullet had grooved his skin a couple inches below his shoulder. It was painful, but not debilitating. He turned back to the others.

Chloe was helping Winger off the floor. There was blood on the man’s shirt, concentrated mainly on the right side of his abdomen. A gut shot.

“I’m okay,” the man said once he was on his feet. But he clearly wasn’t. His breathing was labored, and he was doing a lousy job of keeping the pain off his face. “Let’s keep moving.”

“Maybe you should stay here,” Chloe suggested.

He shook his head, then locked eyes with Ash. “We need to get to your children. Now.”

Ash moved up next to him, draped Winger’s arm over his shoulder, then put his own carefully around the guy’s waist.

“That hall?” he asked.

“Yes.”

A SERIES OF AIRTIGHT rooms led into the biosafe level-four lab. Each had a greater and greater negative airflow from the room before it, meaning air would always move toward the lab, not away from it. This would ensure that any accidentally released airborne pathogen would be unable to escape the lab.

It also meant that each door not only sealed the atmosphere in, but it also greatly reduced any noise from the other side. Dr. Karp and his technicians were already two rooms in out of the three. Though there was no need to take the extra precautions they would have had to take if a level-four pathogen had been present in the lab, they still had to close each door before the system would allow them to open the next. So when the gunfight near the elevator took place, they heard nothing.

As they finally entered the lab, Dr. Karp said, “Put them in number three.”

Chamber three was in the corner, and the most logical one to turn unusable.

Ramos wheeled the gurney carrying the Ash girl into the lab first, then Learner tried to follow with the boy. Unfortunately, doing so pretty much clogged up most of the usable space.

“Roll those back into the airlock,” the doctor said impatiently. “Just carry them in.”

As they did this, the doctor set the supplies he'd picked up earlier on the counter. There were two sealed and empty hypodermics, and two small glass bottles, each with more than enough Beta-Somnol to put a grown adult into a final sleep. The children would pass peacefully. Given what would happen in the world soon enough, the doctor couldn't help but feel he was doing the humane thing, something most would be denied.

He opened one of the hypo kits, stuck the needle into the bottle, then started drawing the drug out.
Yes. Very humane.

• • • •

“THAT DOOR THERE,” WINGER said, his voice weakening. “Those are the subject rooms. They're in there.”

“I think it's best if we leave you here,” Ash said. “Do you want to lean on the wall? Or sit on the ground?”

“I...don't know if I can...stand on my own.”

“Okay, no problem.”

Ash tried to ease the man to the floor as gently as possible, but the orderly still sucked in his breath and winced.

“I'm sorry,” Ash said once the man was down.

“It's okay.” Winger tried to smile. “Go get your kids.”

Ash gave him a pat on the shoulder, then he and Chloe moved down the hall to the door Winger had pointed out.

“What's the plan?” she whispered.

“Play it by ear.”

“Oh, okay. So the same plan as before.”

Ash didn't bother to respond.

He turned the knob until the latch was all the way out, then he inched the door open just enough so that he could see inside. The space appeared to be set up similarly to the wards back at the Palmer Psychiatric Hospital—central corridor and doors off to the sides.

He eased the door open some more. No shouts, no sounds of movement, nothing.

With a quick warning glance at Chloe, he pulled out the door wide enough to get through, then rushed inside. No one was there.

“Check the doors,” he whispered.

They worked from opposite sides, opening each door and looking in. Every room Ash checked had beds, but all the mattresses were bare and appeared unused.

“Ash!” Chloe called out.

She was standing in the doorway of a room near the back wall. He rushed over and looked in.

There were two beds inside. Both had blankets and sheets but were unmade. He moved in quickly, put a hand on one mattress, then the other. The bed on the left still had the warmth of a body.

He ran past Chloe out of the room, through the outer area and back into the hallway.

Winger's eyes were closed as Ash reached him.

“They're not there!”

“Wha...what?” Winger said, his eyelids barely peeling apart.

“They're not there. No one is. Where are they?”

“Not there?” The orderly looked confused. “I don't...” He stopped, then his eyes opened wider.
“No. Oh, God, no.”

“What?”

• • • •

“OKAY,” RAMOS SAID AS he stepped out of chamber three, where he’d just laid Brandon Ash next to the girl on the floor.

At that very moment, the indicator for the door to the first airlock switched from closed to open on the lab’s computer screen.

Dr. Karp almost missed it. He had just finished activating the controls for chamber three, and had turned away to retrieve the hypos of Beta-Somnol when one of his oldest habits, his need to double-check everything, caused him to look back.

Not for one second did he think whoever had entered was one of the project members there to help him.

This was it. The end. Unless there was some kind of miracle—something he didn’t believe in—his own life would soon be sacrificed.

Before it had been just a possibility. Now, the harsh reality was numbing.

Five seconds passed without him moving at all. Then he remembered his oath, his promise to the project. The job he still had to do.

He grabbed the needles, and was halfway to chamber three before he realized there wouldn’t be enough time. He’d have to start the sequence without administering the drug. Hopefully, the children would remain asleep and feel no pain as the intense heat quickly took their lives. Not quite as humane as he’d hoped, but still better than nothing.

When he got back to the monitor, the indicator for the door between the second and third airlocks was already in the open position. As soon as it closed, the door to the lab would open.

He started punching in the code.

ASH PULLED THE door between the second and third airlocks shut, then jammed down the handle that created the final seal. Already having positioned herself at the door to the lab, Chloe began pulling up its handle the second he finished. Ash got there just in time to grab the edge of the door as it released and yank it open.

“No one move!” he yelled as he and Chloe rushed into the room.

There were three men inside. Two were standing next to a wide window that looked into what appeared to be another room, while the third was at a counter along the right wall in front of a computer. Ash knew this third man. He’d seen a picture of him at the ranch. He was the man responsible for the hell Ash’s family had gone through.

“Dr. Karp, where are my children?”

The doctor’s head tilted slightly to the side, then his eyes narrowed. “Captain...Ash?”

“Where are my children?”

“I’m impressed, Captain. I didn’t know you were this resourceful. Unfortunately, I’m afraid you’re too late.”

“What do you mean?”

“They died in the outbreak at Barker Flats,” the doctor stated matter-of-factly. “You were told that before.”

“We both know that was a lie.”

Dr. Karp lowered his hand, his fingers now resting on the edge of the counter. “Why wouldn’t we have told you the truth?”

Ash took three quick steps forward, closing the gap between them to less than ten feet, and pointed the SIG at the center of the doctor’s face. “Where are they?”

“Seriously, Captain. They’re dead. There’s nothing you can do.”

Dr. Karp’s fingers tapped nervously against the counter.

Without looking at her, Ash signaled Chloe to check the rest of the room. As she moved past Dr. Karp, he eyed her nervously.

“Where are they?” Ash asked the doctor again.

The ends of Dr. Karp’s mouth went up and down in a quick smile. “It doesn’t really matter, you know. You’ll all be dead soon enough. Well, maybe not you, but everyone else. The whole world will be different then.”

“They’re in here!” Chloe yelled.

Ash turned to look. Chloe was standing next to an open door that appeared to lead into the room the window looked in on. Before Ash could react, he caught movement out of the corner of his eye, and turned back just in time to see the doctor hit one of the keys on the keyboard.

Ash wanted to run over to Chloe, but he sprinted to the doctor instead, grabbing the man by his collar.

“What did you do?” Ash demanded.

“I told you,” the doctor said. “There’s nothing you can—”

Chloe screamed out in pain. “Stop it! Stop it!”

Ash looked over. She’d put her leg between the door and the jamb, preventing it from sealing shut. But whatever was closing it was keeping the pressure on her.

“Help her!” Ash yelled at the two men cowering by the window. They hesitated a moment, then jumped up when Ash pointed his gun at them, and moved quickly over to Chloe.

“I’m not sure you want them to do that,” the doctor said.

“What are you talking about?”

“Look for yourself.” Dr. Karp nodded toward the window.

Ash wasn’t about to leave the doctor behind, so he manhandled him across the room, then looked through the window. Josie and Brandon were on the floor. While his son looked like he was asleep, Josie was sitting up, her eyelids only half open.

“Oh, that’s too bad,” the doctor said. “The sound must have woken her. I was hoping they’d both just sleep through it.”

Ash turned on him, and leaned in so that their faces were only inches apart. “What did you do?”

“Once that door seals shut, they die. Moving your friend’s leg will make that happen all the sooner.”

“Open it!”

“Sorry.”

Ash jammed the gun into the side of the doctor’s head. “Open it!”

“If you’re going to shoot me, then shoot. It doesn’t change the fact that once the sequence is initiated, I can’t undo it.” He grinned. “Oh, and if the door remains jammed for more than three minutes, this entire lab will be sterilized at a nice toasty 3000 degrees.”

“Three minutes?”

The doctor shrugged. “Sorry I can’t be of more help.”

“That’s where you’re wrong.”

Ash moved the gun from the doctor’s head, and shot the man in the hip. The doctor’s face went slack in surprise. Before he could fall to the ground, Ash caught him and dragged him around to the doorway.

The two men had made no progress in getting Chloe free. The moment they saw Ash they started to back away.

“You’re going to help me, or I swear to God I will shoot both of you, but not kill you. Do you understand what I mean?”

Apparently, they did.

Ash directed them to grab the edge of the door and pull back as hard as they could.

“More!” he said, as he watched the gap.

At first it didn’t grow at all, then suddenly it moved a quarter inch, a half. When it reached three-quarters of an inch wider, instead of pulling Chloe’s leg out, Ash shoved the doctor’s injured leg in.

Dr. Karp screamed in pain, then yelled, “What are you doing?”

Ash felt no need to answer as he then eased Chloe’s leg out. Once it was free, he said to the two other men, “All right. Let go.”

The doctor screamed out again as the door smashed against him.

“You going to be okay?” Ash asked Chloe.

She clenched her teeth, fighting off the pain. “Don’t worry about me.”

He knew her leg was probably broken, the bone perhaps even crushed. But she seemed to be in control. “Cover them,” he said.

“My pleasure.” She pointed her gun at the two men. “Sit down. Both of you.”

Ash didn’t stay to see if they cooperated. He knew if they didn’t, she’d shoot them. He moved back around to the window. It was the only other way in, but it wasn’t something he could just break through with a chair.

He pulled out the little bangs, choosing the four special white squares. These were the ones Pax said did more than just cause noise. He quickly removed the projection sheets off the adhesive backs, and placed the crackers near each corner of the window. He thought about adding a couple of the noisemakers just in case they might help, but decided against it. He pulled out the controller, then moved back around to the side where the door was. As expected, Chloe's two friends were sitting on the floor.

Ash stepped over the doctor, then said into the gap, "Josie! Josie, can you hear me?"

"D...dad?"

"Yes, sweetie, it's me."

"Dad? But...but...they told us—"

"Josie, I don't care what they told you. I'm here and I'm going to get you out."

"Dad!" She crawled toward the door. "Dad! Oh, my God!"

"Sweetie, you need to listen to me. This is very important. We don't have any time, okay?"

"Dad. Please get us out of here."

"That's what I'm trying to do. Now, listen, I need you to grab your brother and take him against the wall that the window's on. But in the corner, off to the side. Not in front of the window. Do you understand?"

"Um...uh...I think so."

"Please, baby. If you don't do it, none of us are getting out."

"Okay, Dad. I can do it."

"Excellent. Do it now. And be ready. There's going to be a loud bang."

He moved back around, and watched Josie through the window as she pulled Brandon into the front corner. Once they were there, he returned to the door.

"Cover your head," he said.

He didn't look to see if Chloe and the others did the same; he just hit the button.

THE TWO SECURITY MEN who'd been sent out to check for the missing car came back after fifteen minutes. They'd found the car ten minutes earlier, abandoned at the side of the highway not far from the road to NB7, but when they called it in, no one had answered. After being unable to reach anyone for five minutes, they decided to come back.

Everything looked the same out front as it had when they'd left, so they were starting to think their boss had just gone on a bathroom break without feeling the need to have anyone fill in for him. That was, until Collins, the younger of the two, opened the front door.

"Oh, Jesus," he said.

His partner, Edwards, started to push by him, but pulled up short when he caught sight of the scene inside. "What the hell?"

The lobby was riddled with bullet holes. And there were five bodies that they could see. The two men moved in and checked for pulses. Two of their colleagues were still alive, their hands and ankles cuffed with the same ties the security team used.

"What happened?" Collins asked.

Edwards shook his head, then headed over to the security room. That's where he found their boss sprawled across the threshold, cuffed and dead.

"Do...do you think whoever did this is still in the building?" Collins asked.

“I have no idea.”

The younger man hesitated, as if he didn't want to say what was about to come from his lips. “Should we check?”

Edwards looked down at his boss, then at the other men strewn across the lobby. “I'm not sure that would be a good idea.”

Four minutes later, with the pair of unconscious men slumped in the back seat, Edwards and Collins pulled out of the compound then headed south on the highway as fast as they could go.

EVEN THOUGH ASH HAD covered his ears, the noise was deafening. Debris flew across the room, smashing into the wall where the counter was, and destroying the monitor the doctor had been using.

Ash immediately jumped back to his feet and returned to the window. However strong the glass had been, it wasn't strong enough to stand up to the little white squares. He climbed through the opening and went to the corner where Brandon, awake now, clung to his sister.

Ash couldn't believe it. He was looking at his kids. They were alive.

He grinned broadly and held his arms out, but instead of hugging him, they drew back.

“Who are you?” Josie asked, sounding scared.

“It's me, baby. Dad.”

“You're not my dad,” she said.

The bandages. The surgery. Even the contacts. He must look like a stranger to them.

“It's me. I swear. I've just had...an accident. We can talk about it later. We need to get out now.”

Reluctantly, they let him guide them out of the room.

He had no idea how much time they had left, but he knew it was probably less than a minute.

“You see that door?” He pointed at the airlock.

They nodded.

“Go in there. I'll be right behind you. I just have to help my friend.”

They both looked over at Chloe, then back at their father, more confused than ever.

“Go!” he said.

That got them moving.

He knelt down next to Chloe. “Put your arm around me,” he told her.

Once she did, he started to lift her, but then remembered there was one more thing he had to do.

He moved over to the doctor.

“I hope you enjoy your trip to hell.”

The doctor forced a smile. “You can't stop anything, you know that. Your kids would have been better off to go now instead of being alive to witness the world they know melt into nothing.”

“I have a feeling you're the only one who'll be doing any melting in the near future.”

“Humor's not one of your best traits, I'm guessing.”

Ignoring him, Ash said, “Before I go, I have a message for you from an old friend.”

The doctor looked at him, a smirk on his face.

“Olivia says hi,” Ash said. “I got the feeling from her she wasn't too happy you left her to die. Pointed out something about the irony that you'll be dead before she is.”

“Olivia? But she's—”

“Goodbye, Doctor.”

Ash lifted Chloe off the floor and headed for the airlock. Just before he passed through the door, he yelled to the other two men, “Once we clear this airlock, I suggest you get in it, if there's still time.”

It turned out there wasn't.

IT WASN'T THE starting of the truck that woke Tamara and Bobby. It was the pothole they hit sometime later. According to the clock on the camera, it was 7:12 a.m.

"Do you think whoever's driving knows we're back here?" Tamara asked.

"I don't know," Bobby replied. "I would think so, though. Wouldn't you?"

The world seemed to have flipped on its end, so she didn't know what to think anymore.

"I wonder where we're going," Bobby said several minutes later.

"Can't be far." The quarantine would prevent any long travels.

But either they drove around in circles or she was wrong, because six hours passed before the engine was turned off for the first time. After a few moments, they could both hear fuel flowing into the tanks.

"Maybe we should get out now," she suggested.

"We haven't heard the knock."

"Maybe there's not going to be a knock. We're not on the base any more."

But neither of them made a move to open the door, and soon they were on the road again. Nearly seven more hours passed before the engine cut out once more. This time, though, there was no sound of tanks being filled. In fact, except for the opening and closing of the cab door, there wasn't much sound at all.

After thirty minutes of not moving, Tamara said, "I'll bet we're in another parking lot."

"If nothing else, we're going to get a great story out of this," Bobby said.

"If we have a job."

Bobby was quiet for a second, then, "Do you...do you really think Joe is dead?"

She was silent for a moment. "They killed Gavin, didn't they? And those kids in the desert. So..."

A few silent minutes passed.

"How far do you think we've come?" she asked.

"Impossible to know."

They broke out some food, and had a dinner consisting of apples, bread, and some kind of deli meat. As she'd done all day, Tamara only took a couple sips of water. Even though it was dark in their hiding space, the idea of peeing in front of Bobby had zero appeal to her.

Tap-tap. Tap.

The knock had been on the side of the truck, right behind her head. Tamara nearly leaped forward in surprise.

Tap-tap. Tap.

She wanted to scream, "We're here! We're here!" But she held her tongue.

She could hear Bobby already working the door latch. As he opened the door, they could see that the back of the truck was still open, and outside it was night.

"You wait here. I'll check," Bobby said.

"Hell, no. You wait here. I'll check."

She pushed past him and walked stiffly to the back of the truck. It was cool out, much cooler, in fact, than it had been when she and Bobby entered their sanctuary, making her realize that the box had actually been heated. She crossed her arms and ran her hands up and down her biceps as she stepped onto the back bumper, and then hopped to the ground.

They seemed to be parked on a small grass clearing in the middle of an evergreen forest. Pine trees encircled the part of the clearing she could see. One thing was for sure—they were certainly not in the Mojave Desert any more.

She looked over her shoulder as Bobby stepped down to join her.

“Where the hell are we?” he asked.

She was about to say she had no clue when a voice from near the front of the truck called out, “Hello?”

Tamara and Bobby exchanged a look, then walked over and peeked around the side.

Standing by the cab were a smiling man and woman.

“Oh, good,” the man said, taking a couple steps forward. “I was afraid you guys might have wandered off. I wasn’t looking forward to hunting you down.”

“Hunting?” Tamara said.

“Oh, no, no, no,” the man said with a chuckle. “Bad choice of words. Searching is more what I meant. Come on. You probably want to get out of here.”

Still leery, Tamara and Bobby stepped around the side and walked halfway up to the cab.

“Who are you, exactly?” Tamara asked.

“Me? I’m Mike.” The man closed the distance between them and extended his hand.

Bobby shook it automatically, while Tamara did so with more reluctance.

“And that’s my wife, Janice.”

Janice waved, but didn’t come closer. She looked as cold as Tamara felt.

“So what are you doing here?” Tamara asked.

Mike shrugged. “Offering you a ride.”

“I hope you don’t mind,” Janice called out. “I’m going back inside. It’s too cold out here.” She started walking around the front of the truck. “Coffee should be ready by now, so whenever you’re ready.”

“Coffee?” Bobby said.

Mike smiled. “Sure. Janice makes the best on the highway.”

When Bobby gave him an odd look, Mike smiled and motioned for them to follow him to the front of the truck. From there, they could see an old Winnebago RV parked fifty feet away.

Bobby glanced at Tamara. “Come on. They’re obviously here to help us.”

Tamara looked at the Winnebago. “Do you have a bathroom in that thing?”

“We do,” Mike said with a smile.

She could feel her tension ease. “Then a cup of coffee sounds great.”

“Excellent,” Mike told her. “After you.”

IT WAS A struggle for Martina to open her eyes. When she did, the brightness of the new day made her shut them almost immediately. She could feel the congestion in her nose, and the rawness in her throat. When she'd fallen asleep, she'd felt fine. Now, not so much.

Her last morning. She was sure of it.

She worked her eyes open again, then rolled over and looked at the spot where Ben had been sleeping. He wasn't there.

Probably decided to move when he realized I was sick, she thought.

She raised herself up on her elbows. She could hear sniffing elsewhere in the dining area, and even a couple of coughs, her friends all dying with her.

"You're up."

She looked over her shoulder. Ben was standing behind her. He must have been in the kitchen. Though he was smiling, she could tell by his red nose that he was sick, too. That depressed her even more. She liked him, and had been hoping that maybe he'd be the one to survive.

"What's wrong with you?" he asked.

"What do you mean?"

"You're all sour face."

She lay her head back down. "I guess I was kind of hoping we wouldn't get it."

"Right," he said, his smile widening. "You've been asleep."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Come on. I'll show you."

With more than just a bit of effort, Ben helped Martina to her feet, then led her to the front of the café. Most of the others were there, all but one or two showing signs of the flu. The TV on the counter was on, tuned to PCN. At the bottom of the screen was a banner that read: Quarantine Partially Lifted.

"Lifted?" Martina said. "But we're all sick here."

"Yeah, and we're still in the quarantine zone, but not for long," Ben told her.

"What are you talking about?"

"Maybe he can tell you," he said, nodding at the next booth over.

She turned and saw Paul sitting on the end of the bench seat. He looked tired—exhausted, actually—but what other signs of the illness he'd had seemed to be gone.

"You owe me a glass of orange juice," Ben said. "I believe that was our bet."

"He's all right?" she asked quietly.

"He's recovering from the illness, but I don't think he'd say he's all right."

Of course. His brother and his girlfriend.

"They're saying on the news that there have been over five hundred new cases in the last thirty-six hours, but most haven't resulted in death. People are being asked to voluntarily stay home until the flu has disappeared, but the quarantine is expected to be fully lifted by tomorrow night."

"So...what? It just stopped killing people?"

"Apparently."

She couldn't believe it. "We're going to live?"

Ben smiled again. "Didn't I tell you this wasn't going to be your last morning?"

“WOULD YOU LIKE me to play it again?” the Director of Preparation asked. There were head shakes all around the table.

“Do you really think she’s alive?” the Director of Facilities asked.

“How would Captain Ash have known her name otherwise?”

They had just watched Ash and an unidentified woman rescue his children from NB7. The video had lasted right up to the point when the flames flared up. Ash had clearly stated the name Olivia and mentioned she’d been left for dead.

At the end of the table, the Principal Director leaned forward. “I think it would be unwise to assume Olivia is still alive based solely on a single brief conversation. But I also think it would be unwise not to try to find out more.”

“Yes, sir,” the DOP said. “I’ll get a team right on it.”

“There are several things, though,” the Principal Director went on, “that concern me more at the moment, lapses of security on this operation that were totally unacceptable. The loss of the NB7 facility, in particular, does not make me happy.”

“Yes, sir,” the DOP said. “I agree with you one hundred percent. Though it should have been unnecessary, we will definitely learn from these mistakes. To that end, if I may…” He glanced at the Principal Director, who gave him a nod. “Bring up channel four, please.”

The monitor came back to life, this time showing what looked like a conference room.

Sitting on one side of the table was Mr. Shell, and on the other, the soon-to-be former Director of Recovery. Ostensibly, the meeting was for the DOR to critique Shell’s performance during the outbreak. That in itself was highly unusual, given that project members almost never met face to face with the Directors, but it was not entirely unprecedented. Given the gravity of what had just played out over the last several days, neither man questioned its necessity.

The DOP used the remote to turn up the volume.

“...more. You must understand that,” the DOR said. “These kinds of slips are completely unacceptable.”

“Yes, sir,” Mr. Shell said. “I understand. There were problems that were unforeseen.”

“Nothing should be unforeseen!”

The DOP couldn’t resist the opening. He touched the button for the microphone that was clipped to his collar. “You’re absolutely correct. Nothing should be unforeseen.”

Both men on the screen looked up toward where the voice must have been coming from.

“The Directorate would like to thank the Director of Recovery and Mr. Shell for their contributions to the project,” the DOP went on. “It is our unanimous decision that neither of your services will be further required.”

“What?” the Director of Recovery said. “Wait. You can’t—”

The DOP hit the mute button. “Terminate,” he said.

He waited until the two men in the other room started choking as the air to their room was cut off, then had the monitor turned off. He looked back at the group.

“Even with these unfortunate incidents, there is much good news. From Dr. Karp’s own calculations, we know that the effectiveness of KV-27a exceeds our hopes. Even the safeguard that he encoded into the virus of turning it into a simple flu after the fifth or sixth host worked perfectly. And with the discovery of the Ash family’s immunity, we should have a working vaccine within weeks. It is unfortunate that the doctor isn't with us anymore, but his work still goes on. I think we can safely designate stage one of the delivery agent complete. That is, unless anyone has any objections?" He looked around the table, but no one said a word. "We will concentrate on stage two now, which is already well on its way. At this time, I see no threat at all to the implementation timetable."

The Principal Director leaned forward again. "What about Captain Ash? He's still on the loose."

"He is, sir. But I don't believe he's any kind of problem. He only wanted his children."

"And these missing journalists?"

"We believe they were scared off, sir, and will resurface soon. When that occurs, they will be dealt with."

"Yes, but who is helping these people? They couldn't have done this all on their own. And if Olivia is alive, where is she?"

"We're looking into all of that, sir, but, again, we don't think any of it is a serious threat. The boulder is running downhill. It's too late for anyone to stop it."

AS THEY SPED away from NB7, Chloe called Matt, requesting a safe house and a doctor. They were directed to the home of an elderly woman in a small, Western Idaho town. Despite the fact the sun had yet to come up when they arrived, she smiled at the children and told everyone to make themselves at home, then disappeared into a room in the back.

Ash hunted down some aspirin for Chloe, then found a couple of bedrooms upstairs and told Josie and Brandon they could use them. But instead of separating, they chose to share a room. He could tell they were still unsure if it was really him, but he didn't want to push himself on them.

After they were settled, he cleaned out his wound again. The first time he'd done it had been in a gas station restroom, not exactly the most sterile of places. This time he found some rubbing alcohol in the medicine cabinet, and poured it into the groove on his arm. It burned worse than when he'd actually been hit, but he knew he had to do it, and dumped nearly half the bottle over the wound before he stopped.

When he returned downstairs, he found Chloe propped up on the couch.

"Why don't you get some sleep," he suggested.

"I tried, but this isn't going to let me," she told him, touching her leg.

He wished he could do something more for her. The pain seemed to be hitting her in waves. She'd be fine for a bit, then, with no warning, would close her eyes tight and cringe.

Just short of an hour after they arrived, there was a knock on the door. It was Pax and Billy. Billy quickly checked both patients, then gave Chloe a sedative that allowed her to fall asleep. As soon as she was out, he dealt with Ash's wound.

"Clean this yourself?" he asked.

"Yeah."

"Remind me not to use you as a nurse."

More burning, then a bandage to cover the gash. When he was through, Billy examined Ash's face, looking at the scars of the surgery from what seemed so long ago.

With a simple "It looks like nothing's going to fall off," Billy went to see what he could do about Chloe's leg.

"You got 'em," Pax said, once he and Ash were alone.

"Yeah, I did." Ash knew he should be happy, but the worry he'd had for his kids' safety had turned into worry for their mental well-being. Sometimes being a parent sucked. "Thanks for your help. Those mini-explosives you gave me, I couldn't have done it without them."

"Don't even worry about it."

They talked a little longer, but at some point Ash fell asleep. How Pax and Billy got him into a bed upstairs, he had no idea. But that's where he woke to an afternoon sun shining through the window.

He showered, put on the new clothes someone had laid out for him, and headed downstairs. He found Pax and the old woman in the kitchen, laughing and having a cup of coffee.

"Where's Josie and Brandon?" he asked, alarmed.

"Your kids are fine," the old woman said. "They're out back, playing with the dog."

Ash walked over to the open back door and looked out the screen. Josie was sitting on a picnic bench, petting the head of a golden retriever while Brandon was trying to coax the dog away with a ball. It seemed so...normal.

“And Chloe?” Ash asked.

“Billy took her back to the ranch,” Pax said. “Said she needs surgery on the leg, but that she should be fine.”

Ash hadn’t told her thank you. He should have done it already, but he’d been too drained to even think about it.

“Can I get you a cup of coffee?” the woman asked.

Ash shook his head. “Not right now, thanks.”

He opened the screen door and stepped into the backyard. Both his kids looked over and stared at him. He wondered if their uncertainty would ever go away, if they’d ever truly believe he was their dad.

As he walked toward them, the golden retriever ran to him. Ash knelt down and petted the dog’s head. “Hey, buddy.” He looked over at his children. “What’s his name?”

Neither of them said anything for a moment, then Brandon took a step forward. “Strider.”

“Hello there, Strider,” Ash said to the dog.

Strider wagged his tail and licked Ash’s hand.

“He likes to play catch,” Brandon said.

Ash stood up. “You have a ball?”

Brandon nodded and showed him the tennis ball in his hand.

“Throw it for him,” Ash said.

Brandon tossed the ball across the yard, and Strider took off after it. As the dog was bringing the ball back to the boy, Ash casually walked over.

“Can I try?” he asked.

“Sure,” Brandon said, handing him the ball.

They played toss with the dog for several minutes, alternating turns, with neither of them really saying anything. While they did this, Josie sat quietly on the bench watching them.

As Ash was about to throw the ball again, Josie said, “Why did they tell us you were dead?”

Ash paused for a moment, then let the ball fly. “I don’t know, sweetheart. Because they weren’t very nice, I guess. They told me you were both dead, too.”

“They did?” Brandon said.

Ash nodded.

Strider returned with the ball and dropped it at Brandon’s feet, but the boy didn’t seem to notice. Brandon looked at his father for a moment, then glanced at his sister and whispered something just low enough so Ash couldn’t hear it.

Josie seemed to be lost in thought for a moment, then looked up at their dad. “Is...Mom alive, too?”

Ash could feel his heart suddenly break. He sank down to his knees so he was closer to their height, tears forming in his eyes. “No, sweetie. She’s not.”

“But you’re here, and they said you were dead,” she countered.

Ash could hear Brandon’s breath become ragged as he fought his own tears. “I know, Josie. But your mom was gone before they even took us out of the house.”

“But...but...are you sure?”

He nodded.

Brandon was the first to fall into his embrace, sobbing into Ash’s shoulder, but Josie wasn’t far behind him.

“I love you guys,” Ash said, then repeated “I love you” over and over.

“I love you, too, Dad,” Josie said, once her tears had finally lost their strength.

“Me, too,” Brandon added.

The hug that followed seemed to last for hours.

JENIFER RUFF

An Agent Victoria Heslin Thriller Book 1

All the characters in this book are fictional. Any resemblance to actual people living or dead is a coincidence.

YOU'LL NEVER VIEW ODD numbers the same way again.

When a key witness in an organized crime trial turns up dead in his kitchen with liar and the number two scrawled on his forehead, the FBI assumes the murder was a hit to silence him. Then the calls start coming in—more victims with similar markings and no connection to the mob.

As agents Victoria Heslin and Dante Rivera struggle to catch a break in the case, they receive a series of cryptic, personal messages from the killer, complicating the investigation. Something disturbing and frightening is underway, and anyone might be next, including the agents, unless they uncover the common denominator.

Jenifer Ruff delivers a gripping psychological thriller that will appeal to fans of the Woman in the Window by A.J. Finn as well as serial killer favorites like The Silence of the Lambs by Thomas Harris and Kiss the Girls by James Patterson.

In the dark, decaying woods behind the Sonesta Hotel, fierce gusts of wind cracked brittle branches, and Beth Dellinger's trembling hand tightened around a 9mm Glock. As she pulled the trigger, something snapped deep inside her brain. Two terrible incidents occurred. A murder—the end of one life—and the inescapable new beginning of another.

Twisted brambles tore into her skin as she fled down the narrow path toward the parking lot, her heart pounding a frantic rhythm. Only one instinct fueled her. Get away. With ragged breaths, she counted her hurried steps in fours.

Four, eight, twelve, sixteen, twenty, twenty-four, twenty-eight, thirty-two.

She slipped on the incline at the edge of the woods and her bare feet flew out from under her. Windmilling her arms, she hit the ground with a thud and slid down the wet earth, dirt smearing the back of her bare legs, filling tiny scrapes with grime. She scrambled up, looking back over her shoulder, stumbled, and kept moving. Pebbles and beer caps littered the rough pavement and a broken bottle shard sliced the edge of her dirt-caked foot. She had yet to register the pain.

A nearby train barreled down the tracks with an overbearing whoosh and grind, its horn blaring, intensifying the pulsing blood in her eardrums.

Four, eight, twelve, sixteen, twenty, twenty-four, twenty-eight, thirty-two.

When she reached her car, she stared blankly at a tube of lipstick she was carrying. She had no idea why it was in her hand. With a violent shudder, she hurled the lipstick back toward the woods as if she'd been clutching a hot coal.

Fumbling for her keys, she yanked the door open, and plopped down behind the wheel. She tossed her purse on the seat beside her, struggling to catch her breath. With a death grip on the steering wheel, she stared through the windshield, seeing nothing.

What did she remember? Fleeing the hotel. A beautiful woman holding the back door open for her. She remembered screaming, and a fiery pain erupting from her cheek. Nothing more. What had happened next? All she knew was that she had done something bad, something she couldn't undo. Had anyone seen? She slumped forward on the edge of her seat, hung her head, and covered her face with her dirty hands, wincing when she touched the bruised skin around her eye. A burned stench emanated from her hands—the smell of gunfire. Blood dripped from her foot onto the floor.

Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen . . .

A sudden noise made her jump in her seat.

“Beth, Beth, Beth. What am I going to do with you now?” Danny bent over and stared from outside the car, his blood-shot eyes level with hers.

Beth shook her head, squeezed her eyes shut, bit down on her bottom lip between her teeth. A tremor coursed through her veins. When she opened her eyes, he was still peering in at her. He rapped his fist against the glass. “Roll down the window.”

She turned on the ignition and lowered the window half-way. He glowered at her as wheezy breaths constricted her chest.

“Are ya happy now?” He pounded the roof of the car with his hand. “What you just did, it's a whole lot bigger than one of your little identify thefts. You might not get away with it. This time, you might really pay for what you've done. As in going to jail for the rest of your long life.”

Beth clutched the neck of her shirt, gripping it tight.

“They saw you. You know that, don’t you?” His harsh whisper made his words all the more terrifying.

She didn’t want to answer him. She didn’t want to have this conversation. But she couldn’t help herself. She had to know what he meant. A lump had formed in her throat. Struggling to swallow around it, she leaned farther away. “Who saw me?”

“All of them. They all saw you.” He made a sweeping gesture toward the windows lining the back of the Sonesta Hotel. Most were large blackened squares. Some had light peeking out around the edges of the blinds.

“No. They couldn’t have.” Her voice shook. She studied the windows for a shadow or a flicker of movement, any sign of life behind them. What did they see?

He gritted his teeth. “Yes, they did.” Each word was like a slap, punching through the air and smacking her in the face. He shifted his weight, still towering outside her window, seeming larger than he really was. “They know because you were screaming like a . . . like a . . .” His face flushed red. Vocabulary was never his strength. “Like a damn crazy lunatic. You know what you have to do now, don’t you?”

She stared out the window, away from him and the sadistic grin he was sure to be sporting.

“You’ll have to take care of them before they betray you, too.”

Her heart picked up a rapid rhythm again. “Ta—take care of them?”

“What part don’t you understand? For someone who thinks she’s so clever—.”

Beth cringed. Shoulders hunched, she gazed through the front windshield toward the creepy hotel. She hadn’t liked much about the place since they checked in earlier that evening. It was all dark shadows and ugly carpet. And now, she didn’t think anyone had seen her. But they must have. For a long time, starting soon after their honeymoon, Danny had been dismissive to her, sometimes even cruel. When he was in one of his moods, his brutal honesty—words that seared her soul—delivered more pain than any kick or slap. It had been a long time since she’d seen the once charming man who made her believe she was special. But she didn’t believe he had ever outright lied to her. At least not to her face.

“I see you’ve still got my gun. And you know how to use it.” He laughed and threw his head back.

She glanced at the brown metal grip just visible at the top corner of her purse. Another shiver rocked her body.

Danny spit on the ground. “Now, you have no choice. Unless you’ve got a better idea. Which I wouldn’t bet on. And for Christ’s sakes, don’t do it here. Wait for them to leave or you’ll draw the police right to us.”

“If I don’t do it here, then how will I find them?” she whispered.

He laughed, a crazy, maniacal sound. “Use your head. You’re supposed to be the expert hacker. Figure it out.”

Clenching her fists, she tried to think.

He pounded on the roof again and startled her. “I have to tell you everything, don’t I?”

If I’m so unbearably incompetent, how come it’s my hacking jobs that pay for everything we do? Our apartment. This vacation. Your new business venture with its many expenses and no income. Huh? Jamming her finger on the window button, she rolled it up and yelled, “Just let me think!” She squeezed her eyes shut again and covered her ears with her hands. Another train rolled by, drowning out anything else Danny may have said.

What am I going to do? What should I do? And then, after taking a deep breath, another option occurred to her—what do I want to do?

One thing she knew for sure—the prospect of jail terrified her. But was she strong enough? What would it take? She straightened in her seat and glanced at the gun again. She would do it. She'd show him once and for all. And more importantly, she'd show herself. She couldn't be pushed around. She wouldn't be caught by surprise. Not anymore. This was the new Beth. And she sure as hell wasn't starting off by going to jail.

She opened her eyes again. Danny was gone.

Yes, she could do this. She'd go after them one by one until she was safe again.

She climbed out of the car and rummaged through her purse for her phone. Hunched over and almost walking on her tiptoes, she crept around the parking lot with cold, dirty bare-feet, taking furtive pictures of each license plate, as good a way as any to get started. There were only twelve cars. The Sonesta Hotel was no one's dream destination.

When she finished, Danny was waiting at the car. "We have to get out of here. Now. Before you get caught. Go get our stuff and meet me back here."

"Why can't you—"

"Just go! Now!"

Beth hustled inside the hotel. She returned only minutes later with drops of sweat rolling down her temples, lugging two small stacked suitcases, one with a broken wheel, and a cooler. They climbed in their "borrowed" Honda and sped off, driving past the nearest hotel, too close, and parking at the second one they saw. The Vista View sat just off a busy road without a vista worth mentioning in sight. But even before entering, she knew it would be a step up from the Sonesta, which Danny had chosen.

"Get us checked in," Danny grunted.

Beth trudged through the automatic sliding doors and inside the quiet lobby. A man in a navy suit walked in through a door behind the desk. "Checking in?" He couldn't have been older than twenty-five and his smile indicated he had the energy to be charming despite the late hour. His name tag read, "Ahmad."

"If you have a room available." Beth adjusted her large dark sunglasses. "We don't have a reservation."

Ahmad narrowed his eyes, looked at Beth and then toward the door.

"My husband is with me." She cupped her hand around her chin, self-conscious of her tear-stained face, blossoming bruise, the dirt on her clothes.

"Okay. I'll be right back. I have to finish . . ." He wiped his nose with the back of his finger. "Just one minute."

Ahmad disappeared through a door behind the desk, leaving Beth to shift her weight from one leg to the other and twirl pieces of her hair.

"You didn't get a room yet? What's taking so long?" Danny had apparently grown tired of waiting for her outside.

Ahmad returned. Beth let out a loud sigh.

"Sorry about that." Ahmad dropped his head and tapped on his computer. "How many nights?"

How long will it take? One day? Two? Can I even go through with it?

"Better do three," Danny said, standing too close for her comfort.

"Four days." Beth lifted her chin. She scratched at the raised bump protruding on her arm. Had to be a bug bite, although it was too late in the year and too cold for mosquitoes. Something had attacked her in the woods and her body was just starting to react.

“You’re in luck. We do have a room and it’s available for four nights.” Ahmad smiled at Beth, but his eyes were traveling elsewhere, and she recognized the judgment in his smug expression.

She frowned and squeezed her fingers into the flesh around her bug bite, simultaneously experiencing pain and relief from the itch. “What number is it?”

“Two twenty-seven.” Ahmad smiled.

Her face twisted as if she’d just been bit again. “Do you have something with an even number?”

Ahmad stared at her for a second longer than necessary, but his forced smile had returned before he dropped his head again. “Let me see.” He poked at his keyboard and leaned closer to his screen.

“You could have two thirty-four. It’s across the hall. Would that work for you?”

Beth let out a sigh. “Much better. Here.” She handed over a new credit card, not the same one they used at the Sonesta. It should work for at least a few weeks.

Ahmad took her card. “Thank you, Mrs. Malone. And by the way, if you were planning to use the gym, it’s closed. Leaks. Too much rain the past few days. I’m wondering if it’s ever going to stop.”

Once inside their room, she scrubbed her hands and gently washed the dirt off her face, dabbing at the crust of blood on her lip. What a sight she had been. Staring into the mirror, she tilted her head at different angles, killing time before she emerged.

With his head resting in the cradle of his hands behind him and his boots on the coffee table, Danny leaned far back on the worn pull-out sofa. Beth stood as far away from him as possible, between the window and the bed. She peeled back an edge of the curtain panel and stared out. A cloud of specks flitted around under a hazy floodlight and the wind tugged at tree branches. More than a dozen cars were parked between painted lines, their flat roofs stretched out long below her. What kind of person owned each of those cars? Grandmothers and grandfathers? Mothers and fathers? Waiters? Salespeople? Assistants and executives? No—not executives, not at this place. And, more importantly, what kind of people owned the cars in the Sonesta parking lot? With a bit of internet research, she was about to find out.

I can’t do this. “What if I just go to the police and turn myself in?”

“Ha!” Danny tipped his head back further. “Like I said, you won’t survive a day in jail. But if you do go to the police, I’ll pay a visit to your sister’s house. Have a little private chat with her kids.”

She scratched the back of her head. Her sister complained incessantly about those kids. Maybe he would be doing her a favor by scaring the crap out of them.

“Don’t believe me, eh? Remember what happened to her little dog when she crossed me? What was his name? Cootie? No, Coobie. Poor little Coobie. Ha!”

She shrugged, her shoulders moving the slightest fraction of an inch. It was just an animal.

“If you don’t do this, you’ll have to spend the rest of your life in a filthy prison. And don’t count on me for any conjugal visits. You’ll be alone forever. Cuz who else would visit you?”

Beth kept her mouth shut and didn’t respond, even though it was killing her to be quiet. Threats toward her sister’s kids could be rationalized—they’d survive. But she wasn’t going to prison. Prison meant being surrounded by meaner, crazier people than the ones she already knew.

Danny rattled on. She almost couldn’t bear the sound of his voice, each word dripped with his imagined superiority. She hated him. She also loved him. Didn’t she? She could strangle the life out of him with her bare hands if she had the strength. How she would enjoy watching him struggle and gasp for air until he finally shut up for good. But then she would be alone, and she didn’t want that either. She stormed back into the bathroom and locked the door. She began counting the diamonds on the wallpaper. Four, eight, twelve, sixteen, twenty . . . The tension across her forehead intensified until she reached ninety-six at the top corner of the wall. She pivoted around and opened the bathroom door.

The room was quiet and empty.

He was gone, leaving her to pace around and pull at long strands of her blonde hair, coarse from too much coloring. She pulled open the small fridge. A laminated sign stuck to the front said, "You use it, you pay for it." Her hand shook so hard, a mini-bottle of liquor slipped from her grasp and fell to the floor. She picked it up, opened it, and tossed it back. It probably cost more than a whole six-pack, but she didn't care. Not tonight. Not when she was using someone else's credit card number. Not with what she was about to do.

After emptying two more mini-bottles, she opened her computer and got down to business, somewhat surprised by her determination. Danny wasn't going to leave her alone about this situation until she did what needed to be done. She'd think of it as an opportunity to finally show him who she really was. If she could kill once, she could do it again.

And again.

She would survive this.

AND NOW IT BEGINS.

Morning drizzle coated the windshield. Beth started the car to let the wipers clear the glass. After four noisy swipes—they needed replacing—she turned the car back off and drained the last of the hotel lobby’s burnt coffee. Three sugar packets and five containers of fake creamer made it barely palatable. Too bad it hadn’t helped shut off the throb of her hangover.

Eyes on the young couple, she turned her key in the ignition as soon as their car began to move. With one hand, she reached underneath her seat and felt the metal of the gun, making sure it was where it was supposed to be. This was it. Game on. She was really doing this. Her stomach cramped and demanded a trip to the bathroom, but she had to ignore it. Knew it was just her nerves.

Kelly and Jason Smith. Twenty-somethings. Married for just over a year. Kelly was petite and curvy with thick, wavy, light-brown hair right out of a shampoo commercial, big brown puppy-dog eyes, and a beautiful smile full of perfect white teeth. Her pink sweater looked soft. Jason wore wire-rimmed glasses, had neat short hair, and didn’t look much older than one of those prep school boys who wore striped ties and navy coats to school.

Aren’t they just adorable?

It had been easy to figure out which hotel room they occupied.

Beth sneered as she followed their candy-apple red Jeep onto the main road. Their heads bobbed. Kelly’s long hair swung from side to side. What was going on inside their car? Oh, for God’s sake—seriously? They were dancing in their seats. Probably lip syncing too. Beth rolled her eyes. A clever, mean thought entered her mind and she almost shared it aloud for Danny, before remembering she was alone.

She trailed behind the Jeep, maintaining a respectable distance. The drizzle changed into a steady rain. She flipped on her lights and wipers. Following all the rules. Not attracting attention. There was too much at stake.

Jason was on his way to make a sales pitch to a company in town; his wife came along for moral support. Beth knew this because she was that good. Of course, it helped that people were so willing to share their lives on social media with whoever might be interested. And Beth was very interested in the information Kelly Smith had to share. Kelly’s propensity for posting made Beth’s task of tracking them so much easier. Their every activity was announced online. “Business trip with a side of pleasure because I’m coming with!” is what Kelly wrote on her very public Facebook site. She might as well have hung a sign on her door: “We’re both out of town. Come rob us!” Because it was a simple feat for Beth, or anyone, to find the Smith’s home address. And if they didn’t have anything worth stealing, well, a frustrated thief might vandalize their place for wasting their effort. Beth knew this from experience. The time she and Danny broke into a house and found absolutely nothing of value—nothing they needed, nothing they wanted, and nothing they could resell—they’d taught those homeowners a lesson all right.

What would Beth’s posts look like if she shared her daily life? “Great day! Hacked into an online account and opened three new credit cards with the info! Whoopee! Oh, yeah, and then Danny smacked me and broke a tooth because he was wasted and I didn’t know where the TV remote was. Can anyone recommend a dentist?” Ha! The world would love knowing her dirty little secrets. She never made her comings and goings public and never would. People should know better, not be so trusting. Otherwise it served them right if someone made off with their flat screen TV, spread toothpaste over their walls, syrup on their furniture, or borrowed their identity until their credit was maxed out.

After a couple of minutes, Jason's right blinker light began flashing and he pulled the car into a complex with stores and restaurants: a Target and Best Buy, but mostly small franchises, the kind that lined most strip malls in America. Was this where he would make the sales pitch? Beth's heart beat a bit faster, like it was warming up for the main event.

Cars chugged along slowly in every direction, up and down the crowded parking lot lanes, no one wanting to make the trek from the empty spaces farther from the stores, not now, with the steady rain approaching a downpour. Beth prayed Jason would drive behind the stores where the trucks unloaded their cargo and there wouldn't be any people. And then what? Shoot them in the shopping mall's parking lot? How was that going to work? Maybe she hadn't thought this out as well as she could have. Until that moment, identifying her targets and following them had seemed like a big enough accomplishment.

With so much traffic meandering through the shopping center, and some of them being damn aggressive—it's not Black Friday, lady!—Beth had no choice but to stay close behind or risk losing the Smiths. Jason steered right up to the curb and stopped. Beth hit her brakes behind him, just in time. The Jeep's passenger door swung open and Kelly's shapely legs appeared, clad in tight yoga pants. With her head down, Kelly made a run for the nearest store, the Plush Nail Salon. It didn't look very plush. The H and the N hung sideways off the sign. One fierce gust of wind would send them flying away. So, Kelly wasn't going to the sales pitch with Jason after all. She was going to get herself all pretty while her man did the hard work. Beth frowned, rolling her bottom lip into her mouth. That wasn't good. Not good at all. She needed them to stay together.

Inside the doorway, Kelly blew her husband a kiss. But it wasn't aimed toward the driver's seat of the Jeep. Beth jerked her head back, following Kelly's gaze, knowing she'd missed something.

Jason was out of his car. Covering his head with a magazine, he hurried straight toward Beth, staring at her through the windshield, his face a determined grimace. A spike of adrenaline edged Beth toward a full-blown panic attack. What was he going to do? He must have recognized her. She yanked the steering wheel to her left, but a line of barely-moving bumper-to-bumper cars prevented a quick escape. Her eyes flew to the rearview mirror as she jammed the gear shift into reverse, but behind her, another car boxed her in.

Jason was only a few steps away.

Heart racing, she doubled over and grabbed the Glock from beneath her seat. Her stomach lurched as she gripped the handle. He was probably at her window now. There were too many people around. This wasn't the right place! She'd be caught for sure if she tried to shoot him here. She shoved the gun under her T-shirt, wincing in terror. Her hands were shaking so much she didn't trust them on the gun, especially not with the weapon against her own body.

A knock on her window made her bolt upright, still gripping the gun under her shirt.

"Hey." Jason stared right at her.

No choice. She eased the gun out from under her shirt.

Hunched over in the driving rain, Jason pointed toward the front of her car. "Just wanted to let you know that your right headlight is out. Didn't want you to get a ticket."

And then he trotted away, still covering his head with the sodden magazine, the shoulders of his coat dark from the drenching rain.

Beth sat stunned, staring into but not seeing the sheets of rain, not hearing the incessant hammering of drops on the roof. Danny was right. She couldn't do it. And right then, she didn't even have the wherewithal to drive her car, never mind follow anyone and do what needed to be done without being caught. But that wasn't all that had her freaked out. Something else about the brief encounter bothered her. Jason didn't act like he knew her. Not a bit. Unless he was playing some sort of game to screw with her head. Maybe that was it. Maybe her headlight was working fine, and the broken headlight story was just a ruse to get her out of the car. She whipped her head to her left and to her right but didn't see anyone else.
