Jason was already pulling out into the slow-moving traffic.

She drove back to the hotel, below the speed limit, her breath coming in fast gulps, murmuring a rhythm to herself, counting every fourth scraping swipe of the windshield wipers.

"Four, eight, twelve, sixteen, twenty, twenty-four, twenty-eight, thirty-two. Four, eight, twelve, sixteen . . ."

• • • •

"I KNEW YOU COULDN'T do it." Danny sneered. "Your screw up only made things worse for yourself. You're kinda . . . noticeable, you know. Ya stick out like a witch with the dark roots in your hair and that purple bruise."

Witch? She wasn't ugly. She'd always thought she was sort of attractive—average height and maybe she could have been in better shape, but it's not like she was overweight—until Danny started making a point of telling her otherwise. "The bruise—whose fault is that?" She sunk down into the corner of the hotel room couch and grabbed a pillow to protect her face, just in case. Danny always found a way to reason that everything was her fault. Like if it weren't for her he'd be living-it-up in luxury, driving a Mercedes, sitting in the front row ordering beers at the Wizards games. As if.

"So now he got a good, close look at you. He knows exactly what you look like. It will be real easy for him to pick you out of a line up once the police come for you. Set you up there with four other chicks past their prime—"

"He didn't act like he knew me. I mean, he—"

Danny grunted. "Have yourself a good time in jail. Not sure how you'll manage. You can't stand to be alone, can you? Makes you all freaked out and you start counting stuff like a fricking nut case. You're really a piece of work." He sneered and threw his head back. "They won't give you a pen because you might poke your eyes out, but you can use your own blood to make tic marks on the cement walls, one for each day. Ha! You'll have plenty of those, you'll be counting them tic marks until you're an old hag. One, two, three, four, five . . . no—not five! I can't end on an odd number because I'm a psycho! Unless . . . unless they hang you, shoot you up with electricity, or whatever it is they do to get rid of bat-ass-crazy killers these days."

Clenching her jaw, she faced away from Danny. She'd been counting the up motions of her bouncing leg. She pressed her hand down hard against her knee and kept it still, but the numbers didn't stop, they only grew faster and louder inside her head.

I'm not going to prison.

The day was only just getting started. She would wait until the Smiths were together again. In the meantime, there were more people on her list. She knew exactly how many—seven. She'd been counting them over and over again.

Next time, she wouldn't fail.

VICTORIA HESLIN'S SKIN tingled in the cool October air as she walked the wet trails. She inhaled deeply and stepped over a rushing stream on a newly constructed bridge of logs, heading towards the mountain trails. There was no place she would rather be than outside, hiking with her dogs.

The rain had ceased, although the clouds were determined to keep out the sun. At the end of a pink leash, Izzy trotted down the path with her head up, alert for any movement or rustling in the bushes. Like a stealthy hunter searching for prey, the Spanish greyhound never stopped scanning her surroundings. Eddie, a large retired racing greyhound, lagged behind, nose toward the ground, sniffing and marking every few yards with a casual lift of his hind leg as if it was his sworn duty.

"Come on, Eddie. Keep up." Victoria gave a gentle tug on his leash. The big dog tore off a mouthful of grass and ambled after her.

Victoria's phone buzzed, an unwelcome interruption that made her grimace inside. She pulled the device from her hip pocket, glanced at the screen, and sighed. It was her boss calling. It was Saturday, but that didn't matter with her job. She answered. As she expected, it quickly became clear her walk would be cut short.

"Oh, no. And he's definitely dead?" she asked, already turning around to head back the way she came. "Okay. I'm just out on my property. I'll be there as soon as I can. I have his address."

She jogged home with the dogs, unlocked the heavy iron gate, and let them loose in her backyard. Inside the mudroom, while she pulled off her hiking boots, the rest of her pack of Greyhounds, Galgos, and Podencos surrounded them, wagging their tails, snorting, and sniffing Izzy and Eddie as if they had been transformed into brand new creatures during their walk.

"Hey. Hey. Calm down everyone." Laughing, Victoria wove through their wagging bodies and into the house. "You act like we've been gone a week." Their tails smacked back and forth against the entryway walls in response. "I'm so sorry to tell you all this, but I've got to go out again."

Seven wagging tails followed her into the master bedroom, Eddie and Izzy leaving faint traces of mud in their path. Victoria tore off her shorts and T-shirt and hurried into the shower. Less than three minutes later, she was putting on a white camisole that covered her sapphire necklace, her mother's birthstone. She ripped open a dry-cleaning bag and pulled on gray slacks, a blouse, and a jacket in a fast, rehearsed manner. Amidst strokes and head rubs for the dogs, she hustled into the kitchen and handed out treats and apologies. She checked the dogs' bowls, grabbed the prepacked bag of human snacks, slipped a water bottle into her backpack, locked the doors, and then jumped in her customized Suburban. Cruising down her long driveway, she hooked up her phone to the car and dictated a text message for Ned.

"Hi. It's Victoria. I had to leave on short notice and I'm not sure when I'll be back, so definitely plan to come around dinner time to feed my dogs and give them some attention. I'll keep you posted once I know more. As always, thanks for your help. And text me that you got this."

A soft chime indicated an incoming text. Victoria read Ned's reply at the next stoplight. Got it. Monday still good for our dinner?

She pressed the speaker button on the steering wheel. "So far so good." Victoria sighed. Was that apprehension she was feeling, just a little, or was it possibly a hint of nervous excitement? She wasn't sure. It wasn't a real date, was it? After all, Ned was her employee. She rarely dated. She'd been attracted to a few men, and recognized when it was mutual, but . . . then she kept her distance.

Somewhere deep inside her subconscious, not getting romantically involved with anyone felt like the right thing to do, at least right now. A long time had passed since she'd given anyone a chance. She barely remembered her last awkward dinner. She'd been called away right in the middle of it. Should have shut her phone off, and she knew it, but maybe she wanted to have a possible excuse to bolt. She shook her head, remembering, and not impressed with her behavior. Perhaps it was time to give it another go, give someone a try. Maybe it wouldn't be so bad if the dinner with Ned was a real date. Or almost like one.

Ned sent another message. Good. So we can talk about what I should bring when we go to the shelter in Spain next month.

She dictated again. "Yes. I'm glad you're going with me. It's going to change your life. And you'll make a big difference there." After sending the message, she dropped her phone into the center console.

She was definitely nervous about having a back-up dog walker for so many days. She'd really learned to count on and trust Ned, finding him was nothing short of a miracle, but everything would work out. The trip to Spain was important. She had a long list of things to check on while she was there.

She pressed the home button again. "Send Ned a text."

"What would you like to say to Ned?"

"I can't remember if I told you this, but Myrtle seems to despise the new herbal toothpaste. Use the poultry one in red tube or she might snap at you." That was her subtle way of reminding him to brush their teeth after dinner.

Ned responded with a thumbs-up.

Thirty minutes later, thanks to non-existent traffic, she parked behind three police cars and an SUV. A chilly wind hit her as she stepped out of her Suburban. She pulled her jacket tight around her chest. A uniformed officer approached. He held up a hand. "This is a crime scene, Miss, you need to get back in your car."

Victoria lifted the edge of her coat and looked down at her waist. "I'm Agent Heslin with the FBI."

The officer followed Victoria's eyes to the badge attached to her pants. "Oh. I didn't—"

"Not your fault. I'm not wearing my jacket."

The officer rocked back and forth on his feet, then turned toward the small, ramshackle house behind him. "We've been keeping the scene secure for you. The other agent just arrived."

Victoria moved her badge from her waist to the collar of her shirt where it would be more visible, in case any of the other authorities had any initial doubts that she belonged there. "Thank you." She smiled, walking past the yellow crime scene tape, toward the home that was currently the center of attention. Paint peeled off around the windows, gray mildew coated the exterior, and a broken gutter pipe hung loose at an odd angle. Aside from the weeds, the small yard was mostly dirt. Puddles of muddy water filled the ruts and depressions. An empty yellow potato chip bag and a blue ice cream sandwich wrapper provided the only color. Everything about the property shouted shoddy construction that had seen better days, except for a gleaming black Range Rover that just barely fit under the rusty carport.

The neighbors' homes all conveyed the same message—those living there had either given up caring or never cared much at all. They might not even be aware of the neglect they were loudly advertising—almost abandoned but not quite.

Agent Rivera stood inside the open doorway, one hand running over his short dark hair. His FBI coat was also absent. He wore a crisp white tailored shirt under a charcoal suit jacket and pants. His outfit was nearly identical to Victoria's, male and female versions of the same colors and materials. Oops. Someone at the office was bound to make a crack about their matching attire.

As she walked toward the house, he saw her and his eyes lit up.

"Hey, Tory." He stepped outside the splintering front door and let it creak closed behind him. "Forensics aren't here yet. Busy day for them."

"First off—nice to be working with you again. I didn't expect it to be so soon."

"Yeah. I'm not complaining."

"So, what have I missed?" Victoria bent down and pulled on shoe covers.

"Well, the state's best witness took a bullet to the head. No sign of a gun, so not likely his own doing."

"There's going to be a lot of angry agents and prosecutors." She pulled a pair of latex gloves from her pocket and put them on. "What do we know?"

"Shot to the temple at close range. Bullet went in and out. Cops found it under the counter."

Victoria opened the door and stepped inside. "Really?" She frowned. "A bullet was left behind?"

"Yep."

The agents walked into the house along the edge of the hallway. A trail of dark red partial shoe prints stained the tile floors and led outside.

She bent down to get a closer look at the narrow tread marks. "Who stepped in the blood?"

"According to the neighbor who found him—she's still inside—the prints were there when she arrived." Rivera lowered his voice and leaned toward Victoria. "We'll have forensics get shoe prints to make sure, but at a glance, they're too small for any of the officers here."

Still crouched, Victoria clasped her necklace through her shirt. "Whoever it was left during the day, out the front door, where they were more likely to be seen."

The agents entered the living room from the hallway. Three uniformed officers, all men, stood together in the room. A tall man with broad shoulders lifted a hand in greeting.

"Hey, Sully." Rivera gave his friend a half-smile. "You've met Agent Heslin?"

Detective Sullivan nodded, his expression slightly grim, as appropriate for a crime scene. He was a big guy who used to spend a lot of time at the gym, sometimes with Rivera when the agent was in town. He'd had his share of troubles and heartache, and Victoria hoped he was doing well. With his skin looking as flushed as deli ham, she wasn't sure. His eyes were a little bloodshot, but that could be from working a double shift and not getting enough sleep.

The detective introduced the other two policemen and said, "I just got here a few minutes before you."

The officer with glasses stepped forward. "No sign of a break in, although the doors might have already been unlocked. He was obviously dead, so we didn't touch anything and called forensics."

"Yeah." A very young officer with red hair nodded. "Only thing we touched was the microwave. It was beeping, so I opened it to shut it off. He was cooking something when he got killed."

Rivera smirked. "So you didn't touch anything except what you touched. Got it."

Sully snorted, repressing a laugh.

The young officer spoke again, his face now almost as red as his hair. "We were told to wait here until the Feds—until you came—because this guy is special."

"Yes. He was." Rivera headed toward the small kitchen and the reason they were all huddled inside the small home—the victim—Todd Meiser.

Light filtered in through a dirty window over the sink, casting a ray of dancing dust specs over the kitchen table and two chairs. The Range Rover key fob sat in plain sight on a small Formica topped island. The smell of cigarettes mixed with the smell of the meal that was still sitting in the microwave.

Victoria scanned the room, taking in the sad, gory scene. Wearing jeans and a long-sleeved T-shirt, Meiser was lying on the worn linoleum, legs bent to one side, as if he'd been on his knees praying before he was knocked sideways. Dark stubble coated his chin, and his mouth hung open in the shape of an O with his lips pursed, a shocked grimace. A blood-soaked woman's silk scarf, black with gray and pink flowers, covered his right eye and drooped down across his nose. A chunk of his skull was missing on the left side of his head, exploded into the mess of bone chips, brain matter, and blood now covering the kitchen floor, with bits plastered against the cabinets.

Victoria tiptoed around the perimeter of blood and pulp, studying the victim and his surroundings. "The last time I saw him, he was a nervous wreck, wringing his hands and pacing around the FBI office, when he wasn't excusing himself for another cigarette. But his behavior was understandable. He was a key witness for the prosecution of Raymond Butler."

"I know we've been after Butler and his organization for years." Rivera's eyes moved slowly and carefully over the corpse.

"Not sure how you missed out on all that fun, but now is your chance to get in on the messy tail end." Victoria placed her hands on her hips. "This is not what I expected to see."

"I know," Rivera answered quietly. "Someone got the job done . . . and dead is dead, but this doesn't look like a professional hit."

"Right." Victoria frowned. "Looks like the scarf was used as a blindfold. Strange to blindfold someone if you're going to kill them, isn't it?"

"Maybe the kill started out as just a threat for him not to testify."

Victoria crouched close to the body. "And what's this about?" The number two was scrawled in black ink above Todd's left eyebrow. Directly below it, the word LIAR. "Written after he was shot. And whoever wrote it must have stepped in his blood while doing so." Balancing as she squatted, Victoria used her phone to snap a picture of Meiser's head. She leaned forward to study the shoe track marks in the blood and took another picture. "Let's keep that info from the press and public for now. About the writing."

"Good call." Rivera walked into the next room. Sully was on the phone but covered it with his hand as Rivera addressed the officers. "Hey, guys. Don't say a word about the number or the writing on his head. Make sure no one else does either. That will be the thing we keep under wraps."

Sully nodded. "Got it. We were thinking the same." He returned the phone to his ear.

One of the officers followed Rivera back to the kitchen and waited until Victoria glanced up. "So, this guy is involved in the Butler case? That's why you guys were called in?"

"Yes. Well, he was."

"What'd he do?"

"He unwittingly helped the Butlers traffic illegal goods for over a year. He was key to putting Butler away." Victoria sighed. "Poor guy. He couldn't wait to get through the trial, start his new job, and leave his past life behind him. Only a few more days and it would have happened." Victoria dropped her head and stared at what was left of Meiser's face.

"Hey. I know what you're thinking." Sully shook his head. "But it wasn't you who got him into the whole mess and it wasn't you who murdered him while he microwaved his lunch."

“I know.” Victoria offered a sad smile. She also noticed the slight tremor in the detective’s hands, the flush on his light skin. “Who found him?”

Sully gestured back toward the living room. “Neighbor. She’s in the next room. Hope you don’t mind smoke.”

“Let’s go talk to her.” Rivera walked past Sully toward the living room but stopped after a few steps to wait for Victoria.

An old woman in sweatpants and a sweatshirt sat on one end of a ratty couch. She wore white slip-on shoes. Purple rollers wound her gray hair into tight cylinders around her scalp. Her wrinkled cheeks sunk inward as she pulled long inhalations off her cigarette and stared with a blank expression at the stained carpet. On a side table next to her sat an ashtray overflowing with butts.

“Ma’am, I’m Agent Rivera and this is Agent Heslin. We’re with the FBI. Can you answer a few questions for us?” Rivera took a small leather-bound notepad out of his pocket.

The woman’s cigarette dangled from her mouth. She mumbled, “You’re the Feds?” Her gaze traveled from agent to agent, up and down their bodies.

“Yes.” Rivera nodded. “And your name, ma’am?”

“Shirley Woodard.”

“Ms. Woodard, please tell us how you came to find the deceased.”

She took a drag on her cigarette, turned her head, and blew a long white stream toward the window. “I heard a gunshot, so I came over here. The door was unlocked.”

“Just one gunshot?” Rivera asked.

“Two. One right after the other.” Shirley fidgeted with the hem of her sweatshirt.

“And you came over here and entered the house by yourself after hearing a gun go off?”

Shirley’s eyes darkened. “Guess I ain’t got much to lose no more.”

“And what did you see?”

“I saw him . . .” she cocked her head toward the kitchen, “. . . on the floor, just like he is now. I didn’t touch him. Didn’t touch nothin’. Doesn’t take a rocket scientist or a special agent to figure out he was dead. I called 911 and I sat here until the cops came. Helped myself to his cigarettes, they was right here on the table. He won’t be needing them now.”

Rivera jotted something down with his pen. “Anything else you saw or heard?”

“No.” She blew out another lungful of smoke.

“A car driving away? Someone running down the street?”

“There weren’t nothin’ else I heard or saw to tell ya. He was just lying there dead and I expect whoever it was killed him was long gone.”

Victoria clasped her hands together, elbows tucked by her sides. “How much time elapsed between when you heard the gunshot and when you left your house to come over here?”

“I don’t know.” She took another puff of her cigarette, her face growing even more haggard.

“An estimate.” Victoria shifted her weight. “A few minutes? Ten?”

“I was getting out of my shower when I heard a bang. I came over to have a check on things after I got dressed.”

“After you put your hair in rollers?” Victoria asked.

The woman patted the rollers above her temple. “I have to go out this afternoon.” She frowned at Victoria. “I came over, didn’t I? We got other neighbors younger than me. I don’t see any of them here, none of them came rushing over.”

Rivera put his notepad away. “Could you lift your shoes up off the floor, so we can see the bottoms?”

Shirley rolled her eyes but leaned back against the couch and lifted one foot at a time. There was no sign of blood on her scuffed, smooth soles.

Victoria leaned forward. “Ms. Woodard, sometimes the authorities need to keep certain pieces of information about a case from the public. The information we withhold can be critical in helping us identify the killer. We’d appreciate if you wouldn’t share any of the details about Todd Meiser’s death. You can say you found him, but that’s all we’d like you to share until we’ve found out who shot him.”

Shirley nodded. “I know. Cops already said so. I got it. And I can keep my mouth shut real good.”

“Thank you for being a good neighbor.” Victoria reached into her pocket and withdrew a business card. She handed it to the woman. “Please call us if you think of anything else that might be helpful in finding whoever killed Mr. Meiser.”

“That mean I can go now?” She stood up, pinched her cigarette between two fingers, and dropped it on top of the other butts.

“Yes, you can go home now.” Victoria walked back to the other officers. “Can one of you escort Ms. Woodard back to her home so she won’t be bothered on the way?”

The young red-haired cop stepped to her side. “Right this way, Ma’am.”

After Ms. Woodard left, the agents scanned the outside area through the grime-streaked living room window. A small crowd of onlookers stood on the edge of the muddy lawn, blocking the sidewalk. “Let’s go talk to some of those other neighbors,” Rivera said. “See who else might be out there.”

The police activity had attracted attention beyond the neighborhood. A local news van had parked behind Victoria’s Suburban. Amanda Jones, the ubiquitous young reporter from Channel 14 News was putting on a sweater. The tall brunette looked like she’d just stepped off the beauty pageant circuit. Her equally young cameraman stood next to the van, scanning the area. Amanda spotted the agents, alerted her cameraman, and rushed forward. As the agents walked down the front path, Amanda met them, holding her microphone outstretched. “We heard there was a murder and FBI agents were called in. Can you tell us who you are and what the FBI is doing here?” She spoke in such a rushed tone; her words almost ran together.

Instead of waving Amanda from their path, Victoria stopped to answer. “I’m Agent Victoria Heslin and this is Agent Dante Rivera.”

“Thank you for speaking with us, Agent Heslin.” Amanda’s tone was more relaxed, like she’d just realized she didn’t have to spit out all her questions in one burst. “We know this is the home of Todd Meiser and that he was dead. Murdered. Can you tell us what happened here today?”

“We can’t share information at this time. But, if anyone has information that could help us with this case, please call your local police department.”

“We’ve also learned that Todd Meiser was a—” Victoria raised her hand, but Amanda continued. “—witness for the prosecution against Raymond Butler, a notorious drug smuggler and money launderer. Did you know Meiser’s life was in danger? Shouldn’t he have been in witness protection?”

Rivera approached the cameraman. “You’re not going to air that yet,” his voice was low but authoritative, a voice that people were used to following. “Give us some time before you include that. We’ll make it worth your while when we can. We still have to notify his family.”

The cameraman lowered his equipment.

“But—” Amanda frowned.

“Thank you very much for your cooperation.” Victoria held the reporter’s gaze and then the cameraman’s. “We’d appreciate a copy of your footage, so we can check out the crowd.”

BETH HELD HER SHOE upside down under the bathroom faucet. Diluted trails of blood ran in pink rivulets from the treads down the sides of the white sink.

“Damn, woman. I really didn’t think you’d do it. I didn’t think you had it in you.” Intruding on her personal space in the small bathroom, Danny snorted, the way he did when he begrudgingly said something almost nice. Like when he called her kitten—go to the store and pick up a case of Bud, kitten. How long had it been since he called her kitten? Didn’t matter anymore. She didn’t have to be his errand girl any longer.

She felt his rough hand patting her on the back. “You might have more guts than I thought. Or you really, really can’t bear the thought of rotting away in jail. I gotta say, you’ve surprised me.”

Yes, she had. She most certainly had.

Meiser had been easy to find. He only lived a few miles from the Sonesta Hotel. People locked their doors at night, when they went to bed, but not always during the day. That was her advantage. And yet, Todd Meiser didn’t seem all that surprised when she entered his back door with a gun. Terrified—yes. Surprised—not so much.

When he was on his knees, his features contorted with shock and disbelief, a surge of power coursed through her veins. Now she knew how Danny felt when he knocked her to the ground and watched her crawl under a table, apologizing and begging for him to calm down and back off. Too many men from her past had made her feel that way, starting with her own alcoholic father—get your ass out of my sight before I make you sorry, Beth. It was long past time she turned the tables.

And she had to admit, she liked how it felt once the tables had been turned. She couldn’t help it.

But she didn’t like all of it. Meiser’s fear and raw vulnerability were all too familiar. They crept in, poking away at the armor she erected for the big moment, ruining her power trip, reminding her that she’d spent more of the past years cowering in fear than she ever intended. She couldn’t look away from Meiser, but she couldn’t bear to see those pleading eyes another second. She’d yanked her scarf off her neck, threw it at him, and yelled—tie this around your eyes! Do it now! And because she’d been weak, her scarf got ruined, sodden with the horrific mess that exploded from his face. She’d had to leave it behind.

Danny rubbed her mistake in. “You left something of yours behind at a murder scene? You know that show about stupid criminals? That’s going to be your claim to fame, Beth.”

She desperately wanted to shower and wash away the disconcerting sensation gnawing away inside her, the lingering image of Todd Meiser’s terrified face, his desperate eyes. But Danny was in the next room now, still going on about the scarf, everything she still had left to do, and how she better hurry. She tried to block out his voice. She wasn’t going to let him ruin everything for her. She had done it. And despite Danny’s recriminations, he was impressed. And that, in itself, was something. A big, fat, huge something to be proud of.

But can I do it again?

“I’m going out to take a walk. I need to. It will help me concentrate.” She edged past him to grab stretchy pants and a T-shirt from her bag. Danny was all for telling her to exercise, practically every day, while managing to ignore his own steadily expanding gut. You got to get rid of that damn cellulite, those ugly dented cheese holes, before it spreads and takes over your whole ass. At home, he insisted she walk on the treadmill. The tiny Vista View gym had water dripping through the ceiling and yellow tape across the door. She'd have to go for a walk outside.

"Make it fast." He pointed. "You have to take care of the rest of them. Tick tock, Beth. Tick tock. You're running out of time."

"I know that." She was just procrastinating, putting off the inevitable, but she didn't care. Shouldn't the small milestone moments be celebrated too? Like their three-year anniversary? Ha! Some vacation it was turning out to be. She deserved a break to settle her nerves before she had to go out there and eliminate another name from her list.

She scurried out of his reach and back into the bathroom. If he was trying to drive her crazy, it was working. She changed her clothes and studied herself in the mirror. Lifeless eyes stared back, like there was nothing behind them. She patted concealer around her bruise; she didn't need to advertise the deep purple ring. Her lips were pale gray, like a cadaver. They desperately needed color. She rifled through her stuffed purse for her lipstick, pulling out tissues, a wallet, pens, receipts, a comb, pain pills, tossing everything to the side and yanking the inside of the lining forward.

Where was it? Where was her damn lipstick?

A jolting current shot through the center of her brain then branched out in alarm-inducing tendrils. She froze, overcome by a wave of unexplained terror. Her knees grew weak. A dark cloud swelled around her sight, closing in, squeezing her vision smaller and smaller, down to nothing. She grasped the corner of the sink, but her hand slipped off as she sank to the floor. "Danny," she moaned as her head smacked the edge of the bathtub.

She woke moments later on the hard tiles, covered in a sheen of sweat, aware of a painful lump above her ear. Crawling up the side of the tub and then the wall for balance, she stood and exited the bathroom with cautious steps in a cloud of confusion. Her head felt foggy, her body shaky. "Danny? Are you here? Danny?"

She walked on unsteady feet toward the window, stopped and started again, focusing on the bit of space between the curtain panels and the floor, searching for shoes, socks, or toes. She cautiously pulled the curtain all the way back to one side, bracing her body for a blow. Ridiculous, but she had to make sure.

No one was hiding there. Her shoulders relaxed a bit. "Good riddance," she whispered, in case he could somehow hear her, like if he was hiding in the closet, which he did once to spy on her. Who did that, right? Danny did. She should have checked there first. But when she slid open the closet door and jumped away from it, she found it empty.

She straightened, managed to push her shoulders back, feeling stronger. He was gone, and that was good, mostly, except for the all-encompassing loneliness. Like she didn't quite know what to do next without him around to tell her. A glance down at her T-shirt and exercise pants rekindled her plan to go for a walk. She'd feel better after a walk.

Outside, it was no longer raining, but the air was still nice and cool. She tried to pretend everything was normal. Walking down unfamiliar streets toward the town center they had driven through earlier, she absentmindedly rubbed her forearms. They had cramped earlier from the recoil of shooting Meiser, or maybe just from gripping the gun so tightly.

She tried to free her mind of all the stress building up around her, focusing on counting each division between the sidewalk squares. But without warning, Todd Meiser's desperate pleas came rushing back, filling her mind. Up until the last minute, she wasn't sure if she would go through with killing him. Even as she parked her car a block away and snuck into his backyard, even as she crept into his kitchen, she still wasn't sure. But then he convinced her she had no choice.

As soon as he saw her standing in his doorway with the gun, he knew exactly why she was there. And he didn't want to die. He begged her not to kill him. "Please. Please don't do it. I didn't see anything," he insisted. And when she came closer, gripping the gun with all her might lest it drop from her shaking, sweating hands, he kept on pleading with her, sounding more desperate, more stricken with each second. "I won't testify. I promise. I'll just forget everything I saw, and I'll disappear, somewhere far away, where no one will ever find me. I won't tell. I promise I won't tell."

Yeah, right. As if she believed him.

Danny hadn't been lying. Todd Meiser had seen her. He knew what she had done. Which meant they all did. And it sounded like he'd already formulated a plan to tell the authorities.

Beth shivered. Thank goodness she had gotten to him first.

She was so freaked out when she left his house, she didn't even think to steal anything. She'd barely noticed her surroundings and couldn't even recall anything about his home. But the image of his desperate eyes and the sound of his begging—those were seared into her memory.

Her thoughts were jerked back into the present when a man and woman around her age blocked the entire sidewalk by holding hands with fully extended arms. Instead of walking around them, Beth stopped to watch. The woman peered into a furniture store window without letting go of him, then laughed as he twirled her around and into his arms. They kissed. It seemed to happen in slow motion, like a scene from a movie. The couple reminded Beth of Jason and Kelly Smith. Those foolish lovebirds now had every reason to appreciate their last few days. Too bad for them, they didn't know those days were numbered, but it didn't seem to matter. They'd acted unrealistically happy every time she saw them.

Beth pretended she was also interested in the strange contemporary art chairs in the display window while she thought about the Smiths and spied on the hand-holding couple out of the corner of her eye. A pang of jealousy struck her, followed by a deep sadness, a hard pit forming inside her stomach. Her life could have been like that of the smiling woman in front of her. Wait—it still could be. It wasn't too late. But it was never going to happen if she went to jail.

The door to a café opened and a family exited together. A little girl held her mother's hand, both wore matching yellow sun dresses. Beth wove around them, past a souvenir shop, a coffee store, and a donut store. In front of her, someone held the pink, brown and orange waxed bag she remembered from when she was young. Her father used to bring home bagels and coffee for him and her mother and donuts for Beth and her sister. Strawberry frosted with sprinkles used to be her favorite. Every Sunday he did this, to make up for his binge drinking the night before, until he left them for good.

Without thinking, she stopped and backtracked into the store, looking over her shoulder. Brightly lit bins of colorful donuts filled the shelves. She scanned each neat row. Blueberry cake, nine of them. Double chocolate, eight. Boston Krème, seven. Powdered Sugar, thirteen. There were no strawberry frosted donuts on the shelves. Maybe the donut store didn't make them anymore.

"What can I get you?" asked the unsmiling, acne-ridden boy behind the counter.

"Two double chocolate." She peeled a folded bill out of her jacket pocket and handed it over in exchange for the donut bag. She moved to a corner booth and sat down with her back to the rest of the store. Removing the first donut from the bag, she stared at it before finally taking a small bite, savoring the sweet richness. The next bite was bigger. She chewed faster, counting. Four chews, a swallow, and a bite. Four chews, a swallow, and a bite. All of it happening with a mechanical efficiency as if she had been given a maximum amount of time to consume the food.

The second donut didn't taste as good as the first. She gulped it down with a furtive glance toward the door. She was almost finished with it when Danny's barking smashed her reverie. "What the hell are you doing here?"

The remaining donut dropped from her hand and onto the table. She stared at it as heat flooded her face. "You're following me?"

"Do you have any self-control? You have a job to do. Get to it. Before they get away and you can't even find them."

"I know what I'm doing," she hissed. A fat man in a navy-blue T-shirt with Munchkins and a large coffee stared at her, one eyebrow raised.

"Oh, yeah?" Danny laughed, a mean sounding huffing noise. "How long do you think a body can stay in the woods before it starts to smell?"

An uncomfortable electric current shot through her brain again, just like it had in the hotel bathroom. Beth jumped out of her chair and ran toward the ladies' restroom, counting her strides. The fat man watched her run past.

"Don't run away from me," Danny yelled after her.

She locked the door and crouched down on the dirty cement floor in front of the toilet. She gagged once. Twice. The third gag released a hot lumpy torrent of brown processed carbs.

She gasped and tried to catch her breath. Wiping her mouth with the back of her hand, she slumped down on the dirty floor, her face hot and clammy, an irritating vibration occurring inside her, like she'd drunk one too many Red Bulls. Her breath came in hitching gasps. She shuddered and dropped her sweaty head back against the wall, letting her knees rest against the toilet. Her esophagus burned, and the taste of vomit repulsed her.

I hate you, Danny.

BETH HURRIED BACK TO the Vista View hotel, focused on what she needed to do next. Danny wasn't there. She brushed her teeth and rinsed her mouth before her stomach acid ate its way through her tooth enamel and she needed to visit the dentist again. So much for the walk making her feel better. She hadn't set out to eat donuts and vomit, but hey, she hadn't set out to become a killer either. Look at me now! Ha! She laughed aloud, without the slightest sense that anything was funny. I may be a killer, but I'm not going to jail.

After a bit of research on the internet—two YouTube videos on how to load a gun—Beth took the weapon apart. She filled the magazine with new bullets, painfully pinching her finger somehow during the process. Seeing the gun in pieces made her temporarily vulnerable, but it had to be done to make sure it was full. She wasn't going to be like the dumb asses in horror movies who walked away from their kill before it was really dead. Those who didn't or couldn't finish the job almost always ended up being sorry. The magazine slid back into place with a loud click. She sighed with relief. Good work. Using a tissue, she scraped a sticky dark splotch from the muzzle. Danny's gun was quickly becoming her good friend.

Without changing her clothes, she grabbed her laptop and keys and hurried back to her car, hoping to avoid Danny. She drove back to the same spot they had parked in last night. She would wait. It would only be a matter of time before someone came out. Had to be. She'd done her research.

Only a few empty spaces separated her from the Smiths' shiny red Jeep, waiting dutifully and somehow looking as irritatingly cheerful as its owners. Kelly Smith hadn't posted anything else yesterday, not since sharing a picture of her fresh manicure, a deep dark purple, almost black, with tiny silver moons on two of her nails. Maybe Jason had bombed his sales pitch and Kelly just wasn't in the mood to pretend their life was one big, happy, romantic adventure. Because no one's was. But from what Beth had seen of the Smiths, they were doing a commendable job fooling everyone. And it had to be an act, didn't it? Or were they still in bed, holding hands, legs intertwined, snuggling under the covers after making love? Was Jason whispering in a sexy voice that she was the only woman for him? The only woman he needed? The only woman he would ever love? Were they so happy they didn't even notice that the hotel was a dump?

Beth cringed, scrunching up her nose in disgust. Even with the windows down, the pungent smell of her unwashed body wafted through the car. Wishing she had showered, she gnawed at her cuticles one finger at a time until she drew blood. She frowned and closed her hand into a fist, as if that could repair the ragged mess. Danny would find something nasty to say about it. Oh yeah...she didn't care what Danny thought any more. To hell with him. She stretched out her fingers, the flaking pink polish in dire need of a fresh coat. She smiled. Killing each witness may have been his idea originally, but she was the one doing it now.

Lucky for her, the Sonesta Hotel hadn't been booked to capacity and the back side was barely occupied.

What's wrong, people? The Sonesta isn't your cup of tea? Was it the ugly carpets? The lobby from the seventies? Afraid you'll go the way of Jack Torrance in the The Shining when you get there? No reason to worry...it's only me following in his footsteps. Just me. Jason and Kelly Smith are having a fricking second honeymoon in there...I'm the only one sitting alone in my car, counting the seconds, counting the future corpses, and waiting to kill the next person on my list.

One down, six to go.

She viewed her surroundings. The parking lot was quiet. She was still alone. Sighing, she woke up her cell and pressed the news icon. Her feed contained mostly national headlines—politics and more politics, Russia, China, trials for people whose names she recognized but nothing more, food recalls, accusations against politicians—articles she'd never cared about and never would. She read about one celebrity's suicide and another's overdose, then moved on, tapping and swiping and occasionally looking up, until a story grabbed her undivided attention. She stopped chewing on her nails and bit down on the tip of her finger, holding it tight between her teeth as she read the headline written to grab everyone's attention—Homicide in broad daylight, victim shot inside his own kitchen!

Todd Meiser had been found.

Beth smiled, and wished Danny was there to witness her achievement. She played the accompanying video, staring intently at the image of Meiser's street lined with police cruisers, a television station van, two black SUVs, and a crowd of spectators. The scene was jumping with activity, a whole lot busier than earlier in the day.

The camera honed in on two people wearing gray suits and white shirts. They were walking away from Meiser's house. The woman was very pretty, but there was also a steely determination in her eyes, a seriousness that said, "don't mess with me or you'll be sorry." Her eyes drew Beth in like magnets. She was slim but muscular with flawless skin, perfect eyebrows, and a pert nose; one that had never been broken like Beth's. Her silky, shoulder length blonde hair parted to one side.

The handsome man beside her had short dark hair and a chiseled chin. If he tore off his shirt and posed, he could grace the cover of one of Beth's steamy romance novels. The couple stood a few feet away from each other while the female reporter asked them a question. The blonde introduced herself and Mr. Sexy as Agent Victoria Heslin and Agent Dante Rivera.

Agents?

The reporter asked them what they had found inside the house. She looked excited and sounded almost breathless. And all because of Beth.

Beth leaned forward, absorbing every bit of the scene. This was all about her! They were all gathered there because of her. The reporter wanted to tell the world what she'd done. What would the agents say? What did they think about Todd Meiser's death? Did they find any clues? That last thought wiped a bit of the grin from her face.

The agents said nothing about what they had discovered inside, nothing at all, although they were professional and polite and sure looked damn good doing it, and then it seemed the interview was cut short as the reporter asked another question.

That was it? Really? That was all they had to share? Perhaps they just needed more time before they could tell people what they found. And anyway, why was the FBI there? Didn't they only get called to work special cases?

Beth watched the video again, this time focusing more on Agent Rivera. He had a tough edge to match his hard body and projected a comfortable confidence in his suit, but it was something about the way he watched his partner that caused a stir deep inside her. A pang of . . . what was it . . . longing? She recognized what she'd seen in him. Something that was sorely lacking in her life, but she still knew it when she saw it. He cared about that woman. It was obvious. Did Agent Heslin feel the same about him?

She played the short video clip two more times, scrutinizing the agents. FBI agent—that was an unusual occupation for a woman. Beth felt a kindred spirit with Agent Heslin. They were both special. Even if Beth didn't have anyone to tell her so. Even if Danny sometimes went above and beyond to tell her otherwise. She and Agent Heslin even looked a little alike. They both had blonde hair. Beth's came from a box at Walmart, but that didn't matter.

Beth unzipped her purse and fished around for her comb. After combing her hair forward, she changed her part from the middle to the side. Turning her head right and left, she studied herself in the rear-view mirror, eventually tucking her hair behind her left ear just like Agent Heslin. With one last glance at her new look, she settled back against the driver's seat and shut off her phone. But images of the agents replayed in her mind.

The air inside the car was stagnant and stale. She opened the windows to let in some cold, fresh air, started the engine and the heat to counter the chill, and plugged her phone charger into the cigarette lighter. She fiddled with one of the studs on the top of her ear, twirling it until it started to hurt. Bored, she typed Agent Victoria Heslin into her browser and opened the agent's FBI profile and headshot. She was really beautiful. And obviously smart. You could see it in her eyes. No wonder Agent Sexy respected her. And a Georgetown grad. Fancy, fancy. There wasn't much else in the profile. She closed out and returned to the other links, opening one that intrigued her.

Well, what do you know! Who would have thunk it!

Victoria Heslin, the lovely FBI agent, was also the daughter of Gardener and "the late" Abigail Heslin and heir to the massive Heslin family fortune. Beth huffed at their elegant picture, a beautiful family with one of those tall skinny hounds on each side. The mother, daughter, and the son all had the same golden blonde hair. The father was handsome, with a strong jaw and an air of importance to him. His thick silver hair had probably been cut and his face shaved in one of those salons for rich guys. Their smiles were relaxed and self-assured. Like it was nothing to be part of this strikingly beautiful family, dressed and groomed to sophistication, perfectly posed, right down to the dogs. Nothing at all.

Beth sneered. Agent Heslin was damn lucky.

But now the mother, Abigail, who didn't look very old, was dead. Why? But even more interesting than that question, she wondered what compelled Agent Victoria Heslin to track down criminals if she didn't even have to work. Earlier that very morning, when Beth fled through Todd Meiser's front door, doing her best to choke back the overwhelming urge to vomit, Todd had looked like something straight out of a gory horror flick. Who would choose to visit dirty, disgusting crime scenes day after day, buzzing with flies crawling on corpses and stinking of blood and puke and urine? Who'd do that when they could be sipping a piña colada on daddy's yacht in the Caribbean?

Beth shook her head and stretched out her fingers, gazing through the window. What would she do if she were rich like that? If she could do anything at all and didn't have to scramble to make ends meet? Inhaling deeply through her nose, she let her imagination run wild. First, she'd make up a new identity. Disappear completely. And once she got there—massages. Definitely. Swedish massages every week, maybe every other day. And facials. And vacations at luxurious resorts surrounded by celebrities. She'd get a new nose, a perfect nose like Victoria Heslin. And a new car. One with valid license plates so she didn't have to constantly worry. She slapped the steering wheel. This piece of crap would be the first thing she'd leave behind. After Danny, that is. Unless he wanted to come with her.

An older man and woman exited through the front entrance, jolting her from her daydream. The Cossmans, room 383, on their way to an afternoon hike with their two mangy little fur balls. They'd told their families and friends as much on Facebook, right above yesterday's image of them smiling with a waterfall as the backdrop. Hands full with bags and water bottles, they crossed the parking lot, their faces animated as they alternated speaking and smiling. At least they would die happy. If they really were. Who really knew just how many times Robert Cossman had betrayed his wife when they were younger. Beth didn't know he had, but she didn't know he hadn't.

After both dogs walked in ridiculous circles and peed, and after the couple took their sweet time arranging stuff inside their Subaru Outback, they were on the move. Beth started her car and pulled out of the lot after them.

As expected, after a few miles, their little SUV made a left from the business road, onto a long, winding country road with gradually increasing elevation. They drove past picturesque farms, and rustic barns, and fields of fat cows grazing on grass made exceptionally green by the recent rains. How far away was this National Park place? Beth grimaced. All of it smelled like manure. She'd never been an outdoorsy person.

Would Agent Heslin and her handsome partner be the ones called to the scene once someone found the Cossmans? Beth sure hoped so. Perhaps she should leave a message for Heslin. The idea intrigued her. But what should she say?

Beating a red light by a fraction of a second, the Cossmans drove straight through a small-town intersection. Beth flexed her foot, about to ram the gas, noticed the police cruiser on the other side, and slammed on the brakes instead.

"Damn it!" She drummed her fingers against the dashboard. Two, four, six, eight, two four, six, eight . . . "Come on. Come on. I can't lose them."

She had to keep herself from going to jail, she had something big to prove, and now she had a new, added purpose. If she wanted to get to know Agent Heslin better, she had to hurry up and create another crime scene.

VICTORIA AND RIVERA walked toward their boss's office. The Butler case constituted years of work and it was almost over, or so Victoria had thought. Figuring out how to keep it from going under with one less witness would become one of her boss's priorities. Victoria wasn't looking forward to briefing him.

"Don't you two make the perfect couple." A fellow agent smiled at them.

"Yeah, well, I called him this morning to see what we should wear." Victoria laughed, but inside she was doing her best to be tolerant. Her colleagues' attentions sometimes bordered on immature. Maybe that's what stress did to them.

The only door with an embossed plaque—Larry Murphy, Special Agent in Charge—jerked open. Head down, wearing cowboy boots under his jeans, Murphy and his military posture marched into the shared space in the middle of the building, carrying his ever-present Georgia Bulldogs insulated thermos. Victoria wasn't sure if the thermos ever got washed but attempts to replace it at Christmas with a newer model had not fared well. Murphy claimed his conviction rate went up to ninety-five percent after he got it. He wasn't messing with that sort of luck.

"I don't need this right now." Murphy pushed his rolled shirtsleeves up over muscled arms as he paced around the other agents' desks, speaking to no one in particular. A former drill sergeant, he liked to think out loud and he wasn't particularly considerate of others' space or concentration. He spotted Heslin and Rivera. "Agents, in my office, please." He slapped Rivera on the shoulder and corralled them forward.

Rivera and Heslin entered his office and stood on one side of his large desk. "Tell me Todd Meiser isn't really dead. Because that's what I want to hear. I want you to tell me that he's in the ICU right now and pretty soon he's going to be able to think and speak even if we have to wheel him into the courtroom on life support."

Rivera shook his head. "Isn't it still a crime to lie to FBI personnel?"

Murphy chewed on his lip. "Too many people are already breathing down my neck about this." He ran a hand over his buzz cut like he was pressing his scalp into place. "We've got too many other things going on for this case to implode after years of putting it together. It's not going to happen." He stared at each agent. "We're going to make damn sure it doesn't."

Every time Murphy opened his mouth, Victoria caught a distracting glimpse of dark green on one of his front teeth. Lettuce? That meant he was eating greens, even if it was just a few leaves on top of his hamburger, and something she didn't want to discourage. Not that he wasn't fit, he kept himself in great shape, but he was known to ignore the fruit and vegetable food groups. She wouldn't mention it. Somehow, it would disappear on its own. When Murphy paused to breathe, she seized the opportunity to get a few words in. "Meiser's death didn't seem like a professional hit. There were a few things that didn't feel right about it. It was careless, for one. He had the word 'liar' and the number two written on his forehead and—"

Murphy interrupted her mid-sentence. "The Butler case goes to trial in three days. Three days. Of course it's a hit. Writing 'liar' on his head—the Butlers are sending a clear message that Meiser's testimony is fabricated. Which is BS." Murphy wrung his hands, his eyes roaming from the pile of papers on his desk to the agents.

Rivera opened his mouth, but Murphy cut him off, too.

“So, do we want to know exactly who pulled the trigger on Meiser?” He pushed some papers aside and snatched one.

“Yes—”

“Of course we do. But is it more important than making sure the rest of the witnesses are safe?”

“No—”

“Of course it’s not. I’ve already put protection on them. That’s the first thing I did when I got the call on Meiser. Would have had it on them all along if the damn budget had allowed. Believe me, I asked.”

“So—”

“But the rest of them, we’re not going to let any of them even take a crap alone. I want eyes on all of them. Local PD is going to lend us a few bodies.” He lifted his eyes toward the ceiling. “We’ll see if they actually do.” He pointed his finger from Rivera to Heslin. “And the two of you will split up and do a shift tonight. I already made a schedule.” Murphy narrowed his eyes at the paper in his hand.

Victoria rushed to share her thoughts. “The reason I think Meiser was—”

She wasn’t fast enough. Murphy went on as if she’d never spoken. “For now, go inform Meiser’s family. That brother. The only one who seems to have his head on straight. Get a sense of how angry he might be, see if he blames us. See if he knows anything we should know—about anything. Threats, that sort of thing. I want evidence to add this murder to the charges against Butler.”

Victoria nodded. They would need more proof before speaking to Murphy again about something he didn’t want to hear. He was definitely stressed out. In the meantime, it wouldn’t hurt to have law enforcement watching the other witnesses.

On her way back to the parking garage with Rivera, she reviewed her mental notes. Sometimes, with hits for hire, the victim’s body disappeared, never to be seen again. Other times, the body was left on display, arranged as a brutal message of what happened to those who fell out of favor or displeased the wrong person. Professional hits were often executed with precision and grace, a testament to the killer’s skills, because practice made perfect. Todd Meiser’s murder was devoid of skill and caution. Yet . . . every hitman had to start somewhere. And if the killer was a novice, they had a good chance of catching him or her with forensic evidence. But . . . if the killer was a hitman, he had more than likely been contracted by Raymond Butler or one of his associates. And if anyone had options that included experienced hit men, Raymond and his guys did. Victoria rubbed her chin, bothered by the apparent contradiction. If it was a hit, it didn’t appear to be ordered by Butler. And it wasn’t a robbery, not with the keys to a luxury vehicle sitting in plain view on the counter. So what was it?

Rivera slid behind the wheel of a black sedan and dropped his container of spearmint gum in the center console. Victoria slid her leather backpack off her shoulder and lowered herself into the passenger seat next to him. “Lots of things are odd about this.” She waited until Rivera put the car in gear and backed it out before continuing. “The blindfold for one. Like the killer felt guilty and didn’t want Todd to look at him. Professional hit men don’t usually feel guilty, do they? The woman’s scarf, that was odd, too. Someone is trying to confuse us, or . . . they have no idea what they are doing.”

“Or both.” Rivera flipped his sun visor down as they exited the garage, even though the sun wasn’t shining. “Hope James Meiser hasn’t listened to the news yet.”

Todd’s older brother owned his own accounting practice. They located his office inside a brick building full of small, professional businesses and waited for ten minutes until his client left before gently breaking the news of his brother’s murder.

James Meiser leaned back in his chair as the wind went out of him, his shoulders slumping as he closed his eyes and slowly shook his head. His voice shook as he spoke. "I guess I shouldn't be surprised, but . . ." He swallowed hard. "Butler." His eyes went to Victoria's. "You have to stop that guy."

"It's possible Butler was involved."

"Possible! Come on. Who are we kidding here?"

Rivera leaned forward in the office chair. "We'll explore all angles. The Medical Examiner and a forensic team will look into everything. We'll let you know what they find."

James placed his elbows on the desk and buried his face in his hands. "Toddy." Reaching for a tissue, he coughed then wiped his nose. "I guess you're saying you want me to wait to make funeral arrangements."

"Yes. Do you mind if we ask you a few questions now?" Rivera removed his notepad from his coat pocket.

"Of course not." James closed his eyes and pressed his lips together. "But you catch the bastard who did this. Butler or not, you get this guy."

Rivera gripped his pen. "When did you last see Todd?"

James shook his head, scanning the desk top. "Oh, I haven't seen him in weeks. Not since the last time he visited our mother. But I spoke to him yesterday. I called him. I just arranged palliative care for our mother. She has terminal cancer. I had some things I needed to tell him. Oh, God." He covered his eyes with his hand. "Now I have to tell her Todd is dead."

"I'm sorry about your mother, James," Rivera said. "Did you and Todd talk about anything else?"

"Yes." James sighed loudly. "Nothing I would mention under normal circumstances, but this isn't normal, so I'll throw it out there. Todd said he was meeting an . . . escort."

Bingo, Victoria thought.

"A prostitute?" Rivera asked.

"Yeah." James kept his eyes lowered.

Rivera opened his notepad and made a note. "Is that a habit for him?"

"It wasn't his first . . . appointment. I gave him a hard time about it, but now I suppose I'm glad he lived it up before he died. He had a lot of stress, you know, with the case. It was eating him up. Or—wait, when did you say he was killed? I mean, could she have . . .?"

"He was shot around ten this morning. Someone heard the gunshot. Do you know who he called? Was there a service, or—?"

"No. I don't know. Sorry."

"Did he say where he was meeting her? Would she have come to his house?"

"I don't know. I have no idea how it's done." He let out a sad sort of snort. "My brother and I led very different lives."

"Do you know who Todd may have been seeing—a significant other?" Victoria asked.

"He never mentioned one to me. I mean, if he did, why would he be calling a prostitute?"

"No angry girlfriend, upset about him seeing hookers?" Rivera asked.

"I—like I said, I just don't know." James ran his hand over his head.

"Did he mention receiving any threats? Specific threats?" Victoria asked.

"No. But it's pretty obvious why someone wanted him dead."

"I'm very sorry for your loss." Victoria met James' gaze. "Sorry Todd won't have the chance to live a different life." She got up from the chair. "We plan to catch whoever did this to him. We'll keep in touch."

James Meiser led both agents to his office door and shut it behind them. They walked to the car and got in before speaking again.

“I’ll call Sam, so we can establish a time line for Todd Meiser’s last few days with his phone and credit card records.” Victoria tossed her bag into the back seat. “I think there has to be a girlfriend. But we also need to find out who he arranged to meet last night. Maybe she stayed into the next day.”

“A woman does fit with the bloody shoe prints we saw.” Rivera started the engine and a second later, his phone rang. “It’s the boss.”

“What now?” Victoria murmured. “Impatient for our update?”

Rivera pressed the answer button.

“Where are you?” Murphy’s voice would have carried through the car even if the phone wasn’t on speaker.

“We’re just leaving James Meiser’s place.” Rivera merged the car into traffic.

“I’m about to text you something.”

“What is it?”

“The address of a double homicide. It’s an elderly couple. Both dead at the scene. No idea who they are yet.”

“And you’re giving it to us because—?”

“Gunshot wounds. The numbers three and four on their foreheads. And another message.”

NED PARKED HIS SUV in front of PawTiques, the all-organic pet store. He could have ordered everything Victoria wanted for less online, but Victoria preferred to support local businesses. He attached Izzy's leash and went inside. He walked straight to the shelves with the supplements and grabbed what he needed.

Wearing a tight, V-neck T-shirt, the beautiful young girl at the register leaned over the counter. "Hi, Ned."

"Hmm? Oh, hi Jenny." Ned scanned the bakery shelf. It was filled with dog treats people would want to eat. "I'll take seven of those frosted things."

"Oh! I love that dog. Which one is that?" The girl pressed her palm against her cheek and smiled at Ned.

"Izzy. She's a good dog."

"She's a greyhound, right?" She moistened her lips and ran a hand through her hair.

"A galga. A Spanish greyhound."

"Can I pet her?"

"Uh, sure."

The girl walked around to the front of the counter and crouched next to him. The light, floral aroma of nice soap and fragrant shampoo filled the air. While she stroked Izzy, she looked up, batting her eyes. "Oh! So cute!"

Ned stepped back and nodded. If Jenny was of legal drinking age, she was just barely. "So, how much do I owe?"

After the store he ran with Izzy on the greenway, filled his truck with gas, and stopped at Lowe's to pick up some wiring to patch up a hole he'd seen in a fence on Victoria's property. She hadn't asked him to do it, but he wanted to anyway.

When he returned to Victoria's house, the red hatchback delivering for Farm Fresh Meals stopped at the main entrance in front of him. Ned pulled up next to the car and got out of his SUV.

"Hey, Kristin? Right?"

"Oh, hi, Ned."

"I'm on my way in." He gestured toward the gate. "I'll take that from you."

"Great." She got out of her car and removed a large insulated bag from the back. "Here you go. We put in extra of the root veggies Victoria liked. And the French cobbler. Could you be sure to tell her? I know she doesn't always get a chance to eat what we prepare."

"I'll tell her. No worries about the food. It's all appreciated and none of it ever goes to waste." He patted his stomach and grinned.

"Good." Kristin smiled and kept staring at him like she was in no hurry to leave.

"See ya." Ned got back in his truck and placed the bag of food on the passenger seat. Izzy jumped into the front and stuck her nose into the bag. Ned pushed her back. "Not for you." He waved at Kristin, opened the gate, and drove through.

Entering through the back door, he stopped to size himself up in the hall mirror. He had to bend his knees, since the mirror hadn't been hung for someone six-feet-two. All his time training outside over the summer had turned his brown hair golden.

In the kitchen, he opened his laptop and logged his run. He'd swim tonight and bike early tomorrow, putting his training right on track for the upcoming triathlon. He was ready to refuel in a big way, but the dogs would eat first.

He dug his hands into the giant container of raw lean beef, vegetables, rice, and vitamin supplements, kneading the moist mixture until it was evenly distributed. He scooped measured amounts into labeled bowls and added some premium dog food. Eddie stuck his nose on the counter. "Excited, buddy?" Ned laughed as they danced around him, spinning and leaping in attempts to earn their food quicker.

Working for Victoria wasn't a huge challenge, but he thoroughly enjoyed his job and it left him with more free time than he would have working anywhere else. Two afternoons a week he was able to volunteer as a vet at a not-for-profit clinic for low income people. As long as he stayed with Victoria, he could continue to pay off his graduate school loans faster than he had ever previously imagined and help pet owners who otherwise might not be able to afford care.

And then there was Victoria.

He smiled.

The dogs inhaled their food in seconds, barely chewing. By the time he set down the last bowl, he was back to collecting the first and depositing them all back in the dishwasher.

After cleaning up, he walked outside and sat down on the back patio. Absentmindedly rubbing Eddie's ears, he gazed out over the back of the property. The whole set up never ceased to amaze him—the acreage and trails, the agility course, a pool just for the dogs—it was like a canine Disneyland. He had an entire wing for himself—a "nanny suite"—bigger by far than his own condominium. He stayed there when Victoria went out of town. But when she came home, he left.

It was hard to keep his thoughts from turning to Victoria. There were just too many reasons to admire her. She worked hard every day to rid the world of trouble, make it an easier place for others to live in. Who would ever imagine someone with her privileges and background wanting to do that? She once told him that being the recipient of a huge trust fund was simple but incredible luck but being an FBI agent was an earned honor. He agreed and his respect for her went through the roof. He'd tried to ignore his daydreams of running his hands through her hair, kissing her . . . but they were only growing, along with his determination. Not a one of his friends would ever say that he wasn't determined. He had six ironman triathlon finishes to prove it.

His phone rang.

"Hey, baby brother. Just calling to see if you can come over on Tuesday night. My friend Katie is in town visiting. She's smart and adorable."

"Can't. I have plans."

"What sort of plans? Actual going out plans or more of babysitting those dogs?"

"I'm going out to dinner with my boss to talk about our trip to Spain."

"Ah. All my joking aside, don't mess things up. You've got a great thing going there. If you're happy that is."

"Yeah. I know. But would it be so bad if we shared a bottle of wine and ended up—"

"Are you paying attention to the world right now? She could accuse you of sexual harassment, fire you, and try and sue you just for—"

Ned laughed. "She's not like that."

"Look, you can have wine with Katie and me. I've got a case I brought back from vacation that I'm excited to share. How about we switch it to Sunday afternoon instead? Brunch?"

"All right, all right."

“If there’s ever going to be something between you and your boss, you need to let her make the first pass. And make sure it’s loud and clear. That’s all I’m saying. And you’d be wise to listen to me and take my advice whenever you are so lucky as to receive it.”

He chuckled. “I know. I’m not going to do anything stupid. But if she ever makes a pass at me . . .”

“She’s crazy not to be madly in love with you by now, so maybe she’s not quite—”

Ned laughed. “There’s nothing wrong with her. She just doesn’t get close to many people.” He thought about the one time he’d asked Victoria about her mother’s death. Her reaction had given him all the information he’d needed for an armchair diagnosis of intimacy issues. “But, hey, I will take your advice.”

“Good because I’d never steer you wrong. Love you, Ned. Gotta go.”

“Love you, Lori.”

What would it take to change Victoria’s mind about him? Would she ever come home at the end of the day and be as excited about seeing him as she was about her dogs?

He had to tread carefully. And be patient. Victoria was worth whatever it might take.

VICTORIA SETTLED BACK against the leather seat, watching the road ahead. “I can’t believe there was a murder on the Triple Falls trail. It’s a popular hiking destination.”

Rivera draped his arm over the top of the steering wheel. “Wonder who got killed.”

“Murphy said ‘older couple’. I interviewed a witness from one of Butler’s warehouses awhile back, can’t remember his name now, but he was on the old side. Maybe his wife was with him. What a shame.” She tapped her phone. “I still need to call Sam.”

Rivera stayed silent while Victoria spoke to one of their intelligence analysts, Sam, her favorite person in the office because he was always polite and pleasant, no matter that everyone’s requests came in as emergencies. He was ideally suited to weather the ongoing stress in the office.

“What can I do for you?” Sam asked, as if he was idling his time when in reality, he was multi-tasking for a dozen agents.

She updated him on the murder scene and asked for information on Todd Meiser’s phone records and anything to help them identify the prostitute James Meiser mentioned.

“I’m on it. You be safe out there.” Even over the phone, his smile traveled through his words.

Knowing Sam would get back to her soon, she ended the call and slid her finger down her phone screen, searching through her mail. “Nothing from forensics yet.” She set her phone down against her leg and looked at Rivera. “What do you think the message at this crime scene says?”

“We’ll find out soon enough. You always hike alone?”

“Me and my dogs. And my pistol.” She patted the holster at her side.

“And you get cell reception in those woods?”

She grinned. “Sometimes.” She knew he worried about her. She was lucky they had been assigned to work together increasingly more often lately. Rivera could be gruff. He was a man of few words. Nothing wrong with that. On the contrary, sometimes working with him was almost as good as being alone.

“We’re almost there. I just have to make a quick call.” She pressed the contact button for Ned. After a few seconds, she said, “Hey Ned, it’s me again. So, I’m going to have to work over night. Can you stay?”

“Absolutely.”

“Thanks. Something came up. It might last a few nights, but I’ll keep you posted on my schedule as soon as I know.”

“Okay. Be careful.”

“I will. I’ve got to go. Thanks again.”

Rivera tightened his grip on the wheel. “So, whenever you tell Ned to stay at your house, he’s automatically available?”

“Yes. Because it’s part of his job.” Why did Rivera sound condescending? Her unpredictable schedule was the reason she paid Ned a salary that exceeded her own. He was always expected to be on call. “To do my job well—”

“Which you do—”

“I need to know my dogs are well cared for. Most of them were rescued from horrific situations.”

“I know.”

“So he’s essentially expected to be on call 24/7. And if that’s so ridiculous, then why have we pretty much signed up to do the same?”

Rivera’s face broke into a smile. “Touché.”

The agents drove in silence past scenic farms. Victoria stared out her window, taking in the scenery in a way she hadn’t on previous trips with her dogs, because she had always been alone and driving. The rolling acres and white fences made her think of her mother, mainly her mother’s love for dogs and horses—all animals, really. If only she’d said yes to more hikes with her mother when she’d been alive. With a sigh, she switched mindsets, reviewing every detail of the scene at Todd Meiser’s house. And then somehow, she sensed Rivera was looking at her, even as he drove.

“What?” She fiddled with the buttons on the dashboard, turning down the heat and having it blow out only from the bottom vents.

“Nothing.”

“Think these crimes are related?” She grabbed her bag and found an elastic band in the inside pocket.

“Yes.” He grimaced. “Unless a group of psychos sent out a memo with a special signature for today.”

“Let’s hope that’s not what’s going on here.” Victoria gathered her hair back and fastened it into a ponytail.

“Meiser’s death reminded me of something, but I’m not sure what. Like I had a déjà vu when I first saw him on his floor.”

“Another case? Was it the blindfold? The number on his forehead?”

Rivera shrugged. “Don’t know.”

“Well, we’ve got a two, a three, and a four so far. I’m wondering if there’s a number one out there that we haven’t found yet.”

Rivera frowned. “I was thinking the same.”

Victoria peered out the window at downed trees from last night’s storm. The forest had thickened, marked by an occasional trail entrance. “Okay, the parking area is coming up soon. It’s not well marked and easy to miss.”

Rivera slowed down. Victoria leaned forward. “There!”

Two giant stone pillars marked the entrance to the gravel lot. A news van was parked near two police cruisers and a sheriff’s car.

“Oh, jeez,” Victoria said, unfastening her seat belt. “They got here before us.”

Rivera parked, and the agents opened their car doors. Amanda Jones rushed toward them as if running from a fire.

“What do you think is the chance of them holding on to the information about Todd Meiser, like we requested?” Victoria asked as she shut the car door.

“Are you kidding?” Rivera formed a zero with his thumb and middle finger.

Murphy’s car squealed into a nearby spot and stopped with a lurch.

Amanda flipped her long hair carefully over her shoulders, framing her face. She was still catching her breath when she spoke, which added to the drama of the scene her sidekick was recording. “Two homicides in one day, Agents? What’s the story? Can you tell us anything about the double murder on the Triple Falls Trail? Is there an unknown killer on the loose?”

Rivera stepped to the side and Victoria answered. “We just arrived, and what we know we can’t disclose at this time. But as soon as we have information we can share with the public, you’ll be the first to know. If you don't mind waiting here in the parking lot, we'll be sure to give you something you can broadcast when we're done here."

"Fair enough. Thank you." Amanda continued to walk alongside them, the video still rolling.

With an angry expression, Murphy edged between the agents and Amanda, essentially bumping Victoria out of his way. Victoria stepped backward and almost stumbled over something on the ground. Rivera's arm shot out to support her. She steadied herself and mouthed "thank you."

Murphy barked at the reporter and videographer. "I'm the SAC on this case. You can't be here. This is an active crime scene. You need to leave." Holding on to his jacket, he raised his arm, pointing to the parking lot exit.

"Agent Heslin said we could wait here until you've finished your investigation. We won't go beyond the area that's been taped off."

Murphy glared in Victoria's direction, then glared at Amanda. He shook his finger toward the main road, causing his jacket to wave up and down beneath it. "Leave. Now."

Victoria offered a discreet apologetic look to the reporter and camera man, who retreated back toward their van. After all, they were only trying to do their jobs. And if there was any danger, the public had a right to know about it as soon as possible so they could take proper precautions. Like not go hiking for a few days until they figured out what had happened here.

There were three other cars in the parking lot, a Honda Odyssey, a Toyota 4-Runner, and a Subaru Outback. Their owners could be in danger, or, one of the cars might belong to the killer, still hiding somewhere in the woods.

"I'll get the plates." It only took a few seconds for Victoria to take pictures of the makes, models, and plates. Rivera waited for her, eyes roaming the area.

The trail ahead had been cordoned off with crime scene tape. A young female deputy guarded the opening.

Putting on his FBI jacket, Murphy spoke to the officer. "How far up the path are they?"

"Not far."

Murphy ducked under the police tape. "Make sure to keep everyone off the trail, especially the media."

The deputy nodded. "I've already had to turn a few people away. They weren't happy,"

"There are trails on the other side of the main road, about a half mile up. Maybe you can direct them there." As soon as Victoria said the words, she wanted to take them back. What if the killer was still out there? She scanned the area, looking for people. "Watch your back, okay?" she said to the deputy as they passed her.

Murphy led the way, grumbling, "my team is losing right now because I forgot to wear my lucky shirt."

"Did you forget last week, too?" Rivera asked, grinning.

"I'm not in the mood," Murphy said, checking his watch. "Three murders in one morning tend to do that to me. I'm supposed to go to my kid's chorus concert tonight. I swear the school moved this thing to the weekend because of my wife's insistence. She wants me there. I've got to leave here before five."

A short walk up the trail, Murphy sauntered up to the Sheriff and put his hand on his shoulder. He introduced himself and his agents to the two other male officers crowding the trail. One of them stepped back, nudged the other, and whispered something. They both looked at Victoria and grinned.

Victoria ignored them and focused on two panting dogs that were tied to a nearby tree. It wasn't warm. They were stressed. They stood alert in their matching leash and collar sets, protecting their owners, who also weren't going anywhere. A surge of anger mixed with compassion temporarily distracted Victoria. She forced down her emotions and turned her attention away from the dogs and to their owners. This job was one of the ways she could make a difference in a world with too many awful people, too many awful circumstances.

The bodies of a man and a woman were sprawled across the dirt path. In their sixties or seventies, both had silver hair, wrinkled bronze skin, and lean bodies. Victoria wouldn't have called them elderly, as one of the first cops on the scene apparently had. The word elderly reminded her of fragile senior citizens with walkers and canes. This couple wore hiking boots, shorts, and lightweight shirts. Their backpacks were still attached, as were their broad-rim hats, secured by strings underneath their chins. Their wide-open eyes and shocked, pained expressions wrenched at Victoria's heart.

Victoria always asked the same questions at a crime scene. What motivated the killer? Why this couple? Why here? Why now? Because answers to the how and why questions almost always led them to the who.

The husky officer stepped forward. "This guy found them and called 911." He gestured to a thin man with a hiker's strong calves leaning against a tree. In a tie-dyed shirt and bandana, he looked like a hippie hold-out from the seventies. A backpack with a sleeping roll and tent attached lay next to him on the ground. He straightened up to speak to the agents. "I was camping overnight. I found them when I was leaving this morning."

Murphy studied the hiker. "Did you see anyone else?"

He shook his head. "The only other people I passed before I found them were a group of women. Three of them. Don't know that they came this way. Two other trails intersect with this one farther up."

The Sheriff's eyes traveled from Murphy to Agent Heslin as he spoke. "Two officers went to find them."

"Can I go now?" asked the hiker. "The Sheriff said I had to wait for you, but now that you're here . . ."

Murphy set his hand on the man's shoulder. "Give Agent Rivera your contact information. We'll be in touch and we might need you to identify the women when we find them, make sure we located the ones you saw."

"Sure." The man gave his information to Rivera. "So, I can go now?"

"One second," Victoria held up a finger. "I just tried to send a message. No reception. How were you able to call 911?"

"I had to walk back to the parking lot and call. They told me to wait for the cops."

"What kind of car did you drive here?"

"A white Toyota 4-Runner."

"Did you hear anything?"

"Like gunshots? Or people screaming? No."

"Okay. Here's my card. Call if you think of anything else." Unless he suddenly remembered he had seen someone running down the trail with a gun, she couldn't imagine he would think of anything else that would be helpful, but it never hurt to make the request and hand out her card, just in case.

Once the hiker left, Murphy walked around the couple, studying the scene from all angles. "From the surrounding pool of blood, they were definitely shot here. The man was shot first, in the heart at close range, possibly trying to shield his wife. He was facing the shooter when he died."

Blood soaked the man's torso. Only his shirt collar indicated his top had once been white. The number three was written on his head in black ink. Below the number, the word CHEATER was scrawled in the same ink.

Behind him, the woman was lying on her side. She had also been shot in the chest. The number four was written on her temple.

"No attempt to hide the bodies." While Victoria studied the scene, she was annoyingly aware of the Sheriff's eyes on her. Wearing gloves, she swatted at the insects honing in on fresh blood, removed the woman's backpack, and examined the contents. It held a collapsible dog bowl, several bottles of water, dog treats, granola bars and trail mix. "It's pretty clear what they were doing out here." Her face was set in stone as she glanced at the dogs, whining to get closer to their masters. She focused hard on them to make sure a tear didn't escape her eyes.

Rivera opened the man's backpack. He found their wallets and car keys, more water bottles and two rain ponchos. "Robert and Anne Cossman. They're from Baltimore." He held up a blue and green hotel key card. "If this is current, they were staying at the Sonesta Hotel and Suites."

"If they're still checked in, I want you to search the room," Murphy said. "Find out what connection they have to the Butlers and Todd Meiser."

Rivera nodded.

Victoria walked slowly toward the dogs, crouching down. "We're going to find out who did this to your parents. And meanwhile—"

"Heslin." Rivera cocked his head and gave her a warning look. "Don't even think about it."

"You sound just like my father. Are you going to take them, then?"

Rivera sighed and shook his head but said, "Sure, why not?"

Victoria straightened with her hands on her hips. "Why not? Because for one, you have terrible allergies. We also work too many hours a day and you don't have anyone to take care of them." She squatted down, allowing them to sniff her. Untying their leashes, she read the tags on their collars. "Come on Leo and Bella. You'll be okay with me for a little while." With their leashes in hand she spoke to the officers. "I live near here. I'll take care of the dogs until we know where they're going, until we find out if the Cossmans have family that wants to take them."

Murphy narrowed his eyes at Heslin. "You've got work to do. You can't be babysitting dogs today. Someone can take them to the pound."

"No, sir. It's not necessary." Victoria's response was quick and firm. There was no question about her determination.

Murphy glanced at his phone. "Forensics is still half an hour out. They're going to want to comb those dogs for evidence. I need to go. You got this?"

Rivera nodded. "Got it."

"Yes." Victoria glanced down at the dogs. Leo tipped his head back to look up at her. She smiled at him.

The sheriff and the officers stood to the side, watching the agents interact.

Looking his agents in the eyes, Murphy's voice was forceful. "Figure out who is doing this and stop them before there's another victim."

Rivera folded his arms. "About our watch on the other Butler witnesses tonight—"

"I'll find someone else." Murphy grumbled. "You've got three murders now, don't let this thing blow out of control. Can't believe this . . . this . . . whatever it is and the Butler case fiasco." Murphy stared down the trail, one hand on the fingers of the others, getting ready to pull off his gloves. Taking a last glance around, his eyes settled on a small dot of white in the corner of Mr. Cossman's mouth.

“Wait. What’s that?” Murphy stooped to part the dead man’s lips. He slid out a small piece of paper and studied it. His scowl deepened. He looked up, stared straight at Victoria, and said, “What the hell?”

“What is it?” Rivera asked, walking over to his boss.

Murphy glared at Rivera. “It says—'Dear Agent Victoria Heslin – Does your partner treat you well?'”

Victoria’s mouth dropped open. She thought she must have heard wrong, but Murphy’s expression told her otherwise. “My name is really on there?”

Murphy narrowed his eyes. “What partner, Heslin?”

“I have no idea. I don’t really, I don’t have a . . . a partner.”

With a deep frown, Murphy pointed at Rivera. “They probably mean you.”

Rivera shrugged as a flush of red colored his cheeks.

Still frowning, Murphy slid the note into an evidence bag and held it out for Rivera. “Give this to forensics when they get here.” He turned to the Sheriff. “I want my agents to talk to this couple’s family first.”

“All right.” The Sheriff didn’t look happy, but he agreed.

Murphy pointed a finger and moved it from Rivera to Victoria. “Find out why someone says this man is a cheater. Find the connection to the Butler case.” The SAC left without looking back.

Victoria stared at the corpses, an unsettled feeling growing inside her stomach. She didn’t want to be the focus of anyone’s attention, especially not a killer’s.

Forensics arrived shortly after Murphy left. They scoured the scene for fibers, hairs, footprints, anything that might be meaningful to help them hunt down the killer and send him to prison. They finished with the dogs as the rain began—wiping out any last traces of evidence—and handed them over to Victoria. With the two dogs leading the way, she headed back to the parking lot leaving the forensics team and the Sheriff behind.

Rivera started after her but stopped and wheeled around. “Be right back, I’ll catch up to you.” He took a few steps back to the crime scene. “Sheriff, can I speak to you for a sec?”

The Sheriff walked over. “What?”

Rivera lowered his voice so no one else could hear. “Think you and your men can not drool next time Agent Heslin is present? Let’s try to be professional here. I’ve got new shoes. I hated getting your slop on them.”

“Hey, now, we didn’t—”

Rivera glared at him. “No, I’m sure I imagined it. And now that we’ve had this nice little chat, I’m sure I won’t imagine it again.”

“Yeah, I’ll talk to the men.” He held out his hand. “I didn’t get your first name.”

“Agent.”

Rivera walked away without shaking hands and caught up to Victoria. Her blonde ponytail swung back and forth from shoulder to shoulder as she walked. Her movements had the athletic grace of a long-distance runner. She hopped over the ditches in stride, climbed over the large rocks and bulging tree roots effortlessly.

The note addressed to Agent Heslin was bugging him, like he’d been caught red-handed doing something he shouldn’t have been doing. He’d done nothing wrong—wishful thinking didn’t count—yet he had the sudden urge to confess. For all he knew, he wasn’t even the partner the note mentioned. He had to drop his paranoia. It might send them down the wrong track of thinking. If Victoria had a partner, it wasn’t him.

From ahead on the trail, Victoria interrupted his thoughts, her voice kind and gentle.

“What’s that?” He called out. “What did you sa—”

Victoria was leaning over, talking to the dogs.

“Oh.” He frowned, continuing down the path, his cheeks suddenly warm.

She straightened again. “We’ll be talking to your family soon. And we’ll get you some water.”

Rivera couldn’t help but smile. “What kind of dogs are they?”

“I don’t know. Mutts. I think one is part Boston Terrier, one looks part Labrador.”

They settled the dogs into the back seat of the FBI vehicle and buckled up. “Glad you don’t have to babysit the witnesses tonight?”

Victoria stared out the window. “Sure. I mean, yeah, I’d rather be home than watching someone else sleep.”

Rivera sneezed once and then twice more in succession. He opened his window all the way and leaned his head toward the fresh air.

“Told you.” Victoria smirked.

His stomach growled. “Want to grab some dinner? We passed a burger place on the way.”

“No. I’m not hungry.” She exhaled loudly. “Their lives revolved around those people.”

“What?” He furrowed his brow. “Whose lives?”

“The dogs. They just lost everything. Their little world was just tossed upside down, and they don’t understand what happened.”

“Neither do we. Too bad they can’t tell us.”

“Did you know, they’ll never forget the voice or scent of whoever harmed their people. Never.” She rifled in her bag and offered Rivera a tissue. Bella, the little black terrier, was still panting. Victoria held out her hand. He edged closer, sniffed her hand, and allowed her to pet him. Leo, the lab mix, was lying on his side holding his head up and watching every move in the front seats. “I know.” Victoria said, still focusing on the dogs. “It’s very hard to lose someone you love. It sucks. It really does.”

Rivera sneezed.

Victoria rubbed the dog’s head. “Shh. He doesn’t mean it, Leo.” She faced forward and attached her seat belt. “Let’s go straight to the Sonesta Hotel.”

Rivera nodded as Victoria’s phone rang.

“It’s Sam.” Victoria put the call on speaker phone. “Hey, Sam. I was just about to call you.”

“Beat ya to it.” The noise of shuffling papers came to them over the speakerphone. “I combed Todd Meiser’s phone records. I’m pretty sure I found the prostitute’s number, called on Friday at three in the afternoon, a ten-second call, probably asking him to call her, and then a return call from that number later in the evening. I left a message. It’s a woman’s voice, very sexy, suggestive, asks callers to leave a message if they are trying to make an appointment for—well, she doesn’t say what for. I’m waiting to hear back from her. It’s not a registered phone. No way to trace it.”

“Thanks, Sam. Call as soon as you hear from her. Get us an address and we’ll go talk to her.”

“Will do. Anything else?”

“Unfortunately, yes. We were just at the scene of a double murder. Also shot at close range with numbers written on their foreheads. The husband had the word cheater written on his.”

“Same killer as Todd Meiser, then?”

“Certainly seems likely.”

Sam whistled.

“Their names are Robert and Anne Cossman from Baltimore. First, can you find us a close relative? Children, maybe?”

“Sure. What’s the connection between the Cossmans and Meiser? I mean, besides the MO, the numbers, and the words?”

“Don’t know yet. I’d like to know who they’ve seen and called since they arrived in Virginia. Check their credit card statements, too. Look for anything that he could have cheated on—taxes, a business deal, his spouse...”

“I’ll try to help you find something. Talk to you later.”

“Thanks, Sam.” Victoria pressed end and stared out the window. “We have a series of victims, all killed during the day, with close-range gunshots . . . all with the writing on their foreheads. Does a stone-cold killer for hire do that? Or a wacked-out nut case?” She toyed with the end of her ponytail, eyeing the passing scenery. “What connects them? Could they just be random murders?”

Rivera answered only with a nod. She hadn’t asked what the deal was with the note bearing her name, the question now at the forefront of his thoughts. Someone was toying with them, or at least with Victoria, trying to send her a message. But why?

“Meiser’s connection to the Butlers is still the most likely motive. We just have to figure out how the Cossmans fit into the whole Butler scenario,” he said.

“Yeah, I was thinking the same.”

An itchy feeling spread over Rivera's face. He twitched his nose. It was just getting started. His sneeze cut through the sound of his phone ringing. "Rivera." He sniffed.

"Hey. This is Sheriff Montgomery. We located the three women—the ones our hiker saw. Looks like they were unaware of the couple who were killed. The women took a different entrance to the trail."

"Thank you, Sheriff." Sniff. "Keep us posted. We'll do the same. And I'm sure our SAC will arrange for all of us to meet soon."

"Okay. Oh. About your request. I spoke with the men. It won't happen again."

"I appreciate that." Rivera ended the call and dropped his phone in the center console.

"What do you appreciate?" Victoria asked.

"Just him getting back to us."

Victoria picked up her phone from where it rested next to Rivera's and checked her messages. "Sam already sent me information on the Cossmans' son, Frank. He lives nearby and apparently works from home." She rubbed her chin. "Wonder why the parents weren't staying with him."

"Maybe he couldn't have the dogs there."

"Maybe," Victoria said.

"Get the directions. Let's see what he has to say." Rivera sneezed again and swallowed back the fluids swiftly accumulating in his throat.

• • • •

VICTORIA STUDIED THE row of modern condominiums while walking up to Frank Cossman's unit. Everything about the shiny new homes said upscale, pricey. She glanced back at the SUV. "We can leave the dogs in there with the windows open for now. It's nice and cool."

"You're the expert."

She rang the doorbell and waited. A man opened the door partway and stuck his head through, like he was just popping out to tell them to go away, they had the wrong address. He had thick hair and looked neat and sharp in a light gray suit. His eyes moved from Rivera to Heslin and their solemn expressions.

"Frank Cossman?" Rivera met his gaze.

The man nodded.

"I'm Agent Rivera and this is Agent Heslin. We're with the FBI."

Continuing his wary glances between them, Cossman opened the door fully.

"Can we come in and sit down for a moment?" Her question left no doubt that this was serious business, but there was a warmth to her words.

Frank led them into a sparsely decorated, modern living room. He and Victoria sat down. Much the same way she had with the dogs, Victoria kept her voice kind and compassionate when she broke the news of his parents' death.

"What? I just . . ." The color drained from his face. "Are you sure it's my parents?"

Rivera leaned his weight against the doorframe. "They had their wallets with them, their license photos match up. But we will need you, or someone else in your family to make a positive ID."

His voice cracked. "They were here to see me, but also to go hiking. They were always hiking. It was their favorite pastime. Always brought the dogs."

"We have their dogs with us now," Rivera said.

"Huh? Oh." He gazed past the agents toward the front door, then down at his shoes. "Are they going to a pound?"

“No.” Victoria took a quick look around the condo and out through the back window. No sign of a yard. “Is there someone in your family who could take them?”

Frank sighed. “I’ll um—I’ll see if my aunt will.”

“All right.” Victoria shifted her weight and crossed her legs. “They’ll be at my house until she can get them. I have a separate enclosure for them with access to the outside. They’ll be properly cared for.”

“To say the least,” Rivera murmured.

Frank fidgeted with his hands in his lap. “So, you’ll hold on to them for a few days?”

“Sure.” Victoria’s shoulders shifted forward as she studied the victims’ son. It upset her that Frank Cossman hadn’t seemed to know the dogs’ names, at least not right away, and wasn’t rushing to get them.

Frank asked a few more questions. They couldn’t tell him much about an active case, which worked out well because aside from the circumstances of the Cossmans’ death, the agents had little to share.

Rivera leaned forward. “Do you have any ideas on who might want to hurt your parents?”

“No one. They were the least likely people . . .”

Rivera clasped his hands. “Somebody thought otherwise and made their point with a few bullets. You sure? Any recent arguments they mentioned? Any neighborly disputes?”

Frank shook his head. “No. Nothing like that I’m aware of.”

“Did he play tennis, bridge, golf? Any activity where someone might have gotten bent out of shape about him cheating?”

“No. And if he did, he wouldn’t cheat, and he wouldn’t even be playing with people who would take it that seriously. He’s not like that.”

Victoria didn’t correct Frank’s use of the present tense when talking about his father. “Did they have debts?”

“No. I’m pretty sure their house has been paid off for years. They buy their cars with cash. They live a simple life. Gardening and hiking, doing yoga. What kind of debts do you mean?”

She thought of all the illegal activities the Butlers oversaw—trafficking of drugs, people, money laundering . . . she wasn’t about to mention them all. “Gambling?”

“Definitely not.”

“Would you know if they are in any way familiar with Raymond Butler or his family?”

“Who?”

“He’s about to be on trial for—”

“Oh. That Butler. No.” Frank crossed his arms and rocked forward. “My parents might know who he was from the news. They’re news junkies, but that’s it. My father is a retired dentist, he wouldn’t—they wouldn’t—why are you asking?”

“We’re exploring the possibility that your parents’ deaths were related to the upcoming trial.”

“Not possible.”

“Your father had the word ‘cheater’ written on his forehead,” Rivera said. “Sounds personal.”

“Do you know what that might be about?” Victoria touched her necklace.

“I have no idea what it could be about or who could have written it.”

“Were you aware of any infidelities in their marriage?” Rivera asked.

“Absolutely not. Absolutely no way.” Frank lifted his eyes toward the ceiling and his face contorted with a wave of anguish.

“Do they visit here often?”

“I don’t know.” Frank’s gaze moved back to the agents. “I just moved here not too long ago from DC, but I’m pretty sure they’ve come to the area to hike before. They wanted to see my new place, my mother brought a few things, like house warming gifts. It’s not big enough for them, I mean, they insisted on staying in a hotel.”

“Can you give us a list of their closest friends, people they did business with, so we can start talking to them?”

“You mean, right now?”

“Yes, whatever you can come up with right now. If you could also list their habits and routines, that would help. I’ll give you my email and as you come up with more, you can send them to me.” Victoria slid a card from her bag.

“Why? They weren’t involved with anything, they don’t even live here, this must be some random mistake, like mistaken identity, or just being in the wrong place at the wrong time. . . I don’t know.” His voice grew quieter and cracked as he spoke. “No one would have a good reason to murder my parents.” His voice quivered. “I’m sure of that.”

“It’s our job to find out what happened.” Victoria handed Frank her card.

“Was—was anything stolen?”

“Not that we’re aware of. You can let us know if anything is missing when you confirm their identities.” Rivera stood up.

“Yeah. Sure. Okay.” Frank stood and wiped his palms on his pant legs. “I’ll get you the names. I’ve got an address book. This is . . . I can’t believe this.”

“We’re very sorry,” Victoria said, as Frank left the room.

The agents exchanged glances. Rivera shrugged and folded his arms. Victoria sensed they had accomplished all they could with Frank Cossman.

Frank came back with names and numbers on a piece of paper. Rivera took the paper. “Last thing—where were you this afternoon?”

“Me? You can’t possibly—” Frank lifted his eyes toward the ceiling. “I was here, I’ve been on the phone with clients all day. I can give you a list of names and times.”

“Please do. We’re heading to the hotel where your parents were staying. You’ll think of other things. Send them to us. Agent Heslin’s email is on the card.”

“Of course I will.”

“Please call your aunt. She can contact me about Leo and Bella,” Victoria said. “We’re very sorry for your loss.”

Frank led them to the door. “Thank you, I mean, thanks for coming out here.”

The agents stepped outside. At the car, Victoria whispered, “I know you believed him. But we’re still going to find out if he or any of their children had a reason to want them dead.”

“Yep.” Rivera typed the address for the Sonesta Suites into his phone, took out a few pieces of his spearmint gum, and started the car.

• • • •

AT THE HOTEL, VICTORIA took the Cossmans’ dogs for a quick walk then put them back in the SUV. They hung their heads out the window, watching her as she walked away. She spotted Rivera standing in front of the cash register at the Sonesta Suites Hotel kiosk. He stuck his wallet into his back pocket and peeled the plastic off the top of a Benadryl bottle.

Victoria couldn’t imagine anything much worse than being allergic to dogs. But Rivera wouldn’t complain. He never did. The only time she caught a glimpse past his emotional armor was at a sports bar. Near the end of the Xavier game, Rivera let loose with some uncharacteristic outbursts of encouragement for his alma mater.

She went over to him, placing her hand on his upper arm. “Sorry about the allergies.”

Rivera shrugged, holding up a plastic card. “Got a room key.”

“Let’s check it out then.”

They walked down the corridor over worn turquoise carpeting. The agents put on gloves and Rivera slid the plastic card into the slot at room 383. A green dot lit up and he opened the door.

Inside, Victoria took in the room—two closed suitcases, pairs of shoes lined up side by side, dog bowls and dog beds. Nothing on the surface indicated the people staying in the room had just been brutally murdered. Inside one of the small suitcases, under a neatly folded sweatshirt, Rivera found a laptop. He slid it into an evidence bag for the IT department.

Victoria scanned the small space again, looking for anything. “Should we have techs come in?”

Rivera shook his head. “Doesn’t look like anything happened here.”

“I’ll take this.” She pulled a large, yellow bag down from the top shelf of the closet. She unfolded the top, peered inside, and moved the contents around to make sure it really contained dog food. “This is excellent.”

“I figured you had a year’s supply at your house.”

“If they switch food suddenly, they’re likely to be sick. Now I can mix some of theirs with some of mine.”

Rivera rolled his eyes, but with the hint of a smile. “I’m starving,” he said as they left the room. “Do you want to grab dinner now then call the Cossman contacts?”

“I’d like to get back to the office, get my car and get home. Let’s split up the research.” Victoria sighed. She’d be thinking about the murders long into the night, focusing on every little detail. The day had started out so well, a long walk in the woods with her dogs after the cleansing rain, and ended so terribly, with three murders and a note for her from the killer. She was determined to find out who had ruined the day for so many people.

Rivera nodded. “I’ll be up late. Call me if you find anything.”

THE GARAGE DOOR ROSE in silence, revealing Ned's black Ford Explorer inside.

Victoria pressed her fist against her lips. "I forgot to call him."

She parked her car and glanced at the dogs. "You stay here. I'll be right back. I need to introduce you to the pack one at a time. Just don't show any fear and things will go well. They're all very accustomed to newcomers."

Entering the large mudroom, she inhaled the fresh scent of lemon and vinegar. The floors were gleaming thanks to the visit from her cleaning crew.

Her pack crowded the room to greet her. Izzy wiggled in and out between her legs. Eddie smiled, his gums pulling back to reveal his teeth. His tail curled up into a circle behind him. Myrtle jumped up and down. Charmer sniffed in cute, quick little snorts.

"I'm home. Yes. I know you smell new dogs. We have visitors. Calm down and you'll get to meet them."

The house phone rang. Victoria headed to answer it. Ned walked around the corner shirtless, wringing water from his dripping hair with a towel. He saw Victoria and stopped short. Their eyes met, and both were silent.

Victoria smiled, shifting her gaze away from Ned's chest and to the phone. Something tingled inside her stomach.

Ned pointed at the phone. "I'm guessing that isn't you calling to say you'll be back soon."

"I'm sorry, Ned." She shook her head, her cheeks still a little hot. "Sort of a last-minute change of plans and I forgot to call you."

"No problem. Hold on. Just let me finish getting dressed. I just went for a run and—be right back."

Victoria opened the fridge and poured herself a glass of water.

Ned returned wearing a T-shirt, skin still glistening from his shower. "I can . . . I mean, I can stay if it helps, or I can go and come back tomorrow . . ." His eyes moved from Victoria to the dogs, a slight shrug of his shoulders.

"Um . . . I guess it's whatever is most convenient for you. I'm going to be up really late working on some new cases . . . really, whatever is best for you."

Ned crouched down to rub Myrtle's side and scratch Cooper's neck, keeping his eyes on them. "Sounds like you're beat, and you've still got work to do . . ."

It might be nice to be in his arms. "Yeah, it was quite a day." She started to bend down to take off her shoes, but remembered she had a reason to keep them on.

"I saw you on the news today. You and another agent."

"Really?" She frowned, thinking about what might have been revealed to the public.

"Coming from a crime scene in front of a small house. Then again later near the Triple Falls Trails, another murder scene." He let out a low whistle.

Victoria chewed on her bottom lip. If Channel 14 had aired footage of her after the first crime scene, that might partly explain the note left for her at the second. Although the content of the note was still a complete mystery.

Ned straightened up and smiled. "I should probably go home and water my plants."

"Oh, you have plants?"

“No.” He laughed. “I’ll just come back tomorrow after you leave for work.”

She nodded. “Ned . . . Thanks. For this. For everything. I—”

“You think your new case will be wrapped up before the trip?”

“Yes, absolutely. I mean—hopefully—but remember, if for some reason I can’t leave, you’ll still go to Spain without me?”

“I will.” He laughed. “I promised, didn’t I?”

“Good. Just making sure. Actually, before you go, can you just help me with something?”

He smiled again. “Of course. What is it?”

She tilted her head toward the garage and offered a sheepish smile. “We’ve got some temporary guests.”

A hint of confusion crossed his face, but only for a fleeting second. His eyes lit up and he smiled. “Ahhh, sure . . . let’s see what type of guests you’ve got out there.”

They both started toward the garage at the same time. His arm grazed hers, startling her with a tingling sensation. She stopped, putting more space between them, still thinking about the feeling. For right now, that was enough. She didn’t want to lead him on. He was too important to her.

“Sorry.” He stepped aside and extended his arm. “Lead the way, boss lady. Can’t wait to see what you brought home.”

She walked ahead of him, and in spite of the day she’d had, couldn’t help but smiling as his warm laughter echoed through the mudroom.

Victoria opened the back of her SUV. “They’re from the crime scene.”

“Really?” Ned stood still, letting the dogs sniff him. “Look, you’ve had a long day. Let me take care of these guys and you go settle in.”

“Thanks.” Victoria exhaled loudly. “That would be nice. I can’t wait to change. My clothes were wet half the day.”

“Go ahead. I’ve got this.”

She stood under the shower spray, letting the heat soothe her shoulders and cascade over her low back. She didn’t know what she was feeling or what she wanted from Ned. She didn’t want to lead him on and make him think there could be something more than there was. She liked him. She really did. Everything about him. He was handsome, smart, fit, loved her dogs—what more did she need? But was it stupid to try and see if there was more? Because she sure didn’t want to risk losing what he was already providing—peace of mind, trust, reliability. None of them small things to be taken for granted.

After the shower, Victoria put on a silky robe and left her bedroom suite to see how everyone was getting on. In the family room, Ned was kneeling next to Leo and Bella. “How are the little ones doing?”

Ned laughed. “They’re only little compared to your pack. And they’re doing great.” That’s when he looked her way. His eyes opened a little wider, he covered his mouth with his hand, and quickly turned his attention back to the dogs. It was his turn to blush.

Victoria pulled her robe tighter over her camisole and sleep shorts. “Good to hear. I knew they would be okay.”

“Yeah, they’re going to be fine here.” Ned stood up. “So, guess I’ll be going.”

“Thanks.”

“Sure thing.”

He walked from the room and the door to the garage closed quietly behind him.

Victoria took his place, crouching down with the new dogs and murmuring to them. “I shouldn’t have done that, come out here in my robe, should I? He’s a gentleman and I’m sending mixed signals, aren’t I?”

Leo licked her chin.

KELLY SMITH ZIPPED up her coat and shifted her feet from side to side. Her fingers wrapped around the door handle as she scanned the dim and quiet parking lot and settled her gaze on her husband, who was walking toward the car. “We’re going to be late.”

Jason pressed the unlock button on the key fob. Something inside the Jeep honked and the locks flipped up. “No, we’re not. There’s at least twenty minutes of previews.”

Kelly opened the passenger door and slid into the seat. “I love the previews. They’re sometimes more entertaining than the movie. We have to hurry.”

“I want to stop at a store and get some candy on the way. It’s too expensive at the theater.”

“No.” She gave Jason her cutest pleading face. “We don’t have time.”

Jason started the car. “I’m pretty sure there’s a CVS on the way. I’ll be quick. In and out.”

Kelly turned on the heater and rubbed her hands together. “No, sweetie, you’re never just in and out. That’s why we missed the nine-thirty show.”

Jason grinned. “I’ll get you red licorice.”

“Fine. And something with caffeine. Like if they have a cold Starbucks latte in a bottle. I don’t know if I’m going to make it through the whole movie. It’s so late.”

“Not my fault.” Jason grinned. “I’m just trying to satisfy my bride.”

Kelly licked her lips, smiling.

Putting the car in gear, Jason placed his hand over his wife’s. As they pulled out of the parking lot he glanced in the rearview mirror. A gray Honda with one headlight followed close behind. The Smiths made a right turn and then at the next stop light, a left.

“Hmm, that the same car?” mumbled Jason.

“Hmm, what?”

“That car back there. I saw that same car when I dropped you off to get your nails done. That lady was behind me. I got out and told her she only had one working headlight. Guess she didn’t get it fixed.”

“That was nice of you to tell her.”

“Lot of good it did.” Jason snorted. “I got drenched doing it. And now she’s following us.”

“No good deed goes. . . unnoticed.” Kelly tossed her long hair over her shoulder.

“It’s no bad deed goes unpunished.”

“You don’t do bad deeds, so all you need to know is my saying. If it wasn’t a saying before, then it is now, because I just made it up.”

“Well, okay then. Notice away.”

Kelly laughed and leaned toward her husband to peek in the rearview mirror. The car was still behind them, looking unbalanced without two glowing circles in the front.

“Strange how that car pulled out of the parking lot exactly when we did.”

“Just a coincidence,” Jason said.

Kelly pushed a button for the radio and twirled the knob until she found something she wanted to hear. “There it is!” Kelly pointed to the CVS as they were about to pass it.

Jason hit the brakes and jerked the wheel to the left. Praying he wasn’t about to cause an accident, he glanced up in time to see the Honda make the same quick turn. Frowning, he parked the car directly in front of the store.

Kelly's eyes met his. "I'll wait here. Be quick."

"I won't let you down." Jason leaned in to give her a quick kiss on the cheek before jogging into the store. The automatic doors slid open, but Jason stopped to peer back at Kelly inside the Jeep. The Honda had parked right next to their car. Jason crossed his arms. The woman behind the wheel stared straight at him. He stared back. He hadn't paid much attention to her in the pouring rain yesterday, but he was pretty sure he recognized her as the same person. He only needed a minute or two inside the store, but he didn't want the candy badly enough to leave Kelly out there with a potential stalker.

Another car caught his attention. A police cruiser drove into the shopping center and parked right behind the Honda, blocking its exit. A policeman got out of the cruiser, his eyes on the Honda. He walked to the driver's side and gestured for the woman to roll down the window. The woman's expression immediately changed in a way that struck Jason as unusual. Not annoyance or resignation, but pure terror. Eyes wide, stricken, a deer in the headlights, like how he must have looked that time in high school when he was pulled over. His car held a keg, drunk friends, open bottles and nowhere to hide any of it.

The officer said something to the woman. He walked around to the front of her car and pointed at the broken headlight. Kelly was also watching from inside the Jeep.

Glad the cop had arrived when he did, Jason shook off the uncomfortable feeling—probably just being paranoid—and headed into the store. After Jason paid, the officer passed him heading to the register, carrying a bottle of aspirin.

Outside, the one-headlight Honda and its driver were gone.

ROCKING BACK AND FORTH against the cloth seat, hardly noticing the cars passing on either side, Beth chewed away on her lower lip. When that uniformed officer appeared out of nowhere and stepped right up to her car, panic overwhelmed her. She could barely think, barely move. She was lucky her heart hadn't stopped then and there. She'd sat paralyzed, aware of the gun on her lap like it was a smoldering coal. Her first thought—someone from her list, someone she hadn't yet killed, had finally taken his or her butt down to the police station and provided a detailed description of her and Danny.

Her stomach roiled thinking about what could have happened if the stupid cop had been more thorough—if he'd lowered his gaze from her face and seen her gun, if he'd asked for a license and registration instead of issuing a polite warning to fix her headlight. What would she have done if he ran her plates? She didn't know exactly what he would have found. She seriously doubted Danny had bought the car the way most people did, with actual money handed over to a rightful owner.

That was a narrow escape. I'm done following them. That cop was a sure sign it's time to quit for the night and hightail it back to the hotel. Stupid headlight. Danny was supposed to take care of that sort of thing, but he almost never did. Lately, she had to do absolutely everything while he was away on his business trips—where he spent money but had yet to make any. And when he was home, he sat around drinking beer after beer and complaining.

And the Smiths were proving to be a royal pain.

After glancing behind her for what seemed like the hundredth time, she snapped on the radio and scanned through the stations, in search of news on a channel with an even number.

She settled back against the seat and was starting to relax a bit, her shoulders no longer tense and tight. The news came on. She cranked up the volume on the radio. They were reporting the day's most mentionable events—three homicides. All of them happened to be perpetrated by her. It was almost surreal, hearing the serious, reverent tone of the announcer, knowing she alone had made it happen.

“Todd Meiser, a key witness in the Raymond Butler prosecution—”

Who the hell was Raymond Butler? What did he have to do with anything? Fuming, racking her brain for where she'd heard that name before, she missed the rest of the report about Meiser. The news anchor prattled on about the old people she killed at Triple Falls and asked for anyone with information related to their deaths to contact the FBI.

She tipped her head back and laughed. The cops and FBI didn't seem to have any idea who had killed any of them. A few of the news reports she'd heard had referred to her as a male—bunch of sexists. No one, aside from Danny, seemed to have a clue that she was the one responsible.

But why didn't the news report say anything about the note for Agent Heslin? Didn't the authorities know it was left by the killer? Wasn't that interesting and newsworthy? Had Agent Heslin even seen it? Frowning, Beth twirled the ends of her hair. She'd have to do better. She sighed and bit into her lower lip, chewing the side that wasn't yet tender and raw. At a stoplight she checked her reflection in the rearview mirror and swiped at the hint of blood on her lip. She opened her mouth wide and slid her jaw from side to side to loosen it.

Chin up, Beth! Three murders so far—not counting the first, the one she wouldn't think about, didn't quite remember, and didn't want to. Not too shabby. She'd accomplished quite a bit for one day. “Why did I doubt myself?” But she knew exactly why and whose fault it was.

She wasn't receiving credit for what she'd done, but if getting credit for the murders meant going to jail, she could live without it. The important thing was that Danny now knew what she was capable of doing. She had shown him. And herself.

Grinning, she remembered how she felt running down the trail after killing that couple. Her heart pounded, her skin tingled, her muscles were fueled with a strength she hadn't even known she possessed. She felt wild and . . . alive. For years she had stolen information online, hunched over her computer, always looking over her shoulder. A slight adrenaline rush had always accompanied the niggling fear, but nothing like what she experienced today. Today had been different. More exhilarating. More real.

She relived the scene in her imagination, picturing her escape down the hiking trail without a soul around to stop her, her blonde hair flowing in the wind. Everything she saw and heard had been amplified, heightened—the twigs snapping at her sides, birds chirping in the sky, yet distant and separate. She was the only thing that mattered. In her mind, she had on dark pants and a fitted white shirt, the same ensemble worn by Agent Heslin, instead of the jeans and sweater she actually wore. “I did it,” she whispered.

The giant yellow arches of a McDonalds came into view on the busy road ahead. The dashboard clock told her it was close to eleven. Her empty stomach cramped. She hadn't eaten much all day. She doubted Agent Heslin ever ate at McDonalds. But Beth didn't have the luxury of time to figure out where Agent Heslin would eat, so she steered into the drive-thru lane and ordered a salad, French fries, and a diet Coke.

She ate the hot, salty fries driving back to her hotel and they were gone by the time she reached her room. Oh, no. Damn. She stopped outside the door, her key hovering above the slot. Would Danny be angry because she hadn't brought him any food? A little too late to be thinking of that now. She still had her salad and would share it with him, but he wouldn't be interested. And she couldn't very well eat it in front of him. Not if he was hungry and in one of his moods.

“Danny?” She balanced her drink against her chest and held the door partway open. A sliver of weak light filtered in through the slit in the drapes.

Silence.

The muscles in her shoulders and chest tightened as she stepped inside the dark room, flicked on the light switch, and tried to look everywhere at once. The room was empty and still, appearing as she left it, except the bed was expertly made. No empty cans or bottles littered the tables or counters. No signs of take-out containers or empty pizza boxes.

She crept to the bathroom and peeked inside the open door. The used towels had been replaced with folded ones. New packaged soaps had been positioned around the sink. A white curtain hid the interior of the shower. Better safe than sorry. Almost holding her breath, she gripped the edge of the shower curtain, braced herself, and yanked it aside like she was tearing off a Band-Aid.

The shower was empty except for brown mildew stains in the tile grout.

Beth left the bathroom, both puzzled and relieved. Where was he? She had the car, so wherever he went had to be on foot. Maybe he'd hooked up with a younger woman he met randomly in the hotel. Wouldn't be the first time. An aching pit began forming in her stomach and a heavy cloud of hopelessness descended over her like a shroud. She pressed her lips together and squared her shoulders, willing herself not to care, to stop thinking about it. Let him. Just let him. You don't need him. Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen . . . The counting made her feel needy and pathetic, but rarely could she stop once it started. She walked back to the front door, turned the lock, and flipped the bolt.

Sinking into the couch, she pulled off her shoes and threw them across the room. She grabbed the remote and pressed down hard on the buttons, flicking through channels until she found some local news.

“Heavy rain in the forecast yet again for tomorrow. Stay alert for flash flooding. If you see standing water, do not attempt to cross it.”

Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen . . .

She tapped her fingers on the table, unable to finish listening to the meteorologist. He was trying hard to make the rain sound like the end of days. With more force than necessary, she mashed her finger against the remote and changed to another news program, a sportscaster wrapping up his piece.

. . . twenty-two, twenty-four, twenty-six, twenty-eight, thirty . . .

She put her feet on the table, set her salad in her lap, and started eating. After a few bites, the picture on the screen switched to a woman with lush red hair, a plunging V-neck sweater, and an intense look in her eyes.

“Breaking news today—Is Virginia facing a serial killer’s spree?”

All counting ceased. Beth dropped her plastic fork, swung her feet off the table, and bolted to an upright position. Serial Killer. Was it her? Is that what they were calling her now? An image of Todd Meiser’s dumpy yard and home filled the large screen in front of her. Yes! A flush of pride warmed her skin. A surge of power radiated through her body. Maybe this was how Danny felt and why he got off on hurting her.

But then the news reporter brought up Raymond Butler. Again! They were all suggesting a connection. “I don’t even know who the hell Raymond Butler is, so there’s no damn connection! He has nothing to do with this. I did it! I did it! All by myself! Me!”

Without taking her eyes from the television, she pushed aside the remains of her salad.

The image on the television changed. There they were again. Agents Heslin and Rivera in the parking lot near the Triple Falls Trail with the same reporter Beth had seen on her phone earlier in the day.

She scooted to the edge of the couch and leaned closer to the screen.

Agent Heslin’s smooth blonde hair had been pulled back into a ponytail. As she approached the reporter, a military-type guy claiming to be the SAC, whatever that meant, edged her right out of the way, stepping in front of her. Agent Heslin teetered a bit, looking down as if she had stepped on something she didn’t expect to be there. In an instant, Agent Rivera was at her side, his hand on her elbow. It wasn’t a big deal, not like she would have fallen off a cliff or anything, but he was there to protect her nonetheless, as if he were her knight in shining armor. Beth narrowed her eyes and caught the split-second flash of anger on Rivera’s face as he glanced at the overbearing guy. When Rivera turned back to Agent Heslin, his expression softened just a bit, despite the determined set of his jaw.

“Hmmm.” Beth’s mouth spread into a smug smile, like she knew his secret. “There’s no mistaking it. He’s in love with her.”

The news story on the television changed to angry, egotistical politicians in suits arguing about a budget, but the snapshot of the agents standing side by side remained clear at the forefront of Beth’s mind. She rolled it over and around, savoring the image like a mouthful of expensive wine. “Rivera.” She said his name aloud, letting it roll off her tongue.

Did Heslin love Rivera back? She should. He was handsome enough. Took care of his body. And it looked like he cared for her so much, like he would never hurt her. But the female agent didn’t appear to be paying attention to him the way he did to her. They didn’t act like Jason and Kelly Smith, going out of their way to touch and make googly eyes at each other. Of course, how could they? They were at work. They had to look professional. Perhaps their after-work behavior told a different story.

Beth dragged her laptop across the table until it was in front of her. What else was there to learn about the lovely Victoria Heslin? Typing in Victoria's name produced several links about the death of her mother, Abigail Heslin. Eyes gleaming, Beth scanned from line to line, soaking up the information.

After three days in captivity, heiress Abigail Heslin succumbs to a heart condition.

Captivity? Beth hit the back arrow, selected another article, and kept reading. The story said tragedy struck one of America's wealthiest families. Billionaire heiress Abigail Heslin was kidnapped for ransom. After three days of captivity, under the stress of her captors and without the medicine for her heart condition, she suffered a heart attack and died within hours of the FBI tracking her down.

The story must have been huge when it happened ten years ago. Victoria Heslin would have been around nineteen or twenty years old at the time. She must have been so worried, but maybe she trusted the FBI would do their jobs and find her in time. How interesting that Victoria ended up working for the very same organization that failed to save her mother. Interesting indeed.

Within a few minutes, Beth had access to the county tax records database and Agent Heslin's home address. Shortly after, she had control of the agent's security system. She was no longer tired. With a determined smile, she stuffed her feet back into her shoes, snatched her car keys off the table, and rushed out the door.

AFTER THE NEW DOGS were settled and Ned left, Victoria got the outdoor fireplace going, turned on a heating lamp and sat on the patio with a soft blanket over her legs and a mug of hot tea. The dogs lay down one by one around her and she gazed out at her property, remembering the first time she'd seen it, many years ago. Fortunately, as much as she avoided social gatherings, she had agreed, for once, to accompany her father to an afternoon party in late spring. Some sort of fundraiser, she'd forgotten what or who it was for.

On that day, elegant women in sundresses sipped flutes of champagne offered on silver trays. A quartet played soft live music and dozens of canopied tables had been spread across the lawn. The house was exceptionally decorated, but all Victoria really noticed were the acres and acres of flat yard and the adjacent trails. The estate was exactly what she wanted. When it came on the market three years ago, she immediately bid above the asking price, unwilling to lose the opportunity, and marking the first time she'd used any of the trust from her grandfather on something other than donations. Her father grumbled that it was more house than she needed, and he was right. But it wasn't the house she wanted, it was the yard. The perfect yard for animals. She'd reminded her father that there were fewer investments better than a fabulous piece of property. The back yard wasn't quite as pristine as when she moved in, seven dogs, not to mention the frequent foster, running, peeing, and digging could do that in no time, but it could be fixed. Yards were meant to be used, not just admired.

It really was perfect. Her mother—who'd mostly owned greyhounds, but also took in a long parade of rescues—would have wholeheartedly approved.

The serenity of the large landscaped yard, aided by the rippling murmur of a fountain, created a peaceful oasis where she could escape from the world. Being alone—with her dogs—was always what she needed to recharge her energy. The day's horrific crime scenes had dominated her every thought since she stepped into Todd Meiser's kitchen. Now, she wanted to clear her mind before she revisited the details, hoping to see each scene with a fresh perspective and perhaps think of something she might have missed.

She finished the last sip of her tea, set down her mug, and uncrossed her legs. Enough relaxing. She and Rivera had three murders to solve. At the beginning of a case, the questions always outweighed the answers. But that would change as they put together everything they learned combined with information from detectives, forensics, and the ME's office.

There's no way the numbers on the victims' heads were a coincidence, so what did they mean? Soon enough they would have the forensic report on the bullets and know for sure if the crimes were connected. In the meantime, what were they missing? What connected Meiser and the Cossmans? Why did the perp write the numbers? What purpose did they serve? A message to us? A need fulfilled for the perp?

Frank Cossman had come through with a list of names and numbers, his parents' closest friends and neighbors. With a tablet and stylus, she began digging for the truth.

After a few hours, and nothing helpful to show from it, she set aside her note pad. Taking a deep breath, she held it, and let it out slowly. The temperature had dropped from chilly to cold. A hazy sky blocked the stars. Wind rustled the branches and leaves.

She glanced at the time on her phone. It wasn't too late to call Helen to discuss the case. It'd be worth it, even if meant wading through a probe of her personal life or lack thereof. Helen Bernard was one of the few people Victoria completely trusted.

She wrapped the blanket around her shoulders. As her call connected, the dogs leapt up, staring alert toward the backyard.

“Stop. Leave the raccoons alone. Sit down.”

“Victoria?” Helen said.

“Hi. You’re still up?”

Eddie let out a long, low growl. Victoria placed her hand on top of his head.

“Of course. I’m about to pour myself a glass of wine. What’s going on there?”

Victoria’s dogs flew off the patio and raced across the yard. Only Leo and Bella remained on the steps, staring out after the others. Not all dogs were wired to chase. “Can you talk for a few minutes?”

Helen would know exactly what that meant. But that didn’t mean she’d let Victoria get right to it.

“Are you still all alone in that big house?” Helen had always been direct.

“I’m not alone. I have my dogs.” As she spoke, they were flying gleefully across her back yard.

“Take it from me, remember I was one of the bureau’s best profilers—”

“I know.” The dogs stopped, sniffed the ground, and turned around in a pack.

“It’s good to love what you do, but not to the exclusion of everything else.”

Victoria pulled the blanket tighter around her shoulders. “Like I said, I’ve got—”

“What does having a dozen dogs tell you?”

“I don’t have a dozen dogs—”

“That you have a gaping hole in your heart that needs to be filled. Don’t pretend a dog—or however many you have—can fill it. On your death bed, you won’t say, ‘I wish I’d have logged another twenty hours on the MacDougal case and rescued five more dogs.’”

“Actually, I might. And it’s seven now.”

“Good Lord! Stop making my point. Seven can’t do what five couldn’t, because it’s not really about the dogs.”

Victoria laughed. “Maybe we can discuss my ‘gaping hole’ another time, since I’m really not convinced it exists.” The dogs returned, panting, looking pleased with their chase. Victoria petted each of them. “Actually, believe it or not, I said I would go to dinner with someone.”

“Is it the agent you’ve been working with? He’s easy on the eyes.”

“Rivera? No. I like working with him. But the dinner is with the guy who takes care of my dogs.”

“Ned? That’s his name, right?”

“Good memory.”

“I’m not that old. My memory is still exceptional. If you wanted a date, there’s no shortage of interested and eligible bachelors out there. You can venture beyond your own house.”

“I know but would they be interested in going out with me the FBI agent, or me the heiress?”

“Or you—the young beautiful blonde? You won’t really know until you give someone a chance, will you? Even if it doesn’t work out, the finding out process can be fun.”

“I’m happy. I like my life.”

“Can’t argue with that, I suppose. But please don’t cancel that dinner if you can help it.”

“I’ll try.”

“I mean it. I know how introverts work. No cancelling. Now, I’ve got my wine. Poured an extra big glass. Tell me, what’s going on there.”

Victoria’s smile disappeared. “So here’s why I called. I’ve got three murders and we know they’re somehow connected, but we don’t know how yet.”

“Start from the beginning. And then we’re coming back to the dog thing. The man thing, too.”

Going through the facts aloud forced Victoria to sort through what they knew and what they needed to know, in an objective and logical manner. Sharing it with Helen allowed for a mentor’s insights.

“It’s way too early to know how this ends. Don’t be impatient. Sometimes we never know. You have your facts laid out. With each additional piece of the puzzle you get now, you try to see what you need to complete the picture. You’ll see what fits.”

“That’s the problem.” Victoria sighed. “Nothing fits.”

“Then you either don’t have enough puzzle pieces, and you need to be patient, or you aren’t looking at it the right way. Maybe it’s not a cow puzzle, maybe it’s a puzzle of horses but in the very corner there’s one cow. See?”

“Gosh, that’s a big puzzle, then.”

“Which is why we can’t solve it tonight. Get some rest. Magnum PI reruns are calling me.”

“Why would you watch schlocky detective shows when—”

“Magnum was a detective? I just like the short shorts on Tom Selleck. Later.”

Victoria had to laugh. She wasn’t any closer to a motive that made sense for the Cossmans and included Todd Meiser, but the facts and the questions were more obvious. When she said goodnight to Helen, she was yawning and ready to go to sleep. Waking up with a clear head was the best thing she could do to get results.

“Time for bed.” She led Leo and Bella behind a small gate in an enclosure built to separate fosters or injured dogs from her pack. They had a room all to themselves and their own dog door leading to a separate outside area, but they could still see and hear her and the rest of the dogs. “You’re in here. Just until I know my dogs are okay with you, and you’re okay with them.” She rubbed each of them behind the ears and then sat and watched them sniff the new area. “At least you have each other.”

She yawned again as her dogs trailed behind her into the bathroom, watched her brush her teeth, and followed her back to the bedroom.

“Good night everyone. Sleep tight.” Victoria flipped off the light switch and sank into her bed. Below her pillow lay her personal gun. The thought of something happening to her, something that would leave her dogs without their owner, was enough to keep it nearby. If it could happen to her mother, it could happen to her. She wasn’t about to be anyone’s victim. Around her, the dogs grunted and sighed until the room fell silent.

BETH HURRIED OUT OF the hotel with her hands stuffed inside her pockets. She shouldn't be allowing herself this distraction. Not while she still had witnesses to eliminate. What if visiting Agent Heslin somehow prevented her from finishing the job that would keep her from going to prison? But she couldn't seem to alter her current plan, even though it defied common sense. It was as if Agents Heslin and Rivera were calling to her, as if they were in desperate need of her help and she couldn't ignore them.

"Where are you going?" Danny's growling voice carried across the lobby.

She whirled around. Crossing her arms, she answered, "Not really your business. Notice I'm not asking you where you've been."

"Uh. Can I help you?" the woman working the front desk asked, her face a mask of concern.

Beth glanced around. The hotel employee was still staring at her. Beth's eyes shot daggers back.

"I'm sorry." A forced-looking smile took shape on the woman's face. "I thought you were speaking to me."

"I wasn't. I was talking to my husband." Beth marched out to her car, half hoping Danny would go away so he didn't ruin everything for her. This thing she was about to do, it was her thing. But at the same time, she didn't really want to be alone.

"Why are you wearing your hair like that? You've never pulled it back like that before." Danny's tone communicated the scowl she would surely see on his face if she fixed her eyes on him.

Frowning, Beth ran her hand over her head and down the length of her ponytail. "Thanks for noticing."

He scoffed. "It makes your forehead look huge. You look like the Addams Family girl. You know, the hideous one."

Sometimes it was like he could read her thoughts. She did her best to ignore him, keeping her mind occupied with her own plan. They said little else on the long drive that took them from city lights and billboards to lengthy, dark stretches of trees and hedges. When the distance between each driveway was greatest, she slowed the car to a stop and idled in front of a giant iron gate. They had arrived at Victoria Heslin's residence. The agent's home wasn't visible from the road, but it was back there somewhere, at the end of a long, fancy-paved driveway. Small spotlights lining the road beyond the gate illuminated tufts of tall, unusual grass, bushes shaped with precision, and neatly-trimmed trees—the kind of stuff that requires regular landscaping. The darkness beyond was different than elsewhere. Not depressing, not hiding unknown horrors like back at the Sonesta Hotel, but alluring, almost a tease concealing whatever constituted the unlit surroundings.

"Wow," Danny said.

"Don't let it fool you. The wealthy, with their landscapers and cleaning crews, have plenty of their own problems. They're only better hidden."

"How would you know, Beth?" He sneered.

"Because I read and watch the news, idiot." She eased up on the brake and let the car coast past the entrance, about the length of a city block.

"What are we doing here?" Danny hissed. "This isn't part of the plan."

"It will only take a few minutes. There's something I have to do." She parked off to the side of the road on a wide patch of lush, green grass.

“You going to try to get in there?”

She nodded without looking at him. “I’m not just going to try. I’m going in.”

Danny laughed. “Terrible idea, Beth. This place represents insane money. Has to have high tech security and video monitors.”

Her pride got the better of her and she smiled, even though she hadn’t intended to share even a speck of information with him. “I’ve already scrambled the signals and shut off the alarms.” Truthfully, there hadn’t been any alarms activated. Surprising, for a property like that at night, and also puzzling. Closing her eyes and taking a deep breath, she hoped she wasn’t mistaken.

Danny grunted. “Better be something worth stealing in there. You get caught, I never heard of you. Give me the keys.”

She ignored his comments, but she couldn’t help pondering his words. Was this worth the trouble of what could happen if she got caught?

“You think you’re anything like that agent? She’s a confident trust fund chick. She’d never do things just because someone told her she had to. She’s nothin’ like you, Beth.”

Bristling at his words, Beth scrambled out of the car and called back, “Shut up.” As usual, he just couldn’t stop trying to get under her skin. But this time, his intent backfired. He’d just given her more reason to go ahead with her plan. Her plan. Not his. She knew he wouldn’t follow. He wouldn’t get his hands dirty. He saved all of that for her. Always had.

“Get back here,” Danny screamed after her. “Don’t get your stupid ass caught over your girl crush. You aren’t done with what you have to do!”

Beth stopped, but not because of Danny. Hell, no. She just needed to think. And she had to pee thanks to the huge diet Coke she drank earlier. She dropped her jeans and squatted down on the side of the dark road. “Oh, damn.” Her underwear hadn’t been completely clear of her stream. Once her pants were back in place—now with an irritating wet spot against her lower back, a frustrating reminder that she hadn’t been able to handle the simplest of tasks—she studied the fence, walking alongside it. The bushes on the other side formed a thick barrier at least six feet tall.

Agents probably did stunts like this all the time, climbing over obstacles, pulling themselves up ropes. She could handle it. But as far as she could see in the dark, there really was no break or opening in the bushes. This here’s as good a place as any. She stretched her sweater sleeves down and around her hands to protect them from the tiny spears mounted on the top of every post. Huffing and puffing, with the spears digging through her sweater and into her skin, she hauled herself over the fence.

Amidst the snapping and cracking of branches, she dropped the rest of the way, plunging into the bushes. She landed hard on the other side, falling on her hip. Stinging flashes of pain shot from the scrapes on her arms and ankles, and her hip ached. A branch snagged her hair, tugging strands from her ponytail. She squeezed her eyes shut and forced herself to push through the scrapes and claws of bushes until she was free.

With an aching, angry sigh, she paused to pick the leaves and twigs from her body. When she finished putting her ponytail back together, she was ready. Finally, the lights from the house were visible in the distance.

Like going to the fricking Biltmore mansion. She’d been to the estate in Asheville when she was younger and had never forgotten the place. Its size and the wealth it represented were awe inspiring, but there was also something ominous and creepy about such an obscenely gigantic home, its cold stone walls and floors, the claustrophobic bare-bones servant quarters in the attics and basements. They visited in the fall around Halloween, just like now, when the skies grew dark early. As they made their way to the parking lot, she glanced over her shoulder. In the shadows between the trees, it was the ultimate haunted house.

Pull yourself together. This isn't a haunted house. It's Agent Heslin's home. And if you want to speak with her, you need to get your butt up there.

Cursing her damp underwear and her dirt-smeared knees and elbows to take her mind off her doubts, Beth took a trembling step toward the house. Soft earth squished under her weight as each footstep sank into the ground.

Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen, sixteen, eighteen, twenty. . .

IZZY LET OUT A DEEP woof. Victoria rolled over and opened one eye. Izzy was always the first to alert Victoria to anything out of the ordinary—like the occasional visitor. She flew off the bed and ran toward the doorway, her brown brindle coat blending seamlessly into the dark bedroom.

“Shhh. Be quiet. I need to sleep.”

Within seconds, all the dogs were on their feet and barking. What had woken them? With a touch of sleep still clouding her thoughts, Victoria imagined Ned had stayed the night in the guest wing and was just getting something in the kitchen. But just as quickly, she remembered he had gone home long ago. Had she set the alarms? No. She rarely set them during the day or night, afraid the dogs would set them off, and last night was no exception.

The barking escalated. Victoria wasn't hearing the excited yelps from earlier when the dogs chased something through the yard. These gruff barks were intended to send a firm message—this is our house. Which meant someone was there who didn't belong. She whipped her gun out from under her pillow and stood up, the hardwood floor cool beneath her bare feet. Her skin crawled with tiny goosebumps as she listened. In the sliver of light coming from the bathroom, the dogs' shadows stretched and twisted against the walls like hunched, contorting demons. Eddie slipped through the partly closed door and disappeared. From behind their enclosure, Leo and Bella watched, ears flattened, tails tucked underneath their bellies.

She wedged her cell phone under her arm, turned on the light, and crept out of her room toward the center of the house. The sheer size of her home intensified her concern—so many rooms and corridors where someone could lurk and hide. In a whoosh of movement, Izzy and Eddie ran past her and rushed outside. The dog door—large enough for a person to climb through—slapped shut behind them and clicked into place. That was good. If someone was on her property, they weren't inside. Yet.

“Exterior lights on.” Victoria's voice was steadier than her nerves.

Light flooded the patio and yard. Angled against the wall, Victoria scanned the area. Izzy and Eddie trotted back inside, huffing, and shaking their heads, their fur damp. “Good dogs, good dogs,” she whispered. She hoped they sensed her tension, she wanted to confirm their instincts—it wasn't okay for someone to be out there in the middle of the night. If that was the case. She hoped there was another explanation.

Facing the back door, Eddie growled.

It's probably nothing. I'll just check the monitors and go back to bed. A niggling sensation reminded her that just because it was most likely nothing didn't mean it was always nothing. It was definitely something when her mother was abducted in the middle of the night while the rest of the family and dogs were at their lake house.

Years ago, alone, in an equally big house, had her mother heard something, then tried to convince herself she was being silly, that perhaps whatever she'd heard wasn't anything more troubling than an animal invading the garden? Did she pass up the opportunity to call 911, thinking there was some innocuous explanation right up until the terror-filled instant she realized she was wrong? Had she thought it was probably nothing right up until the instant when strange men grabbed her, tied her up, and hauled her away from the home she would never see again? Victoria would never know the answers to those questions, but she knew she did not want to repeat mistakes from her family's past.

With a shudder, she cocked her gun, crept through the kitchen, and opened the door to the control room. Each screen inside the room would show a video feed from cameras spread around her house and property.

When she entered the room, in spite of all her training, an icy current ran up her spine.

Eerie gray static danced menacingly across the otherwise blank screens. Her heart pounded. Never had that happened before.

Closing and locking the control room door behind her, she called the security company.

Someone answered immediately. "Wentworth Security."

"This is Victoria Heslin. My code is GALGA081895SR2."

"Confirmed, Ms. Heslin. How can we help you?"

"I believe I have an intruder, maybe not in the house, but outside. I didn't have the security system activated before I went to bed, so no alarms went off, but my video feeds are down. Can you check on them?"

"Yes, Ms. Heslin. Do you think you or anyone else in the house is in danger? Do you want me to call 911? We can have one of our security personnel out there in . . . ten minutes, or do you want me to contact the Sheriff's office and have a patrol car come by?"

Victoria studied the gray screens, pushing away the thought that they were mocking her. Something was very wrong. But the dogs were no longer barking. She stared at her gun, curling her toes on the tiled floor. After years of living in a constant state of worry because of what happened to her mother, Victoria signed up for self-defense classes, and then studied martial arts. She hadn't wanted to live her entire life in fear. When she joined the FBI, even though her awareness of criminal behaviors multiplied, her paranoia disappeared as her training and experience progressed. By the time she graduated Quantico, her sense of empowerment was complete. She was now entrusted with protecting the lives of others, and more than capable of doing so. She could take care of herself.

"Ms. Heslin, are you still there? Should I call 911 for you?"

"No. No, thank you. No need to send anyone here. I'm the only one in the house and I'm armed. I just want to know what is going on with my surveillance cameras."

"Do you need a technician dispatched this evening, or would you like to make a service call for tomorrow?"

"Let me look around. I'll call back to place a service call."

"Okay. Thank you." She took a deep breath and ended the call.

She opened the door in a shooting stance, her gaze darting around, ready to pull the trigger if necessary. No need to announce her presence as a federal agent. This was her home.

The dogs lifted their heads from where they were sprawled across the floor on their sides. Izzy jumped up first and the rest of them scrambled to their feet and surrounded Victoria, each completely focused on their master. Whatever they heard earlier was no longer a perceived threat. Whatever, or whoever they heard was gone.

Ordering herself to calm down, Victoria sat at her desk with her weapon close by and checked her messages, aware of every slightest noise. Exhausted, but wound up like a tightly coiled spring, she eventually returned to bed and replaced the gun under her pillow. Tomorrow would require all her focus. She needed to sleep, especially because there might be some sleepless nights ahead as the investigations moved forward. But details and images from her long day kept flashing through her mind: brain matter, blood spatter, gaping bullet holes, numbers scrawled in black ink across ashen skin, a note left for her, and the bouncing gray static on her security video screens.

A clap of thunder echoed through the walls. Izzy jumped onto the bed, circled, then lay down, draping her head over Victoria's ankle. Victoria pulled the soft sheet and comforter up to her chin and concentrated on the dog's soft, rhythmic exhalations.

As a thunderstorm rocked the night, Victoria slept again while her darkest fears took shape in nightmares.

• • • •

SHAKING WITH FEAR, her heart pounding like crazy, Beth ran through the darkness. She landed wrong and her ankle twisted to one side. She yelped as a jolt of pain shot up her leg. Limping as fast as she could, she kept moving across the wide expanse of yard between her and the fence.

At any second, she expected to get slammed to the ground from behind, pulled backwards, and torn apart.

Just as suddenly as it started, the barking stopped. Nothing jumped on her back or tore at her skin. But would they come back? I'll act crazy, stomp, and wave my arms around to freak them out. Or did that only work with bears?

She shivered, thinking about what might have happened, what still might happen. A small winged creature darted past overhead, flapping too close for comfort. She shielded her face, bracing for an attack straight out of a horror movie. Since the moment she set foot on Agent Heslin's back porch, it was as if someone flipped a switch to let loose a deranged circus from hell. The sudden barking and growling—like a kennel full of crazed dogs lived inside the house. And not little yappy dogs like her sister's. Dogs with deep, guttural voices—a bunch of giant drooling beasts like German Shepherds, Rottweilers, and Doberman Pinschers, snarling and snapping their razor-sharp teeth, ready and willing to tear out someone's throat. That someone could have been her if she hadn't taken off running for her life. Maybe the dogs were the reason Agent Heslin hadn't activated her security alarms—no need for them.

Ankle throbbing, she continued with a wincing gallop movement toward the thick bushes. She ducked her head and covered it with her arms, forcing her way through the bushes to the fence. Tiny spears dug into her hands as she lugged herself over and collapsed on the other side in an exhausted heap. Her chest heaved with ragged gasps of breath. Not her finest moment.

The wet earth soaked through her jeans and top. She finally stood, brushing off debris and fixing her hair so Danny wouldn't know what she'd been through. Sweat trickled down her sides, further chilling her in the cold air.

Where was the damn moon when she needed it most? Unsure if she was heading in the right direction, she painfully hobbled toward the front gate, focusing on calming her heart and lungs so it wasn't like she was still running an obstacle course. As her fear dissipated, her anger grew. Things had not gone as she expected. Not even close. She'd had to flee like a scared and helpless animal, a terrified little rabbit, like prey rather than the predator.

She turned on her phone flashlight and aimed the small circle of light on the ground in front of her feet. When the large iron gate loomed ahead, she unfolded a note from her pocket and wrapped it around the fence where it was sure to be seen.

The note would have to do for now. Next time, she'd be better prepared.

A PERSISTENT WHINE broke through Victoria's slumber in the otherwise silent room. She rolled from her back to her side, jostling Izzy off her legs. The sad sound continued. She sat up and rubbed her eyes, the comforter falling in soft folds around her waist. The first specks of morning light entered the room. Her alarm hadn't gone off yet. The dogs rarely stirred until she got out of bed. Who was whining? And why was she so tired? As she woke fully, her memories returned—Leo and Bella, the disturbance after midnight, the malfunctioning security cameras.

"Listen up, Leo and Bella, I like my dogs to be quiet until the alarm goes off. So if you're still here tomorrow, gotta remember that. Please." She tossed the covers aside, stood up, and left the bedroom, followed by her dogs.

Walking through the main floor, her eyes darted to every corner. A quick check inside the control room proved the video monitor feeds and security system were working. The security company had left her an apology-laden message saying the technology had experienced a mysterious but temporary glitch and then restored itself. Victoria wasn't comfortable with the "mysterious glitch" explanation. Quite a coincidence for a night when she thought she might have had an intruder. She intended to find out exactly what happened. It might be time for a new security company. She returned to her bedroom to brush her teeth and pee. Her smooth skin always paled when she didn't get enough sleep, and dark circles had formed under her eyes, but it was nothing a little tinted moisturizer couldn't hide. She changed into running clothes and clipped her phone onto her jacket. As she passed the safe in the mudroom, headed outside, she debated grabbing her gun and holster, but decided against it.

Fog descended from a gray sky heavy with thick clouds, another soaking downpour almost a certainty. The scent of recently cut grass and damp earth had been intensified by yesterday's rain. The yard was littered with leaves and twigs blown from the foliage. Stepping off her back patio, she spotted footprints in the mud. Hairs raised on the back of her neck. A size seven shoe was her estimate. Gazing out through the mist at the tall bushes that framed her yard like a wall, she imagined someone hiding behind them, waiting. But her dogs, with their extraordinary hearing and scent detection, were calm and quiet, so no one was there. She crouched down and took pictures of the shoe prints with her phone.

She followed the footprints around the side of her house and toward the front of the property. Broken branches and trampled bushes indicated where the night time visitor had climbed the tall fence. Victoria straightened, rubbed her chin, and thought. She wasn't being paranoid if the threat was real. But how concerned should she be? She walked the perimeter of her home. No one had attempted to enter. Someone would be foolish to try and break into her home alone—yet she only saw one set of prints. The intruder might have been nothing more than a teenager on a dare. Egged on by her friends, hadn't she once been dared to scale the neighbor's brick wall and swim a lap in their pool when she was younger? Her soaked hair and clothes had provided the proof of her daredevil behavior. That might be all it was, except . . . there was the concerning issue of the security feeds.

Unwilling to climb through the bushes and jump the fence, Victoria jogged to the entrance to see if she could pick up the trail on the other side. Steps away from the gate, she spotted something small and white standing out against the black iron.

Careful not to ruin any fingerprints, she unfurled a wet slip of paper from around the bars and opened it like it was an ancient, fragile manuscript. Diluted purple splotches of ink smudged the paper. She squinted to decipher all the letters.

Without trust, you have nothing. Do you trust Rivera, and can he trust you?

DRIVING TO THE OFFICE, Victoria pressed the phone to her ear as she pulled onto the interstate. She'd barely said hello before she yawned.

Rivera chuckled. "Late night?"

"Sorry. I sent you the summary notes I took after making calls and reviewing the research we got from local detectives."

"I looked everything over. Sent back my thoughts. Not much for us to go on."

"Nope. Not yet."

For a few miles, they brainstormed ideas about the murders, discussing the profile of whoever was responsible.

Victoria yawned again, although this time it might have been a nervous reaction rather than from her lack of sleep. She took a deep breath. "I had an unexpected visitor last night."

"A visitor?"

She told him what she'd found, including the note.

"Wait. You let me drone on and on about our case homework and then decided to drop that little bomb on me? What the hell?"

"Guess I was still processing the information." She turned down the heat because the warmth was making her sleepy.

"Any idea what the note means?"

"Nope. I was hoping you might."

He huffed. "Do you have it to give to the techs?"

"Yes. It was wet, not sure about prints, but they can at least compare the writing and the paper with the other one. I'll bring it to the lab as soon as I get there. You know, I think this focus on me could be the killer's weakness. It might be how we put an end to this."

Rivera grunted.

"Listen . . . don't tell Murphy. Let me tell him."

"Sure. But tell him right away." Rivera ended the call.

Victoria scanned her ID card and entered the FBI building just in time for Murphy's update meeting. Rivera was already seated at the table in the windowless conference room. His fingers tapped the table like he was playing the base notes of a piano piece. He studied Victoria as she took the adjacent seat, leaning toward him. "I dropped off the note. They'll analyze it to death for us—including the handwriting—but with the lighter staff on Sunday, results will be delayed."

Rivera nodded. He followed Victoria's gaze to the wall. Pictures from yesterday's crime scenes were displayed on a white board: a gruesome close-up of Todd Meiser's bloody face was taped above a wide view of the Cossmans lying across the hiking trail. Normally there might have been lines, some solid, some dotted, drawn between the images to illustrate the connections. There were none.

Murphy entered. "All right, I'm here." He slapped Rivera on the shoulder as he passed behind him. Before taking a seat, he dropped his notepad on the table and plunked his insulated thermos down beside it. "Let's get to it. Here's what I know. We now have two major crimes in the course of twenty-four hours and a media frenzy brewing. The media sure does love themselves a serial killer." He clutched his thermos. "Meiser's death might come with an explanation, one that ushers a boatload of blowback for us—should have been under protection, blah, blah, blah—you all know I wanted them protected. The Cossmans’ deaths—well, until we have an explanation, their deaths came straight out of nowhere. More frightening for the public. More blowback for us. So let’s put their fears to rest . . . what do you have? Thoughts? Leads?”

Victoria and Rivera exchanged brief glances. She knew what he was reminding her to do, but she managed to ignore the frown on his face. “How was your son’s chorus concert?”

“Fine.” Murphy grunted.

“Good. Glad you were able to make it. Well, it’ll be easier to figure out the who, after we know the why. So we’re focusing on what connected the Cossmans to the Butler trial. We’re also looking for any reason someone might want them dead.”

Murphy took a swig from his thermos and wiped his hand over his chin. “Obviously.”

“So far, we’re not seeing that connection. No one Rivera or I spoke with could give us a reason someone might want the Cossmans dead, nor could we connect them to the Butlers, or Meiser. They don’t appear to have posed any threats or crossed anyone.”

Repetitive thoughts raced through Victoria’s head. What did the victims have in common? What have we missed? And why the notes for me?

Murphy stared at Rivera. “Anything to add to that bunch of nothing?”

Rivera coughed, giving Victoria a side long glance.

Murphy wasn’t looking at her. In a plea for Rivera to give her just a few more minutes, she held one finger up just above the table.

Rivera noticed and gave the slightest shake of his head before answering Murphy’s questions. “Sam gave us their credit card receipts from the past two days, since they arrived in town. Nothing we found puts Meiser and the Cossmans anywhere near each other.”

Victoria pointed to the white board. “So, if we’re staying open-minded here—the crimes show almost no passion, no excessive violence—the victims weren’t tortured, their deaths appear to have been instant. Yet the murders don’t appear well planned or connected in any way aside from the numbers on their heads.”

“If that information was leaked, someone else could have copied it,” Rivera said. “We asked to keep a lid on those details, but the neighbor who found Meiser saw it, so did the officers and the techs. At the Cossman crime scene we had police, the sheriff, the hiker, techs. . . any of them or all of them could have mentioned it to someone.”

“And the note left for you at the Cossman murder scene—” Murphy narrowed his eyes at Victoria. “That suggests some pre-planning. It also suggests the killer is messing with us or has some sort of fixation on you.”

“Well . . .” Victoria grasped her necklace. “There is something else. Someone left a note on my property last night. I think—”

Murphy plunked his forearms on the table and leaned toward her. “What do you mean, a note? What did it say?”

Victoria told him.

“Seriously, Heslin? That should have been the first thing you told me.” He scowled at Rivera. “Did you know about this?”

Victoria answered, not wanting Rivera to be in trouble for keeping quiet about it like she’d asked him to do. “We don’t know that it’s related to the other crime scenes.”

Murphy sighed heavily and sat up straight in his chair. “Let me know if forensics matches it to the others. If so—well, we’ll cross that bridge when we come to it.”

Victoria let out the breath she'd been holding and smiled inside, relieved she was still on the case. She wanted nothing more than to catch whoever killed Meiser and the Cossmans.

Murphy's phone lit up on the table. He ignored it and took another gulp from his thermos. "What about the Cossmans' hotel? Did you or the cops find anything there?"

"Nothing with the staff," Victoria said. "They all had alibis."

"The police have spoken to every person who stayed at the hotel in the past week. They made up an excuse about lost and found items, they didn't want to cause a panic, but wanted to make sure they were all alive and well. We have three guests we still haven't spoken with. Jim Johnson—might be a fake name. Paid with cash." Rivera glanced at his notes and smirked. "Jason Bourne also paid in cash. And one guest was using a stolen credit card."

Murphy plunked his elbows on the table, rested his chin on his hands. "The one using the stolen card. Tell me about him. Or her."

Rivera flipped a page in his notebook. "He was in room 332. When I called Thomas Wilson, the person whose credit card was used for the stay, I got an elderly man in San Francisco. Mr. Wilson hasn't left the Bay Area in years. Whoever was staying in room 332 had opened a new credit card in Thomas Wilson's name. He had the room reserved for three days, but one of the cleaning attendants reported that the bed hadn't been slept in after the first night, and his belongings were gone.

"So we don't know the criminal's real name or what happened to him?"

"Correct." Rivera tapped his fingers over his notepad.

"At least we haven't found his body yet. Prints?"

Rivera shook his head. "The woman who cleaned the room found empty beer cans, but she threw them out and they're long gone. We dusted the door handles, the remotes, and the phone. But it's a hotel room, there are too many. Didn't want to drag the lab down this alley when we don't have anything to connect him to the murders, and as far as we know, he left before Meiser was killed."

Murphy grunted. "See if the card was used anywhere after he left."

"We did." Rivera flipped his notepad closed. "It wasn't."

"Keep the account open and put a trace on it so we know if it gets used again." Murphy grabbed his belongings and stood up. "Well, get back to it. Let's hope we get some leads today, from somewhere."

Victoria left the meeting room and walked straight to her office. Cloudy morning light filtered in from a small window above her head. She opened her laptop and checked on her house. All the video feeds were working. On one screen, Izzy wandered through the kitchen, staring up at the countertops and sniffing here and there. One of her favorite things to do was to leap on top of them and search for errant crumbs. No doubt she'd try it soon enough. Ned might even find her there when he arrived in a few hours. The other cameras showed the rest of the dogs were fast asleep.

Victoria had to find out what happened to cause the temporary glitch in her video cameras, but for now, the murder cases came first, until a glance at her phone showed her father had left a message. If he needed something from her, she'd better find out what it was, or he'd be calling back soon. Her father was a wonderful man, but he had no practice with being ignored. She pressed the play button and raised her phone to her ear.

"Tori, darling. Hope you are well today. My attorney called. A sizable amount of money left your trust. Two hundred thousand dollars. You know I trust you, but Fenton just wants to make sure you aren't in any . . . trouble. Just call me. Love you."

Victoria deleted the message and set down her phone. Make sure she wasn't in trouble? What on earth did Fenton imagine she did with the money? She rolled her eyes. Fenton was supposed to be her attorney as well. He should call her directly if he had concerns. Although, she didn't want to explain every dollar she spent, nor should she have to. She had good reason to keep her transactions secret and anonymous. She didn't want the publicity, and with her career, she couldn't have it. Federal agents were supposed to live quiet, private lives. The public didn't need to know she existed.

Rivera popped his head in the opening of her door. "You okay, Tori?"

She turned her chair to face him and offered a slight smile. "Absolutely."

He handed her a coffee.

She peered into the paper cup. "Do I want to drink this?"

"It's fresh. I just made it."

"Thanks." She took the cup and wrapped both hands around it, letting the warmth seep through her skin. "I know I must look a little rough around the edges. Not much sleep last night. But I'm fine."

"If you're worried about—"

"Good, you're both here." Murphy burst into Victoria's office, hitching up his pants. Victoria quickly scooted her chair out of reach to avoid a slap on her back or shoulder. Murphy didn't discriminate, every shoulder apparently beckoned to him. At least it was shoulders and not rear ends, or he'd be facing more charges of harassments than he could count.

Murphy directed his gaze at the top of her head. "Heslin, do you color your hair to make it blonde like that?"

"Uh, no. I've never colored my hair. This is the hair I was born with. Why?"

"I just called down to forensics. Their report isn't ready, but they gave me something. There were long blonde hairs on that silk scarf from Meiser's house. Techs thought they could be yours and wanted a sample."

"I don't see how—"

"Relax. They're not yours. And I told them you weren't that sloppy. The hairs they found were brown hair dyed blonde."

Victoria met Rivera's gaze. "We need to identify the prostitute Meiser was with and see what color hair she had."

"Or if Meiser had a lover who found out he was with a prostitute." Murphy wagged a finger. "He could have taken the girlfriend to a real nice dinner for the same amount of money he paid the hooker."

Rivera wrapped both hands around his mug. "You think the hypothetical girlfriend got that mad?"

"When it comes to a woman scorned, there are no limits." Murphy slapped Rivera on the shoulder before walking out.

Victoria called after him. "So, you're willing to consider that Meiser's death might not be related to the Butler trial?"

Murphy yelled back from the hallway. "Of course. I'm willing to consider his Grandma did it, but it's not likely."

Victoria swiveled her chair back to face the center of her desk. "Between the small footprints and the long blonde hairs, there's a woman involved. But there's no good reason for a scorned girlfriend to then become a serial killer."

The agents' phones beeped at the same time. Victoria read the message. "Okay. Ballistics just confirmed the bullets matched. The same gun killed Meiser and the Cossmans. So that's good. Finally a connection besides the numbers. At least we know for sure they're connected."

"Same hit man, different client?"

Victoria shrugged. “I really don’t see any evidence that either was a professional hit. Even though I know it’s the best and only motive we’ve got so far with Meiser.” She took a sip of her coffee and flinched. It was a far cry from a spiced pumpkin latte, but she took another sip because she didn’t want to make Rivera feel bad. She swallowed the second bitter gulp and stared at her notes.

A day later, and the same two questions remained. How were the crimes connected? Why would anyone want to kill the Cossmans?

AFTER TAPPING AROUND on the top of the bedside table, Beth sat up and found her phone. She jammed her finger on the button to stop her alarm. Running her hand through her matted hair, she stared blankly at the wall. Her eyes drooped closed. She clutched a pillow, plopped back against the mattress, and rolled onto her stomach. She should get up, but she didn't want to. Need more sleep. Her body ached. The bed was comfortable, the pillows decent. Just a few more minutes . . .

"Get out of bed, lazy ass," grunted Danny. "You've got to get the Smiths before they're out of here."

Danny was right. Jason and Kelly got lucky yesterday when the cop showed up. But today would be their last day flitting around town being all sweet to each other like it was their honeymoon. It had to be. Because I'm not going to jail. Please, God, don't let them have called the police already. She rarely prayed, only when she was in dire danger of being caught for something. Now was as good a time as any.

She pushed herself out of bed and trudged into the bathroom. She rubbed her eyes and frowned at her puffy face, her flattened hair, and the dirt caked under her fingernails. She stripped and turned on the shower. The water helped soothe her soreness. Jumping through the bushes and over Agent Heslin's fence had not been one of her better ideas.

Alone in the room while getting dressed—just like Danny to go down to breakfast without me—she turned on the television. In no time at all, she'd found a news update about what she did. Her face lit up as she turned up the volume. The brawny guy, he must be the boss of the other agents, gave a statement about Todd Meiser's death and what it meant for the Butler case. The Butlers again! Those freeloaders sure were getting a lot of attention for what Beth had done.

During the commercial, she rifled through the clothes in her suitcase and pulled out wrinkled black pants and a white blouse, the most business-looking outfit she owned. She purchased them just in case she needed to pretend to be someone sort of professional for one of Danny's business schemes. The pants were a bit tight around her thighs and the shirt poked her underarms, but it made her feel official. Confident. Powerful. Like someone deserving of respect. When packing, she'd envisioned completing the outfit with her black, floral scarf—no longer an option thanks to Meiser—and going somewhere kind of nice. She and Danny were on vacation, after all.

Just over a week ago, he had plopped down on their couch, opened a beer and said, "Next week is our three-year anniversary."

"It is?" She knew their anniversary date, but she had a hard time believing he had remembered.

"We should celebrate. Let's get away for a few days."

"Really? Okay. Sure," she'd agreed. "Where should we go?"

"I already picked a place out. It's in Virginia. I used to go there when I was a kid. There's a waterfall with a mind-blowing view."

"Waterfall?" Beth had asked, still surprised he'd suggested a vacation. "Remember I showed you that article about that woman who slipped from the edge of a waterfall and fell to her death? Was that the same place?"

Danny took a gulp of beer. "Nah, that was somewhere in North Carolina. You remember that, huh?"

“Yes.” The story was too morbid to forget. Beth wasn’t a fan of heights, and she shuddered at the thought of tumbling to her death and smashing to bits on the rocks below. But it wasn’t often that Danny suggested they do anything together, aside from watching television. She wasn’t about to put down his idea even if it involved traipsing along the edge of a waterfall.

“Anyway, we’re going to hike up to the falls when we get there. It’s going to feel like we’re on top of the world. And . . . I’ve got a surprise for you.” He grinned.

“You do? What is it?”

“Can’t tell ya. But you’ll just have to trust me.”

Beth smiled. Everything about his out-of-the-blue suggestion was unusual. Danny hadn’t been romantic since they got married. He hadn’t paid much attention to her at all lately, other than to show his irritation over one thing or another. She might have been a little more suspicious if she hadn’t been so hopeful. “What about the new business you’ve been working on?” Our million dollar sure-thing. “Can you leave it for a few days?”

Over the past few months, Danny had been leaving town for a few days at a time. His new business venture was supposed to make them a lot of money. One million dollars was the figure he used. She’d asked, but he hadn’t shared any details. Beth had yet to see anything come of his travels. Just a bunch of hotel and meal expenses, but he seemed passionate about whatever it was, she had to give him that.

“Oh, yeah. It can wait a few days for me.” He downed the rest of his beer. “I’m closer than I’ve ever been. It’s just a short matter of time before it happens. Then it will be like hitting the jackpot. Guaranteed.” Grinning, he tossed the can toward the trash and missed.

Now, here they were, in Virginia on their supposed vacation. A nice dinner was likely to happen. That’s what people did on anniversary trips, although they probably used credit cards with their actual names on them. Lately, Danny never wanted to go out anywhere with her. Which was strange because when he came back from his recent business trips, she’d found receipts for some upscale restaurants. Not like super fancy, can’t-get-a-reservation types of places, but still a big step up from Bubba’s Take-out Barbecue. Well, tonight would be different. She’d go without him. She’d find a nice sit-down restaurant with waitstaff and cloth napkins and candles on tablecloths, the type of place where Agent Rivera might take Agent Heslin. She’d enjoy a good meal by herself.

After she killed the Smiths.

Studying her reflection in the mirror, she removed the studs and rings from her ears, setting them at the back of the sink until only one earring remained in each earlobe. She was ready.

She drove back to the Sonesta Hotel, her ground-zero, stakeout spot. She didn’t see the Smith’s Jeep. She parked facing the hotel entrance to catch them coming in, or to catch someone else from her list coming out. An hour went by. Boredom always made her crave a salty or sugary snack, but she had no food. She rotated her index finger from side to side, chewing on her cuticles. To pass the time, she called Danny to give him an update. He was probably laying around the room watching television and sleeping. What she really wanted was for him to bring her something to eat, which was impossible because she had their car. The truth—she was lonely and wouldn’t mind just hearing his voice. The call went to his voicemail.

“This mailbox is full and cannot accept additional messages.” She’d always been annoyed by the bossy, robotic woman who came with the phone service.

Beth sighed and returned to watching through the windshield. Where were the Smiths? According to the hotel’s computer—pathetic—almost anyone could hack into that system—they were still checked in. But what if they had left without checking out? What if they'd taken off without stopping at the Sonesta's front desk like she and Danny had done?

Clasping her hands repeatedly, she watched the digital clock, counting the seconds until the minute changed. Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen, sixteen . . .

Out came—what was his name—room 125—he was on her list. Horrigan? Yes—Steve Horrigan. He had no social media presence that she could find. She knew almost nothing about him. For all she knew, he was one of those guys who was living in a different decade technology wise.

She couldn't just wait around for the Smiths any longer. Cursing them for eluding her too many times, but mostly because of their stupid happy faces and marital bliss—which she doubted was even real—she followed Horrigan's black Ford pick-up out of the parking lot. The Smiths should stop acting so sappy, stop the irritating public displays of affection, and take a clue from couples like Agent Rivera and Heslin. Their love was evident in subtle glances, but they didn't go out of their way to throw it in anyone's face.

Tailing Horrigan to the edge of the city, annoying hunger pains pinged across her stomach like mini lightning bolts. When she passed a Bojangles, she considered forgetting about Horrigan and stopping for food. She managed to steel her resolve by thinking about the gross food they must serve in prison. She had a job to do if she didn't want to find out more about prison slop first hand. From a street lined by woods, Horrigan pulled his truck onto a dirt road. So did Beth. Her car bounced in and out of ruts and mud puddles but she barely slowed down. He would see her following. She didn't care. Her stomach growled. She needed to get it done.

At the end of the road, he parked in a cleared area large enough to hold a few cars. He got out and grabbed a tackle box and fishing pole from the back. He smiled and waved as he passed her window. Beth looked down at her legs, pretending not to see him. Better to let him march deeper into the woods.

She waited until he disappeared on a narrow path. When she got out of her car, the wind cut through her thin, silky blouse. She wrapped her arms around her body to ward off the chill. Wishing for a coat and something warm to eat—a hot chicken biscuit would be perfect—she hurried after him. The path ended in an open area near a river. She heard a cough, looked left, and saw Horrigan.

He set his tackle box down. "Can I help you?" He sounded amused, without a hint of fear.

A strong wind blew against her. She tucked her chin. "Why would I need your help?"

"You followed me here. And it don't look like you came ready to fish." One side of his mouth lifted into a smirk.

Okay, so she wasn't the best follower, not like when she was stalking people online. Then she was great. She stepped closer, one hand inside her purse turning her gun around so she could pick it up and be ready to shoot. The gun refused to move. The damn muzzle was stuck on something. Had to be the hole in the inner lining, the one that occasionally ate her lipsticks and spare change, the reason she and Danny couldn't find one of the car keys for months. Scowling, she kept her eyes on Horrigan but had to put both hands inside her purse to get the gun loose. "I think you know why I'm here, Steve. You saw me! You know and I know that it's just a matter of time before you decide to tell someone."

Horrigan leered. "What are you doing?"

The gun finally jerked free inside her bag. She kept it hidden.

"Okay. Whatever, lady. I think you've been drinking. But I'd like to know what you think I saw." With his hands on his hips, he took a few steps in her direction. "Why don't you go ahead and tell me what's going on and why you're here."

A strong gust of wind howled past, fueling her anger. Her pulse thumped like a drum in her ears and throat. How dare he mock her and act like he had the upper hand! The old Beth might have let him intimidate her, hunched her shoulders and hurried away, but the old Beth was gone, replaced by a stronger version who didn't have to take his or anyone's crap.

"This is what's going on, Steve." She yanked the gun out of her purse and curled her fingers around the grip.

His eyes bulged. He held up a hand and backed away. "Whoa, hold on there. Just lower that thing. No need for—"

"You going to try and outrun my bullets, or just stand there and tell me you really don't know what I did?"

"I don't know—honest to God—you have me mixed up with—"

"Like hell I do." She pulled the trigger three times. He jerked as each bullet met his body. Beth's arms shook with each shot, but she held tight to the gun.

With a vacant, shocked stare, Horrigan swayed in slow motion at the edge of the woods. Blood soaked his hands, squirting through his fingers as he clawed at his chest. His legs collapsed, and he slumped to the ground on his back, gurgling and groaning.

Beth dropped the gun. Steering clear of his streaming blood, she grabbed his feet. After a few dragging steps, his dirty boots slid off in her hands, and she toppled backward onto her bottom. "Damn it." She scrambled up and wiped her hands on her pant legs, threw the boots into the woods and resumed pulling on smelly, damp, threadbare socks. Gross. She managed to drag his body a few yards into the trees and bushes, stopping twice to catch her breath. He was no longer groaning when she took his keys and rifled through pockets for his wallet. She grabbed his tackle box and fishing pole and threw them into the woods after him.

Her arms were limp, wiped out from shooting and dragging Horrigan's heavy body. She straightened her clothes, damp with sweat, and scowled at the dark, dirt smears on her shirt and pants and the muddy area covering her butt.

Grabbing her gun off the ground, she hurried back to the cars, hope no one heard the gunshots, and threw everything from her car and glove compartment into Horrigan's truck. It was time for a switch. With the rag and a bottled water from his floor, she wiped down every surface inside her own car, focusing on the steering wheel, the door handles, and the gear shift. She didn't have a record, they wouldn't find her fingerprints in the system, but Danny . . . he'd been convicted of several petty crimes. If they found his prints, he'd lead the authorities right to her. As she hurried through the work, her new mantra played in circles in her head: "I'm not going to jail, I'm not going to jail, I'm not going to jail . . ."

She backed the truck out, yanking the wheel left to face forward. Another pick-up rounded the corner, spewing dust in its wake. Really? Now? You've got to be kidding me. Her heart rate spiked as the vehicle drove straight toward her, filling up the one lane road. Her new mantra evolved into a frantic counting spell. With one hand, she put the vehicle in reverse, gripping the gun with the other, certain the approaching driver was there because he heard the gunshot.

The truck pulled up beside her, the driver's side only a few feet away. Her fingers tightened around the gun in her lap. Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve . . . A middle-aged guy wearing a blue plaid flannel shirt and a ball cap lowered his window and stared at her.

She rolled her window down too, lifting the gun a few inches. Her heart thumped harder.

He leaned forward with a big smile on his face. "Fishin'?"

“Yep. I was.” She did her best to act natural, but her smile felt tight and forced, like it might crack. She closed her lips, so she wasn’t baring her teeth like a rabid animal.

The guy shut his engine off.

Crap! He was staying. She had to get out of there. But at least he wasn’t there for her.

“Any luck?” he asked.

This time her smile was the real thing, full of pride and satisfaction. “I caught exactly what I wanted to catch today.”

“Good for you. Hoping for the same.”

“Ha!” She revved the engine and sped away. It wasn’t luck, eliminating him.

That’s when it hit her. No! Oh, no! No! No!

Her breath caught, and her heart skipped a beat. Everything felt wrong from the pit forming in her stomach to the dizziness spiraling around her head. In her haste, she’d forgotten to write the number five on Horrigan’s forehead. Numbers were important, even the odd ones. Numbers brought order. Numbers were necessary. And, to make it worse, she hadn’t left messages for anyone.

CHRIS ROBERTS SLOWLY reeled in his line, pulling slightly left, up, and left again, to get it unhooked from the twig it had snagged on. “Come on, Betsy. Come on, girl. There we go,” he whispered to himself. Once the line was free, he eased his way downstream, whistling, and cast from his new spot. He’d been standing next to the river for an hour, without getting a nibble.

The thirty-something blonde lady must have taken her luck with her when she left. She was a funny one. She had an edge about her, a nervous look, not what he expected to see on the face of anyone who had just spent time hanging out by the river. Strange that she was out there. She wasn’t dressed for the outdoors. He could only see her head, shoulders, and a bit of her torso. Her silky white top hadn’t fared well while she was fishing. Kind of looked like she’d had an unhappy spill in the sand, or a roll around in the bushes. Another poor office worker trying to snatch a break from a dismal cubicle and get some fresh air, like he used to do. He grinned. Or maybe she drove all the way here only to discover that nature is actually dirty, before scurrying back to the safety of her office’s four gray walls. He shook his head. Nah. Just before she left, her nervous look had been replaced with one of triumph. She’d be back for more.

He rolled his neck from side to side and reeled in his empty line again. Across the calm water, a small dark spot scurried about. A beaver. It climbed out of the water on the other side of the bank. Roberts smiled, content. There was no place he’d rather be, except maybe doing the same thing in Colorado, or Montana. It was the quiet hum of nature that appealed to him. The lull of the clear water streaming gently past, the whitecaps that arced over the boulders and rocks, the lack of artificial noise.

He set down his fishing gear and opened his thermos of herbal green tea. It was better hot, and in this weather, it would be tepid in no time. Winter was extending its icy grip into the fall season.

Back in the clearing, he had parked near another car. He would have heard it leave if the engine had started, so it was still there. Where was its owner? Might be nice to have someone to talk to for a bit.

He finished his tea and, with his hands inside his fleece lined pockets, stared across the river, taking a deep breath of the fresh, chilly air. He stepped back toward the cover of the woods to relieve himself. He gazed in through the trees, admiring the colorful fall foliage, until something caught his attention. The handle of a fishing pole stuck up through the brush. He chuckled. Odd—but not entirely unusual; wouldn’t be the first time a day with no fish got under a sportsman’s skin and—like an irritated golfer who missed a three-foot putt—he threw his equipment into the woods. The pole was a sturdy one. Was it salvageable? He ambled into the woods, toward the discarded piece of equipment. When he was close enough to grasp the pole, he caught a glimpse of something else.

Red liquid glistened across the bushes, dotting the leaves as if they were diseased. And then . . . he had to blink to make sure what he saw was real. He dropped the pole, and backed away in quick, stumbling steps. His hands flew to his chest. “Oh no. Holy mother....” A thin sweat broke out over his skin.

The dead man’s eyes had stared up at the gray sky, his expression frozen in horror. Roberts could barely think or breathe. Had the man moved? He didn’t think so but—Oh, God!—he wasn’t sure. You have to check! Roberts crept forward again, gripping the sides of his head. The man’s shirt was soaked in blood, a pool of it covered the ground beside him. Oh, he’s dead! He’s definitely dead!

Roberts' eyes darted around. His pulse thumped, rushing blood past his ears, louder than the river. He yanked his phone out of his shirt pocket. It slid out of his sweaty, shaky hands, flipped through the air, and landed in the blood.

"No!" He squeezed his eyes shut. Bile rose in his throat. He had to lean forward, resting his hands on his knees, and wait for the nausea to subside. The dead man's face was etched in his brain, the gruesome expression and lifeless eyes staring at him from inside his mind.

He wanted to race back to the car and lock the doors. But he had to call for help. Tears sprang from his eyes as he grabbed his iPhone from the puddle of blood seeping from the dead man. Holding the phone away from himself, he ran back to his bag, where he had a rag. He cringed and gagged as he wiped the deep red liquid off his screen. A sudden noise came from the woods. He jerked around, heart racing. A squirrel scurried up a nearby tree trunk. Damn. If he hadn't just peed, he surely would have wet himself. Muscles tight and tense, he scanned the area again. The quiet isolation of the river bank had become a source of terror.

Praying for God's help, he pounded 911 into his phone. His fingers slipped on the numbers. He had to hit the back button and start over again. Come on, come on, come on!

"911. What is your emergency?"

"I just found a dead man. He's near the river. Near the clearing when you turn off . . . off . . . I can't even remember . . . where am I? . . . Fordham Street!"

"Your name, please."

"I'm Chris Roberts." His lips trembled. "I was fishing. That's when I saw him. Jeez. He's been shot. At least I think he's been shot." Roberts gathered his gear in one arm, dropped his empty thermos and almost tripped hurrying to pick it up. He flung his bag over his shoulder. With his new pole dragging across the ground behind him, he hurried toward the clearing where he'd left his car.

"Mr. Roberts, I'm sending someone to your location. You should hear the sirens in a few minutes. Is there anyone else in the vicinity?"

Roberts peered over his shoulder, scanning the river bank and the woods. He'd reached the clearing. "I don't think so, but . . . there's another car here."

BETH WIPE GREASE OFF her hands with a napkin as she swallowed the last bit of her hot dog. Slumping down in the gas station parking lot, she pulled out her cell phone and called Danny. One less witness to worry about, and only three left. She wanted to share that news. Her call went to his voicemail. Again.

Asshole better clear out his messages one of these days. She made a mental note to tell him when she saw him later. She'd been harboring so much anger towards Danny lately. She had a vague, almost surreal but ever-present feeling that they'd had a huge fight recently, but she couldn't even remember what it was about. His business venture? Or . . . she just didn't know.

She put the truck in drive and headed back to the Sonesta Hotel. She liked being high up above the ground, it made her feel in control, like the boss of the road. Too bad the interior smelled like cigarette smoke. But here's what else smelled like cigarette smoke—prison. So it was a good reminder of what she was determined to avoid.

As she was pulling in to the hotel lot, a middle-aged man with dark skin and a paunchy stomach walked toward his car. Arnold Gomez. Thanks to the “special reunion” pictures he posted on his Instagram page yesterday, she knew where he was going. He was running late, thank goodness. He should have left a while ago if he was going to meet his nephew when he said he would.

She rummaged in her purse for a scrap of paper and a pen. Wrinkles formed across her forehead as she leaned forward and scribbled her next message. This time she would be prepared. With a smile, she tucked the paper in her pocket, drove across the parking lot, and fell in behind Gomez's Hyundai. Turn after turn, she followed him closely, but not too closely.

Beth glanced at her speedometer. He was doing at least 48 in a 35-mph zone. She frowned. Wouldn't that be just her luck if a cop pulled her over and searched the vehicle. She had no idea what Horrigan had stashed under the seats. He could be a drug runner for all she knew, although he seemed too boring of a guy for that. Still, to play it safe, she let up on the accelerator even though it meant increasing the distance between her and Gomez.

None of the people passing in cars paid her any attention. They weren't staring out their windows or switching lanes to avoid her. She was just a random person in a Ford F-150. They didn't have an inkling of what she had done or what she was about to do. No one expected something bad to happen during the day. Even Danny seemed nicer when the sun was out, before his first drink woke up his mean streak and each additional drink intensified it.

Gomez left the main road and drove onto a side street. Small homes gave way to apartment complexes. At a sign offering two months free rent, free cable and Wi-Fi, Gomez slowed down and entered the Hampshire Apartment Complex. Beth gripped the wheel tighter, her arms growing rigid. Her heart raced. Just a few more minutes.

Ignoring the “Drive Slow – Children” signs, Gomez wove through the apartments to the back and parked in front of building D. Beth parked nearby. She tucked Danny's gun in her purse and stepped down from the truck. Gomez was still in his car. Looking around, she saw no one else. Too good to be true? Nah. Even if someone came out, who would try to stop her? They might call the police, but she would be long gone by then. And if they were lucky enough to catch her license plate, it would lead to Steve Horrigan. They'd be looking everywhere for him, thinking he was the killer, at least until he started to smell and someone eventually discovered him.

A terrible sensation descended over her. Something she couldn't pinpoint but knew was bad, like a nightmarish déjà vu. She closed her eyes and leaned against the side of the truck, hoping it would pass.

A car door softly clicked shut. The car beeped as it locked.

No time. Pull it together. She opened her eyes. Gomez was walking away. Do something.

"Freeze!" Slightly dizzy, she managed to stand with her legs apart, both hands on the gun, her voice level but loud, pretending she knew exactly what she was doing from experience. And she really did have some by now. But the strange, unsettling feeling made it hard for her to focus.

Gomez spun around and placed his hand on his chest. "Me?"

"Yeah, you." Her voice cracked. What is wrong with you, Beth?

"Uhh, why?"

"You know who I am." She stepped forward, a little unsteady.

"No." He shook his head. "I don't know you."

"Don't lie to me. It's too late for that."

"I think you've made a mistake, lady." Gomez glanced toward the apartment building and took a step backwards.

"I haven't made a mistake. I'm Agent Heslin. FBI."

He cocked his head to the side and shrugged. "What do you want?"

"I want you to do what I say, so no one gets hurt." Her knees beginning to quake like they had in the hotel room yesterday. If she was going to shoot him and not miss, she had to get a lot closer. "Just get on your knees." She echoed her words in her mind, wanting to sound confident and in charge. Impressive. Powerful. "There's something important happening here. FBI business."

"Why do I have to get on my knees?"

"Don't ask me questions. Just do it." Her hands were trembling. She gripped the gun tighter, like it might fly out of her hands any second. She moved close enough to see his dark eyes darting about. A muscle in his neck quivered and tensed as he lowered himself to one knee.

Beth held her chin up, moving closer step by step, eyes fixed on the scar running across the man's cheek. Just like Danny's scar. And somewhere in those few seconds after he kneeled, Beth no longer saw Gomez's dark skin and shaved head. She saw Danny. And for once, he was doing what she asked him to do.

He sprang up and ran toward her. Beth blinked, not believing her eyes. Her mind flashed to the time she accidentally knocked over Danny's full, opened bottle of whisky and he came after her with a hockey stick.

A rush of panic flooded through Beth's veins. As quick as she could, she pulled the trigger. Once. Twice. The kick from the shot rattled her teeth and jerked her back. Danny staggered to the side then stumbled backwards, a shocked expression overwhelming his features. A knife fell from his hand and clattered to the pavement beside him. He crumbled over with a groan.

Beth ground her teeth. The heat of her anger spread across her face. How dare he? Where was the respect for a federal agent? He'd tried to trick her, acting all cooperative while planning to stab her as soon as he had the chance. Just like Danny. Pretend to be all nice so Beth wasn't expecting the blow that might send her tumbling down the stairs, backwards over the chair, or wherever she happened to be when his rage blew up. But this time, she had shown him. She stepped right up to Gomez and pulled the trigger a final time. The gun only emitted an empty click.

Damn! She glared at the gun. Now I have to figure out how to reload it.

Her breaths came short and fast. Her whole body shook as she hid the gun inside her purse, but the unsettling feeling from earlier had disappeared. At her feet, Gomez stopped convulsing and lay still.

She rummaged in her purse for the Sharpie. Where is it! Gotta clean out this bag! Finding it, she scrawled the number six on the center of his forehead. Below it, she wrote, You'll be sorry. "I'm more than a punching bag and sex toy." She tucked the scrap paper with her note into his mouth. With a smug, satisfied smile, she hurried back toward her car.

"Uncle Arnold!"

The voice broke Beth's reverie. She stopped, rooted to the spot. He saw me! Now, the nephew needed to go, too. But her gun was empty.

The young man ran toward his uncle's body. He stopped suddenly, picked up the knife from the ground, and scanned the area with his chin lifted and his eyes blazing.

Beth backed away, still watching. The nephew walked forward again, sank to the ground, his hands covering his mouth, one knee in the spreading puddle of blood. With a sudden jerk of his head, he rose to his feet, looking left, right, and over his shoulder, the knife still in his hand.

Beth froze as the nephew's eyes met her own.

Danny's words echoed through her mind. Who do you think you are, Beth? You can't do anything. Her posture changed. No longer channeling the confident demeanor of Agent Heslin, she slumped her shoulders and waved her hands around in frantic, panicked motions. No one would ever suspect me.

"He's been shot!" she screamed. "I didn't see who did it. I'm—uh—I'm going to get my phone and call 911!" She ran the rest of the way to Horrigan's truck as if she was hurrying to call for help. Instead, she drove off, tires screeching around the corner.

KELLY WALKED THROUGH her living room, wheeling her suitcase behind her. She sniffed, turning her nose up. The whole place smelled a little musty. There was no food in the fridge, of course, and the dehumidifier would need to be emptied before that green stuff started growing inside it. She had to run a dark load of clothes right away so her favorite yoga pants would be clean for tomorrow. But it was good to be back.

She lowered the volume on the TV. Jason had already disappeared into the bedroom. For him, it just wasn't home without all the televisions going at once. Picking up a pen, she started making a list.

Eggs, butter, bananas . . .

Behind her, the TV mentioned a shooting. She glanced at the screen. Her pen dropped. Her stomach flipped. "Jason!"

Jason rushed into the living room. "What's wrong? Are you okay?"

Kelly fumbled with the remote, pausing the news and then rewinding it. "Look!" She pointed at the paused screen, her eyes wide.

Jason followed her gaze. "What?"

Kelly pressed play, waving her hands in front of her, her eyes fixed on the television. "That dead guy was in the room next to us!" Kelly's hands flew to her face and the remote hit her in the nose. She lowered her hands, wringing them in front of her chest. "In our hotel."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes! I remember his face, and that outfit. It doesn't really match. He was wearing it at breakfast yesterday. He sat one table over from us. He said hello to me because I saw him when he first checked in, when you went to park the car and I went up to the room by myself. He was in the hallway then. Same pants, different shirt. He was in the room right next to us."

On the television, the news anchor stepped to the side, revealing a man lying on his back on the ground. "Law enforcement needs your help identifying this man. He was found by the Rocky Bend River off Fordham Street this afternoon, with no identification."

A digital black bar covered parts of the man's torso and his entire face, hiding something Kelly could only imagine was terrible. He wore a dark green sweatshirt, flung wide open, a blue shirt patterned with pink fish and gray fishing poles, and camouflage cargo pants.

The camera went to a close shot of the newscaster with the crime scene image behind him. "The unidentified man has heavily tattooed arms."

"If you recognize him, please call the number below. Anyone in the area who heard gunshots between the hours of eight and ten in the morning are asked to notify authorities."

A tip line number scrolled across the bottom of the screen.

"Whoa. I don't remember him." Jason frowned at the screen and twisted his hands together. "And now he's dead?"

"Not just dead. Murdered!"

"Can't believe they showed a dead guy on the news. I didn't think they were supposed to do that."

"They said he was shot. Well, they said something about hearing gunshots. They don't know who he is. What should we do?"

Jason rubbed his hand over his chin. "We call that number. Tell them what you said, so they can figure out who he is."

Kelly paused the television again, flapped her hands against her sides and paced in a circle. “You do it. Hurry. I’m too nervous right now. I’ll tell you what to say.”

Jason called the number, taking deep breaths. “Hi. This is Jason Smith. I’m calling because I have some information about a murder we just saw on television.” He put his hand over the phone and spoke to his wife. “They’re transferring me.”

A few seconds later he spoke again. “The man who got killed, he was in the room next to us at the Sonesta Hotel in Virginia.”

Kelly held onto his elbow, bouncing on her toes, shaking his arm. “Do you remember our room number?”

“Okay. I can hold.”

Kelly jostled his arm again. “I can’t remember our room number. Do you know it? We have to tell them what room we were in. He was to the right. But if you were facing our door, he was to the left.”

“Facing it from the hallway or from inside the room?”

“From the hallway. From the hallway.”

“Okay. Calm down.” He put his arm around her. “I’m on hold. They’re going to connect me to someone. I can’t remember the number either right now. I mean, I knew it, but . . . somewhere in the middle of the second floor. They can always look it up.”

Kelly grabbed a throw pillow from the couch and paced around the room.

“I’m still on hold. Wait, they’re transferring me to a detective.”

“Put it on speaker so I can hear what they say.” She hugged the pillow to her chest.

Jason gave his contact information and told the police what they knew.

“Thanks for calling in on the hotline. Let us know if you or your wife think of anything else.”

“Oh. Okay. We will.”

Kelly bounced on her toes some more, shaking Jason’s elbow again.

“Uh, can you hold on for a second?” Jason asked the detective.

“We should tell them about that lady following us.” Kelly nodded, her whole body bobbing up and down.

Jason moved his mouth away from the phone and whispered to his wife. “That’s not relevant, Kel. And we don’t really know that she was following us.”

“They said they wanted to know about anything suspicious,” Kelly whispered back, her eyes as wide as possible. “She was suspicious. Weird and suspicious. Maybe she followed that guy too. And now he’s dead. She had a gray car—”

“A Honda—”

“A gray Honda with a big dent in the front and the headlight wasn’t working. Tell her, Jason. Please.”

“No.” Jason covered the bottom of his phone with his hand. “That lady has nothing to do with this. And we’ve done enough.”

“Then let me tell them.”

“So now you’re not too nervous?” He shook his head.

She held out her hand, her big brown eyes pleading.

Jason sighed and handed his cell to his wife.

RIVERA WAS TURNED BACKWARDS, backing a black SUV out of the FBI garage when his phone lit up with a call.

Victoria lifted the vibrating device from the center console. “It’s Detective Sullivan. I’ll put him on speaker. If it’s not about the case, take it off real quick before I hear something I might not want to hear.”

Rivera laughed and cranked the steering wheel to his left. “Sully won’t say anything you can’t handle.”

“You’re forgetting the time he called me a snob.”

“He didn’t call you a snob. He asked if you were one. Valid question, considering.”

“After we saw him at Meiser’s house, I meant to ask you how he’s doing now, you know, with the drinking . . .” She let her words trail off to accept the call, pressed the speaker phone button, and handed the phone to Rivera.

“Sully. What’s up? Agent Victoria Heslin is with me and you’re on speaker. We’re on our way to forensics.”

The detective spoke in a hushed voice. “Another victim of the Numbers Killer. At the Hampshire Apartments complex.”

“The Numbers Killer?” Rivera asked.

“That’s what the media are calling him.”

Rivera blew out a big puff of air. “So much for keeping the info about the numbers internal. When did it happen?”

“Few hours ago. We’ve already done our jobs here. I noticed no one from the FBI showed up. Not sure why no one has called you yet—sorry.”

“Shouldn’t he have called us?” Victoria whispered to Rivera, frowning.

Rivera whispered back, “he’s calling us now,” then spoke to the detective. “Sure thing. Appreciate this. Wait—was there another message written on the victim?”

“Hold on. Someone asking me a question here.” Sully must have covered his phone because muffled conversation continued on his end of the line.

“I’m looking up the address.” Victoria typed into her phone.

Sully returned. “You there?”

“We’re here. Are they sure it’s our same guy?” Rivera asked as Victoria said— “You need to make a U-turn here.”

“Sure as can be without forensics and ballistics. He had the number six written on his head, same as the others. Looks like number five got skipped, or we haven’t found the body yet.”

“Was there another message on him?” Rivera cranked the steering wheel around a median to head in the other direction.

“Yeah. On his head. ‘You’ll be sorry.’ And they found another note. Another note with your name on it, Victoria.”

Victoria gripped her thighs, bracing herself for the information. “I’m just really popular this week, aren’t I? Well, what did it say?”

“It said, ‘Agent Heslin, watch your back.’”

Rivera’s nostrils flared.

A cold chill traveled down Victoria's spine. Her thoughts flew to her late night, uninvited visitor, the footprints in her yard and patio. She didn't want to let the killer unsettle her like this, but goosebumps formed on her skin just the same. She crossed her arms and rubbed her shoulders. "Well, I—I guess the killer doesn't know me very well. I always watch my back. Thanks for calling us, Detective. We're on our way."

"Later." Sully disconnected the call.

Rivera gripped the wheel. "That note is a direct threat," he said through gritted teeth. "I don't think you should go anywhere alone until we've caught this guy."

Victoria tapped the gun in her holster. "I've got this thing here with me at all times. And another around my ankle. But, you know what, just in case, I should ask Sam to see if anyone from one of my past cases was recently released from prison."

"No need." Rivera slowed the car to a stop for a red light.

"Why not?"

"Because I've already checked."

"Oh." She was quiet for a moment. "When did you do that?"

"After we found the first note."

"And?"

"We didn't come up with anyone."

"Hmm." Victoria rubbed her hands together then placed them under her legs.

"Murphy's probably going to take you off the case now."

She had been thinking the same. She stared out the window, away from Rivera. "Well, until then, I'm still here. So let's hurry up and get to the Hampshire Apartments. Now that the killer is sending me personal threats, I want to catch him more than ever."

• • • •

RIVERA GAZED PAST THE police tape to study the apartment complex—rows of identical buildings, mustard-orange on the bottom, whiteish with mildew stains on top. A few porches overflowed with trash—mattresses, boxes, rusty bikes. Others were much nicer—a colorful bistro table and chairs, one with large potted and hanging plants, some Halloween decorations. "Any surveillance cameras around?" He stared over Sully's shoulder, still scanning the buildings.

"There are cameras, but they don't work."

"Great."

Blood stained the pavement in the parking lot. Crime scene techs had left evidence markers and tape behind, but the corpse was en route to the medical examiner's office.

"The guy's nephew is over there. Name is Hernan Gomez." Sully gestured to the young man sitting on the curb. "He had a gun on him, no permit, but it hadn't been fired. We took it. Also had a knife."

"Okay. We'll talk to him. Might as well."

Rivera and Victoria walked over to Hernan Gomez. Wearing a ball cap, the young man's face blazed with anger. He didn't look any older than twenty and might have still been a teenager.

"I know you'll have answered some of these questions already, but please bear with me," Rivera said. "He was your uncle?"

"Yeah." Hernan kicked at the ground with his shoe, scuffing it back and forth.

"Did you see anyone else around when you found him?"

The young man wiped at something under his eye. "Like I already told the cops, no one except some lady. She left to call 911. She told me she didn't see who did it."

Rivera made a note on his notepad. "Did she come back?"

"Nope." Hernan pulled on the rim of his cap and avoided Rivera's eyes.

"What did she look like?"

Hernan shrugged. "I dunno." He pointed to Victoria. "Sorta like her."

"Good, that helps. Was she taller, shorter, heavier?"

"Heavier, maybe. And she wasn't as pretty."

"Okay. What about hair? This color, same as Agent Heslin?"

"Yeah."

Rivera and Victoria exchanged a quick glance.

Hernan shrugged. "I don't really remember much. I was, you know, blown away about my uncle."

"That's okay," Rivera said. "That's a good description right there. We're going to have you work with a sketch artist on a computer, see if you can remember more."

Hernan nodded. "Because you think the woman mighta killed him?"

"We need to talk to her. Hear what she might have seen. She might be scared, too. Did you see her leave?"

"Yeah. She drove off in a black pick-up. Back part was open. Like no cover on it."

"That's great. Glad you noticed that." Rivera wrote on his pad. "So, you live here with your uncle?"

"He was here visiting me. We were going to lunch."

"Were you with him when he was shot?"

"No, I was upstairs in my apartment waiting for him to get here."

"Can you show us your place?" Victoria asked. The police hadn't gone inside. She wanted to get in there before any evidence could be hidden or destroyed.

"Yeah. Over here." Hernan mumbled as he trudged toward his home.

Rivera stayed where he was. "I better call the boss."

"Find us when you're done." Victoria caught up to Hernan and walked alongside him. "What sort of man was your uncle?"

Hernan shrugged again. "I don't know what he was into. Not getting shot type of sh—stuff. Nice, real nice, but—you know—boring. Worked in a warehouse somewhere. Moving boxes and stuff. He was the manager."

"Do you know where he worked?" Victoria asked.

"Nah. Sorry. He told me, but I forget the name of the place."

"That's okay, we'll find out." She stopped outside Hernan's door and looked around.

Hernan unlocked his apartment door and held it open. "Why'd he have that writing on his head?" Hernan frowned deeply. "That was freaky."

"We're not sure yet." Victoria stepped inside. Apparently, Hernan didn't watch the news. "Just wait over there, please." She gestured toward the corner where she could keep an eye on him as she explored the small space. The entire apartment could fit into her kitchen. Xbox games and controllers were scattered around the main room and on the table top. In the kitchen, a trash can needed to be emptied, a stack of dishes filled the sink, and a cereal box sat open on the counter. In the bedroom, clothes were strewn across a single twin bed.

"If your uncle was staying here, where did he sleep?"

"He wasn't staying here. We were just hanging out during the day. Getting to know each other. He's my dad's brother and I don't know my Dad. So he just found out I existed. I just met him for the first time a few days ago."

That explained how little he knew about the man. Victoria opened the closet and peered inside. "So he was staying somewhere else?"

"I don't know where he was staying. I think he said he knew a guy who lives around here."

"But he didn't say who?"

Hernan shrugged and sank down into his ratty couch. He dropped his head into his hands. "I didn't ask him. Oh, man. This is unbelievable. My uncle was a good guy. I know he was. Not like my—You got to catch this—"

"We'll find whoever did this. You can count on that. This is my card. Call me, please, if you think of anything that might be helpful, or if you remember who he was staying with."

Hernan took the card and nodded.

"Is there someone you can call to come hang out with, so you won't be alone?"

Hernan shrugged.

"You're holding up really well, and we appreciate the help. Can I call someone to be with you? Your mom, a friend?"

"I'm fine. I'll deal with it."

"Okay. Maybe you can visit a friend then."

"Yeah. Okay. Okay. I'll do that."

Sensing the annoyance in Hernan's voice, Victoria said goodbye. She left as Rivera was striding up the path to Hernan's apartment. Rivera stopped suddenly and stared off in the distance toward the woods lining the back of the complex.

"Hear that?" Rivera took a few quick steps toward the trees, then took off running.

Following Rivera's lead, Victoria pulled her gun from her holster and dashed into the woods after him. When she caught up, he was putting his gun away.

"It was just a deer." He shook his head, breathing hard. "Sorry."

"No, problem. A sprint works better than caffeine." She tucked her weapon back where it belonged.

"I just thought, if she's leaving you messages- it's likely she's sticking around to see your reaction to them."

"I know." Victoria walked next to Rivera, taking deep breaths, her heart still pounding.

"Learn anything from the nephew?"

"Not much. He barely knows his uncle. Gomez was divorced. No kids. And he wasn't staying here. Hernan isn't even sure where he was staying or where he lives, so we'll have to find out. I'm sure the detectives already have. You?"

"I left a message for Murphy. He was supposed to make a public announcement on the case at five. Then called Sam, asked him to search for connections between all the victims. If we're lucky, Gomez is the missing link connecting all of them."

"Hope so."

Rivera took a last look back at the woods. "And . . . I just got off the phone with the 911 shift manager. There were three calls to 911 about this shooting. All from males. None from a woman."

"You were busy. I think it's safe to say our killer is a woman with blonde hair. And Hernan didn't find her at all suspicious. But did she want him to see her, or did she get caught?"

Rivera ran his hand over his hair. "Either way, it's a short matter of time before we catch her."

"Let's try for catching her before another body comes in."

• • • •

WITH A TENNIS TOURNAMENT playing on his television in the background, Jason Smith tore open an envelope and threw its contents into the growing pile of junk mail. Kelly sat in a recliner nearby, reading. Jason's phone rang. She looked up from her novel. "Who is it?"

Jason lifted the device. "Unknown. I'm not answering." He set it back down.

Kelly leapt from her chair and grabbed his phone off his desk. "Hello," she said breathlessly.

"This is Federal Agent Victoria Heslin. It's urgent that I speak with Jason and Kelly Smith."

• • • •

AT THE LOCAL POLICE station, the Smiths sat in a small room with a table and four hard chairs, across from a tattooed woman with two nose piercings and jet-black hair. A big, burly officer in civilian clothing, with a close-cut beard and side burns, sat with them.

"Why are we here, again?" Jason asked.

The officer cleared his throat. "The information you provided led us to identify Steve Horrigan, the man you saw on TV earlier. The car you described with the dent in the right front, the one your wife thought was following you, it might match the one found at the crime scene this morning. The plates were stolen, the car isn't registered. And, we have three victims who were checked into the Sonesta, your hotel, when they died."

Kelly turned to Jason. "See that, baby, good thing we told them about that lady. Glad we didn't stay another day in that hotel."

The tattooed woman tapped a pencil on the table. "Tell us what you remember about the woman driving the car, and I'll do my best to create her image."

Jason clasped his hands in front of him. "She was probably around thirty years old, maybe a little older. She had blonde hair. Not thick like Kelly's, but not stringy either, just average hair. She wore it down, parted in the middle."

Kelly toyed with the ends of her hair. "And it was pulled back in a ponytail when I saw her. She was parked in a car next to me. Before she drove off, she stared at me—really stared, like she hated me or something. It freaked me out. I knew something was seriously wrong with that woman."

"We'll make a version with each hair style." The artist showed them different features on her laptop, asked questions, and used short quick strokes of a stylus to shape the woman's head, her hair, her cheeks, and her eyes.

The Smiths studied the image.

Jason frowned. "Can you make her eyes a little more . . . lidded? And maybe a little more . . . dull?"

"Okay." A hint of a grin crossed the artist's face.

Jason studied his wife—her glossy, smooth hair and glowing complexion, her lush pink lips—and offered her a smile meant to reflect his appreciation. He turned back to the sketch artist. "She had sort of an overall disheveled look to her."

The artist nodded, adding lines and shading. When she was finished, she'd created a portrait of a sad woman with a distrustful look in her eyes, like she'd had a tough life. She didn't look like a killer, but more like a victim. "What do you think?"

"That's pretty good." Jason nodded. "Seems about right best I can remember."

Kelly agreed.

The artist tilted her head, studying the picture. “Any other distinctive features, birthmarks, scars?”

Jason shrugged and shook his head.

“Okay.” The officer stood up. “Just sit tight awhile longer. Some FBI agents need to speak with you. They’re on their way.”

“We spoke to them earlier.” Kelly crossed her arms in front of her chest and rubbed her shoulders.

“Right.” The officer walked toward the door.

Jason took off his jacket and wrapped it around his wife. “Cold?”

Kelly nodded.

“Can I get you anything while you wait?” the officer asked from the doorway.

The Smiths asked for water bottles and settled in, holding hands, exchanging anxious glances and nervous smiles until the officer returned. He waved them toward the door. “Okay. They’re ready for you.”

The agents were waiting for the Smiths in a room with more comfortable seating and a window. The change in rooms felt like an upgrade. “Hi. I’m Agent Victoria Heslin, with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.” The female agent shook hands with Kelly, then Jason. “We’re grateful you called the tip hotline today. Your sketch was very helpful. We just compared it to another image from someone else at a recent crime scene. The sketches are similar. You’ve been a big help to our investigation so far. Especially since you noticed the car she drove.”

“It was my wife who wanted to mention the woman following us.” Jason’s eyes beamed as he glanced at his wife. He had teased her that this wasn’t how he wanted to spend the evening—at the police station—but she had done good. At the prompting of the agents, he repeated the information they had shared with Agent Heslin earlier in the day.

“This is important. Did you ever see that woman inside the Sonesta Hotel?”

“No. We didn’t,” Jason said.

“I’m positive I didn’t,” Kelly added.

“What made you notice her following you?” Victoria asked Jason.

“So, first she was behind us when I dropped Kelly off at the mall near our hotel, to get her nails done. Her headlight was out so I told her.”

Victoria’s face lit up. Rivera was already out of his chair and tapping his phone, most likely calling the police impound lot, asking someone to turn on the Honda’s headlights and check the left one.

Jason shifted his gaze from Rivera back to Heslin. “Then she was behind us again when we were going to the movies last night. We left the hotel and stopped at a store to get snacks. She followed us right from one parking lot to the next.”

“Did you find that strange?” Heslin asked.

“Oh yeah. But then a cop pulled up and I let it go. He must have said something to her about her headlight, I saw him pointing to it. And when I came out of the store, she was gone.”

“She left as soon as the cop talked to her,” Kelly said. “So creepy. Why was she following us? What did she want?”

Victoria shook her head. In light of what happened to three other hotel guests, she could make an educated guess about what might have happened if a cop hadn’t come along, but she had no proof yet.

Kelly picked at her nails. “I really don’t think I’m going to sleep well again until you find her.”

“We will,” Victoria shifted in her seat and crossed her legs.

Kelly clasped her hands tightly together. “That hotel was awful. I can’t believe we ended up there. It looked nothing like it did online.”

“We’d like to show you some pictures. Please tell us if you came across any of these other people while you were at your hotel or at any other time.” Victoria set out a picture of Todd Meiser, from before he died.

Kelly and Jason both said no.

“What about this married couple?” She set down a picture of the Cossmans.

“Oh no.” Kelly clamped her hand over her mouth. “I did see them! They had cute dogs with them. Is that...oh my God! That’s the couple who were murdered when they were on that hiking trail!”

“Where did you see them?” Victoria slid the stylus from the side of her tablet.

Kelly perched on the edge of her seat, knees bouncing. “I saw the husband taking the dogs out one night. Our first night, because it was when I went to fill the ice bucket. And I saw them both at breakfast one morning.”

“Did you speak with them?”

“No.”

“Did you see them interacting with anyone else?”

“No.”

Rivera showed them a picture of Arnold Gomez, just in case he had made an appearance at the hotel for some reason. Neither had seen him.

“Why is this happening to people that stayed at the Sonesta with us? Why are they dead?” Kelly twisted her fingers together in front of her chest.

With a grim expression, Jason reached for his wife’s hand and squeezed it.

Victoria swallowed hard. “We aren’t sure yet.”

THE AGENTS DROVE BACK to their office checking leads, requesting data, and sharing information. Since it was Sunday, traffic was light. The drive was taking a lot less time than usual.

Rivera lowered his phone from his ear. “Okay. Listen to this.” His voice might have sounded calm and controlled to anyone else, but from the hitch in his breath, Victoria knew he was excited about something. “The Honda they found near Horrigan’s body matches the Honda the Smiths said followed them from the hotel. Broken left headlight. That puts this blonde woman at the Sonesta Hotel, at least in the parking lot, and at two of our crime scenes. And her hairs put her at Todd Meiser’s crime scene and in the Honda, not conclusively, the DNA tests will take a while, but at least the hairs are a visible match under the microscopes.”

Victoria clapped her hands. “So who owns the Honda?”

“The vehicle and the plates were stolen, and its been wiped clean of prints.”

“Of course. Otherwise it would have been too easy.”

“That’s not all.” Rivera tapped the steering wheel. “Remember little Gomez said the blonde woman left the parking lot in a black pick-up? Well, guess who owned a black pick-up?”

“I’m betting on Steve Horrigan.”

“Exactly. We’ve got an alert out on the truck. The description will be on every electronic billboard within a few hundred miles of here. Every patrol officer in the mid-Atlantic will be looking for it.”

“So we know what our killer looks like, sort of. But who is she? Why is she doing this? And why did she choose these people who don’t seem to have anything in common?”

Rivera’s expression turned grim. “And why is she sending messages to you?”

“I have no idea.” Victoria looked out the window, lifting her eyes toward the sky. Having seen little of the sun in the past few days, it was hard to tell if it was dusk, or if the clouds were thickening and darkening in preparation for another rainfall. Or maybe both. It had been another long day. Ned would have fed the dogs their dinner hours ago.

“I’ve got to send Ned a message and let him know I’m coming home.” She had to do a better job of keeping him updated on her schedule, or it really wasn’t fair to him. He had his own life. But what if she didn’t text ahead to let him know he could leave? What if she showed up and maybe he stayed and maybe they just hung out together for a while? Wouldn’t that be just what she needed to clear her mind, relax, forget about her work for a few hours so she could see everything again with an objective, clear mind in the morning?

“What are you thinking?” Rivera asked.

“Nothing. Just . . . looking forward to going home tonight.”

Who was she kidding? A few hours with a nice guy talking about something other than murder probably was exactly what she needed, what she should do. It was how normal people spent their after-work time—right? But was it fair to Ned? It would be impossible not to think about the cases and the crime scenes, not to text Rivera when a new idea or question occurred to her. That wasn’t fair to Ned. She wouldn’t be very good company at all.

She typed a text—I should be home in an hour. Thanks for everything—and pressed send.

VICTORIA PULLED INTO her garage. Ned's SUV was still there. That was unusual.

She entered the house through the garage. The dogs jumped up and went crazy greeting her, even Leo and Bella. She put her bureau-issued gun and holster in the safe. An incredible aroma emanated from the kitchen.

She walked into the kitchen. Ned was standing over the sink. "You're still here." Oops-that sounded rude. She smiled warmly to cover up her faux pas. She really was happy to find him still there. "Something smells amazing."

"That's dinner and there's a plate waiting for you if you're hungry. I waited for you to get home because I just have to show you something." He smiled ear to ear.

"What is it?"

"It's a surprise." He walked into one of the family rooms. The dogs had all lain down, a sure sign Ned had given them plenty of exercise during the day.

"Izzy, come," Ned called.

Izzy leapt from her bed and trotted to Ned, her body wagging side to side.

"Okay, ready for this?" Ned's enthusiasm could not have been more obvious. He was bursting to show her the new trick he'd taught Izzy. His smile was contagious. Just what she needed to push the murders out of her mind, if only for a short time.

• • • •

NED LEFT A FEW HOURS after Victoria arrived home. They'd hung around, laughed, and emptied several bags of organic dog treats teaching the dogs new tricks together. The evening had been light-hearted and fun.

Just a few minutes after he pulled out of her garage, she had a phone call from him.

"Hey. I'm still here, at the end of your driveway. There's someone waiting in a black sedan outside the front gate. Says he's an FBI agent."

"Oh, sorry. I should have mentioned that. He's a colleague. He's keeping an eye on me."

"Why do you need someone to keep an eye on you?"

She closed her eyes and rubbed her temples. "It's just work stuff. Go home and get some sleep. I'll call you tomorrow about some ideas I have for the trip."

"You sure? Because—"

She smiled. "I'm sure."

He sighed. "Okay."

"Hey. Thanks for tonight. It was fun. Just what I needed."

"Yeah? Well we can do it again sometime. My boss lets me have a pretty flexible evening schedule."

Victoria laughed. "Great to know. We might just have to do that. Have a good night."

VICTORIA TOOK HER SEAT at the conference table with Rivera, three other agents, local detectives, including Sullivan, and government officials. Most were absorbed with their own phones. The Chief of Police made small talk with the mayor, waiting for the meeting to begin. Victoria poured herself a glass of water from the pitcher on the table.

Pictures of Arnold Gomez and Steve Horrigan had been added to the montage of images lining the white board. Listed in chronological order were the messages left on the victims and the notes addressed to Victoria.

Todd Meiser - #2 - Liar

Robert Cossman - #3 - Cheater- Sonesta Hotel.

Anne Cossman - #4 - No message found - Sonesta Hotel.

Note to Agent V. Heslin with Cossmans: Does your partner treat you well?

Note on Agent V. Heslin's property: Without trust, you have nothing. Do you trust Rivera?

Steve Horrigan - no message, no number. Suspect's car left behind. Sonesta Hotel.

Arnold Gomez - #6 - You'll be sorry.

Note for Agent V. Heslin with Gomez - Watch your back, Agent Heslin.

The names Jim Johnson, Thomas Wilson, and Jason Bourne, the only guests at the Sonesta Hotel who had not been located, interviewed, and alibied, were circled with question marks around them.

Murphy entered the conference room, unsmiling. With a curt nod he acknowledged a few of the people seated around the table, slapping the Chief of Police on the shoulder as he passed. He set his Bulldogs thermos down. "Let's get started." He fixed his eyes on Victoria. "Agent Heslin, go ahead."

Victoria pushed her chair back, stood up, and turned on her tablet. Full of neat bullet-point lists, underlined phrases, starred and capitalized items. Rather than reading from the notes, she kept her gaze focused on the faces around her. "We haven't identified our perp yet, although we have a description. Here's what we know. We have five murders—four males and one female—that we know were caused by the same gun. We think the numbers represent the order in which the victims were killed, and the ME's findings support that."

The mayor raised her hand as she spoke. "I thought the man they found by the river didn't have a number on him."

"Correct." Victoria folded her arms. "But ballistics match, and the Honda left behind at his crime scene matches one witnesses saw the suspect driving."

"I see." The mayor settled back in her seat, looking uncomfortable.

Victoria gestured toward the white board. "The victims don't seem to have been targeted by race, age, or gender, unless Anne Cossman was simply in the wrong place at the wrong time, which is possible. But most likely, these aren't hate crimes in the typical sense." She made eye contact with the Chief of Police. "We've spent the morning combing through your team's interviews with the victims' employers and family members. We compared your reports to our own, as I'm sure the detectives are doing as well." She nodded at Sully. "We've found no commonalities. The victims don't appear to share friends, family, activities, attorneys . . . nothing."

"So why them?" the mayor asked.

"The connection must exist from the killer's point of view." Victoria clasped her hands in front of her body. "These people have done something to her."

“Her?” The mayor’s mouth hung open.

“Yes, ma’am. We believe the killer is female,” Victoria said. “The victims have done something to wrong the killer, at least from her perspective. It could be anything. All of them are from out of town, except Todd Meiser. All but Meiser and Gomez stayed at the Sonesta hotel.”

“Where was Gomez staying?” the mayor asked.

“We’re not sure yet.” Sully shifted in his seat and cleared his throat, staring at the white board as he answered.

“So have we looked into everyone else staying at the hotel?” the mayor asked.

Sully answered. “We have three guests still unaccounted for. Two left after one-night stays. Might not have even stayed overnight. Both paid cash. We’re thinking they met a woman or . . . a paid date. It happens in that hotel. The third is Jim Johnson. The minute that Mr. Johnson comes back for his stuff, we’ll know about it. We’re trying to track down all three of them.” The detective swirled his coffee absentmindedly with a stirrer. “You know, maybe the victims all drove too slow or cut our killer off changing lanes.”

Sully’s suggestion was an attempt to diffuse the tension in the room, but anything was possible. Victoria pointed to the whiteboard. “The killings took place in daylight, three of them in open, public areas. They’re sloppy, not well planned, with prints, hairs, fibers and other evidence left behind.”

A colleague of Sully’s interlocked his fingers, resting his hands on the table. “The killer also left behind a scarf.”

Heslin nodded. “However, there’s no match for any of the fingerprints in our systems. We believe the perp just recently became unhinged somehow.”

The Chief of Police made a fist and tapped it on the table. “Unhinged. Sloppy. New at killing. You’ve got the hotel connection. And yet, you—I mean, we—still haven’t caught the person.”

Rivera cocked his head. “It’s only been three days.”

“Only three days?” The chief’s voice rose. “Have you been reading the papers? Or watching TV? It’s wall-to-wall coverage. We need this case closed yesterday.”

Victoria took a sip of water from her glass, giving herself another second to think. “Based on the footprints, the hairs left behind, and our descriptions of a suspect seen at two of the crime scenes, we’re looking for a woman in her early to late thirties, with straight brown hair dyed blonde, about five foot four. She’s been seen wearing her hair down and also in a ponytail. She may not have a job, since the crimes have occurred at different times throughout the day.”

“Did anyone see her at that hotel?” the mayor asked.

Murphy set his thermos down with a thump. “No.”

“So we’ve got a female serial killer in our city?” The mayor fiddled with the top button of her blouse as she spoke.

“Yes.” Victoria nodded. “A spree killer, actually. More than one murder in a short period of time, different locations, no cooling-off period between them. It’s possible she’s not acting alone, but she’s our only suspect at this time.”

“Isn’t that unusual? Doesn’t that make it easier to find her?” The mayor let go of her button.

“Yeah,” Murphy said. “It cuts our potential suspects in half, so we only have 150 million possibilities—in the USA.”

Victoria addressed the mayor. “Men are more likely to be serial or spree killers because they’re more socialized to express their aggression outward, more likely to hunt down victims. And it’s rarer for women to kill using guns. But none of that makes our jobs easier. We really don’t have statistically significant samples of female spree and serial killers to study. And on average, female killers manage to evade arrest for much longer than men.”

Sully twirled the stirring stick between his fingers like a tiny baton. “What type of spree killer do you think we’re looking at?”

“The short timeframe for these kills argues for a mission-oriented killer, someone with a purpose for elimination, like revenge. But, as I said, the murders are highly disorganized, So, it’s possible we have a visionary killer.”

“Can you elaborate?” the mayor asked, again clasping her top button.

“Visionary killers select their victims in a way that tends to appear random to investigators. They’re usually suffering from psychosis, having delusions or hallucinations that compel them to kill. The victims they choose are directly related to their psychosis.”

“Like David Berkowitz,” Rivera said. “The ‘Son of Sam.’ He claimed Satan, or a demon told him to commit murders.”

“I thought it was his dog.” Sully laughed.

“Yeah. And like our killer, he also left letters for the police.” Rivera crossed his arms, placing his hands on his biceps. “Some visionary killers believe or come to believe they are someone else entirely.”

Victoria made eye contact with her colleagues around the conference table. “Female spree killers still attack for the same reasons as men, though—anger, revenge, the need for control, mental illness. Based on the messages she’s left, it’s likely she’s been wronged by a man, a boyfriend or husband. She appears to be leaving messages related to that experience.”

“Are we even considering that the Butlers had anything to do with all these killings anymore?” an agent asked.

“We’re still considering everything.” Murphy set his arms on the table. “Until we can rule it out with absolute certainty.”

“Well, then . . .” The Chief of Police shifted his gaze to the notes on the wall, then settled it on Victoria. “As far as I can tell, in addition to the hotel, what connects these victims—and their murders—is you, Heslin.”

“Excuse me?” The pitch of Victoria’s voice rose. Beside her, Rivera sat up straighter.

“It was you who convinced Todd Meiser to testify,” the Chief said. “Then we’ve got the couple killed hiking with their dogs, and I understand that hiking with your dogs is one of your big hobbies. And all the notes were left for you. Someone is obsessed with you.”

Victoria crossed her arms and shifted her weight. “The first note was left when the Cossmans were murdered. It’s possible the killer saw Rivera and me being interviewed on television after Todd Meiser was murdered. Channel 14 was on the scene when we left.”

The chief rolled his eyes “Where I come from, when we hear hoofbeats, we think horses, not zebras. You are in this up to your eyeballs. Let’s not overlook the obvious just because it’s uncomfortable for you.”

She turned red. “I’ve never met... I’ve never met the Cossmans, Steve Horrigan, or Arnold Gomez. And it’s not me that our suspect seems to have taken an interest in.”

The Chief maintained his hard stare. “Could have fooled me.”

“She appears to be focused on . . . an imagined relationship between Rivera and me. Perhaps she . . . has some displaced anger towards us.” Victoria inhaled deeply, took her time exhaling. “At this point, I’m certain we need to focus on what connects these victims in the killer’s mind.”

The Chief leaned forward. “Still, is there anything you want to share with us? Anything that might shed light on the messages written on the victims? Liar. Cheater. You’ll be Sorry. Is it possible those messages were intended for you?”

Victoria opened her mouth to speak, closed it again. She clasped her hands behind her back to keep from curling her hands into fists. Sully coughed and averted his eyes.

The Chief’s gaze roamed from Victoria to Rivera. “Is there something going on with you two? Because if there’s something we don’t know, and it allows this perp to keep killing, accumulating victims . . .”

Another detective jumped in. “If the FBI is going to be taking the lead on these cases, don’t be making things worse for us. We’re the ones who have to take the heat for these deaths.”

Rivera glowered at the detective. “Don’t forget—we live here. This is happening in our backyard, too.”

Murphy cut in. “Enough. We’re not going down this territorial battle path. The FBI was called from the beginning because of Meiser’s connection to the Butler case. Now that we have a serial killer on our hands, we would have been called in anyway. This is our case, no doubt about it, but I like to think that we’re all working together in the best interest of the public, to catch this killer.”

Rivera set his hands on the table. They were still and steady, as usual, steady as a rock, but the muscles around his eyes tightened. His voice sounded carefully controlled. “To address concerns anyone may have, there is nothing unprofessional going on between Heslin and me. There never has been. Everything points to those messages being intended to represent the killer’s thoughts on the victims.”

“Sorry to say this, Rivera—” Sully looked away from his friend, grimacing. He gestured toward the white board. “But the notes and the one-word messages are directly tied, and the notes are directed at Agent Heslin.”

“The killer is unstable.” Victoria dropped her hands to her sides, the heat of anger rising to her cheeks. She couldn’t believe the turn the meeting had taken. She focused on Detective Sullivan, taking in the hint of red capillaries around his irises and again wondering if he was just overworked or if he’d been drinking. She placed her hands on her hips. “There may be no rational explanation for what The Numbers Killer leaves behind. Insane or not, people do some horrible things without any reason at all.”

The Chief of Police narrowed his eyes, offering a slight nod.

“So what can we do?” the mayor asked. “How can you put out extra people to protect the public if we don’t know who is at risk?”

Her question met silence.

Victoria cleared her throat and everyone looked at her. Hands on her hips, she lifted her chin, and squared her shoulders. “Finding victim number one might be the key to all this.”

AFTER THE MEETING, it was a relief to be alone. Sitting at her desk, Victoria shook off the feeling that she'd been accused of something. Resentment wouldn't help and would only distract her from the case. There was work to be done. Detectives were still at the Sonesta Hotel trying to figure out how the staff or guests might figure into the murders. Sam and other intelligence analysts were still searching into connections between the victims. The police were handling the calls coming in through the tip lines, and Victoria and Rivera were following up with the few that seemed legit and warranted further investigation. There hadn't been anything else useful since they talked to Jason and Kelly Smith. Victoria also had a pile of paperwork waiting, forms she had to complete from her last case. And she was expected to testify in court during the Butler trial, although she was still waiting on the exact date and time.

Before she'd accomplished much, Rivera stopped outside her door. "Come with me to the ME's office?" He twirled a set of keys in his hand.

"Because you don't want to be alone with Rebecca?" Victoria laughed. "Please don't tell me you haven't noticed she has a thing for you."

Rivera grunted. "I've noticed."

"She reminds me of a young Oprah. She's been divorced at least two years now. Not sure why you don't ask her out."

"So, are you coming or not?"

"Sure. Just giving you a hard time. I was thinking the same anyway." Victoria closed her laptop and stood up. "Let's see what Rebecca has to say about the last two victims. I'll meet you in the parking garage. What car number?"

"Number three. But I'll wait for you."

She stopped. "Rivera, you know I can take care of myself. I don't need a personal escort."

"Maybe I don't want to walk out there alone. You think of that?"

She laughed. "Fine. Give me a minute."

AN ACCIDENT ON THE highway had traffic at a standstill. Victoria pulled a protein bar from a pocket in her backpack. "In case of emergency." She held it up. "Want half?"

"No, thanks. But I've got to eat something. You mind stopping somewhere?"

"No. I'm hungry, too." She dropped the bar back into her bag. "When you get to the next exit, there's a little Mexican place on South Boulevard. I know the owners. We used to do spin classes together."

"Sounds great." His stomach growled. "Told you."

"You shouldn't skip breakfast." Victoria laughed. "We're almost there."

Inside The Cantina, the Monday lunch crowd was sparse and they had their pick of the red vinyl booths. Both agents ordered tacos and Rivera ordered a Coke. The waiter delivered waters and a basket of chips with salsa. Rivera dug in to them without hesitating while Victoria turned on her tablet and opened her notes. She had to lean toward Rivera to be heard over the music. "What do we still need to follow up on in our search for a connection?"

Rivera dipped two chips into the bowl of salsa and spoke between bites. “Our background checks covered their previous locations, work histories, insurance agents, gym memberships. There’s nothing. It’s like you said—she’s getting revenge for something they did to her.”

“Wish we had a crystal ball right now. Okay. We need to dig deeper on this. And let’s go back to the Sonesta Hotel after the ME’s office.”

“You think the detectives are holding back on us?”

“No, it’s not that, it’s just, we need to go back.”

Rivera grabbed another handful of chips. “What would make you angry enough to go after people like that?”

“Hmm. Well, if I was crazy and disturbed enough to have a hit list, anyone who tortures animals would be at the top of it.”

“Ahh. That was too easy. I should have guessed it.”

“How about you?”

He drained most of his water and set it down. “Pedophiles? Yeah, that’s it. Perverts that victimize children.”

“So if you saw someone assaulting a child, you would go after them?”

“Absolutely.”

“So what did our killer see them do?”

Rivera shook his head. “Or maybe we’re looking at it in reverse. Maybe the question is—what did they see her do?”

Victoria shook her head and dropped it into her hands. “I don’t have any idea.”

Rivera stood up. “Be right back. Can I get you anything?”

“No, I’m fine.” She tapped the top of her almost full glass of water. “Thanks.”

Rivera returned at the same time the food arrived. He stood next to the booth while the waiter placed their platters on the table. He took his seat once the waiter left. “No work-talk while we eat. Let’s see if we can do it.”

Victoria smiled and powered off her tablet. “So, are you and Renee still good friends?”

“We’re friends. We don’t talk much. She’s seeing someone.”

Victoria lifted her taco for a first bite. “Is it serious?”

Rivera shrugged and dug into his own food.

Victoria took his limited response as a lack of interest in the topic. She dabbed at her lip with her napkin. “I like this song.”

Pretending his fork was a microphone, Rivera closed his eyes. He began to sing a Dave Matthews ballad.

Victoria’s mouth dropped. “Wow! You’re really good.”

He opened his eyes and stopped singing. “Damn straight I am.”

She laughed. “Keep going. I like it.”

“If you insist.” He finished out the refrain in a smooth, low voice, adding a twang. “How about you sing a few verses?”

“You do not want to hear me sing. I promise.” She laughed.

“Come on. Can’t be that bad.” He took a gulp of his soda.

“Nope.” She smiled from ear to ear. “But . . . how about this . . . I’ll save my singing for when you’re really down and need cheering up, because I promise you will laugh your ass off.”

Rivera extended his hand across the table and Victoria shook it. “It’s a deal.” He grinned and finished the last of his drink. “I know you don’t go out much when you’re not working, but maybe we should do this for real sometime. Go out to eat, but not under the auspices of work and catching a crazed killer.”

Victoria smiled. “That might be fun.”

Rivera cleared his throat and touched his ear. “Hey, uh, there’s something I should tell you.”

“Yeah?” Whatever was coming, she had a feeling it was going to be interesting. “What’s that look for?”

“What look?” Rivera cocked his head.

“Like you just . . . I don’t know. Like maybe for once you’re not entirely sure of what you’re going to say.”

Rivera smiled. His gaze never wavered.

“Have I got something on my chin?” She raised her napkin, hovering it near her mouth.

Rivera chuckled. “Your chin is fine.”

“What is it then?” Unsure if she should be frowning or laughing, Victoria settled for an uneasy half-smile.

“I just . . .” He crossed his forearms on the table and leaned in. “The reason we’ve been working together a lot is because . . .”

“Because?”

“I might have been requesting it.”

A smile slowly built on her lips. Her stomach fluttered, although she didn’t know what would follow his confession. “You have?” She uncrossed her legs and shifted her weight, tucking a wisp of hair behind her ear. “Well . . . that’s interesting. I can’t wait for you to tell me why. Or do I want to know?” She placed her hand against her cheek. “I mean, I know I’m a lot more pleasant than Agent Poloski . . . and I never have to leave to pick up my kids or watch their recitals like—Oh, dear—Oh, crap.” She shook her head.

“What?”

“Talking about picking up kids—you know, my dogs are sort of like my kids and I forgot to call Ned again. Hold on. This will only take a second.” She took out her phone and tapped her contacts. She held up one finger, waiting for the call to connect.

“Victoria?”

“Ned, hey.”

“Ah!” Ned exclaimed. His laughter was joined by a young woman’s voice.

“Oh, dear! Oops!” The woman laughed again in the background.

Victoria’s muscles tensed. She twisted her napkin. “Did I catch you at a bad time?” The pitch of her voice had risen.

“I was pouring wine when you called. Apparently, I can’t multi-task as well as I thought. Just spilled it.” He chuckled, and so did whoever was with him, a light flirty sound.

“But, it’s only . . . it’s just afternoon.” With a flash of anger, Victoria stared intensely at her empty plate.

“Yep. So, what do you need, boss?”

She shoved a stray section of hair away from her face. “Oh, um, I just wanted to make sure you could come back to feed them dinner and hang out there for a while.”

“Sure. Are you going out of town? Did you want me to stay over?”

“No. Actually, you don’t need to go back. Don’t worry about it, I didn’t realize you had plans . . . I mean . . . the dogs will be fine. They’ve got their dog door. They’ll be fine.” She frowned and pressed the red button to end the call.

Rivera lowered his head to meet Victoria's eyes. "He can't babysit the dogs tonight?"

"What? No, uh. I guess he's on a date. In the middle of the day. I mean, he didn't say it was a date, but it sounded like one." She rotated her palm toward the ceiling. "I don't know why I'm so surprised. But . . ." She looked away, grabbed a few chips, and chewed them absentmindedly. "It's no big deal. The dogs will be fine."

"Can't argue with that. If I'm not mistaken, dogs all over the world manage on their own for hours at a time."

"I know, it's just—never mind. Anyway." She sighed and looked past Rivera, over his shoulder. "What were we talking about before I made that call?"

Rivera settled back against the booth. "You know. Work stuff."

"Right."

"Ready to get out of here?" He looked around the restaurant.

"Yeah. Okay."

Rivera spotted their server and signaled to get his attention.

• • • •

INSIDE THE MEDICAL examiner's office, gospel music played through the speakers. Dr. Rebecca Boswell, a licensed pathologist, was pushing a gurney with a zipped body bag. A large presence, Rebecca wore hot pink scrubs and black sneakers. Her sleek hair was pulled back in tiny braids.

"Hello," Rivera called.

Rebecca stopped, stared at Rivera, and smiled. "Agents, welcome." She crossed the room and turned down the music. "I was wondering when I was going to see you."

"Hi, Rebecca. We were on our way here yesterday when we got the call about Gomez." Victoria set her hands on the side of a steel gurney as she spoke.

"Someone has been keeping us all busier than usual, haven't they?" Rebecca shook her head.

"What can you tell us?" Rivera asked.

"Nothing you don't already know." She nudged the bridge of her glasses using the heel of her hand. "Same COD for the victims, shot from up close with a small-caliber weapon. The last one, Gomez, took three rounds to the torso. Nothing unusual about how they died, considering." She shrugged. "I've got Gomez's wallet in the back room still, if you want to examine it. It wasn't on him. It was in his car and somehow it ended up here."

"Not exactly protocol, but as long as it's not lost," Victoria said. "We'll go take a look."

"Follow me." Rebecca led them into an office and grabbed a key from a drawer. "Gloves in a box on the wall over there. Plastic sheeting next to it." She unlocked a safe and stood back.

Rivera set a sheet of plastic on a table. Wearing gloves, Victoria scooped up the evidence bag and removed the wallet from inside it. She unfolded the nicked leather sides. She gasped, and her mouth dropped open. Tucked into one of the credit card slots was a blue key card for the Sonesta Hotel. "You've got to be kidding me," she whispered. "I cannot believe we're just finding this out now."

"Wow." Rivera slid the wallet and card back into the evidence bag.

Victoria glared at the wallet. Her mind raced with frustration, mostly targeted at Detective Sullivan. "I told you—How could—"

"There might be an explanation," Rivera said.

"Whatever it is, better late than never." Rebecca peered over their shoulders. "Significant?"

"Definitely," Rivera said. "I think we've identified missing Sonesta customer Jim Johnson. And now we know why Johnson hasn't returned to the hotel. Gomez must have used a fake name."

With a sigh, Victoria pulled off her gloves and tossed them in the trash. “So far, we’ve got Todd Meiser on the one hand, and on the other—Sonesta Hotel customers being eliminated. That hotel connects all the victims, except for Meiser.”

“We need to get back there now.” Rivera tucked the evidence bag with the wallet into his coat pocket.

Victoria nodded. “I’ll call Sam on the way. I want to see everything he’s got on the hotel staff.”

“We’ve already seen it.” Rivera started walking toward the door.

“Did we?” Victoria followed him, walking next to Rebecca. “We, as in the FBI? Because I can’t believe this happened.”

“Local PD interviewed them all and did background checks, but our agents did, too. I saw the report. Useless. Let’s talk to the staff again.” Rivera stopped in the doorway. “Thanks, Rebecca. You’ve been a huge help.”

“Anytime. Come back and stay longer next time.” She smiled at both agents, but her gaze lingered on Rivera.

“I’m calling Sam.” Victoria called as they left the ME’s building. “Sam, it’s Victoria and Rivera. You’re on speaker phone.”

“Excellent timing, my favorite agents.”

“We know you say that to everyone, Sam,” Rivera said.

“I was about to call you.”

“What’s going on?” Rivera asked, pulling the car keys from his pocket.

“I found the companion Meiser met with. That’s what she calls herself. Her name is Olivia Papaleia. She didn’t know he was dead, by the way. Finally called me back when she heard. She seems young, cooperative, and afraid. I didn’t question her, but she started talking anyway. Said she was in classes all day when he was killed, and she has plenty of witnesses. Said she’s never been to his house. She met him at a hotel, where—”

Every muscle in Victoria’s body tensed with excitement. “Which hotel, Sam?”

“The Vista View Hotel.”

Victoria’s shoulders slumped. “It’s like we were so close to winning the lottery and then the last ball popped up with the wrong number.”

“Sorry. And she has no priors. Doesn’t even have so much as a parking ticket to her name. And that’s her real name, I checked it out.”

“Good to know, but from what these crimes tell us, whoever is doing this, it’s like she recently snapped,” Victoria said. “Five kills in a matter of days. She’s either getting revenge or she just recently went nuts. The fact that she has no prior record may not matter.”

“Give us her address. We’ll try to speak with her right now,” Rivera said, opening his car door.

“She has alibis you can check, so you’ll know soon enough if you like her for any of these murders. Here’s her address.”

• • • •

WITH THE ESCORT’S ADDRESS programmed in their GPS, Rivera took the next exit to get them headed in the right direction. “It’s only a thirty-minute drive, and sort of on the way to the Sonesta Hotel. It will just be a detour.”

“What could have happened to get these people killed?” Victoria said. “Why don’t we know?”

“Maybe Olivia can tell us.” Rivera opened his container of gum with one hand and shook a few into his mouth. “Do you want to call for backup?”

Victoria read the signs and billboards lining the road: Jesus Saves, Fresh Farm Produce Exit 28, Savvy Furniture Mart, Open 365 Days a Year. She shook her head. “There’s two of us. Sounds like she couldn’t have done it. Let’s just call in to Murphy, let him know where we’re going. We’ll be fine.”

Rivera grunted his agreement. “We’ll put our Kevlar on before we go in.”

WEARING FBI VESTS, the agents stood outside the door of the address Sam provided. Their hands hovered by their hips, just above their weapons as they vigilantly watched the doors and paths around them.

“Ready?” Rivera asked.

Victoria nodded and pressed the doorbell. A woman opened the door. The agents quickly scanned her body. She wore a long, fitted sweater, leggings, and dark-rimmed glasses. There was nowhere to hide an easily accessible weapon on her body that would not be detected.

“Olivia Papaleia?” Victoria asked.

“Yes. That’s me.”

Olivia was of Middle-Eastern descent with olive skin and shining black hair that formed a single French braid between her shoulders. No trace of blonde. She was nothing like Victoria expected.

The agents identified themselves. With a tight-lipped smile, Olivia made a sweeping gesture to welcome them inside. “Please come in.” She closed the door and padded away, leading them to a neatly decorated room. On a glass coffee table sat a laptop, a spiral notebook, and a text book—Modern Political Theories. The flickering light of a candle cast a small dancing shadow on the back wall. Victoria caught the light aroma of oranges and cloves, reminding her of Christmas.

“Have a seat.” Olivia indicated two chairs, part of a comfortable arrangement of furniture, and plopped down on a couch with plush pillows and a faux fur throw. She folded her legs to her side.

How had this confident woman made Sam think she was afraid? The fact that she’d fooled him gave Victoria reason to be wary.

Rivera scooted forward on the edge of his chair. “We’re here because you might have been the last person to see Todd Meiser alive. You were with him beginning on Thursday night at the Vista View Hotel, correct?”

“Yes. He wanted company, and that’s what I provide.” She batted her eyes at Rivera. “Just company. It’s all quite legal. He needed a calming presence. I know he was killed in his home. I was never there.”

Rivera’s expression remained placid, even Victoria couldn’t read his thoughts. “When did you part ways?”

“I was with him for less than two hours. I came back here after. My roommate can vouch for that. She’s at work right now, but I’ll give you her number.”

Rivera jotted down the contact information for Olivia’s roommate on his pad. “Did you know Todd well?”

“No. Not really.”

“Had you ever met him before?”

Olivia looked down at her bare feet, trailed a pink fingernail across her ankle and under a delicate gold anklet.

“We’re trying to find a killer,” Victoria said. “We’re not here to bust anyone for . . . anything else.”

She lifted her chin, dipping her head back. “I’m just concerned, worried really, that I might know something I shouldn’t know.” She sighed. “But I don’t think so. So—yes, I’ve met him before. A few times. Same place.”

“The Vista View Hotel.”

Olivia set her elbow on the arm of the couch and rested her chin in her hand. “Yes. The one next to the rail road tracks.”

Victoria’s and Rivera’s eyes met. Victoria’s body stiffened. “Isn’t the Vista View near the shopping mall? I don’t think there are any railroad tracks around it.” Her voice took on a new, quiet intensity. “Olivia, is there a chance that you met Todd Meiser at the Sonesta Hotel, not the Vista View?”

“Oh. Yes.” Olivia grimaced and tugged on the silver earring dangling from her ear. “Sorry. I do mean the Sonesta. The one with the big blue sign. It’s not very nice.”

For Victoria, the energy in the room completely changed. She wanted to jump up and pump her fist in the air. It was a challenge to maintain her composure. “Did Todd tell you the name he used to check in?”

Olivia allowed herself a slight smile that didn’t last long. “He used the name Jason Bourne.”

Victoria nodded, but inside she was beaming. One more unknown hotel guest was now accounted for. “At the Sonesta Hotel, did you see anyone speaking to him, or watching him? Anything that seemed unusual or made you uncomfortable?”

“Well, yes, actually, there was something. Todd arrived before me. He planned to meet me at the back entrance and let me in. I was almost at the back door when a woman ran out. She looked angry, although she might have been afraid, it seemed more like anger. And I think she was crying. A man followed right after her. He yelled, ‘Come back here. You don’t understand.’ Something to that effect. Todd saw them too. Before the door closed, and even after, we could hear them fighting behind the hotel.”

“Do you know what they were fighting about? Could you hear them?”

“I could hear that they were upset, but I couldn’t tell you what it was about.”

“And you didn’t call the police?”

Olivia shrugged. “No. It didn’t seem necessary. People argue. Their argument just made its way into the parking lot. Besides, I had business to attend to. I had an exam to study for after. At first, I thought about going to see if she needed help. But she was yelling just as loud as he was. It was awful, but it seemed like a domestic affair. Not anyone else’s business. And it didn’t last long.”

“How long?”

“Oh . . . I remember. A train went by. The train runs so close to that hotel, it literally shakes the walls and blasts its horn the whole time. I don’t know how anyone sleeps there at night. The sound of the train and its horn drowned out the fight. After the train passed, I don’t remember hearing anyone.”

“And you didn’t see the couple again?”

“I did not.”

“Can you describe them?”

“Oh . . . gosh.” Olivia rolled her eyes up to the ceiling then back down, settling her gaze on Rivera. “He was an average guy, a little scruffy, not someone who takes great care of himself. He had dark hair, I think. And she was sort of pale, washed out.”

“What color hair did she have?” Victoria asked.

“Hmm . . . blonde?”

Victoria pushed Olivia’s candle toward the opposite end of the table and set out copies of their sketches. “Does this woman look familiar?”

Olivia set her feet on the ground and scooted forward. “In this picture with her hair down, that could be the same woman I saw. She might have looked like that. But I’m not sure. She rushed by me.”

“Anything else you can think of?”

She shook her head. “Sorry.”

Victoria set out photos of the victims. “Did you see any of these other people?”

Olivia took her time studying the photos. “I’m sorry. I’ve never seen them before.”

“Okay. Do you know if Todd had a girlfriend, particularly one with medium-length or long blonde hair?”

She smiled. “That’s not something I would ask him.”

Victoria and Rivera exchanged glances in a subtle, practiced way to see if either had more questions to ask. Rivera stood up and Victoria followed.

“So, I’m all good. You’re going to call my roommate?”

“Yes. Thank you for your time.” Victoria handed Olivia her business card.

Olivia placed the card on the coffee table and stood up with them. “Todd was nice to me. I hope you find out who killed him. I hope you catch the person who killed all these people.”

So do we, thought Victoria, walking toward the front door.

“Rivera,” Olivia called, her voice soft.

Both agents stopped and turned around.

Olivia dropped her head in a coquettish pose so only her eyes looked up at him from under her long, dark lashes. “That train isn’t the only thing that can shake the walls.”

He smiled. “I bet it isn’t.” Then he turned and walked out the door.

Once outside, Victoria laughed. “Guess she isn’t concerned that you’re with the FBI.”

“Guess not.” A red tint crept over his face.

“Looks like she’s putting herself through college. Whatever she’s doing must pay more than working retail.”

“That’s what they tell themselves, isn’t it?”

Victoria nudged Rivera’s arm. “It appears to be her choice. I like her. And I like that she appreciates you. And if her alibis all check out, it doesn’t look like she is involved in any of our cases.”

Rivera rubbed the back of his neck. “Now we know that all the victims were staying at the same hotel. The Sonesta is the key to all of this. We got off track because Meiser happened to be a witness in the Butler trial. From the very beginning of all this, you’ve been saying his death didn’t look like a hit.”

“Thank you for pointing that out, I’ll take the credit.” She smiled. “Let’s go back there now, to the hotel. I’m surprised Sam didn’t find issues with any of the staff. No criminal records and each of them has an alibi for at least some of the murders.”

“Maybe they’re all in on it together.”

“Hmm. No grievances against the hotel owners. No pending lawsuits. But there has to be something.”

On the way to their car, Victoria opened her bag and felt her keys in an inner pocket. “We’re not far from the office. If you don’t mind stopping there, I’ll get my own car. The hotel is sort of on the way to my place. Then you can just take this car home after. I mean, if we have a chance to go home tonight.”

Rivera nodded as he opened his door. “I don’t think you should go home alone.”

“I know. Agent Lampros was at my house last night. I feel terrible that he had to stay up because of me. I brought him muffins and coffee when I left the house. I hope someone else gets stuck with the job tonight.” Victoria sat and fastened her seat belt. “Oh. I almost forgot. Again. I need to make a quick call.” For the first time, she was anxious about calling Ned. Since she’d interrupted his date, she was worried about what she might hear. She pressed a few buttons on her phone and waited. “Hi. I need you to come by tonight and stay a few hours.”

“Sure thing. Oh. Are we still on for dinner tomorrow?”

The dinner was only to discuss their trip. That’s all it ever was. So why did it seem like everything had changed? “I’m sorry. Can we reschedule the dinner?”

“You have to eat something tomorrow night. I can meet you wherever.”

Victoria sighed. “There’s just a lot going on. I doubt I’m going to be able to go, or that I’m going to be very good company if I can make it.”

“The news says it’s five murders now.”

“Yes. The whole city is working on catching the perpetrator, it’s not just me.” Victoria set her free hand on the door frame, gripping the edge. “Although, my team is supposed to be leading the efforts. I’ll keep you posted. I mean, you’ll know when I’m free because I won’t be begging you to come to my house.”

“It’s what you pay me for.”

“Right. But thank you. How are the new little ones doing?”

“They’re doing fine. One of them is a little wary of the big boys, but they’re holding their own. No worries. Is someone coming to get them soon?”

“I haven’t heard anything yet. To be honest, I forgot. We’ll give them a few days and then I guess I’ll follow up with the family to see what their plan is. Thanks, Ned. I’m very grateful. I’ll talk to you later.”

“Good luck and . . . be careful.”

“I will.”

Rivera wove through the rush hour traffic. “You had a dinner date with your dog walker?”

Victoria slid against the door as Rivera hung a right without slowing the car. “Hey, slow down. Nothings on fire.” She laughed. “I’m not really sure it was a date. And had is the operative word.”

“You have stuff in common with this guy? Besides dogs?”

Victoria shrugged. “I guess that’s what I might have found out. It wasn’t a real date or anything. We had business to discuss. But it probably wasn’t a good idea.”

“Really. Huh.” Rivera turned on the radio and zipped in front of a slower moving car. He grabbed for his gum, dumped a few pieces into his hand, then slapped them into his mouth. “So, taking care of your dogs—is that Ned’s only job?”

“It is now. It’s a lot of work. Especially when I’m out of town. You’ve heard of concierge doctors? Well, he’s like that, except I’m his only client. And it’s not me he’s taking care of.”

“What did he do before you hired him? Do you know?”

Victoria opened her eyes wide and stared at Rivera for several seconds, then laughed. “Of course I know. You think I would let a stranger into my house to take care of the dogs without vetting him every which way and a few more? Jeez. You know me better than to ask that. I did a comprehensive background check.”

“So what did he do?”

“Ned is a veterinarian. He was just a year out of vet school when he moved here. He started his own practice but didn’t have enough clients to make ends meet. He has some hefty school loans. That’s how I managed to get him. Okay, dad?” She sighed. “I’ve got enough people questioning my personal decisions already.”

“Hey, you have a serial killer suddenly very interested in you. Strange notes left on corpses and strange footprints on your property. Your security cameras weren’t working the other night. Time to rethink everyone and everything.”

Victoria lowered her eyes and her voice. “Yeah. Okay. I get it. You’re right.”

Rivera moved his hand toward the center of the car. She thought he was about to reach for her own, but then he dropped it back on the wheel. “I want you to be safe more than I want to be right.”

TWO LOOSE ENDS REMAINED: Jason and Kelly Smith.

They were gone.

I wasn't fast enough.

Beth had their home address. They had seen her close up, not once, but twice. Just like Todd Meiser had seen her inside the hotel. His name hadn't been listed with the other hotel occupants, but she recognized him immediately when she traced his Range Rover's license plate to a registration, then to a photo of him.

First things first. She had to get rid of Horrigan's truck in case they found his body. She turned into the shopping center where she'd first tried to kill the happy-go-lucky singing Smiths. The Walmart parking lot was bustling with cars. She parked the pick-up and hopped on a nearby bus to the airport where she rented a car with the last of her "borrowed" credit cards and fake IDs. She was grateful she had them, but worried about having run out of alternate identities and sources of payment.

She returned to the Vista Hotel. She didn't want to stay there too much longer on Sylvia Malone's newly opened credit card. There was more than one way to end up in prison. But she couldn't go home either. Not with Danny still hounding her.

Inside her hotel room, she pulled a blanket off the closet shelf and wrapped it around her shoulders. The news reports would be starting in a matter of seconds. Plopping onto the pull-out couch, she clicked on the television and found one of the major networks. She bit her lip through a car dealership commercial. A drug commercial for a disease she'd never heard of came next. She chewed on her nails through the long, ridiculous list of side-effects. When the music signaling the news started, she lowered her hand, staring intently at the female newscaster sitting behind the studio desk.

"Breaking news. Another murder committed by someone the police are now calling the Numbers Killer. What are authorities doing to prevent someone else from falling victim? Stay with Channel 14 for the latest."

The other reporter went through his list of what was to come, but Beth tuned him out.

"What? How could they know about my counting? Danny must have told them!"

She jumped up, pacing the length of the room and back. Two, four, six, eight . . . two, four six, eight . . . She grabbed a water bottle off the dresser and gulped from it. The newscaster had sensationalized the murders, like Beth was some crazed killer going after people with no rhyme or reason, and no one was safe. She laughed, quick and sharp. Her amusement didn't last long. Danny had betrayed her. To hell with him. She didn't need him. Had she ever? No!

She needed to turn her new-found notoriety and skills into money. Maybe she should contact Raymond Butler and collect a little reward for her efforts? After all, as she now understood, she had inadvertently done him quite a favor. He owed her. But what did she have to hold over him? The deed was done, it wasn't like she could threaten to bring Meiser back to life if the Butlers didn't pay. Perhaps Butler could offer her a job, before he was carted off to jail. Not everyone could hack into an FBI agents' video camera feeds and shut them down. Not everyone could hack into hotel registries and the DMV, matching hotel guests to their rooms and cars. It might have been relatively simple, if some of them hadn't used fake names. She was pretty amazing and deserved a job with a guaranteed paycheck every week. That would be nice for a change.

The news report returned, jolting Beth back to attention. The tall brunette woman she'd seen earlier on TV spoke from an outside location.

"The violent killing spree that began yesterday morning with Todd Meiser now includes Robert and Anne Cossman, and Arnold Gomez. Channel 14 news just learned that all the victims had numbers written on their foreheads."

Oh. Of course! That's why they're calling me the Numbers Killer. She laughed with relief. Danny hadn't told anyone about her counting compulsion after all.

The camera view drew back, revealing the parking lot where Beth had left Gomez to die.

"Then, just yesterday afternoon, Arnold Gomez, also visiting the area, was murdered here at the Hampshire Apartments, where he was visiting his nephew. Police say the killer wrote the number six on Gomez' forehead, after he was shot. None of the other victims appear to have any connection to Raymond Butler and the trial that starts in just a few days. But the numbers appear to correspond with the order in which the victims were killed."

Hmm. No mention of Horrigan and his ugly fish shirt because she'd forgotten to write something on his head. But wait . . . That was a good thing! They couldn't know it was her that killed him. Grinning, she focused on the news.

"Channel 14 will stay on top of the investigation as authorities track down the killer. If the numbers really do represent the order in which the victims were killed—" The reporter frowned, like she was the one who had to solve these crimes, not Agent Heslin and Agent Rivera, "—where are victims number one and five?"

Victim number one? Beth's knees shook, and the room spun. What's happening to me? She reached for the wall to brace herself. Fear spiked her adrenaline and she desperately wished she wasn't alone. Being alone made her situation so much more frightening. Where was Danny when she needed him? She fought the wave of nausea rising from her stomach, dropping her head into her hands. She managed to lower herself to the floor before she fell unconscious.

The news was still playing when she woke up. Lifting her head off the carpet, she rubbed her forehead. The nausea had passed, but her ears throbbed with the onset of a headache. She dragged her purse off the desk and onto the floor. Removing the gun first, she rummaged through the mess of useless junk in search of aspirin. Where the hell is it? The bottle wasn't there, but her fingers closed around two lint covered pills at the bottom of her bag. Those would have to do. She trudged off to the bathroom to wash them down with water, then returned to the television.

"Channel 14 News has just learned that the Numbers Killer left a threatening note for an FBI agent at the murder scene of Arnold Gomez."

"What?" Beth sat up, gasping. "A threatening note? No. No. No. I would never do that." Her hands flew up to cover her mouth. "I didn't threaten her! How could they think that? I was trying to protect her. I told her to be careful. I told her to watch her back!" She slumped against the wall, tearing at her hair. This was awful! How could she have been so misunderstood?

She had to see Agent Heslin and clear up the terrible misunderstanding. It couldn't wait another second. But how? How could she get to her with those crazy dogs guarding her mansion?

Squatting on the floor next to the coffee table, she woke up her laptop. Waiting on the hotel's internet service was like watching grass grow, but within fifteen minutes she had intercepted the feed going from Agent Heslin's home to the security firm who monitored her videos. This time, instead of shutting them down, she watched.

The house was huge, so on her screen, each live feed was smaller than the size of a postage stamp. Clicking on an image enlarged it. She needed to find where Heslin kept the dogs. She clicked on all the outside views. Finding no fenced kennels or pens, she switched to the interior views. Many of the rooms were almost empty of furniture, but covered with large stuffed squares, giant circles, and bean bag chairs. Some sort of contemporary decorating trend? A room with a sectional couch and a large television had the same squares and circles, but there, almost every stuffed shape had a dog on it. How many beds did those dogs need? Some of the creatures were laying around with their ridiculously long legs sticking straight out like poles, their mouths lolling open. A few were laying half-on and half-off the giant square beds. Some were curled up inside bean bag-looking chairs, their legs tucked beneath them. What a life they had!

Beth enlarged the view of the kitchen and her jaw dropped. What the—? A bolt of anger shot her to full attention. There was a tall man in Heslin's kitchen, opening cabinets and drawers, acting like he was right at home. He had light brown hair and looked like he was in his late twenties, or early thirties. His muscles rippled under his jeans and form-fitting quarter-zip top, one of those silky athletic shirts. From all the pictures Beth had studied of the Heslin family, she would have recognized Victoria's brother, who had blonde hair just like his sister. This was not the brother. "Who the hell is that?" If Rivera was Mr. Sexy, then this guy was Mr. Sexier. But what was he doing in Heslin's house? He didn't belong there. And did Rivera know about him?

Beth quickly searched through the other feeds, clicking like mad to see if Heslin was somewhere else in the house. She didn't find her or anyone else. Unless the agent was in one of the bathrooms, this guy was alone in her house.

She returned to the feed from the kitchen. Mr. Sexier stood against the large, white-marble topped island in the center of the room. He was busy doing something, but Beth couldn't see what because his back shielded her view. She leaned closer to her laptop. Mr. Sexier moved to the side. Syringes lay spread across the counter. What was going on there? One by one, he filled them from a glass bottle. Beth squinted. The front of the bottle had a prescription label, it wasn't something from a store. Whatever he was doing, it was extremely suspicious.

He opened the refrigerator and removed a square, plastic container. Then he called to the dogs. The video has sound! They flew from their beds and surrounded him. He opened the container. Without a trace of hesitation, they gobbled down the food he handed them. The man grabbed the collar of a big dog, striped brown and tan like a tiger, telling the animal he was a good boy. Behind the man's back, his other hand held a syringe. Slowly, he moved his hand toward the dog's thigh. Once there, in one swift movement, he jabbed the dog with the syringe and depressed the plunger.

Beth gasped.

What the hell is he doing? Is he trying to kill Agent Heslin's dogs?

RIVERA PICKED THE SHORT straw on updating Murphy, so Victoria arrived at the Sonesta Hotel before him. She parked her SUV in the back corner of the parking lot, away from the main entrance, to survey the area without being on display herself. From the cooler in her backseat, she grabbed a yogurt and spoon. The yogurt wasn't exactly cold, but it wasn't quite warm yet either, so she went ahead and opened it. She only had a few minutes to finish eating and pull up her video camera feeds to check on her dogs. Before too much time passed, she wanted to be sure there wasn't another "glitch" with the system.

Four of her dogs were in the family room, three of them on dog beds, and one on the couch. All slept soundly. Leo and Bella slept side by side next to the picture window. Victoria tapped the screen to change rooms and found Eddie by himself in the kitchen. With his butt up and his tail wagging, he swatted his toy and then hopped after it. Izzy trotted into the room, her tail wagging like mad, attempting to join in his game.

Victoria smiled, eating her yogurt and watching her happy dogs. A year ago, Izzy was found malnourished and dehydrated, tied to the back of a house in Seville in the blazing sun. Victoria had pictures from when Izzy was first brought to the shelter. The vet had pulled more than fifty bulging ticks off the pup's ears, treated her for mange, worms, and burns from God only knew what. The playful dog with shiny fur romping around her kitchen looked nothing like the despondent animal who had been rescued from a hellish life of neglect and abuse.

Eddie and Izzy froze in unison, ears up, and muscles tensed. After a few seconds of standing frozen like statues, they raced out of the room.

Ned's voice sang out. "Who wants to go for a walk next?"

An unfamiliar pang resonated inside her. She had become used to the concept of Ned being around whenever she needed him. The threat of him being with somebody else bothered her more than she would have thought.

Ned stepped into the entryway carrying leashes and wearing a Vanderbilt zip top and jeans.

The passenger side door opened with a sudden click and the interior lights came on. "I've got the folder with—"

Victoria gasped. The spoon dropped and clattered against the cup holder. Her hand flew to her sidearm.

"Oh, sorry. Didn't know I would startle you." Rivera sat down next to her and pulled the door closed.

She laughed, placing her hand over her chest. "Good thing you're not the perp."

Rivera frowned, watching the image on her phone. "That's Ned?"

"Yes. Jeez, I'm still trembling, here."

"What's he doing?"

"I don't know. I just turned the video on. He was supposed to give the dogs their shots today. Not sure if he remembered."

Rivera reached for her phone. "Can I see him?"

"Sure. You can even hear him." After handing him her phone, she collected her spoon from the floor, wiped it off with a paper towel, and dropped it back into the cooler with the empty yogurt container. She leaned in to see what Rivera was seeing. A smiling Ned attached leashes and spoke to the dogs while they jumped up and down, weaving around him like it was the best day of their lives.

Rivera's expression concealed any emotion.

"Let's get out there before it storms again," Ned said to the dogs. He began singing Thunder by Imagine Dragons, substituting in a few of his own lyrics.

"Here, give me that," Victoria held out her hand. "I feel bad that we're spying on him."

Rivera returned her phone.

"Did I tell you he agreed to go to Spain with me next month?" Victoria shifted in her seat. Her lips were pressed together, she didn't have the heart to smile.

"For another one of those dog group visit things?"

"Yes." She frowned and mimicked his deep raspy voice. "For one of those dog group visits."

"Don't you ever vacation at a resort, like normal rich people? And why Spain? Aren't there plenty of dogs here in the US that you can rescue?"

"Yes. Absolutely. And I do help . . . financially . . . It's just that some breeds really touch your heart. My mother had a thing for greyhounds, and the dogs at these shelters are all suffering, or they were, I mean. At the end of the hunting season, hundreds and hundreds of them are discarded by hunters like they're pieces of garbage. And few will find forever homes if they aren't sent to other countries for adoption." Victoria took one last glance at Ned leashing up her dogs before shutting off her device and pocketing it. "So, what's the plan?"

"Interview the staff again." Rivera placed his hand on the door handle.

"Good idea." Victoria turned away from Rivera. They both opened their doors and got out. "And first, let's take another look around inside."

"In case there are bodies stuffed in the cleaning supply closets . . ."

"At this rate, I wouldn't be surprised." The doors clicked shut and Victoria pressed the key to lock her car. "And I want to know why we didn't know about Gomez staying here until we found the key in his wallet."

They went straight to the front desk to introduce themselves and took down the names of the employees currently working the desk and on the floors. There had to be at least a dozen other detectives and agents working the Numbers Killer case from every angle, but Victoria and Rivera were the only ones at the hotel.

Victoria's phone rang. She glanced at the screen, frowned, and held up a finger. "Sorry. It's Ned. Just give me one minute."

A frown appeared on Rivera's face.

Victoria wandered a few feet away from him to answer her phone. "Hey, Ned. Everything okay?"

"No. Sorry to bother you on the job, but Sasha is acting really strange."

"Sasha?"

"Yeah. Sasha is pacing and panting. I think she's sick and uh, you should take her somewhere. Can you come home now?"

Victoria froze. An icy chill skittered down her back. "Sasha?" Sasha passed away a few months ago from osteosarcoma. Ned administered her chemo for months and eventually put her down while Victoria held her and sobbed. Was he just getting her dogs' names confused? Impossible. He wouldn't forget her name. He knew all her dogs and everything about them. And if one of them was ill or injured—something beyond what he could handle—he was to rush them to the emergency vet hospital. Victoria didn't take any chances with their health.

“Um, okay. I’ll be there soon.” Her voice wavered as the phone went dead on the other end. What was he trying to tell her? Was this code that another one of her dogs had broken a leg due to osteo, and he just didn’t want to deliver the terrible news over the phone? A dull, heaviness crept into her chest. Did he have to put one of the dogs to sleep immediately, and wanted her to come back to say goodbye?

Rivera’s dark eyes met her own. “Everything okay?”

She clamped one hand around her waist. “Um, I don’t know. Look—I’m sorry. I hate to do this, but I have to leave. I’ll be back as soon as I can. Okay?”

He narrowed his eyes, crossing his arms over his chest, and studied her. “What’s going on?”

“I’m really not sure.” Would Ned pull some sort of stunt to get her home because she had cancelled their date? Was this his way of showing her she could make the time? If that was his plan, she would be furious. Beyond furious. But it didn’t seem like something Ned would ever do. No, something terrible had happened to one of her dogs. Already, her heart ached. Her limbs felt numb. She couldn’t bear to consider which one was hurt.

Rivera’s phone buzzed from inside his coat pocket. He slid it out and looked at the screen. “Murphy. I better take it.”

Victoria waved over her shoulder and hurried off. In search of clues, she tapped the icon to view her security cameras and clicked the page with the video feeds.

They were all blank again.

A tendril of terror traveled down her neck and into her toes as her mouth went dry. She picked up her pace and called Ned back. His phone rang until it went to voicemail. She ran the rest of the way to her SUV, got in, and peeled out of her spot.

When she drove past the entrance, Rivera held his hand up and mouthed something. She didn’t stop. She could call him later, once she knew what she was dealing with. At this point, all she could tell him was that something strange was going on at her house. Something that required her immediate attention.

The timing could not have been worse. They were closing in on the killer, had to be. The secret to everything was somewhere locked inside the Sonesta Hotel. She’d come back as soon as she could. She swallowed the lump in her throat and sped down the street, driving 70 in a 50 mile per hour zone.

RIVERA RAN HIS HAND over his head as he watched Victoria's taillights disappear into the night. What had Ned told her that made her spooked? Whatever it was, she hadn't wanted to share it with him.

Rivera did not consider Ned as a competitor—until he saw him on screen. In the past, every time Ned's name came up, he'd pictured a goofy-looking, skinny guy in a big baggy T-shirt and loose pants. Like Shaggy from the Scooby-Doo cartoons, or the hiker who found the Cossmans. The live video proved he'd been way off. The dude was good looking and had the run of her house. Maybe there was something more than their employer and employee relationship. Guess he and Victoria weren't as close as he thought. But when he pushed Ned and his emotions aside, he was even more uncomfortable with Victoria's sudden departure. She had never left work at a critical moment before. So, whatever Ned told her had to be a big deal. Putting that together with the notes she'd received from a killer, and alarm signals went off in his brain.

I should go after her.

Murphy's ranting broke through his thoughts. "Can you hear me?"

"Yeah, boss." Rivera forced himself to unclench his jaw and focus.

"Cops just found Horrigan's truck. Abandoned in a Walmart parking lot. Another dead end."

"Hmm," was all Rivera could think of in response. "I'm at the hotel. I'm going to find out what happened here if it kills me."

"Agent Poloski figured out why Gomez paid cash for his hotel room and checked in under a false name. His stuff is still in his room, by the way. I thought it might be our biggest clue yet, that Gomez knew someone was after him. But Poloski discovered that Gomez owes money to his ex and this follows a trend of not wanting her to know he had money for a pseudo-vacation and a hotel."

"Jeez. Okay. Let me know if he finds out there's more to it." Rivera ended the call and started walking back to the hotel with the folder of photos and sketches under his arm, cracking his knuckles. He stopped, turned toward his car in the parking lot, took a few steps, then turned again. With a loud, heavy sigh, he walked inside to the center of the three-story lobby and looked up at the upper floors. He closed his eyes and took a deep breath, taking in the faint smell of must, the muted sounds of shuffling feet, and a few murmurs coming from behind the reception desk. He opened his eyes. Behind the registration desk stood an overweight young lady in her early twenties wearing glasses. Her name tag said Betty. Next to her stood a bearded man who looked slightly older, also wearing a black blazer with black pants. The man kept his focus on something behind the counter. Betty tucked a stray hair behind her ear and smiled at him. "Hi. You checking in?"

Rivera held up his badge. "FBI."

"Oh. Again." She blinked and squared her shoulders. The male worker beside her straightened up and leaned forward against the desk. "I'm the manager on duty. Can I help you?"

"Aren't you supposed to wear a name tag?"

"Can't find it today. My name is Alex."

"Where can we speak privately, Alex?"

Alex lifted his hand toward the door behind the desk. "Come this way." He raised a movable piece in the side of the counter, so Rivera could walk through.

“I need you to come, too,” Rivera told Betty. “I know you’ve already spoken to detectives, so I apologize for putting you through this again, as you say, but it’s important.”

Alex nodded. “Sure.”

Rivera glanced out through the office window toward the front desk. “Have you seen anyone suspicious here? Any unusual behaviors that stick out these past few days?”

Betty pushed on the arm of her glasses. “We already told the detectives, and the agents, but there was one guy who left a few days ago.”

“The one who wanted a specific room number, right?” Alex grinned. “Said he knew it was ridiculous but just to ‘work with him.’ It was just . . . strange.”

“Yes. That was him.” Betty’s eyes had lit up with excitement. Or maybe she was just nervous about the investigation being focused on her place of employment. “He was wearing a baseball cap, can’t remember what it said now, but I’m pretty sure he was wearing a cap. He’s gone now, but he never checked out. Left a few days earlier than he had the room reserved for. I heard that the credit card he used wasn’t his. It was some sort of identity theft thing. But you know what? I’m just remembering this—I’m pretty sure he asked for two key cards.”

Two? The guy posing as Thomas Wilson and whoever he was with—were they the couple Olivia saw running out the back door? Was his companion the mystery killer? Or did they have absolutely nothing to do with the murders? Rivera opened his folder and showed Alex and Betty the pictures of their killer compiled by the police artists. “Have you seen this woman?”

Betty picked up the photo and drew it closer to face. “No, I don’t think so.”

Rivera pressed his lips together and silently sighed. Just because the staff hadn’t seen her, didn’t mean she hadn’t been there. He trusted Olivia and what she claimed to have seen. Her “that might be her” response to the Smith’s sketches was the most hopeful testimony they had so far.

He scanned the memos hung on a bulletin board next to his head. “Any kind of get together or meeting being held here?”

Betty shrugged. Alex shook his head.

The agent picked up the pictures and put them back in his folder. “A sales opportunity? A reunion of any kind? A hiking or fishing club?” None of the things he mentioned would be a fit for all the victims, but there had to be some commonality that hadn’t occurred to them yet.

“Not that I know of. And I’ve worked every day this week.” Alex’s eyes flashed toward the door, then back to Rivera. “We’re more likely to have guests who pay with cash and don’t want anyone to know they’re here than we are to have business meetings, if you get my drift. This place isn’t . . . you know what I mean, don’t you?”

“I understand. I’ve got some pictures for you.” Rivera opened his folder and set down the same photos he’d shown to Olivia earlier. “Did you see any of these people together? Talking? Coming or going together?”

Betty stared, covering her mouth with her hand. “I recognize some of them as the people who were killed.”

Rivera saw the fear in her eyes. The hotel’s guests were more at risk than the witnesses for the Butler case. The police should be guarding them instead. But none of the victims had been killed at the hotel. Should the hotel close until the killer was apprehended? The media didn’t know about the connection yet, but surely once the word spread about the victims’ sole connection, everyone would flee and cancel reservations as quickly as they could. Once word got out, the hotel wouldn’t be able to give rooms away. “Can you get me the names of everyone staying here for the past four days, with their room numbers?”

“Yes. We’ve already done that for the FBI and the police, like five . . .”

“I’d like to see it again.”

“It will just take a few minutes.” Alex shook the mouse on a nearby computer and woke it up.

Rivera left the office and walked to the far corner of the lobby where he had a view of the entire space. He called Victoria. There was no answer.

Alex returned and presented Rivera with several printed pages. The agent set them down on a coffee table. He jotted down the names and room numbers of the victims in order of their deaths. He also wrote down the Smiths’ names, since it was possible, even likely, they had twice been targeted and followed.

Meiser, aka Jason Bourne: room 267.

Cossmans: room 383.

Gomez, aka Jim Johnson: room 145.

Horrigan: room 125.

Smiths: room 123.

And the still missing Thomas Wilson: room 332.

The hotel employees hovered nearby, ready for another request. Rivera stared at the information and rubbed his chin. The victims’ rooms weren’t in consecutive order, nor were they even on the same floor. He handed Betty his list. “I’ll need access to these six rooms.”

“Sure. Just . . . I’ll be right back.” She pivoted around and returned to the office.

Five minutes later, carrying room keys in six different labeled sleeves, Rivera headed to the room occupied by the Smiths. It had already been cleaned and made ready for the next occupants. He didn’t expect to find anything there, but he slipped on gloves and searched every corner, shelf, and drawer for possible answers. His eyes traveled the room one last time searching for anything that didn’t belong. He moved the drapes aside and peered out the window into the dark woods. Beyond a large berm, twisted branches bent and straightened in the wind.

A glance at the bedside table clock told him Victoria should have made it to her house by now.

He walked down the hall, poked through Horrigan’s belongings, and found nothing of interest. He took the stairs to the second floor and the room Meiser and Olivia had used. The room had already been cleaned, occupied, and cleaned again. But in room 225, Gomez’s belongings were still inside. Again, nothing in the room struck Rivera as significant.

On the third floor, in room 383, the Cossmans’ stuff had been cleared away since his last visit with Victoria. By request of the authorities, the hotel had been told not to give the room to any new customers yet. Rivera took another quick look. He didn’t expect to spot anything new, and he was right.

Thomas Wilson’s room, 332, had also been cleaned before the hotel had been instructed to leave it as is.

Except for room 332, each of the other rooms shared the same layout and the same view on one side of the building. The only other common thread between all was being in close proximity to each other between three floors of the Sonesta Hotel last Friday night. The same night Olivia saw the mystery couple fighting.

What are we missing?

Rivera parted the curtains and stared outside toward the woods again. Nice enough as a backdrop, if you didn’t look too closely. Not a forest exactly, but enough trees for teens to hide in and guzzle beers. A place to toss trash into for those too lazy to make the trek to the dumpster. Big enough for small creatures, the ones who occasionally ventured out onto the highway for an unplanned game of Russian roulette. From his current angle, he spotted the start of a narrow trail, snaking haphazardly through overhanging limbs.

Removing his gloves, he checked his phone again for a message from Victoria. Doing something was better than doing nothing.

He walked down to the first floor and left the hotel through the backdoor. Outside, a dampness hung heavy in the cold air, descending with the gloom as if it meant to creep into every corner, every crevice. He crossed the parking lot and stopped somewhere between the building and the edge of the woods. Looking back at the hotel, he scanned the roof and the exterior walls. He located the rooms he'd just explored by their dark, unlit windows. Had all the victims seen something behind the hotel that put them in danger? After a few seconds of staring, he pivoted to face the woods. He'd have a quick check, and if Victoria still hadn't called him back, he was heading to her house.

Intermittent gusts of wind cut through his sports coat. A faint, unpleasant smell wafted from somewhere close by. A dead squirrel maybe—the little creatures didn't only die on the highway. He rubbed his neck. Something about the woods bothered him.

He scanned the edge, where the woods met the patchy grass, found the trail opening, and headed in. Tall, wet weeds slid against his pants. With each step deeper into the canopy of tangled trees and fallen branches, the smell grew stronger and more repulsive. Surprising that the hotel staff hadn't received a request to do something about it yet. Or maybe they had.

The swishing of sodden, fallen leaves accompanied his steps. It took stumbling over a bumpy root for him to get with it and turn on his phone's flashlight. Broken foliage indicated someone or something else much larger than a raccoon or possum had been through recently. His heart beat faster as he stepped slowly, alert for anything unusual.

The electric whoosh and the clickety-clack of an approaching train cut through the silence. The horn blasted, the noise steadily building to a roaring crescendo. Olivia's claim that the train blocked out all other noise rang true. He took another step forward. A metal can crunched under his foot. A few more yards ahead, a piece of white fabric floated above the ground, glowing like a ghostly apparition in the small circle of light emanating from his phone. Rivera peered toward the fabric. The smell was strong. A few steps closer and the outline of a torso became visible under the white fabric. A man with pale bloated skin and dark hair was lying face up. A single word covered his forehead. Not written in black ink, but in deep pink strokes of color. Lipstick.

Rivera edged closer, struggling to decipher the letters. B. E. T. R. He couldn't make out the rest. He looked away, cleared his head of assumptions, and tried again.

Betrayer.

He'd found victim number one.

THE TIME FOR MEDICAL attention had long passed. The man had been dead for several days. If the smell wasn't enough of a giveaway, the damage from scavengers—tiny missing chunks of flesh—made it certain. Rivera pulled a pair of gloves from his pocket and crouched down, disturbing as little as possible around him. The man had been shot at least twice. Black stains circled his collar bone, stomach area, and the grass and leaves around him. He had died right there in the woods. Rivera put the gloves on and searched the dead man's pockets for identification. He found a wallet with a license inside. The name on it meant nothing to him.

The train had passed, but the wind was starting to howl. He called the medical examiner's office and Rebecca answered.

"It's Rivera. I found another gunshot victim."

"Hello, Rivera. Where did you find him?"

"Sonesta Hotel. Can you come out?" He put Rebecca on speaker and moved his flashlight beam slowly over the ground, looking for shell casings or other evidence.

"It just so happens that I can, for you. I can be there almost immediately." The sound of movement and metal clinking came through the phone, like Rebecca was putting away her tools.

"You know where it is?"

"Yes, I do."

"Good. Drive around the back. Look for the dumpster. I'll meet you there." He glanced at the time and at his messages. Still no word from Victoria.

"Hold tight. I just have to clean up here and grab my bag. Then I'll be on my way."

"Not sure what you'll find. He's been there awhile and with the rain . . . It's starting again now. Sounds like a storm coming."

"Whatever there is to see, I'll do my best with it. I'm also good at my job." She chuckled. "I'll call Forensics on my way."

"Thanks, Rebecca."

The rain was just a cold drizzle, but the wind was cold and biting when Rivera called Murphy to give him an update.

Murphy huffed into the phone. "Why the hell didn't anyone find that body before?"

"Don't know, boss."

"I can't come out there. I'm up to my neck in this other thing. I'll call the Chief of Police, so he doesn't feel left out. Glad Rebecca and forensics will get there first."

On the verge of shivering, Rivera called Victoria next. Still no answer. She'd always answered his calls before, no matter what she was doing, even when she was out walking her dogs. Once she'd even picked up in the middle of taking a shower. He left a message asking her to call him immediately and told her he had found another body. Victim number one. He bit into his lower lip, his concern for Victoria escalating; his bad feeling about her situation growing worse. He had to wait for Rebecca to arrive. But then he was getting in his car and driving straight to Victoria's house.

His call to Sam went to voicemail. He left a message with the victim's name. "I'm going to text you an image of his license. Tell me anything you can about him." He ended the call and sent Sully a text, then read case updates in his email until the ME's familiar white van appeared. The drizzle changed into a light but steady shower as a young man stepped down from the driver's side and Rebecca emerged on the passenger side.

"Over here." Rivera waved from the edge of the woods. He was pleased Rebecca brought someone with her. He didn't intend to wait until she was finished, but also wouldn't have felt right about leaving her alone.

"What have we got?" Rebecca carried a bag of data collection tools. Her assistant walked behind her carrying an umbrella and lighting equipment.

Rivera wiped water from his forehead with the back of his hand. "Hey, Rebecca. Hi—"

"Eric. I'm an assistant. Just started last week."

"Hi, Eric. You got here fast." Rivera walked toward the path. "The vic is back here. He's been dead a few days."

"We hustled to get here before the rest of the cavalry arrives and tramples the scene. You think this one is also a victim of the Numbers Killer?" Rebecca asked.

"I'm sure." Rivera lifted a branch to avoid getting hit in the face.

"I hope he's the key to stopping the killer." Rebecca ducked under the branch.

"So do I." Rivera led the way to the body, staying off the path and walking right through the brush to preserve evidence. "There he is."

Rebecca followed Rivera's gaze to the corpse. "I smell him already. He's dead. You got that part right."

Eric set up the lights while Rebecca removed items from her bag. "You need a hat to keep the rain out of your eyes," Rebecca said, talking to Rivera but studying the scene before her. "I've got an extra one in the van you can have."

"I can't stay." Rivera glanced over his shoulder toward the parking lot. "Unless you need me for something specific."

Rebecca chuckled. "Nothing I need you for here." She glanced at him sideways. "Everything okay?"

"Yeah." Rivera rocked back on his heels. "I've got to go check on . . . a situation. I'll call and either meet you back here or at your office."

"Okay. No problem. Forensics is on their way. I'll give you a personal update as soon as I'm done. And good luck with your situation."

Rivera raced through the rain to his car, threw open the door, and sped out of the hotel parking lot with the rain battering his roof.

FOR THE LAST FEW MILES to Agent Heslin's house, Beth drove her rental behind a small red car. Large magnets advertising Farm Fresh Meals decorated the back and sides. The car's brake lights came on as it approached the large iron gates. It stopped in Heslin's driveway. Beth pulled up alongside it, hopped out of her sedan, and walked up to the driver's window. "Hi. You're delivering?"

"Yes." The woman smiled sheepishly. "A little late. I got behind."

"I'll take that for you. I'm a friend of Agent—a friend of Victoria's. I'm going up to the house."

"Oh, okay. Are you sure?"

"Of course I'm sure." Beth forced a smile.

"All right. That will help. I'll get the bag." She removed it from the trunk. "Thanks."

"You're welcome." Beth maintained her fake smile. Now drive away.

She returned to her rental and waved the other woman away. Once the red car had disappeared down the road, she drove past the entrance and parked around a bend on the side of the road, where the car wouldn't be seen by anyone entering at the front gate. She dropped her gun in the delivery bag, hustled back to the gate, and pressed the buttons to announce her presence. "Hi. I have the—" Oh crap. What is it called? She glanced down at the bag. "The Farm Fresh Meals delivery for Victoria Heslin."

"Kristen?" said a deep, masculine voice. Figured Mr. Sexier would sound like that.

"No. Kristen is sick today. This is Beth. Are you going to open the gate? Food is getting cold." Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve . . .

"The food is supposed to be cold."

"Oh. Fine. No one told me what's inside." Two, four, six, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen . . . "I have other deliveries to make." She swallowed hard, her mouth dry.

The gate inched open, swinging in a slow arc across the fancy pavers. Yes! I'm in! Beth hurried forward carrying the bag. She didn't know where the delivery people usually took the bag of food and she didn't care. Somehow, she would get past the guard dogs. Perhaps Mr. Sexier really had killed them today and she had nothing to worry about. Although what would that make him? Someone to watch out for, at the least. She walked around to the shadowy area at the back of the house. She'd just set foot on the edge of the stone patio when the dogs came rushing out, barking.

"Damn! No! Stay back! Bad dogs!" With her heart pounding and fear threatening to paralyze her muscles, she grabbed her gun from the bag. She violently shook the bag upside down, dumping its contents to the ground. Kicking at one of the boxes, she sent it flying up into the air, scattering roasted vegetables around the patio.

The dogs immediately forgot about her. They scarfed up the food like live vacuum cleaners. All except for the two smaller mutts who didn't really fit in with the others. Something about them was familiar. They stood together, away from the rest of the pack, barking, and snarling at Beth like they had their own set of rules.

Sweating and breathing hard, Beth yanked the tops off two other boxes of food and tossed their contents away from the house. The dogs scrambled after it.

With her gun cocked in front of her chest, and not taking her eyes off the animals, she hurried away. Grabbing the back door—please be unlocked!—she swung it silently open, jumped inside, and pulled it shut behind her. She slumped her back against the tall windows. On the other side of the glass, the dogs were eating and sniffing their noses over the ground. She sighed with relief. They were out and she was in.

She took a few quiet steps across the floor. Nothing creaked or groaned. Of course it didn't. Everything in the fancy house looked perfect, but not that it mattered, the dogs had already made enough of a racket. She stopped in the kitchen to admire the room, her mouth hanging open. The space was big and open but warm and inviting at the same time. Beautiful wood floors gleamed, and stately marble covered the counters. The high-tech stainless appliances—a computer in the fridge?—looked like something from a future decade. The tiny video feed images hadn't done it justice. Did it get any better than this? Actually—yeah- same set up but without the faint, lingering smell of dogs. Still - just wow! And if what Beth suspected was true, Heslin didn't deserve to live there.

A framed picture hung on the wall—the same family Beth saw online. Except in this photo, they were relaxed and laughing instead of formal and posed. She was reaching to touch it when an angry voice blasted through the silence from behind her.

“Who are you?”

She jerked around to see Mr. Sexier, a towering presence with his arms crossed.

She lifted her gun, aiming it at his chest. His eyes grew wide. He took several steps back.

Beth swallowed and cleared her throat with a sharp cough. “Listen, Mr. Sexier, I've killed people, and I won't hesitate to do it again. Do what I say, and don't you dare try to trick me.”

“Ahh, yes ma'am. What is it you want?”

“Ma'am? What the—? I'm not an old lady!” She forced her anger out through her stare.

“I know.” He opened his palms toward the ceiling. “I was just being polite.”

Beth shook the gun. “First, I want to know who you are and what you're doing here.”

“You want to know what I'm doing here? Shouldn't—”

Beth gritted her teeth and screamed. “Answer my question!”

“I'm Ned McCallister. I take care of the owner's dogs.” He looked past her, out the glass door. “And since you dumped dinner on the ground, looks like I'm going to be her chef tonight as well.”

Beth sneered. “Glad you can find humor in this situation. But let me tell you something, there's nothing funny about it. And it didn't look like you were taking care of them today. Looked like you were trying to kill them.”

“Kill them? Why would you think—and how would you know anyway? Were you watching me?”

“Since I'm the one holding the gun, you don't really get to ask questions.” She scanned the kitchen and gestured toward the leather bar chairs. “Go sit down on that chair thing over there.”

The dogs swarmed back into the house, a caravan of twisting and turning, sniffing and snorting, hyper creatures.

Beth jumped back. “What the hell?”

“Dog door.” Ned tilted his head toward a giant rectangular hole in the wall.

“Get them out of here right now. Get them out!” She kept the gun pointed on him. “Or I'll finish off what you started today.”

“What I started?” He walked toward one of the doors leading out of the kitchen. “Come on, dogs. This way. Come on.”

Beth followed close behind, keeping his body in the range of what she could hit without missing. “Don't try anything.”

The dogs followed him. He shut the door and turned around to face her. “What's going on?”

“That’s exactly what I’m here to find out. But not without Agent Heslin. Call her and tell her to come here.”

“Tell her to walk into a potential ambush? I’m not doing that.”

Now what? Without taking her eyes off him, she paced the floor. “Listen, Ned. You might be so stupid and brave that you’re willing to sacrifice your life so your girlfriend doesn’t get hurt, but are you willing to sacrifice one of her dogs? Seems to me she really cares about them. What would she think if all her dogs died because you wouldn’t cooperate? Guess she wouldn’t need you anymore if that happened. In fact, maybe that’s a great idea. Maybe that’s what’s best for everyone. If I kill them all now, you can go before you’ve ruined Heslin’s whole relationship with Rivera.”

“Wait. Calm down. There’s no reason to hurt the dogs. And I really have no idea what you’re talking about.” Ned shook his head.

“Don’t look at me like I’m stupid. Make the call!”

Frowning, Ned reached for his phone on the counter.

“Wait! Let those dogs back in.”

“Now you want them back in?”

“Just let them in! Some of them.”

Ned opened the door and called to the dogs. They all rushed in. Beth took a step back, cringing at their exuberance. “Not all of them!”

“Oops,” he said, not sounding one bit sorry that he hadn’t done exactly what she told him to do.

Beth shifted the gun’s aim to the pack of dogs bouncing and leaping around Ned. “Now call Agent Heslin and tell her to come home because one of the dogs is hurt and you need her help. Do not say anything else. Do not tell her I’m here. Do not mention anything about a gun. One wrong word and I will start shooting these dogs. I will. I really, really will. Is that understood?”

Ned’s face hardened. He moved his gaze over the dogs. They were all looking up at him like he was royalty, although they occasionally eyed Beth in a way that bothered her immensely. The two smaller ones resumed snarling at her.

Ned glared at Beth as he picked up his phone.

• • • •

AFTER THIRTY MINUTES, Beth’s arms ached with exhaustion, tired from holding the gun raised for so long. “Where is she?”

“She said she was coming.” Ned sighed. A big white dog rested its head on Ned’s lap. Ned stroked its neck. “You know she’s a federal agent, right?”

“Of course I know that. Where was she when you talked to her?”

“I already told you. I have no idea.”

Through the floor to ceiling windows, a bolt of lightning illuminated the sky in shades of deep purple. With a backdrop of ghostly black branches, shadows moved around the patio. Beth wasn’t sure if there was really something out there, or if it was just an illusion. In the corner of the kitchen, the two little dogs hadn’t stopped barking and snarling since she arrived. “Shut up, shut up, shut up,” she hissed at them. Their yapping only grew louder. “What the hell is their problem? Why are they doing that to me?”

Ned shrugged. “They’ve been nothing but friendly and submissive, until you came along.”

With no warning, all the big dogs jumped up and ran toward the back door.

“Why did they do that?” Beth kept her finger on the trigger, lest Ned forget who was in charge.

The backdoor opened with a soft, almost undiscernible crick. The dogs' panting and huffing escalated. A repeated slapping noise echoed into the room. Someone was moving slowly toward the kitchen.

"Ned?" came a female voice from the entry way. Agent Heslin.

"Finally," Beth whispered. She gestured to Ned with her gun. "Stand up slowly and turn around." She twirled her hand to get him going, keeping enough distance so that he couldn't grab the gun, but close enough that she could still shoot him without missing. When he was facing the entry, she stood behind him, pressing the gun into the back of his neck. "Tell her you're in here."

"Don't come in here," Ned shouted.

"That's not—damn it!" Beth whipped the back of his knee with the gun.

Ned groaned. His knees buckled from the blow.

"Get up." Beth grabbed his T-shirt, peering around him, suddenly nervous about catching her first real-life glimpse of the FBI agent. "You're going to be sorry if you don't do what I tell you." She cocked her weapon. "And don't you worry about Heslin. She can take care of herself. Let's just hope she'll tell me the truth. I need to hear what she has to say."

Heslin crept around the corner, her gun stretched out in front of her, surrounded by all the dogs except the two littlest, meanest ones. Kudos to the agent for being so calm and well prepared. But what had Beth expected? Victoria Heslin was a real agent. She'd had actual training.

"What did you tell her, Ned?" Beth poked his shoulder with the muzzle. "How did she know I was here?"

"Because she's good at her job. And you better listen to her." He shifted his weight to one leg, favoring the one Beth hit.

Beth huffed. "Aren't you a brave man for someone who could have their brains blown out at any second. How many warnings do you need?"

"I'm a Federal Agent. Drop your gun. Let him go and we can talk." It was the same voice from the news interviews. And the agent was even prettier and more polished in person.

Beth gripped her gun tighter. "Oh, I know exactly who you are. But do you know who I am?"

"I'm not sure that I do, but I'd like to know. Put your gun down so we can talk." Heslin took a few steps forward.

"I'm the one who tried to warn you. I told you to watch your back. I was protecting you." Beth angled her body sideways, making herself as small as possible behind Ned's body, keeping the muzzle of her gun on his back. "You never know who you can trust, and who wants you dead. But little did I know that it was you who couldn't be trusted."

"I can be trusted." Heslin came closer. "Put the gun down."

She looked so calm and yet so serious. How did she do it? Beth squared her shoulders and leaned into Ned's body. She was completely shielded. "I want the truth from you, Agent Heslin. Only the truth."

"You've got it, as soon as you put the gun down. Whatever it is you need to know, I'll tell you. Only the truth. What's your name?"

Beth had to admire the agent's intense focus. No freaking out. She acted like they were having a normal conversation. Well, if that's how it was done, Beth could do the same. "I'm not going to let go of my gun because I don't know who deserves to live yet. Maybe Ned does, maybe he doesn't. You see, I thought we could be friends, Heslin. Now, well, I just hope you aren't about to disappoint everyone. It's not fair to Agent Rivera. And I won't let him suffer."

"Rivera isn't suffering. Rivera and I are colleagues. Nothing more."

“Oh, really? Is that what you want me to believe now? Don’t patronize me. Do you think I’m that stupid? Do you?” I’m shouting. I need to calm down, not lose my cool. She took a deep breath. “I need to know who this man is, and what’s he doing here at your house. But first, make those dogs shut up.”

Heslin didn’t respond. She moved slowly forward, her progress so slight, Beth wouldn’t have noticed if she wasn’t so astute. One step, two steps, three steps, four . . . “Stop right there. Don’t come any closer or I will kill this man. I swear to it, I will blow his brains out just like I did with Meiser and the Cossmans and the rest of them. Where is your partner?”

Heslin’s eyes flickered away from Beth’s for a nanosecond to look at Ned.

“He’s out trying to catch the Numbers Killer, right? He is, isn’t he?” Beth snorted. “How about that. Well, he’s in the wrong place.”

The agent’s phone rang from inside her coat pocket. She ignored it.

Beth let go of the gun with one hand to wipe her sweaty palm on her pants. “So—who is he?”

“His name is Ned. He’s a vet. He takes care of my dogs.”

“Ha! A vet? At least your stories line up, but I’m not sure if I believe them. So, let’s say your GQ model boy-toy really is your dog walker and a vet . . .” She trailed the butt of her gun up Ned’s back between his shoulders until it was pressing against the back of his neck.

“He is.” The agent’s gaze didn’t waver.

“Does Rivera even know about him? I wonder how he feels about you hiring someone so handsome? I don’t think he likes it much. Now he always has to wonder. Why would you do that to him?”

Victoria didn’t respond.

“I’ve never even met Rivera,” Ned said, sounding exasperated instead of terrified, which made Beth very angry. “I think I’d have met him here if they were a couple. Don’t you?”

“Shut your mouth.” Beth snarled. “You’re the cause of all this. You don’t belong here, and I know what you’re planning. Don’t think I’m going to believe anything you have to say about Rivera.”

Heslin took a step closer.

Why isn’t she putting down her gun? Doesn’t she care that Ned could get killed right in front of her? What do I have to do to make her cooperate? She lowered her gaze. All the dogs were lined up in front of Heslin, staring at Beth. Their skinny, half-starved muscular bodies crept her out. And the little ones were still doing all they could to drive her off the edge. Sharp intermittent yaps, coming at her in odd numbers, like screeching fingernails on a blackboard. She tried to find a pattern, a way to add the barks together in a rhythm that ended up even. They were fraying her nerves with their yapping, yapping, yapping.

From somewhere beyond the kitchen, she heard the voice she did not need to hear. Not now. Oh, God. Not now!

“You’re losing it, Beth.” Danny laughed. “You’re counting, aren’t you? I know you are. Better drop the gun. You’re no match for her.”

Beth cringed. She didn’t know how he’d gotten there, but it was just like Danny to show up right when she was starting to really stress out. She gritted her teeth. He was trying to mess with her confidence, like always. Wouldn’t he just love to see me fail.

“Agent Heslin is not going to put her gun down, Beth. FBI agents don’t do that. You’re the one who needs to do what she says.” Danny’s tone was mocking, like he was enjoying her anguish.

“Get out of here,” hissed Beth through clenched teeth. “I mean it. I do not need you here right now.”

“You want us to leave?” Heslin still sounded calm, like everything happening in the kitchen was normal. Like Beth was no big threat.

“I’m not talking to you.” Beth shot daggers through her eyes at Heslin.

“She’s going to beat you, Beth. You’re going to jail,” Danny said.

From behind Ned, Beth cocked her head toward Danny’s voice. “Get out! I don’t need you. I never have. You’ve ruined everything, and I know what you were planning! You thought I’d get caught, didn’t you? That’s why you wanted me to kill them.”

“I don’t know what you mean,” Heslin said. “But drop the gun and we’ll talk about it. You can explain everything. I’m a very good listener.”

“Listen to the lovely, calm agent and drop your gun, Beth,” Danny said. “I’m damn sure she has more experience than you, in spite of your little killing spree this weekend.”

Beth grimaced, her face contorting with rising anger. “Shut up, Danny! Just get out of here! I’ll never trust you again. Never!”

Victoria and Ned exchanged glances. “With whom are you speaking?” Victoria asked.

The agent’s snooty arrangement of words sparked a flame of anger inside Beth. What the hell?

“Do you think I’m someone named Danny?” Ned’s voice had the bite of being placating. There was an edge of condescension, not just fear. He thinks he’s better than me.

“He’s asking who you’re talking to, Beth. Are you gonna tell him?” Danny’s voice rose. “He feels bad for you. He thinks you’re crazy. Can’t you hear it in his tone? He thinks you’re a nut case who hears voices.”

“Go back outside!” Beth shouted.

Victoria moved her eyes slightly to the right, just over Beth’s shoulder.

“Is there someone with you?” Victoria’s tone was even calmer now. She spoke as if she was consoling a child.

Why were they acting so strangely now that Danny was here? Was he hiding behind something so they couldn’t see him? She didn’t dare risk turning around to look. She was not going to take her eyes off the agent for a second. Were they trying to trick her? Of course they were. Everyone was out to trick her. It was Beth against the world. Always had been. Well, she wasn’t going to fall for it. Not for a second.

The little dogs kept barking. Barking and barking at the top of their stupid, puny lungs. Beth pressed her lips together so tight her teeth dug into her lips. “I’m going to kill those dogs if they don’t shut up.”

Victoria’s lips quivered, but her voice remained steady. The gun didn’t waver. “If you hurt one of those dogs, I will shoot you. So that’s your decision to make. I hope you do the right thing and choose wisely.”

Beth laughed, a high-pitched frightening sound that surprised her. “But you don’t mind if I shoot your boy-toy?”

A muffled sneeze startled Beth. She stepped backward, pulling Ned with her. “Who’s there?”

No one answered.

“Danny? Is that you? For once in your life, help me out for a change. Go outside and tell me what’s going on.”

Rivera entered, his gun also drawn in front of him.

Beth laughed again. She sounded unhinged, even to her own ears. “Oh, now it’s really going to get interesting.”

“Ma’am, please set the gun down and let’s talk.” Rivera spoke calmly, politely. He kept his eyes locked on hers. “You’re outnumbered. If you shoot at any of us, you will die. We don’t want you to die. We want to hear about what you did and why you did it.”

“I’m here for you, Agent Rivera. You!” pleaded Beth. “I know how much you love her! I’ve seen it with my own eyes. I’m here to warn you that you can’t trust her.”

“I appreciate that, Elizabeth.” Rivera took a step closer. “And I want to hear your advice, but it’s hard to talk when we’re aiming weapons—”

“How did you know my name?” Beth shouted.

“You’re famous now. Really.” Rivera’s nose twitched, his face contorted, and he sneezed but went on as if it never happened. “I want to hear what you did, and why you did it. Everyone does.”

“You know what I did, then. I killed all of them who saw me. Almost all of them. Jason and Kelly Smith got away. But not for long. And that Butler guy had nothing to do with any of it.”

“We know. We know it was all you,” Rivera said, as if she had done something wonderful. But did he really appreciate what she’d done, that she’d had the strength to do it all by herself, identifying them and tracking them down, or was he placating her so he could put her in jail?

“You killed Todd Meiser, the Cossmans, Steve Horrigan, and Arnold Gomez?” Agent Heslin asked.

“Yes. All of them. By myself.”

“No wonder their dogs despise you,” Ned muttered.

“What was it they saw you do?” Heslin was still watching Beth closely.

Beth lowered her gaze for a second, but the gun against Ned’s back didn’t waver. “I—I had to do it. Danny said they saw me.”

“Who is Danny?” Heslin asked.

“Tell her who I am,” Danny shouted. “Tell her what you did.”

Beth’s hands were cramping around the gun. She’d been holding it in a death grip since Heslin came in. “You said they saw me!”

Danny laughed and slapped his leg. “That’s not what I mean, and you know it. And you really are the stupidest woman on this earth. No one saw you! You killed them because I told you to. No other reason. You didn’t want to go to jail. Guess you really wanted to do it, didn’t you? You wanted to know what it was like to have the power.”

“That’s not true! The first one, Todd Meiser—before I killed him, he begged me—said he wouldn’t tell what he saw if I let him live.”

“He was about to testify against the mob, Beth. Surely, with all your insane counting, you can put two and two together. Or can’t you?”

“Who is Danny?” Victoria asked again.

“You want to know who he is? You want to know who Danny is?” Beth screamed. Her face contorted in anguish. “He’s my worthless cheating husband. But why don’t you ask him who he is for yourself.” She laughed, a high-pitched crazy sound. “I’d love to hear what he has to say.”

“We can’t ask him.” Rivera edged toward her. “I found your husband, Elizabeth. I found him in the woods behind the Sonesta Hotel.”

Something snapped inside Beth. Again. And this time, she felt it happen. A giant dam broke inside her mind, spewing forth a torrent of filthy memories. An ache spread through her chest, her lungs, her throat. The truth left her shocked and gasping, with nowhere to hide from it, no way to avoid the drenching in pure heart-breaking nastiness.

LAST FRIDAY NIGHT. That's when it all happened. Just four days ago, but it seemed like ages. Beth had been innocent and stupid. Well, maybe not innocent, but certainly unaware.

She and Danny hadn't talked much during the long drive to Virginia. Danny said he was tired. He slept most of the way while Beth drove. They checked into the Sonesta Hotel long after sundown. He went to the front desk to check them in, since they were using Thomas somebody or other's credit card. Once they had their keys, they drove the car around to one of the side doors and went in with their stuff. There was nothing special about the hotel, but their room was clean, with windows offering a view of the woods. Beth gazed out. In the varied degrees of blackness and shadow, it was nice enough, but barely.

Danny yanked the curtains closed. He stepped on the back of his shoes to pull them off and tossed them into the center of the room. He plopped himself back on the bed like he wasn't going anywhere for a while. "Damn!" He lifted his head off the pillow, his voice taking on the edge of irritation she knew so well. "I forgot somethin'."

"What is it?" Beth picked up his shoes and lined them up side by side in the closet. "Maybe it's something we can buy here."

"No. Nothin' from home. I left my gun in the car. I can't leave it there, in case someone breaks in." He didn't make a move to get up. Beth knew what was coming. "Go get it, will ya? Bring it inside."

She had been about to open his suitcase and put away his clothes but stopped. For the vacation to be any fun, she had to make sure Danny stayed happy and didn't run out of beer, but also didn't drink too many at once. She picked up the car keys he'd tossed onto the desk. "Sure. I'll be right back."

"Wait. Throw me a beer before you go."

She opened the cooler they brought from home, got the beer, and handed it to him. "Here you go, hon. And I'll be right back." She smiled suggestively, but Danny hadn't taken his eyes from the television, except to open the beer. Leaning down, she kissed him gently on the edge of his mouth, just a fleeting kiss where the scar on his cheek met his lips, her hand resting on his chest.

Dutifully, she left the room carrying her purse, so she had a place to conceal his gun. She didn't know why he had the gun, or what it was used for, but he'd always had one. She went through the empty lobby and out across the dim parking lot. Opening the driver's side door, she glanced around. Seeing no one close by, no one paying attention to her, she scooped the gun out from under the front seat.

A couple holding hands walked toward the front entrance and a man stood just inside the automatic doors. She was wary of carrying the gun. Danny didn't have a permit for it and neither did she. She didn't want to get in trouble for something so insignificant, didn't want to take any additional risks that might ruin their vacation and the surprise he had lined up. Despite all the illegal activities she'd participated in, above all, she was terrified of going to jail.

Making a split-second decision, she walked around the side of the hotel toward the woods, shivering in the cold. She used her key card to open the back door, where no one would see her. The entryway was dark and smelled slightly of ammonia. On the other side of the stairwell, someone she couldn't see was having a one-sided conversation. She stopped to make sure her purse was zipped shut.

There was something familiar about the voice coming from around the corner. The deep gravelly sound reminded her of Danny, but the tone was off. Too accommodating, too charming, and there was soft laughter.

“I miss you too, kitten.”

Beth’s skin turned clammy. A feverish chill raked through her body and settled in her bones. The voice was too much like her husband’s to belong to anyone else. But who was he talking to? Who was he calling ‘kitten’? She stood still, holding her breath.

“She went out, but I’m in the stairwell because she’ll be back in a minute.” Danny spoke in the coaxing voice he used when he wanted something he couldn’t get with force. “Don’t get all panicked on me, now. It’s gonna work out. Just trust me. Do what I say. And remember, I was with you all weekend working on the plans for remodeling the inside, we went to the—” Beth flattened herself against the side of the staircase and craned to hear him, she missed a few words because he was practically whispering.

“There’ll be no trace that I was ever with her here. No video cameras. That’s why I picked this dump. So stick with the plan.”

Beth clenched her hands into tight fists. A terrible sickness threatened to rise out of her throat and spill onto the floor.

“Use my credit card tonight at a drive-through and a few times tomorrow, but make it all seem business related, during the day, nothing too private. You know what I mean? And nowhere with video cameras. Got it?”

There was silence and then Danny laughed.

“After she’s gone, just a few months more, and then we can do whatever we want. One million dollars buys a lot of everything, baby.”

Another pause. Another deep, soft laugh. “Wish me luck. Love you, gorgeous.”

An icy current snaked through Beth’s chest at the same time she felt like she’d been slapped hard, knocked off balance. The scraping of shoes on the concrete told her he was coming closer. She froze, fear and anger forming a tight ball in her throat, choking her.

Just a few steps away, he switched direction and walked up the stairs. At the top, a door opened and closed.

She waited another minute, trembling, her mind racing, her stomach rolling with nausea. She swallowed hard. She slapped her cheek, hoping to wake up from a horrible, ultra-realistic nightmare. Surely, she had misunderstood. It couldn’t be what it sounded like. It couldn’t, because if it did, that would mean . . . Oh, God! It meant she was a pathetic, misguided fool. She had no one. She had nothing. Her whole life was worthless.

She crept up the stairs, the last three years of her life flashing through her mind in sharp snippets, the best and the worst of it all: meeting Danny at her sister’s wedding, his proposal the following Valentine’s day, the first time he’d slapped her when they were on their honeymoon.

Slowly she opened the door to room 234, afraid her face would give her away. How could she possibly hide her hurt and shock? She stuffed her hands in her pockets to keep them from trembling.

Danny was stretched out on the bed again, head propped on all the pillows – having left none for her—watching a game on television. He glanced at Beth—as if she was an annoying mosquito who buzzed inside when the door was open—then back to the screen. In that brief instant, she saw the coldness in his dark eyes, darker than usual. Her heart ached. How could she have been so stupid? Mini vacation? So close to hitting the jackpot with his business venture? She shuddered. She had trusted a cheater, a man who would rather she was dead than alive. She finally averted her gaze from him, feeling painfully alone, more alone than she had ever felt before.

In the wall mirror, she caught her reflection, ashen skin and worried eyes. She wiped at the tears spilling down her cheeks. Her gaze dropped to her suitcase. A new sick feeling of shame and stupidity arose inside her like a sudden wave of violent illness. Inside was the present she had bought him, her own surprise. A power station charger and Wi-Fi hotspot he could use when traveling. Something he said he needed.

“Did you get my gun?” he grunted.

“Yes. I’ll just keep it in my purse.” Trembling inside, she sat down at the tiny desk, grateful it was positioned in a hideaway around the corner, away from Danny’s line of view. She shoved off one shoe and then the other.

“What took you so long?”

“I um, I got something from the vending machine.” Her voice came out thin and weak. She reached for her laptop.

“What are you doing now?” The volume on the television increased.

“Nothing.” She opened her computer and powered it on.

“Nothing?”

“I’m uh—I’m checking a site with things to do in the area.”

“We’re going to hike to the top of the waterfall. Rain or shine.”

“Uh, huh.” She typed furiously.

“I can barely hear this show. You’re making too much noise.”

“Sorry. I’ll be more quiet.”

Quickly, as if her time was running out, which apparently it was, she logged into their checking account expenses and searched through the charges. She hoped and prayed for some sort of mistake, some crazy misunderstanding. Danny snored loudly on the bed, sounding like a fat and congested hog.

Most of the recurring payments belonged to Danny. A video game subscription, a music subscription, the internet, and cable. Only one monthly payment stood out as something she didn’t recognize. It went back several years, starting a few months after their marriage. She traced the payment to an insurance company, didn’t even have to hack into their system because dumb-ass Danny used the same login and password—baddanny1—for everything. She entered his email and password. There it was—the insurance policy she didn’t know they owned. One million dollars to be paid to Daniel Dellinger in the event of Beth Dellinger’s death.

Scenarios flashed through her mind, each more terrible than the next. How did he plan to do it? Push her off the waterfall when she was admiring the view? Or shoot her first and then push her? Was that the big surprise? Because if she hadn’t overheard him downstairs, then yeah, it would have been the mother of all surprises.

Staring at the screen, the cold, hard pang of her sadness wrestled with the hot fury of her rage. How could he do this to me?! How could he?! Then came more anger, directed at herself. How could I have been so stupid and unsuspecting? How could I have almost let this happen? Part of her perched on the brink of exploding, part of her threatened to crumble and break like old brittle bones. Confront him? Or run?

One overriding urge emerged through her tumultuous, warring emotions—the fierce need to survive. He was not going to kill her. She was not going to die.

She pulled her pocket book closer to her side. The hard muzzle of the gun pressed through the material and against her hip. She opened a new browser and typed: how to shoot a revolver. She read the first set of instructions and clicked on another. How hard could it be?

“You’re acting strange, Beth.”

He’d gotten off the bed and snuck up behind her. She slammed her laptop closed and jumped sideways in her seat. “What? No, I’m not.”

“What’s going on?” Hovering over her shoulder, his hot, beer breath warmed her neck. “What are you doing?”

“Nothing.” She wrapped her arms around her chest instinctively. “I wasn’t doing anything.”

He eyed her with an intensity she now recognized as hatred. “I’ll be the judge of that.” He pushed her out of the way and grabbed for her computer. He lifted the top. The screen flashed to life and he clicked on the tabs she hadn’t closed.

Clutching her purse, she made a dash for the door and ran out. Tears stung her eyes. She flew barefoot down the back stairwell, taking them two at a time, without looking back over her shoulder. Yanking the hallway door open, she ran through the corridor and straight into the hotel lobby, gasping for breath. She stopped for a second, eyes darting from the exit to the front desk. The office door swung shut on the backside of a man in a cheap black suit. There was no one else in sight. Jumbled thoughts raced through her mind. She could scream for help. Surely the employee, or someone, would come out and help her, or call the police. But what good would it do? If Danny didn’t kill her tonight, he’d be even angrier after a run in with the cops. What proof did she have that he was going to kill her? “Kitten” wasn’t going to back up Beth’s story. And even if she did, Danny wouldn’t be the only one taken to jail. Identity theft carried a longer sentence than domestic abuse. Danny would see to it that Beth would pay for their crimes. She could count on that.

Decision made, she kept her mouth closed and sprinted down the hall to the back of the hotel. Had she made a conscious decision to run to the woods behind the hotel? She didn’t know then and she didn’t know now. The will to survive superseded all else. She flung open the back door, barely even registering the man who stood aside to let her pass and the attractive woman with dark hair who hurriedly leapt out of her way.

Danny breathed heavily behind her. “Come back here! You don’t understand. What you saw—the insurance thing—it’s not what you think.”

She ran. Her violent entrance into the woods was echoed by branches cracking and snapping close behind her.

“Stop! Come back here!” Danny yelled.

An approaching train barreled down the tracks like it was coming right at them.

He wanted her dead.

He would kill her.

But not if she killed him first.

She yanked the gun from her bag. She aimed. She fired.

The incessant barking and growling of the two littlest dogs snapped Beth back to reality. Her hands were shaking so hard it looked like the gun was vibrating. Danny is dead. I killed Danny. I killed my husband. A muscle below her eye began to spasm.

“We don’t want to hurt you, but I’m counting to three and if you don’t put the gun down, you leave me no choice. One.”

Agent Heslin let the odd number hang in the air, as if she knew what it would do to Beth.

Danny laughed again, a cruel, mocking sound. “You got yourself in a real doozy now, dumb ass. How are you getting out of this one? Can’t wait to see how this works out for you.”

“How could you? How could you do that to me?” She screamed, and the gun jerked up and down in her hand.

“Two.”

“Guess you’re going to prison after all, Beth.” Danny’s laughter grew louder.

“No! I’m not!” Beth shrieked. In one swift movement, she whipped the gun toward her head.

“Nooo!” Victoria shouted.

Three shots rang out. One from each gun in the room.

TREMBLING INSIDE, VICTORIA lowered her gun. Four of her dogs raced away, tails underneath them, terrified of the gun shots.

Beth was lying motionless on the ground, blood spewing from her shoulder and neck. Rivera crossed the room. With a swift kick, he sent Beth's gun spinning across the floor and away from her.

Victoria hurried to Ned's side, followed by the remaining dogs, and gripped his upper arms. She gazed up at him. "Ned! I was so worried I might lose y—." She removed her hands and took a quick step back. "I mean—are you hurt?"

Ned shook his head, closed his eyes for a second. "No, I'm fine. Shaken as hell, but fine. That might be an everyday occurrence for you two, but not for—"

From the floor, Beth let out another moan.

Rivera shouted, "She's still alive," and pulled out his phone.

Gasping, Ned ran to Beth and kneeled by her side. He tore off his shirt and pressed it against her neck. "I don't think the bullet hit the jugular. Get me some towels."

"This is Federal Agent Dante Rivera. We have a serious gunshot victim who needs immediate medical assistance. The address is—Victoria!"

"1406 Arbor Way," Ned answered.

As Rivera repeated the information to the dispatcher, Beth's lips moved rhythmically.

"What's she saying?" Victoria asked.

"I think she's counting," Ned answered.

Beth's eyes flew open and rolled back into her head. She fell silent.

"Go!" Ned yelled to Victoria.

Victoria rushed away with dogs trailing after her.

"Wait," Ned hollered. "Get a tie, or a scarf, too! And get tampons!"

"Okay," Victoria shouted from the hallway.

"And gloves if you have them!"

With her breath coming in fast gasps, she hurried to the master bedroom. She yanked a scarf from a rack in her closet, snatched tampons from under her bathroom sink, and grabbed a tall stack of crisp white towels from the linen shelves. She rushed back with her arms full. She'd been involved with life and death emergencies before, but never in her own kitchen. With Ned, Rivera, her dogs, and so much blood. . . there was something surreal about the entire situation.

The dogs surrounded the spreading pool of blood and lapped at it. She swung her leg toward them. "Out! Get away!" They scattered, spreading bloody paw prints across the floor. "I still have to get gloves."

"I've got some." Rivera grabbed them from his pocket and held them out.

Ned's hands were already soaked with blood. "You put them on," he told Rivera. "Then grab a towel and put your hand where mine is. Press down like you mean it."

Victoria dumped the load she was carrying onto the floor and tossed Rivera a towel. He took Ned's place.

Ned straddled Beth and began chest compressions. He glanced up at Victoria for a fraction of a second, just long enough for her to know he was telling her what to do. "Tie the scarf or—whatever you brought—tie it around her shoulder like a tourniquet," he said breathlessly. "Then plug each of those holes with a tampon.” He did another series of compressions. “Then one of you needs to get behind her and stabilize her neck, don’t let her head move at all. Damn it! We should have done that first.”

Victoria knelt and tied the scarf around Beth’s shoulder and pulled it tight. Sweat slid down Ned’s temples as he continued pumping Beth’s chest. Her blood spread across the floor, soaking through their pant legs as they knelt around her. The dogs returned and licked at the blood while Victoria yelled, “No. Get away,” in a futile attempt to make them stop. Rivera sneezed violently, four times in a row.

Ambulance sirens wailed in the distance as Ned continued compressions.

“I have to let them in.” As Victoria keyed the code to open the gate into her phone, and the approaching sirens grew louder, Ned and Rivera worked furiously to save the killer’s life. Rivera’s lips moved silently, and Victoria knew he was praying. The woman bleeding out on the ground was a dangerous killer with severe psychological problems. They would do everything they could to save her.

• • • •

VICTORIA LOOKED FORWARD to getting home early. It was only a matter of time before something would happen and she would be called away by the FBI for a new case. She hated not knowing how much time she had—an hour, a week?—but that was part of the job. It was in her best interest to relish the downtime while she had it. She was only a few miles away from her house when her father called. After exchanging a few pleasantries, he got right to the reason for his call.

“Fenton is always keeping watch for our names in the media.”

Victoria coasted the Suburban to a stop sign. “I know he is.”

“Well, you’ll never guess what he dug up.”

“What is it?” She looked right and left before easing the car into motion.

“He found an online newsletter for a shelter in Seville Spain. It’s called the Abigail Heslin Foundation for Animals. It’s a large facility built to house over 700 dogs at a time, with an onsite Vet.”

“Wow. Really?” She gripped the wheel tighter. “Sounds just like something mom would do.”

“Yes, I thought the same. Except the shelter didn’t exist until a few years ago, Victoria. Your mother didn’t do this.”

Victoria sighed. Bracing herself for the questions that would follow—exactly how much did she spend? Did she know that the money was being used wisely, etc.

“But she would be very, very proud of you.”

Victoria smiled, and a warm feeling radiated through her. “Thanks, Dad. I hope she would. I’m going to visit the shelter next week. I’m taking Ned with me. We’ll fly back with some dogs and help them find homes here. Can I mark you down to take one, or two, or three? Three is a good number.”

Her father laughed. “I admire what you’re doing, but I think you know the answer to that question.”

• • • •

THE DOGS GREETED VICTORIA in the mudroom with a flurry of huffing, puffing, and smacking their tails against the walls. She stroked their heads as they bounced around her. “That’s right. I’m home, babies.” Izzy shoved her head into Victoria’s shopping bag.

“No. That’s not for you,” Victoria said, gently pushing the dog’s head away.

Ned walked in from the direction of the guest wing. With him came the slight scent of a fresh, sporty aftershave or deodorant. She liked that smell. His hair was wet. His skin glistened from his shower.

“You’re early.” He slid his phone from his pocket. “Did I miss a call?”

“No. I didn’t call. I had mountains of paperwork to do today. I could only take so much of it, so I left early. I was hoping you could hang out for a while and talk about our trip.” Victoria lifted the bag. “I brought dinner. Hope that’s okay and you haven’t made anything yet.”

“No. That’s great.”

She set the bag on the counter. Ned walked forward to open it. “Wow. Is this just for us or do you have friends coming?”

Victoria laughed. “Just us. I wasn’t sure what you wanted, and I know you’ve been training hard. Thought you might eat a lot.”

Ned chuckled. "I'm always hungry. Izzy and I just had a long run."

"No one else is coming for dinner, but someone is coming to get Leo and Bella."

"Oh." He crouched down and scratched Leo behind the ears. "Hear that, little guy. Hope wherever you're going is almost as good as this place."

Victoria pushed the bag further toward the center of the counter where it was safe from the dogs. "I just need to change my clothes." She walked to her bedroom and stripped down to her underwear and sports bra. She replaced her work clothes with jeans and a long sleeve t-shirt and went back out to the kitchen. In the short time she'd been gone, Ned had set out plates, silverware, and napkins. He'd transferred salmon, rice, and grilled vegetables from boxes into bowls. He smiled when she entered the kitchen and pulled a chair out for her.

"Thanks." The wonderful aroma of the food filled the kitchen as she sat down, feeling warm and relaxed. "So. Only a few more weeks. Have you ever been to Spain? I can't remember if I asked."

Ned tipped the bottle of wine to fill Victoria's glass. "I spent half my junior year of college studying in Barcelona."

"Oh! That's wonderful. I had no idea. So you speak the language fluently?" She took a sip of wine and set her glass back on the table.

"Well . . . I used to speak it well. But it's been awhile." Ned scooped up a spoonful of rice and ate it.

"I'm sure it will come back to you once we get there. We'll check into our hotel and freshen up. Then it's straight to the shelter."

"How do we get all the supplies there?"

"They'll be there already. I shipped them last week." Victoria took another sip of wine. "They're so glad you're coming. There are always dogs who need surgery. Many of them were hit by cars. We've had a few where their owners didn't need them anymore so they broke their legs then dumped them far from home so they wouldn't get back." Victoria closed her eyes and shook her head.

"Holy crap." Ned let his spoon clatter onto his plate. "This is going to be tough."

"Yes, it is. And it's going to be exhausting, but everyone will be so grateful, especially the dogs."

Ned smiled. "My dad used to do mission trips to Haiti every two years with some of the physicians from his hospital. That's what this seems like to me."

"That's exactly what it's going to be like for you, except your father probably didn't take any of his patients back to the US with him." Victoria took a bite of her food and sighed. It was delicious.

"After the first time he went, he couldn't wait to go back. Even though a lot of what he saw was heartbreaking."

"Yes. Same," Victoria said.

The intercom buzzed. Someone was at the front gate. Victoria tapped the code to open it and walked to the front door.

A woman wearing running shoes, jeans, and a sweatshirt stood on the other side of the door. "Hi. Are you Victoria?"

"Yes." Victoria smiled warmly. She liked the woman already.

"I'm Sarah. I'm Ann's sister."

Leo and Bella ran to Sarah and sniffed her.

"They know you?" Victoria asked.

"Oh, they know me all right. I take care of them whenever my sister and Robert need help." She dropped to her knees and let the dogs lick her chin. "You're coming home to live with me now." She stood up and wiped the tears from her eyes. "Being with them will help me cope with losing my sister. This is a good thing."

Victoria smiled. "I'm glad you feel that way. I'm sure your sister would be so grateful if she knew."

Sarah sniffed and nodded. "Thank you for taking care of them." She looked around, taking in the beautiful home, and laughed. "They might not want to leave."

"Dogs don't care where they live as long as someone there loves them," Victoria said. "I'll go get their leashes."

Ned introduced himself to Sarah. "We're going to miss them."

Sarah petted Eddie and Myrtle, her eyes roaming over the house, the dog beds and toys. "I guess you and your wife are really dog lovers."

Ned smiled. "Oh. I'm just—"

Victoria walked back in carrying leashes and a dog food bag. "Here they are. And this is the food your sister was feeding them."

"Thank you." Sarah attached the leash and they watched her leave with the dogs. When she was inside her car, they closed the door and returned to the kitchen.

"How about a walk?" Ned asked. "After we clean up here."

"Sure. Who should we take?"

"Let's try and take them all. Three for you. Four for me."

She laughed. "Really? This will be a first."

They put on their own jackets, and then put sweaters on the dogs to protect them from the chilly air. They headed across Victoria's backyard to one of the main trails.

"There's something I'd like to talk to you about. Something from, you know, the other night." Ned said, walking with two dogs on one side and two on the other.

"Sure. It's normal and healthy to talk about things like that—the fear, the stress. It's important to talk it out with someone who will understand."

"I was afraid, yeah, I mean, Beth Dellinger was disturbed, but I'm dealing okay with what transpired."

"She might be in a coma forever. The doctors aren't sure."

"I know, and I have to admit I feel bad for her, she was not healthy, talking to her dead husband like he was really in the room with us." He shuddered. "But that's not what—it's about something you said."

"Me?" Victoria swapped Eddie's black leash with Myrtle's pink one as the dogs crossed in front of her.

"Well, I'm guessing you've handled situations like that before, hostage situations. But maybe not where the hostage is someone you know, right?"

"True. That was a first."

"So—I'm going to be direct here—when you said, 'I was so worried I might lose you,' were you worried about losing me as in, now I have to find someone new to take care of the dogs? Or was there something else?"

Victoria smiled, their eyes met. Her heart skipped a beat. "A good dog walker is hard to find, Especially one who . . ."

"Especially one who?"

"Maybe I'll wait until we get to Spain before I fully answer that question."

He smiled. "Can't wait to hear your answer."

They couldn't clasp hands, not with seven dogs between them. Victoria slipped the leash loops up her forearm and reached her free hand over to squeeze Ned's.

• • • •

The End

READY FOR BOOK TWO, Pretty Little Girls?

Until you know who you can trust, you trust no one.

CONTINUE the story with *Pretty Little Girls, Book Two.

Read It Here!

Keep reading for the next book in Fractured

• • • •

JUMP TO THE TABLE OF Contents

• • • •

Join Jenifer's Reader's Group

JENIFER RUFF IS A USA Today and International Bestselling Author Jenifer Ruff writes dark and twisty mysteries and medical thrillers in three series: The Agent Victoria Heslin series, The Brooke Walton Series, and The FBI & CDC Thriller series. Her novels showcase contemporary issues and bring complicated characters to life. An avid fitness enthusiast and hiker with a background in epidemiology and public health, Jenifer lives in Charlotte, NC with her family and a pack of greyhounds.

www.jenruff.com

DAN ALATORRE: THE GAMMA SEQUENCE

---

The GAMMA SEQUENCE
BY DAN ALATORRE

Author's Rating:

Language: * Sexuality: * Violence: ****

For your convenience each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

© This eBook is licensed for your personal use only. This eBook may not be re-sold or given away to other people. Thank you for respecting the hard work of this author. © No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted by any means without the written permission of the author. Copyright © 2019 Dan Alatorre. All rights reserved. This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, businesses, companies, events or locales, is entirely coincidental.

He wasn't sure he believed her...
...but DeShear took the case.

Why would anyone be killing geneticists?

It was one wrong move, standing up for what was right, that cost him his career on the force. Now, DeShear must rebuild his life as a P.I. and this case seems simple enough. But looks can be deceiving. Had his client, geneticist Lanaya Kim, really found a thread that links the murders?

Why is she so frightened?

Years before, Lanaya had worked with them all. One accident could be believed, but the more they happened, she knew it just didn't add up. Who was killing her colleagues?

Could she be a target?

You'll love this fast-paced thrill ride, because everyone enjoys a struggling detective trying to rebuild a life and a strong woman hoping to uncover the truth.

THE MURDERER PULLED a black ski mask over his face and stared at the ornate entry to his next victim's house.

On TV, cops and angry boyfriends can always kick a door open. In real life, it's a little more complicated than that.

He hefted the 40-pound battering ram to gage its balance. According to the website that sold them, these heavy steel rams replaced a swift kick for police officers around 1975, and had been reliably opening the entries of stubborn perpetrators ever since.

Hit the knob with it straight on, and it will do the rest.

Taking a deep breath, he rubbed the knot growing in his stomach. He leaned away from the door and peeked through the large bay window, focusing on the fat old man at the dining room table. The overhead chandelier cast a warm yellow glow over the walls, spilling onto the yard outside in a misshapen rectangle.

The man inside carved a tiny slice of something on his plate, gently lifting it to his mouth, the fork upside down like European royalty. Good posture, too. No doubt that was the way Dr. Faustus Braunheiser demanded the students at Wellington Academy to eat, all prim and proper. Students watching from their tables would see the rigid old man operating as any good headmaster should, a perfect example of stuffy grace and tedious dignity.

But tonight, the old man dined alone.

No gawking teenage boys in matching shirts and ties, no suck-up faculty. And best of all, no family members.

That's no way to celebrate your birthday, Doctor.

A breeze tugged at the killer's collar and brought the stench of the bay at low tide. He peered at the tall hedges lining the driveway.

Thank goodness for privacy.

He reactively went to wipe his hand on his pants, stopping when he remembered the latex gloves he wore. After patting the butt of the big revolver strapped to his belt, he regripped the 40-pound steel battering ram. Its two handles allowed it to swing like a giant pendulum, and according to the website, the concentrated impact at hand speed was somewhere in the vicinity of 6,000 pounds per square inch.

More than enough to do the trick.

He took another deep breath, straining to guide the tip of the thick black ram to the shiny brass knob, but not touch it. He held it there for a moment, lining up his shot, then he let the ram swing backwards. The momentum of its short, stubby mass wanted to carry him backwards with it, off the elegant front porch and down the majestic home's marble stairs, but he forced his arms and shoulders to contain the pendulum.

When the battering ram reached the peak of its backwards arc, he brought it forward once again toward the door.

One.

Exhaling hard, he rocked the ram backwards again. A bead of sweat rolled past the bandage and down the side of his face.

He swung it forward again, nearly touching the knob.

Two.

The ram arced backwards one last time. With a grunt, he squeezed the steel handles and gritted his teeth, heaving the ram toward the door knob.

Three.

The impact sent a jolt up his arms and a thunderclap that boomed down the doctor's long driveway and past the vintage Jaguar parked there, before fading into the night. As the door knob disappeared, a cloud of splinters took its place. The momentum of the ram carried him into the door frame, the ram disappearing up to the handles inside the thick wooden door.

He yanked the heavy steel tool a few times to get it free, then dropped it over the mansion's stone porch rail and into the manicured bushes. It landed with a thump in the thick mulch. The massive front door stood, cracked in several places and with a big hole where the knob used to be, but it inched open.

The killer raised his foot to do the rest. Kicking the door, it swung open and crashed into the mahogany-paneled wall. The old man at the table was already on his feet, his eyes wide and his mouth half open with the next tiny bite of his elegant birthday dinner. He stormed toward the entrance of his home. "What do you think you're doing? Who are you? Get out!"

Heart pounding, the intruder pulled his large gun from its holster and pointed it at the old man. "Shut up and sit down, Dr. Braunheiser."

The headmaster stopped in his tracks, jaw agape. He slowly raised his hands.

"You don't remember me, do you?" The Greyhound said. A tall, athletic-framed man, he knew he cut an imposing figure. The black ski mask was a nice touch, too. It had a way of keeping the victim slightly terrorized and completely focused. Still, the intruder fought to keep the adrenaline from showing in his voice or making his hand quiver.

"This—this house has an alarm," Dr. Braunheiser said. "The police. They're probably already on the way."

The Greyhound shook his head and crept toward the old man. "I disabled that. Your phone wires run right alongside your electric meter and cable lines, over on the pool side of the house. Besides, when you came in, you didn't re-arm the system, so let's not lie to each other, shall we?" He raised the gun to eye level, staring down the barrel to his victim. "Now get on your knees."

Dr. Braunheiser frowned, lowering his hands. "I'll do no such thing."

The Greyhound swallowed hard to quell the knot in his stomach. "Yes, you will." He inspected the long, carved wooden mirror hanging next to a massive aquarium in the foyer. A very scary man in a black ski mask and blue jeans stared back at him. Cocking his head, he returned his gaze to Braunheiser. The old man was probably used to a stern tone of voice sending fear down the spines of grade schoolers. Not tonight. The Greyhound squeezed the thick handle of his .45 tigher. "You'll get on your knees and do what I say, or I will catch the next flight to North Carolina and I will kill your daughter Jenifer in the office of her clinic. Then I will track down your wife Sandy at her seminar and kill her in her hotel room." He narrowed his eyes and growled at the doctor. "Get the picture, birthday boy?"

Braunheiser's hands trembled as he held them in the air. "There's no need for any of that. Just . . . just tell me, what do you want? I can—I, I have . . ." His voice trailed off, much quieter now, and not nearly as stern as a moment ago.

The Greyhound advanced and put his gun near Braunheiser's temple. "I already told you. Get on your knees."

The doctor lowered himself with a grunt, easing his hands down to the shiny wooden planks and steadying himself as he slid each foot backward. Hands at his sides, he raised himself to a kneeling position, wincing, and faced his intruder.

“The car keys to the Jaguar,” The Greyhound said. “Where are they?”

The doctor glanced toward the entrance. “On the hook. By the door.”

“Okay.”

“Do you . . . do you want money, then? I can get—”

The Greyhound hooked a thumb under his ski mask and slid it up past his face to rest on his forehead. The air was cool on his skin. “So, you don’t remember me?” He glared at his victim. “Well, I was pretty young at the time. It’s not like they took class photos at the facility or anything.”

Braunheiser blinked a few times. “Facility?”

“Angelus Genetics.”

The old man’s face went white.

“Oh, now it’s starting to come back to you.” The Greyhound lifted a finger to the bandage over his eye. He winced, sweat rolling down his neck and along his back. “I’m glad you remember. I like reminiscing. But first, let me tell you how this is going to go.” He slid the mask back down over his face.

“I—I can get you money,” the doctor whispered, his voice quivering. “Drugs. Medicine. Whatever you—”

“Just shut up!” The Greyhound screamed, leaning close to the old man’s head. “You are not running this show, Doctor!” He turned to the mirror, admiring the mask and the way it hid his features while creating an ominous presence. “You know,” he wheeled around to the man kneeling in front of him. “It’s amazing you got as far as you did. You’re just about the worst liar I’ve met from the facility—and I’ve met quite a few of your colleagues over the years.”

The Greyhound pulled a handkerchief out of his pocket.

“Here’s the deal. You’re gonna put a few drops of ether on this handkerchief, and then you’re going to inhale it.”

“I won’t.”

“You will.” He dropped the cloth in front of the doctor. “If you try not to, I’ll put a few rounds into your thighs, and you can lay on the floor kicking in pain while I hold the handkerchief over your face.” He lowered his voice to a whisper and put his mouth close to the doctor’s ear. “Totally your call.”

“Gunshot wounds . . .” Braunheiser swallowed hard, sweat appearing on his brow, “tend to get noticed by detectives.”

“Coroners, too, Doc.” The Greyhound sniffed. The old man’s Clive Christian cologne and aftershave filled the assailant’s nostrils. “But if you think somebody’s going to come poking around in the middle of the Great Cypress Swamp, way out past the Indian reservation, and dig through a bunch of gator dung to find your injuries, well, just remember—those Miami detectives didn’t even bother to get their feet wet when ValueJet flight 592 went down in the Everglades. I doubt the deep swamps are the first place anyone would think to look for you, anyway.”

The old man trembled now, his whole body shaking. “So . . . you, you do need to kill me?”

The Greyhound righted himself. “Oh, without a doubt. Was that not clear?” He strolled down the long hallway toward the Christmas tree, admiring the vases and statues as the dark floor gently creaked under his feet. “You have a few minutes. Use them wisely. Pray, maybe—to whatever you believe in. Science. Money, possibly. Power. But make no mistake, in a few minutes, one of us will be dead.” He swallowed hard. “And since I happen to be holding the gun, I’ll bet it’s going to be you.”

“You’ll never get away with this.” Anger seeped into the doctor’s voice.

“I already have,” The Greyhound said, walking back to the doctor. “Several times. But I’m tired of talking to you. It’s showtime. Three deep breaths ought to do it—and I’ll be able to tell if you’re faking, so don’t.”

With trembling hands, the doctor reached out and lifted the white handkerchief from the floor.

The Greyhound produced a small vial from his other pocket. “Three drops of this. No more, no less. Remember, there are lots of bad ways to die. This doesn’t have to be one.” He held out the bottle, waving it back and forth like a clock pendulum as he stared into the old man’s eyes. “It must be terrible, knowing you’re going to die very soon.”

The doctor gazed at him, the handkerchief in his shaking hand. “If you tell me what you want, maybe I can help you.”

“No! I’ve had all the help I care to endure from you, Doctor Braunheiser! Now, one last time.” He stretched his arm out and leveled the big gun at the old man’s head. “Start sniffing or I swear the walls will be painted with your brain splatter.”

The old man uncapped the plastic bottle, the lid slipping from his trembling fingers. It rolled across the floor. The Greyhound stooped to pick it up. “Can’t leave evidence laying around.”

The vial had a tip like an eyedropper. Braunheiser lifted the bottle, squeezing three small drops into the center the handkerchief.

“Over your nose and mouth,” The Greyhound said, waiving the gun at the doctor. “Please breathe through your nose deeply, and count backwards from ten.” He snorted. “Just kidding. You don’t have to do that.”

The old man took a hesitant breath.

“Deeper than that. Gun shots hurt really, really bad, from what I hear. First there is the impact—like getting hit with a baseball bat, wham! Knocks the wind out of you. Then there is this sharp, searing pain that rockets up your body and bashes your brain. Then, there’s the intense burning feeling. Some guys say they can even smell their own flesh smoldering from the hot lead. Then wave after wave of nonstop agony overwhelms your whole system and sends you into shock—after enduring ten or fifteen minutes of dire pain. Probably put an old boy like you straight into coronary arrest. And at close range, this .45 can take a whole leg off as well. Now, if you can’t do it for yourself, think of your poor innocent wife and daughter. Jenifer and Sandy don’t deserve to die, too. Think of the rancid, sticky mess of blood and goo we’ll be leaving for the maid to find on Tuesday. So, please. Do it right.”

The doctor squared his shoulders and inhaled deeply.

“That’s more like it. Better go ahead and count.”

Trembling, the man nodded. His eyes filling with tears, he spoke through the handkerchief he held to his face. “Ten . . .” His voice wavered. “Nine.”

He closed his eyes, tears rolling down his cheeks. “Eight . . .”

Another deep, shaky breath.

“I’ll help you,” The Greyhound said. “Seven.”

The doctor’s shoulders sagged as he inhaled a third time. His hand fell to his side, the cloth floating to the floor. His head bobbed, tipping to the right slightly, and then his body slumped. He crashed face-first onto the polished oak planks.

The Greyhound took a deep breath and released it slowly, rubbing the knot in his belly. “That’s more like it. Now, if you’ll allow my friends to escort you to your car, we’ll start phase two.”

HAMILTON DESHEAR DABBED his face with a towel and leaned over the canvas camping chair, snatching his phone from the lid of the cooler before it could vibrate into the sand. He never took the phone with him when he ran, figuring he was allowed an hour at dawn to himself. His daily three-mile run on the beach was one of the few pleasures he permitted himself these days.

A nearby fishing pole rested in a half-buried PVC pipe but showed no indication of having caught a fish. He held his towel over the phone to cast a shadow in the bright light, then read the screen.

Unknown number.

Good. It's not Tullenstein again.

He tapped the green icon and raised the phone to his ear. "DeShear Investigations."

The woman on the other end spoke with a quiet but rushed tone. "Hello, may I speak with Hamilton DeShear, please?" Her words wavered slightly, like someone who doesn't quite know how to ask for what they want.

Maybe a wife who wanted her husband followed, but definitely not one of Tullenstein's minions looking to slap another lawsuit on him.

DeShear held the phone away from his face to note the time. Seven-thirty on the dot. "This is Hank DeShear. What can I do for you?" Setting the phone back on the cooler lid, he pressed the speaker button and brushed sand from his taut, shirtless torso.

The caller cleared her throat. "I'm not sure how to say this . . ."

"Okay, well, take your time."

A well-toned young lady—easily half his age—jogged by wearing a sports bra and pink yoga pants. Her blonde ponytail bobbed at the back of her baseball cap, but her eyes stayed on DeShear. She smiled and gave him a wave. He lifted a hand and nodded. Her long legs churned through the soft sand as she turned and continued down the beach.

"I require your services," the woman on the phone said. "But you must start right away. Will you meet with me? I spoke with Mark Harriman of the Tampa police department. You were very highly recommended."

"Well, that was nice of Harriman. What's this about, Miss . . .?"

"You may call me Lanaya Kim. I assume you've read about the death of Dr. Braunheiser last evening?"

"I caught part of it on the news. Wellington Academy. He was the headmaster." DeShear grabbed the phone, thumbing icons in an attempt to find the Tampa Tribute website. The service indicator flickered with one partial bar as it searched for a stronger signal. His laptop was in the trunk of his car, but it wouldn't power up fast enough to let him find the story quickly and read more—if it got a signal at all.

"The news reports say he died in a single-person car wreck. I want to look into a wrongful death case, but you must start immediately. Are you available to meet me tomorrow?"

"Sure." He brushed the sand from his legs. "I can even meet you this morning if you want. What law firm are you with?"

"Tomorrow. And I am a private individual. An attorney of my employ will contact you soon if you take the case."

"That'll be fine. Can I ask what your relationship to the case is, Ms. Kim?"

“As I implied, the death of Dr. Braunheiser was something other than a simple accident. We can talk in detail about that tomorrow. I’d like to—”

“What do you think happened?” He squinted into the calm waters of the bay as they glistened in the morning sun, tiny diamonds dancing with each ripple.

“I . . . I can’t discuss it over the phone. If you—”

“Tomorrow it is, then, Ms. Kim. And don’t worry, I’m pretty well versed in these types of things. I do excellent trial research, and like Harriman probably told you, I used to be a cop. So if we need to get a wrecked car’s brake lines checked, or a power steering mechanism inspected to find a faulty repair or a manufacturing issue, that’s no problem. I can locate the best experts, compile all the research, and present it so anyone on a jury finds in your favor. Of course, for it to go anywhere, you first have to show you’re an affected party. Can you tell me how you connect to Dr. Braunheiser?”

A few seagulls landed next to his fishing rod.

“The news . . . the news says that Dr. Braunheiser’s death was an accident.”

“And you wanna sue.”

“No. I want . . . my interest . . .” She took a breath. “If an advanced toxicology screen is performed, it will show Propofol in Dr. Braunheiser’s system. Enough to where he would not have been able to drive a car.”

DeShear rubbed the beard stubble on his chin. “That’s a little different. You think the wreck was intentional? A homicide?”

“I really—I don’t want to discuss this over the phone. When we meet in person, I can tell you more.”

“Okay, but from what you’re saying, you—or someone else—thinks the doctor’s death was a murder.”

“Mr. DeShear—”

“Ma’am, it’s an important distinction for me. I don’t do murder investigations.”

“Mr. DeShear, please listen to what I have to say.” Her voice quivered. “Please.”

The quiver hooked him. Fear in others had a way of making him sympathetic. He put a hand on his hip. “Okay, I’m sorry. Go ahead.”

“Not on the phone. Tomorrow. In person.”

He pursed his lips. Something about her didn’t feel right.

“You do bail bonds work, correct? Finding criminals who skip out on their bond? And your bail retrieval account is with Mid Florida bank. Check your balance. You’ll see a five-thousand-dollar deposit has been added by Credit Suisse, from an account ending in two-zero-one. Would you like to take a moment to verify the funds are there?”

He snapped upright. “I’m, uh, not really at my office right now.” Glancing at the car, he regretted not firing up the laptop earlier—and not jogging where there was a better signal.

“Can you check from your phone? I’ll wait.”

“Yeah, there’s not really a signal here. Five thousand, did you say?”

“Do I have your interest now? It’s all yours for simply meeting me tomorrow on Bayshore Boulevard. Hear me out and the money’s yours, no strings attached. Afterwards, we can see if you’d like to handle my case.”

He nodded. “Five thousand dollars will certainly buy a few hours of my time. I’m available later today if you want.”

“Tomorrow. I’ll be coming in from Texas.”

“What time should I pick you up at the airport?”

“Please pay attention. I need you to report the information about the Propofol to the police. It won’t show up in a standard toxicology report, so the coroner will specifically need to look for it.”

“Okay. They’re gonna wonder how I got the information.”

“Tell them the truth. You got a tip over the phone. Tomorrow, meet me at noon, at the corner of Bayshore Boulevard and Gandy. I’ll be dressed in red jogging gear and stretching on the grass in the median.”

He stood and held the phone to his ear with his shoulder. Folding the canvas chair, he grabbed the cooler and fishing rod as he made his way to the car. “A thousand people jog on Bayshore every day. How will I find you?”

“Your picture is on file with the department of professional regulation. I’ll find you. I must go now.”

“Just to make sure we’re on the same page—if we meet, I get to keep the five thousand.”

“Correct.”

“Well, you just bought yourself a meeting.” He smiled. It might be a merry Christmas this year after all. “So how’s the weather out there in Texas during the holidays?”

“I don’t know. I didn’t say I lived in Texas, I said I was coming in from there.” She huffed. “I do hope you pay better attention to detail going forward than you have so far, Mr. DeShear.”

He shifted on his feet. “Yes ma’am. Sorry. I sure will. As a private investigator, we often need to deduce things, so—”

“Try not to deduce incorrectly, then. One last thing. You are not to try to contact me in any way. For the moment, assume every aspect of your life has been compromised. Your office, your computers, everything. Operate as though your phones are bugged and your home is under surveillance. I’m calling you from a disposable phone, so don’t try to call me back on it.”

“Don’t take this the wrong way, but that sounds a little over the top.”

“For five thousand dollars, I get to sound as over the top as I want.”

“All right. Fair enough.”

“Come alone tomorrow, and don’t tell anyone about the meeting.”

“No problem.” He set down his gear and rubbed his forehead. “Ah, Ms. Kim, this may cost me the job, but I feel obliged to say this again—I can’t get involved in an active murder investigation. It’s just not allowed. So, when I tell Harriman about the Propofol, if that pans out—that’s it. I’ll have to step aside.”

“I’ll be hiring you to handle a missing persons case. You still do that, don’t you?”

“Well, yeah.”

“As an investigator working for a law firm in a wrongful death suit or missing persons case, you’ll be able to interact with every law enforcement agency necessary. Enough discovery motions will be filed in enough cities for you to act with virtual impunity.”

“Okay,” DeShear said. “But who’s the missing person?”

The line went silent. Just as he was deciding she’d ended the call, her reply came.

“The missing person is me.”

After driving to the bank and cashing out his newfound five thousand dollars, DeShear opened a safe deposit box and put most of the cash inside. He then got a haircut and a shoeshine, and spent most of the rest of the day alternating between hunching over his computer and pacing back and forth around his living room like he was trying to wear out the carpet.

Lanaya Kim had been right about Braunheiser's accident—as far as what the news and the Tampa police were reporting. A single-car wreck ended the doctor's life, after apparently losing control of his 1968 Jaguar convertible. With no air bags, no shoulder straps, and no roof, the doctor was crushed under the car when it went off the road south of his home. The vintage vehicle dropped the ten or so feet onto the rocks lining the bay, flipping over and crushing the doctor underneath.

Nothing too interesting there; a case of bad luck on the old boy's birthday, maybe after a few too many glasses of wine.

Propofol, on the other hand, was a very interesting drug. Anything with the nickname "milk of amnesia" had to be. A restricted use anesthesia, it was mainly accessible to nurses, doctors, and pharmacists, but it had been known to be a target for hospital break ins. Propofol had the added distinction of being part of pop singer Michael Jackson's demise, which made it a headliner for a while with some illegal drug users. Since it could cause irregular heartbeats, an overdose might appear as a heart attack. Being an injected drug, Propofol would usually be easy to spot if it was the cause of death.

The fact that it was a standard anesthesia in colonoscopies and many surgeries was most interesting to DeShear.

He leaned back in his chair, staring at his computer screen.

It's a knockout drug. It'd be hard to drive at all when you're looped.

Now that he knew a little about the subject, DeShear called the Tampa Police Department. He used the main line so his call would be logged and recorded, instead of attempting to contact Harriman on his cell phone. The information might make DeShear a suspect in a murder investigation. He wanted it all to be on the record.

"Hank DeShear," Harriman said. "Old Hanky Panky. Long time. To what do I owe the pleasure?"

"Work, Officer. It's not a social call today."

"So I figured. If we were still social, I'd probably have seen you at the hockey game last week like we planned. How's your cough?"

"It put me on the couch for five straight days, but I'm all cleared up now—and trying to catch up on work. Maybe we can see a game later this month." Reaching across his tiny dining room table, DeShear grabbed a yellow legal pad and a pen. "What about you? How you managing?"

"Day by day, man."

DeShear chewed his lip. "I need a favor. It's about the Braunheiser accident."

"Okay, sure. Whatcha got?"

He tapped the pen and took a deep breath. This information could go a lot of ways, and most of them would be bad for DeShear. The legal pad was filled with various scripted versions of how to deliver the tip to Harriman so it raised his interest enough to order the tox screen but didn't get anyone brought in for questioning. It was a dicey route. Harriman's ambition blurred his judgement at times, and DeShear had a five-thousand-dollar lunch date the next day. He couldn't risk getting locked up for forty-eight hours if Harriman's boss got a bug up his butt and wanted to press him for more.

Downplay it.

“I got a tip that the good doctor was drugged and that’s what caused his wreck. Seems like a stretch, but I thought I should report it.”

DeShear held his breath.

“It is a stretch. Our guys checked the scene. He rolled his car on top of himself, end of story.”

“I know, but my source says if you do a tox screen for Propofol, you’ll find it in his system.” DeShear’s heels bounced on the vinyl flooring as he waited for an answer. “That’s the stuff Michael Jackson was on when he croaked. Can you request one and let me know?”

“Sounds pretty thin. How good is the source? I don’t wanna raise a ruckus over a respected member of the community and end up looking stupid. What if you contact the family directly and see if they’ll ask the medical examiner?”

Terrific.

Harriman’s ambition could make him a jerk, but he wasn’t usually this thick. “Mark, old buddy, if you get information that kicks this upstairs to major crimes, it’s another step up the ladder for you. Run the screen. It’s a legit tip, and it might prove something. How long would it take to get a result?”

“If I request it and there’s nothing there, you owe me a dinner.”

That was a good sign. The possibility of getting some kudos from his boss might have worked. “Okay.”

“At Bern’s, and I choose the wine.”

Of course it had to be at the most expensive steak house in town, the one known world-wide for its expansive wine cellar. “Steaks at Bern’s, and we drink beer. How long until I can hear back?”

“A day, maybe two. I’ll call over there after we hang up.”

With the fish on the hook, DeShear decided to press his luck. “That’s more like McDonald’s Big Mac speed. If you want a steak dinner, I need steak speed.”

“Kinda pushy when you’re asking me to do work you’re getting paid for, but I’ll see what I can do. Because you’re a friend.”

“Thanks,” DeShear said. “Good talking with you.”

He ended the call, then returned to the business of wearing out his carpet.

• • • •

HIS 7 A. M. BREAKFAST at Ihop wasn’t as leisurely as he’d hoped. Five grand was a lot to lose if the interview went bad. He’d have stayed home, but his carpet had suffered enough—and there’s only so much nervous energy you can vent at the gym. If he ate really slowly, a big plate of pancakes and eggs might fill some of the gap before his meeting.

At 7:30, shoving his untouched breakfast aside, he opened his laptop and returned emails for a while, trying to not look at his phone every five minutes to see what time it was. Then he went outside and bought a copy of the Tampa Tribute from the box in front of the restaurant. He sat down and perused the pages of each section while quietly bouncing his heels under the table like a madman. At ten thirty, after staring at the newspaper without actually reading anything, and surrendering to daydreams about a lavish cruise to the Bahamas paid for with the cash from his safety deposit box, he gave up stalling and headed toward his appointment.

The drive to Bayshore Boulevard was quiet. Morning traffic had already subsided, and things hadn’t yet picked up for the lunch rush. But the south end of Bayshore wouldn’t be too busy anyway. MacDill Air Force Base lay at the tip of the Bayshore peninsula, and any contractors there who wanted lunch offsite would stay farther south. Downtown Tampa lay at the north end of Bayshore, and office workers there tended to stay north so they could get back to the grind in less than sixty minutes. Bayshore itself was the scenic respite of big houses and old money, back from when Tampa first became a major shipping port over a hundred years ago. The doctors and lawyers who later moved into those mansions maintained the exclusive aura of Florida's very well-to-do.

Along the route, DeShear passed by the Braunheiser residence. A few police cars lined the driveway. Mrs. Braunheiser and her adult daughter would have gotten the bad news and come home, and by now they were probably meeting with the police to answer any questions as a matter of routine.

DeShear reached up and loosened his tie, more from nerves than from being hot. December in Florida was a fickle thing, causing people to run their air conditioners one day and wear leather jackets the next as Canadian winds struggled with Caribbean currents to see whether there would be a frost on Christmas day or swimming and sun tans. Today, Canada was winning—but only barely. The breeze off the bay created a light chop in the water, and it sprayed onto DeShear's windshield when the occasional large wave crashed into the rocks. Whitecaps were visible past the Tampa Yacht Club. It would be rough sailing for anyone who ventured out, regardless of the size of their boat.

Parking a few blocks from Kojack's Ribs, DeShear walked toward the designated intersection in the hopes of catching a few extra details about his mysterious client before she arrived. He shouldn't have bothered.

"You're early, Mr. DeShear."

Lanaya Kim had long legs, and she was a little heavier than he expected. A middle-aged woman with dark brown hair, almost black, but with few other overt Asian features, running didn't appear to be her thing. She sat in the middle of the wide grassy median that separated Bayshore Boulevard's northbound and southbound lanes, her legs in a V, arching herself toward one foot and then the other.

DeShear crossed the asphalt to stand near her. "Yeah, you never know with traffic around here. Nice to meet you, Ms. Kim."

She continued stretching, not looking up. "You came early to see if you could learn what kind of car I drove, or who else might be with me."

He smiled. "That's just good detective work, ma'am. Don't think anything of it."

"I won't. You are younger-looking in person than your online profile." She sat upright, putting her hands behind her on the grass. "Based on the college graduation date you listed on LinkedIn, you're in your mid-fifties. You could pass for thirty-five."

"Thank you. Good genes, I guess."

"Hmm." She narrowed her eyes at him. "Do my questions make you uncomfortable?"

Yes. "No, ma'am."

"Your hair has almost no gray. Do you color it?"

He stepped back a bit, putting a hand to his head. "Color it? No." His cheeks grew warm. This was already a very strange interview.

"Okay, then." She took a deep breath. "Shall we start?"

"Please."

She extended her hand and he helped her to her feet. The running shoes looked new. So did the red workout shirt and jogging shorts.

"Do you mind if we walk while we talk? It may help maintain the illusion that I'm here to casually exercise."

"Sure." He shrugged. "I'm not exactly dressed to work out, though."

“No, you are not. Next time, I’ll be more specific—although I thought it would have been obvious after I said what I’d be wearing. Lesson learned. This way, please.”

She crossed to the other side of Bayshore and headed north on the big sidewalk that ran several miles along the bay. Whether it was freezing out or hot, the bay always gave a breeze. Sometimes that breeze smelled of low tide, but the joggers didn’t seem to care.

“You have questions,” Lanaya said, pulling her hair into a ponytail as she walked. “What are they?”

DeShear followed her, gazing at the concrete railing that lined the sidewalk. “Well, I took the five thousand dollars out of my account and put it in a safe deposit box, so if you change your mind after our meeting, you can’t grab it back.”

She moved at a brisk pace, swinging her arms. “I have no intention of grabbing it back. It’s for services rendered. As of a few minutes from now, it’s yours. Then we’ll see about me hiring you to take my case.”

“Okay. You also mentioned some things yesterday that you said you’d explain today.” He loosened his tie again. “So I guess I’m really here to listen.”

“Fine. Let’s pick up the pace, shall we?”

He winced, wishing he’d worn different shoes, but took off his suit coat and swung it over his shoulder. Though he worked out every day, he still got sweaty easily when he did physical activity. The breeze from the bay could only do so much.

Between breaths, Lanaya spoke in short huffs. “I have information about a murder.”

“I know. The news and the cops still say it was just a car wreck, but we’re running down your drug tip.”

“I’m not talking about Dr. Braunheiser. The authorities dismissed the last two murders as well. Accidental deaths in all cases, except they weren’t. If Mark Harriman has requested the advance toxicology screen, we’ll have the report soon. Like the others, it will show Propofol.”

“That’ll be big news.”

“That’s not the big news. If somebody calls up the police and says a prominent physician didn’t die in a car wreck on his birthday, but was actually murdered, and three of his colleagues were murdered on their birthdays in the last twelve months, that’s big news.”

DeShear stopped walking. “If that were happening around here, I’m sure we’d have heard about it.”

“No, that’s exactly why you haven’t heard about it.” She ceased walking and came back to him. “It hasn’t happened around here. Dr. Braunheiser isn’t linked to the other murders because of where he lives. He’s linked by where he worked.”

“Which was where?”

She looked down. “I’m afraid I can’t divulge that at this time.”

Leaning against the thick concrete rail, DeShear frowned. His fifty-four-year-old knees preferred the padded comfort of running shoes to hard concrete and the thin leather soles of his dress shoes.

But that wasn’t the only reason for his discomfort. He couldn’t shake the feeling that something didn’t add up with Lanaya Kim. Maybe he was being played. Nobody spends five thousand dollars on a PI for a meeting. Not just for a meeting, anyway.

“You’re looking at me strangely.” She put her hands on her hips, drawing hard breaths. “I’m not crazy, but what if I am? The money is good.”

“Well,” he sighed. “I can’t argue with that.”

“See this?” She patted the thick concrete railing. Waves crashed on rocks a few feet below. “It’s designed to have cars not go through it, and it runs the entire length of this scenic drive, without a break, for over four miles. Guess where Braunheiser’s wreck occurred?”

He hooked a thumb over his shoulder. “The paper said it was south of here, at Ballast Point. Near the park.”

“Twenty feet past where this big railing stops. Coincidence?”

“Maybe. Most people don’t go for a drive and stay in front of their house.”

She folded her arms. “Let me turn the tables on you for a moment. You were highly recommended. I’m not seeing it. You said you were a police officer. Why did you leave your career after so many years? Did you not like it?”

“I’m not sure you want to hear my story. It has a sad ending so far.”

“Our future work arrangements end now if I don’t hear it.”

That got his attention, but it was a delicate topic. His instinct was to stare at the sidewalk, but he forced himself to look into her eyes and be firm and candid. “I got let go,” he said. “I received three commendations in two years, and had just gotten my picture taken with the mayor, when they fired me.”

The wind lifted a tuft of her long hair. She pushed it from her eyes and tucked it behind her ear. “What was the picture with the mayor for?”

“I was fishing at a marina, and I’m on the dock next to some of the bigger boats. Some guy jumps in this one boat and steals it. Problem is, he didn’t realize there were little kids down below. He gets about three hundred yards offshore and stops, and he throws the kids overboard. Now, there’s nobody around. The boat owner is in the bait shop getting ice and sodas, and I’m standing on the dock watching this thing unfold. The thief takes off again, and the kids are drowning in the channel. I don’t have a boat, so I jumped in. Swam over, saved the two kids. The waves were pretty good sized that day. The kids wouldn’t have lasted five minutes. Anyway, it made the newspapers, and I got my picture taken with the mayor. ‘Off-duty cop makes city proud.’ That kind of thing.”

“Fishing again. Do you do a lot of that?”

“I used to fish a lot with my dad when I was a kid.” DeShear stuck his hands in his pockets. “He died when I was in high school.”

“I’m sorry.” She shifted her weight. Her tone had softened. “What about the commendations?”

“You need the whole bio, huh?” He shrugged. “Okay.” He took his hands out of his pockets and counted on his fingers. “I got one for stopping a school shooting. Busted in the door and knocked the kid to the ground when he was still scaring everybody and firing holes into the ceiling. One was for a big drug bust where we saved a hostage. The other was for getting people out when the library was on fire.”

She shook her head, tucking another strand of hair behind her ear. “Why on Earth did they let you go?”

DeShear turned around and leaned on the railing, facing the breeze. In the distance, across the choppy water of the bay, stood the skyscrapers of downtown Tampa and its police headquarters.

“My partner and I went to a dirty apartment building, a little rat hole, where this guy was selling drugs. It was a domestic dispute call, and everybody in the place looked like they were starving to death except this big guy. He’s on meth or something, but the kids haven’t been showered in weeks. The girlfriend is full of bruises. So I’m talking to this guy, and he just let loose. He smacks his daughter, right in front of me. The kid’s about four or five, and she was crying because she was hungry, and he backhands her and tells her to shut up. Sends her flying.” He peered at Lanaya. “I had a bad temper. A quick temper. So I laid the guy out. I let him know what it was like to be on the receiving end of violence, so he'd think twice about hitting somebody next time. And . . . I busted his jaw." DeShear sighed, looking over the water. "Turns out, his dad is a big shot attorney, and they sued me for everything under the sun. I lost my job, and the big lawyer took my house, my car, my bank account, everything. Now I do this. And try to work on my quick temper."

"You still got three commendations. Those go to heroes." She stepped closer to him and lowered her voice. "I believe I'd be proud to have you work on my case."

He nodded. "Thank you."

The wind picked up again, taking a few scattered leaves from the sidewalk and carrying them across the wide boulevard. They came to rest on the manicured lawns of the mansions on the other side.

"When the Propofol is confirmed," Lanaya clasped her hands in front of her, "the police will demand to know where the information came from. If you tell them it was me, then that will make me a suspect. If you don't, they'll hold you as a suspect. I am not the person who did any of this, but if my name comes to light—from being booked as a suspect or being named in a news story—then people who want me silenced will know where to find me. Meanwhile, there have been several associates of Dr. Braunheiser's who lived around the country and who have died under ordinary-looking circumstances. Upon deeper investigation, their deaths were quite suspicious. Whoever did that is involved here. There may be other things involved as well."

He leaned against the concrete railing. "Well, again—murder goes over into the Tampa PD basket, and if they are around the country, it goes to the FBI."

"Yes, and while they assemble a task force and jockey for jurisdiction and rent office space and try to piece together what we already know, others will die."

"That's . . . not really my problem. I just can't—"

"Of course it's your problem." She stared straight into his eyes. "There are ruthless murderers after me. They'll happily kill you to get me."

DESHEAR GRIPPED THE steering wheel and frowned as he drove toward Tampa International Airport. Driving a client to the airport wasn't a big deal, but potentially putting his life at risk and still not getting the whole story, that didn't sit well. He valued his butt a lot more than five thousand dollars.

He also didn't feel he was in a position to argue. He needed the money, but people who can drop that kind of cash on an hour-long interview can probably hire people to get it back, too.

But a cruise to the Bahamas would be nice . . .

Then there was the story itself. Plausible, but thin. But there wasn't any harm in getting paid—and paid well—to listen to somebody's far-fetched story. It was a part of the job he didn't like, but it was still part of the job.

As long as he wasn't getting played somehow.

Maybe poke the bear one more time. See if she'll spill something.

"Listen," he said, adjusting his sunglasses. "If you really think your life is in danger, you need to go to the police."

She sat with her hands in her lap, clutching a small purse and staring out the window. "You still don't believe me. Well, what if I already did go to the police? You were a cop. What can they do? How many stories have you heard where some girlfriend was being battered, or an ex-wife's life was being threatened, and the police can't do anything until the guy makes a move? Well in my case, the move will be my death—and that's not really a good option."

"But I mean—"

"This is much bigger than that, and the best solution is for me to stay on the move, which I am. And you are potentially linked to me now. I've wired money to your account and we've spoken on your cell phone. We've met in person. I took precautions by using a numbered bank account and disposable phones, but any number of things could have been noticed on your end."

He nodded. "Well, thanks for that."

She turned and stared at him, keeping her hands in her lap. "Pull over."

"Don't get in a huff. You asked for a ride to the airport and I said I'd take you. Delta, was it?"

"Pull the car over right now."

He sighed, slowing the vehicle to make a turn. "I'll stop over here. This road's too busy for theatrics." He pointed to the vast, mostly empty parking lot of International Mall. "How's that?"

"That will do fine. Thank you."

Pulling past the rows of regal palm trees and coiffed topiaries, he eased into a parking spot away from any other cars. After turning off the engine, he turned and rested his back against the driver's side door, studying his soon-to-be-former client.

She stared at the small purse in her lap. "I've been trying to do you a favor, Mr. DeShear. Five thousand dollars is a lot of money, but I'm desperate. You can walk away right now and keep the cash. You did your part. You met with me." The quiver in her voice returned. It hooked him over the phone, and it reset the hook again now. "I . . . can get a cab from here. That's what I did to get to Bayshore. And I can—"

"I'll take you to the airport." He spoke in a low, soothing tone, almost a whisper. It was like a husband who was making up with his wife after a tiff where the words had been flung too hard. "I'm not a jerk. Not that kind of a jerk, anyway.”

She raised her head and swallowed hard. “I’m not crazy. I have proof that I’m in danger, and I have information about much more than that. But . . .” Turning to him, a tear ran down her cheek. “I don’t want to die.”

He pursed his lips, drawing a deep breath. Her fear was real. That mattered.

A tiny pop opened the little purse, revealing a thick wad of hundred-dollar bills and a driver’s license. She pressed them to one side and took out a few folded pieces of paper, handing them to him. “This is what you’ve been wondering about.”

He removed his sunglasses. The papers were photocopies of newspaper articles. One reported the accidental drowning of Emmet Kincaid, a winemaking consultant in northern California; the other was the accidental overdose of Nilla Cunde in Missouri, from painkillers. Both had died within the last thirty days.

She glanced at the papers. “At one time in their careers, they were geneticists. Like me.”

“Okay.” He handed the photocopies back to her. “But I can’t shake the feeling there’s something a lot bigger that you’re not telling me.”

“What if I told you both of these people had Propofol in their systems at the time of death, and that they both used to work together—at the same facility where Dr. Braunheiser once worked?”

He sat back. “Is that true?”

“What if I told you that someone knew they worked together with the others, and now all the geneticists who worked there are being systematically killed, one at a time? I can show you a list. But not here.” She stuffed the papers back into her purse. “I’ll show you in Atlanta.”

The hook was already set, and he was the fish. He had to learn the rest of her strange story.

“Why Atlanta?”

“Will another five thousand dollars get you to come with me?”

Another five thousand dollars!

He tried to remain calm. Money caused people to do stupid things, and his spider sense was pinging away at this woman.

But ten grand is ten grand.

“A smart guy would say no. I get the feeling you’re a rich lady who needs a body buried, and I’m gonna end up doing the digging. I’d like to still be a PI when this is all over, and not be in jail or the morgue.”

“I’m not rich.”

He put on his sunglasses and reached for the ignition. “You have ten thousand dollars to hand over to me in cash. That doesn’t make you poor.”

“I have a limited budget I procured for this instance, and I hoped it would never arrive.” She lowered her voice and sighed. “I have the other five thousand in cash, in a locker at the airport. Can I hire you to go with me to Atlanta or not?”

“Cash in a locker at the airport. Sounds ominous.”

“Yes. People with bad intentions stash boodles of money in lockers at the airport. You’ve been watching too much TV. Innocent people who need to move in a hurry might do it, too. I am not a person with bad intentions.” She sat upright and wiped her eyes. “Start the car. I’ll explain more in Atlanta. You can see the cash when we get to the Delta terminal. I’ll give you half the money when you buy your ticket. The rest, you get when I’m safely checked into my hotel.”

He glared at her, his jaw hanging open. “You’re not gonna take no for an answer, are you?”

“Not when ‘no’ might get me killed.”

He started the car, smiling. “Well, I guess I’d better pack a bag for my trip to Atlanta.”

“There’s no time. And I don’t want to risk going back to your apartment. We may have already been compromised.”

“Compromised, huh? You working for the CIA now?” He put the car in gear. “My place is on the way.”

• • • •

THEY NEVER GOT PAST the fire trucks.

Smoke was still billowing out of DeShear’s apartment building when they drove up. The captain motioned residents of the Polo Club Apartments to the front parking lot, and DeShear walked the rest of the way with Lanaya following. Three engines had been called out, but they hadn’t extinguished the fire before his apartment was incinerated—along with half of the building.

Residents and pedestrians gawked at the carnage, gasping and pointing at the black mess.

All DeShear could do was stare.

Lanaya viewed the charred damage from over his shoulder. “Now do you believe our lives are in danger, Mr. DeShear?”

“Yeah. Yeah, I sure do.” He was a talking statue—and barely that. Through his sunglasses, he watched firefighters spray water at columns of smoke that jumped and danced in the wind. Some white, some black, but all stinking of charcoal and lost memories and pain. And under it all, the burned-out remnants of his life.

Lanaya tugged his arm. “Come on. Let’s go.”

“All my stuff . . . my files, clothes, my furniture. Business records.”

“Mr. DeShear . . .”

“Pictures.” He turned to her. “Files.”

“You backed your computer up, right?”

“I—sometimes. On a hard drive. That was also in there.” He turned back to the blackened apartment building. “Crap!”

“Mr. DeShear.”

“And I did have some money stashed in the drawer of my desk. Not a lot, but—”

“Hank! Look at me.” She took his arm and pulled him aside, toward the hedges of the next building and out of the view of the gawkers. “This was not an accident. The arsonist who did this probably wanted you to be in that fire, and he may be nearby waiting for you to show up so he can finish the job. Let’s not make that task any easier. We must go. Now.”

“Yeah.” He backed away from the smoking mess of his home, letting her guide him. “Yeah, let’s get to the airport.”

THE GREYHOUND WAITED in the ER lobby for over an hour, a small canvas gym bag at his feet, pretending to read his cell phone. Right after the evening shift change, a very concerned Hispanic family entered the hospital. From what he could overhear, there had been an automobile accident involving the young parents and their small son. The father had arrived a few moments ago in an ambulance. The wife and little boy were apparently unharmed except for a good scare.

The grandmother arrived shortly after, and then the sister, with her husband and their young daughter; eventually the grandfather appeared as well, and an uncle. Within thirty minutes of their arrival, the young couple's entire extended family was gathered in the ER.

The Greyhound had been waiting for a group like this all night. He left his chair by the TV and newspapers, walking to the water fountain. When he returned, he sat near the family. None of them appeared visibly upset; the paperwork gave the wife the most concern, not the car wreck or her man's broken leg. A few minutes later, the wife had been called to come visit her husband somewhere down the hall. The grandfather and sister went with her, leaving the boy with his grandmother until they were certain Poppy's leg injury wouldn't be too much for little eyes to see.

But they were distracted. They wouldn't be checking for injuries that weren't obvious.

"Abuelita," he said in a low tone.

The family had been speaking English since they came in, with an occasional smattering of Spanish by the older woman, so the term of endearment—addressing her as "little grandmother" in Spanish—would get her attention without raising her concerns. She turned to face him.

"Ask the doctors to check the boy for internal injuries."

Judging from his height, The Greyhound estimated the little boy to be about three years old. He had been scampering around the ER with the girl, bouncing on chairs or hiding under them, until she wore out. Chattering away to anyone and no one, the boy had continued to race around the lobby until his mother shoved his iPad into his hands and instructed him to play a game with his cousin. After a few minutes, he tossed the tablet aside and was up again, searching for the few toys in the lobby and grabbing his grandmother's hand to find My Little Pony on the TV.

The old woman smiled at The Greyhound's question and waved her hand. "They say he's alright."

"I know, he seems fine. A little ball of fire. Bola de fuego." The Greyhound leaned toward her. "But in any car wreck with a small child, you must check for internal injuries. For safety."

The boy had been persistently grabbing at the crotch of his pants since coming into the emergency room.

"Chico," The Greyhound said as the little blur ran by. "Do you need to go to the bathroom?"

The boy stopped and looked at him. "No."

"He grabs himself like that all the time," the grandmother said. "He's just at that age."

The boy sprinted away to check the mulch of the large planters. His aunt and uncle were on the phone updating other family members, and his cousin sat mesmerized by whatever was on her iPad screen. But having put the idea in play, his grandmother stood and asked if the boy needed to use the restroom. Again, he declined. With a quiet grunt, she got up out of her chair and strolled toward him, holding out her hand. "Come on, we might be here a while. Let's try to go potty."

He plopped to the floor in protest. "But I don't have to go."

“Lorenzo! Up!” A sharp snap of Grandma’s fingers ended the standoff, her scowl rousing the child to his feet. The pair walked hand in hand to the ladies’ restrooms and disappeared inside.

The Greyhound returned to reading his phone, waiting for the next round of the grandmother’s family members to be called back to visit the injured father. A moment later, the wife and Grandfather returned to the lobby, announcing that her husband’s leg was badly broken and he was headed for surgery. He was going to need pins and would be wearing a large cast for a few months, but otherwise he wasn’t hurt too badly.

The ladies restroom door flew open.

“Cristina!” The grandmother’s face was white. “Call the doctor. He’s peeing blood.”

The ER sprung into calm but fast action. Nurses and aides in scrubs appeared, ushering the boy and his angry-faced mother toward the triage rooms, and a chunk of the family followed. The sister’s husband and daughter stayed behind with the uncle, but most of the rest—from what The Greyhound could see—followed along.

The Greyhound stood up and went with them.

He shoved his phone under the mulch of one of the large planters, picked up his gym bag, and moved with the group. The internists would eventually shoo the overflow of family from the boy’s room, but The Greyhound only needed to walk with them past security. Since the shift change, no one on staff would know how long he’d been there, and with him sitting next to the family, they’d assume he was with them.

At the first corner, he turned left when the family cluster turned right.

The hospital’s cameras and watchful eyes were everywhere, but The Greyhound knew as long as someone acted like they were where they were supposed to be, no one on the staff really noticed if they weren’t.

He only needed to find one small room, make a quick adjustment to their inventory, and he’d be on his way.

Entering an empty elevator, he peeled off his shirt and sweat pants to reveal the scrubs he’d purchased at the uniform supply store. He shoved his clothes into the gym bag and pulled out a long, heavy metal box. Thanks to the ever-increasing need for businesses to put everything about themselves online—including their floor plans—he knew exactly where on the third floor to locate the surgery center. Down the hall from pre-op was the main drug holding area, a small, heavily locked area that contained the anesthesia. Near the surgery center was the holding room vault.

The Greyhound smiled as the elevator doors opened. Crossing to the nearby vending area, he slipped the gym bag into the trash, opened the heavy metal box, and withdrew its contents.

The best part about technology is how complacent it made everyone. Companies that sold things to hospitals didn’t make any money if the hospital wasn’t constantly upgrading to the latest, greatest thing. Oxygen sensors needed to be more portable and super lightweight; x-ray machines need to take digital images and send them instantly to the laptop waiting a few feet away. A heart rate monitor needed to slip over a finger and be every bit as accurate as its earlier, bigger, heavier versions. Everything—simply everything—must be high tech.

Newer hospitals utilized biometrics now—a password, followed by a fingerprint. Certain older ones—like those targeted for acquisition by the Angelus Genetics group, for example—still only required passwords.

With a steel-cased, electrically-encoded lock, a digital keypad on the door, and an overhead security camera, the most restricted drugs in the hospital would be unwatched ninety-nine percent of the time. Even the best security guards couldn't stay focused on a door that only opened a few times a day.

Complacency. The Greyhound counted on it.

Most of the time, a well-placed, powerful electromagnet would zap an older system, defaulting to not holding the deadbolt in the locking position—and rendering the door temporarily unlocked.

After that, the drug vault itself needed to be accessed. The same magnet would open it, too.

The Greyhound held his heavy electromagnet close to his hip, walking straight to the meds vault like he was the head of the hospital. His heart pounded as he moved toward his target. Would it open? He never knew until he tried. Sometimes yes, sometimes no.

At a prior attempt at a different hospital, an intern had stepped ahead of him and opened the door to the vault. That made access easier, but it meant disabling the man with some close quarter punches before grabbing the goods. He fingered the bandage above his eye. The fight hadn't been quick enough. He wouldn't make that mistake again.

Holding his breath, he stood in front of the secured room and pressed the big magnet against the lock, to the side of the knob and keypad, where the circuit board and deadbolt engagement system were located. The keypad's blue LED screen went black, and a clunk came from the thick door's insides.

His heart thumped in his ears as he reached out and grabbed the handle. With a gentle tug, the door opened.

A rush of adrenaline surged through him as he crept inside. Now, to the meds vault.

He blinked a few times, realizing that he was panting hard. His pulse was throbbing and sweat gathered on his brow. The small room was uncomfortably warm, but he focused on the vault.

The thick, tempered glass door displayed rows of tiny bottles behind it, each with an important-looking label. Black ink with a blue square or a red dot made about the only discernible difference in the bottles, aside from the bold print identifying each drug.

He lifted the magnet onto the side of the vault, waiting for the readout to fail and the default spring to be released, causing the noticeable clunk the same way it had on the vault.

The LED screen stayed blue.

The Greyhound swallowed hard, his heart in his throat. He forced the magnet downward an inch, scraping the painted steel side of the vault. Its metallic screech was like nails on a chalk board.

Nothing.

A bead of sweat rolled down his forehead and off the tip of his nose. Huffing, he gritted his teeth and shoved the magnet back an inch. It was only a matter of time before someone from security barged into the vault. He had less than a minute, at best.

But how long have I been in here already?

He wiped his brow with his sleeve and put a hand on the vault. Gripping the big magnet, he forced it to move in a circular motion over the side panel.

Engage. Now.

Time. There wasn't much time.

Blinking sweat from his eyes, he worked the stubborn magnet around, searching for the locking hardware. The electronics had to be there. It was on all the diagrams. Opposite the vault's hinges and an inch or so from the front.

Where is it?

The one in LA had given him trouble. Several had, in fact. St. Paul, Baton Rouge . . .

He tried to force that out of his mind, heaving against the magnet to get it to budge.

Keep moving it. The lock is here. It's on all the diagrams.

With each thrust of his sweating hands, the magnet scraped along the side of the vault in fractions of an inch. Would this be another one he had to walk away from?

Seconds ticked by. The guards would have been notified by now, and they would be on the way. A whole-floor lockdown would ensue in a matter of moments, and then he'd be—

Clunk.

His heart leaped. He righted himself and yanked open the vault door, reaching past the red and green labels to the large teal bottle that said Propofol.

Grabbing it, a bolt of pain lurched through his stomach. He winced and doubled over, groaning as the air rushed out of him. The bottles nearly fell from his grasp. Making a fist, he pressed his other hand to his belly and squeezed his eyes shut, leaning on the countertop to keep from falling to the floor.

Not now.

A wave of nausea swept through him. The room grew warmer. He sunk to his knees and leaned against the wall, swiping his shoulder across his forehead again. Swallowing hard, he pushed down the urge to vomit and slapped a hand onto the countertop, forcing himself back to his feet. He stood there, gasping and dripping, as he slipped the Propofol bottles into his pocket.

He glanced at the door. It swayed back and forth.

Get it together.

Closing his eyes, he hoped the door would be standing still when he reopened them. It complied. With a deep breath, he tightened his gut and took a step forward.

His legs went out from under him and he crashed to the counter again.

Walk. Move it or go to prison.

With a groan, he pushed off the counter and grabbed for the door latch.

A few seconds of acting normal and you'll be home free. It's less than sixty seconds to the elevator. In three minutes, you'll be outside.

He eyed the door. "Suck it up," he whispered to himself. "You can manage for three minutes."

He knew the nausea and pain would pass soon, but the bouts had been getting stronger, and each round was knocking him down for longer and longer periods of time. The last one came on fast and took him down for a week. That couldn't happen now. This needed to be a wave; it needed to come and go, not be the start of another crash.

He didn't have time for a crash.

Breathe.

Sixty seconds to the elevator. Another hundred and eighty to the rear parking lot.

The rest of your life depends on the next four minutes.

Nodding, he straightened up and clenched his gut. He opened the door and stepped into the hallway. The air conditioning was cooler there, for some reason. Less stuffy than in the small vault.

The nausea subsided. He took a few steps.

Normal. Walk normal. And with confidence.

He quickened his pace, glancing down the corridor to the elevator.

Fifty feet, then forty.

As he neared the elevator, relief swept through his system. He was going to make it.

The light over the elevator came on and the bell pinged. As the doors opened, several dark uniforms came into view.

Security.

He peeked to his right. The vending area. He slipped inside and faced a big machine filled with potato chips and granola bars. In the machine's glass, the dark uniforms raced by behind him. He dropped the magnet into the trash can and waited, closing his eyes to catch the sound of the elevator closing.

When they did, he walked to them. He waved his hands between the doors, forcing them to open. Once inside, he could collapse.

"Long day?" The petite African-American woman in the corner wore a light gray suit and carried a clip board.

And a badge.

The security captain.

The elevator doors shut as he faced the panel of buttons. "Yeah, I pulled a double."

The indicator was lit for the next floor down. He pressed L for lobby, the ground floor, and kept his face to the front.

"I work doubles all the time. Seems like the hospital admins never work late, but us low level folks can't work enough hours for them. You look exhausted."

"I feel exhausted. Like I'm going to pass out if I don't get to bed soon." He mustered a smile and glanced in her direction, not long enough to be perceived as checking her out, but not so short as to be dismissive. He needed to act normal and engage the way a hospital staff member would with someone they might run into again—and to not draw undue attention to himself. "Sorry. Guess I shouldn't complain."

She was attractive, wearing her black hair pulled back in a tight bun, but with high cheek bones and big eyes. Her suit was just snug enough to show off her figure, but this wasn't the time for that. He had to fight to act normal until she got off the elevator.

The nausea crept back to him. He pressed his hand to his gut and swallowed reflexively to keep the queasiness at bay, but it wouldn't stay back for long. When it came, it'd stay for a few hours or stay for a week, depending on if it was a small wave or a tidal wave.

The elevator pinged. The woman stepped to the front. "Well, see you around."

"Cheers." His gaze lingered just beneath the hem of her short jacket as she walked away.

Then the knot in his stomach seized up on him again and he leaned against the wall as the elevator doors closed.

He reached his rental car without further incident and crawled inside. He managed to drive to a fast food place a block away before he threw up, then he slouched in his seat until the pain in his stomach subsided. Once he made it back to his hotel, he could rest until the wave passed. Some water and carbs would be a good idea, too, before he regrouped to pursue the real target of his trip.

St. Anthony's hospital across town, and a rendezvous with its chief of medicine, Dr. Asher Fishel.

THEY PASSED A FEW HOURS in the airport lounge—gate side—with DeShear bouncing his heels under the chair and staring at his newspaper, doing his best not to get up and wear out the airport carpet.

If they tracked her to Tampa and connected her to me, then they can follow us to Atlanta.

He studied every bulge in every passenger's suit jacket to be certain it was not a gun, and reassured himself that every fleeting look from a maintenance worker was not a covert enemy operative calling in a kill squad.

When their flight boarded, he was finally able to relax.

His client was another matter.

The locker contained a laptop and a few other essentials. While they flew, she typed furiously—and constantly checked over her shoulder and up and down the aisle to ensure no one was watching her.

He toyed with his complimentary miniature bag of pretzels. Lanaya needed to calm down a few notches. “You warned me about being tracked digitally,” he said. “Do you think it's safe to use your computer on an airplane?”

“They don't collect Wi-Fi data from devices on airplanes. It's too expensive to record all the searches and tie them back to the end user.”

“What are you checking?”

She didn't look up from the screen. “Googling former co-worker names.”

“To see which ones are still alive?”

“Basically.”

“Okay.” He reached over and gently closed her laptop. “I don't know exactly what kind of trouble we're in, but that's not helping you.”

“I—”

“You need a break. Check it later. Right now, let me buy you a drink.” He pressed the overhead “call attendant” button. In the front of the plane, an electronic bell dinged.

Settling back into his chair, he smiled at the flight attendant when she appeared a moment later. “My lady friend and I would like a drink. Do you have any Mexican beer?”

The young lady scribbled on her pad. “Yes, sir.”

“Perfect. I'll have one. And my friend will have . . .”

“Tequila,” Lanaya blurted out. “A shot of Tequila.”

DeShear raised his eyebrows. As the flight attendant went down the aisle, he faced Lanaya. “Tequila? I figured you for a chardonnay gal.”

“Normally, yes. But I realized my life may be ending soon, and there's a lot of things I haven't tried.”

DeShear opened his mouth to speak, but stopped. He opened the bag of pretzels instead, and popped one in his mouth.

Lanaya slipped the laptop into the seat pocket in front of her. “I've arranged for two business class suites at our hotel.”

“Okay. Good.” DeShear lowered his voice. “You know, I've been wondering how you book airline tickets and hotel rooms.” He held the tiny foil bag to his lips and tapped a few more pretzels into his mouth. “After a while a fake ID can be tracked just like a real one. You must have several.”

“I have a friend’s prepaid debit card.” Lanaya whispered, rearranging the copy of In Flight magazine and the safety card that rested in the seat pocket with her laptop. “I gave her ten thousand dollars and she got me the card. We are close enough in appearance that I’m able to travel using her driver’s license.”

“That works?”

“Most women change their hair style over time, Mr. DeShear. Longer, shorter, highlights—or they gain or lose weight. They take their glasses off for the photo but wear them in person. If a license is more than a few years old, the image will have faded. At my age, as long as the resemblance is close and no one’s calling the credit card services, it’s not a big deal.”

The flight attendant returned with their drinks. DeShear picked up his plastic cup of beer. “Cheers.”

Lanaya lifted her cup and raised it to her lips. It hung there, suspended in midair.

“Is there a problem?” DeShear asked.

“I’ve never had tequila before.” Lanaya stared at the clear liquid in the cup. “It smells awful.”

DeShear chuckled. “It tastes even worse.”

She sniffed the cup. “Why do people drink it?”

“Most? To get drunk.”

“Oh. Of course.” She inched the tiny glass closer and stopped again.

DeShear sighed. “How about we share drinks? Take half your shot, and chase it with a big sip of my beer.”

“That—thank you. That sounds like a good idea.” She closed her eyes and put the cup to her mouth, allowing the tiniest of swallows to cross her lips. “Oh!” She stomped the floor, shaking her head. “Oh! Oh! Oh!”

DeShear flinched.

“Ew! Oh my!” Lanaya screwed up her face, waving her hands. “Oh, that is awful. Quick, give me the beer.”

DeShear handed over his drink. Lanaya gulped hard—and kept gulping. The cup went horizontal, then three-quarters vertical, then straight up. She slammed it on the folding table, shaking her head again. The last bit of beer had been completely drained from it. “Bleh.”

She took a few deep breaths as DeShear held out a miniature pretzel. “So—ready for another?”

• • • •

DURING HER SECOND MEXICAN beer, Lanaya finally seemed relaxed. DeShear was a few drinks in, too, so he probed a little more about her strange associates.

She wasn’t having any of it.

“At the hotel, and definitely not while drinking.”

DeShear knew when he was beat. He sipped his beer and made small talk, keeping her mind off their troubles—to the extent that was possible.

“I misjudged you, Mr. DeShear.” Lanaya slurred her words a little. “You’re brave and smart, and you have the commendations to prove it.”

“I did have them. They went up in flames with that picture of me and the mayor.”

“Yes.” She took another sip of beer. “I’m very sorry about that. Your pictures were the only personal thing you really mentioned at the fire. They must have been very special. Family?”

DeShear sat forward. “Why are we on a plane to Atlanta?”

She shrugged. "Because walking would take too long." She burst into laughter at her joke. Alcohol consumed at high altitudes was allegedly more potent than at sea level. DeShear hadn't factored that in when he ordered the second round. Or the third.

"No." DeShear smirked. "I mean, why Atlanta? Do you have something hidden at the gate for when we land?"

"Killers tend to be less effective in places that use metal detectors to find guns." She giggled, waving her cup at him. "That's a plus for us."

He watched her, not smiling and not frowning, just waiting.

"Because," she sighed. "It's a major hub for nearly everywhere else in the United States, and we need quick access to California, Montana, Ohio, Minnesota . . . Now, that's all I'm telling you until —"

"—until we are checked safely into our hotel," he said. "Okay. You win."

"Mr. DeShear—Hank DeShear—why do you go by 'Hank'? Hamilton is a perfectly good name. Hamilton DeShear. It's practically regal-sounding."

"It's a little long."

"What's your rush? Hamilton DeShear is far more memorable."

"I guess I hadn't thought about being memorable."

"You were certainly memorable to those girls you saved. And to those library workers." She took another sip of beer. "Tell me more about Hamilton DeShear, the man I'm entrusting my life to."

DeShear reached over and took her cup, placing it on the empty tray table on the other side of him. "What would you like to know?"

"Tell me a fishing story about you and your father."

"He was my foster father. My real parents died in a car wreck when I was a baby."

"That's terrible."

"Now, Curt DeShear, he was a good guy. I loved him a lot. Good dad. I went to a couple of foster homes and stuff before he and his wife adopted me. I only remember a little about her."

"What happened to her?"

"Cancer took her when I was about ten. She gave it a good fight. Lasted a couple of years, but she was constantly in the hospital, and back then they didn't really have the things they have now. She suffered a lot."

"I'm very sorry," Lanaya said. "I shouldn't have pried."

"It's okay, you didn't know." DeShear drained the last of the beer from the cup. "I made the best of the family I got."

"Hmm." Lanaya settled into the seat, pressing her cheek to the cushion and drawing her knees up. "Was there ever a Mrs. Hamilton DeShear? Or children?"

"I told you, my story was a sad one so far. Are you sure you wanna hear it?"

"Perhaps we can change it going forward. Besides, you can't give a reply like that and then not tell the story. Give."

"We met in graduate school, got married right after. I started teaching and she landed her dream job at a big accounting firm, so we waited to have kids. But after a couple of years, we stopped waiting—and then it was the babies who wanted to wait. We just couldn't get pregnant, and then we had miscarriage after miscarriage. I just . . . a guy can only watch his wife's heart break so many times. To be so excited and then have it all crash, then the crying—for weeks. I couldn't keep putting her through it. But then we found out we were pregnant again, so I didn't say anything. And this time we had a baby. A beautiful baby girl, who erased all our sadness just by showing up. When she was born, she was the biggest ray of sunshine in our lives. The sky was bluer, the grass was greener. Then . . . when she was three . . . she got sick. She just, faded. They said it was similar to Leukemia. No cure. We spent a year watching her go. Most marriages can't last through that. Ours didn't. Each time we saw each other, we saw our daughter not there, and we just couldn't do it."

They sat there in silence, the low hum of the engines filling the plane. When the flight attendant dimmed the lights, the last of the passenger conversations dimmed as well.

Lanaya snuggled into her cushion. "You've had a lot taken from you in your life."

"I told you, I'm down but I'm not out. Not by a long shot." He took off his tie and rolled it up, stuffing it into his pants pocket. "And after we check into our hotel, you're telling me your story. The one that put us on a last-minute flight to Atlanta."

"Okay," she said, her eyes half closed. "I promise."

THE PEACHTREE PLAZA was a downtown skyscraper of a hotel, one much nicer than DeShear expected his client to provide. Low key seemed to be Lanaya's M. O., but he wasn't arguing. Room service and a hot bath sounded good.

They passed through the crowded lobby to the front desk, where she checked them in. Holly had been strung across the countertop, and a big Christmas tree adorned the area near the elevators.

Lanaya had procured adjacent rooms. "So we can go back and forth to talk without stepping into the hallway where we might be spotted."

Shaking his head, DeShear slid his plastic key through the slot on the hotel room door. "I think you can calm down a little here. We should be fine in a busy hotel."

Lanaya opened the door to the room next to his. "You're the one who's been bouncing your feet all day."

Once inside, she knocked on the interior door. DeShear flipped the deadbolt and opened the door. Two inches away, Lanaya had cracked hers open. "When we're asleep, you keep yours open. I'll keep mine locked. Otherwise," she stepped back and pushed her door open the rest of the way. "We can work in here and strategize."

"Sounds good. Let me wash my face to wake up, and I'll be right over."

He returned a few minutes later with a towel around his neck and a Coke in his hand. She waved for him to join her at the little desk by the window, opening her laptop. She glanced at his soda. "Would you mind grabbing one of those for me?"

"Not at all." He tossed the towel onto the bed and opened the panel on the console under the TV, accessing the mini fridge. "Coke? Or something else?"

"Coke's fine."

"Not tequila?"

"Never again." She shuddered.

He smiled and handed her the little bottle. Aside from being her semi-body guard, he still wasn't really sure why he was here. But as she said, the money was good, so he could afford to be patient. She'd tell him when she was ready.

"I think our killer or killers will head to Minneapolis next." She pointed to a map on the laptop screen. "The researchers in the group I worked in were recruited from all over the country. I think that was on purpose. They'd have less in common, but upon release they'd return home—and be far less likely to connect with former co-workers. Two from my group work together in Minneapolis."

"I think you're about two jumps ahead of me," DeShear said, glancing at the lights of the Atlanta skyline out the window. A few blocks away, a tall, thin crane dangled a wreath above a construction site. "Let's back up a bit. You said the murder victims worked together. When?"

She closed the map window and a black screen appeared with lines of code. She typed on the keyboard and closed the program. "The better question is where."

"Okay." He lowered himself onto the bed, reclining on one elbow. "Where and when?"

She spun in the chair to face him. He said nothing, just cradled the Coke in his hands.

Lanaya sighed and cracked open her soda bottle, staring at it. "People don't set out to do bad things. I don't think they do, anyway." She raised her eyes to meet his. "I was a good scientist, Hamilton. I won the Tewksbury award my final year in my doctorate program. My parents were so proud. I got recruited to Centaur Genomics, and life was good. My work was highly praised in numerous publications. Then I got a call from Angelus Genetics. They weren't as established, but they were very cutting edge. Marcus Hauser didn't talk about changing the world—he was doing it. And they had it all, at Angelus. A big raise, free day care, student loan forgiveness. They offered below market rate loans to employees for cars and houses because they wanted the very best people on their team. I was young and ambitious. I jumped at the chance.”

He let her talk. He'd learned confessions take time.

She leaned back in the chair, holding the Coke in her lap, slowly turning the bottle. “Fast forward a few years and you realize they own you. You're not going to make that kind of money anywhere else, and if you leave, you'd have to drastically change lifestyles. No more private schools or semiannual vacations to Hawaii and Aspen.” She shrugged, watching the little bubbles work their way up the side of the plastic bottle. “Then one day they announced they were downsizing. Some of us were offered positions at their subsidiary in Arizona—Onyx Research. This facility was very different. Specialized. Very compartmentalized, and extremely secretive. You barely knew the name of the person in the next cubicle, much less what they were working on. I was assigned to a project that was the cream of the crop. The one that was going to make Angelus Genetics famous. These people weren't just curing cancer, they were removing the possibility of anybody getting it to begin with. And not only cancer. Diabetes, MS, Heart disease—all the biggies.

“Some of the younger employees created an online black screen site, to do at home what we couldn't do at work—talk—but using symbols instead of names. One girl, Double Omega, said her project's success rates were inflated. A week later, she was gone. Rumors on the black screen site said it was suicide. I didn't know her, but it seemed possible. Positions at the Onyx facility were extremely high-pressure, and the lack of interaction was depressing for a lot of people.”

She sighed, getting up and facing the window. Her reflection showed her lost in thought, reliving things she wanted to forget. “I got reassigned to a new project. That happened a lot. Segmentation. One person started a project, another finished it, and who knows how many worked on it in between? But that way, Onyx guaranteed employees couldn't take secrets to a competitor. I soon realized I'd taken over Double Omega's project. She had it backwards. They were not inflating the success rates, they were hiding the failures. If the classification group succeeded at all, the viables were segregated out and given a new group name. This would show something like 80 or 90% success in the new classification group, but they were only taking 10% of the entire pool. So the project actually had a 90% failure rate or worse. That's much closer to industry norms.”

She shook her head, turning to him. Her eyes were red and brimming with tears. “I was a very good scientist, Hamilton. And now . . .” Her voice broke. “I'm probably going to be publicly discredited and murdered in a way that looks like an accident.”

DeShear sat up on the bed. “So these killings, our case . . . somebody's committing murder over a bunch of faked reports?”

“It's big money, Hamilton. World-wide patents that might eradicate life-threatening afflictions are worth billions of dollars, possibly trillions. People shoot each other in a neighborhood poker game. They can certainly be killed over billions of dollars. But no, our murders didn't take place because of Onyx's DNA sequencing successes. They're happening because—”

There was a knock at the door. “Room service.”

DeShear slid off the bed. “I'll get it.”

“Don't!” Lanaya hissed. He stopped and looked at her, opening his mouth. Her eyes were wide. “I didn't order any room service.”

The knock on the door came again. "Room service."

DeShear put a finger to his lips and rushed to the door. Through the peep hole, he could make out the top half of a large man in a white culinary service jacket. He went back to Lanaya, whispering in her ear. "Get up. Tell him to leave it outside, then go into the bathroom."

She rose, her hand to her mouth. DeShear quietly placed his drink in the trash can by the desk, then put his hands on Lanaya's shoulders and leaned in close. "Thank him first. I've got this."

"Thank you," she said, inching across the room. "Please leave it outside."

"Good job," DeShear whispered. "You're doing fine."

"Yes, ma'am. I need you to sign for the bill."

DeShear moved in front of her, holding a hand out and moving the other one back and forth under it.

She nodded. "Can you slide it under?"

Giving her a thumbs up, DeShear looked around the room for a makeshift weapon.

The man in the hallway thumped the door bottom a few times. "No, I'm sorry, it doesn't fit. This new carpet's too thick."

"One minute." She faced DeShear, mouthing, "What do we do?"

He guided her into the bathroom and pulled the door halfway closed. "Stay here. Don't say or do anything."

He went to the door and stared at the handle, drawing a deep breath. Glancing to the bathroom to make sure Lanaya wasn't visible, he leaned close and held his hand above the latch.

Could be an honest mistake by the hotel.

Could be an execution.

Jerking the handle downward, he flung open the door. The waiter stood next to a room service cart. Two flat metal plate covers rested on top of the cart's long, white tablecloth.

The waiter launched himself into the doorway. Jumping backwards, DeShear grabbed the man's collar and heaved him face-first into the heavy door. He held the intruder by the back of the neck, pinning him. The man grunted and flailed, reaching for the waistline bulge at the small of his back. DeShear rammed a shoulder into him, slamming the man into the door again. Grabbing the intruder's hand, DeShear forced it skyward. The assailant howled in pain.

DeShear dropped the man's hand and yanked up the jacket, revealing a holster and a large gun. He pulled the weapon free and gripped it tightly, then slammed the butt of the heavy gun into the side of the man's head.

The intruder slumped and fell to the floor.

DeShear stood over him, panting. Grabbing his assailant under the arms, DeShear dragged him toward the bed, then went back to retrieve the room service cart.

He called to the bathroom. "You can come out now."

Lanaya peeked past the bathroom door.

DeShear rolled the cart toward the bed. "It's okay. This guy's done for the night."

As his client crept out of the bathroom, DeShear lifted the metal plate covers from the room service cart. There was nothing underneath. He tossed them onto the bed and flipped up the tablecloth, exposing a sawed off, pump action shotgun. He grabbed it and took it to Lanaya. "Do you know how to use one of these?"

She recoiled. "I'm a scientist, not a cowboy!"

"Okay." He tucked the pistol into his belt and went into his room, ratcheting the shotgun barrel repeatedly until all the shells were ejected onto the mattress. After sliding the shotgun under the bed, he gathered the expended shells and carried them to his bathroom, where he deposited them into the toilet tank.

He pulled the pistol from his belt and sprung the magazine, checking its ammunition.

Full load.

Motioning to Lanaya, he stepped toward the door and pressed himself to the wall. She followed.

“Keep quiet,” he whispered. “If our friend has somebody waiting in the hall, we don’t want them to know it’s us coming out.”

He eased the handle downward and inched the door open. At the end of the hallway stood a man in plain clothes, doing nothing.

That’s unusual for a hotel.

DeShear opened the door the rest of the way. “Keep calm. We’re a husband and wife going to dinner.” She went through, then he joined her, walking side by side with the gun behind her lower back.

They moved down the hallway toward the man.

“Honestly, darling,” DeShear said. “It’s very late. I’d just as soon skip dinner and grab a drink at the bar.”

Lanaya said nothing. She swallowed hard and trembled.

DeShear carried on the act, solo. “Hmm? Well, if you insist, my love.”

The man stared at them as they approached.

DeShear smiled at him when they got close. “Excuse me, friend, but do you have the time?”

The man looked past him.

“No?” DeShear pulled out his gun and shoved it into the man’s face. “Well, then, can you turn around and grab the wall? Feet spread.”

The man hesitated.

“Your buddy’s dead,” DeShear scowled. “Don’t join him.”

Lanaya gasped. “You killed him?”

DeShear winced. “Shh!”

He patted the man down and relieved him of a .45 caliber revolver.

“Walk with me to the elevator,” DeShear said to the stranger. “You’re going to get in and go straight to the top floor.”

When the elevator arrived, DeShear shoved the man into the back and leaned inside to press the top button. “Don’t get cute and exit early. If I see you downstairs in the next hour, it’s not gonna be pleasant for you.”

As soon as the elevator doors closed, DeShear stepped back and watched the floor indicator light show the man was going up.

“Now,” DeShear said. “We take the service elevator to the laundry room and get out of here.”

He grabbed Lanaya’s hand and they raced down the hallway.

DR. ASHER FISHEL BLEW a long stream of smoke at the computer screen, scowling at the spread sheet displayed there.

“Don’t you ever go home, Ash?” Dr. Kuntara leaned in the doorway of her friend’s office, fanning the haze of smoke away from her nose. “And open a window, would you?”

Fishel coughed a few times, pulling the cigarette from his mouth as he lumbered to heft his massive frame up from his desk. A half-eaten cheeseburger rested on a cafeteria tray, next to an overflowing ash tray and a can of Diet Coke. “I have work to do. Marcus is up my rear about the merger.”

“Maybe another cigarette will help you with that cough.”

He walked past his dusty treadmill to the window, sliding it open. The blinds swayed in the night’s chilly breeze. “We can’t all be smoothie drinking marathoners like you, Tahvia.” Fishel held his cigarette out the window. “Between the merger, the board review, my high blood pressure, my high cholesterol, the new regulations . . . there’s so many things that are trying to kill me, I’m lucky I’m still standing.”

“It’s possible we board members have concerns about the long-term health of our key man. But suit yourself, boss. See you tomorrow. And don’t let Dr. Hauser work you too late.” Kuntara grabbed the door knob and pulled the door shut behind her.

“When do I ever?” Fishel grunted. He went back to his cluttered work space and swigged his soda. A computer screen full of spread sheets stared at him. He took a swig of his drink, sucked on the cigarette, and hunched over the keyboard.

A knock came from the door. Fishel glanced at his watch. According to his Rolex Presidential, it was almost eight-thirty. “Housekeeping,” he muttered. “As if I didn’t have enough distractions.” He called out in the direction of the door. “Come back in an hour.”

The man on the other side mumbled something, then knocked again.

Fishel didn’t look up from the computer. “I said come back later!”

The door opened and a tall man in blue coveralls backed into the room, pulling a large cleaning cart. Rags and spray bottles hung over the sides, and a big trash can rose from the center.

“Are you new? Or deaf? I’m busy. You’ll need to clean later.” The doctor glared at the cleaner and took another drag on his cigarette. “Habla English, you moron? Later. Come back later.”

With his back to Fishel, the cleaner pulled something from his pocket and raised it to his head. When he turned around, his face was covered by a black ski mask.

THE GREYHOUND SHOVED the office door closed and leveled a gun at the frightened chief of medicine. “Do you habla .38 caliber, Doctor Fishel?”

The blood drained out of the doctor’s face. “I—I . . .” His hands slid from the keyboard and disappeared under the desk.

Keeping the gun aimed at the doctor’s head, The Greyhound held up a smart phone with a video image playing. “You have a silent alarm button under your top drawer. Before you answer the phone and give the security answer for an emergency rescue, you need to look at this.”

His mouth hanging open, Dr. Fishel peered at the screen. The Greyhound came closer, holding the phone in front of him. “This is live streaming video of your wife at the bookstore where she is attending her book club. As long as you do exactly what I say, when I say it, your wife will not be hurt. If you do not do exactly as I say, she will be murdered in the parking lot on the way to her Volvo. Nod if you understand.”

The doctor stared at the screen, white faced. “Shanna . . .”

The Greyhound slammed a hand down onto the desk. “Nod if you understand, Dr. Fischel.”

He nodded.

His heart pounding, The Greyhound swallowed hard and set the streaming phone next to the doctor’s keyboard. “Do not touch the phone. My man on the other end needs to hear me every thirty seconds or he kills your wife. Nod if you understand.”

As his office phone rang, the doctor glanced at it, then back to The Greyhound. He nodded again.

Stepping around to the chair, The Greyhound put his gun to the doctor’s head. The phone rang a second time.

A sharp pain ignited in The Greyhound’s stomach, throbbing and sending stabs in all directions. He winced and re-gripped the gun with his sweaty fingers, forcing himself to remain upright. He balled up his other hand and pressed it to his abdomen.

The pain flared again.

The Greyhound sucked in his breath and leaned on the credenza. “When I tell you, answer the phone and give security the ‘all clear’ password. If you do not, your wife dies. If security comes in and tries to apprehend me, my man at the bookstore opens fire. Nod if you understand.”

The doctor nodded. The phone rang a third time.

“Answer it,” The Greyhound said. His lungs ached and his head throbbed. Pulses of green and red flashed over his vision. The gun stayed pointed at the trembling doctor.

Fishel lifted the black receiver from its cradle. He held it to his head and closed his eyes, swallowing hard. “This is Dr. Fishel. Nightingale. I repeat, Nightingale.”

The Greyhound breathed hard, sweat running down his neck. He raised his other hand to steady the first, the gun staying pointed at the chief of medicine.

“No, everything’s fine. The cleaner came in and I mashed the panic button trying to get up. Getting too plump for my chair, I guess.”

Eyeing the doctor and then the video playing on the phone, The Greyhound shifted his weight. So far, so good.

“Thank you. Happy holidays to you, too. Goodnight.” Fishel hung up the phone. “I did it. They aren’t coming. Now . . . what do you want?”

“We’ll get to that.” The Greyhound panted. “First, I need you to take this.” He tossed a white cotton cloth onto the desk, then pulled a small bottle from his pocket. “Put one drop of ether onto the handkerchief, hold it to your face, and inhale it deeply.”

The doctor’s shaking fingers stretched in the direction of the cloth. The Greyhound reached past him and placed the bottle on a stack of papers. He dug into his pocket again and withdrew a syringe.

“One drop only, Doctor.”

The knot in his stomach erupted, sending The Greyhound to his knees. He grabbed a corner of the desk to keep from crashing to the floor, coughing uncontrollably as his lungs burned like they were on fire. The room swayed.

“You’re ill,” the doctor said. “You—you’re white as a sheet. You need help.”

The Greyhound shook his head, staggering to his feet. “Not from you!” He pointed the gun back at the doctor. “First, do no harm.” Steadying himself, he wiped the spit from the side of his mouth. “Or were you absent the day they went over the Hippocratic oath at medical school?”

“Son,” the doctor spoke in low, calm tones, his voice wavering. “Whatever’s bothering you, we can talk about it. Let me get you some help first.”

“Put a drop of ether on the cloth.” He grimaced and cocked the gun. “Shanna’s keeper will lose patience soon.”

Fishel lowered his gaze to the bottle. He picked it up and unscrewed the cap, then held the vial over the cloth. The bottle shook in his grip. A drop of liquid fell onto the small white cloth. He set the bottle down, quivering so much he almost knocked it over. The wet tiny dot spread across the handkerchief.

“Put it over your nose and mouth, and inhale. One big breath. If you try to cheat, I’ll know.” The Greyhound pointed the gun at the video. “Think of your wife.”

The doctor nodded. “I’ll do as you say. Don’t hurt my family.”

Blinking the colors from his eyes, The Greyhound glared at his victim. “Don’t talk to me about hurting people. Let’s go. One big breath. Do it.”

Lifting the cloth near his face, a whimper escaped the doctor’s lips. He raised his eyes to the man in the black ski mask. “Why are you doing this?”

“Angelus Genetics and Onyx Research. You remember them. You were a big deal over there before you bought your way into respectability.”

The doctor’s jaw dropped. “We-we did legitimate research there.”

“You,” The Greyhound narrowed his eyes, “are a despicable human being for what you did.”

“I—I didn’t. I . . . in the Arizona facility, they—I had no idea until—”

“You had every idea. Nilla Cunde said it was your goal from the outset. Emmet Kincaid said the same thing. They’re both dead now. So is Dr. Braunheiser. And Dr. Contiglio. Bendina Tasson, Theo Waldrop, Mina Farris—all gone. But not before they gave me things.”

“Oh, no. No . . .”

“I have notes from meetings you attended, where you and Hauser rolled out your grand plans. How you’d get the financing. I have it all, doctor.”

“We . . . shut it down. We stopped!”

“You moved it to Indonesia, you lying piece of garbage. U. S. laws couldn’t touch you there. Do you want to try to explain the deal you did with Cambodia? What you allowed to happen there?”

“Please.” The doctor swallowed hard. “Science. We . . . our ideas were for the benefit of mankind.”

“Stop lying! Ideas are one thing. What you put into practice—deciding right and wrong, life and death. You made up the rules, like the megalomaniacs you are. I’d shoot you right now, but I need to fly under the radar until—” His lungs exploded. He coughed, backing away and gasping for air. When he recovered, he wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. Blood stained his sleeve.

He pointed the gun to the handkerchief. “Let’s go.”

The doctor lifted the cloth and pressed it to his face, closing his eyes. His chest swelled and relaxed as he inhaled, then he looked at The Greyhound.

“Put it down.”

When he did, The Greyhound went to him and held out the syringe. “Inject yourself with this.” He handed it to the doctor. “If you do not, my man will kill your wife.”

The old man lurched forward, grabbing at a letter opener. The Greyhound shoved him back into his chair. "Your wife is alive, doctor. Do you want her to stay that way?"

"Help!" Fishel yelled, his words slurring. "Help me!"

The Greyhound curled back his fingers and rammed the butt of his hand into the doctor's ear. The old man crashed to the desk, grabbing his head and wailing. "Don't kill me!"

"Administer the syringe! Now! I have people watching your son in Malibu and your daughter working at the Cleveland Clinic."

"You're sick," the doctor cried. "You're enjoying this."

"I hate every minute of this, believe me. But I will see your wife die if you don't plunge that needle into your arm right now."

The doctor sniffled. "Okay." He picked up the syringe and stared at it.

"Do it."

Dr. Fishel placed the wavering tip of the needle near the crease of his forearm, sliding it along a raised blue vein. The skin depressed for a moment until the needle penetrated the skin, then he pressed the plunger.

He winced as the fluids entered his system.

The Greyhound took the syringe and slipped it into the pocket of his coveralls. "Now, up. To the treadmill, doctor."

Perplexed, the old man rose and slowly went to the treadmill.

The Greyhound followed, his pain and nausea subsiding. He reached over to switch on the machine and pressed a button on the keypad. The console beeped, and the dark gray vinyl tread rolled backwards.

"Get on."

The doctor's trembling hands grasped the rails. He climbed on the exercise machine and eased one foot onto the moving tread. As it went backwards, he stepped forward with his other foot and started walking.

"Now, I need you to take this respirator gage and put it into your mouth." The Greyhound held an opaque hose and mouthpiece up. They were standard equipment in stress tests, as the doctor well knew. The Greyhound held out a heart rate finger monitor to the doctor, keeping the readout in his hand.

As he put the equipment on, the old man shivered violently. The Greyhound retrieved the cell phone and placed it on the treadmill's console, shoving aside a yellowed magazine. The streaming video continued to display his wife.

Brandishing the gun, The Greyhound gestured to the screen. "Here's where we are. Your wife is alive and well. All you have to do is stay on this treadmill and keep moving until I say stop. This won't take long." He reached across the doctor and pressed the "up" arrow. The treadmill increased its speed. "If you stop, she dies. If I stop talking, or if I don't get what I want quickly, my friend on the other end does his job."

The doctor wheezed into the respiratory gage, his brow brimming with sweat and his hands shaking.

The heart rate monitor read 120.

"Keep going."

Fishel gasped, rubbing his chest.

"That's the Synthroid you injected. Keep going."

Sweat formed on the fat old man's face. The synthetic metabolism hormone was overloading his system. But at his age, a dead guy on a treadmill wouldn't even get an autopsy.

Moisture stains appeared on the doctor's shirt collar and under his arm pits. His abductor kept his eyes on the readout. "It hurts, I know."

The doctor groaned, grabbing his chest.

"Keep that hose in your mouth, doctor." The Greyhound raised the gun. "And stay on that treadmill." He pushed the "up" button again.

The doctors' eyes grew wide. His pace became unsteady, wobbling as he walked. He hunched forward, clutching the rails of the exercise machine.

The Greyhound pulled a stun gun from his coveralls pocket. Lifting it in front of the doctor's face, he pressed the button that sent a two-inch lightning flash across the electrodes on the tip. "Faster, doctor." He reached over and pressed the "up" button again.

The old man wobbled and bounced on the treadmill, wheezing and moaning through the tube as the video of his wife's meeting ended and the camera holder followed her into the parking lot.

The Greyhound viewed the heart rate monitor. It spiked to over 200. The doctor wheezed and gasped, leaning on the railings of the treadmill. His eyes widened. The hose fell out of his mouth. A long string of saliva dropped onto his shirt. "You—you're . . . an animal."

Gritting his teeth, The Greyhound scowled at the old man. "Would you have ever stopped if I didn't do this? If that makes me an animal in your eyes, I wear the label proudly. This has to be done, and not to gain the respect of someone like you." He jabbed his chest with a finger. "I didn't decide my ambitions were more important than other peoples' lives. Not like you. I'd never do that. Not for all the money in the world."

Fishel leaned on the rail, his feet moving but his face gray. The readout jumped to over 200 again.

"Keep going." The Greyhound picked up the streaming phone and gathered the rest of his things. "It's almost over."

The old man gagged and fell sideways into the railing, his arms flailing. He threw his head back and clutched his chest, sliding down onto the treadmill and collapsing. The tread pushed him backwards until his body came to a rest on the office floor, only his head remaining on the dark gray vinyl. His jaw hung open and his eyes stared outward at nothing, the tread churning against his cheek. Blood tricked from his nostrils, but otherwise he was still.

The monitor read zero.

Sagging into the wall, The Greyhound lifted the phone to his mouth and blinked tears from his eyes. His voice fell to a whisper. "It's done."

CENTENNIAL PARK BRIMMED with giant, twinkling Christmas trees and hordes of holiday revelers. Ice skaters glided over the temporary rink, and vendors plied everything from hot chocolate to snow globes. Holiday music filled the air. With Lanaya at his side, DeShear eyed the wide spans of grass beyond the paved pavilions. He raced toward the park, each breath throwing a puff of white in front of them.

“I can’t run anymore.” Lanaya gasped. “Where are we going?”

DeShear slowed to a walk. “I’m sorry. I’m a runner. I forget other people can’t keep up sometimes.”

She shivered and rubbed her arms, glancing over her shoulder. “I don’t see anyone.”

“Good. Let’s hope it stays that way.” DeShear slipped out of his suit jacket and put it around her shoulders. “We might be able to get a souvenir sweatshirt over there.” He pointed to the little vendor kiosks clustered near the ice rink. “But we can probably find a café that’s open down the street, and get you out of the cold. Either way, it’s best for us to be somewhere public right now.”

They walked past a police officer on horseback near the park entrance. Inside, several teenagers with hockey sticks sent an old sneaker back and forth over the ice. Several extra sticks rested against the wall.

A “hot coffee” sign flashed from the vendor on the other side of the rink.

“That sounds good,” Lanaya said. “Buy you a cup?”

“Sure.” DeShear tucked his hands under his arms and followed her to the kiosk.

She pulled the jacket close around her. “Why don’t we take a cab out to the suburbs? I’m not crazy about downtown Atlanta right now, and I’m sure we can find a Starbucks or coffee shop there.”

“I bet there’s a MARTA hub near here.” He glanced up and down the adjacent street. “Train stations have security cameras, so our friends from the hotel won’t try anything if they spot us. Plus, it’ll be warm.”

Lanaya ordered two coffees from the man in the wooden window and handed him a twenty-dollar bill.

“Can we grab the train around here?” DeShear asked the vendor.

“About two blocks that way.” The man pointed toward a big intersection, then handed Lanaya her change.

They stepped to the side to wait for their order. Two picnic tables and an overflowing trash can stood behind the kiosk, under some pine trees.

“Okay,” DeShear said. “Now we have to figure out our next move.”

“I have that already. Minnesota.”

“But our little chat got interrupted.” DeShear cupped his hands to his face and blew warm air through his fingers. “You know why these doctors and scientists are being murdered, and by who. You seem to know who’s next. What am I missing?”

She shivered. “Let’s talk about this at the train station.”

“No, let’s talk here. Things have gotten awful dicey since I met you. I might be able to help us both stay alive if I know what you know.”

“But it’s freezing out here.”

“Then talk fast.”

Lanaya rubbed her hands together, then shoved them into the suit coat pockets. Over the speakers, Silent Night played. She stared at one of the sparkling Christmas trees. “If I tell you everything—what I know and what I think—you’ll say I’m crazy. Where do I start?”

“Start with the dead bodies we already know about.”

“Well,” she said. “The first several murders happened over a few years. The next six took place over six months. Now he’s killed three in three weeks—that I know of. It could be more. I don’t have all the names.”

“Why’s the pace getting faster?”

“I believe he’s running out of time. He’s from the third group, the Gamma caste. He’s taken out a lot of the top players from Angelus Genetics and Onyx Research—partners, senior management, project leaders. It’s becoming more and more difficult to get information off the black screen site. People always posted rumors and speculation about their projects, but now threads are being deleted out of rampant paranoia, and new posts aren’t appearing anymore. I get bits and pieces at best. Innuendo. Guesses. But occasionally someone posts a legit tip for a while. Like the newspaper clippings I showed you.”

“Or the employee roster.”

“Correct.”

“And no one, no authorities are looking for a connection between so many prominent scientists dying in a short time period?”

“They were spread out. It’s hard for people to see beyond what’s in plain sight. An old man’s traffic accident this week in Tampa doesn’t tie neatly to a forty-five year old woman’s accidental drowning last month in Missouri, especially when her resume doesn’t mention she worked at Onyx Research a dozen years ago. These jobs were kept quiet. When people left, they were threatened with nondisclosure lawsuits. Most don’t put it on their resume at all.”

“Ma’am, your order’s up,” the vendor called out. “Two coffees.”

DeShear went to retrieve them. “Well, your guy’s not running out of time based on anything I’ve done. I just found out about him. And it looks like he’s got help now.”

At the painted wooden board that served as the coffee kiosk’s condiment table, Lanaya poured cream and sugar into her steaming coffee. DeShear left his black, cradling it with both hands to warm his fingers.

“If they’re all Gammas, then they all have the same problem.” Lanaya picked up a soda straw and stirred her coffee. “There’s no assurance of that, but they’d all be driven by the same motive. The top brass at Onyx may not even be aware of what’s happening, or they concluded they could wait them out. I suppose if you’re wealthy enough, when a problem comes to your attention but you know it will go away in a few years, you might try that option. And it worked until the problem tracked them down.” She blew on her coffee, sending a little steam cloud into the air.

“But why would the killer—or killers—be limited on time?” DeShear frowned. “What keeps them from tracking down folks from Angelus and Onyx over the ten years or however long it takes?”

“The subgroup I worked on had an eighty-percent fail rate at the peak median point, once the Gamma sequence had commenced. The corporate high-ups are playing the odds.”

“Okay, now say it in English.”

“I worked in genetic sciences, Hamilton. DNA selection. People denigrate my field with phrases like designer babies, but this is more than pre-selecting a child to have blue eyes or an athletic build. We were developing ways to find and advance genes that were completely devoid of the most common-occurring natural fatalities in human life. And it was applied science. But . . . there are down sides.”

She shuffled to the picnic table and stared into the shadows of the trees. “For every successful group of embryos whose DNA we altered to grow up and never get cancer, we had groups that failed. Rumor had it that the vast majority were terminus pre-utero, but not all. That was okay, we told ourselves. We could terminate any errant viables.” She turned to look into his eyes. “It was a gray area, but most of us felt we could rationalize taking that step with an embryo that couldn’t function without a host. Those who didn’t agree, left. But I think once a decision like that gets made, it’s easier for the top brass to make the next one. We heard that a huge opportunity opened up with organ harvesting. We had viables that weren’t cancer resistant, but we could grow their stem cells into whatever was needed. Again, tricky choice, but you could see how some scientists . . . the results could help a lot of people. Then, we heard some new ideas came in.” She circled the table, waving her hand. “You see, you’d work on the middle of a project that didn’t seem to make sense, but as long as the results were there, it moved forward. You didn’t know what its goal was, but from your end it looked like testing. That’s where the people on the black screen site could connect the dots. We weren’t compartmentalized there. We thought we could figure out what was happening.”

“Which was what?” DeShear set down his coffee on the picnic table and leaned on the side of the wooden kiosk.

Lanaya looked down, lowering her voice. “We heard someone at the top of Angelus Genetics realized it was far cheaper to allow the errant viables to continue than it was to attempt to grow mass volumes of healthy organ tissue from stem cells. Makes sense, from a numbers standpoint. The stem cell curation process alone would cost billions. They already had the embryos, so it would be easy enough for someone to take the next step. What did it matter if a viable was terminus at stage nine or stage nineteen, or stage three hundred and fifty four, it was always going to be selected for terminus.”

She swallowed hard. These were difficult confessions.

“So, we think they did it.” She shrugged. “That’s the rumor. They allowed the errant viables to develop—to grow up. Many of the resulting children would have severe deformities, or nonfunctioning higher brain functions—it’s much easier to choose a good gene to move forward with than to find the dozens of bad genes you want to leave behind—but if the children’s organs worked perfectly fine, then . . . I mean, if that’s true—if they used my research to . . .” She wiped a tear from her cheek, staring at the sky. “The world can be a cruel place. There were black screen rumors that errant viables were being sold. Some went to black market orphanages. Others, to the drug trade to serve as slaves, or to human traffickers. Media in other countries isn’t like what we have here in the States. With the facility in Indonesia, the news was more controlled, so negative information couldn’t get out. The politicians were in on it. We heard Onyx connected with a Cambodian human trafficking ring. The money poured in, all washed through a subsidiary of a subsidiary of a subsidiary, so the people at the top could claim they didn’t know—but they’d have to know.” She narrowed her eyes. “No executive makes that kind of revenue without knowing the source of every dollar.”

DeShear folded his arms. “You were involved in that?”

“I most certainly was not. They used information from employees like me to advance the programs, but we were kept in the dark. But if it’s true, it has to be stopped. Enough odd things have already happened to think this is possible. Double Omega’s death seemed far more nefarious based on what I’d learned, and I certainly didn’t think it was a mere suicide anymore. When I got the information about the other murders, I was scared. I decided to leave the company quietly, and not raise any eyebrows while I got my ducks in a row. Possibly, find others to help, or who knew more. If anyone caught wind of what was happening before we pieced it all together . . .”

“If you can stay alive long enough.” He nodded. “Yeah, that’s a little more than a missing persons case.”

“Dying became a real possibility, but if the rumors are true, Angelus Genetics must be stopped. I’m sorry I deceived you, but I have to be careful about what I divulge. Many have already gone underground, which makes it difficult to know who’s still alive. Some have changed their names, or acquired different identities.”

“Like Lanaya Kim? Her name wasn’t on your airplane ticket. Or the hotel bill. Akina Cho flew on Delta Airlines and Dara Han checked into the Peachtree Plaza hotel.”

She held her hands out. “Does it matter? Would you divulge your name to a stranger in this circumstance?”

DeShear took a deep breath and let it out slowly. “No. And the killer we’re after, he got screwed by the company—so now he’s a psycho bent on revenge?”

“No, no. He didn’t get screwed by the company—he was born there. He’s an illegally produced, genetically altered human embryo. He’s part of a gene selection process that was made illegal decades ago in this country and in many others. And at the median age of fifty-five, over 80% of the viables that didn’t die post-vitro, die from overwhelming organ failure within ten months of detecting the start of the sequence. Just as we grow our organs in nine months as babies, the Gammas have a life curve that causes organ depletion. If normal humans lived to be two hundred years old, at some point the brain would naturally fall to dementia, the kidneys would suffer renal failure—all human organs wear out if the host lives long enough. With Gammas, that’s at a median age of fifty-five. If they’d have left his genes alone, he’d live to be a median age of eighty-five or older, like any normal person.”

“I can see how somebody might have a problem with that.”

“That and the other horrendous things the company may be engaged in. He obviously is taking measures to see that it stops. But he may have a limited time if the Gamma sequence has already commenced. Simply put, I believe the killer is dying, and he intends to kill the people responsible before he does.”

DeShear studied her face. “From what you’ve said about Angelus Genetics, I’m not sure he should be stopped.”

She set down her coffee and tucked her hands under her arms. “For the most part, he’s going right down the list I copied, with few deviations—probably people he can’t find. But the list doesn’t distinguish between people who were in a position to know what was going on, and people who weren’t. The executives and board members had to know about the horrendous activities, but the list has project managers on it—people who were compartmentalized, and who had no idea what the data was used for. People like me.” She lifted her head to bring her gaze to his. Her eyes brimmed with tears. “I don’t know how to contact them without potentially exposing myself, and what if some of them are working with him? It’s just—he doesn’t realize there are innocent people on that list.”

“Or he doesn’t care.”

She sniffled. “Oh, I think plenty of people would view him as highly righteous. He merely doesn’t have all the facts—and he doesn’t have the time left to get them.”

“Dara!” A man’s voice broke through the still, frosty air. “Dara Han!”

Lanaya glanced at the stranger. He stood next to a woman in a red leather jacket, just past the mounted police officer near the park entrance. The man waved a hand and ran toward them, putting his hands in his pockets.

DeShear bolted upright. "Does anyone know you're here?"

"No, I—"

"Get down!"

The man pulled a gun from his pocket and fired. The bullet whizzed past DeShear's head and piffed through the pine tree branches, sending a cascade of twigs down on him. He grabbed Lanaya and pulled her behind the coffee kiosk. Screams went up from the tourists gathered around the park. People ran in all directions.

The assassin ran toward the kiosk, firing his gun repeatedly. A tree branch exploded behind DeShear. In front of him, a woman running with a shopping bag whipped her head backwards and dropped to the ground. The next shot pinged off the condiment table. The next hit a man who ran in front of DeShear.

The mounted police officer turned his horse and galloped after the crazed stranger. The woman in the red leather jacket grabbed a hockey stick and swung it at the officer as he came by. It broke over his chest, sending him backwards off the horse.

She chased it down and grabbed the pommel, flinging her leg over the saddle. Righting herself, she grabbed the reins. With a thrust from her heels, the horse drew up and raced forward toward Lanaya and DeShear.

The woman pulled a gun from her pocket, pointing it in Lanaya's direction.

"We're trapped!" Lanaya shouted.

"Stay behind me." DeShear peeked out from behind the kiosk and took the gun from his belt. He held the gun with both hands, lifting it near his face. The wooden corner of the coffee hut burst into splinters as another shot went past. Flinching, DeShear ducked back behind the corner and dropped to one knee, taking a deep breath.

Bullets ricocheted around them. Tourists screamed as they ran from the gunman.

Sliding his finger onto the trigger, DeShear swung himself around the corner and scanned his field of view. He leveled the weapon at the coming stranger, waiting for a clean shot. Running shadows crossed before his eyes.

As the man waded through the scattering crowd, DeShear squeezed the trigger. The shot caught the man's shoulder and pulled him backwards. He shook it off and raised his gun again.

DeShear stood and advanced. "Everyone, down, down, down!" The gun firmly between his hands, he stared down the barrel at the attacker and fired three quick shots. Three red puffs burst from the assassin's torso. The man sagged and fell face first into the ground.

Pivoting to the horse, DeShear fired again. The first shot missed the racing rider.

She aimed her gun at him. Flash after flash came from the muzzle. She was thirty feet away, then twenty. Her shots soared past him.

As the galloping horse drew near, DeShear ran forward into its path and dived into the grass. The horse leaped over him, unbalancing its rider. DeShear rolled onto his back and pointed his gun at her, firing.

She slumped forward and slid from the saddle. Tipping sideways, her body went limp and hit the ground, one foot still caught in the stirrup. The horse kicked and bucked, turning in a circle as it dragged her.

A pedestrian raced forward and grabbed the reins, calming the horse. DeShear sprinted back to the coffee kiosk. Lanaya stood there, her knees shaking and her mouth hanging open.

He put his arms on her shoulders and pulled her to his chest. "You did good."

She nodded. Her mouth moved but no words came out.

Taking her by the hand, he moved toward the shadows of the trees. "You can thank me later. It's time to go."

MARK HARRIMAN RESISTED the strong urge to shove the mountain of paperwork off the desk and into the trash can next to it. His eyes were red and sore from staring at a computer screen, and his back ached from slouching over its keyboard.

As the assistant duty officer approached, he leaned back in the chair and groaned. “Jayda, no.”

She shrugged, placing another set of reports on top of the pile. “Sorry, friend. You told the lieutenant you’d do them all. This is ‘them all’.”

He shook his head and reached for the new stack of reports. “Next time, tell me to keep my mouth shut.”

“Next time, ask me first.” Jayda strolled back to the elevator.

He groaned, flipping through the papers. “This would go a lot faster if these guys learned to spell.”

The phone console beeped. “Mark, are you still at Detective Sanderson’s desk?”

“Yep,” he replied to the speaker phone. “Whatcha got?”

“The fire inspector is on line eleven.”

“Thank you.” He waited for the speaker to cut off and lifted the phone from its cradle, pressing the flashing button. “Officer Harriman speaking.”

“Hey, Mark. It’s Dyson Spinks. We’re filing our PFR and you said you wanted what we had so far on the DeShear fire.”

“Yeah, thanks, Dyson. I appreciate it. How’s it look?”

“It’s definitely arson. We found accelerant everywhere. Gasoline, looks like, but we’ll know for sure tomorrow. And the swimming pool camera caught some images of a suspicious character lurking around the building right before it went up.”

Harriman rocked back in the chair. “Wow, that’s good work. Your gang is rocking it. I’ll let Hank know to keep his eyes open.”

“Well, that’s the thing. A neighbor of his was home sick with the flu all week. Said she saw our person of interest go into the apartment, alone, right before the place went up in flames.”

“The flu?” Harriman frowned. “What, was she spying on him from the toilet?”

“There’s different kinds of influenza. There’s the diarrhea kind and the upper respiratory kind. She had the cough. It’s going around. I had it a while back, and—”

“Anyway . . .”

“Uh, anyway, she knew DeShear from saying hi at the mailbox and the pool, so she noticed when it wasn’t him going into the place that day. She didn’t think anything of it at the time, except that normally no one would be going up there alone without DeShear. After the place went up in smoke, she thought it was suspicious. She gave a statement to our investigator, but it’s not much more than that.”

“Can you send me the images from the pool camera?”

“Yep. And Mark, there’s one more thing. The boss doesn’t like it—DeShear’s place burning and him suddenly out of town and not returning calls.”

Shaking his head, Harriman leaned forward in the chair. “Hank’s no arsonist.”

“Hey, stranger things have happened. The manager said he’d been slow with the rent a few times lately. He hasn’t paid for December yet, and it’s a week until Christmas. His credit report said his insurance on the place lapsed, so we called the insurance company to verify. Guess what? The premium got paid the morning of the fire.”

Harriman winced. “Okay, the guy was having a bad stretch. Every time he makes a buck, that butt wad Tullenstein hauls him back into court and takes it. That doesn’t mean he torched his apartment.”

“All I’m saying is, lots of people get in a tough spot and want a clean slate. They figure an insurance check will buy them a new life. It’d be nice if DeShear would talk to us. A guy going away the same day his home burns to the ground, and then not returning calls—that doesn’t look good.”

Harriman sighed. “Yeah, okay.”

“He’s your friend. Give him a call.”

“I’m on it.” Grabbing a pen from the desk, Harriman scribbled a note on the pad. “Can you send me the video from the pool camera?”

“Sure. The hedges hide most of it, but we separated a few still images that look pretty clean. We’ll use those in the morning to get the neighbor to verify it’s who she saw. I’ll email them.”

“Thanks, buddy.” He tossed the pen onto the desk and rubbed his eyes.

“And Mark . . .”

“Yeah?”

“Have DeShear call us. Like yesterday. The longer this stays unresolved, the worse it looks.”

• • • •

THE NEARLY-EMPTY VENDING machines at the MARTA station provided their last bag of stale Fritos and some questionable-looking cupcakes to DeShear and his companion. He handed her the bag of chips and viewed the lobby. “At least it’s warm in here.”

Lanaya opened the Fritos and sniffed, scrunching up her nose.

DeShear took a bite of a cupcake, stopping midway through. “These are no better.” He tossed the package into a trash can.

With a huff, Lanaya sat down on a bench, shoving her hands into the suitcoat pockets.

DeShear paced back and forth across the unswept lobby. “If they’d shoot at us there, in a public place—with a cop present—they’re . . . well, they . . . I don’t know.” He put a foot on the bench and leaned forward, folding his arms over his knee. “What I wonder is, are these guys two steps ahead of us or are they tracking us somehow?”

Lanaya withdrew her hand from the suitcoat pocket. She held up a cell phone.

“Oh, crap,” DeShear said. “I thought I left that in the hotel room.” He took it and mashed the home button. “I put it on airplane mode for the flight, and didn’t remember to take it off.”

“They may have been able to track us using that.” Lanaya hunched her shoulders. “It won’t receive signals in airplane mode, but it’ll still ping cell phone towers and give your location.”

“Great. Sorry, I didn’t know. So I can’t use my phone, and we left all your stuff back at the hotel, your computer and—”

She shook her head. “Don’t worry about that. My computer is encrypted and set up to not keep histories. The phone was a new disposable. They won’t get anything.”

“Good. What about the keys to your many secret airport lockers and the fake IDs? Those might be in the hands of our gun-happy friends now.”

“I doubt it. I tossed my purse and the keys in the hotel room safe when we got there. Until they get a hold of a daytime manager, they won’t be able to get into that safe—and even then they’re probably going to need the person registered to the room to do it.” She looked at him, raising her eyebrows. “Unless they’re law enforcement.”

“Nah. Not these guys.” He stood up and paced again. “The way they were shooting, they had zero clue how to handle a gun. There’s no—hey, that’s something.” He stopped and rubbed his chin. “Yeah, they’re amateurs. Even rookie cops wouldn’t fire into a crowd like that—there’s no chance of hitting your target. These clowns shot like they were in an arcade. That means they aren’t law enforcement or former military. They’re, like . . . well, like you. They’ve seen guns on TV, but they don’t know how to use them.”

“And that’s a benefit how?” Lanaya threw her hands up. “You said we’d be safe in the open, then the OK Corral happened!”

“It means they won’t use coordinated attacks or ambush planning. We can outsmart them. Plus, after that crazy melee in the park, there’ll be Atlanta police all over the place.” He frowned. “Which means the cops will be after us, since we were shooting, too.”

“It was self-defense,” Lanaya said. “They shot at us first.”

“Yeah, and that will all get sorted out eventually.” DeShear rubbed his chin again. “But not before we’re sitting in a holding cell—and then if they have any law enforcement help, we’ll be sitting ducks.” He looked at one of the substation security cameras. “We need to get on the move. Now.” He headed for the exit.

“Yes,” Lanaya said, jumping up. “To Minnesota.”

Stopping at the exit, he turned and waited. “Minnesota will require an airport. Airports have cops. Besides, we’re linked now. Booking me an airline ticket is almost the same as booking you one, so they’d be able to track us. You don’t have an ID anyway now—do you?”

She reached into her back pocket and pulled out a driver’s license. “Lanaya can still fly. And I have some money stashed in a locker at the American Airlines terminal. One with a keypad. There’s enough for two tickets to Minnesota.”

“You are something else.” DeShear grinned, pushing open the door. “Well, anywhere but here is a good idea right now. But no trains and no buses until we’re at the airport—and then we get the first flight to anywhere. We can’t afford to get picked up in the airport while we’re sitting around waiting for a flight.”

She pointed to his cell phone as she breezed past him to step into the cold night air. “Call a cab. They don’t have security cameras, and we can hire one to take us a hundred miles if we need to.”

• • • •

DURING THE WAIT FOR the cab, DeShear checked his voicemail messages. One was from Mark Harriman. The toxicology report had come back positive for Propofol in Dr. Braunheiser.

There were standard, post-accident messages from his insurance company; he skipped over those to see what else was pressing. The fire inspector had called several times. Not surprising after an arson, but since DeShear was on the run, the folks at TFD could work things out for themselves for a while.

The last message was another from Harriman. The fire investigators had pictures of a person of interest, seen outside DeShear’s place right before the fire. Harriman would email it. And without directly saying so, apparently TFD as much as implied DeShear may have been working with the person to burn the place down.

Fair enough. I’d have thought the same thing.

He opened his email and waited as dozens of messages tried to load, but didn’t. The signal wasn’t strong enough outside the substation. He tucked his free hand under his other arm and shuddered against the cold.

A cab approached from the other side of the street, slowing to make a U-turn. DeShear walked to the curb and waved.

The driver didn't speak much English, but that was an advantage for the moment.

DeShear's phone might divulge that he'd called for a ride—if anyone was tracking him online—and maybe even where they were headed, but he figured powering down his phone would stop them from keeping on his trail through the use of cell towers. Then online trackers wouldn't know if he'd changed destinations or taken a detour after boarding the vehicle.

He opened the rear passenger door for Lanaya.

The wind whipped her hair into her face. "Are you sitting in front?"

"No, I thought we might both sit in back. So we can strategize."

"Oh. Very good." She climbed in. DeShear followed. The burst of air from the car's heater was a welcome relief. He rubbed his hands together and leaned back into the soft, warm seat cushions.

The driver had been instructed to take them to the airport, but Lanaya's earlier comment had some merit. Driving a hundred miles would deliver them halfway to the Florida-Georgia border, far away from the current troubles in Centennial Park and the Greater Atlanta police.

The cab driver could call in a change of plans and take us to a rest stop, and we could hire a second cab to take us into Florida. From there . . . well, who knows, but at least we wouldn't be on anybody's radar screen, and that might keep people looking for us in Atlanta while we got to, say, Jacksonville—and took a plane to Minnesota . . .

Except he didn't have a fake ID. If he used his real one, they'd be tracking him again.

Crap.

He sat back, sighing, and closed his eyes. The heat in the cab was nice on his feet and hands.

Opening one eye, he glanced at Lanaya-Dara. "What's in Minnesota?"

"Don't you mean who? I told you, there were two people from Onyx who now worked together in Minnesota."

"You and your husband?"

The headlights from an approaching vehicle illuminated her face. She was tired, but held her chin high. The car passed, sending the cab back into darkness. The only light was the green glow of the dashboard gauges.

DeShear's voice was soft. "It's the only place I've really seen you get excited about, so it had to be."

"Very good, Hamilton. My daughter and two sons are there, too. At a safe location. Not our house."

"Good."

It was a big admission, saying the kids were there. It showed trust, but it showed there was more at stake than just her own well-being.

DeShear rolled his shoulders and stretched his back, easing into the seat cushion. "I gotta admit, I feel a little silly about calling you the wrong name this whole time."

She shrugged. "Couldn't be helped. My sister Tinara went by different names. To our mother, she was 'Yeon-in'—Sweetie, in American English—but always Tinara to my father. My brothers and sisters and I called her Tia, as did her grade school classmates. High school friends called her Tina, and in college, she was Tinara again. When someone walked up and said hi to her, the name they used told us where they knew her from. That's where I got the idea of using different names on each missing persons case."

"How many people are you involved with?"

“No, I’m the missing person in each case. Dara Han might be looking for Lanaya Kim. In a different city, Akina Cho has hired a law firm to look into the wrongful death of Kiri Jiang.”

“Sounds like a CIA operation.” DeShear chuckled. “Let me guess. Lanaya flies to Tampa, but Akina checks into the hotel room and pays cash. Then Kiri flies to Atlanta. I like it. The killers can’t figure out where you are very quickly.”

“And different people would know me under different names, so . . .”

“So you’d know who to trust.” DeShear nodded. “I get it. Okay, then. You can still be Lanaya.”

She smiled. “How very generous of you.”

“You know,” he turned to her. “I was thinking. We can change cabs and get to a different airport, then head back to Tampa. Apparently I have some things to clear up there, but I might be able to call in a favor, too. If you think your family is safe—”

“They’re as safe as I could get them, but who knows for how long? My husband and I are on a short list that keeps getting shorter. If time is tight for the killer, two targets in one place would be very appealing. That’s where you come in. As a private detective and former police officer, you know how to set up stakeouts. We could even set up a ruse with the police—a break in or domestic dispute of some sort, possibly a stalker—anything that would get them involved and watching, so as soon as he showed, we’d have him. He might even know if any of the big rumors about Angelus are true, too.”

“It’s a good plan, but it could take a while,” DeShear said. “What if we crank it up a few levels?”

“What do you mean?”

“Our guy originally kept the murders quiet because publicity would cause people to eventually link the murders and take the fight to him. He couldn’t have that because he wanted to keep eliminating the people on the list. But after what happened in the park, that’s probably done. And if he only has a short while to live, that strategy doesn’t work anymore, anyway. But if he knew there was a gathering of all the high-level mucky mucks from the company that gave him an early death sentence, I would think that would prove too tempting to resist.”

“But I told you, they live all over the place. What would cause such a thing to happen?”

He leaned forward, tapping the seat with a finger. “You indicated that most of the top executives were motivated by money.”

“Most, but not all.”

“And Angelus Genetics is an American company?”

“Yes, but the work now takes place in subsidiaries located all over the world.”

Folding his arms, he sat back. “Doesn’t matter. Nothing will get an American company’s entire executive staff on a plane faster than the stock price falling, and nothing will make a stock fall faster than classifying its major investments and subsidiaries. You raise a stink with the IRS and cry for an audit, and the big wigs will come running to defend their numbers and keep everything quiet. They’ll all be in the same place at the same time, guaranteed.”

“Classifying?”

“It’s an accounting term. It means declaring the investments as crap. I learned it from my ex-wife, Camilla. She worked her way up at one of the big accounting firms. Now she’s a bureau chief with the IRS.” DeShear grinned. “Trust me, between your inside information and what happened in Centennial Park, the IRS will be conducting a severe rectal probe on Angelus Genetics in twenty-four hours. And as a bureau chief, Cammy can get us on the audit team.”

“Sounds intriguing.” She smiled. “I think Lanaya should rent a car at the airport so we can drive to Tampa tonight.”

• • • •

THE MAN STOOD ACROSS the street from Centennial Park. Christmas trees lined the grassy perimeter; police cars and ambulances lined the street. Victims covered by blood-stained sheets lay silent through the park while holiday music serenaded them from the public address system.

Frowning, the man pulled a phone from his pocket. He tapped the screen and held it to his ear. “This is your bird dog. Just letting you know, I’m out.”

“What! Why?”

He moved away from the gathering crowds and news van lights. “You said this was an eyes-on operation to follow a scientist. Well, she’s got a friend. After the two of them put your room service clown into a coma and sent me on an elevator ride, they went a few blocks down the street and took out your operatives in the park.”

“I told you, things can change on the fly.”

“And I told you, I’ve already seen the inside of a federal penitentiary. I don’t care to see another one. It’s amateur hour out here, and I’m done.”

“I can get you more money,” the man on the other end of the line growled. “How much? Name your price.”

“Lose my number.” The man ended the call and put the phone in his pocket, walking away from the park entrance and heading back toward the Peachtree Plaza hotel.

• • • •

“BUT YOU SAY AIRPORT!” The cab driver pulled his car into the Dunkin Donuts parking lot. “This, not airport.”

“Sorry. Change of plans,” DeShear said, leaning forward. “You can let us out right here.” He turned to Lanaya and lowered his voice. “Do we have enough for a tip?”

She counted out some cash. “Our funds will be nearly depleted after we pay for this little detour, but as long as we get to my locker at the American Airlines terminal, we can do whatever we want.” She handed the cash to the cab driver.

“Okay,” DeShear said. “Let’s go.”

They went inside as the cab drove off. DeShear chose a quiet booth in the back, away from the counter and employees. When Lanaya was seated, he leaned across the table and placed his phone in front of her. “Call another cab,” he whispered. “Take it to the American terminal, get your traveling money, and rent a car. Then come pick me up here.”

He glanced around. An eighteen-wheeler pulled into the massive parking lot of the Flying J gas station next door. “Better yet, pick me up there, at the truck stop.”

She nodded, staring at the phone. “What if . . .”

“If people have seen us together, splitting up makes the job of tracking us harder for them. But I’m a big liability to you right now.” He sat back, tugging at his shirt collar. “I’m wearing the same clothes I had on in the park when I was shooting the place up. If they put my image on TV and I step into a busy airport, it’s game over. My hands are still covered in gunshot residue.”

Lanaya pursed her lips.

“Hey.” He reached across the table and took her hand. “I’m not abandoning you. I kept watch to see if we were being followed on the ride over. We weren’t. In all the video footage anyone might have, you're wearing my suitcoat. Leave it here. I'll throw it in the dumpster outside. Pull back your hair while you're in the cab. With what you have on, you'll look different enough to get in and out of the airport without raising eyebrows, so you'll be fine—right now. In a few hours, probably not.”

He gave her hand a gentle squeeze. “It'll work.”

“Okay.” She forced a smile.

“There we go,” he said. “How much cash do we have left?”

“Eighty-three dollars.”

“Okay. Give me twenty. I'll wait with you here until the cab comes, then I'll go next door and buy some kind of different shirt. Pick me up there. Between the ride to the airport and back, it shouldn't take you more than an hour.” He pressed the home button on the phone to check the time. “One more thing. Don't act nervous. The TSA folks watch for that. They'll stick you in an interview room to make sure you're not a terrorist, and you'll end up creating more questions than you can answer.”

“I know. I have been in an airport before.”

DeShear shifted on his seat. “Oh, I didn't mean to—”

“It's just—it's all suddenly gotten a lot more real.”

“Yeah. Bullets flying at you will do that.”

Lanaya's hands were shaking again. She stared at the Flying J parking lot. “What if I come back and you're not here?”

He took a deep breath and let it out slowly. “Then they got me—and you head to Minnesota. From there, you call Mark Harriman and you tell him everything. All of it. Don't hold anything back.”

She swallowed hard, her voice wavering. “And if I'm not back in an hour?”

He picked up the phone and put it in her hand. “Then I will come find you. And whoever's in my way will pay a steep price.”

• • • •

DESHEAR WAITED AT THE booth while Lanaya climbed into her cab. As they pulled away, she saw him get up and head for the restaurant exit. They drove past the Flying J, its extra-long parking spots accommodating the many tractor trailer trucks of its clientele. Many would gas up and continue on; others would spend the night.

Sleep. What a nice luxury.

Remembering what DeShear told her, she gathered up her hair. “Do you have a rubber band?” she asked the cab driver.

He held up a plastic box of miscellaneous items—pens and paper clips, a butane lighter. Digging through it, she found a hair tie with two big beads on it. She held it up to the light. The platinum-haired super hero Storm adorned one bead; her alter ego, Ororo Munroe, smiled from the other.

Lanaya smiled back. “Warm it up a little around here, would you?”

The cab driver glimpsed Lanaya in the rearview mirror. “What, ma'am?”

“Nothing. Sorry.” She slipped the tie around her ponytail.

At the airport, she had the cab stop near the end of the departures area. Traffic was light, but there were still plenty of cars coming in and out. She put her hand on the car door latch. The cab suddenly felt very secure.

TSA watches for nervous people in the airport. Act calm.

She wiped her sweaty hand on her leg, then put it back on the latch.

Here goes nothing.

She opened the car door. A gust of icy wind rushed over her cheeks and hands, making her flinch. She exited the vehicle and walked toward the nearest entrance, hunching her shoulders against the cold. Her steps were awkward and stiff, like she'd forgotten how to walk and was trying to remember. Keeping her face to the ground, she entered the building.

She tried to walk fast without appearing to do so, but the trek to the American terminal seemed endless. She only peeked up to maintain her bearings, convinced that doing otherwise would bring forth swarms of gun-toting assailants. Her stomach was a knot, barely even taking notice when she passed the ever-aromatic Cinnabon.

As she approached the lockers, she slowed her pace and peered over her shoulder. If the killers had tracked her to DeShear in Tampa and then to Centennial Park, they could be anywhere. Sweat dotted her upper lip. Nobody seemed particularly interested in her activities, though. A maintenance woman pushed a trash cart through the quiet lobby. In a far corner, a man in coveralls guided a spinning floor polisher over the shiny surfaces between the acres of carpets. The distant PA system announced an arriving flight.

Lanaya stared at the rows of lockers and swallowed hard. She crept toward the one she'd rented, stretching a shaking finger out to the keypad.

Beep, beep, beep.

With her code entered, the latch released. Holding her breath, she opened the little door.

Inside, her belongings were just as she'd left them. She let out a sigh of relief, her heart settling back into her chest.

She leafed through the backpack holding her money. She'd managed to stash more than enough for a trip to Tampa, but how long would she be gone now? A few days? A week? She glanced around the area. No one was watching her, but there were a lot of variables at play. Take it all? Leave some in case she needed it later?

Half. Take half.

With trembling fingers, she pulled several stacks of hundred dollar bills out, tore off the paper band, and jammed the bundles into her pockets. With a shove, the backpack went into the locker and she closed the door.

The blue screen blinked at her.

Her stomach jolted. Money. She needed quarters to get the door locked again. Heat came to her cheeks. She closed her eyes and leaned her forehead against the wall of lockers. Stupid, stupid, stupid.

She scanned the lobby. A news stand-gift shop was still open. She could leave her belongings in the unsecured locker get to the store and back before anyone noticed. The thought made her stomach churn again. The locker held too much money to leave unattended. But the thought of getting identified halfway across the airport lobby with so much cash on her was equally unsettling.

Her heart throbbed. Be calm. There's hardly anyone here. Go over, get some gum, and come right back.

And what if the locker's empty when you return? Then what? Years of saving, gone—and possibly your life with it. These lockers had bailed her out of a jam more than once.

But she'd brought it in increments, never wanting too much cash on her at one time, and never fearing someone was on her tail. This was different.

She'd have to risk it. She had to take it all with her to get change.

She reached into the locker and stuffed everything into the backpack, then straightened up and smoothed out her clothes.

“You’ll look different enough to get in and out of the airport without raising eyebrows. It’ll work.”

She tucked the backpack under her arm.

The maintenance woman and floor cleaner both remained next to the trash cart, glancing at her as she passed. The radio on the woman’s hip crackled with indistinguishable chatter.

It’s nothing. They aren’t watching you.

Her pulse thumping in her ears, she stared at the floor and hurried across the carpet to the news stand.

She entered the shop, trying to control her nerves. Outside, the maintenance woman and the floor cleaner spoke for a moment, then parted ways.

Focus. The shop has change. Get it and get back to the locker.

She grabbed a pack of Juicy Fruit and placed it on the counter.

The cashier set down her phone. “Will that be all?”

“Yes. And three dollars in quarters, too, please. Thank you.” Lanaya looked around as the cashier scanned the gum. No one else was in the store.

“Ma’am?”

She looked at the cashier.

“I said, it’s a dollar seventy-three, please. Would you like your receipt?”

“No. Thank you.” Lanaya watched the lobby as she reached into her pocket, handing the woman a bill.

The cashier held it up to the light. Lanaya’s heart skipped a beat. A one-hundred-dollar bill! What did you do with the twenties?

The cashier picked up a yellow-colored marker and drew a line on the bill. She frowned, drawing another line. Then another. “Excuse me one moment,” she said, heading to the back of the shop.

“I have another. A smaller—” Lanaya rifled through the backpack, her pulse pounding. Nothing but hundreds.

Panic surged through her system. Lanaya patted her pockets. One was empty. Jamming her hand into the other, she found the money she’d been carrying. She yanked it out. “Here. I have—a twenty.” She slapped it on the counter.

The cashier disappeared through a door at the back of the shop. “It’s no problem. One moment.”

Lanaya’s heart raced again. What was the woman up to? She checked the lobby, holding back the urge to run from the news stand. The maintenance lady was standing in front of the shop now, near the corner of the front display window. Lanaya clutched the backpack to her chest. On the other side of the doorway, the floor cleaner moved his machine back and forth, watching her. She was trapped.

I can’t run for it. I’ll never get off the airport property, it’s too big. It’s too far. I’ll need a car, but I have to . . .

Her mind was a blank. A drop of sweat ran down the side of her face.

. . . do what? What should I do?

The maintenance woman peered into the shop. Her eyes met Lanaya’s.

Another jolt went through her. That’s it. They’re coming for me. She backed away from the counter. They’re coming.

Her eyes darted around the shop. Where does that back door go? Was someone with the cashier, getting ready to pounce?

Lanaya rubbed the side of her face, panting. Think. Focus. How can you escape?

The door opened and the cashier entered the shop again. Lanaya stared at her, trembling, but saying nothing. The woman walked toward the front of the store.

This is it. She drops the security gate. Run. Run now.

The woman went to the cash register. "All set." She held up a pen. "My testing marker was out of ink. I'll have your change for you in a second."

Lanaya inched toward the counter. She peeked at the rear door, then to the display window. The maintenance woman wasn't there.

With trembling fingers, she took her change and the red and white plastic shopping bag containing her gum, stepping away from the counter to scan the lobby again.

Get to the locker, then get to the rental car desk. Fast.

She hurried across the carpet, looking everywhere she could without raising her head.

Act natural, act natural, act natural.

The lockers were only a few feet away. When she reached them, she yanked open the backpack and grabbed several thick wads of bills. She shoved them into the shopping bag, pushed the backpack into the locker and slammed the little door shut, jamming coin after coin into the slot as fast as the machine could take them. She wiped her upper lip with the back of her hand, staring at the machine until the keypad read "Secure."

Turning, she ran a hand across her forehead. The car rental counter next, and out of here. Her ears hummed, a slight headache coming to her.

She moved quickly, her heart racing, walking to the rental counter. The young man there smiled. "Hello. Do you have a reservation?"

"No," Lanaya said, her voice wavering. "I don't have a reservation, but I do need a car."

"Thank you." He typed on the keyboard. "May I get your name and home address?"

As the young man registered her fake ID, Lanaya drummed the countertop.

"Nervous flier?"

"Excuse me?" Lanaya asked.

He pointed to her tapping fingertips.

"Oh." She dropped her hand to her side, shifting her feet. "Very sorry."

He slid a form onto the counter. "Sign here, please. Your car is in spot three-thirty-one. Through the doors and to the right."

"Ma'am." The woman from the shop called out to her.

Lanaya turned, heat rising in her cheeks. The maintenance lady was with the news shop cashier. They came toward her.

Her stomach churned. She grabbed the car key from the counter and headed to the doors.

"Ma'am." The cashier moved faster. "Ma'am!"

"No!" Lanaya screamed. She broke into a run. "No! Get away from me!"

The doors opened and a man in a dark suit came through, pulling a suitcase behind him. Lanaya slammed into him. He broke her fall, dropping his bag and backing up. They both managed to stay on their feet.

She pushed herself away, her heart racing and her ears humming.

"You left this." The cashier handed her a twenty-dollar bill. "I'm sorry I scared you."

"Oh, uh . . ." Lanaya swallowed hard, taking the bill. "The mistake was all mine. I'm very sorry." She turned to the man in the suit. "Please forgive me." She gestured to the clerk at the car rental counter. "I'm a nervous flier. I need to calm down."

The maintenance woman shook her head and reached for her radio.

“You’d better wait a few minutes before you try to drive,” the man said, bending over to pick up his suitcase.

“I will. Thank you. Sorry for the trouble.” Lanaya backed away. “Thank you.”

With the four of them staring at her, Lanaya disappeared through the doors.

WEARING A BLACK UNIVERSITY of Georgia “Bulldogs” sweatshirt and a gray pair of sweatpants he bought at the Flying J, DeShear drove the rental car onto I-75 and headed south. Lanaya had said she was too nervous to drive, and he didn’t question it. She looked frazzled when she finally came to pick him up.

It would be a long drive to Tampa—about 450 miles—but it was critical to get on the road before the inevitable Centennial Park investigation had a chance to review videos from witnesses and security cameras. The authorities would eventually see him on the MARTA substation videos with Lanaya, and then getting the cab, so they’d call the cab company and learn the car was hired to go to the airport.

The airport cameras wouldn’t show him at all, and if Lanaya had gotten in and out of the airport without drawing too much attention to herself, they’d have a decent head start on avoiding a holding cell and doing a lot of explaining.

DeShear checked his speed and set the cruise control at seventy miles per hour. The dashboard GPS said it would still take about eight more hours to get to Tampa. He preferred to drive about ten miles over the speed limit on long drives, to shave a little off the clock, but on this trip, he’d stick to the speed limit. Not getting pulled over was more important than saving a few minutes.

In the passenger seat, Lanaya knitted her hands as she stared out the window.

“What are you thinking about?” DeShear asked.

“Just . . . everything.”

“It’s all a lot to take in,” he said. “So don’t try. Not right now. Let the fog of war pass.”

“I can’t believe how many mistakes I’ve made. I can’t—I can’t focus. It’s very unlike me. Everything since Bayshore Boulevard has been a complete blur.”

“That’s adrenaline. It’s normal. In the army, after a firefight, you’d see soldiers rocket along for a while, almost numb to the intense loss of life happening all around them. Then after they’re safe for a bit, they crash like a ton of bricks. But all sorts of things can happen. Some get nervous and forgetful after the fact. It’s common.”

Her expression stayed the same. Time to change subjects.

“We’ll stop in a bit and get something to eat and a change of clothes.” DeShear rubbed the stubble growing on his chin. “A hotel would be nice, but it’s more important to get to Tampa fast, don’t you think?”

Lanaya didn’t seem to hear him. He tried again.

“You said the people who killed Dr. Braunheiser might be running out of time. But the disease—”

“The Gamma sequence.”

“Right, the sequence.” He didn’t necessarily want to make her have this discussion, but she seemed to need to unwind, and talking often did that for people. The subject might not even matter. “Do the killers know what’s involved?”

“Yes, I believe they know.” She folded her hands in front of her and looked at him. There were bags under her eyes. “Angelus intended for them not to interact, but I think the company kept tabs on them somehow. That was the thinking on the black screen site, because we’d see hospital data. Where else could it have come from? They had to be tracking the Gammas. No one else knew. But in doing so, the company may have inadvertently tipped off some of them that they were being observed. In any case, the ones doing the killings certainly seem to know, and they are understandably concerned. It's an extremely harsh way to die, and for Gammas, there's no avoiding it."

DeShear shook his head. "They're acting like it's worse than death."

"In many ways, it is. It comes on with a harsh, persistent cough. Most people think they're getting the flu or pneumonia, but after a week or so, the symptoms clear up. But this isn't a virus, Hamilton. It resurfaces after about a month, accompanied by migraines and extreme fatigue. Kidney and abdominal pain follow. One by one, all the vital organs of the afflicted shut down. Lungs, liver. There is constant nausea, and symptoms associated with dementia. Some get massive skin sores that won't heal. Everything goes at once."

He placed his elbow on top of the car door while he drove. "There has to be something the doctors can do."

"Most of the people go into the hospital, but about one third don't. The result is the same either way." She sighed. "No team of physicians can rectify every organ failing at once. In an average case, once the sequence has started, the subject spends the next ten months in severe, debilitating pain. And somewhere along the line, they get overwhelmed and can't keep fighting. Only about one in five survive."

"No wonder they're killing the people involved. Can't be fun, knowing that's waiting for you. What is a person supposed to do when they discover they only have a few weeks or months to live? I mean, before the bad stuff starts." He glanced at her. "Have you thought about it?"

"Not recently. I've been pretty focused on trying to stay alive. I suppose I'd get my affairs in order, say my goodbyes. Prepare my children for a future without me." She turned to face DeShear. "What about you?"

"I don't know." He shrugged as he stared at the road. "I don't have any family. No real affairs to get in order. I'd try to enjoy what time I had left, I guess. Go on a cruise."

"Some do that. Many of the afflicted choose to not endure the eight months of pain at all. That's another indication they've found out about the sequence."

"I can understand that, staring at eight months of pain with death waiting at the end." DeShear held the steering wheel and sat up straighter. "There was a cop in my precinct a few years back—got diagnosed with cancer. Young guy, headstrong. He rubbed a lot of people the wrong way. Anyway, the cancer was already bad when they found it, so they told him to start planning. You know, like you said—get your affairs in order." DeShear stared at the highway. "Watching what he went through, week after week, it was hard. We'd visit him in the hospital, me and the guys. Most days he wasn't himself. He was a frail old man all of a sudden, and then he was in a lot of pain. Just nonstop. He was that way for a year, almost. I . . . it was a long year." He glanced at Lanaya. "A lot of people would have found a way to end it and get out of that nonstop pain, you know?"

Lanaya lowered her voice. "Did he pass away?"

"No, the kid was a fighter. He battled back. I'd get off work, I'd be tired or whatever, but I always went to go see him, at least a few times a week, usually more. I had to go. I felt like, if I didn't, he might not be there the next time, and I wanted to be sure he knew . . ." DeShear's voice wavered. "That somebody was still pulling for him. I went to that hospital for almost a whole year, and I never saw that kid give up. And he made it. He's been cancer free for almost ten years now." DeShear sniffled. "Whenever I'm in a tough jam, I think about him fighting death from that hospital bed all alone, with those tubes hanging off of him and all those machines . . . and I know that whatever challenge I'm facing, I can beat it if I just don't quit."

Lanaya reached over and patted his leg. “I’m sure your visits were a great comfort and inspiration to him, Hamilton. Do you still see him since you left the force?”

“Yeah. Harriman and I go to hockey games together when we can.”

“Mark Harriman? No wonder he spoke so highly of you.” She sighed again. “That’s a nice story. I like a story with a happy ending.” She clutched the red and white shopping bag as she stared out the window. “I hope mine has one.”

The hotel suite at the Fairmont Le Château Frontenac was littered with tissues stained with blood. The gold-colored trash can in the ornate bedroom overflowed with them, as did the one in the massive bathroom, where a large man stood vomiting in the steamy shower. Just beyond the rumpled bed, a cell phone rang on the nightstand. It vibrated against a box of prescription migraine medicine and an empty bottle of Pepto Bismol.

Coughing, the man wrapped a towel around his wet, muscular torso and grabbed the phone. “Hello?”

“I’m checking in,” the woman on the other end said. “You weren’t answering. I got nervous. Is Maya with you? Or Britt?”

“Not this trip. It’s only me.” He wiped his mouth as he sat on the bed. Blood smeared across the back of his hand. “What do you want?”

“I thought we all agreed you wouldn’t be traveling alone now.”

“I got new information, and it should be a fast trip. I’ll be back in New York tonight. Now—what do you want?”

“Like I said, I’m checking in—like you asked me to.”

“Right.” He rubbed his eyes. “Sorry. I . . . I had a rough night.”

“Aren’t the new drugs from Maya working?”

He glanced at the desk by the window. The top was filled with bottles and syringes. “It’s hard to tell. Transfusions have worked best so far.”

“You’ll have to wait. I don’t know anybody at the hospitals in Quebec, and I can’t just call and ask them to offer the blood and equipment. Transfusions cost a lot of money and they take time.”

“Money, I have. Time is a different matter. Speaking of which.” He lifted the Patek Philippe wristwatch off the night table. “I need to get on the road if I’m going to get all the way up to Saguenay before our target wakes up and gets moving. She’ll be much harder to get once she’s at the lab.” He held the cell phone to his ear with his shoulder as he strapped on the watch.

“Tristan, listen to yourself. You’re pushing too hard. You should rest up.”

“Can’t.” He stood, leaving the towel on the bed and going into the bathroom. “I’m getting weaker every time. The steroids and HGH can only do so much. I have big spans of strength—days and days where I feel great—but they’re getting more spread out, and the crashes are getting worse.” He reached into his shaving bag and picked up a stick of deodorant, swiping it under his arm. “If I can keep mustering a few days here and there for transfusions . . .”

“Do that. Rest up. We got this.”

“You got this?” He frowned. “You completely blew the last assignment. It was a mess.”

“We—”

“I’m not blaming you.” He stared at his reflection, running a hand through his damp hair. “It was a bad idea—my bad idea. From here out, I’ll handle it.” Setting the phone on the marble counter, he pressed the speaker button and ran the deodorant under his other arm. “I have an easy target here, then another in Maryland. Then I can get two in Minnesota. That’s four in a week, and I might start letting the word out that they’re connected.”

“How? It’s too risky going to the press. If we expose the others, they’ll be hunted down.”

“I’m not going to the press.”

“Well what, then?”

He peeked at the large gun inside the shaving bag. “Let me worry about that.”

“Yeah,” she huffed. “You’ll handle it—if you don’t pass out in the middle of the next one. You were running on fumes an hour after Tampa.”

“I’ll be fine. The transfusions help a lot.” He picked up the brown plastic medicine bottle from the counter and shook a few pills into his hand, swallowing them without water.

“But it doesn’t have to be only you. We can help. I know the last one went wrong, but—”

“You’ve been helping, and I’m grateful. But less blood on the hands of others is better.”

“That’s not realistic.”

“That’s how I want it. Now, I really have to go. I’ll see you in New York.”

She sighed. “Do you ever think we’re wrong about all this? Not in what we’re doing, but how we’re doing it?”

“Every day. And every night before I go to sleep. I wonder if what I’m doing makes me worse than they are.” He crossed the room to the window and stared out from the majestic Fairmont Le Château Frontenac, gazing over the lights of the Quebec City skyline. The castle-like hotel towered over the old city. In the distance, the big river rippled and flowed, casting shimmering reflections out from its dark, curving swath.

He swallowed hard, a knot forming in his throat. “But I think about innocent kids suffering and I remember how this started. Then I don’t worry anymore. It has to be done, and this is the only way. And now I know I’m the only one who can do the job.”

“Other greyhounds would probably step up if they were asked. Or if they knew.”

“But I’m not just any greyhound.” He squared his shoulders and stared at his reflection in the glass. “I’m the Greyhound. And as long as I’m breathing, the job stays with me.”

DESHEAR'S EYELIDS HAD been getting heavy as he passed by the odorous paper mills and swampy roadside ponds of southern Georgia, but the blue flashing lights in his rearview mirror took any sleepiness out of him. He gripped the steering wheel and glanced at the speedometer. Seventy-one. No way any cop—not even a Georgia highway patrol trooper with a quota—was going to pull someone over in the middle of the night for a measly one mile an hour over the limit.

Lanaya sat with her eyes closed and her head resting against the door, her red and white shopping bag in her hands.

She finally gets some sleep, and now a state trooper's going to wake her up.

But why is he pulling us over?

It seemed too quick for the Atlanta police to connect all the dots and track them down, but it still wasn't good. If the officer started looking around the inside of the car, he'd find a big bag of cash, a few unregistered guns—who knows how many felonies those were involved in—and he'd haul them in on suspicion. Then, while they were sitting in a holding tank, the authorities would eventually link them to the park shooting and the hotel assault. Sitting in lockup would also make things pretty easy for anybody who wanted to put some bullets in them—just wait for the arraignment, follow them outside to the car, and pop, pop, pop.

It was simply a can of worms DeShear didn't want opened right now. None of that helped protect Lanaya's family or stop the killers.

DeShear flipped on the rental car's emergency flashers and eased the car toward the side of the road. He drummed the wheel as options raced through his mind.

It can't be about Centennial Park. There hasn't been enough time. The hotel incident wouldn't get attention this far away. It's not feasible that it was related to the killers, and if the killers were connected to the police, they'd have used the cops earlier in the game.

But it didn't matter. He'd find out soon enough.

"Lanaya, wake up."

She didn't budge.

"Lanaya." He tapped her on the leg. "Hey. We're getting pulled over by the police. Wake up."

That did the trick. She gasped and sat upright, clutching her bag to her chest. "What's going on? And what's that smell?"

"The old paper mill, the Georgia swamps . . . Georgia in general. We have a state trooper pulling us over. Try to act calm, like you did when you went to the airport."

She swallowed hard, nodding.

He eyed the shopping bag. "See if you can—without bending over—see if you can slide your big bag of money under your seat."

"Why? It's my money. We didn't steal it."

DeShear held his hands out. "Look at us. Do you know what a Georgia cop thinks when he finds a couple of sleepless people, dressed like they're practically homeless, driving a car in the middle of the night with thousands of dollars in cash—ten minutes from the Florida border?"

"Drugs?"

"And they don't take kindly to that. Now, shove it under the seat without bending over. He'd see that from his patrol unit, and it would give him probable cause to search our car, and then he'll find our guns. Try to slide the bag, and then kick it the rest of the way with your foot. If we don't give him a reason to search the car, we'll probably be fine."

"Probably?"

"We don't know why he's pulling us over yet. Maybe the rental agency caught the fake ID. Did everything go okay at the airport when you went to get the car?"

She stared straight ahead. "Yes. Why? Of course it did. Why wouldn't it? Take the ticket. Or talk your way out of it. You were a cop."

"I don't think that's our best plan of action." He pulled the car to a stop, glancing at the GPS. A blue car icon pointed down a purple highway, bordered on the right by the big green patch of a swamp. The Florida border wasn't on screen yet, but it was close. "These southern Georgia boys like to write their tickets. Just sit tight and act like a sleepy wife on a long, boring road trip. We went to Gatlinburg for the week."

The silhouette of the officer approached, one hand shining a flashlight into the rental car, the other resting on his gun. DeShear peeked at the side of the road. The narrow emergency lane had a short span of grass next to it that disappeared down a hill, no guard rails.

The officer was shorter and rounder than most state troopers. DeShear continued to hold the wheel with both hands, forcing himself not to drum his fingers. After the officer had come a few steps closer, DeShear slid a hand onto the armrest and pressed the button to lower the window. The sharp, cold wind bit his cheeks.

The beam of the flashlight bounced off DeShear's face, then moved around the car's interior.

"Evening, sir," the officer said, his breath making white puffs with every word.

The accent was thick. Pure southern Georgia. And his uniform wasn't the gray and light blue of a state trooper uniform and a Stratton hat. Some kind of county deputy, maybe.

Why is he on the highway stopping us?

"Evening officer," Deshear said, squinting in the bright light.

"License and registration, please."

"Sure. Why did you pull me over?" DeShear rubbed his eyes. "I had the cruise control set at seventy."

"Welcome to Chipley. It's fifty-five through here, right on to the Florida border."

He pronounced "here" as "hyah," with two syllables.

"Well, I'm sorry, I used the cruise control because I wanted to be sure not to speed." DeShear reached for his wallet.

"And you didn't pay attention when it went to fifty-five."

DeShear winced. The whole situation that was now putting them in potential jeopardy could have been easily avoided. "No. Guess I missed the slower speed limit sign."

"You and everybody else in a rush to get to sunny Florida."

Over the officer's shoulder radio, the dispatcher calmly gave instructions to another unit.

"Do y'all have the registration for this car, sir?"

"Suh" was another one, said southern style. In Atlanta, there wasn't a discernible accent at all.

"Uh, it—it's a rental." DeShear shrugged. "Let me look for it."

Stepping back from the vehicle, the officer shined his light on Lanaya. "Take your time."

She held completely still, more likely from fear than DeShear's earlier instructions, until the light passed from her face.

DeShear dug his wallet out of his pocket and withdrew the license, contemplating his next move. He couldn't risk the officer running his ID. The computer might not have the car flagged, but it might have him. He glanced in the rearview mirror at the flashing blue lights behind him.

“Here you go.” He held the license up, but didn’t extend his hand outside the window. “I’ll check the glove box for the registration.” He leaned a little toward the glove box, inching his hand further into the car.

“That’s fine, sir.” The officer reached for the license.

The dispatcher came on again. “Unit 454, we have a make on your tag.” Static interference garbled the last part. It sounded to DeShear like she said, “TSA reports 10-29-F. Proceed with caution.”

DeShear recognized the code. The vehicle was wanted in connection with a crime, and by TSA. His heart pounded. They couldn’t get picked up.

This guy’s not highway patrol or a county deputy sheriff. He might not have dashboard cameras.

The officer frowned, leaning forward for the license with one hand as he pressed the mic with the other. “Say again, Dispatch.”

DeShear dropped the license and grabbed the officer’s wrist with both hands. He pulled him forward and grabbed the shoulder mic. As the officer scrambled for his sidearm, DeShear yanked the hip radio off his belt.

The officer jumped back, drawing his service weapon and pointing it at DeShear. “Stop! Get out of the vehicle!”

DeShear dropped the car into reverse. “Hold on!” he shouted to Lanaya. Stomping the gas pedal, he launched the car backwards. The wheels squealed as DeShear threw an arm behind Lanaya’s seat so he could keep his eyes looking out the back. The squad car grew in the window.

The officer chased after them.

“He’s coming!” Lanaya shouted.

DeShear steered the car wildly as it raced backwards. “I have to slow down to make sure the air bags don’t deploy on impact, but you’re still gonna feel a bump.”

Lanaya put a hand on the dashboard. “What about the cop?”

“He shouldn’t shoot at us. We’re not engaging him.”

“Shouldn’t?”

Aiming the car at the cruiser looming in the back window, DeShear hit the brakes. Lanaya bounced backward into her seat. The cars touched bumpers with a metallic crunch. Mashing the gas pedal, the tires squealed again as the vehicle strained to put the police cruiser in motion.

DeShear gritted his teeth. “Come on. Come on!”

Smoke poured off his tires.

DeShear forced all his weight onto the pedal as the officer closed in on them. The cruiser inched backwards.

“He’s right on top of us!” Lanaya screamed, sliding down in her seat.

“There we go.” The cruiser moved slowly, grinding over the asphalt, its locked wheels not turning as it slid. “Come on, baby.”

The grill of the squad car groaned as the sedan forced it to move. DeShear jerked the steering wheel to the left. The rear of his car went toward the highway, but the rear of the police cruiser went toward the side of the road.

The green swamp glistened in the night.

“There we go, baby! Come on!”

The cruiser picked up speed as it headed toward the embankment.

“Hang on!”

“I’m hanging on!”

He swerved, sending a jolt through the car as they sped off the asphalt and over the grass. DeShear and Lanaya bounced upwards into the ceiling.

The cruiser teetered on the edge of the short precipice, its tail pointing down toward the swamp.

The grill raised slowly, then the squad car slid down the hill. It gathered speed and bumped along over the wet, uneven ground until the angle got too steep, then it rolled over onto its side. A second later, it fell onto its roof with a muffled crunch. The patrol car slid sideways for a few more yards before coming to rest upside down, a few feet into the muck of the murky green swamp.

DeShear jammed his vehicle into drive and punched the gas again, sending dirt and gravel upwards as he sped forward. The officer took a position near the side of the road, pointing his gun and shouting. DeShear swerved wide to the left, nearly into the median, so the deputy wouldn’t think they planned to run him down. As DeShear passed, the officer kept his gun on them, but no shots were fired. Their vehicle sped down the highway and away from the scene.

DeShear squeezed the steering wheel, smiling and bouncing up and down as they raced past an exit. “Yeah! Whew, baby, we did it.” He looked at Lanaya. “You okay?”

“Barely.” She maintained her grip on the dashboard. “Slow down.”

He eased his foot off the gas and let their speed drop to fifty-five, his heart pounding. “Yeah, good call.” There might be more than one deputy on this span of I-75. No sense in getting pulled over again. They wouldn’t be so lucky a second time. He peered at Lanaya. “You did well back there.”

As they went around a wide bend in the road, a gravel swath appeared up ahead in the median.

“Okay,” DeShear said. “One more time. Hang on.” He swerved the car over the gravel and onto the northbound lanes.

“What are you doing?” Lanaya said. “The cop is this way and Tampa’s the other way.”

“There’s an exit before we get to him. We have a very short window of time before we’re right back where we started, getting pulled over.” DeShear checked the GPS, then picked up the officer’s radio from the floor boards and tossed it in the back seat. “When Officer Friendly doesn’t report in a few minutes, they’ll go looking for him—and then all of cop world is gonna break loose. They’re going to look at the last stop he called in. He would’ve given the make, model, and license number of this car. If there’s video in that squad car, they’ll download it and have the color of the car and the number of occupants. They already know it was headed southbound. So we’re going to go north for a minute, back to that little town we just passed. We need to be in a different car.”

“Where are we going to rent another car at this time of night in the middle of nowhere?”

DeShear took the first exit off the highway. “Who said anything about renting?”

• • • •

THE FIRST TRUCK STOP they came to was brightly lit, with a lot of eighteen wheelers parked all around it, but no regular cars. At the 7-11 next door, however, several cars out back appeared to be where an employee might park. The dingy bar next to 7-11 had even more selections.

DeShear circled back to the truck stop and pulled in. “Stay here. Keep your head down, but you’re not hiding. You’re just not drawing attention to yourself. If somebody sees you, don’t act like you’re asleep, act like your husband’s inside going to the bathroom.”

“What does that expression look like?”

“Annoyed. I’ll try to find a vehicle at the bar. If I’m lucky, the ones by the back exit belong to employees, so nobody’s going to need them too soon and come looking for them. But I don’t want to have the bouncer catch me borrowing his car when he comes out for his smoke break.” DeShear opened the door. A blast of cold wind shot through the rental car. “Stay put. I’ll be back in less than ten minutes.”

She frowned. “But then you’ll be driving a stolen car.”

“You will, once I procure one, and only for a few minutes. I’ll drive the rental—the car the cops are looking for—and we’ll find a pond and roll the rental into it. Then I’ll hop in the stolen car with you and we’ll head south. First chance we get, we swap plates to a Florida tag. It’ll buy us a few hours, and by then we’ll be in Gainesville, and our Georgia deputy and the big bad Georgia Highway Patrol won’t be looking for us there. Neither will TSA, for whatever’s chafing their butt. We snag another car from the university in Gainesville, and keep on trucking until we’re in Tampa. Depending on if we make good time or not, we might get there before daylight. And whatever personality you used at the rental agency, she probably needs to disappear, too.”

Lanaya sat back, nodding. “You’re quite resourceful, Hamilton.”

“That’s what you’re paying me for, but let’s not start high-fiving yet. We’re not in Tampa, and we’ll have a bunch of killers looking for us when we get there.”

WHEN THE GARAGE DOOR opened and Danielle Tremblay's white Audi SUV backed out, The Greyhound was ready.

Arriving before sunrise, he had parked three blocks away from the quiet Rue De Lampe number nine, then braced the icy Canadian morning to wait outside the Tremblay residence. Wearing two thin jackets—to discard the outer layer after it got covered with blood splatter—he squatted behind the neatly trimmed hedge on the side of the house, trying to think about anything except what he was about to do. When the garage door rumbled, his stomach lurched with adrenaline and nervousness, his thoughts crashing back to the reality of his mission. He reached past the two layers, his gloved hand sliding to the shoulder holster that held his .22 caliber Smith & Wesson handgun.

The car's engine turned over and hummed. He exhaled slowly and slinked around to the driveway.

The weapon was scary-looking, with its long silencer. He confirmed that thought when he approached the car and held the gun to the window. Danielle Tremblay's jaw dropped and her eyes went wide as she leaned away from the stranger wearing a ski mask and holding a big gun.

His stomach jolted again. She had children; what if they were the ones to find her? There was a husband. Neighbors who thought they lived in a safe, quiet neighborhood.

Wincing, he forced all that from his mind. There was a job to do.

He squeezed the trigger.

The first muted blast put a dime-sized hole in the glass, coating the inside with red spray. The driver slumped over the center console of the Audi, her face to the ceiling, a red cavern in her forehead. The car rolled a few inches toward the street as The Greyhound tugged the door latch. Opening the door, he walked alongside and he pumped five more muffled shots into his victim's torso. When the car hit the stone mailbox, it came to a stop.

He stepped back, shaking the adrenaline out of his hands. Tucking the gun into its holster, he shut the car door and walked up the street to his vehicle, but not before leaving a message behind.

Stuffed in the victim's mouth, police would find a business card that read Angelus Genetics.

HARRIMAN'S PHONE RANG as he drove to the station. He lifted it from the cup holder and read the screen. The fire marshal was up early. It wasn't even seven yet. That meant it probably wasn't good news.

He pressed the button and held the phone to his ear. "Mark Harriman."

"Officer, this is Harmon Crenny." The man spoke in a slow, deliberate cadence, giving his words a nearly pleasant delivery—if there hadn't been iron in every word.

"Yes, sir. What can I do for you?"

"I understand you are friends with a certain fella by the name of Hamilton Dee-shear, and he doesn't seem to like returning calls from my field investigators."

"Well, sir. It's just that . . . I believe Mr. DeShear is on a case, and apparently—"

"Apparently he's dodging us. This here is what's known as a courtesy call, officer, and it's the only one you gonna get, 'cause I'm telling you, this kinda stuff don't fly. Tampa Fire don't mess around when it comes to arson, y'hear? Now, I've been patient so far—your department and mine, needin' to play nice in the sand box with each other and all—but that time is over, so listen up."

“Yes, sir.”

“I understand friendship, son, but this here is a serious matter. So I don’t care if y’all are friends or cousins or if your momma knew his family way back when. If I don’t hear from Hamilton DeShear in the next eight hours, I’m putting a warrant out for his arrest. And once I do, it might be a while before he sees the sky again. Am I making myself clear?”

“Yes, sir. I know you don’t have any choice. I appreciate the call.”

“Good. You’re very welcome. You have a nice day now, officer.” The fire marshal hung up. Harriman sat at a red light and pounded his steering wheel. “Dammit, Hank, where are you?”

• • • •

AS THE SUN PEEKED OVER the privacy fence and through the trees behind it, Lanaya sipped her coffee and stared at a large, two story house. “Are you nervous to talk to her, Hamilton?”

He shook his head. “No. It’s . . . this is just not the kind of story you want to show up with after not speaking for a while.” He moved his eyes over his odd assortment of clothing. Sweatshirt, sweat pants, dress shoes. Unshowered, unshaven, bad breath. “Especially not looking like this.”

“Forgive me for prying. Are you two not on good terms?”

“We are. We just . . . People drift apart.” DeShear toyed with the coffee cup, turning it slowly in the cup holder. “My work and hers don’t intersect much. We don’t run in the same social circles anymore. She remarried, so . . .”

“I see,” Lanaya whispered.

The home was impressive. The lawn looked freshly mowed—almost a formality this time of year in Florida—but most homeowners had their service continue mowing through the holidays to keep the weeds down. Not that this house had any weeds.

A corner of the swing set was visible from the street, and it needed a new coat of stain. That may have been the only thing on the property that wasn’t in showcase condition.

DeShear ran his fingers back and forth over his lips and along the beard stubble on his chin, staring at the house.

“I think you misjudge your wife,” Lanaya said. “She knows you and trusts you. I think she’ll understand your current appearance.”

“Yeah.” DeShear pursed his lips. He sat forward and put his hand on the door latch. “Guess it’s time to find out.”

He opened his door and stepped out into the frosty morning air. The thought of explaining—what to say, what to not say—worried him. The story had a lot of moving parts, none terribly believable until the part where the shooting starts, and then Camilla would refer it over to the police.

Lanaya followed him up the driveway. He thought about asking her to wait in the car, but Camilla would see her eventually and he’d have to explain anyway.

On the porch, he pressed the cold, glowing doorbell with his thumb and leaned back, drumming his fingers on his thigh. Three muffled tones came from inside the house, melodic and regal, like distant church bells, or a deep, well-trained wind chime. DeShear looked down and smoothed his Georgia Bulldogs sweatshirt.

The entry wreath swung backwards as the big door opened.

Camilla was a pretty woman, and she was dressed well. Her charcoal gray suit hugged her curves without being unbusinesslike, and her hair and earrings were both a radiant shade of gold.

Her eyebrows furrowed. “Dash?” A half smile came to her face as she opened the door wider, cocking her head. “What are you doing he—”

Dash. DeShear's enjoyment at hearing her old nickname for him vanished when her gaze dropped to his attire.

"Oh, my goodness. Dash, what's happened? Have you been in some sort of wreck?"

He opened his mouth, shrugging. "It's a long story, very involved, but it's one that I need to discuss with you. I'm sorry for showing up like this. If there had been any other way—"

"It's nearly seven." She adjusted an earring. "I have to get to the office."

"I know. It's important, though. I'm in the middle of a complicated case and the IRS is going to want to be directly involved."

A man's voice came from behind her. "Darling, who's at the door?" Harper Madison III, assistant U. S. Attorney, appeared. Tall, thin, and just the right amount of gray at the temples to seem distinguished without simultaneously appearing elderly. He worked on the last adjustment of his necktie as he approached, then slid the silk knot neatly into place at the front of his starched white shirt collar.

Camilla stepped back. "Honey, you remember Dash."

"Yes." Madison's face was rigid. "I'm sorry, Hamilton, but it's a bit early for a social visit, isn't it?"

DeShear nodded. "It is. But this information involves your department, too. And the FBI. If I could just come in for a minute, I can explain."

"You know," Madison said. "The fire marshal's office called us. They were asking if we'd seen you. Something about arson on your apartment. So we're required to call them and tell them that you're here."

"Honey, that's not—"

"Mom, where is my language arts folder?" A girl came down the stairs. She wore a plaid skirt and a stiff burgundy Polo shirt embroidered with the crest of the exclusive Tampa Day School.

"Cassidy." Madison swept his hand toward the door. "Say hello to Mr. DeShear."

"Good morning, sir. I mean, good morning, Hamilton." She stood by her father and stared at DeShear's ill-fitting sweat pants. "Ew, what happened to you?"

Despite the awkwardness of the entire situation, her comment made DeShear laugh. "I got into some trouble, and you noticed." Putting his hands on his knees, he leaned forward and faced the young girl. "You're smart, like your mother. How old are you now? Eight?"

"Ten," she said.

"Ten? Wow. Almost all grown up."

Mr. Madison cleared his throat. "Again, Hamilton, it's a bit early . . ."

"I know, I know. I think I have some information that you need to hear, and the reason for my appearance is because we've been on the run from—" he glanced at the girl "—we've been working on some things that will interest both of you. But time is critical."

"Fine," the attorney said. "I'll call the fire marshal and you can discuss it with them. If there's anything they need me to hear, they can tell me."

"Actually, it's primarily an IRS matter." His eyes went to Camilla. "A multinational corporation with illegal funds. It'll fall under a RICO statute violation, but that's just for starters. There's intent to defraud shareholders, and probably a ton of undeclared income. But it'll require federal marshals and FBI."

Mr. Madison frowned, putting his hand on his wife's shoulder. "Darling, I'm due in court at eight-thirty."

Her eyes stayed on DeShear. “Let me listen to what they have to say.” Camilla turned to her husband. “Then I’ll take them to my office. You come by after your hearing.”

Harper turned his chin up. “You sure?”

She patted his shoulder. “Drop off Cassidy on your way.”

He grumbled, heading down the hallway.

Camilla stepped back from the door, sweeping her arm toward the living room. “Please, come in. And where are my manners?” She held her hand out to Lanaya. “I’m Dash’s—Hamilton’s—ex-wife, Camilla Madison.”

DeShear let Lanaya pass him to enter the house. “This is my client, Lanaya Kim,” he said.

The ladies shook hands. With her arm still holding the edge of the big door, Camilla looked at her ex-husband. The half-smile came back. “It’s good to see you, Dash.”

“Thanks, Cammy.”

He ignored the butterflies in his stomach and stepped inside, the door easing shut behind him.

CAMILLA GOT UP FROM her living room sofa. “I don’t know, Dash. It’s pretty thin.” Glancing at her watch, she walked to the hallway and plucked a set of keys from a large, baroque armoire. “Look, why don’t you visit the fire marshal and get that situation cleared up, then we’ll sit down again in a few days and see where everything is.”

DeShear shook his head, rising. “Can’t. That won’t work. People shot at us in Atlanta. Her family’s in hiding, for Pete’s sake. The others on the list are in danger. Why won’t you act on this?”

“It’s not IRS jurisdiction. It’s mostly overseas, and what isn’t in Indonesia is a matter for the FBI and the police. I’ll act on it. I’ll refer it to the right agencies, and they’ll move on it. But it’s not really an IRS thing.”

“But IRS is the key. Cammy, these guys did a lot of illegal stuff, but they did it to make money. It’s not feasible to think none of that cash came back here. And when it did, they sure didn’t declare it to the IRS and pay taxes on it. Even Al Capone didn’t do that. All we have to do is show one dollar from that activity making its way back to the States, and we have the thread that unravels the sweater. Now, Lanaya has solid evidence of what activities occurred at the Arizona facility—”

“Ten years ago,” Camilla said. “Or longer.”

DeShear paced back and forth. “They’re still doing it, and they’re washing the money. So it’s tax evasion or it’s money laundering, or both, but that’s IRS all the way. If you declare an emergency audit on a publicly traded company, they have to comply. Demand to see all assets, leak it to the press, and they’ll have no choice. They’ll have to take you to Indonesia to inspect—or watch their stock price plummet.”

She folded her arms. “It’s not that easy. It requires coordination with a lot of federal agencies.”

“Which is what that Fast Fly team used to do, right? Storm into financial institutions without any warning and seize everything in a surprise raid? I seem to remember you going on a lot of those back when we were newlyweds. And when you leak the news about the audit, the killers will come out to take down the board members they haven’t already gotten. You stuff a plane full of FBI agents and federal marshals dressed like auditors, and take them down to arm the Indonesian facility like it’s Fort Knox. If the killers set one foot in the airport and buy a ticket to Indonesia, we have them on conspiracy. Lanaya doesn’t think there are more than a dozen of them, so a platoon of federal marshals will have no trouble bagging the thugs the second they make their move. IRS will look like a hero and FBI will get a bunch of arrests. Everybody wins.”

“Yeah, we could utilize the RICO statutes to get the ball rolling.” Camilla twirled her keys, her gaze focused on a distant wall, but not really looking at it. “Between the potential IRS violations, the racketeering, and the conspiracy to commit murder, it makes a compelling case. The political arm will like it, and Fast Fly is good at making headlines.”

DeShear leaned forward. “And who puts Fast Fly in motion?”

“IRS.”

“Yeah, but who, specifically?”

“Bureau chiefs. I can ring the alarm and engage a Fast Fly team.”

“Yes, you can.” He grinned. “Cammy, please. I’m not going to embarrass you. I didn’t burn my apartment down, and I’m not wrong about this. Do it, and put us on the audit team. Get me on site. I’ll find out what they’re up to.”

She checked her watch again. "I'm not doing anything until I get some more details."

DeShear stepped back, chewing his lip.

She sighed. "Ride with me to my office and we'll talk on the way. I need to clear my schedule."

• • • •

"GOOD MORNING." CAMILLA'S assistant stood and handed her a stack of messages.

Camilla took a glimpse at the papers as she crossed the outer office area. She turned to Lanaya. "Ms. Kim, would you wait out here for a moment please? Tonia, would you get Ms. Kim some coffee?"

"Of course, Camilla." The assistant stood and walked down the hallway.

"Dash, would you join me in my office?"

DeShear nodded. "Sure."

The door shut behind him as his ex-wife went to her desk and sat. She placed her car keys on a folder on her desk, leafed through the messages, then picked up a pen and pointed it at him. "What kind of trouble are you really in?"

"None, really," DeShear said, shifting his weight on his feet. "Not the police kind, anyway. My client has shooters after her, and they burned down my place and shot at us in Atlanta. I fired back."

"Using what?"

"A gun I took off a guy who attacked us in the hotel. Then we—well, I—assaulted a cop and stole a car . . ."

She winced. "Who did you hit?"

"I didn't hit him. I grabbed the deputy's arm to take his radio, but that's technically assault. On the video it will look bad, and he'll say I assaulted him. Then . . . I disabled his patrol car and put it in a swamp. Oh, and the guns are probably stolen. I don't think the guys we took them from were really the above-board type."

Camilla closed her eyes and rubbed her temples. "Anything else?"

"That's about it."

"Well, it's good you aren't in any trouble." She tossed the pen to the desk. "What about the fire at your apartment?"

DeShear raised his hands. "I had nothing to do with that. I went to the gym and then had breakfast at Ithop, then I was with my client. That's all verifiable."

She leaned back and put her elbow on the arm of the chair, resting her chin in her hand. "Okay."

"So what I need is for you to arrest me."

"What?"

"Us. Arrest us." DeShear took a seat in one of the chairs in front of Camilla's desk. "Call a federal marshal from downstairs and arrest us, to be remanded into your custody. Then we'll be able to take care of business with you. The local jurisdictions don't supersede federal authority, so the Tampa fire marshal and the Tampa police, the Georgia deputy—none of them will be able to interfere with Lanaya and me unless you give the green light. Which you won't because I'm bringing this giant, promotion-getting case to you."

"Yeah, it's all for me. Thanks for making it so easy, too. The fire marshal and Tampa PD won't mind at all. Here's an idea. I think I'll get them over here and let them express their happiness to you in person before I take you out of their reach."

"That's a different way to go, but okay. They've all been leaving messages, anyway. But I was a little busy not getting killed to return their calls."

She sighed. “What about clothes?” Camilla pointed to his sweatshirt. “You can’t help run a task force meeting looking like that. I’d say you look like you slept in that gear, except you don’t look like you’ve slept.”

DeShear rubbed the beard stubble on his chin. “No, it’s been a while. But my place burned, so . . . we have some cash, though. We can buy some clothes. If we make a list, can somebody run to the mall for us? I mean, since it’s not really safe for us to be on the street.”

“I guess so. We’ve done stranger things. I’ll send an agent.”

He eyed the keys on her desk. “Would a federal marshal object to escorting us to your place so we can grab a shower?”

She frowned, sliding the keys to him. “Anything else? Want a pizza?”

DeShear stood. “We should contact the owner of the stolen car in front of your house. The license tag on the vehicle isn’t his, but they can track him down from the VIN number. And there are two stolen guns under the front seat. I think that’s it. Oh, no, there’s another stolen car in Gainesville.”

She glared at him.

“Yeah, that’s it. Have I told you how pretty your eyes are?”

She spun around in the chair to face the wall and a stack of folders piled high in front of a mirror. “Go. Get coffee, food, a shower. Then get back here. We have a big meeting to put together.”

He nodded. “Thanks, Cammy.”

As he moved to the door, he glanced back. Camilla had leaned forward to the mirror and lifted her chin, gazing at her reflection’s eyes.

DeShear smiled. “See?”

She looked at him in the mirror. “Go!”

THE GREYHOUND HELD a brochure in his hand as he stared out the penthouse window. Clouds of morning mist lifted and floated over the churning waters of Niagara Falls, the rocks around the basin white with a thick coat of ice. The railings of the observation deck were white with ice, too, like an artists' sketch that had run out of colors. Only a few people ventured out into the cold and past the wire Christmas trees to enjoy the view.

According to the brochure, the falls were to be bathed in colorful lights each night, and on New Year's Eve there'd be fireworks as well.

"The view from anywhere in this hotel should be beautiful." He tossed the pamphlet to the desk. "It'd be nice to use that to make a statement, somehow. Maybe throw Dr. Graff over the falls at the stroke of midnight. Maybe throw a few other board members from Angelus Genetics over, too. Really make a splash, so to speak."

As Maya readied her equipment, Dominique tied a length of rubber band to his arm.

"Why do you hate them so much?" Maya asked.

"I don't hate them." He tossed the brochure into the trash can and pushed himself back on the large bed. "I'm fine."

Dominique leaned in, lowering her voice. "You're not fine."

"Okay, have it your way. I'm not fine. I'll never be fine again, and I don't want to be. I hate what these people have done." He yanked the tourniquet off his arm and stormed to the window. "I had everything. A great job as a hedge fund manager, flying all over the world trading equities. Boats, cars, houses. A beautiful young family."

Britt and Maya stopped what they were doing, watching.

"I'd like to think I'm not motivated by hate, though, Maya. Some people might even say I'm being generous by not dragging this out somehow and hurting the people from Angelus the way they hurt others." His eyes narrowed. "They bred us like cattle or dogs, selecting the attributes they wanted to advance without worrying about what other latent characteristics might tag along. And the poor pups that didn't fit the bill? Oh, they were discarded like trash. Snuffed out, without a thought. Did you know, they even referred to us as dogs? It's in the records I discovered. Dogs! That's what we were to them."

Dominique stood in silence next to the transfusion equipment that awaited its patient.

"They called the alpha group Airedales. The betas were Bassets." He stared out the window. "And my group, the Gammas, we were Greyhounds." His voice softened, his thoughts elsewhere. "I think referring to us as something other than human made the byproducts of their research more palatable for them. The Nazis did the same thing. Ironic, for a company named Angelus—'Angel'—don't you think?"

The Greyhound turned to face his confederates, scowling. "But if people hate them, it's deserved. They earned it. Genetic changes don't just affect the subject. It's passed on. I watched so many die a slow, painful death because of what these monsters did. Then one day, my own children—one after the other, they'd fade and start their decline. As soon as we buried one, the next would get sick, like the Grim Reaper was taking turns as part of a sick game, to torture us."

His gaze fell to the floor. "After our youngest passed away, Megan was overwhelmed with grief and depression. Just overwhelmed. There's no word for that kind of pain. We tried to work through it.

We saw counsellors. You eventually try to live life again, but you never really do. During my next business trip, she called me in tears. She said she couldn't stand the pain, that all she could feel was darkness inside, and that each breath hurt to take." He lifted his eyes to Dominique. They were brimming with tears. "I understood. I felt it, too." The Greyhound swallowed hard, his voice a whisper. "Then she hung up and cut her arms open from the elbow to the wrist."

He closed his eyes and leaned against the window frame, the palatial suite in front of him and the massive waterfall churning behind him. "Angelus took everything from me. From me and a lot of others. I was able to build a new life for myself, but a lot of others—innocent people, children—they suffered and died for no reason other than for Angelus Genetics' bottom line." He clenched his teeth. "If evil has a face, it smiles from the board room of Angelus Genetics, in the body of Dr. Marcus Hauser. And as long as there's breath in my body, I'll keep fighting to stop them."

He stood, stepping to the bed, but stumbled.

"Doctor Carerra!" Britt ran forward, grabbing The Greyhound's arm as he slumped to the floor.

Dominique went to him, cradling his head in her hands. "Tristan?" He didn't respond. She glanced at Maya. "Help us get him to the bed."

"Yes, Doctor," Maya said. She grabbed one arm as Dominique held the other. Britt took hold of the legs, and they hoisted their unconscious patient onto the mattress.

Dominique leaned over him, gently lifting his eyelid and shining her pen light into his eye. "We need to start the transfusion, stat." After checking the other eye, she went to the centrifuge and turned it on. "Maya, get your meds ready. Britt, bring more units of whole blood up from the van."

He jumped up. "Yes, Doctor."

Dominique pulled another rubber swatch from the box and slipped it over Tristan's arm. "We have to act fast or we could lose him."

DESHEAR STROLLED PAST Camilla's Christmas tree and into the kitchen. A large, muscular man with a square jaw and a crew cut followed him, wearing a khaki t-shirt that read "Federal Marshal" across the front. His camouflage fatigue pants appeared to have been recently ironed, and his face was unwavering and stern.

DeShear pulled the coffee maker forward on the counter. "Officer, would you like some coffee?"

"I would not." He spit the words out like they tasted bad in his mouth.

"What about your fellow marshal?"

The officer straightened up and flexed his shoulders. "I'm sure neither I nor officer Vulpes wish to have any coffee with you or the other asset currently in our custody. Let's not dawdle. Ms. Madison wants us back at her office asap."

"Can't go anywhere without clothes, my friend. When they get here, we'll shower and dress as quickly as possible." DeShear opened the coffee. "But I can't get over feeling I must have wronged you somehow."

"Let's just say I don't appreciate escorting a felon around, and that I'd prefer our other hard-working officers take care of the proper business of the federal marshal's agency rather than be sent on a shopping trip to the mall."

It was too much to unscramble to someone who didn't seem to have an interest in the truth, so DeShear let it slide with an "I see." Hopefully, within an hour they'd part ways, never to see each other again.

"I'll have a cup." A large, muscular, female federal marshal walked into the kitchen. "Thank you."

DeShear looked at the officer with the crew cut, then called out to the living room. "Lanaya, coffee?"

"Are you making some, Hamilton? Are you sure that's allowed?"

He gathered cups from the cabinet. "I think Cammy will understand the intrusion. We can only watch so much TV while we wait."

"Then, yes, I'd like some very much."

DeShear pressed a button on the front of the machine. With a beep, it came to life. "There we go."

In the hallway, the doorbell rang with its elegant chimes. DeShear wagged his finger and grinned at the crew cut marshal. "Did you order a pizza?"

Frowning, the marshal headed to the door. He returned a moment later, following a third marshal holding several colorful paper shopping bags and a long plastic dress bag. "Merry Christmas," she said. "Your clothes are here."

Lanaya took the dress bag from her. "Thank goodness."

Taking the remaining bags, DeShear moved past the other marshal. "Let's do this again soon."

Following Lanaya down the hall to the master bedroom, DeShear emptied a bag onto the bed. "Pretty sure whatever's in that dress bag is for you. These men's pants are probably for me." He sifted through the garment packages. The next bag contained ladies' underwear. "Oops. This bag is probably yours. In fact," he glanced at the door. "I'm going to . . . if you want to go through the bags and pull out the men's clothes, I'll wait outside."

"Oh, nonsense," Lanaya said, dumping a bag onto the bed. "You were married. I'm sure there's nothing in here you haven't seen before."

“No, but it’s rare to know my clients’ underwear choices.”

“I see. Rare, but not completely unknown, then.”

“I, um. I . . .”

“Why, Hamilton, I believe I’ve made you blush.” She leaned over the bed and rummaged through the bags, handing him items. “These would be yours. Here are socks and a belt. Here’s another, a shirt. That looks to be about it.” She stood up straight. “If you’ll use the bedroom upstairs to dress, I’ll see you in the living room in ten.”

“Sounds good.” He stepped into the hallway, then stopped. “Lanaya, there’s one more thing.” He turned to face her, putting his hand on the door frame. “I’ll ask you this once, and whatever you say, goes—I won’t bother you with it again. You’ve gotten your family to a safe place. I don’t need to know where it is, but from what I’ve seen, you’re pretty good at that. If we’re successful in drawing the killers to Indonesia, that takes them away from your family, but it puts them in proximity to you. It’s very brave, but it’s also very dangerous. It puts you at risk, and I don’t want you to get hurt.” He shrugged, smiling. “I’ve kind of grown fond of you.”

A smile crept across Lanaya’s lips as well. “Possibly, you’ve merely grown fond of my money.”

“You said you didn’t have a lot of money.”

“I don’t.”

“Guess that’s not it, then.” DeShear locked onto her eyes, his face serious. “I’m just saying, you don’t have to do this. The people we’ve involved now, they’re professionals. They can handle everything from here. If you don’t like the odds, say the word and you can be out—no questions asked. You can watch it all from the sidelines and no one will think less of you. Tricking killers to come after us, that’s a risky game, and there are no do-overs.”

She folded her hands in front of her, looking down. “Hamilton, people are fond of saying that humans and dolphins share ninety-seven percent of the same DNA. Some say dolphins and humans are closely related—even though our most recent common ancestor died ninety-five million years ago. Humans and chimps share ninety-eight percent of the same DNA, but we can talk and they can climb trees with their feet.” She lifted her gaze and stared out the window. “The science of genetics is a journey into an amazing, powerful world, and it has fascinated me since I was a child, because it’s the little things in genetics that make all the difference.” Her eyes met his. “We share a high percentage of DNA with fuzzy animals and cute sea creatures, but we share 100% of the same DNA as mass murderers like Jeffrey Dahmer, the Son of Sam, and Adolph Hitler. That’s reality. When we bring a gene forward, who knows what things are brought with it? Given another roll of the dice, with the wrong environment and a little neglect, those things could create a group of Charles Mansons instead of Mother Therasas. I took part in what happened at Angelus. It may have been an unknowing role, but that doesn’t change the end result. A long time ago, I decided I wouldn’t sit by and let others do what I considered to be my responsibility. I need to try to correct what I am responsible for.”

“Can’t talk you out of it, huh?”

“I called you, remember? If I was able to be talked out of it, I’d have never started into any of this. Besides, we may be headed to Indonesia, but the destination is a genetics lab. That’s my turf.”

• • • •

“THANK YOU FOR COMING.” Camilla shook the hand of fire marshal Harmon Crenny and a lieutenant from the Tampa police force; then she greeted Mark Harriman. “Please, sit down. We’ll be starting soon.”

Harriman took a seat, leaning forward to whisper to his host. “Is Hank here, Cammy? I’d like to see him as soon as possible.”

“So would I,” grumbled the fire marshal.

“I know you all have business with Mr. DeShear, and you’ll speak with him soon.” Camilla sat, looking at the small group assembled in front of her. “But he is a principal source in an IRS matter that we are exploring, and it is of the utmost urgency. I’ll ask that you respect federal-state-county hierarchy and let us maintain him as our resource until the matter is closed. That said, I will let him speak with you, and he should be here any—well, speak of the devil.” She stood. “Here is now.”

DeShear strutted forth, in clean clothes and a necktie, leading a little parade of federal marshals, an IRS agent, and his client. He smiled as he approached Camilla’s group. “Remain seated, everyone.”

Harriman jumped to his feet, frowning. “Why haven’t you returned my phone calls?”

“Sorry, buddy.” DeShear clapped him on the shoulder. “Had to power my phone down to keep some killers from, well, killing us.”

The federal marshal with the crew cut approached Camilla. “Ms. Madison, will you have any further need of us?”

She nodded. “Stay close. It’s a secure building, but we’ll be assembling the task force and possibly leaving quickly. Coordinate with your sergeant, and be ready.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

The fire marshal growled at DeShear. “Don’t think some fancy footwork by your ex-wife will save your butt from arson charges, son. They’re on my desk, signed and ready to go.”

DeShear swallowed and looked at Camilla. “Not while I’m working for the feds, right?”

“Maybe not.” Crenny scowled. “But the minute they’re done with you, I take you away—in handcuffs. And that’ll be sooner than you think.”

Camilla raised her hands like a traffic cop. “I’m sure there’s no need for—”

“What the . . .” Harriman stared at Lanaya, his jaw hanging open. “It’s you.”

Lanaya backed away, her face a puzzle.

“You okay, there, Mark?” DeShear said.

Harriman whipped around to him. “What are you up to?” he hissed.

“I guess our pictures finally got around from the park shooting and the other stuff. It’s all—”

“Other stuff?”

“It’s nothing.” DeShear shrugged. “Well, it’s not nothing, but it’s a self-defense shooting. We were completely in the right, we just didn’t have time to stay and clear it up. But we will. Promise. That’s all gonna go away.”

“But . . .” Harriman glanced at Camilla, then back to DeShear. “We need to talk. Now. In private.”

“Can it wait until after the meeting?” Camilla asked, taking a glimpse at a wall clock.

Harriman grabbed DeShear by the arm. “I don’t think so, Cammy. Can I use your office for a minute?”

“We’re waiting for a link up to Washington. I’d prefer we don’t keep the vice president waiting.”

“The vice president?” DeShear said. “Holy cow.”

“Yeah, you said some of the right buzz words.” Camilla stood, pointing to the clock. “Genetics and money laundering had the director’s eyes glazing over, but when I said human trafficking, that lit him on fire. That’s a hot button for the vice president, and that got us a big green light for our official inquiry.”

Official inquiry was a coded term for what the IRS asked for right before one of its raids. The board of directors of the company in question would turn their noses up at an official inquiry, getting some blustering lawyer to request a postponement, then the Fast Fly team would kick down the doors, having already been staged. The IRS investigators seized everything, in every location, while the executives at the home office peed down their legs. Camilla had delivered.

“Money laundering? Human trafficking?” Fire marshal Crenny narrowed his eyes. “DeShear, what kinds of seedy crap y’all involved in, son?”

“Not him, sir,” Camilla said. “The people he’s been reporting to us about.”

“Reporting?” Crenny echoed, pounding the arm of his chair. “Reporting?”

“Yes,” Camilla nodded. “We’re using Mr. DeShear and his client as informants.”

“How long has that—”

“Would everyone like to join me in the conference area?” She walked away from the fire marshal and pointed to a large glass room with a long table centered in it. “The vice president will be on the video call with the director.”

“We’ll be right there.” Red-faced, Harriman dragged DeShear into Camilla’s office and shut the door.

“What’s up with you?” DeShear said, shaking his arm from his friend’s grip. “I know I didn’t call the fire investigators back, and that was wrong of me. But like I said, the bad guys were shooting in my direction at the time.”

“Did you open the emails I sent you?” Harriman put his hands on his hips, shaking his head and staring at the floor. His face remained red. “On your phone or anywhere?”

“No. I powered down, and we’ve been on the run.”

“I sent you an image of the arsonist.” Harriman put his hand to his temple. “You didn’t check it?”

“Not yet. Why?”

“I’ve got some bad news for you, then.” Harriman stared at Camilla’s group as they crossed the lobby and filed into the conference room. He pointed to Lanaya. “The arsonist in the picture is your client.”

THE MOTEL DOOR BURST open, its wooden frame splintering as its door knob shot across the floor. Jim Clayman leaped off the bed, racing for the gun laying on the tiny desk.

“Don’t try it.” Two men and a woman charged through the broken door. The closest intruder, sporting a shaved head and a dark brown goatee, spoke first. “There are more of us than there are of you, and we’re better armed.”

Clayman stared at the intruders. They stood side by side, each pointing a large gun at him. Two said nothing, just kept their guns aimed at his head.

He slowly sat back down onto the bed.

“You called your employer and said you were out,” the man with the goatee said. “He says you’re not.”

“What?” Clayman said.

“You said the situation in Centennial Park was amateur hour. Well, now he’s hired some professionals, and we say you’re not out until the boss says the job is done. Is that understood?”

Staring at the three large guns pointed at him, Clayman nodded.

“You didn’t do your job, little bird dog. You were supposed to keep eyes on the targets, and you ran away instead. That’s amateur. So now you’re going to come with us and make things right.”

Clayman swallowed hard. “How?”

“We’ll explain in the car. Let’s go.”

“Who are you?”

“Oh, you think you’re in a position to ask us questions, huh? Okay. I’m Elvis Presley.” He pointed to the others. “That’s Janet Jackson on the left, and the other one is George Michael.” Elvis raised his gun and smashed it into Clayman cheek, sending the hostage’s head back. “Any other stupid questions?”

Clayman gasped, putting a hand to his face. Blood covered his fingers.

Elvis leaned in close, raising his voice. “I asked you a question. I expect you to answer me. Do you have any more questions of any kind, at this time, for myself or my associates?”

Clayman flinched. “No.”

“Then let’s go.” Elvis stepped back and gave him a big grin. “We have a car in the parking lot. Walk to it quickly and quietly. Don’t say a word. If you try anything funny—or anything at all—we’ll shoot you to death right there in the parking lot. Don’t think we won’t.” Elvis waved his gun at the door. “You’ll disappear like your targets did, but you won’t be on your feet.”

He grabbed Clayman by the collar and hoisted him up. “When the big boss pays you to do a job, you do the job. You don’t call him and say you quit. The big boss decides when you’re done working for him. Understand?”

“Yeah.”

Elvis drew back and cracked Clayman with the gun again. “You say ‘yes sir’ when you’re talking to me.”

Clayman howled in pain, blood dripping from his mouth and other cheek. “Yes, sir!”

Gritting his teeth, Elvis put his nose to Clayman’s, whispering. “I’m about three seconds from putting a couple of rounds into your chest and two in the back of your head. So smarten up, little bird dog.” He spaced his next words for emphasis. “You’re . . . not . . . calling . . . the shots.”

With Janet Jackson holding one arm and George Michael holding the other, they crossed the parking lot toward a gray sedan. As they neared it, Elvis dug in his pocket and pulled out a key fob. The car lights flickered and the trunk popped open.

“No!” Clayman kicked and twisted. “No! No!”

Elvis stopped and turned to face the hostage, shaking his head. “Some people just don’t listen.” He gripped his gun and brought the butt down on the back of Clayman’s skull. The hostage sagged in the arms of his escorts.

• • • •

DESHEAR STORMED INTO the conference room, with Harriman following him. Camilla and her assistant were tinkering with the A/V projector. Around the large conference table sat the police lieutenant, the fire marshal, several IRS agents, and representatives from the FBI and the federal marshal service.

“I need to borrow my client for a minute,” DeShear said, walking up to Lanaya and pulling back her chair. She stood, her jaw hanging open.

“Will you quit screwing around?” Camilla said. “The meeting’s about to start!”

A blue image appeared on the left half of the wall screen, displaying the seal of the Vice President of the United States. The right side flashed the words, “connecting,” and then went to an image of several people sitting around a small table, the IRS Directors logo on the wall behind them. A woman’s voice came over the monitor. “Bureau Chief Madison, we now have you connected with Director Fleming. Please hold for the Vice President.”

DeShear and Lanaya headed into the lobby.

“Dash! What are you doing?” Camilla called after them.

The conference door swung shut. DeShear walked briskly, his hand at the middle of Lanaya’s back.

“Hamilton, I do not appreciate being manhandled.” She took his hand and pushed it away. “Please.”

He kept walking. “Stay quiet and get in here.”

Entering Camilla’s office, he pushed the door closed and turned to his client. “I’m going to ask you one time, and then I turn you over to the fire marshal and Harriman. What did you do?”

“What? What do you mean?”

“You know what I mean! My apartment. The fire. No more lies. Out with it.”

“I do not appreciate—”

“Enough!” He pressed his hands against the sides of his head, pacing back and forth in the office. “They have pictures, Lanaya. Images of you walking around my apartment building ten minutes before the whole place went up in flames. The neighbor in the next building identified you. She knows me. She saw you go into my unit right before the fire.”

Lanaya stood rigid. “Whatever the authorities have, I assure you, they do not have pictures of me.”

“What, it’s your evil twin sister? It’s you! You’re wearing the same running shoes.”

“If you check, you will see those are a very popular brand and style. Over three hundred pairs were sold in the greater Tampa Bay area this year.”

“Stop!” His cheeks grew hot. “Just tell me why. They wanna hang this on me. They think I conspired with you. And in a few minutes, when Camilla’s meeting is over, those two guys—the fire marshal and the police lieutenant—they’re gonna talk to Harriman, who will mention the uncanny resemblance you have to their suspect. Then one of us is going to jail. Well, it’s not going to be me, sister. I didn't burn my place and I sure didn't conspire to have it burned. Everything I had was in there. But you—you probably waited for me to leave, and then—”

“Arson is a very serious matter.” Lanaya’s tone was calm and even. “Frankly, I’m offended you think I’m capable of such a thing. I’m certain they ensured everyone was out of the building first—whoever the arsonist was.”

DeShear shook his head. “You did it, didn’t you?”

“As I said previously, no, I didn’t do it.”

“Okay, so some random woman who just happens to be your height and build and hair color, and with the same facial features and the same running shoes, comes by my place when you just happen to be in town, and she—she just wanders by, and—”

Lanaya looked directly into his eyes. “Would you have believed me?”

“What? Believed what?”

She kept her eyes locked on his, her voice falling to a whisper. “My case. The links between the deaths, the Propofol. Would you have believed me if you hadn’t seen for yourself what these people were capable of?”

“I—I already said yes to meeting you when—”

“You wanted to turn it over to the police, as I recall. You said so several times in our meeting. You humored me for the large fee I offered, but it wasn’t until you saw your own self in danger that you really signed on.”

He shook his head. “That’s not true, and don’t try to turn this around.”

“Turn what? Those were real bullets they shot at us in Atlanta. Did I stage that, too?”

“Atlanta was real, but . . .”

“And the murders. Those were real. Or did I kill Dr. Braunheiser and Emmet Kincaid and Nilla Cunde and a dozen other people? Wake up. This is all real. People are dying. And whoever burned your place, they saved your life.”

“How in the world do you figure that?”

She proceeded to the window that looked into the lobby, toying with the cord that controlled the blinds. “Were they only shooting at me in Atlanta? They shot at you, too. I said we were linked, and we are. Atlanta proved that. If someone burned your place to get you away from it, they did you a favor—whoever it was. And any conscientious person would ensure there were no people remaining in the building first.”

“It’s—Lanaya, this is a big deal. This—that fire marshal is gonna string you up, and me right along with you. They play for keeps.”

“Then let them!” She turned to him. “The killers play for keeps, too. We learned that in Atlanta, when they killed several innocent people simply to get to us. I play for keeps as well. I’m in this thing, and I’m staying in. If someone who looks like me burned down your apartment, let the police and fire marshal do their jobs. They’ll see Lanaya Kim was nowhere near Tampa until her flight came in an hour before our meeting. There wasn’t enough time to get there, do what they propose, and still get to the meeting.”

“Lanaya . . .”

“Hamilton, I will not keep repeating myself. It’s decision time. The cards are dealt.” She pointed to the glass conference room. “Your ex-wife has the Vice President on the phone to send a squad of auditors and armed personnel overseas to deal with a situation that twenty-four hours ago they didn’t even know existed.”

“I’m sorry.” He looked down. “I think this might change things.”

“Does it?” She went to him. “The fire marshal and police are ready to arrest the woman in the picture, and yet they’ve subordinated their interests for the bigger cause—a cause that needs your help. I certainly can’t do this without you. But I’ll respect your decision. You must be true to your own sense of what’s right.”

He stared at her, chewing his lip.

“Hamilton, you might be a private investigator right now, but you weren’t always, and it’s not your true calling. A blind man could see it, but somehow you can’t. You’re destined to be a hero and save lives—through whatever format fate chooses to manifest it—but make no mistake, that is your true calling. It’s your nature to stand up to the bad in the world, and that will always drive you, no matter what your job title is. And that’s who I need with me for this.”

She looked to the window. Camilla’s assistant walked across the lobby toward them. “Now, unless I miss my guess, that nice young woman is coming over here to tell us to return to the conference room. What are you going to do?”

• • • •

ARRIVING AT THE SITE they’d settled on earlier—a small clearing at the end of a long dirt road—Elvis and his associates went about the second part of their interrogation. Janet Jackson opened the trunk and snapped a tube of smelling salts in half, holding it under the nose of their hostage. Clayman’s head jerked, then jerked again as he struggled to avoid inhaling the pungent fumes that brought him back to consciousness.

“Told you,” Janet Jackson said, leaning on the side of the car. “We should have clipped this goofball in the hotel room.”

“When you’re right, you’re right.” Elvis nodded, sighing. “Okay, let’s get to it. We have a conversation to finish.”

Janet and George grabbed Clayman by the arms and hauled him from the trunk. Dragging him around to the front of the car, the headlights would allow for additional illumination until the rising sun cut fully through the thick trees overhead. Clayman’s eyes rolled around for a moment, then he gagged and vomited down the front of his shirt.

Beyond the car, a lone cricket chirped in the chilly swamp.

Elvis grabbed Clayman by the hair and held his face up. “Time to come clean, little bird doggy. Your targets got away. You had a gun. Did you use your weapon?”

“I, uh . . .”

Elvis raised his gun and fired a shot into Clayman’s shoulder. The burst splattered red onto Clayman’s face and neck as he screamed in pain. He grabbed his shoulder and doubled over, pulling free of the grip of the men who held him. He rolled on the swampy ground, wet leaves sticking to his back and face.

“Pay attention,” Elvis said, grabbing his victim and setting him upright. “Are you awake now, bird dog? This is not the time for stalling. It’s a simple question, so you should be able to answer fast and without deliberation. What happened to your weapon?”

“The guy took it from me!” Clayman whimpered, blood spilling from his hand as he gripped his shoulder. “The guy with the scientist.”

“He hit you?”

“He, he . . .”

The second shot went past Clayman’s ear, clipping the lobe. A patch of dirt splattered a few feet behind him when the bullet hit it. Clayman shrieked, slapping a hand over his ear.

“Gotta work on your aim, Elvis.” George chuckled.

Elvis glared at George. “Shut up.” Turning his focus back to Clayman, Elvis grabbed his victim’s hair again and wrenched his head back. “Again, did he hit you?”

“No!”

“How did he get your gun?”

Clayman groaned, blood dropping through his fingers. “He surprised me and took it.”

Cocking the gun, Elvis put it to Clayman’s head. “I’m not hearing the ‘how’ part. How did you, a guy with a gun who was hired to watch the hallway, end up getting disarmed and letting the targets get away—but no shots were fired and there ain’t a mark on you?”

“He—he sucker punched me. Hit me in the gut!”

“Nope.” Elvis shook his head and stepped back, firing a round into Clayman’s thigh. “Wrong answer.”

Clayman rolled over onto the muddy ground again, holding his bleeding leg and crying in agony.

“I think you’re smart enough to know, this night only gets worse for you, little bird dog. See, you let your partner get attacked, but he got a concussion, so I can see why they got his gun. The waiter routine was lame, but whatever. It could have worked if there’d been competent people involved, but it’s done now. The gunman in the hallway, though, that scene doesn’t add up to me. Did the targets pay you off?”

“No.”

“Did they threaten your family?”

“No. I don’t have a family.”

“Good thing. I’d hate to have to break the bad news to them that their stupid, screw up, cowardly son and-or father and-or brother died in a swamp after disgracing himself.” He raised the gun again.

“No!” Clayman raised his hands to stop the bullets, turning his face away. “No! No!”

The two blasts from Elvis’ gun lit up the darkness in the swamp, like flash photography at a wedding reception. Chunks of red and tufts of hair splattered onto the wet oak leaves. Clayman splashed face-first onto the muddy edge of the swamp.

“Toss him in deeper.” Elvis tucked the gun into his belt. “So the gators will find him.”

“There’s no gators eating in weather this cold,” George said.

“Just get him in the water, George,” Elvis growled. “Or they’ll find two bodies.”

George hustled over to the body and dragged it through the muck.

Janet pulled the tarp from the trunk of the car, balling it up and tossing it into the murky swamp. “What now?”

“Now,” Elvis glanced at his watch. “We go tell the big boss at Angelus that we tied up his second loose end from the Peachtree Plaza hotel, discuss a fee to eliminate this scientist lady and her friend, and then get rid of this Greyhound joker.”

George waded out of the swamp, slapping mud from his hands. “By now the scientist is long gone from Georgia. They’re either in Florida or Minnesota.”

“And The Greyhound will be coming after them soon, if he’s not already.” Janet turned to Elvis. “It’s awful cold in Minnesota this time of year.”

“Yeah, it is.” Elvis spun the key ring on his finger as he walked to the car. “So I guess we’ll start in Florida.”

CAMILLA'S ASSISTANT was cordial but firm. "I'm sorry to interrupt, but Ms. Madison requests your presence in the conference room."

"Okay." DeShear sat on the edge of the desk, rubbing his chin. "We'll be there in a second."

"She'd like you to report now." A smile tugged at the young lady's lips. "I believe her exact words were, 'If he resists, I'll have the federal marshals shoot him and drag him to my meeting.'"

"Okay, let's go." DeShear stood. "That crew cut guy would probably do it."

Most of the meeting went faster than DeShear expected. The Vice President was on and off in less than five minutes, asking to be kept up on the situation as things unfolded. The FBI and CIA asked very few questions, as did the federal marshal service. The Director of the IRS seemed to take it all in stride, as though this sort of thing happened every day.

The one person sweating bullets was Camilla—or she would have, if she were the type to sweat. Her poker face was par excellence, but keeping her hands under the table while she capped and uncapped her pen, that had been her "tell" going back more than two dozen years.

DeShear was glad he still knew her well enough to catch it. No doubt his pre-meeting antics had caused some of that stress, but it was now a lose-lose proposition to say anything about Lanaya's arsonist activities to anyone.

He studied his client.

Do I believe her?

He was still tossing around his options when the person next to him stood and pushed in her chair. Others did the same. The wall screen went dark, and people filed out of the conference room. Cammy stood and gathered her notes.

Only Lanaya and DeShear remained seated, each staring silently across the table at the other. Her gaze appeared hopeful. His, he knew, did not.

"Seems like you two have some unfinished business," Camilla said as she headed toward the door. "You can have the room for a few minutes, but we'll be moving quickly now. Be ready to get in one of our vehicles and head to the airport on my signal."

"Gotcha." DeShear kept his eyes on his client. "I'll be ready."

Lanaya thanked Camilla for the clothing and the hospitality, then turned back to DeShear. She said nothing. The door clicked closed behind Camilla.

DeShear cleared his throat. "I'm not sure what happened at my place . . ."

"You know," Lanaya said. "When I said I had a friend who looked similar enough to me that I could travel using her ID, you didn't question it. Is it not much more likely that the people who are chasing us—who were only chasing me until I came to Tampa—that they found a similar-looking woman to be seen lurking around your apartment?"

"Why not kill me when I was inside, asleep?"

"You weren't the target then," Lanaya said. "I was. But they could definitely send a message once you agreed to meet me. To scare you away from the case. As it happens, you're the type who doesn't back down in the face of a bully. They misjudged you in that. And me."

DeShear shook his head. "I don't know . . ."

"Maybe there were too many people around that night, and the arsonist feared being spotted. Or they couldn't get their lookalike to your apartment until the next morning. Does it matter? We still end up here, with the IRS getting ready to raid a genetics facility in Indonesia.” She lowered her voice. “And me, wondering what you’re going to do.”

He folded his arms. Across the lobby, Camilla exited her office, shoving an earpiece under her hair and crossing the lobby toward the conference room.

Lanaya leaned forward. “Hamilton—”

“I don’t think you’re the arson type.” He got up from his chair. “You’re too nervous. You’d have been a wreck if you burned my place and then went back with me. And even if I didn’t believe you, if the fire marshal and police can subjugate their concerns for the greater good, who am I to question it?”

Lanaya smiled. “Thank you, Hamilton.”

The conference room door banged open. “They will serve demand letters on Angelus Genetics tonight at 4:55 P. M.” Camilla raised her sleeve to her face, cupping a small microphone in her palm. “Ready all units, we are go. We need to be rolling in ten minutes. Reply with your affirmative and meet me downstairs in the parking lot. The transports are assembling now.”

• • • •

WHEN THE POLICE CRUISER turned south onto Bayshore Boulevard and the convoy of Chevy Suburbans followed, DeShear spoke up. “This isn’t the way to Tampa International Airport.”

“That’s because we are headed to the MacDill Air Force Base airport,” Camilla replied from the front passenger seat. “We’re going to hop on a couple of Cessna Citation X’s, and get our butts to the rally point before anyone even knows we’re gone.”

“We’re flying in Cessnas? Aren’t those a little . . .” He frowned, holding his hands close together.

“Don’t think single engine prop plane.” She held her hands far apart. “Think private jets of the rich and famous—and drug runners. Those babies can reach speeds close to Mach one, and have been refitted to carry twenty passengers.”

The Suburban swerved to pass a slower vehicle, the flashing blue lights of the squad car in front of them leading the way. Cars eased to the right lane as the convoy passed. DeShear grabbed the handle over the window to steady himself when the big vehicle bounced around. “What are the planes refitted from?”

Camilla waved a hand. “We just add seats. Drug dealers like to travel in comfort and style. We can confiscate any asset used in a drug deal, including a forty-million-dollar private jet.”

“And you get to keep them?”

“Yeah.” She adjusted her sunglasses. “The IRS gets to do all kinds of stuff nobody knows about. Flying from MacDill allows fewer eyeballs on us as we depart, too. Hold on.” She lifted the hand mic to her face. “All units, this is Bureau Chief Madison. We have approval to enter the base through the Bayshore Gate. Our escort will meet us there and take us to the airfield. We are cleared for immediate departure.”

“It’s over ten thousand miles to the Indonesia facility,” Lanaya said.

“On these planes, it’ll go by in about ten hours,” Camilla said. “Including pit stops in San Diego and Hawaii. The bulk of the agents and marshals are following in a KC-135, but we’ll have the recon team with us.”

DeShear nodded. “How many people are we bringing?”

“I can’t discuss operational details, but let’s say it’s enough to get the job done. Twice, probably. But it’s a coordinated raid. Everybody storms the Bastille at zero hour, eastern standard time.” Camilla rubbed her hands together. “Those executives will be having heart attacks when they start getting phone calls about IRS agents busting into every facility they own all over the world.” She reached into the black canvas bag at her feet and pulled out a holstered gun, placing it in her lap. “Man, I love my job.”

THE RELATIVELY SMALL size of the jet, as compared to normal airline jets, belied its prowess. The Cessna Citation X had a sleek exterior and a luxurious interior. Premium leather was in abundance, and the row of bench seats the IRS installed allowed for nearly double the number of passengers the plane originally held.

“I don’t know if it’s worth forty million dollars,” DeShear said as he moved to the rear of the cabin and took a seat. “But it’s impressing the heck out of me right now.”

Lanaya made her way down the aisle, sitting next to DeShear. She spoke loud enough for the other passengers to hear. “I hate to ask, but may I borrow a computer—and does anyone know if this plane gets wifi? It’s been a while since I checked in.”

At the front of the plane, Camilla greeted the FBI and IRS agents as they boarded, handing each an “Indonesian cheat sheet”—simple, common phrases and their translations. “We have secure wifi access,” she said to DeShear, “and I can lend you an IRS laptop. The next meal opportunity is North Island Naval Air Station in San Diego.”

The agents passed back some protein bars. DeShear held up one of the slender green packages. “You guys really come prepared.”

“It’s a ten-hour flight.” Camilla said. “It pays to not have people getting stir crazy in such a small space. Try to learn some Indonesian phrases.”

Sliding down in his seat, DeShear reviewed the cheat sheet. “Is napping allowed?”

“It’s encouraged.” She patted the last agent on the back as he entered the plane, then took a step onto the stairs at the door. “Everybody, strap in. We’ll be wheels up as soon as I go thank the General for the use of his runway.”

DeShear peered through the tiny window. A gray, military-style ATV approached, carrying one large passenger and one skinny driver, both in khaki green uniforms. Camilla shook hands with the large man. After they chatted for a moment, the ATV drove off as quickly as it had appeared. Her business finished, Camilla climbed back on board the little jet.

She clapped the pilot on the back. “Steggy, let’s rock and roll.”

“Roger that, boss.” He flipped a few switches, and the monstrous egg-shaped engine outside DeShear’s window commenced its high-pitched whine.

MISTY WHITE CLOUD SLIVERS zipped past DeShear’s window, barely visible at the jet’s cruising speed.

Good acoustics and awesome speed. Drug dealers know a good plane when they see one.

Lanaya typed on the laptop. A metal asset tag reading “Property of Internal Revenue Service” was glued near the left side of the keyboard.

“Paco,” Camilla called from the front of the plane. “Trade seats with me for a sec.”

The agent in front of DeShear got up and moved forward. Camilla took the seat and faced DeShear. “When we get to the facility, we’ll have anywhere from an eight-hour to twenty-hour advantage over anyone not already there. Executives in New York will hop on their corporate jet and hot foot it to wherever the action is, trying to keep us from finding their dirty little secrets. If what Lanaya says is true, we'll be in the cat bird seat. If she's wrong, or they moved the facility, we'll still be less than ten hours away from anywhere it could be in the world."

"It's there," Lanaya said. "I checked a few days ago. Even Angelus can't move a genetics lab that fast. Not with what they're doing."

"Okay." Camilla nodded. "When we land, you two will be front and center with me. We'll be moving fast, looking for the stuff that's out of place."

DeShear sat up. "Like what?"

"According to your client, the operation is too big to be easily hidden. They have a large group of people, and that means food, water, beds . . . showers and bathrooms, hopefully. The higher the head count, the harder it'll be to hide."

"My reports indicate they disguised it as a grade school," Lanaya said.

"Makes sense. Nobody would question that." Camilla leaned closer. "The real key is in the element of surprise. You start having IRS and FBI agents ask questions to a bunch of scared low-level employees, it's a gold mine."

"What if they request an attorney?" DeShear asked.

"Doesn't matter. Lying to an FBI or IRS agent is a federal crime, and anyone who tries to hold out for an attorney runs the risk of not immediately complying with the demand letter—also a crime. Bottom line, if they don't grant us full access to everything we want, somebody goes to jail."

"Even though we're not on U. S. soil?" Lanaya asked.

"Any American employees that lie or impede the audit will be tossed in the clink the second they set foot back in the good ol' USA. That would include the board of directors, the executives, and any key project managers."

"Wow."

"Don't mess with the IRS." Camilla smiled. "We have FBI agents with us that are experts in human trafficking, and DEA agents who'll dig up the money laundering links. You two will stick by my side and guide the investigators. Not everything will be on site, and Lanaya, you'll know what's missing. All I need is one on-site person in authority to open their mouth about the process, and we're all set."

"Pfft," Lanaya huffed. "Ask them."

Camilla cocked her head. "What?"

"Simply ask them," Lanaya said. "Most of these geneticists are former or future professors. They love to brag about their work, especially to people who don't seem to understand it. With a few of the right questions, they'll kick into condescending lecture mode and tell you all about the place."

DeShear nodded. "Then the right person can ask a few key follow up questions . . ."

"Which," Lanaya said, "having already engaged, they'll be remiss not to answer."

"Not answering will be considered an impediment to the audit." Camilla rubbed her hands together. "A fact that I'll be only too happy to explain. Answering will tip their hand."

"Wow," Lanaya said. "And while they're hesitating, trying to think of what they ought to do or not do, the noose will tighten. Answer, lose your job. Don't answer, go to jail. I like it."

"We'll have this whole place bagged and tagged before the board gets here," Camilla said. "Then we interview the executive committee, and anything that doesn't match what we've already been told, somebody's going to jail. These witnesses will flip to our side and rat on each other like you've never seen."

Lanaya looked out the window. "It's hard to believe we're so close to shutting this whole sordid mess down."

“We’re close. Real close.” Camilla stood, returning to the front of the plane. “Keep it together, though, because things never go exactly as planned.”

Lanaya sat back and re-opened the laptop, entering the three, twelve-digit passwords to access the black screen site.

“Back to work, huh?” DeShear said. “Good for you. I think I’m going to catch a little slee—”

Lanaya gasped.

“What is it?” DeShear sat up. “What’s wrong?”

Her face white, Lanaya turned the computer to him, displaying the only message.

Your life is in danger. The Greyhound is heading to Indonesia. DO NOT GO to the Angelus site there.

-Double Omega

THE TAIL LIGHTS OF Dr. Hauser's Rolls Royce shut off with the engine, and the heavy driver's door swung open. A foot, clad in an Italian leather loafer, stretched out to the concrete floor of the parking garage, followed by a dark, wooden cane. Eventually the other foot appeared, and the tiny, stoop-shouldered old man himself.

Dr. Hauser's knobby fingers gripped the car door until he was certain his feet would keep him upright, then he let go and shoved his hand into his suitcoat pocket. He took a half step—and abruptly stopped. In the spot next to the one marked “Reserved for the Chairman of the Board, Angelus Genetics,” the van door slid open. Two men and a woman stepped out.

The closest man to the doctor had a dark goatee. He glanced at the old man's cane. “Arthritis?”

Hauser narrowed his eyes, a white puff escaping his lips as he spoke. “Excuse me?”

“The cane,” the man said. “Is it because you have arthritis? Your knees give you problems in cold weather?”

“I'm old.” Dr. Hauser frowned, looking over his expensive but ill-fitting suit. “Everything gives me pain in cold weather. Warm weather, too.”

“I'm sorry to hear that. Maybe my news will take some of the sting out of this frosty December morning.”

“So you're not here to rob me, then.”

“No.”

“Good.” The doctor pulled his hand out of his suit coat pocket, holding a .38. “I'd have hated to put a bullet hole through the pocket of this jacket. It's a Brunello Cucinelli. Cashmere and silk.”

The man smiled. “You know, I wondered why a man who drives a Rolls Royce would walk around alone in a parking garage. People who drive a Rolls have things other people want to take from them.”

“I park here because it's my parking spot and I'm a creature of habit. This has been my parking spot at Angelus Genetics for over a decade. But I'm not stupid, either.” He slid the gun back into his pocket. “We live in dangerous times, and they keep getting more dangerous.” Pointing to his car, the doctor sighed. “Did you know the Silver Cloud comes with bulletproof glass and run-flat tires, as standard equipment? No world should need cars like that.”

He raised his chin and peered down his nose at his three companions, his words echoing off the concrete walls of the parking garage. “Well, then, I suppose you've come to talk business. You are recently from Atlanta, I take it?”

“We are, sir.” The man lowered his voice. “And we are here to report a successful set of conclusions regarding the unfortunate incidents that took place in Centennial Park.”

“They're dead, are they? Both of them?”

The man nodded.

“Good. Can't say I'm unhappy about that. I did the best I could to find competent people the first time, but one doesn't simply Google ‘assassins’ and get ten good killers from Angie's List.”

“Angie's Hit List, maybe.”

“So why are you here?” The doctor's voice was gravelly and low, almost a mumble. “I thought payment had been arranged through my attorney.”

“Mr. Jennings saw to it that me and my associates were paid very well. We feel our relationship has advanced to a point where you’d want to retain our services for some additional challenges the company seems to be facing at the moment.”

“The IRS?” The doctor growled, hoisting his cane at his car. “That’s where I’ve just come from, meeting with the lawyers about the Infernal Revenue Service. They slapped a demand letter on us and now I have to catch a plane to keep their big noses out of our business in Indonesia. Still, not a good idea to start shooting government types. There are a lot of them, and some carry big rifles and drive tanks.”

“Sir, we have come to believe the geneticist and her friend are on the way to Indonesia.”

“And how,” the doctor cocked his head, “did you come to believe that?”

“We get paid well for our services, and in turn we pay our sources well. Those government types with the big guns? Notoriously underpaid, as are cops and IRS agents. We simply network enough to let people know we can assist them with their financial burdens, and information magically flows to us.” He looked around the garage. “It’s amazing what a teller at a police or military credit union can tell you about folks with top secret clearances who are struggling to make ends meet.”

The doctor nodded. “I’m impressed with your candor—and it takes a lot to impress me. Go on.”

“We’ve also recently learned that a small group of people have been quietly making key employees of Angelus and its subsidiaries disappear. With you and the other board members all rushing to get together to protect your Indonesian asset—the largest asset on the Angelus balance sheet—I think it’s very unlikely these assassins would waste such an opportunity.”

“I don’t like the idea of guns, mister . . .”

“Presley. But please—call me Elvis. And these are my associates, Janet Jackson and George Michael.”

“Hmm. As I say, I don’t care for guns—unless they’re mine, and they’re pointing at people who’d like to kill me. Then I like guns a great deal. In this case, I’d like to place an order for as many guns—and people to use them—as are necessary to ensure I return safely from my overseas business trip, and to subdue any particular element that dislikes the way I run Angelus Genetics. Am I talking to the right party, Mr. Presley?”

Elvis grinned. “You are, sir.”

“Good. And just so we are absolutely crystal clear, you need to be completely successful in this venture, or the first task of your replacement will be making sure you and your colleagues disappear.”

“I’d hoped our work cleaning up the mess in Atlanta would be proof enough.”

“Never hurts to remind the service provider what’s at stake.” The doctor waved a hand, shuffling toward the garage exit. Elvis followed.

“Atlanta was petty cash,” Dr. Hauser said. “If they’re coming for me in Bali, I want a small army to meet them. See Jennings’ people for the money, like last time, and get enough hitters so you can eliminate this threat without breaking a sweat. I want no mistakes this time.”

“Not a problem. Can we expect any help from the Indonesian army?”

“For what I’m paying their prime minister, I certainly hope so. But let’s face it, they’re not exactly the U. S. Marines, are they? Or should I say former Marines?” He glanced at Elvis’ companions. “I’ll arrange for some speedy jets to get you and your first team where you need to go. Obviously, you can’t all fly to Bali with us on our plane, but I’ll accommodate two of you. The others will travel on jets that are just as good and just as fast. How soon can you be ready?”

“I took the liberty of making some arrangements in anticipation of this meeting going well. My people can board a plane within the hour, with a not-so-small army to follow by this time tomorrow morning.”

“We might not have that long. And what about this Greyhound character? Think he’s already in the air?”

Elvis’ jaw dropped.

“You’re not the only one with contacts, Mr. Presley. Nor are you, Miss Jackson and Mr. Michael. This is serious business, and I do my homework. You go airborne when my plane does, understood?” The old man turned and leaned close to Elvis, his stale coffee breath permeating Presley’s nose. “This situation ends only when a few bullets come to a stop in the back of The Greyhound’s skull. And anyone who worked with him—or even considered working with him—needs to die, too. Slit the throats of their sleeping children and then burn the house down. I want my message delivered in the absolute harshest terms possible, so no one ever tries anything like this again.”

Presley stood, staring at the tiny man, not speaking.

“Too rich for your blood, Elvis?” The doctor wiped a drop of spit from the corner of his mouth.

“No. Just . . . not what I was expecting, sir.”

“Good.” Dr. Hauser’s shaking hand let go. He walked away, his cane pounding the garage floor with each step. “Then The Greyhound won’t expect it, either.”

• • • •

“MY HEAD WON’T STOP pounding.” The Greyhound rolled over and squeezed his eyes shut, pulling a pillow over his eyes to block the light. “What did you give me?”

“Steroids,” Maya said, crossing the hotel suite and coming to the bed. “Among other things. The new mix seems to help the others for extended periods, but it’s a daily routine.”

She took his pulse and temperature. Both were normal for a change.

“Steroids, huh? Well, if that’s what it takes.” He sat up, pushing the sheets aside. “I have to tell you, aside from the headache, I feel great. Like I finally have energy again.”

Maya watched him stretch. “It’s an experimental mix, and it’s expensive, even to a big-time hedge fund manager like you.”

“Former hedge fund manager. Now I do this. How much?”

“Five thousand a dose, and you need several doses a day, but the results are encouraging.”

He stood and walked, flexing the muscles of his half-naked torso. “It’s worth it. If you can get me a version that doesn’t come with the skull splitter, I’ll take a month’s worth.”

Maya picked up an oxygen sensor and blood pressure monitor, carrying them to him. “Sit down so I can get your vitals. I said the drug is new. It doesn’t have a version without a headache side effect yet.”

He sat in the chair by the desk, holding his arm out to her. “I’ll still take a month’s worth.” He drew a deep breath as she wrapped the blood pressure cuff around his arm. “Where’s Dominique? I have some traveling to do.”

“She split for work. Hold still.”

He frowned. “I told her to quit. She knows I have enough money to take care of whatever she needs.”

“She needs to stay connected. Her sources bring in half of our information, so let her.”

“Yeah, yeah.” He looked around the room. “What about Britt? Where’s he?”

“Getting breakfast. We weren’t sure when you’d wake up, and we were hungry.”

The Greyhound stared at her. “How long have I been out?”

She waited until the blood pressure cup had deflated before she replied. “Long enough to make us think you might not wake up again.”

“That’s amazing. I haven’t slept more than three hours at a time in months.” He stood again, pacing around the room like a panther. “I really feel strong. This mix may be the one.”

“You say that every time. It has other side effects, like irritability, but I’m not sure we’d notice that one. Plus the usual anger flashes and rage that come with steroids.” She scribbled some notes on a pad. “But with proper dosages, we can keep you running for a week at a time at this stage, maybe more. That’s what we’re seeing in the tests.”

“A week? Why didn’t you tell me about this sooner?”

“You haven’t been around, and it’s a trial drug. I can’t just grab a jug of it and board a plane. I’ve been stealing a dose here and there on the side and having a private lab make more for me in secret. The bill for that has been big. Even you’ll think so.”

He went to the closet and grabbed a suitcase, tossing it on the bed and opening it. “Doesn’t matter. If we own the patent rights, we’ll make it back.” Returning to the closet, he clutched an armful of shirts and pants against his chest, carried them to the suitcase, and dropped them in. “And money won’t matter to me if I die from not having your special cocktails. So get me a month’s worth. I have a plane to catch.”

• • • •

THE CESSNA BOUNCED from turbulence. DeShear grabbed the headrest of the seat in front of him to stabilize himself from the jolts. “I have to admit, I thought I’d like Hawaii more. But the airport looked great out the window. I almost saw a palm tree, I think. Very . . .” He glanced at the cheat sheet. “Indah.”

From her seat at the front of the plane, Cammy took a bite of a donut and flipped him off.

“Don’t make jokes.” Lanaya opened the laptop again. “The black screen site has gone dark, and that message is scary to me.”

“I know,” DeShear said. “I’m sorry. Look, you said Double Omega died, so this could be a hoax of some sort—”

“It’d be the first in the history of the site.”

“Okay, well, whoever The Greyhound is, he or she will be running into a lot of armed FBI agents if they try anything.”

She shook her head. “Nobody can access the site unless they know the codes, and those are extremely secure. Greyhound may be a code name for the group behind the murders of the Angelus employees.”

“But what I was getting at is, if your friend is dead, somebody’s posing as her. If it’s not a hoax, it’s either intended to scare you out of coming, or it’s a warning to be very careful if we come. So . . . who has access to the site?”

She leaned back in the seat and stared at the plane ceiling. “At our peak, there were a few dozen users. We asked questions before admitting anyone, and security held up tight. Up until a few months ago, I felt very good about the site.”

“What happened a few months ago?”

“Get ready,” Camilla said. “Seatbelts on. We’re going up again for the next leg. We land in Bali in about two hours.”

Lanaya knitted her hands. “Hamilton, if it’s been breached, then who knows what information has been compromised?”

“Okay, calm down.” He placed a hand over hers. They were trembling. “Let’s go over the facts. It doesn’t matter if The Greyhound is headed for Indonesia. We wanted him there. That helps us. Next, whoever he brings, we never expected him to come alone—and Cammy has a ton of heavily armed people on our side to guard us.”

Lanaya nodded. “I suppose that’s true.”

“So somebody was trying to help you with that message. That’s a good thing. It’s not the dead girl posting messages from beyond the grave, so the question is, who is it really? But as long as we’re in the hands of these fine folks with all the weaponry . . .” He pointed at the others on the plane. “I think we’ll be okay.”

“My brain knows all that, but my heart won’t listen.” She sighed. “It keeps worrying and beating fast. I think the pounding in my chest is so loud, it’s keeping everyone on the plane awake.”

DeShear smiled. “Yeah, well, if you weren’t worried, you wouldn’t be human. Just . . . close your eyes and focus hard on something else. Like your kids. Getting them ready for bed on a school night, making them brush their teeth, fighting with them for five more minutes of TV. Focus on that. See if you accidentally fall asleep. We have a big day ahead of us.”

“My youngest always does that.” She curled up in the seat, resting her head in the leather cushion and facing him. “Every night, it’s ‘Five more minutes, Mom? Pleeeeease?’”

“Typical kid.” DeShear shook his head, chuckling.

“I miss them, Hamilton.”

He put his arm over her shoulder and patted her on the back. “You’ll see them soon, don’t worry.”

“Promise?” she whispered, closing her eyes.

“Promise.”

SHE STARED AT THE PICTURE. It hadn't faded. Neither had the memories.

Sitting in her car, the woman tapped a cigarette out of the teal-colored pack and placed it between her lips. Her trembling fingers dug through her purse and found the butane lighter. With a flick, the little flame appeared. She held it to the tip of the cigarette and inhaled, heat and bitter smoke flowing over her tongue and down her throat, filling the insides of her lungs.

She still wasn't used to it. Never would be, probably.

Smoking can kill you. She'd heard that how many times over the years? She'd said it, too. Didn't matter. It was a habit of necessity, and had been for quite some time. One does what one must.

She breathed out, the smoke cascading across the steering wheel of the Mercedes and into the windshield, rolling slowly outward over the dash board.

Her father used to lower the driver's window a little when he smoked. That was when she was a child, and doctors in TV ads actually recommended certain brands of cigarettes over others. "More doctors smoke Camels than any other cigarette," the black and white ads proudly boasted. Men in white jackets sat at desks puffing away; elegant ladies wearing strapless gowns and pearls blew streams of white past their lipstick, then smiled at the camera.

Dad always cracked his window so the cigarette fumes would escape as he drove. The smoke obeyed, too, curling upwards from the glowing tip of the cigarette and dancing in the sunlight before getting sucked out near the side view mirror. But the smell lingered anyway, and the children all got plenty of second-hand smoke during the long drives. When they jumped into the pool at the Holiday Inn that night, their young faces would turn up and frown as the water unlocked the smoke smell from their hair and ran it down their cheeks.

She wore her hair down to her butt back then, so hers smelled the most. But they were kids. They didn't know any better. Children don't know about the dangers of the world, and they aren't supposed to.

Children.

She stared at the picture. "Children are a precious gift—of constant worry," a friend had joked a few weeks after her oldest was born. "Welcome to parenthood."

Sleepless nights filled with feedings, or diaper interruptions in the middle of dinner, those were nothing compared to worrying if the baby's reflux was preventing her medicines from fully being digested, or waking up every hour to see if her fever had subsided. After the divorce—she married too young, to her high school sweetheart—it was just the two of them, a young mother and her daughter, and the bond between them grew, but the concerns multiplied. Worrying if she was growing fast enough, learning to ice skate as well as the other kids in her class, worrying about good grades and making friends at school and talking to boys. When life dealt her a good turn and she was able to go back to school, she still worried about her baby. About teaching her to drive and calling before curfew and applying to colleges and getting a good job out of school.

A gift of constant worry? It wasn't so. The worry ends.

She glanced at the clock on the dashboard. A few more minutes.

She took another puff, the tip of the cigarette glowing. Closing her eyes, she eased her head into the soft leather seat and blew the smoke out, letting it fill the car.

The face from the picture smiled in her mind, growing from toddler to adult in the blink of an eye, but she used to play and laugh with her two young brothers. The three children were close, as siblings should be. Loving.

The picture was the last one taken with all three together. Her babies. She couldn't bear to look at the more recent pictures that displayed only two of her children. That wasn't fair, she knew, but the pain was still too much. Too intense. Too raw. Pain like that never goes away. A parent learns to live with it, but it's always there, raising its volume occasionally to stab at the heart and break it all over again.

The other two said they understood, and they did. They shared the loss. But they didn't really. Not as fully as she did. They couldn't, at their age.

Another look at the clock. How much time should she let pass? She allowed herself fifteen minutes for smoke breaks, at mid-morning, to establish the pattern. But today she sat in the car past the allotted time. The cold weather seemed too refreshing to pass on, so she stubbed out her cigarette and cracked the window, allowing the icy breeze to float through the car.

She hated smoking. But habits are habits.

As she slid the picture back into her wallet, the voice of Dr. Hauser came to her. She hadn't noticed him pull in; normally Marcus would have been there hours ago. In the corner of the garage, he and another man spoke, with a man and a woman nearby, watching.

Their conversation was quiet from that distance, but the words carried through the concrete garage. They were too far away to hear everything, but she could hear enough.

All she saw was the face of her daughter, the oldest, smiling from the photo. The last photo she had of her family together.

She slid down in her seat and listened as the men spoke.

Killing a child is a terrible thing. Threatening to kill the other two surviving children will get most parents to agree to anything.

For a while.

Then the hands of fate work their magic. Fighters gotta fight, and she was a fighter. If she hadn't been one before, she became a fighter after her daughter's murder.

The death of a child will do that, too. Especially when you got the kid a job at your company.

The conversation ended. The old man limped across the parking garage, pounding the concrete with his cane. The noise echoed through the cold, still morning like shots being fired at a gun range.

When he was gone, she sat for a while, staring at the clock and wondering how long to wait before she entered the Angelus Genetics headquarters building. Five minutes more, maybe ten. Or possibly she'd run an errand to pretend she hadn't been sitting in the parking lot at all.

Ten minutes might not even be enough, but Dr. Marcus Hauser was a very important, very busy man. He wouldn't be sitting in the lobby watching for her, and she wouldn't mention where she'd taken her break. No one would ask, but if they did, maybe she could say she walked around outside for a few minutes. She'd done that before on cold days. No one would question it.

Ten minutes, then, and a short walk after. That should do it.

It took an eternity for the ten minutes to pass, but when they did, she got out of her car and exited the far side of the garage, away from the spot with the sign that said "Reserved for the Chairman of the Board, Angelus Genetics."

She circled around to approach the front doors from the other side, as if she'd been walking. Simple and effective.

The wind picked up, tossing her hair, her heels clicking and clacking over the hard sidewalk. Drawing a deep breath, she approached the big glass doors and checked her reflection. Normal, and yet nothing of the sort. Not anymore. Not for a long time now—Hauser had seen to that. But she was functional, performing her job as before to all eyes who cared to watch, and that's what mattered.

Pretending to be a smoker so she could escape the corporate walls and covertly pass information along to others about the illegal side of Angelus Genetics, that was simply a habit created of necessity, and had been for quite some time.

One does what one must.

She pulled the heavy door open and stepped inside, smiling at the receptionist. The young man in the headset smiled back, then punched a button on the phone console and waved at her.

“You have a call on line three, Dr. Carrera.”

THE JET HAD BARELY touched down at the Ngurah Rai airport before the agents were up and moving. The man seated in front of DeShear stood and stretched. “Time to put on our party dresses for the big dance.”

The door opened and the humidity of the island swept into the plane, like entering a bathroom during someone else’s shower. A United States Marine Lieutenant in khaki green camo gear boarded the jet. He matched the image on his phone to the woman standing in front of him. “Welcome to Bali, Bureau Chief Madison. I don’t know how much local interaction you and your people will have, but the fine people of Indonesia primarily speak Indonesian—although many speak decent English. Be advised, fair skin and American accents will stick out. Enjoy your lunch, and good luck.”

The Lieutenant left the plane, followed by the agents. DeShear and Lanaya exited last, with Camilla.

“You two stay with the team.” Camilla put on her sunglasses. “The other agents will be landing in a moment. I need to rendezvous with a representative of the Indonesian government.”

DeShear squinted in the bright light, holding a hand up to shield his eyes. On the shadeless airfield, the sun was hotter than a summer swamp. “You meeting anybody I’d have heard of?”

Camilla scrolled through pages of maps on her phone. “Dina Wulan, special assistant to the prime minister.”

“Nope. Never heard of him.”

“Her.”

A Mercedes limo approached, flying the red and white flag of Indonesia from the side of its hood. A Marine waved to Camilla as he led several people toward the vehicle.

“Looks like this might be her now,” Camilla said. “I’ll see you two back at the hangar.”

DeShear followed the agents from his plane across the scorching tarmac to the Delta hangar as another Cessna jet pulled up. A small jet landed on the runway behind them.

“Hamilton,” Lanaya hurried her pace to stay next to him, looking around the airfield. “Are you the least bit nervous?”

“I’m definitely a little out of my element.” He spoke loudly, to be heard over the whine of the jet engines. “But that’s not unusual in my line of work. How are you holding up?”

“Oh, very nervous.” She rubbed her arms like she was chilly. “Death threats tend to do that to me.”

He stopped and put a hand on her shoulder. “We’ll be okay while we’re with these guys.” He pointed to the group of agents assembling in the hangar. “Focus on what Camilla told us. When we get to the lab, it’ll be our job to notice what’s out of place.”

“She said that was my job.”

“I get to help you.” He smiled, patting her shoulder. “We’re a team.”

The hangar was hot and stuffy, but it offered a way to get out of the blazing sun. DeShear wiped his brow, glancing around. Dust blew in from every hole and crack in the aging airplane garage. Across the runways, the trees of the thick jungle swayed in the breeze.

Folding tables and chairs had been set up to allow the team members to eat. DeShear approached a table where a Marine laid out small bags. “Are these any good?”

“Best chow in the world, sir.”

“Really?”

“Yes sir. Much better than dog chow or cat chow—but it’s still chow.”

“People chow, huh? Great.” He took two of the rectangular bags from the young man. The next table offered unchilled bottles of water. He grabbed two and took a seat next to Lanaya, handing her a bottle and an MRE. “Lunch is served.”

A woman in camouflage approached them. “Ms. Kim?”

“Yes,” Lanaya said.

“These are for you.” She handed Lanaya an large manila envelope. “From Bureau Chief Madison.”

“Thank you.” Lanaya opened the envelope and pulled out a set of blueprints. “It’s the plans for the Angelus Genetics lab here, dated from before they left Arizona. I bet they didn’t stick to these.”

“Maybe not,” DeShear said. “But we can get some current satellite images and see what’s changed. Let’s have a look at your laptop.”

A Marine captain in green fatigues called out from the front of the hangar. “Listen up. The buses for Bureau Chief Madison and her teams will report in five. Be ready to move.”

DeShear waved at him. “Captain, we need wifi.”

“Hot spot in the rear office, sir. But we still leave in five.”

“Got it.” DeShear stood, turning to Lanaya. “Let’s see if we can get an overview image of the facility and take screen shots to review it on the bus. Maybe load it into my phone if we get a chance, too.”

The IRS agents remained seated, studying spreadsheets on their laptops, while a crowd of FBI people gathered near the hangar exit.

“Come on.” Lanaya stood. “We’d better hurry up and find that hot spot.”

• • • •

THE MERCEDES STRETCH limo cruised around the perimeter of the airport. Inside, a small woman in a dark gray business suit extended her hand to Camilla. “Ms. Madison. It is very nice to meet you. I trust our accommodations have been satisfactory so far.”

“Yes, madam assistant director.” Camilla shook hands and settled back into her seat. “The IRS is very grateful for the cooperation of your government, and the Vice President sends his regards.”

“Ah, yes.” The assistant nodded. “A good golfer, your Vice President. It must have been very difficult to lose to the Prime Minister, without appearing to do so, the last time they played.”

“Well,” Camilla said. “Our Vice President was once a diplomat, ma’am.”

“I see.” She folded her petite hands in her lap. “Can you tell me what your plans are for your stay? I understand you brought many people with guns. The country of Indonesia does not want trouble with our friend the United States.”

“Of course not. We are only here to conduct an audit.”

“Does an audit require so many people and weapons? Our friends to the north are nervous about so many jets landing. It almost appears to be an advance team before an invasion.”

Camilla took a deep breath. “Those concerns are understandable. In this case, we need to move fast, but we fear the subject of the audit, a U. S. company, may object to our presence and offer some resistance. We intend to make an impression with a show of strength to them, nothing more.” She swallowed hard. “I’m sorry, I was told your government was informed of all this.”

“Sometimes things have a way of changing. In my position, it’s best to keep informed. You are planning quite a show, as you say.”

The car stopped. The uniformed driver got out and opened Camilla's door.

"I will relay your words to our Prime Minister," the assistant said. "Do your best to see that the show of strength remains a show only. Indonesia does not want a war."

AS HIS ESCORT VEHICLE bounced its way along the road to the genetics lab, Dr. Hauser's phone rang. He checked the screen but didn't answer, scowling at the driver instead. "Can you find any more potholes to hit? Don't you people know how to pave a road?"

Wiping his brow with a handkerchief, Dr. Hauser pressed a button on the phone and held it to his ear. "Dina, how are you?"

"Welcome again to Indonesia, my friend. All of Bali welcomes you. Was your flight enjoyable?"

"I'm afraid not. These old bones don't travel as well as they used to."

"A pity," Dina said. "Perhaps a visit to one of our many waterfalls will renew you, Doctor. Some are said to contain the powers of magical healing. Remember, the one in Nungnung is not far from your facility."

"You tell me every time I come. The pictures look beautiful—a giant river that takes a long, steep drop into a vast pool, surrounded by lush tropical foliage. Very pretty."

"And magical. People write their problem on a piece of wood from the pala tree and throw it in the river, because whatever goes over the falls is never seen again."

"But it's still located in the hills at the end of a long footpath, right?" He stared at his cane. "And ever since I've taken to needing a walking stick, places like that will remain a longer jaunt than I care for. Maybe you can arrange a tour of it for one of my next trips. We can ride in one of those military helicopters my company convinced Uncle Sam to give you."

"Excellent suggestion, Doctor."

A low-hanging palm tree branch slapped the side of the car as it passed. "I understand you've had some other American visitors arrive today, Dina. What of our friends?"

"A Miss Madison of the IRS has landed. She brings many agents from FBI and ATF. Many small jets, with big jets coming. We are, of course, concerned. We value our relationship with all of our friends—the American government, and of course our generous business friends who bring jobs to this country."

Hauser frowned, raising his voice. "The IRS is trying to embarrass me and my executives to our shareholders. Well, I have a small army arriving at ten A. M. tomorrow." He jabbed the car seat with his index finger. "Then we'll see this Miss Madison and her little band of bookworms tuck their tails between their legs and run home."

"Please choose your pejoratives carefully, Doctor. Words such as 'army' are very distressing for the people I report to. Indonesia does not want a war."

"Figure of speech." The doctor leaned back, tugging his linen guayabera shirt to send puffs of air across his chest. "I simply mean I have a business to run, and I don't need distractions like this. I'm sure your boss understands."

"My superior reads words in American newspapers like the New York Times, that tell the world Indonesia is still a semi-dictatorship, and that your company is engaged in illegal activities here. Of course, we both know neither of these things are true, and that your IRS will not find anything at your facility to the contrary."

"You have my word. News reports are merely a pack of lies and gossip, written by morons hoping to get a Pulitzer prize. Whoever can embarrass the biggest fish, wins. We should do it like you, with more government control of the press. Then nothing would get out that we don't want out."

“Of course, Indonesia has a free press now, Doctor.”

“Uh huh. But either way, tomorrow morning, my ar—my set of auditors—will land. And shortly after that, a speedy resolution of these unpleasanties will occur.”

“Do you expect Miss Madison’s people to wait? We were told—”

“I don’t care what they do.” Hauser dabbed his upper lip with the handkerchief. “I’ll stall them with presentations about our operation and its vast importance to the world of science, but a bunch of number crunchers won’t have the technical expertise to begin to understand the intricacies of the genetic selection process. Following the presentation is a fancy reception and dinner at the Viceroy. I want to appear friendly and cooperative, but perhaps you could arrange for the power at their hotel to go out, so there’s no air conditioning and they can’t sleep. Cranky auditors tend to want to go home quickly.” He chuckled. “But either way, their report will end up saying whatever we want.”

“And if it doesn’t?”

“Oh, we have plenty of friends in Washington, as we do here. We can get an IRS report slow-walked to the point that a snail would look speedy by comparison. Maybe even bog it down until a new administration gets elected. One that’s more open-minded about our operations.”

“As always, you have thought of everything, Dr. Hauser.”

“Glad I could offer you and the people of Indonesia a lesson in strategic planning, Dina. Feel free to come to the dinner tonight. It should be quite elaborate by third world dictatorship standards.”

“I’m afraid I’ll be working late tonight, sir. Our friends to the north and elsewhere have expressed concerns about all of this. Indonesia does not want a war.”

The car came to a stop in front of a set of tall, iron gates. Men with machine guns blocked the entrance. Behind them, a series of huge warehouses spanned over acres of cleared jungle.

“I understand. Go hold their hands. Tell them, sometimes you simply have to do what needs to be done—and often the best choice is clear, but unpleasant.”

An attendant looked at the driver’s credentials, and the gates opened.

“And don’t worry, I’ll take care of things at my lab.”

• • • •

THE BLUEPRINTS WERE unfolded over a filing cabinet in the hangar’s small office. DeShear stared at the pages, rubbing his chin. “On paper, the genetics facility doesn’t look as big as I thought. I’m not sure what I expected, but not this. A building or two? Seems kinda small.”

From her seat at a nearby desk, Lanaya glanced up from her computer. “I didn’t think they’d match, but I didn’t expect them to be this different, either.” She pointed to the overhead images on her screen. “I count twenty buildings, all over a hundred feet long. That’s a far bigger campus than any research facility I’ve ever seen.”

“How big was the one in Arizona?”

“Two buildings that size, with an annex. A lot like the blueprints.”

“So they used the same format to get a toe in the door, and then expanded.” He shrugged. “I guess that makes sense. The labor’s cheaper here.”

“Hamilton, with that many buildings, they could house every genetics lab in the world. What we want is in those buildings, I’m certain of it. But they’re so big, and there’s so many . . . And I’m sure there’s security.”

A Marine opened the office door. “Time to go, folks. Your ride has arrived.”

“Thanks, private.” He nodded to Lanaya. “Grab a screen shot.”

She frowned and tapped the keyboard. "I'm not sure what good it'll do. Who knows how often the Indonesian government allows these satellite images to be updated."

"It's a start. We'll learn a lot more once we're able to get on site and start looking around. 'Improvise, adapt and overcome,' right, private?"

The young Marine smiled. "Oohrah, sir."

• • • •

THE ESCORT VEHICLE carrying Dominique Carerra and some other Angelus board members pulled up to the Viceroy hotel. Its expansive, elegant white façade and columns were a sharp contrast to the jungle nearby.

A uniformed attendant opened her door. "Welcome to the Viceroy Bali, Miss Carerra."

"It's Doctor Carerra," she said, sliding out of the car.

"How clumsy of me. My apologies, madam." The man bowed and greeted the other board members by name. "Bali welcomes you all. Please, follow me. Your suites have been prepared, and our staff will attend to your baggage."

A red helicopter approached, with an "Air Bali" logo painted on its side. It swooped in and landed on the helicopter pad across the drive. The attendant waved to the pilot before returning his attention to his guests. "This way, please."

The lobby of the grand hotel was lavish. Its dark bamboo ceiling stretched upwards three stories in an elegant cone shape, towering over the white marble floor below. Each suite was equally impressive. The massive beds looked out onto stone balconies and the lush landscape beyond.

A young bellman followed Dr. Carerra into her suite, her suitcase riding on his shiny brass cart. "Shall I unpack for you, madam?"

"Thank you, no. I can manage." She inspected the room. It had one phone on the nightstand, and a large stone ashtray on the coffee table. "But I'd like a pack of cigarettes. Salem lights, if you can find them."

"That will be no problem, madam."

"And then I'd like to walk the grounds and stretch my legs. Can you recommend a running trail?"

"I shall have the concierge call your room, if it pleases madam." The boy said. "She will know the best path to recommend."

"Very good." She tucked a bill into his hand. "Thank you."

"Thank you, madam." He bowed, his eyes widening upon seeing the denomination of the bill. "I am Rafi, and I am assigned to this floor. If you need anything, please do not hesitate to call."

"Thank you, Rafi." She strolled to the balcony. "I shall need some things from time to time during my stay. And please have the concierge call me about a trail."

The young man bowed again, backing toward the door. "Right away, madam."

When the door closed behind him, she opened her laptop and scanned the Viceroy's many scenic hiking paths, to locate the one that ran closest to the nearby Kamandalu Ubud hotel. She made a mental note, shut the computer down, and powered off her cell phone. Crossing to the bed, she reached behind the nightstand and unplugged the room phone.

She grabbed a pair of sneakers and some running clothes from her bag and entered the marble bathroom to change.

• • • •

"DR. CARERRA!" A BOARD member waved at her from the bar. "Will you join us for a drink before we head over to the facility?"

A rotund man passed her in the lobby, answering for her. “Dressed like that, I’m guessing the answer is no, Patel. But Dominique, isn’t this weather too hot for a run?”

Rafi appeared, carrying a teal-green pack of cigarettes in a clear plastic bag marked Viceroy Bali. “Madam, as you requested.”

“Thank you.” She took the cigarettes and slipped them into the hip pocket of her sweat pants. “And thank you, gentlemen, but I’m going to try to exercise my way out of jet lag. A nice, long trail through the hills sounds good.”

Patel strolled into the lobby from the bar, smiling. “That’s a strange combination, Doctor Carerra. Cigarettes and running?”

“A good habit to cover a bad one.” She patted the enormous stomach of the man next to her. “We all have our vices, don’t we Dr. Bruner?”

The men chuckled.

“Yes,” Patel said. “I was about to treat myself to some carrot juice in the bar. I take your point, Doctor.”

“Enjoy your run, Dominique.” Bruner waved a hand, ambling toward the bar. “See you at dinner.”

The bellman walked to the bell stand.

“Rafi,” Dr. Carerra said.

The boy whipped around, snapping to attention. “Yes, madam?”

“The concierge never called me.” She walked toward the front door. “Let’s see about a running trail.”

DESHEAR'S PHONE VIBRATED in his pocket. As the bus rumbled along the broken asphalt, he slid it out and checked the screen.

Text message.

Pressing the icon, the app opened. The sender information said Name Unknown, with no number displaying, but their message was short and clear.

Check black screen site.

He sat back, raising his eyebrows. Not a lot of people knew about the site, and even fewer knew he had knowledge of it. Could be a trap.

Next to him, Lanaya sat with her hands in her lap, one massaging the other, a distant look on her face. The last message hadn't been a threat, so maybe this one wasn't.

He chewed his lip and looked at the phone screen again. The message was gone.

Bolting forward, he clicked the app again. There were no messages.

The jungle rolled past as the bus rocked back and forth, sending dust clouds out in its wake. DeShear had never seen a message disappear that way. Not a regular text message. Not without manually deleting it himself.

Its quick disappearance meant whoever sent it didn't want anyone else to see it. How they made it happen, he didn't know.

It's a move of fear, though. Not strength.

He nodded to himself. "Lanaya, can you get a signal here? For your computer?"

She lifted her eyes, blinking as if to remove a fog. "What?"

"Can you access your black screen site right now?"

"No, I don't think so." She glanced at the computer. "I thought they said there'd be no access on the bus."

Swaying and jolting with every pothole, he faced the front of the bus, holding the seat in front of him as he stood. "Cammy. Any way to get wifi out here?"

Camilla turned in her seat and looked at him over her shoulder. "I can let you access my hot spot, but out here it'll be slow. They might have wifi at the lab."

He went down the aisle, holding the seat tops with each bumpy step. When he reached Camilla, he brought his face close to her ear. "I'm not sure we can wait until we get to the lab."

"What have you got?"

"Not sure yet. Can you link us in?"

Camilla rose and followed him to the rear of the bus. Opening her phone, she found the laptop signal and watched for it to connect. "All set. It's a weak signal, but it's there."

DeShear faced Lanaya. "Check your black screen site."

"Why?"

"Just check it."

She tapped on the keyboard, bringing up a series of password pages. Each required a code before allowing the user to move on to the next. When she finished, a new window opened and a tiny message icon appeared on the screen. Next to it was a gray box with a blinking cursor, and next to that were three white boxes. The rest of the screen was black.

“Man, you’re making me feel old.” He shook his head. “I wouldn’t know what to do on a website like this.”

“That’s entirely the point,” Lanaya looked up from the screen. “It’s only to be accessed by people who know how. For example, normally, you’d type a password or command where the waiting prompt is, right?”

“Sure,” DeShear said.

“If you do, it’ll lock you out, shut down the site for a few hours, and permanently ban this computer’s IP address. The ban keeps hackers from autosearching web addresses. Nobody can afford a sextillion new IP addresses merely to see what’s happening on this little site.” She pointed to the three white boxes. That tells me my hidden password dock is in the third quadrant.”

She slid her finger over the mouse pad until the cursor arrow was in the lower left corner of the screen. It flashed a top hat like the guy in monopoly wore, then disappeared.

“I now have five seconds to enter a code.”

Her hands hovered over the keyboard.

“Uh.” DeShear shifted in his seat. “You’d better hurry.”

She didn’t move, her face blank.

“Lanaya . . .” He leaned forward.

She dropped her fingers onto the keys and typed rapidly. None of the letters or numbers were visible. When she finished, a blue window opened.

“You don’t really have five seconds. You can’t start typing before three seconds have elapsed.”

“Good grief,” DeShear said. “This site’s gonna give me a heart attack and I’m not even using it.”

“That’s also the point. It has many hidden features to keep secrets private. The message won’t appear for thirty seconds. That’s so anyone who accessed this screen would think there was nothing there, or they’d hit a glitch. If they type any key stroke in that time, it locks them out. By shutting the site, it lets every valid user know a breach was attempted. Traffic usually slows down for a day or two after that. But . . .” She shrugged. “There are so many people quitting the site lately, it doesn’t matter. They’re so paranoid it’s been accessed by Angelus, it’s nearly a ghost town, and fewer users means those that remain have a greater chance of being spotted. I’ll probably have to quit soon.” She set her hands in her lap. “Here’s the message.”

Kamandalu Ubud hotel, room 502

- Double Omega

Camilla looked at DeShear. “What do you think?”

“I think somebody calling themselves Double Omega warned us not to go to Indonesia.” His gaze went to Lanaya. “Now they know we’re here, they’d like to chat.”

“Don’t go,” Camilla said. “If they’re using the name Double Omega, it’s obviously somebody from Angelus.”

“A team leader or project manager, I’m sure.” Lanaya knitted her hands again. “If they know the name Double Omega, they know everything.”

“Hold on,” DeShear said. “It could be an outsider she told things to before she died. Even if it is someone from Angelus, we’re still alive, so they might be a friend. There’s no other reason to reach out. I think the first message was trying to help, too.”

Camilla shook her head. “Dash . . .”

“Look, these people killed executives and high-ranking people. They’d never make murdering us a priority over knocking off the board members. And they could just wait until we were in our hotel rooms tonight and whack us then. There’s no reason for the killers to schedule a meeting and leave that kind of trail.” He peeked at the driver, then looked back to Camilla. “Can we detour this bus to the Kamandalu Ubud hotel?”

“It’s not exactly on the way, but yes, we can take you.”

“Just get us within a half mile,” DeShear said. “We’ll walk the rest. I trust your agents, but I don’t know about a local driver. Who knows what his annual income is. A tipoff about us to someone at Angelus could go a long way to improve his finances.”

Lanaya typed on the laptop. “About seven thousand dollars.”

“What?” DeShear said.

“In Indonesia,” Lanaya pointed at the screen. “The average annual income is about seven thousand dollars.”

Camilla shook her head. “No wonder Angelus moved their lab.”

“Well, then,” DeShear said. “A little cash will go a long way here, and Angelus has a mountain of cash.”

“Dash, listen. You and Lanaya have set me up with a nice sting operation to expose a multinational corporation and their fraudulent business practices. Money laundering, tax fraud—that’s all good for me. What’s your goal in all this now? It’s not to make the IRS look good.”

“I want to stay alive.” Lanaya closed the laptop, her hands shaking. “Angelus employees are dying at the hands of someone who wants vengeance, and my name is on that list. My life has become a mess of hiding and running, and I’ve endangered my family. By coming here, we thought we’d have a chance to expose what Angelus is up to but also draw the killers out.” She glanced at DeShear, lowering her voice. “That they’d come for the Angelus board.”

“They will.” He nodded. “They’ll come. It’s too tempting for them not to. Either at the hotel or somewhere at the lab, the killers will try to make a move—and soon. If they know anything about what’s going on, they’re expecting a bunch of IRS accountants to be here. Cammy, all you have to do is ask the FBI to keep their eyes open, and as soon as the killers try to strike at the board, have the feds grab them. They aren’t expecting that. Then we’ll go to the press and expose Angelus Genetics and all of their illegal operations.”

“Okay,” Camilla said. “So how does going to the Kamandalu Ubud hotel help any of that?”

“I don’t know.” DeShear pounded his fist into his other hand. “But if this message is from an employee at Angelus, they’re risking their neck to send it to us. It might be a good idea to find out what they think is so important.”

• • • •

THE LONG DRIVEWAY OF the Kamandalu Ubud was smooth and even, as was the public road it connected to, but the scorching heat from the jungle had already worked on DeShear and Lanaya as they walked the half mile to the hotel. By the time they were near the front entrance, his shirt was clinging to his chest.

“Next time I tell somebody to drop us a half mile from a hotel in Indonesia and we’ll walk the rest of the way,” DeShear panted, “you smack me.”

Lanaya dabbed her forehead and neck with a handkerchief. “Do you suppose we march right in and knock on the door to room 502?”

“If we’re not supposed to, I’m sure our new friend has figured out some way to let us know that.” DeShear wiped the sweat from his face with his shoulder. “Ready?”

“No!”

Smiling, DeShear put his hand on the hotel's front door. "Just act natural, like we're staying here. Hotel elevators are usually on the far side of the lobby, past the front desk. Walk with determination and act tired."

"I am tired."

"Then it won't be difficult to act that way."

The Kamandalu Ubud was a beautiful hotel, with an extravagant air. The lobby was large and spacious; the service staff friendly. Each greeted the couple as they walked by. DeShear returned their hellos; Lanaya stiffened more and more with each one.

At the elevator, she exhaled sharply.

"What?" he said. "Were you holding your breath?"

She shook out her hands like she was flinging water from them. "My breath, my nerves, my heartbeat. Who knows what we're walking into, Hamilton?"

He folded his hands in front of him, eyeing the row of lighted numbers above the elevator. "We'll be fine." The doors opened. He stepped in and pressed the "five" button on the service panel.

As the lights glowed with each passing floor, Lanaya's hands rubbed faster. The doors opened and DeShear led the way down the hall. At room 502, he stopped, glancing at Lanaya. She rolled her shoulders and took a few short breaths, then wiped her trembling hands on her thighs.

"Okay." She nodded. "Go ahead and knock."

DeShear raised his hand to knock on the door. The latch went down with a sharp mechanical ratchet, and the big door swung open. Standing in the entry was a woman with dark, curly hair, dressed in a sports bra and sweat pants.

Lanaya gasped, turning white.

"What?" DeShear took a sideways step from the door. "What is it?"

"She—she's on the Angelus board." Lanaya backed away. "They've got us."

"I recognize you, too, Dara." The woman stepped forward. "Please come in."

Lanaya held her hands up, shaking her head. She stumbled backwards, bumping into the hallway wall.

"I think you knew my daughter," the woman said. "On the black screen site, she went by the name Double Omega."

Lanaya pressed herself into the wall, sliding to the floor. Her breath came in short spurts.

The woman looked up and down the hallway. "I'm not here to hurt you. Is that what you think?"

"What . . ." Lanaya shrugged. "What . . ."

"Come inside before someone sees us." She held her hand out to Lanaya.

DeShear stood by, watching, unsure what to do. He swallowed hard. "I think it's okay. If she had wanted us dead, we'd be dead by now."

The woman kneeled by Lanaya, whispering. "I want what you want, Dara—the end of Angelus Genetics and its horrendous activities. But people are coming here to kill you, and if you don't listen to me, the only thing that will be ended is you two. Now hurry. There isn't much time."

DeShear helped Lanaya from the floor and onto the couch in the room.

"Mr. DeShear, I'm Dominique Carerra. Lanaya is right, I'm on the board of directors at Angelus Genetics."

DeShear cocked his head. "You called her Dara."

"I know several of her aliases, and I know why you're here. I've been following you through the black screen site." Dominique bit her fingernail. "But now things have gotten . . . out of control. If you're trying to expose Dr. Hauser with an audit, it won't work." She threw her hands out. "Did you think he wouldn't protect his investment? This laboratory facility is the single most valuable asset Angelus Genetics owns. It's worth hundreds of billions of dollars. This IRS situation you created has caused him to arrange for hundreds of armed killers to be here tomorrow. They'll defend the laboratory and stall any inspections. You don't know him. He's not going to allow anything to jeopardize his work. My daughter and my husband were both lost because of his insidious vision, so I have to be careful while I protect what's left of my family, but I can still help you bring him down."

Dominique stared at them, both of them staring back.

"Hauser has grown rich and arrogant. He thought a few guns at the front gate of the facility here would be enough to keep its secrets safe—and for the most part, he's been correct up until now. He's only been untouchable because he seemed too powerful to oppose. Once that dynamic changes . . ." She shook her head, then peered at DeShear. "Do you still have your phone?"

"Yes," he said.

"Then take pictures. Bring them back to me and I will get them to the media. The drone rooms are the key. I would do it myself, but Hauser will be watching me. I got you these." She dug into her hip pocket and handed them two green plastic cards with a gold-colored chip imbedded in each, and a green Angelus Genetics ID card. "Security will take your picture when you enter the lab. They'll issue you a red temporary ID card for the duration of the IRS audit, which they think you're with. A green ID is executive level access."

DeShear took the ID. His driver's license picture from the Florida DMV had been used for the image.

"These can't get you into every building, but it's the best I could do. The drone rooms require a yellow ID, a top security clearance. For that, use this." She pulled up the leg of her sweat pants and unstrapped a long, thin, black metal case. She placed it on the coffee table.

DeShear picked it up. The case was about the size of two watch boxes laid end to end, and heavier than he expected. Velcro straps had been fitted to it.

"Inside is a strong electromagnet that will deactivate the locks on the far buildings—there, you'll find the drone rooms. Wear it on your leg, Mr. DeShear, as I did. I don't think they're going to be frisking people on the IRS accounting team."

She went to the door. "Wait here a few minutes after I leave, so we aren't seen together. Remember, get the pictures, and get them to me. I will get them to the press."

Holding the heavy case, DeShear looked at her. "I had a hard time believing all this, and I've been in the middle of it. Will the press take your word for it?"

Dominique's face fell as she turned to him. "I'm on the board of directors for what's about to become the most despised company in the history of the world. Trust me, if you bring back pictures of the drone rooms, every news agency on the planet will believe every word I say."

"And the drone rooms?" he asked. "Is that where . . ."

"The drone rooms," Dominique sighed. "Are where you will see the worst depravity the human mind is capable of creating."

DESHEAR WALKED TO THE cabs at the end of the long Kamandalu Ubud driveway. The first two were Toyota Camrys; the next was a Mercedes. “Hello.” He waved at a small cluster of men smoking under a pala tree, then pointed to the Mercedes. “Whose cab is this one?”

The closest driver stamped out his cigarette. “Please to go in order, sir.”

“Sorry.” DeShear shook his head. “I’d like this one. I’ll give the cars ahead of it ten American dollars to let the Mercedes go first.” He waved the bills at them. “Deal?”

Two of the men rushed forward to take the money. A third hurried to the Mercedes.

“Thank you.” DeShear clasped his hands together at his chest, bowing. “Terima kasih.”

He crouched down in the back seat as the Mercedes neared the front of the hotel. Lanaya walked out the front door and went quickly to the curb, gripping her hands in front of her. “Stop right here,” DeShear said to the cab driver. “Let this lady in, but don’t get out to open the door.”

She climbed into the back of the cab, rigid and shaking, staring straight ahead. The driver pulled the car around the curved driveway and back to the main road.

“Okay,” DeShear sat up. “When we get to the laboratory, Cammy’s group will have already gone in. Hopefully, the Mercedes will help us look a little important, and we’ll proceed as though we’re supposed to be arriving later than the others did. I’m sure someone will take us to them.”

Lanaya leaned to DeShear, whispering in his ear. “Should we talk openly in front of the driver?”

“They can’t all be spies for—” He stopped himself. “Well, they can’t all be spies.”

When the cab arrived at the gate, a short, thin man in a beige uniform approached. The driver rolled down his window, and the steamy jungle heat rolled in. A bronze plaque on the tall limestone columns bore the name Angelus Genetics.

Getting inside was the key to everything else. DeShear pretended to busy himself with his phone, watching carefully while trying not to appear to be watching at all. Next to him, Lanaya sat rigid, knitting her hands.

The attendant had a long, oval face, with narrow slits for eyes and a jaundiced complexion—not at all like the locals. He glanced at the Americans and nodded to the guards at the gate, saying nothing. Two men walked to the center of the entrance in silence and pulled the iron gates open.

As they passed, DeShear looked at them. The gate area was open to the sun, yet they seemed unfazed by the heat. They bore the same yellowish complexion as the attendant, but with rounder faces and an obvious underbite. Their jaws stuck out, not like a boxer getting ready to take on his opponent, but like a child pretending to be a chimpanzee. It gave them a dull, unthinking expression.

“They’re undernourished,” Lanaya whispered, as the cab passed through the gate. “Not well fed, by the look of them, and certainly not eating a balanced diet.”

That hadn’t been the case with most of the people they’d seen in the airport and hotels. Indonesians were noticeably skinnier than an average American, but these men would look gaunt compared to anyone DeShear had met in the country so far.

The cab bumped along a dirt road that was lined with banana trees. They swayed in the breeze as the Mercedes stirred up a dust cloud to greet them. Prior traffic had settled so much tan silt on the leaves, the roadway looked like a black and white movie of itself. Dark shadows cutting between dirt-coated palms were the only colors.

At the end of the road, the laboratory rose up out of the jungle—a giant, windowless blue steel rectangle rising thirty feet into the air. A hundred feet long, it stood like a castle wall, imposing itself on the foliage and daring anything to try to pass. In the center, a large white sphere jutted upwards, an eye staring at the heavens.

The cab pulled in front of a pair of black doors. The sign mounted next to them was painted in red: “All visitors must pass through security.” Above the doors, a black sign contained the word “Security.”

From the front, the entire building appeared to have no other doors or windows. Behind it stood dozens of identical buildings. They spanned four across, and at least ten deep, separated by the wide ribbon of the dirt road. No weeds, not a single blade of grass, grew alongside the structures.

DeShear glanced at the meter and counted out some money. He handed the cash to the driver as Lanaya got out of the car.

As DeShear exited, the driver clasped his hands together at the chest, nodding. “Berhati-hatilah,” the man said. “Be safe, my friends.”

It was a friendly gesture, but it made the hairs on the back of DeShear’s neck stand up. He shut the door and the cab sped away, disappearing in a cloud of dust as the jungle swallowed it up. Facing the glass doors, an emptiness crept into DeShear’s stomach.

The worst depravity the human mind is capable of creating.

He stood next to Lanaya, staring at the entrance, not at all sure he wanted to see what waited inside.

A blast of cool air rushed over his face as he opened the door. The lobby inside was white and spotless, four gleaming walls and not much else. A stainless steel counter bearing several computers occupied one corner of the space, with a black glass door behind it. To the left was a camera on a tripod, with a series of colored screens next to it.

DeShear took a few steps into the cold room, his footsteps echoing off the empty walls. Across the room, stationed midway between the camera and the counter, was a large, black metal door marked, “Authorized personnel only.” In the door was a thin rectangular window with criss-cross wire mesh inside it.

Other than that, the room was empty—and completely silent.

The uneasy feeling intensified its grip on DeShear’s gut. He took a deep breath and tried to shrug it off. If he let himself appear bothered by the situation, Lanaya would get even more worked up. He looked at her and shrugged. “It’s security. Gotta be a security guy around here somewh—”

An overhead speaker announced a message in a woman’s voice. “Tunggu disini.” Her tone was calm and pleasant. “One moment.”

The speaker repeated the twin messages after about ten seconds. As it started a third time, the glass door behind the counter slid open, and the message stopped mid-sentence. A small, black-haired man entered the room and pointed to the camera. “Kamu berdiri di sana.”

A large Caucasian man with square shoulders and a square jaw appeared behind him. “Are you with the audit?” His accent was American.

“Yes, thank you,” DeShear said, approaching the counter.

The big man narrowed his eyes. “You’re late.”

“We had other business to attend to first. For the audit.”

“Like what?” The man glared at DeShear, not moving.

DeShear held his breath for a moment, searching for the way to deliver his words. He did not want a confrontation, but he didn’t want to explain further, either. “IRS business.” He said it flat and even, as though he was telling the man what the date was. Information, nothing more.

The man's eyes went from DeShear to Lanaya, then back again. With a grunt, he nodded to his associate. The smaller man walked to the camera.

"Stand with your back against the red screen," the American said.

DeShear nodded at Lanaya. She swallowed hard, massaging her hands as she followed the instructions.

"That's good," the big man said. The camera clicked twice. "Okay. Next."

DeShear replaced Lanaya in front of the camera. Two clicks later, the small man returned to the counter. The glass door slid open and he went inside.

"Wait here," the American said, going into the back room. The glass door quietly closed behind him.

The uneasiness tightened its grip on his gut. DeShear shoved his hands into his pockets and checked around the room. The low hum of the fluorescent lights was the only sound. Strolling to the large metal door on the far wall, he peeked through its tiny window.

DeShear jumped back, his heart in his throat.

On the other side of the glass was a large machine gun, held by a huge man in camouflage fatigues. The man held the gun to his chest, his eyes blank and cold, staring right at DeShear.

The security officer reappeared, carrying two red plastic IDs. He slinked a lanyard through each and tossed them onto the gleaming countertop. "Put these on. Step to the door."

DeShear and Lanaya slipped the lanyards over their heads.

"Where do we find the others?" DeShear asked.

"Wait for the buzzer," the security officer said. He called out over his shoulder. "Buka kunci pintu."

A buzzer sounded from inside the metal door, and the lock opened. DeShear put his hand on the pull bar, ready to see the huge machine gun and the hard face of its owner on the other side. He took a breath and yanked the heavy door open.

Inside, the small, black-haired man from the security counter was alone in the room.

The windowless space was about twenty feet by twenty feet square, like a two-car garage, with opaque white walls—but without the intimidating man and his machine gun.

Odd.

The far side held another black steel door. Beside it, a silver-colored ball protruded from the wall.

The small man scowled and pointed at it. "Tunggu di sana."

DeShear stared at him.

"Di sana." He repeated sharply.

Lanaya crept toward the door. DeShear followed. A rectangle was etched on the metal ball, with the silhouette of a head and shoulders in the upper right corner. He lifted his ID card, keeping his eyes on the black-haired man.

"Iya nih, iya nih," he growled. "Baik."

DeShear slid his ID card across the ball. The lock tumblers in the second door clicked. He turned and pulled the second heavy metal door open, revealing a long, white hall with black flooring. As he walked through the doorway, Lanaya swiped her card over the reader and was right back on his heels.

The faint, sterile smell of cleaning solvents filled the hallway, the way they do in a doctor's office. Halfway down the hallway, he stopped at a door and tried the knob. It was locked.

"What do we do?" Lanaya asked.

“They’re here somewhere, behind one of these doors.” He swallowed hard and walked another thirty or so feet to the next door, trying it.

Locked.

“What if they’re not here?” Lanaya whispered. “They could already be—”

“They’re here.”

As he approached the next room, a tall man in a white lab coat stepped out. He said nothing as he held the door open.

When DeShear reached the entry, he peeked inside. Camilla’s audit team was seated on folding chairs watching a presentation by a gray-haired woman in a lab jacket. At the back of the room, Camilla stood with her arms folded.

“Ah, there is the rest of the team,” the lecturer said. “Let us continue.” The lights dimmed as the screen behind her illuminated with the words Angelus Genetics in blue.

“As I explained earlier, the compound consists of a mere eight buildings, each connected to an airlock and each with its own security passcode. Our workers are put into sterile cleanroom suits, similar to hospital scrubs. They wear shirts, pants, masks, boots—like a surgical team, as will all of you. Our sites operate at 99.97 percent decontamination, the highest in the industry. Next question, please.”

An agent raised her hand. The woman pointed at her. “Yes?”

“We saw at least four more buildings when we arrived. What are the others?”

The lecturer smiled. “Dr. Hauser has generously leased some of the buildings on the site to a school for underprivileged children, an orphanage, a shelter for the homeless, and an animal rescue facility. Of course, these are done at no charge in order to assist the people of Indonesia in the greatest way possible.”

DeShear walked to Camila.

“Welcome back,” she whispered, keeping her eyes forward. “You missed over an hour of the most thrilling, paint-drying lectures I’ve ever had the displeasure to sit through—and I work for the IRS. Did you get what you were looking for?”

“Slight change in plans,” DeShear said.

“Do I want to know what?”

“We’re splitting from your team to get pictures. I think it’s better if you don’t know more at this point.”

A few rows in front of them, another agent raised his hand. “Do you work with living genetic tissue?”

“That’s a common misconception,” the lecturer said. “Our procedures are largely done with computer models.” A slide appeared on the screen—a young man with his face to the lens of a huge electron microscope. “We utilize a minimal amount of genetic material, as allowed to us by the World Health Organization, whose embryonic protocols were agreed to in Geneva in 1999 by . . .”

DeShear leaned to Camilla. “Did they count heads on the way in?”

“They don’t have to.” She held up her red plastic identification card. “We swiped these IDs through readers at the doors.”

“Okay.” He handed Camilla the cards they’d received a moment ago. “Take these and scan them for us on the way out.”

Camilla slipped them into her pocket. “How will you be able to get out, then?”

DeShear chewed his lip. “I don’t want to get into details and jeopardize what you’re up to. You have a legitimate function here, so the closer you stick to that, the better—but make sure those cards get scanned on the way out. We don't want anyone to come looking for us. Are the FBI agents present?"

"Front row and back row."

"Good. We'll meet you at the reception tonight."

"Listen, Dash—"

"We'll be fine." He winked. "You know me."

Camilla grumbled. "That's what worries me."

An image of a laboratory appeared on the screen as the lecturer continued. "Workers pass through the first two rooms in this hallway for their decontamination process, and then they enter the labs in their cleanroom suits, through sealed airlocks. You will be permitted full access to the site, wearing the same protective gear and accompanied by members of our security team, as well as one of our geneticists who can answer any of your questions."

She slid her hands into her lab coat pockets and smiled as the Angelus Genetics logo reappeared on the screen. "As we said earlier, we wish to comply with all of your requests, and conclude your audit quickly and to the satisfaction of all."

THE SHORT, ROUND MAN stopped his golf cart with a screech, jumping out and rushing to the open door of the large jet. “Welcome back, sir! All of Jakarta welcomes you!” The scorching heat lifted from the tarmac, casting mirage-like reflections over the runway and sending up heat ripples that distorted the view of anything further than fifty feet away. Behind him, a private team of baggage handlers pulled open the plane’s cargo hatch and unloaded suitcases.

A brown-haired woman in ripped blue jeans stepped off the jet first. Standing in the shadow of the jet, she clutched a bottle of water and twisted back and forth, stretching. Next came a tall, muscular man, wearing a blue blazer and sunglasses.

The tall man smiled and shook hands with his friend. “Thank you, temanku. Was it any trouble arranging for us to come in this plane?”

“Oh yes.” The little man winced. “The Concorde has been banned here for many years. Much trouble has been caused by your loud arrival.” He put his hands over his ears and made a face. “Sonic booms over Jakarta are not popular.”

“This isn’t a Concord.” The American patted the side of the big plane. “It’s better—a prototype from a company based out of Denver, and it flies at Mach 2.2. Knowing an investment banker or two has its privileges. They had one of these in New York, and four and a half hours later, here we are. Not too bad.”

“Yes, but very loud.”

“Well, our friends had a head start and I needed to catch up. How much money will it take to make anyone’s issues about the noise go away? One hundred thousand American dollars?” He walked to the baggage cart and pulled off a blue suitcase. One of the baggage handlers rushed forward, but he waved them away. “Thank you, it’s all right. I’ve got it.”

His friend shrugged, massaging his hands. “That much money will most certainly take care of our friends in the government, but—”

He looked away, scowling. “Two hundred thousand, then.”

The man clasped his hands in front of his chest, bowing. “As you wish, sir.”

As the other suitcases were loaded onto the baggage tram, the little man and the American seated themselves in the golf cart. The woman took a seat behind them.

“Where is the helicopter?” the American asked.

“Right this way, my friend.” He set the cart in motion, with the baggage tram following. They drove past several terminals and out toward the tree-lined edge of the airport property. Behind a chain link fence, a half dozen red Air Jakarta helicopters sat inside painted circles. Next to those stood another half dozen, in various colors. The golf cart came to a stop in front of a black six-seater. The pilot gave them a thumbs up, setting aside his clip board and moving his hands over the console. The whine of the shiny black turbojet quickly overwhelmed any other sounds nearby, as the big overhead blade crept into motion.

The American leaned forward, shouting to his little round friend. “Teman, I have something for you.” He stepped out of the golf cart. The little man followed. Hefting the blue suitcase, the American placed it at the feet of his teman.

“By dawn, I will need the helicopter refueled in Bali,” he shouted. “And this jet needs to be ready and waiting to leave again.”

“It will be done. And I have something for you as well.” The little man walked to the golf cart and pulled out a small, polished wooden case, the size of a box that would contain expensive silverware. “As you instructed, a high intensity air pistol—extremely lethal at close range. From China, but high-quality, and very reliable. But . . .” He shook his head. “My friend, I’m afraid a second noise infraction so soon may take more than another two hundred thousand dollars to correct.”

The American lifted the suitcase and shoved it into his friend’s chest, scowling. “There’s a million dollars in cash inside that. Make it happen!”

“This is a mistake,” the woman said. “You’re throwing too much money around.”

He grabbed the wooden case, glaring at her. “Get on the helicopter.”

She climbed on board and sat in one of the plush blue seats, buckling herself in. The American threw the rest of the bags onto the floor in front of her, then grabbed the side rail and hauled himself into the cabin.

“It’s my money.” He sat, heaving the door shut. “I’ll do what I want with it.”

“It’s going to raise eyebrows. You’re putting the operation at risk like you did with that stunt in Canada.”

He whipped around to face her, his eyes narrowing. “Maya, you disappoint me.” Heat rose in his cheeks. “First, you hold out about a new medicine by saying you can’t contact me. Then you get insubordinate with me in public and embarrass me in front of my friend.”

“I’m just saying—”

“That is enough!” he shouted, his face growing redder with each breath. The veins throbbed in his neck. “One more outburst and I swear, I’ll . . .” His hands trembled.

She backed away, pressing herself to the helicopter door, but also remaining defiant. “Stop it. You need me.”

“Do I?”

“The medicines. You—”

“You told me you stole them and you had them made by private laboratories. It’s fair to say when I check the receipts for the many, many things you’ve purchased, I’ll get the names of those labs. Was there something else?”

“You—you’re tired.” She spoke in a soothing tone. “From your trip. We both are. You don’t mean it.” She placed her hands at her sides. “It’s the new drugs. I—I told you, they contain steroids, but some of the new components are like steroids amplified—one of the side effects is being short tempered and irritable. They’ll come and go, but—”

“I’ve never felt better.” He glared at her. “But I don’t kid myself, either. There’s not much time left. Your drugs are going to give me a week, maybe more, but I know what waits for me after that. This work needs to get finished, and if I have to spend a little bit of money to make it happen, I don’t want to hear about it from the likes of you. Do we understand each other?”

“Excuse me,” the pilot said. “We are ready to depart for Bali. Please put on your headsets and make sure your seat belts are fastened.”

The American took one of the headsets from the overhead clip, thrusting a second set at his companion. “Maya, I asked you a question,” he growled. “Do we have an understanding?”

“Yes, Tristan.”

“See, that’s been part of our problem all along.” He gritted his teeth. “We’re too informal, too relaxed. We’re getting sloppy. Tristan? This isn’t a friendly tea party, this is business—so maybe we need to start acting like employer and employee. Now, I’ll ask you again. Do we have an understanding?”

She spoke softly, not taking her eyes off him. “Yes, Mr. Carrera.”

CAMILLA LOOKED AT HERSELF in the mirror as the other female agents changed. Clad in a white jumpsuit from head to foot, including sewn-in booties, and a hood that surrounded all but her eyes, she brushed a damp strand of hair off her forehead. “I should have opted for the three-piece set.”

“It’s not better,” one of her agents said rising from the locker room bench. Wearing the white scrub pants and shirt, similar booties, and a hood, she held out her arms and walked stiff-legged toward the mirror. “I look like a snowman.”

“Well, Frosty.” Camilla stuffed her clothes into a locker. “It’s all for a good cause. Let’s go. I hear the next room is even more fun.” They passed several others coming from the showers.

“Make sure you’re not entering the cleanroom with any cosmetics, lotions or sprays of any sort on your person,” the lecturer told them for the second time.

Camilla and the agent walked around the corner to the locker room entry, a glass door with a large rectangular button next to it. Each entry they passed had a box of white latex gloves mounted on the wall, with hand sanitizer nearby. After they put on the gloves, they tucked them under their sleeves as they had been shown. Camilla elbowed the button to open the door. A whoosh of air blasted her head as they entered the small airlock. They waited for the door to shut behind them, then opened the second door. Another whoosh of air. On the other side, they passed a large bin labeled “Disposal for Gloves.” As long as they hadn’t touched anything in the airlock, they didn’t need to replace their gloves, but the bins were everywhere. As the second door shut, the airlock made a sucking sound.

The gray-haired woman from the lecture stood at the front of the room. “You may sit anywhere. This room is completely sterilized every four hours.” She strolled in front of a row of chairs, moving toward the podium. “I apologize for these inconveniences, but we must preserve the integrity of the sterile laboratory environment.”

Camilla stared at her white-gloved hands. “I’m sure you get used to it after a while.”

“Indeed,” the woman said. “Only the front entry of every building contains the airlock, so all personnel must pass through the front entry to gain access to any building. Our workers joke that after they get home, they walk through the front door and reach for gloves they are not wearing, to throw them in the bin.” She picked up some papers from the podium and tapped the edges, lining them up. To her left, a row of windows gave a view of a long hallway. Beyond them, another set of windows allowed a look at the outside. The large blue buildings of the strange campus stood, one after the other, spotless and clean, next to the dirt road that separated them. Each had a red sign out front, “Cleanroom Suit Required For Entry.”

“When the others join us, we will begin our tour,” the lecturer said. “And then you can return to your hotel to prepare for tonight’s reception.”

“Actually, I’d just as soon miss the gala and shorten this tour.” Camilla approached the front of the room. “We have a lot of work to do, and we haven’t been provided the on-site financials yet. We can split my group into teams and have some of them do the tour while the rest of us—”

The woman held up a hand. “The numbers will only make sense when you understand the facility and its many intricate functions. It’s best that you—” She glanced at the window to the hallway. “Oh, we have a special treat.”

An old man in a business suit stood next to several people wearing cleanroom attire. The gray-haired woman walked to an intercom unit mounted by an emergency exit, and pressed the button.

“Good afternoon, Dr. Hauser.”

“Good afternoon.” He pointed his cane at the auditors passing through the airlock. “Are you treating our guests well?”

“Of course, sir.”

“Fine, fine.” His eyes passed across the men and women next to Camilla. “Ladies and gentlemen, I welcome you—and I welcome the opportunity to share the monumental scientific achievements we perform here on a daily basis. Angelus Genetics is truly changing the world. Enjoy the tour. I look forward to seeing you all tonight at the reception.”

Camilla waved a hand. “Dr. Hauser—”

He leaned on his cane with both hands, shaking his head, his eyes on the intercom. “Please. I’ll be happy to entertain any questions you have at the reception. Until then, you are in good hands. Thank you.”

The intercom made a popping noise as he turned away, hobbling down the hallway.

Camilla leaned toward the agent next to her. “Make a note. The lecturer specifically said cleanroom suits have to be worn everywhere in this building, no exceptions, and in all buildings marked with the red sign out front. Why does everyone else have to wear these moon suits when he doesn’t?”

“Hmm,” the agent said. “So much for the integrity of the sterile environment.”

“It’s just a hallway, but no exceptions means no exceptions. My trainer at the IRS once said, when people are doing what’s supposed to be their routine, pay attention to what varies. The things they don’t remember to do every time are being done as a show for you.”

“Why would he not wear the cleanroom suit?” the agent asked. “Where’s he going, if this audit is allegedly the biggest thing in his life right now?”

Camilla folded her arms.

He’s going to check on whatever actually is the biggest thing.

She sauntered to the glass, peering through the two sets of windows. The old man exited the building and climbed into a black golf cart. The others, still dressed from head to toe in white, joined him, and they drove away. In the distance, a few people dressed in full cleanroom attire entered the side door of another building with the red sign out front.

They aren’t using the airlocks.

She whispered to the agent, “Without drawing attention, get a male agent to bring DeShear over here. You go get Ms. Kim. They’re probably still in the locker rooms.”

Let’s find out where Dr. Hauser goes.

• • • •

THE DESK CLERK AT THE Viceroy Bali smiled at The Greyhound. “Welcome back, Mr. Huntley. How was your flight?”

“Fine.” He smiled back, stepping to the counter. “I’ve brought a guest.” He glanced at Maya, who sat on one of the overstuffed couches, her phone to her cheek. “I hope you’ll be able to accommodate her with her own room. Adjoining mine, if possible.”

“Of course, sir.” The young man leaned over his computer keyboard. “We have a suite reserved for you, but if I may move sir to another floor, I can most certainly have your guest be next door.”

The smile left The Greyhound’s lips. “We’re very tired, so I suppose that’ll have to do for now.”

“Very good, sir.” The clerk typed for a moment, then placed the key cards on the counter. The Greyhound waved at Maya, who pushed herself up from the couch and walked over.

“Here are the keys,” he said to her. “Go get settled in. I’ll be up in a moment.”

She took the plastic cards as a bellman approached with their bags.

The Greyhound turned back to the desk clerk. “And now I’d like to speak with the manager.”

The clerk’s face fell. “Sir, I’m happy to—”

“The manager. Now.”

“Of course, sir.” The clerk nodded.

Maya’s jaw dropped. “Tristan—”

“It’s fine.” He turned to her, putting his hands on her shoulders. “Really, I’m not upset at all.” He lowered his voice, smiling. “Go upstairs and relax. Please. This will only take a few minutes.”

She watched his face for a moment. “Okay.” Walking across the marble lobby with the bellman in tow, she pressed the elevator call button.

An older man appeared at the counter. “Mr. Huntley, how good to see you again. I understand there is a problem. How may I be of assistance?”

“Mister . . .” he read the manager’s nametag. “. . . Rahmat, is it? Do you have an office where we can speak in private?”

“Of course, sir. Right this way.”

The manager led The Greyhound down a hallway, past a door that opened into the service area. Huge carts of towels awaited the laundry machines, and a man in blue coveralls folded cardboard boxes, stacking them near the dumpsters.

“Here we are.” The manager stood beside an office door, holding his hand out.

The Greyhound stepped inside and scanned the room, his hands going to his suitcoat pockets. A sturdy wooden desk and two chairs filled most of the space, along with several filing cabinets and a potted plant. There were no security cameras, and there hadn’t been any in the hallway, either.

“Please sit.” The manager eased the door shut. “I’m sure whatever the issue, we can—”

The Greyhound was upon him, handkerchief in his fist, thrusting it over the manager’s nose and mouth. The man pushed back, but was unable to break The Greyhound’s iron grip. Struggling until he needed a breath, the manager reluctantly inhaled the ether. His eyes rolled back in his head as his arms sagged; then his body went limp and he collapsed to the floor.

The Greyhound held the cloth on the manager’s face until he was sure the man was unconscious, then rifled through the man’s pockets. Attached on a retracting belt lanyard, with a dozen metal keys attached, was a plastic card—the manager’s master room key.

The Greyhound unclipped the lanyard from the belt, slipping it into his pocket.

He stood, wiping his brow as he stared at the man on the floor. The Greyhound had no perspiration. A steady heartbeat. He stared at his hands—no trembling fingers.

Stay in control.

He nodded, taking a deep breath. The new version of the drugs had side effects, but now that he was aware of them, he could maintain his composure.

He opened the door a crack and peered down the hallway. Nothing. The service area was vacant, too. Stooping to grab the manager under the shoulders, he dragged him to an empty laundry cart and dumped him in. After enough towels from another cart had covered the unconscious Mr. Rahmat, The Greyhound administered the Propofol.

In six or eight hours when the manager woke up, he’d remember nothing.

The Greyhound returned to the office, locked it from the inside, and pulled the door shut from the hallway. Straightening himself up, he smoothed out his jacket and walked through the service area and into the big lobby, heading for the elevators.

“CAMMY,” DESHEAR WHISPERED, his cleanroom suit covering everything but his eyes. “What’s up?”

“The chairman of Angelus Genetics just went for a ride in a black golf cart,” Camilla said. “If you hurry, he’ll still be at whatever building he went into. I think you might use it as a starting point for your little side venture.”

Lanaya peeked out the window, massaging her hands.

“Any idea how we can get around outside without being stopped?” DeShear asked.

“Have a look.” Camilla peeked over her shoulder, keeping her voice low. “Others are walking around out there, dressed the same as us, and nobody seems to care. The security bit may be a ruse, but either way, if you move quickly and stay hidden between the buildings, you can probably go wherever you need to go.”

He stared out the window. “I’ll be darned.”

“Wait for the tour to start, and as soon as we move from one building to another, just stay behind somewhere until the coast is clear. Maybe in an airlock, or duck behind an AC unit or something. Best I can think of at the moment.”

“It’ll be fine.” DeShear said. “If there are other people out there wearing these moon suits, who’ll know the difference? All that’s visible is our eyes.”

“Okay then.” Camilla looked at him. “And if you get caught . . .”

“Don’t worry.” He took a step backwards, toward the rear of the room. “You knew nothing about it.”

DR. HAUSER WAITED WHILE one of the members of his party opened the door for him.

“I’m a bit concerned, sir,” the man said, entering the warm, dim room. Ventilating fans turned overhead, while circulation pumps hummed below. “All these strangers, poking their noses around the facility. It’s not a good idea.”

Hauser waved the cane at him, hobbling down the shadowy center aisle. The stainless steel shelving was thirty inches wide and forty feet long, reaching thirty feet into the air. Each was spaced exactly thirty inches apart, for maximum capacity in each building.

“We’ll keep them busy with the tour until it’s time to go to the reception,” the old man said. “Tomorrow morning, this audit nonsense comes to an abrupt end.” Hauser squinted at the rows and rows of high shelves, his eyes adjusting to the low light. “By the time they’re done showering and suiting up again, I’ll have my own private army here to meet them.” He walked up to a shelf, inspecting one of the thousands of fluid-filled containers housed on each. Reaching past the long lines of surgical tubes running in and out through the container lids, he tapped the glass, staring at what floated within. “My people arrive at ten A. M. Then we’ll see what happens with this little audit.”

“PLEASE REMEMBER, STAY with your guide.” The gray-haired woman walked between the agents, her back stiff and her nose in the air, as she handed out white clipboards. “Use the airlock entrance at the front of every building. A new cleanroom suit will be provided to you as needed during the tour. Any—”

“Agents.” Camilla addressed her group, looking right past the lecturer. “This is an inspection. It is part of an official audit. If you have questions that are not answered, direct them to me immediately.”

“As I was about to say,” the lecturer scowled at Camilla, “any questions will be handled by the guide assigned to your individual group.”

Camilla raised her voice. “Any area of this property that you are not immediately granted access to, detach from your tour at once and report to me.”

The lecturer’s voice raised to a shrill pitch. “All visitors must remain with their group!”

Camilla glared at the woman. “Then you’d better grant immediate access to anything my people want to see.”

A hush fell over the room. The agents watched the standoff in silence, their bureau chief’s words hanging in the air.

A smile forced its way across the gray-haired woman’s lips. “I shall see to it that all requests are handled in accordance with Dr. Hauser’s generous instructions to us that you be accommodated fully.”

One of the guides in a cleanroom suit ambled forward, reading from his clipboard. “The first eight agents, please step this way. We will be exiting through the airlock.” A cluster of agents dressed in white moved forward. “This way, please.”

Camilla lagged behind. The lecturer addressed her. “Which group will you be with, Ms. Madison?”

“I haven’t decided yet. Do you have a suggestion?”

“The septic facility is that way.” The old woman turned to walk away.

I’ll look for your office there. Camilla offered her most professional tone. “If you’ll excuse me, I have an investigation to conduct—and if attitudes don’t improve around here, I’ll be requesting additional time for a much more thorough and cooperative examination.”

“Request what you like.” The woman continued walking. “Your work here will come to a speedy conclusion soon enough.”

“I’m in charge of the audit here.” Camilla squared her shoulders. “It’ll go on as long as I see fit.”

The lecturer wheeled around, her eyes ablaze. “It will go on,” she yelled, her voice echoing off the white walls. Catching herself, she lowered her voice. “It will go on for exactly as long as Dr. Hauser decides.” She smiled again. “And not a moment longer.”

An agent put her hand on Camilla’s shoulder. “Boss . . .” He held a clipboard with a site plan in front of her. She straightened her spine and took it, flipping pages and staring at them until the lecturer exited.

The first group of agents filed out of the room. DeShear walked up to Camilla. “What was all that?”

“That,” she winked, “was me making sure all eyes are on me and not on you. I’ll go with the next group. You go with the one after that. First time they go around a corner, split off.”

“Got it.” He returned to Lanaya. “How are we holding up over here?”

She sat on a side bench, her fingers trembling as she held her clipboard. Squatting in front of her, DeShear took one of her hands and held it between his. "I think you're getting calluses from all the massaging you've been doing to these."

"I should think that's a far sight better than an ulcer or heart attack." She swallowed hard. "But I'll be all right."

He patted her hand. "I know you will."

DeShear debated about whether or not to tell Lanaya more about the sketchy plan. Additional information might help her calm down, or it might give her another thing to stress about. He opted for the "less is more" option and said nothing, taking a seat next to her on the bench.

Camilla's group moved forward with their guide.

DeShear stood. "Let's stand a little closer to them as they leave." He tapped an agent on the shoulder, whispering. "Get the group to come forward so it's not as easy to eyeball who's with what guide."

The agent nodded, rising. A moment later, the two groups were next to each other at the airlock. DeShear stood behind Camilla's group first, then slowly moved back to his. As the door opened and her team entered, he stepped aside at the last minute. The door shut in front of him, and he slid between the others on his team.

Their guide came forward, staring at a clipboard with a map of the facility on it. "As soon as they are out, we'll go." He raised the clipboard, pointing to a blue square at the front of the facility. "Our first stop is in records. I understand you folks like numbers. We have a lot of them there."

A chuckle went up from the team members.

The guide walked to the airlock door. "This way, please."

DeShear's group crowded into the space. The rear door shut and the door to the hallway opened, complete with the windy re-pressurization. The guide led them toward the exit. "Stay together, please."

DeShear put his hand on Lanaya's shoulder, holding her back and letting the others pass. The hallway had no security cameras.

Strange, for a facility that's supposed to be so security-oriented.

He clutched his white clipboard and peered out the windows, inspecting the other buildings. There were no visible cameras where they'd normally be—over doorways and on the corners of the buildings.

"Lanaya, did you see any mention of security cameras on the blue prints?"

"No, but that's not unusual." She clutched her clipboard to her chest. "Things like that are often added later. Why?"

"I don't see any." DeShear rubbed his chin. "They could be hidden, but part of the effectiveness of security cameras is letting some be visible so people know you have them."

They stepped outside, the heat mugging them in their cleanroom suits.

"This way," the guide said. "Stay together, please."

The prior group had gone to the right and were already a hundred feet away, waiting to enter the next building through its airlock. The guide for DeShear's group walked straight ahead, raising his clipboard and pointing to a blue square two buildings down and to the left.

As they walked, they passed utility fixtures. Large pumps, high-volume air handling units, and massive electrical boxes lined the blue exterior walls.

Plenty of space to duck behind.

The group neared the end of the first building. “As you can see, we have a first-rate facility,” the guide said. “All construction was done using the highest possible standards . . .”

DeShear tapped the nearest agent on the shoulder. “Be sure this tour is the last one to finish today. And I mean, late-to-the-reception last.”

The agent nodded.

When his group turned the corner, DeShear took Lanaya’s arm and kept walking straight ahead. She blinked rapidly, her spine frozen as he drew her to an electrical closet, pressing both of them to its side.

“What now?” she whispered, plastering herself against the building.

DeShear pointed. “We move as fast as possible to that next building and take a spot in the exact same place. Got it?”

Her eyes went wide. “Do I run?”

“Walk fast.” He peeked out from the electrical box, looking up and down the path. “Act like you’re inspecting the roof. If someone sees us running, that’ll attract attention.” He gave her a nudge. “Go!”

Lanaya jumped out onto the dirt path, walking briskly. DeShear followed, gazing at anything upwards as he covered the ground between the buildings.

No visible cameras, but they still might have them.

Reaching the tall metal closet at the next building, the pair slid around next to it.

“Can we hide in these things?” she asked.

“It’s high voltage stuff. I’d rather stay out here.” DeShear glanced around. “Actually, I think it’s time we got inside a building. Any thoughts on that? Do any of these big blue boxes look interesting to you?”

She shook her head. “On the blueprints, they had generic labels—but I’m sure those have changed since construction ended.” She brushed the dust off a pipeline with her finger and inspected the label. “This is potable water. That one’s ‘gray’ water—people have showered with it, or something similar.” She looked up to where the pipes disappeared into the wall. “Doesn’t look like anything interesting goes on in this one. I’d say the newer buildings, in the back, would be where the good stuff is.”

The sound of a diesel motor echoed down the alleyway.

“Stay back,” DeShear said, pressing himself to the wall.

She squeezed her eyes shut. The engine noise grew louder, the ground under their feet vibrating. A huge white tanker truck rolled by, sending up a cloud of dust.

Lanaya fanned her face. “So much for our cleanroom suits staying clean.” She stuck her head out and looked at the back of the truck. “Well, now. That’s interesting.”

“What?” DeShear said, leaning forward. The dust trail obscured his view of the truck, except for the top of its big white tank.

Lanaya tucked her clipboard under her arm. “Let’s follow that.”

“Okay, but why?”

“That’s a refrigerated dairy truck, Hamilton.” She crept out onto the dirt road, putting a hand on her hip. “I can’t think of a genetics lab in the world that uses milk in its protocols.”

• • • •

HOLDING HIS BREATH, The Greyhound held the big pellet gun next to his cheek, his hands trembling as he slid the manager’s key card across the door lock. The latch for Dr. Bruner’s room disengaged, and the door opened easily. The Greyhound tiptoed inside, ready to assault the obese board member.

Easing the door shut with latex glove-covered hands, he studied the scene. The shade curtains had been drawn, making the room dim. The aroma of food reached him from the room service cart by the desk. Empty plates and an empty bottle of wine littered the surface. On the bed, a thin brown-skinned girl stirred, curling away from the hairy back of the enormous fat man snoring next to her.

The Greyhound crept toward them, grabbing her dress from the floor. He tapped her shoulder. The young girl mumbled something incoherent and rolled over. As her eyes fluttered open, she recoiled with a gasp. Her tiny jaw dropped open as she stared at The Greyhound in his ski mask.

He lifted a finger to his lips, handing her the dress and pointing to the door. Her eyes went to his gun. "Go." He whispered. "Pergi. Now."

The girl nodded, taking the dress and wrapping it around her as she slid from the mattress. She bolted across the grand room, stooping to pluck a small purse from under the chair, then flung open the door and raced down the hallway.

The sound of the heavy door slamming shut awakened the fat man. He grunted, patting behind him without looking. When he didn't find his companion, he sat upright.

A long, slow wheeze escaped Dr. Bruner's lips as he stared down the barrel of The Greyhound's gun.

"Where is your phone?" The Greyhound asked. "Don't speak, just point."

The man swallowed hard, gesturing to the desk with a shaking hand.

"Thank you." The Greyhound went to the desk and picked up the phone. He tossed it onto the bed. "Open it."

Bruner's pasty complexion turned whiter as he stared at the phone.

"Open it, or I'll shoot you in the head and hold your dead finger to it, and open it anyway."

He grabbed for the phone, fumbling as he picked it up.

"Press the texting icon."

Dr. Bruner panted, pressing a button. The screen came to life.

"Put it on the bed and slide it to me."

The doctor complied, his large torso rocking forward to shove the device a few inches closer to the intruder.

"Thank you." The Greyhound picked it up, leaning back on the edge of the desk as he thumbed through the texts. "Ah, here we are. 'I am taken sick. Will miss reception dinner, but will be back in action tomorrow morning.' Hmm." The Greyhound pressed the top of the text message to see its recipients. "This went out to the other board members."

Bruner nodded, his mouth hanging open.

The Greyhound raised his gun, aiming at the doctor's forehead. "You've saved me the trouble of worrying about who might come looking for you if you missed dinner." He stood up, stepping closer to his cowering victim. "And you're sick all right, judging from the age of the escort you hired."

The fat man stammered, his mouth unable to form words.

The Greyhound pulled off the ski mask, staring into the eyes of his victim. "You thought you'd gotten away with it. You and the other Angelus board members. The executives, the project managers—you all thought you could hide your secrets in the jungle, but you can't. Some secrets refuse to remain hidden."

He fired. The large air gun bucked in his hand, making a sharp pfff noise as the pellet burst forth. The doctor jerked backwards into the pillows. His arms and legs flailed as he struggled to get his bearings.

“These are as lethal as a gun, and every bit as fast. Two to the side of the head will kill you. That’s what I came to do.” The Greyhound leaned over the man. “Now that we’ve met in person and I’ve seen your recreational pursuits, I’m even more convinced of my decision.”

Bruner gurgled, grabbing aimlessly, his head swaying back and forth until he sagged into the mattress.

“Good thing for you I’m in a rush. I have several other appointments this evening, with colleagues of yours.” The Greyhound tossed the phone back onto the bed, putting the barrel of the gun against the fat man’s temple. “I hope they’re less distasteful than this one’s been.”

• • • •

THE TANKER TRUCK DROVE to the far end of the complex, a straight line down the path Lanaya and DeShear were on, then turned left.

“I think we should move a little faster through here.” Lanaya’s words huffed as she walked. “We don’t want to lose that truck.”

“Agreed. And . . .” DeShear took her clipboard and stacked it with his, reaching up to slide both onto the top of the next electrical closet they passed. “I think the IRS auditors are the only ones carrying those.”

At the end of the building, they peeked around the corner and scurried across the gap. Lanaya shook her head. “I’ve been in a lot of genetics labs in my day, Hamilton. I don’t think this place has much in the way of security.”

“Maybe not in the traditional sense.” The image of the big man with the machine gun flashed in his mind. Again, he decided less information was better for his client. “But let’s not guess wrong.”

When they reached the end of the row of blue buildings, DeShear stood next to one of the electrical boxes and looked back over his shoulder, counting the buildings. Twenty. Much more than were visible at the front. The road was wider here, too, and paved with asphalt. By setting each building a few feet further away from the dirt road than the next, it was impossible to see them all from the front of the complex.

An error in construction, or an easy way to allow visitors to only see what you wanted them to see?

He answered his own question when they rounded the next corner.

THE GREYHOUND SLID his personal key card across the hotel lock and thrust open the door to his room. The interior door to the adjoining suite was open. He tossed the air gun onto the bed and unbuttoned his shirt, yanking its tails from his beltline. “Maya, when is my next dosage due?”

“Depends.” Dr. Carrera stepped into the doorway between the two rooms. “When was your last one?” Leaning on the door frame, one of her hands dangled at her side while the other rested on her hip.

“Dominique,” he whispered, rushing to her. He pulled her close and buried his face into her shoulder, his hands sliding along her back. The long, dark curls of her hair brushed past his face. “Oh, I’ve missed you,” he said.

She slid her hands inside his shirt, wrapping them around him, squeezing him as if she never wanted to let go. A soft moan escaped her lips.

Leaning back, he took her face in his hands and crushed his mouth to hers, devouring her warm, full lips. He kissed her again and again, tears coming to his eyes. Pressing his cheek to her face, he rocked back and forth in the doorway, his hot breath rushing over her neck. “You left New York without saying goodbye.”

She stroked the back of his head, running her fingers through his hair. “I had to maintain appearances in front of the others. I’ve missed you, my love. I can’t stand being away from you.” She closed her eyes and kissed the back of his neck. “Especially not now. Maya said you were having mood swings. Anger and rage.”

“I’m handling it.” He drew a deep sigh, pulling away from her. “And the work is almost done. Soon—”

“Okay. Shh.” She pressed a finger to his lips, shaking her head. Her voice fell to a soft whisper. “Not now. Let’s talk of other things. There’s plenty of time to discuss all that later.”

“I wish you were right.” He stepped away to face the window. The Bali skyline glimmered in the afternoon heat. “Doing . . . this, these things—” he turned to her. “It’s not how I envisioned spending my last remaining days.”

She closed her eyes, leaning her head back. A tear ran down her cheek. “I . . .” she sniffled, staring at the ceiling. “I wish I could do more for you.”

“Don’t say that. You did what you could. Everyone has. The latest version of the meds have made me feel better than I’ve felt in months. That can’t be a bad thing.”

“No.” She shook her head, mascara streaming over her cheeks. “It’s not.”

“Be strong.” He went to her, taking her in his arms. “We need you strong, this team we’ve assembled. And later . . . I mean, after . . .” He gazed into her eyes. “Our boys will need you to be strong. You’ll be all they have left soon.”

“But one in five survive. We have to think about that. You could—”

“Don’t believe the stats from the cretins that created this nightmare. Don’t pin your hopes on a lie.”

“The numbers . . .”

“Numbers don’t bleed.” He walked to the window, leaning on the frame. “They don’t cough all night until their ribs ache and their throats are on fire. They don’t vomit blood and pass out in the shower from the hammering pain of a migraine. They don’t cry as child after child parades by in a nonstop blur of hospital visits that only end at the morgue. Numbers . . .” he shrugged. “They give the wrong people false hope. And any numbers from Angelus are lies.”

She crossed the room to him, stroking his back. “You said you were feeling better.”

“It takes bigger and bigger doses and more each time.” He lowered his head. “That’s the fine print. Three injections a day become six, become nine. Pretty soon I’ll be shooting up every fifteen minutes just to stay awake.”

Wrapping her arms around his naked torso, she pressed her cheek to the warm skin of his shoulder. “They’re working on the longevity.”

“I’m working on longevity, too. It’s all I have left. That, and you—and a little more work. Then I can go. I’ll know I did what I could, regardless of the personal costs.”

She lifted her chin to rest on his shoulder. He leaned his head against hers, both of them staring out the window. A gentle breeze swept across the landscape, making the palm trees dance and sway. “Do you remember how we used to be?” she asked. “Before we started our life together? When we first met?”

“I think about it all the time.” He put his hand on hers. “The pretty young intern who got invited into the big prospectus meeting.”

“I was there to take notes. Not even notes—I was the backup to the note taker.”

“I remember blue eyes and long dark hair. A pink glow on tan cheeks, from a weekend at the beach. And a smile that lit up the room.”

“I remember a tall, confident hedge fund manager, holding court over all the big, powerful people at the company. And they all listened. You owned the room.”

“You wore a green silk blouse.” The tip of his finger traced the curves of her French nails. “Green, with little white flowers on the bottom of it. I barely made it through my presentation.” He turned to face her, chuckling as he leaned back against the window frame. “I couldn’t keep my eyes off you. Then or now. You showed me how to love again. After I lost Megan, I never thought I’d care for another woman that way, or want a family. You gave all that back to me.”

She rested her head on his smooth, firm chest. “I still have that blouse. I take it out of the box in the hall closet sometimes and daydream about how things used to be.”

“Tell me.”

“I think about things I wish I’d done differently. Like not getting Sadie the job at Angelus, or not even going to med school. Not saying yes to Keenan when he proposed after high school. Lots of what ifs.”

He pulled his head back so he could see her face. “I think sometimes if we took out the bad things in life, it might take away the good things that came after. Our paths led each of us to the other. For better or for worse.”

“Mostly better.” She snuggled against him. “Hug me.”

He put his cheek to her hair, closing his eyes and pulling her closer.

“Tighter,” she whispered. “One day soon, I might not be able to do this, and I want to remember.”

He took a deep breath and let it out slowly. “Remember me how I was before this started, not who I’ve become. The me from a few years ago.”

“I’ll take you now and then, and with mood swings and ‘roid rage, with any negative side effects and any other changes.” She sniffled, looking into his eyes. “I’ll stand by you, as you take vengeance on people who did unspeakable things to you and others, and I’ll keep working night and day to find a cure.” Tears welled in her eyes again. She swallowed hard. “I’ll take any of it over a long, slow, irreversible, slide toward death—but only if you will, too. If you’ll fight with me—for you.”

He lowered his chin, easing his forehead to rest against hers. “The drugs may keep me on my feet, but I fight every day because you give me the strength.”

• • • •

DESHEAR STARED AT THE wall of bamboo trees. The wind crashed their tall, thin trunks together, sending knocking sounds down to earth, like musical sticks or hollow blocks hidden somewhere high up in the long green leaves.

But through the noise of the wind and the trees, the distant sound of children reached his ears.

He caught glimpses as he walked. Running, laughing, singing, sitting, the sun shining bright on their t-shirts. There were hundreds, maybe more. Bits of color flashed through the foliage. Red, white, green, blue—clothing of every color, every shape, every size; some faded, some new—all adorning the mobs of children in the big field.

To his left, the road cut a hole through the barrier trees. He walked to it, his eyes on the distant children. It was a pleasant sound, a soothing one—and a nice difference from the undertone of the rest of the campus.

A cluster of girls made a circle and danced. Another group played jump rope. Beyond them, soccer and ring toss. Tumblers and jumpers and mad-dashers playing tag, he stared in disbelief at the throngs of children at play.

It had been many years since he’d paid attention to that sound, or cared to remember it, and it warmed him inside. “This must be the orphanage, or the school,” he whispered, mostly to himself. “Or both.”

Lanaya stood next to him, her jaw hanging open. “There are so many.”

“Halo.”

DeShear turned to see a wrinkled old woman approaching from the blue buildings. The tanker was parked next to the building behind her. She waved at DeShear, donning a dark colored head scarf and a semi-toothless grin. “Halo, teman-teman saya.”

“I’m sorry,” DeShear said. “I’m new to speaking Indonesian. I speak very little.” He put a finger to his chest. “Saya . . . tidak berbicara.”

“Ah.” She held her arms out at her sides as she walked, her long, dark dress frayed at the hem. “Parlez-vous français?”

He shrugged. “Sorry. American.”

The old woman took his hand, patting it. She looked up at him with brown eyes that were fading to a milky white, gently pulling him toward the playground. “Come. You can see.” She pulled again, and he followed. “Come.”

Her steps were short and hobbled, but she moved quickly. She swept her free hand outward at the field full of children. “Indah. Beautiful, yes?”

Still holding the old woman’s hand, DeShear nodded. “Where did they all come from?”

Lanaya walked behind them, saying nothing.

The field was even bigger than he’d thought. Easily a few hundred yards away still, it spanned close to a half mile in each direction, a strange, green playground chopped out of the jungle. A thick line of bamboo bordered it on all sides.

It’s not a fence. Where would they go—and why would they leave? It’s a visual barrier. This area isn’t meant to be seen from the ground.

DeShear’s host stopped but still held his hand. She smiled as she viewed the children. “Semua ciptaan alam itu indah.”

He caught “beautiful” again, but that was all. “Do you work in the school, ma’am?”

“I am saudara,” the old woman said. “Sister.”

“Sister? Like a nun?”

She pulled him along, walking along the bamboo wall. “Come. You can see.”

“Where is the orphanage?” DeShear said. “The buildings for the school? This way?”

The old woman hobbled over the grass. “Come.”

DeShear followed, towed at a quick pace by his elderly host, nearing the hundreds of children. It was as if an entire grade school had been released at one time. Kids of all ages were scattered everywhere. He passed by a tall metal pole with speakers on top.

That must be how they call them in from recess.

As he got closer, the groups were easier to see. Not all of the children played. Many sat watching, or sat on the sidelines not watching, as others played.

Lanaya stayed on the road as DeShear dropped the sister’s hand and walked toward the children. Clad in the cleanroom suit from head to toe, his taller white frame stood out in sharp contrast against the green of the field.

An errant kick launched a soccer ball in his direction. A small, barefoot boy galloped after it, running in a lopsided way. “Bola, bola.”

The ball rolled close to DeShear. He walked forward to retrieve it, but the boy was faster.

“Bola.” Panting, the child called after the ball, plodding along with his hands outstretched. “Bola.”

DeShear’s stomach lurched at the sight of the child. The boy had the same jaundiced color as the guards at the gate. The same half-open jaw. He was shoeless, with messy hair, and his dirty clothes fit poorly and had holes in them. His curved spine forced his right side down onto his hip. He didn’t run lopsided because he had no shoes; he ran that way because that was the only way he could run. His head was too large for his body, giving the appearance at a distance of being younger than he was. The face of the child was thirteen, maybe older; the body, maybe five or six.

The boy picked up the ball and ran back to the game, moving in his unbalanced lope. “Bola . . . bola.”

A sick feeling rising in his gut, DeShear inched closer to the hordes of children.

The sickly look was present on many faces. Some were missing legs or arms. Boys playing soccer without shirts displayed massive surgery scars on their backs. Children with shirts had blood stains seeping through around rectangular bandages.

He stumbled forward, his heart in his throat, taking it in, unable to stop himself from seeing what the field presented.

A girl with no arms smiled at him, her dress a tattered rag. Next to her, another girl sat on the ground, her eye sockets shriveled and empty.

“What’s happened?” DeShear said, his voice trembling. “What’s happened to all of you?”

The girl with no eyes turned her face to him. Her words flowed slowly from her hanging jaw. “Apakah kamu punya permen?”

“What?” DeShear swallowed hard, his voice breaking. With tears welling in his eyes, he took a step toward her and extended his hand.

“Permen?” Another girl echoed. “Permen.”

The children swarmed in on him, hands out, clamoring at his cleanroom suit. “Permen?”

DeShear’s jaw hung open, his breath coming in short gasps. They were all deformed in different ways. Misshapen heads, missing teeth, missing limbs. Some sat on the grass, staring off at nothing.

Others limped forward, fresh bandages on their backs or abdomens.

He didn't want to breathe. He didn't want to see. But it was everywhere, all around him. Every child he saw had a different malady.

They were too thin, too dirty, too short, too ragged. They were undernourished, with sickly yellow skin. Their faces looked at him, but few had much glimmer of awareness in their eyes. They were less like children and more like . . . newborns. Alive and functioning, doing human things, but not engaging in the recognition and intelligence that even a one-year old displayed. They were slow and disengaged, not really seeing, not really hearing.

Dozens crawled toward him over the grass, dragging their legs behind them, not a wheelchair in sight.

"Permen. . . permen."

They mobbed him, gently pawing him, idly chanting.

"Permen. . . permen."

"Sister!" DeShear turned to the old woman, the force of the mob of children pushing him this way and that. "What is it? What do they want?"

Lanaya stood with her hands over her mouth, tears welling in her eyes.

"Permen." The old woman held a wrinkled hand up to her brown, weathered face, pinching her bony fingers closed and pointing them at her mouth. "They ask, 'Do you have candy?'"

Candy. DeShear gasped, his words no longer leaving his mouth, his knees wobbling. Dozens more children pushed forward from all areas of the field.

The old sister clapped her hands three times. The children stopped, the field going silent. All eyes were upon her, each child standing completely still. A strigidae owl screeched in the distance.

"Biarkan dia dating," the old woman said. The children near DeShear stepped and bumped, moving backwards to clear a path for him, back to where the sister stood on the road.

He waited, unmoving, not yet ready. His heart pounded as he yanked the hood of his cleansuit down past his face, staring at the old woman and choking on his words. "What's happened to them?"

"Paroseseen." She turned and pointed a brown, wrinkled finger. The bamboo wall came to a corner and turned, exposing more blue buildings.

Above the doors, a sign said "Processing."

• • • •

“MS. MADISON?” THE YOUNG agent asked. “They’re calling for us to go back to the main building and depart for the hotel.”

Camilla glanced at her watch. “Thanks. I’ll be right there.”

“Yes, ma’am.” The young woman turned to go.

“Hastings,” Camilla said.

The agent stopped. “Yes, ma’am?”

“Any word on DeShear or Ms. Kim? Have any of our people seen them at all?”

“No ma’am. Not since we started the tour.”

“Okay. Thanks.” Camilla stared down the dirt road, the sun hanging low in the sky, as the agent joined the others. Camilla took one last view of the many large buildings before heading toward the rest of her group, a long line of white-suited agents in front of them.

“Excuse me.” Camilla trotted to their guide. “I need to arrange for a hired car.”

The man kept walking, not looking at her. “We have orders to take everyone to the hotel.”

Camilla stopped, putting her hands to her hips. “Orders?”

“I mean,” the guide stopped, facing her. “Our orders—our instructions—were to see that you are all safely returned to your hotel.” He worked a smile onto his face. “So you may have enough time to prepare for this evening’s reception.”

“Uh huh. Well, I have another meeting first, so I need a cab. Have one sent to the front of the security building. Now. And I’ll be taking several of my staff with me.”

“I’m sorry, ma’am,” the guide said. “But—”

Camilla narrowed her eyes. “Do you want me to miss a video conference with the Vice President of the United States? Do you think that’s good business for your employer?”

The man’s jaw dropped. “No.”

“Then call me a cab, and do it quickly.” Camilla pointed. “I want it at the front door before I get there. Understood?”

“Yes, ma’am.” The guide walked away quickly, then broke into a run.

The young agent leaned close to Camilla. “We have a meeting with the Vice President?”

Camilla turned to her. “I asked if he wanted me to miss a meeting with the Vice President.” Camilla grinned. “I didn’t say I had one. Grab some other agents and have them mill around my cab as everyone boards the buses, so it’s not obvious whether DeShear and Lanaya went with me.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

“Okay.” Camilla said. “If you get asked, they did.”

• • • •

“HOW IS SECURITY?” MAYA asked, sliding a needle into The Greyhound’s arm.

“There isn’t any.” He looked away from the syringe, focusing on the tube taped to his other arm.

Dominique picked through a series of bottles in a padded suitcase. “That’s not entirely true. My good friend Dr. Hauser arranged for security, but apparently only for himself. A few of the men with him are soldiers from the Indonesian Army, dressed as civilians.” She stood, walking to the bed. “I suppose the rest of us are on our own—although he made it clear during the conference call with the board that wouldn’t be the case.”

Maya administered another injection and inspected the IV drip. “What about your strength? How are you holding up?”

“Good.” The Greyhound stared at the tubes carrying drugs into his arm. “And so is my attitude. If I didn’t lose it on that pervert Bruner, I’m not going to.”

“Did you want to?” Dominique looked into his eyes. “Was there any inclination toward rage?”

“Are you analyzing me, Doctor? I was focused on the job. I already knew—”

“It’s important to understand.” Maya stood, crossing the room to the bag of bottles. “As these treatments get more frequent, the inclination to react harshly will increase.”

“I can keep it together.”

“Tristan,” Dominique leaned forward. “She’s trying to say you might not realize you’re going too far. These drugs affect your emotions and reactions.”

He chewed his lip. “I . . . I was dispassionate. I knew what I was there to do, and how I was going to do it. I knew Bruner wasn’t going to suffer much, so when I saw the girl, I wanted to get her out of there and get it over with.”

“No feelings of rage?” Dominique asked.

“No.”

“Any feelings at all?”

“Not like before.” Behind him, the sun touched the tops of tall buildings in the distance. “Look, I know what you’re thinking. You’re worried I’m getting de-sensitized to it, to the killing. Well, I am. And I think I need to be. If I thought too long about what my task is at any given moment, I’d hesitate—and then I might make a mistake. That could cost all of us. But if you want to know how I sleep at night, well . . . not very good.” His eyes went to Dominique. “And not all the vomiting is from the sequence breaking me down, okay?”

She nodded. “Okay.”

Maya pulled the IV tape from his arm and removed the needle, pressing a ball of cotton to the injection site. She tore a short piece of white tape and pressed it over the cotton.

“Tonight, I can get several of them here in the Viceroy. The rest, I’ll get tomorrow at the facility. I’ll wear one of their moon suits, and whenever any of them separate from the group, I’ll be ready.”

• • • •

“COME. YOU CAN SEE.” The little woman hobbled toward the second set of buildings—the ones marked Processing. “Come. I will show.”

“Hamilton.” Lanaya grabbed his arm, wiping the tears from her eyes. “I heard rumors about this—I read about it on the black screen site. But . . .” She swallowed hard, looking out over the masses of children. “I—I don’t think I really ever conceived that they’d . . .”

He took her hand, squeezing it gently. “I understand.”

“They’re . . . they’re children.” Her words caught in her throat. “Little children. Babies. And they’re chopping them up.”

“And we’re going to stop it. All of it.” He leaned forward, frowning. “We’re going to make this madness end.”

She nodded, drying her eyes.

DeShear handed her his phone. “Can you take pictures? And maybe some video? Let’s focus on finding things that will get the newspapers to help us end all this.”

She took the phone and stared at it, her voice a whisper. “Yes.”

DeShear glanced at the old woman.

“Come.” She walked toward the processing building. “I will show.”

An eighteen-wheeler truck was parked at the rear of the second facility. Behind it, in the distance, stood a bulldozer and a back hoe.

Breaking ground on their latest building.

The nearest side of the building was lined with oval tanks. Pipes ran from them and into the building. Red warning signs had been mounted on the front of each one.

DeShear pointed. “What do you think those are for?”

“It’s a surgery facility,” Lanaya sniffled. “Those will be gases for operations and medical functions. Oxygen, nitrous oxide, carbon dioxide, nitrogen. That sort of thing.” She lowered her voice. “Why do you think she’s showing us all this?”

He lifted the ID card from the lanyard around his neck. “It’s an executive level pass. She probably does this all the time for the big wigs.” DeShear trudged along, glancing over his shoulder. “Probably figured that’s what we were doing all the way down here. To her, we’re VIPs.”

The processing facility had no airlock. They opened the doors and went right in.

Cool air swept over his face. A few overhead lights were on in the massive building, illuminating the glass rooms below. Each was about twenty feet square, and maybe twenty feet high, with an operating table in the center and a rack of lights over it. Several tray tables were nearby, and a long row of gurneys lined the corridor.

DeShear walked up to one of the operating rooms, his footsteps echoing through the empty facility. Beside him, the old woman smiled. “It is here. Very good, they take bad parts out of the children.”

“I—I can’t believe it,” DeShear’s shoulders slumped, his breath fogging the glass. “They tell them they’re sick, and then . . . they chop them up and sell off the pieces.”

The faces of the children, asking for candy, clouded his vision. Their scars and deformities blocked his view of the surgical machinery in front of him. “That’s why they look jaundiced.” He turned to Lanaya. “They’re not underfed. They can’t process the nutrients.”

She stared at the operating room, her eyes unfocused and vacant. “You take out a liver, or a section of intestine, or some knee cartilage . . . I’m not sure the recipient asks where it comes from. They’re told cadavers, for some of it. Recent car crashes and the like.” She inched closer, placing her hand on the glass. “They . . . they have no idea.”

“How many organs can a—” DeShear exhaled sharply.

The back hoe.

His heart raced as rage welled inside him. “Where’s the back exit?” he shouted, running down the aisle. “How do I get out of this place?”

He sprinted past room after room of operating tables, fear growing in his gut, his eyes scanning the walls. When he found the exit sign, he didn’t slow down. He threw both hands into the door’s crossbar and slammed it open. Racing across the short span of asphalt, he hurled past the truck and up a small hill. When he reached the top, the bulldozer and back hoe were visible again.

The ground was churned and uneven, like a recently plowed field. The wind shifted, bringing the smell to him, assaulting his nose and making him choke—but he forced himself to keep going.

At the bulldozer, he stopped, panting as he gazed over the big hole. To his right, the back hoe rested silently, its shovel posed in midair, ready to continue its work the next day.

Below it, the tiny faces.

Gasping, DeShear sank to his knees, almost unable to speak, the breath going out of him. “No. Please, no.”

Row after row of small bodies lined the hole, dusted with lime to kill the smell and speed decomposition.

Blank eyes stared up at him. Their young faces were empty and gray. Some had been wrapped with a loose sheet; others were nude, their play clothes probably saved for another child.

He stood on the edge of the hole, shaking his head, unable to fathom the minds that could do such things. There were so many bodies stacked in the rows, they seemed not to be real.

But the smell made it real. The stink of rotting meat, and the buzz of the flies. The half-buried bodies, some with dirt resting on their open eyes and mouths, next to the feet and hands of their little playmates, that was all too real.

“Hamilton!” Lanaya made her way up the small hill. “What is it?”

“No.” He jumped up, the soft brown dirt sinking under his feet. He fell to his knees. “Stay there. You don’t need to see this.”

“I have to take pictures.”

He got up and ran to her. “Don’t. I’ll do it.” He took the phone. “Go. Go now.”

She stared at him for a moment, then nodded, backing away.

He faced the hole in the distance, then looked at the mud under his feet. This, too, had been recently filled. He was standing on the graves of other children.

He winced, stumbling backwards, looking for an unturned patch of ground, not wishing to further desecrate the burial site.

For hundreds of yards in all directions, there was none.

DESHEAR PACED BACK and forth in front of the tanker truck as the old woman looked on. “How can you be a part of this, smiling and walking around like it’s not happening? What is wrong with you?”

She shook her head. “Not to understand.”

He gritted his teeth, pointing at the play field. “Those children are being slaughtered. Killed. Don’t you care?”

“Killed?”

“Yes. Those kids, right there. Aren’t they your responsibility?”

“They die, you say. I make them alive.” Her tone was calm and even, her hands held in front of her. A teacher, teaching. “When I come here, they not play. They not sing. They sit, like dog, in rooms. I make this.”

DeShear shook his head. “You . . . you . . .”

“Everyone die. You, me. I cannot stop the bad. But I can make better, this.” She waved her hand toward the playground, a thin smile on her lips. “For some good, for them. Do you understand? I help them come from baby to now, and know some joy of the world.”

“Babies? Where do you have babies?”

“We have. Come. You can see.”

She led them back to a building near where the milk truck had been.

“I don’t know if I want to see anymore.” Lanaya shuddered.

“Well, you have to.” DeShear scowled. “And so do I. We’re in this thing. With the pictures I just took, we have enough to bring this whole place down, but the people at the top have a plan for that. They’ll deny, they’ll obfuscate. They’ll say some low-level person in charge went rogue. I want proof that they knew all along, so there’s no escape for the freaking monsters who did all this.”

The sister hobbled past the sign demanding everyone wear cleanroom suits to enter, pushing open the door. She held it for them. “Come. Here is.”

DeShear checked the battery on his phone. More than fifty percent. Hopefully, more than enough.

The room beyond the open door was dark. He looked at the old woman. “The babies are in here?”

“Yes. Come.” She brushed past him into the dim room. “You can see.”

DeShear took a few steps into what appeared to be a library or warehouse, pausing as his eyes adjusted to the dim light. It was almost as hot inside as it was outside. That hadn’t been the case in the operating building. Lanaya entered the room and let the door close, shutting out most of the light.

Rows of shelves were visible, but not much else. A steady, low hum filled the air. He scanned the ceiling, where large circulation fans turned slowly, their massive blades black against the fading light of the sunset sky. A gear engaged somewhere in the back, with the whir of an electrical motor, and the concrete floor under his feet vibrated.

Pumps. Fans.

He walked down the center aisle, between the shelves, and opened his mouth to ask the sister where the babies could be in such a place. It was sterile and dark, but warm.

A fine bead of sweat formed on his lip. As he went to wipe his shoulder across it, Lanaya turned on the flashlight from his phone, shining it downward to light the floor.

The glint off the glass was the first evidence he had that anything was even in the room but the shelves. Clear, rectangular containers rested end to end, with hoses running across the tops, each diving down to the shadow floating inside.

He stepped forward, his mouth open and his guts in a knot, as he reached out to touch the container and convince himself that what he saw was really there.

Inside the glass, attached with surgical tubes, was a human baby. They floated, not fully formed, looking part human, part fish, with large, round heads and curled, translucent bodies, floating in a silent pool. Their eyes, formed but not seeing. Tiny organs were visible through the undeveloped skin. Hands with fingers reached outward at him. Tiny feet pulled close, as if to offer protection from whatever might come in the darkness.

He panted hard, his hands shaking as he moved to the next container. It held another fetus, as did the next. They were like aquariums, spanning as far as he could see. The shelves went to the ceiling, and from front to back in the room, with just enough space to step in between them and maneuver.

He shook his head, his gaze going down the row as far as the light from the phone allowed, shimmering off dozens and dozens of containers.

Babies. They're growing fetuses here.

He looked at Lanaya. She stood by the first row, staring at the glass. They were larger there. Farther along, maybe by a few months. The ones by DeShear were smaller. He walked down the aisle in silence, peering at the smaller and smaller residents of the containers.

Pictures.

"Lanaya," he said.

"I'm on it." She wiped away a tear and held up the phone, hitting the video record button. The front light came on as the phone started recording. She gasped, quickly aiming the beam at the floor. "What about the brightness of this light? Will it hurt their eyes?"

"I don't know," DeShear said, swallowing hard. "I think it might. You figure, these would normally be inside some layers of skin and muscle."

He leaned back, scanning the ceiling, forcing himself to concentrate. There might be special lighting. He didn't want to gather evidence and blind thousands of victims in the process.

Thousands.

They grow them here until they're big enough, then take them to processing and start carving them up.

Nausea gripped him. He shook it off and counted the shelves he could see. There were more than a dozen and a half on each side of the aisle, reaching to the ceiling. Each had an occupant, as far as he could tell. There'd be no reason to have hoses going into a container if there wasn't. There had to be tens of thousands of fetuses, possibly more. Maybe a hundred thousand.

"Sister, are there any lights in here? One that won't hurt the eyes of the babies?"

"Light, yes. Here. I will show." She walked past him in the nearly-dark room. DeShear followed, with Lanaya behind him, cupping her hand over the phone. Only part of the light went past her fingers, but it was enough to act like a small flashlight.

At the back wall, the old woman turned. About ten feet down the aisle, a panel of knobs and switches was mounted on the wall. "Here is light."

Lanaya raised the beam, still covering it, allowing the reflected light to illuminate their way. Her hand glowed red, showing the bones within, like the skin of the fetuses.

DeShear studied the panel.

The front door opened, and the room was bathed in orange light from the setting sun.

“This way, gentlemen.” A gravelly man’s voice boomed forth into the room, accompanied by a sharp, intermittent clack of hard wood hitting concrete.

DeShear crouched, grabbing Lanaya’s arm and pulling her downward. He put a finger to his lips and nodded at the camera. She held it to her chest and shut off the light, snapping the side button down to “mute.”

The old woman watched with an expressionless face, not moving from the panel. She curled a wrinkled finger at her two guests, tiptoeing further down the row to the corner.

Several men could be heard in the room. DeShear took Lanaya’s hand and slinked toward the old sister. She rounded the corner and stepped into a small wooden closet—mostly empty, but big enough to house all three of them, and unable to be seen from the front of the room.

“Haskins, get the lights.” The gravelly-voiced man said. “My friends, here is where the real magic of our facility resides.”

Footsteps came down the aisle, toward them. DeShear held his breath, hoping the man found the light panel and nothing else. Next to him, the sister stood, unwavering.

A figure rounded the corner. DeShear eased his head back, balling his fist as the silhouette neared. The man stopped halfway down the row and snapped some switches. A dim, pink glow washed over the room as the assistant went back to the others.

The man with the gravelly voice spoke again. “The room will get slightly brighter over the next few minutes, but your eyes will quickly adjust. We also have still images we can show you of any specimens, and I can bring infrared and ultrasound equipment in if you should so require.”

DeShear crouched, inching out from the wooden closet and peeking at the group that had entered the room. There were six total, three facing him and three facing away.

Two of the men appeared to be Asian, with black hair and dark eyes. A third man was tall and blonde. Of the people facing away from him, two wore cleanroom suits. The other had gray hair and was hunched over, dressed in a dark business suit. He gestured with a cane as he spoke.

“We call this the Fetal Development, Retention and Obstetric Nutrition Enclosure,” the old man said, his gravelly voice rumbling over the glass containers. “Its nickname is the drone room, because it resembles a beehive—and we have been so very busy. Each human embryo here has been developed from our stock, genetically selected to be free of almost every form of human suffering, and housed in our proprietary synthetic amniotic fluid, much like that of a real human womb. We have four such buildings on site, and each contains over a million live specimens in various stages of growth. As your eyes adjust to the special lighting, feel free to look around.”

“That’s Dr. Hauser,” Lanaya whispered. “The one with the cane.”

“There are concerning rumors,” one of the short, black haired man said. His accent was decidedly Asian, possibly of Chinese descent. “I have heard they die early.”

A man in a cleanroom suit waved a hand. “All developmental sciences have challenges—”

Hauser stepped in. “Any of these specimens not developing adequately are terminated. Fetuses determined to be inadequate for any reason can be selected for terminus prior to introduction into the synthetic utero habitat you see here, while others are terminated in infancy. We have very strict standards. By age five, we will have completely purged these lines of any deficiencies. We are, of course, working on those challenges, but my understanding was you required stock that was already beyond childhood.”

“No, we hear adult have short life span.”

“Ah.” Hauser said. “You may be referring to some nasty rumors about an earlier series we developed decades ago. The group was about seventy-three percent male, and they typically lived almost to age sixty. Fine specimens, the Gammas. Very smart, very strong. Athletic. But we no longer . . . that line is no longer produced.”

“I see. At present, we have no use for that,” the short man said.

“Of course not.” Hauser swept his cane at the rows of containers. “But what you want is here, for every client you have, whatever their needs. We can grow and harvest any internal organ, for you to ship worldwide. We can provide your customers a subservient work force or any type of worker you desire. And in a year or two, we can open a facility in your country.”

“We would be grateful. Cambodia is a poor country with many needs.”

Hauser nodded. “High tech jobs, with laboratories and shipping. The construction of a large campus, like you’ve seen here. These are all good for Cambodia.”

“Our current interest is in females.” He held up a handful of pictures. “Where can we inspect these?”

The man in the cleanroom suit checked his clipboard. “I believe what you want is at recess now, on the playground, or we can take you to the school when recess is over.”

“Yes, we pass on the way here.” The short man shook his head. “But no school. My employers have no need for them to be educated. No reading or writing.”

“Not a school to educate, my friend,” Hauser said. “Simply a way to ensure a child remains obedient. Training.”

“Obedience training?”

“Yes, of a sort.”

The door opened again, and another group of people entered.

“Dr. Hauser,” a security guard said, stepping forward. “These are the Norwegian representatives you wanted to see. They’ve just arrived.”

“Ah, excellent.” Hauser extended his hand. “Please, join us.”

The security guard stepped back, allowing Dr. Hauser to shake hands with the Norwegians. “Sir, this is Ms. Pederson,” the guard said. “And her associate Dr. Karlsdotter. He had a question about longevity, and I was unable to properly answer.”

“We were just discussing that,” Hauser said. “The Gamma sequence. It’s merely an unfortunate circumstance, really, in a line of embryos we developed years ago.”

The woman nodded, making notes as Hauser talked. “Why does it happen?”

“We don’t completely know. In the same way pre-birth babies develop organs for nine months, hormones and DNA coding says ‘stop’ at birth. Yes, they still develop, but not like before. They move from creating organs and systems to growing and maturing them. Upon a genetic marker, similar to ones that cause gray hair, the organs in the Gammas stop regenerating. Since it’s all organs, blood, et cetera, it manifests itself as massive and virtually simultaneous organ failure. Like cancer, its cause isn’t completely known. And also like cancer, its cure isn’t yet known. It’s as though their bodies do a pre-birth for nine months and then a pre-death for nine months.”

He walked along the aisle, leaning on his cane with each step, deep in lecture mode as he passed rows and rows of the containers. “Modern science doesn’t actually know why people die of old age, except to say their bodies wear out. We simply view this as an accelerated version of that. Like a tire that is said to last fifty-thousand miles, for some cars that would be ten years, but on other cars it might only be five. With the Gammas, we don’t know where the extra mileage is happening, we simply see that it does. It could be partially explained by the faster metabolism genes that were brought forward in that line.”

He turned, punctuating the air with his cane for emphasis. “Life begins with rapid growth, and then slows. We don’t ask why. Puberty happens at roughly the same age all around the world, based on nothing other than a predetermined DNA time stamp that says it’s time to stop being a child and start becoming an adult that is able to reproduce. Menopause also occurs at a predetermined time, within a few standard deviations, because the DNA time stamp says it’s time to no longer have children.”

The doctor limped back toward the group. “In the Gamma individuals, death occurs at roughly age fifty-five for a similar reason.” He shrugged. “A predetermined DNA switch in them simply said stop. But as I say, it’s no longer an issue.”

The Norwegian woman looked up from her notes. “I believe that alleviates any concerns we had, Doctor.”

Her associate nodded. “We are ready to place our order.”

“Fine. Right this way.” Hauser headed for the door, his cane popping fast as he moved across the concrete floor. “The paperwork will only take a moment. And then, if you’ll excuse me, I have a reception I must attend.”

“I believe we are ready, too, Doctor,” the Asian man said. “Subject to a satisfactory inspection of the stock.”

“Excellent!” Hauser chuckled. “I may have to open a bottle of champagne.”

The others laughed, following him to the door.

“But to be clear . . .” The Norwegian woman held the door for her elderly host. “After the Gammas, you were able to detect the flaw in subsequent lines, and remove it?”

“Gammas are not produced anymore.” Dr. Hauser lumbered outside into the fading light. “And none exist today. You have my word on it.”

THE GREYHOUND STOOD shirtless at the edge of the bed, studying the clothing laid out there. “Quite a selection.”

“Best I could do.” Wearing a fluffy white robe, Dominique sauntered from the bathroom, her hair wrapped in a towel. “One maintenance uniform, and one from the dining room staff. What else do you think you’ll need?”

He sighed, going to the dresser and taking out a pressed, folded dress shirt. “A fast car, a reliable gun—a reliable machine gun would be nice, or even two—some good timing, good luck, and good strength.” Opening the top drawer, he sifted through the silk neckties. “Did I say good luck?”

“The best luck is being prepared.” Dominique came up behind her husband and slid her arms around his waist, kissing the back of his shoulder. “And you are certainly that.”

“Tristan?” Maya knocked on the partition door. The Greyhound turned around and kissed his wife, then went over to the door and opened it. Maya held a notepad in one hand, a cell phone in the other, examining the screen. “I have some good news. The lab says the half-life for this latest batch of meds is testing better than previous ones. Initial field tests show as much as twenty percent better endurance.”

The Greyhound slipped his shirt on. “I feel it. We talked about that in New York, remember?” He lifted his chin, inspecting himself in the mirror as he pushed a gold cufflink through a stiff white cuff. “I’d say it’s more potent, with a longer range, and less of a downslide after.”

“If we can flatten the peaks and valleys,” Maya said, “so there’s no crash between cycles, we’ll really have something.”

“That’s great news, Maya.” Dominique sat on the bed and folded her hands in her lap, her voice low. “Thank you.”

Tristan finished buttoning his shirt, tucking it into his pants, his tone equally somber. “You’re a great chemist, and a good friend, Maya. If I haven’t told you that before, I should have.” He glanced at Maya as he picked up the shoulder holster, sliding it over one arm and then the other, the strap running across his back. “You’ve saved my life more than once, both of you.” Taking the air gun from its polished wooden case, he slid it into the holster and smoothed the wrinkles from his shirt.

From the bed, his wife gazed at him, her face drawn.

“I . . . should probably go.” Maya took a backwards step toward her room. “You two have preparations to make. Good luck tonight, Tristan.”

He forced a grin. “I’ll see you in New York very soon.”

He didn’t fully believe the words he said, and neither did anyone else. It was more of a wish than anything. All three knew there was a very real possibility they’d never see each other again. The expression on Dominique’s face said it all—a wife sending her husband off to war, possibly never to return.

In a few hours, it would all be over, one way or the other. Hauser and the board would be dead, or The Greyhound would be.

He put on a windbreaker to cover the gun and the fancy shirt.

“Do you have a plan for Hauser?” Dominique asked.

“I’ll get into the reception, and an opportunity will present itself. He’ll go to the bathroom or he’ll step into the hallway to take a phone call. Then I’ll take him down and make him disappear. I’ll ambush the others in their rooms tonight.”

“The phone call.” She nodded. “Hauser’s always doing that—stepping out so no one can overhear him. But he’ll have bodyguards with him.”

“Leave that to me.” He shoved a handkerchief and the ether bottle into his pocket, along with the Propofol and a few syringes. The last item was a small container of pepper spray. “As for the rest, the less you know, the better. For your protection.”

“Don’t do that. Don’t act cold. Not now.”

A sad smile crossed his face. “My love, I said goodbye an hour ago—unrushed, unworried, a perfect moment—because I knew there wouldn’t be a chance to say goodbye properly when I had to leave.” He chose his words carefully, making sure his voice didn’t waver. “If that’s the last time I hold you, I’ll remember it forever. And if we see each other again—”

“Stop.” She lowered her head, wiping her cheek with the sleeve of the robe.

He went to the bed and sat, taking her hand in his and looking into her teary eyes. “If we should see each other again, we’ll cherish that goodbye, and share another one at a different time.” He swallowed hard. “I hope that’s the case.”

Squeezing her eyes shut, she pressed her face to his chest.

He held her, enjoying her warmth through the soft robe, brushing his hand up and down over her back as he inhaled the aromas from her shampoos and bath soaps.

On the dresser, a series of chimes played on his phone.

He kissed the top of his wife’s head. “It’s time.”

She hugged him a moment longer, then let her hands fall to the bed. The Greyhound stood and stuffed a few garments into a canvas bag, picked up his phone, and headed to the door.

• • • •

DESHEAR AND LANAYA reached the security station after the sun had set, but its interior lights were still on. Sweaty and tired in their cleanroom suits, they approached the building. At the back door, DeShear pressed the intercom button.

The voice of the security guard came over the speaker. “You’re late.”

“Yep.” DeShear said, leaning on the button. “You gonna buzz us in?”

“The others went through a long time ago. You were supposed to stay with your group.”

He glared at the intercom. “Clearly, we did not.”

It remained silent.

Lanaya huffed. “Does he expect us to spend the night out here?”

“He might.”

She frowned and pressed the button. “See here, young man. Who do you think you’re talking to? We are board members of Angelis Genetics, with executive level passes. If we wish to stray from our group, we shall—and with not a word of admonition from a security guard in the process! Do I make myself clear? Now open this door before we’re late to the reception.”

The door buzzed. As they opened it, the tall square-jawed American guard ran toward them. “I’m so sorry, ma’am! I thought you were with the audit team.” He opened the next door for them. “I really apologize. It’s been a long day, and—”

Lanaya stormed past him, with DeShear following.

“My good man,” she said, “it’s one thing to have a long day. It’s quite another to be rude.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

She stopped, putting her hands on her hips. "I shall keep this between us this time, but remember, you are a representative of Angelus Genetics. I'll expect better from you in the future. Now if you'd be so kind as to call a cab for us."

"There's one waiting, ma'am. The IRS woman insisted. But . . ." The guard folded his arms.

"Yes?" Lanaya stared at him.

"Ma'am, I'll need to collect your ID cards." He eyed the lanyard with the security pass.

DeShear held his breath. If the guard inspected cards every day, he would know DeShear's was doctored.

The guard stared at Lanaya.

She narrowed her eyes, holding up her ID badge. "We'll be keeping these."

He let out a loud sigh and reached behind the counter. The door buzzed. "Yes, ma'am. Enjoy your evening."

Lanaya marched through the front door and headed for the taxi, climbing in with DeShear on her heels.

"Nice work." He chuckled.

"Thank you." She fanned her face. "I nearly wet myself."

The cab bumped along the dirt drive, heading from the lab campus to the hotel. DeShear pressed his phone to his head, holding his other ear shut so he could hear over the road noise. "We got him, Cammy. We caught Hauser talking about committing euthanasia, and we have pictures of a mass grave site on his property, filled with the bodies of children."

"What?" Camilla said. "I can't hear you, Dash. You're breaking up."

DeShear raised his voice. "I said—"

His phone cut out. He looked at the screen. There was no signal and only three percent battery life.

"Crap!"

A moment later, the screen flashed with an incoming call from Camilla, but it immediately dropped and lit up with the message "call lost."

"Is there any juice left in your phone?" he asked Lanaya.

She shook her head. "What do we do?"

"Driver, do you have a cell phone?"

The man shrugged, peering at DeShear in the rearview mirror. "No English, sir. I am only speak Indonesian."

DeShear held up his phone, pointing to it. "A power cord? Anything?"

The driver shook his head. "No phone, sorry. I take to hotel, yes?"

"Yes." DeShear slumped back in his seat, pulling his cleanroom suit hood off. "Hotel."

• • • •

THE GREYHOUND WAITED in coveralls behind the dumpster until a truck pulled up to the Viceroy loading dock. A man with a rifle stood at the back of the hotel; another at the side. Both were dressed the same as The Greyhound. As the service crew came out to unload the vehicle, he joined them. Hefting a box onto his shoulder, he lowered his head and carried it inside.

He followed the man in front of him to the kitchen and set his box on a stainless steel counter, lingering as the others returned to the truck. When they were gone, he walked in the opposite direction and ducked into the restroom. He unzipped his coveralls and balled them up, slipping them into the trash can in the corner, then smoothed his hair.

The wait staff jacket and dark pants would work well enough inside the reception.

• • • •

NEAR THE CHRISTMAS tree in the Viceroy hotel ballroom, Camilla sipped ice water, tapping her hand against her thigh. There had been no word from DeShear yet. Something may have happened. If it did, what then?

She distracted herself by watching one of the hotel staff plug a cell phone into a projector cable. Slides about Angelus Genetics appeared on screens lining the walls. After a second cord was attached, holiday music came over the ballroom sound system.

Her phone pinged. Pulling it from her purse, she read a text from DeShear.

On our way.

She strolled around the room, trying to focus on mingling with her agents as they awaited their host, telling herself if DeShear and Lanaya were on their way, they were probably okay.

• • • •

DOMINIQUE TOOK ONE last look in the mirror, pressing her hand to her stomach to ease the butterflies. She slipped her key card into a small handbag, adjusted the strap on her shoulder, and headed to the door.

When she opened it, Dr. Hauser was smiling at her from the hallway.

Her stomach lurched. She fought the urge to slam the door in his face and throw herself against it.

“Hello, Dominique.” Hauser brushed past his two bodyguards. “May I escort you to this evening’s reception?”

She swallowed hard. “Uh, of course, Marcus.” Then, a smile. “It would be my pleasure.”

“Excellent.” He extended his arm. “This way.” They walked down the hallway together, his cane setting the pace. At the elevator, one of the body guards pressed the button. The doors opened, and the foursome stepped inside.

As the doors closed, Hauser leaned his cane against the wall and pressed the button to the lobby. “You know, my dear Dominique, you disappoint me.”

Her heart pounded. Would the body guards attack her now that she was out of sight in the elevator? Why hadn’t she brought a weapon?

She fought to keep her breathing steady, staring straight ahead.

“You are an amazing creature. So smart.” He patted her arm. “But I knew you only did my bidding out of fear, and that can only take things so far.” He pulled a piece of paper from his pocket and gazed at it. “How are your children—the boys? Are they behaving while you’re away? Not giving your mother any trouble, I hope.”

Her hands shook, her voice wavering. “They’re fine.”

“Ah. Good.” The paper crackled as he unfolded it. “They have school in the morning, tomorrow, and baseball practice after.” He looked up. “Baseball, in December?”

She said nothing, holding her breath, unable to stop her heart from racing.

“And you will call them at your mother’s, on their tablet, after baseball—as you do every time you travel.” He folded the paper and put it away. “I’d like that to continue. I’d like for you to call them tomorrow. I’d like for them to answer and speak with their mother. I’m sure they’d be disappointed if that didn’t happen. Of course, I’m sure you’d be heartbroken if you called and they didn’t answer. If your mother said they weren’t there, and she didn’t know where they were.”

A shudder ran through her. “Please don’t.”

“Why, I admire the effort you make to call them every day. In fact, I want you to call them tomorrow, and the day after that, and greet them with loving arms upon your safe return.”

Tears welled in her eyes. “Please . . .”

He squeezed her arm, his gravelly voice growing stern. “It would be terrible if anything were to happen to your young sons while you are out of town, so I’ve asked a friend to keep an eye on your children during our stay here. A friend of these gentlemen.”

“Marcus, y-you know me. I would never—”

“I’ve been watching the entire time, my dear. I know everything. You leaked confidential information on our company through a black screen site. You’re working with a psychopath called The Greyhound. You may even be responsible for this IRS debacle.” He gritted his teeth. “It infuriates me that I took you in as a lowly intern, and helped you soar to great heights, and—I’ve given you so much! I helped you become a doctor, put you on the board of Angelus. I had great hopes for you. But . . .” He lowered his voice. “I don’t pretend I haven’t taken much from you as well. Your daughter leaked information, and she paid a high price—but you paid it as well. I don’t deny that, and it turned you against me. Among other things you disagreed with.” He looked her in the eye, his gaze growing cold. “But just as you’ve taken from me, with the lying and sharing secrets, more can always be taken from you. So let’s both hope nothing happens while I’m here in Indonesia. Because if something were to happen to me, something most assuredly will happen to your lovely children.”

The bell rang. The elevator doors opened to the lobby. A large, lighted Santa greeted them from the far side of the room.

Hauser dropped her hand and leaned on his cane, hobbling across the shiny marble lobby.

“Dina!” Hauser shouted, waving his hand at the Special Assistant to the Prime Minister. “You made it. How good of you to come. You’re in time for my speech.”

The woman smiled and clasped Dr. Hauser’s hand.

Inside the elevator, Dominique fell against the wall, shaking and clutching her stomach, barely able to keep from sliding to the ground.

THE WOMAN FROM THE lecture walked briskly across the ballroom, passing a long table of dignitaries. Various board members from Angelus Genetics were seated next to representatives of the Indonesian government, the slide show of Angelus Genetics PR images projected onto screens behind them. In the center of the long table, a microphone awaited.

The lecturer leaned forward onto the lectern. “Ladies and gentlemen, thank you all for coming.” She tapped her note cards, looking out over the gathering. “Angelus Genetics would like to welcome our guests from the United States Internal Revenue Service, the Federal Bureau of Investigations, and the Federal Marshal Service, as well as representatives of our host nation. This reception is being held in the hopes that we can get to know each other better and come to some understandings about our business here in Indonesia. To that end, I have a slide presentation prepared . . .”

Camilla groaned to herself. A few of her agents groaned quietly nearby.

“But first, we have a special treat for you. The chairman of Angelus Genetics would like to welcome you. Ladies and gentlemen, I give you Dr. Marcus Hauser.”

She stepped away from the microphone, clapping. A polite applause went up from the assembled agents and others in the room. In the back corner of the ballroom, far from the doors, a man in a wait staff jacket carried a tray of hors d’oeuvres. As Hauser lumbered toward the lectern, the server set the tray on one of the many round tables in the room, and walked quickly toward the rear exit.

DESHEAR AND LANAYA pushed the front ballroom doors open and rushed inside. Hauser’s gravelly old voice boomed over the speakers as DeShear walked through the crowd of agents.

“Happy holidays, everyone. Thank you all for coming.” The old man cleared his throat. “I can’t say I’m happy you’re here, but I look forward to addressing your concerns and putting this awkward audit behind us. I hope you’ll all be home for Christmas.”

“Dash.” Camilla’s voice came from behind DeShear. “What happened to you?”

“Cammy, you won’t believe what we found.” He glanced over both shoulders and lowered his voice. “I tried to tell you this earlier, but the call dropped. We heard Hauser talking about conducting human trafficking and euthanasia, and I saw a mass grave site on the far side of the campus where there’s supposed to be a school. He’s in it up to his eyeballs.”

Camilla’s jaw dropped. She put her hand on his shoulder, directing him to the back of the ballroom. “You saw mass graves?”

“Mass graves, organ harvesting facilities,” DeShear said. “I was in a field where there had to be thousands of children buried. They’re using a freaking bulldozer to cover the bodies. And Hauser knows all about it. We overheard him when he was pitching some clients.”

“That’s incredible.” Camilla put her hand to her forehead, glaring at Hauser as he spoke.

“Get some lights and I’ll take you there right now.” DeShear said. “It’s all just sitting there, a whole second campus.”

“Ms. Madison, if I may.” Lanaya leaned in close. “I want this company stopped, believe me, but it may be best to move quietly. Dr. Hauser is very smart and very well protected by the Indonesian government. The Prime Minister would be hugely embarrassed by word getting out about mass graves and human trafficking. An IRS audit of an American-owned company? That, they can weather.

Euthanasia, organ trafficking—those things are another matter entirely. If the Prime Minister is in on any of this, I fear they may try to hush it up. They could even hold us as spies or some such thing while they move the evidence.”

Camilla waved to a few of her agents. As they approached, she put a hand on Lanaya’s shoulder. “Don’t worry. With proof of a mass burial site, I can call the Vice President and get the U. N. here in about twenty-four hours. Nobody can move a mass burial site that fast.”

The two agents stood by Camilla. “Get word to the team leaders that I need to see them, but they need to move quietly.” The agents departed. Camilla turned back to Lanaya and DeShear. “When I get the U. N. here, the press will follow. That spells the end for Angelus Genetics. We can seize everything they have, and they won’t be able to say a word about it.”

DeShear pounded a fist into his hand. “Good. Hauser needs to go down.”

“Hold on,” Camilla said. “It’s not that fast. Lanaya is right. Hauser’s being protected, and the Indonesian prime minister won’t want that being exposed on his watch. We need to move carefully, and if we tip our hand, Hauser might walk.”

“How does he walk from something like this?” DeShear’s face grew hot. “He’s in too deep. We saw him talking about it. Go arrest him right now, in the middle of his stupid speech.”

Camilla put her hands out. “For me to do anything, we need direct proof that he violated U. S. laws. Otherwise Hauser will say he didn’t know anything about it. He’ll blame it on a rogue manager, climb onto a jet, and ride it all out somewhere else. That’s how these multinational corporate big wigs play the game.”

Lanaya groaned, putting her hands to her face. “He could open up shop in a new country and be right back in business.”

Camilla nodded. “We need direct evidence that shows he knew about the killings and human trafficking. It won’t be in the company ledgers, but if we find evidence of money laundering, we can squeeze some lower level players and work our way up to Hauser. That’ll take weeks, and if he even thinks we’re getting close, he’ll bolt.”

“But he talked about euthanasia.” DeShear shook his head. “We both heard him.”

Camilla shrugged. “Right now, it’s your word against his.”

Lanaya shot upright. “No, we—”

Camilla held up a finger. “We need to do it right, so he can’t weasel out of anything. Let me call this in. That lady at the table is the Special Assistant to the Prime Minister. She’s here to show Hauser is connected. We’ll need hard proof that he—”

“We have it!” Lanaya whispered, holding up a phone. “Where’s a power cord?”

At the front of the room, Hauser dug in his pocket with one hand and waved at the group with the other. “Now if you’ll excuse me, duty calls. So, Merry Christmas, and enjoy the party.” He stepped away from the microphone, holding his phone to his ear. As he headed for an exit, two large men followed him.

• • • •

THE GREYHOUND WAS WAITING for them.

Hauser left the ballroom, speaking quietly into his phone. “The Cambodians closed on an order for three hundred today, and signed a deal for a thousand more as soon as we can get them ready.” He looked around. “Hold on, I need to move to where there’s more privacy.” He walked toward the men’s restroom, pointing at one of his bodyguards. “You make sure no one comes in.” He nodded at the other. “You, come with me.”

The bodyguard opened the restroom door. Hauser went inside to continue his conversation, the other large man following him.

On the other side of a bushy potted plant, The Greyhound pulled out the ether, splashing some onto his handkerchief. He palmed it in his left hand and walked toward the restroom, his right hand around the container of pepper spray in his pants pocket.

“Sir,” he said to the bodyguard. “You’re with the reception. May I get you anything from the bar?”

As the man opened his mouth to reply, The Greyhound yanked the pepper spray from his pocket and released it into the bodyguard’s eyes. His hands shot to his face as he shook his head, backing up into the wall. Before he could call out, The Greyhound was on him, shoving the wet handkerchief into the man’s face. The bodyguard twisted away, but The Greyhound held fast, keeping one hand crushed to his target’s face and wrapping the other one around his throat. The man launched himself backward, slamming into the wall to crush his assailant. The Greyhound winced, the air going out of him as sharp pains exploded through his rib cage.

The handkerchief was his only chance. He gritted his teeth and forced the cloth harder into the man’s face, tightening his grip on the bodyguard’s throat. The lingering pepper spray burned The Greyhound’s eyes as he fought to keep the handkerchief in place.

Inches from him, the men’s room door flung open. The other bodyguard stepped out, his gun drawn. The Greyhound leaned his shoulder into the wall and shot a foot out, catching the gunman in the jaw. The man’s head snapped back, and he sprawled onto the carpet.

The bodyguard’s thick arms came at The Greyhound again, swatting at his ears and eyes, as the man tried to get a grip on his attacker. The bodyguard groaned and clawed, then heaved himself into the wall again. Blind and struggling for air, he caught his attacker’s collar. The Greyhound kept his grip, struggling to hold the ether over the man’s face. The bodyguard grunted into the cloth, flinging his head. He let go of The Greyhound’s collar and put both hands on the arm that choked him. He grunted, bending over and falling to his knees, twisting and turning, but unable to shake loose his attacker. His hands slipped off, but he grabbed again—slower. The Greyhound stood behind his target, sweating as he forced the cloth to stay in place. The bodyguard groaned and swayed, his movements growing clumsy. The thick fingers finally went slack and slid off The Greyhound’s arm.

The bodyguard’s hands dropped to his sides, and he slid to the floor.

The Greyhound stood over him, panting. His eyes watering, he blinked hard and glanced up and down the hallway. No one had come around the corner in the melee. He grabbed the big man by the arms and dragged him into the ladies’ room, returning a moment later for the other bodyguard.

As the restroom door shut, The Greyhound opened the bigger man’s jacket and relieved him of his gun. It was a military-style weapon, probably from the Indonesian army. He tucked it into the back of his belt and moved to the second man. Same style gun. He tossed the weapon into the trash.

He moved quickly, sweat dripping off the tip of his nose. Hauser wouldn’t stay in the men’s room too long without his bodyguards, and he may have already phoned for help.

Standing, The Greyhound peeled off the wait staff jacket and unholstered his air gun, laying it on the sink. His own jacket and shoulder holster went into the trash; the air gun went into his hand. His eyes still burning from the spray, The Greyhound pulled out his shirt tails to hide the weapon tucked in his belt and stepped into the hallway. He took a deep breath, readying himself to enter the men’s room.

He looked almost like any other guest at the hotel now, and a man walking into a men’s restroom wouldn’t normally raise any concerns—except to the old man inside.

He pressed the air gun against his thigh so it wouldn't be immediately visible to a casual onlooker. He stared at the restroom door. Hauser might be armed, too.

The Greyhound chewed his lip, his pulse racing. If he could act casual for a few seconds when he stepped inside, like he was a normal guest entering the restroom, that might be all he needed. He placed a hand on the restroom door.

A two or three second advantage.

That was all he required for the air gun to quickly and quietly do its job.

• • • •

LANAYA LOOKED AROUND. “Is there a plug? Anything?”

“Up there.” Camilla pointed to the lectern. “The audio and video for the ballroom are coming from a cell phone. Use that.”

Clutching the phone to her chest, Lanaya viewed the nearest screen. Holiday music accompanied slides of the Angelus propaganda. Her eyes wide, she faced Camilla. “Are you sure?”

Camilla gritted her teeth and pointed at the phone. “Is the proof on there or not?”

“It is.”

“Then let’s go.” Camilla headed for the lectern. “Jingle Bells can wait.”

• • • •

THE GREYHOUND HELD his air gun tight as he stood by the restroom door, his thoughts racing.

Hauser is in here. He might be hiding in a stall, or he might have a gun—and start shooting the second this door opens.

I can’t just kick open the door and use the bodyguard’s weapon to open fire, because the noise will draw attention. Hauser can make all the noise he wants, though. Whoever comes will protect him.

Right now, he’s probably on the phone calling for help—and that help will be here in minutes, or even less time.

So . . .

He leaned close to the heavy door, ready to give it a hard push.

It’s time to go in.

He shoved the door open and leaped inside, his gun raised at arm’s length. As the door crashed into the inside wall, The Greyhound scanned the room, peering down the barrel of his weapon.

Tile. Sinks. Stalls. Urinals.

The room appeared empty.

He has to be in one of the stalls.

The Greyhound lowered himself to one knee. The bottoms of the toilets were visible under the short stall walls, their shadows falling on the tile floor. In the far stall, the shadow was larger than the others. He kept his gaze on the shadow as he crept into the room.

The shadow moved.

The Greyhound leveled the air gun at the stall door. “You can come out, or I can shoot holes in the door until you come out.”

“You can’t shoot.” The old man’s gravelly voiced wavered, echoing off the tile walls. “There are five dozen FBI agents across the hall. The noise from a gun will have them here in—”

The Greyhound squeezed the trigger, sending a pellet blasting through the stall door and into the tile wall. A golf ball-sized hole appeared in each, a cloud of splinters and plaster falling to the floor.

“Okay,” Hauser said, his voice wavering. “I’m coming out.”

The latch on the stall door clacked as it unlocked, and the door inched outward. The tip of the cane touched the floor, followed by one foot, then the other, as the old man stepped off his toilet seat perch. “I’m unarmed.” Hauser’s voice trembled. He stuck a hand out of the stall, waving it.

“I’ll need to see both hands, doctor. Now come on out.”

“My cane. I can’t walk without it.”

Then how did you climb up onto—

Hauser leaned out the door and fired a gun. The deafening blast echoed off the tile as a white and yellow flash burst from the barrel. The Greyhound slammed backwards like he’d been hit by a linebacker. Red exploded from his shoulder, a searing crash of pain surging through his arm and chest.

He fell into the wall, gasping and trying to raise his gun. The muscles wouldn’t respond. His weapon clattered to the floor. Blood gushed from his wound.

• • • •

“THAT’S GUNFIRE!” CAMILLA shouted. She bolted from behind the lectern. “FBI, let’s check that out. My people, secure the room. Get the civilians and dignitaries to the far wall, away from any windows and doors.”

A group of FBI agents headed for the door, followed by several Indonesian soldiers, splitting into two teams. The commander barked orders to secure the perimeter. Guns drawn, the agents pressed themselves against the walls as their leader threw the door open and leaped into the hallway. “We’re clear! Move, move.”

The agents funneled through the door, splitting left and right into the hallway.

DeShear turned to Lanaya. “That could be our killer. You got this?”

She fumbled with the projector’s connectors. “I think so.”

“Okay.” DeShear bolted for the door.

“Dash, don’t!” Camilla shouted.

It was too late. He was gone.

• • • •

BLOOD STREAMED FROM The Greyhound’s shoulder. With his other hand, he reached behind his back for the pistol.

“I wouldn’t.” Hauser’s cane fell to the floor as he limped forward, keeping his gun pointed at The Greyhound. “I’m not a killer, but I’ll make an exception if you pull out a gun.”

“You’re worse than a killer.” The Greyhound winced, fighting the pain. “You’re a mass murderer.”

“And you’re not?” Hauser smiled, inching closer. “How many people have you killed? Twenty? More?” He took another step, balancing carefully. “But you justify it because you disagree with them. You don’t like their ideas. Well, I disagree with you and your ideas.”

The Greyhound gritted his teeth, gasping as the pain pounded his shoulder.

“It’s over.” The old man took another step toward him, putting the tip of his gun to The Greyhound’s head. “You lost, and I won, because I always win.”

• • • •

A LARGE WOMAN IN AN evening dress stood in the hallway, trembling. DeShear shouted at her. “Where’s the shooter?”

She pointed with shaking hands. “M—men’s room.”

The FBI commander squatted in the hallway, his gun trained on the men’s room door. “Team one, go.” As two agents raced to the bathroom door, the commander called down the hallway. “Team two, check the lobby for additional threats.”

DeShear took a position behind him, leaning in close. “Have somebody find an interpreter in case the shooter doesn’t speak English.”

“Carson,” the commander shouted. “Grab one of the hotel staff that speaks English.” He glanced at DeShear. “Are you armed, sir?”

“Not yet.”

“And Carson—get a weapon for the bureau chief’s friend.”

• • • •

THE GUN SHOOK IN THE old man’s hand.

The Greyhound winced as the pain from his shoulder throbbed. Sweat formed on his brow. “Not so easy, close up—is it? You prefer your victims small and helpless.”

The doctor shrugged. “The trembling is a byproduct of an adrenaline surge—from when you shot at me—and nothing more. If I wanted you dead, you’d be dead right now.”

A bead of sweat trickled down The Greyhound’s cheek.

“It’s easy to kill a man,” Hauser said. “Killing his ideas takes time and effort. I know you have others working with you. Seeing you humiliated in public as your efforts are disgraced, that’s how you kill a movement.”

• • • •

THE AGENTS TOOK POSITIONS on each side of the men’s room entrance. “You! In the restroom! Throw down your weapon and come out.”

“I went into the ladies’ room.” The woman backed down the hallway, a hand over her mouth and her eyes wide. “There are two bodies in there!”

“Watkins!” The commander shouted. “We have an unidentified threat in the ladies’ room.”

Another agent raced forward, two others on his heels. “On it.”

A gravelly voice came through the restroom. “I’m Dr. Hauser. I’ve been attacked.”

“Doctor Hauser.” The commander shouted, moving to the men’s room. “Where is the gunman?”

“I shot him. He’s on the floor.”

The commander frowned, facing DeShear. “There’s a lot of bodies piling up in this hotel. How big a threat is the old man?”

“Small,” DeShear said. “Unless you’re a kid.”

The commander nodded. “Doctor, we’re coming in. Lower your weapon.”

He pressed his hand to the door and opened it. Inside, an old man with a gun stood over a younger man with blood seeping from his shoulder. “I got him,” Hauser said. “I got The Greyhound.”

An agent rushed past the commander and relieved Hauser of his gun. Two others took The Greyhound’s weapons and lifted him to his feet.

“Get an ambulance and get something to restrain that guy,” the commander said, pointing to The Greyhound. “See if any of the soldiers have handcuffs. If not, get some zip ties from the kitchen. Anything to hold him until the local police arrive.”

The men dragged The Greyhound out of the restroom and toward the lobby, leaving a dotted trail of blood along the floor. DeShear stepped to the wall so they could pass.

This was the big killer. The one we were all afraid of.

The Greyhound hung his head, staggering as the agents helped him walk.

Doesn’t look like such a threat now.

“Doctor.” An agent took Hauser by the shoulders. “Are you all right?”

Before he could answer, his own voice boomed from the speakers in the ballroom. A conversation between Hauser and another man filled the air.

“Any of these specimens not developing adequately are terminated . . .”

“Let’s get you to a hospital, sir,” the agent said, taking the doctor by the arm. “We’d like to get you checked out and make sure you’re okay.”

Hauser shook the man off, limping toward the ballroom. As if in a trance, he moved forward, frowning, his mouth agape.

“ . . . others are terminated in infancy.”

“What is that?” Hauser shouted, throwing open the ballroom door.

Lanaya stood at the lectern, all the screens filled with a video—a distant image, shot between shelves and over the tops of surgical tubing and glass containers—of Dr. Hauser and the Cambodian man.

“By age five, we will have completely purged these lines of any deficiencies.”

“Stop it!” The doctor’s face turned red as he yelled at the screen. “Turn it off!”

The lecturer watched, her mouth open, as the doctor continued into the ballroom. Two FBI agents held her, keeping her from going to him.

“ . . . my understanding was you required stock that was already beyond childhood.”

Hauser’s eyes darted to every screen, his arms flailing. “No! Stop it! Turn it off.” He glanced wildly around the room, his gaze falling on the Special Assistant to the Prime Minister. “Dina! I can explain!”

She reached into her purse and took out her phone, holding it to her ear—and turning away from Hauser.

“Dina!”

Hauser limped to the center of the ballroom, viewing every screen, his image plastered on all of them. He leaned on the back of a chair, his head sagging.

The men onscreen continued their negotiation.

“Our current interest is in females. Where can we inspect these?”

“I believe what you want is at recess now, on the playground . . .”

Panting, Hauser stood upright and smoothed his shirt. “Madam Assistant, I . . . I am an important person in this country. The—the Prime Minister, he instructed you . . . to show me every courtesy.”

Dina lowered her phone and looked at the doctor.

Hauser swallowed hard. “I wish to leave Indonesia. Tonight. Right now. Earlier, you offered me a helicopter. I’d like you to take me to it.”

“What!” Lanaya shouted. She turned to Camilla. “You’re in charge. Don’t let him walk away.”

Camilla stepped forward. “I’m sorry, Dr. Hauser, but the FBI has the authority to ask you as many questions as they want, and the IRS will insist on getting those answers before you leave.”

“No, no, no.” He shook his head, waving his hands. “Forget all that. I am not on U. S. soil, so you have exactly zero authority. I was willing to sit still for this ridiculous audit, but my patience has run out. By ten o’clock tomorrow morning, I’ll have my people here to put an end to your little witch hunt. Then we’ll see who has authority.” He pounded the table, pointing a finger at Camilla and narrowing his eyes. “Tomorrow morning, your so-called audit ends, Ms. Madison. And then you go back to the United States with your tail between your legs!”

Camilla folded her arms. “They’re not coming.”

“What?”

“That big army you hired to swoop in and stop us,” Camilla said. “I got a phone call from somebody who overheard a conversation in a parking garage, where you hired a bunch of killers to come here and disrupt a federal investigation. Your army of thugs got stopped at the airport in Tampa. It seems the ATF and FBI had an issue with so many people and weapons being moved illegally out of the country, so they're all discussing it." She shrugged. "Well, the agents are. Your mercenaries are behind bars. And so is your lawyer—who hired killers at your direction. So, nobody's going to be riding in like the cavalry to save the day."

"What—who?" Hauser's face turned white. "That's a lie. I never told anyone—"

"Yes, you did." Dr. Carerra stood up. "I heard it all in the parking garage, Marcus. I called the FBI, and they were kind enough to put my children in federal protective custody while I came here to watch you sweat."

"Dominique!" Hauser gasped. "I'll—I'll sue! I'll destroy you. I'll take everything you own, and then I'll burn it to the ground!"

"I don't think you will." Camilla smiled. "A lawsuit would require you to set foot back in the United States—where I have a lot of subpoenas waiting for you."

"It's over, Doctor." Dominique made her way around the dignitaries' table. "Your company is over, and your power is over." She walked past him, heading to the exit. "You're over."

His jaw hung open as she passed.

"But my audit isn't." Camilla strolled to the lectern, picking up the cell phone. Its cables swayed as she held it over the projector. "I have an agent out front hiring every cab on the hotel property, and we're going to have them turn on their high beams and drive me to the land behind your second campus." She set the phone down and glared at him. "I think pictures of what's buried there accompany this little video of you and your Cambodian client."

Hauser got to his feet. "I don't know what you're talking about. I have no idea what's buried out there, and I'll deny I ever knew. You don't decide when things are over, I do. That's the benefit of dual citizenship. I'll find another Third World dictatorship to park my laboratory in, and Angelus Genetics will keep going. Nothing's going to change. In fact, I think I'd prefer living in Paris or Stockholm, or perhaps somewhere in China."

He backed away from the table, looking at his friend Dina. "A facility in Cambodia could be open within six months, Madam Assistant." He snapped his fingers. "But, as a friend of the Prime Minister, I'd prefer we stay here. I'll simply have to consider my options."

She shifted on her feet.

"Now what about that helicopter, Dina? I'd like to leave. Now."

She put the phone back to her ear and stood for a moment, whispering. A few seconds later, she nodded and slipped the phone into her purse, looking at Camilla. "It is the wish of the Prime Minister that his very special friend, Dr. Hauser, be allowed to leave immediately." She turned to Hauser. "My car and driver are out front. You will be escorted to the airport, where the Prime Minister's helicopter will be standing by to take you to his private jet. You may take it anywhere in the world you wish to go."

"No!" Lanaya screamed. "He can't be allowed to just leave!"

"I'm sorry." Dina's face was firm, displaying no emotion. "Indonesia wishes no trouble, but my orders are that he be allowed to depart immediately."

Hauser smiled, lifting his chin. "The Prime Minister's private jet." He limped to the door. "I think a quick trip to Switzerland may be in order."

Lanaya turned to Camilla, tears in her eyes. "That's it? He gets to walk away?"

"What's buried out there isn't going to go away," Camilla said.

Hauser stopped, peering down his nose at her. "Of course it is. The fact is, Ms. Madison, aside from a few people in New York and Washington DC, nobody will care this audit ever happened. In a few years, most Americans won't remember what all the fuss was about. But." He wagged a finger at her. “Right now, millions of shareholders of Angelus Genetics have lost a lot of money—most are little people, who will feel it in their retirement accounts.” A smile stretched across his thin lips. “The Wall Street Journal has been begging for an interview. I think I’ll give them one—and I’ll make sure they know who caused all those people to lose so much money.” He turned, hobbling toward the exit. “Life has different lessons to teach us all. You learned that you are ineffective, and I learned that dual citizenship is worth several billion dollars.”

He chuckled as he passed through the door, not looking back. “Good evening.”

DESHEAR FOLLOWED DR. Hauser down the hallway and across the ornate lobby of the Viceroy hotel. He stood by a Christmas tree at the entrance as the vehicle for the Special Assistant to the Prime Minister rolled up. The young driver hopped out and opened the car door for his “very special” passenger. The old man entered the vehicle, the door shut, and the car drove slowly down the long driveway. The moonlight illuminated the pala trees there in a silvery glow, as the car turned left and disappeared down the main road.

DeShear stood inside the hotel doors, gritting his teeth.

It was no longer his battle. He’d done what he could, from protecting Lanaya to bringing down a killer. Angelus Genetics had suffered. The Greyhound was in custody.

But it was a hollow victory. He’d learned too much in the past few days to be satisfied with these results.

Across the lobby, The Greyhound sat in a chair under a large wreath, an attendant bandaging his bloody arm while two FBI agents looked on. One pointed to a set of handcuffs being held by a nearby Indonesian army officer. “Hey, shooter—these pretty bracelets go on your wrists when he’s finished wrapping your arm.”

The Greyhound said nothing, slumping forward in the chair, his head hanging.

Siren blaring, an ambulance sped to the front door and screeched to a stop. The agents put their hands under The Greyhound’s arms and pulled him to his feet. He winced in pain.

“Serves you right,” the agent said. “I heard they found another body upstairs, a big fat guy. And the manager went missing after he met with you.” He shoved The Greyhound forward toward the ambulance. “Is that more of your handiwork?”

“Nick,” the other agent said. “Take it easy.”

“No, screw this guy, Jake.”

Nick shoved The Greyhound again. He banged into the side of the ambulance, groaning and sliding downward. He turned and leaned his back on the vehicle, his eyes closed and his head sagging.

“Hey!” Jake jumped in front of Nick, blocking him from assaulting their prisoner again. “I said take it easy. We don’t get extra points for killing the—”

The Greyhound sprung up and raised his hands high over his head, crashing them down on the back of Jake’s neck. Swaying sideways, Jake slumped to the ground.

The other agent pulled his gun. The Greyhound swung his leg in a roundhouse kick, crashing it into the agent’s forearm and sending him sprawling onto the sidewalk.

From his vantage point in the lobby, DeShear bolted toward them. “Hey!” he shouted, raising his weapon. “The killer’s loose!”

A second kick from The Greyhound landed on the side of the agent’s head. Jake’s eyes rolled back and his body went limp. The Greyhound scooped up the agent’s gun and raced down the long driveway.

DeShear sprinted out the door after him, several agents and army soldiers following.

The Greyhound was fast, covering the driveway at an amazing speed. DeShear was barely able to keep up. At the tree line, The Greyhound darted across the main road and disappeared into the darkness of the jungle.

DeShear hit the main road at a full sprint, the jungle coming up fast. A small hole was visible in the bright moonlight—a running trail. Palm fronds and brush hung low over the dirt path. Ducking his head, DeShear thrust through the wet leaves, their long green fingers slapping at his face.

“DeShear!” the agent called behind him.

“I’m on him,” DeShear yelled over his shoulder. “Split up and see where these paths come out.”

He bounded over the dark path, unable to see beyond a few feet. His heart raced, knowing The Greyhound could be waiting for him anywhere ahead, but his gut said the killer intended to run—and running was DeShear’s game. He hurled himself down the trail, legs churning, heart pounding. The path turned and climbed, narrowing as outcrops of rocks extended from the sides. DeShear’s shoulder caught the edge of a stony outcrop, bouncing him away and nearly causing him to lose his balance. He stopped to right himself, gasping in the still night.

He held his breath until his lungs ached, listening to hear the fleeing killer somewhere ahead. Thumps and cracking branches reached his ears. The killer was still running.

Pulse pounding, DeShear lurched forward down the path. Ahead, the trees opened to a clearing. He slowed his pace. He’d be an easy target there, even for a wounded man. He couldn’t count on the killer getting tired or missing a shot.

DeShear crouched, gasping as he checked left and right. A smooth rock jutted out from the thick, wet jungle. Sweat dripped from his nose as he slid behind the rock, his eyes darting around the clearing.

He inhaled fast and hard, trying not to make much noise, then took a deep breath and held it.

No twig snaps or brush being swatted aside. The killer had stopped.

DeShear exhaled quietly, his heart thumping. Several trails met in the clearing, but a cloud had moved over the moon, making the view hazy.

Which trail had the killer taken?

A gunshot came from his left, its muzzle blast lighting the trees like lightning. Before he could react, the rock pinged next to him, ringing in his ear and covering him in grit. He threw himself to the wet jungle floor, his weapon next to his cheek, holding his breath and waiting.

Branches crashed together as the killer fled, racing down the trail. DeShear leaped to his feet and followed.

The path sloped downward now, twisting and turning, jarring his knees as the ground dropped in the dark. He crashed into rocks and trees that sprang up out of nowhere, slipping on a dirt trail that grew muddier with each passing minute. His face scratched and stinging, he raced onward, his anger and adrenaline fueling him.

The trail turned, moonlight illuminating his way. Ahead, a tall shadow darted past the trees.

I’m gaining on him.

DeShear growled and pumped his legs harder, limbs and vines whipping his cheeks as he sped down the path.

Trees loomed ahead again, and the trail went dark. He rushed forward, gun raised, ready for another ambush. As he crashed through the palm fronds, he looked for a place to take cover.

His feet went out from under him. The trail dropped downward, and he fell, face first, into the mud, sliding several feet until his shoulder slammed into a tree trunk.

DeShear rolled over, panting, gun drawn, ready to shoot anyone who appeared. The jungle was quiet. He put a hand out, found a rock to lean on, and got to his feet. Dripping with sweat and wincing from the pain, he scanned the underbrush.

The roar of water came through the dense jungle. Somewhere to his left, water surged through the brush, cutting its way through the dark hillside. It was loud and constant, a river or more—probably what the trail was originally designed for. Tourists, seeking a scenic trail to walk or run on, not a killing zone.

The noise of the surging water lessened his ability to hear the man he was following. His world just got a little more dangerous, but if it did for him, it did for the killer, too. He peeked over his shoulder. Any FBI agents or Indonesian soldiers following him wouldn't be able to hear verbal directions now, but that might be a good thing. Whatever they could hear, the killer could hear—potentially giving away DeShear's position and making him a target.

He leaned forward into the brush, pushing aside a large cluster of leaves. The path worked its way downward through the thinning foliage. A scenic trail would have water views if it was this close to the water, but that water sounded too fast and too loud to get close to.

He crept over the path, hunching down to be a smaller target if anyone was going to shoot.

Another gunshot pierced the night air. He heard it, and saw the reflected flash off the wet leaves near him. It missed, not even coming close, but it told him the direction of the killer—and that was all he needed.

He's shooting blindly. He doesn't know where I am.

DeShear could no longer hear footsteps or someone making their way through the brush. Not over the noise of the rushing water. But he could follow a shadow down a trail. Keeping low, he moved fast, using the moonlight as his guide while he could, and keeping the river on his left.

DeShear's heart pounded as he raced forward, calculating the killer's options. There were only two directions, and really only one. The killer couldn't very well come back toward him if he intended to get away; somewhere behind DeShear, FBI agents and Indonesian soldiers were coming. He couldn't go left; the river would drown anyone that tried to enter it. And he couldn't go right—up a wet jungle cliff in the dark? No chance.

The killer's only option was forward—downward, moving along the same path he'd chosen in the clearing. His only escape was to outrun them all, and bleeding from a gunshot wound, that was unlikely.

DeShear gritted his teeth and pushed another clump of leafy branches out of his way. The ground sloped downward more sharply, with a row of short, straight lines appearing through the dark.

Steps.

It was definitely a tourist trail, then. DeShear moved quickly over the wet steps, climbing down through the thick foliage. He looked ahead, trying to see through the brush. A shadow moved. DeShear stopped, holding his place and not trying to find cover. The incline was too steep, and any sudden movements might give him away.

He waited, gun drawn, watching the shadow.

It was longer now. Stretched out, and moving in a slow, awkward fashion.

Crawling.

Maybe he lost too much blood to continue his escape.

DeShear lowered his foot to the next step. It was shorter, and wetter, than the others. A smooth stone that had become wet and slippery in the growth of the jungle. The shadow kept crawling, so DeShear kept moving down the steps. One by one, he inched lower, never taking his eyes off The Greyhound. The steps were like ice, slick and wet. He'd easily fall if—

That's what happened to the killer. He fell, and he may have broken a leg, too. No way he'd stop running.

The hairs on the back of DeShear's neck stood on end. A cornered animal fights hardest. If The Greyhound had broken a leg, he'd shoot to kill for sure—if he still had the gun.

The roar of the water was louder now, impossibly loud for a river. It had to be one of the waterfalls—and a big one. In the darkness, it'd be hard to tell, but maybe the moon would show it. He crept down the last few steps, inching toward a flat, grassy area.

A faint white cloud swirled just past the edge of the clearing, a darker, more iridescent one churning below. The river was about thirty feet down a cliff, a wide, rushing beast, flowing out and off the edge of the world and down into the darkness.

At the edge, the shadow stood, a silhouette against the faint white cloud. He was tall and athletic, but slouching. DeShear stared at the figure, uncertain if the killer was looking at him or the rushing water below. A few feet away, the end of the earth beckoned. A cloud moved over the moon, but the vista was visible enough for DeShear to recognize it from pictures. Nungnung was hundreds of feet up, and recent rains had made it angry. Its dark water sped past, covering the visible distance in less than a second.

The shadow heaved its chest, its shoulders going up and down, just like DeShear's. He wiped the sweat from his brow. The runners' race was over. Only a victor needed to be decided.

The killer spoke, his words all but inaudible over the noise of the falls.

"What?" DeShear shouted, his gun trained at the man in front of him.

Limping along the edge of the cliff, The Greyhound raised his voice. "What now?"

Injured or not, DeShear kept his gun aimed at the stranger. He'd seen the act before, at the ambulance, and he had no intention of falling victim to it like the FBI agents had.

"Now we go back," DeShear yelled. "I take you in, and you go to prison."

The shadow shook his head, shouting. "You can't be on their side. You know what they've done. You've seen it for yourself."

DeShear saw no gun in the killer's hand, but that could be a trick. It could be in his belt, and it could be fired at any moment.

"I'm not on anybody's side," DeShear said, the roar of the waterfall eating his words.

"Killing me allows them to continue. You know that, and you know they have to be stopped. You want that as much as I do."

DeShear took a step backwards, keeping his gun aimed at the killer. The shadow was too close to the edge. One bad step could send him down the cliff and into the churning water below.

"You know I'm right," The Greyhound said. "You saw the graves. That's a part of your nightmare now, like it's been part of mine."

DeShear blinked sweat out of his eyes. "Let's go back to the hotel. Talk about it there. Plead your case to the press. Get some public sentiment."

The shadow shook his head. "I'm all busted up. Hauser took my arm." He took another step along the edge of the cliff. "Those steps did the rest. I can barely hold myself upright."

Strong guy, to be standing after all that.

"You won't shoot me," he said. "You can't. You see that I'm right."

"Let's not shoot each other. Deal?" The mist from the massive waterfall made the gun slippery. DeShear tightened his grip. "There are other ways."

"Like what, send them a sternly worded letter? I got a congressional inquiry, and they put the lead senator on their Board of Directors. They held all the cards until I started killing them. Your IRS trick sure isn't going to stop them. But my way works. It got their attention. And it will get other people's attention. This will make it stop. My way."

“That’s not for me to decide.”

“I didn’t say it was.” The Greyhound held his finger to his chest. “I made the decision. After all they did to me . . . it was mine to make.”

The two men stared at each other in the darkness, the roar of the waterfall filling the air.

DeShear lowered his gun. “Come with me.”

The Greyhound held his ground, unmoving, as clouds of mist floated up in the distance. Slowly, he nodded his head.

The clearing burst white with light, the crack of a large rifle blast booming through the night. The Greyhound jolted backwards.

DeShear dropped to the ground, turning in the direction of the gunshot. In the pale moonlight, soldiers from the Indonesian army came into view. Wading their way through the brush, they burst forward.

Twisting, The Greyhound’s arms grappling for vines and leaves as he arched backward. His fingertips flicked over a few branches, then he disappeared over the edge of the cliff.

DeShear sprinted forward, staring at the water below. It raced past, a dark and powerful force of energy, rushing over the edge of the cliff and crashing into the black water below. He stood there, his heart pounding. No one could live through that. But if anyone could, The Greyhound would.

If we don’t find the body, we might never know if he’s really dead.

The soldiers came closer, shouting and waving at him.

DeShear turned to the water, and jumped.

The icy cold of the river shocked his system, but only for a second. The water threw him forward and over the edge. His stomach climbed to his throat as he fell, a roller coaster without cars, plummeting forever into the darkness, then the terrible crash and churning of the water below. He kicked and rolled, his lungs aching, fighting to find the surface, depleting himself as he clawed the water crushing him.

It lasted forever, fighting the dark water, his exhaustion turning his arms and legs into heavy bricks, but at last his lungs found air. He strained to push himself upwards through the water, breaking the surface again and again to greedily suck bites of air with his last ounces of strength.

The water past the falls was calm, a drastic difference from the churning monster above. The current pushed him to the edge where the river turned, and the sandy bottom met his dragging feet. With aching arms and rubber legs, he inched onto the riverbank and collapsed.

He lay there on his back, gasping, the moon staring at him through the trees.

Beyond him, a twig snapped in the brush. He mustered the strength to turn his head, spotting the shadow of a tall, athletic man, a silhouette in the moonlight, lumbering through the brush. The shadow stopped, seeming to look at him.

DeShear swallowed hard, panting as he lay on the wet riverbank. He had no gun, and no strength. He would lose any fight right now, and maybe the stranger knew it. He stared at the man, and the man stared back at him.

Then the stranger turned and walked away.

THE SOLDIERS RADIOED for a Jeep, and within an hour, they'd found DeShear and gotten him back to the Viceroy hotel lobby. Lanaya wrapped him in towels and a robe, insisting a medic from the Indonesian army check him over while she asked a thousand questions. Camilla's team was scouting the grave site, sending pictures to her in the lobby—her makeshift command post—as she sat next to DeShear and guzzled coffee.

“Yes, it's possible he got away.” DeShear shrugged. “My guess is, he drowned.”

“The man you saw at the bottom of the falls,” Lanaya said. “You claim he walked away—but The Greyhound was limping.”

“Yeah.” DeShear nodded. “But he could have been faking at the top of the falls.” He pushed away the intern's hand and climbed off the couch. “Look, I don't know for sure. But I don't think he's a threat anymore.”

“Why?”

“Just my gut.” DeShear sighed. “He could have killed me in the jungle just by waiting around a corner and ambushing me. He had a gun, and I'd have never seen him until it was too late. He could have shot me at the top of the falls, too, in the clearing. The shots he fired when I was chasing him were to get me to stop following him. I think he missed on purpose. And if he really was the guy I saw walking away from the river, he could have dropped me right then and there. I was done, exhausted from fighting the river. I had nothing left, and it was obvious.” He shook his head, his eyes focused on the floor. “He had me several times, and never made a move. And I could have killed him, too, at the edge of the falls. I didn't shoot him. We both just . . . I think we decided not to shoot each other.”

“That's you.” Lanaya knitted her hands. “What about me?”

DeShear patted her shoulder. “If he didn't kill me, he won't kill you. We're connected, you and I. And I think he gets that.”

“Whatever goes over the falls is never seen again.” The Special Assistant to the Prime Minister crossed the lobby, approaching them. “I hope you are recovering well, Mr. DeShear.”

“Looks like he'll live,” Camilla said to her. “I wish I couldn't say that about your special friend, Dr. Hauser.”

Dina took a deep breath and let it out slowly. “It has been a long day for all of us, but as I said, Indonesia does not want trouble with our friends.” She looked at Camilla. “Your press is fond of calling my country a semi-dictatorship. Well, in a dictatorship, the news is what the government says it is. So if we say Dr. Hauser's plane exploded on takeoff, then it did. And if we say he was not taken to a warehouse and executed, then he was not.”

The small woman looked into the eyes of each of the three shocked faces in front of her. “Someone once said, ‘Sometimes you simply have to do what needs to be done—and often the best choice is clear, but unpleasant.’ I agree. Have a nice trip home.” She strolled past the large Christmas tree in the lobby. “You may make it back in time to do some last-minute Christmas shopping.”

Camilla stared at her long after she had gone from view, a hint of a smile on her lips. “I don't need to go Christmas shopping. I think I just got everything on my wish list.”

Lanaya turned to DeShear. “What about you, Hamilton? Are you ready to go back home to sunny Florida?”

He groaned. "I am, but I'm not sure what I'll be going home to. My apartment burned with all my belongings."

"Well," Camilla said. "When Hauser's people were trying to make it look like you and your client torched your place, they paid your insurance premium first. It was probably to keep investigators focused on you two for the arson rap, but Harriman says Lanaya's flight schedule checked out and so did your alibi—so you'll be able to collect. I have a feeling that it'll all track back to Angelus, and I don't think they're going to fight that claim very hard. Their best bet will be to write a big check—if they have any money left after all this." She picked up her coffee cup. "And like Dina said, there are still a few shopping days before Christmas." Camilla crossed the lobby to the coffee machine, stopping to talk with her agents there.

"Wow," DeShear said. "Maybe I'll go on my Bahamas fishing cruise after all."

"Well, I will certainly be looking forward to getting home." Lanaya rocked back and forth, smiling. "It's been quite a while since I kissed my babies good night, and I do have some Christmas shopping left to do!"

DeShear sat up, toweling off his damp hair. "Next time you want to go on an adventure, schedule it a little sooner. I'm bad enough at buying presents as it is."

"I couldn't." The smile disappeared from her lips. "You were sick."

"Huh?" DeShear cocked his head. "What do you mean?"

Lanaya's hands dropped to her lap, one massaging the other again. "I'm afraid there's one last thing I need to tell you. I've been meaning to, but there was never a good time. This isn't either, I suppose, but . . ." She swallowed hard, glancing over her shoulders. "You remember when I told you about The Greyhound—about the Gammas, the genetic group he was part of. There are others." She lowered her voice. "You, for example."

"Me." DeShear sat frozen, the implications reverberating through his head.

"You were sick the week before I called on you. The flu, you said, but . . . it wasn't. We checked. And you are the right age."

His jaw dropped. "The sequence? But I'm fine—I just ran a marathon through the Indonesian jungle." A nervous laugh escaped his lips.

She lowered her eyes. "I think, in a few more days, that will very likely change." Taking his hand, Lanaya's voice fell to a whisper. "I'm sorry, Hamilton. Your records came to us like a lot of others. You weren't adopted. That was a cover story. You were born at the Arizona facility, as part of the program."

He looked at her, his mind racing, but the overwhelming pall of truth seeped through her words and settled in his gut.

I'm one of the Gammas.

Lanaya was many things, but not a liar. Not about something like this.

His heart sank. "So, uh . . . in a few days, I'll start in with all the symptoms." Her words came back to him about the months of suffering the others had gone through, and the slow death that followed. "I just—I spend the next year of my life in pain at a hospital, until . . . I die?"

Hearing himself say it out loud, when it wasn't about someone else, was strange. As a cop and a private detective, he'd delivered bad news to people before, but this was different. It seemed like a bad joke, but without a punch line—and no one was laughing.

"So, no cruise, I'm afraid." Tears welled in Lanaya's eyes. "You'll be ill for ten months or so." Her voice broke as she spoke. "But—but Dr. Carrera says their latest tests have shown remarkable results." She wiped away a tear, forcing a smile. "One in five survived before, and with proper treatment, and the new meds, there could be great improvements. After what I've seen these past few days, you strike me as a fighter. You'll not only beat it, you'll lead the charge."

He swallowed hard, his eyes focused on the floor, empty inside. Learning of your own imminent death had a way of drowning out everything else.

"I'm sorry I deceived you, Hamilton, but working together has helped us connect with the very people who can help you." She sniffled. "They think there's a good chance you'll be fine."

"It's . . . not exactly the kind of news anyone wants to hear." He sat back, letting it sink in. He was part of the group, yes, but the drugs were available to possibly cure it now. If something like this had to come along, there were worse ways for it to happen.

And he'd learned from his friend, Harriman, how to fight such an illness. He'd been there for Mark; Mark would be there for him now, too.

He looked at Lanaya. "I . . . kinda wondered what made me so highly recommended."

"My self-appointed duty these past few years has been to seek out people like you. To make up for my role at Angelus. It was another deception I had to maintain until now. I'm very sorry."

He pushed himself to his feet and went to the window. The hotel lights illuminated the edges of the jungle. Palm trees swayed in the hot breeze. Beyond them, only darkness.

"Ten months." He glanced over his shoulder at her. "You skipping out on me until then?"

"Not in the least." Lanaya sat upright. "In fact, I have small children. I thought perhaps it would do them well to see what a real-life hero looks like, close up. Regular visits, perhaps. If you'd like."

"Lanaya and her kids." Deshear shook his head, a smile crossing his lips. "Well, if the illness doesn't kill me, that might."

"My dear Hamilton." She went to him, wrapping her arms around his muscular torso and squeezing him tight. "I have many friends. None but you have ever saved my life. In the end, it's life that matters. I owe you."

He sighed. "Okay, but no more deceptions. We're linked, you and I. Partners tell the truth to each other."

"Okay," Lanaya whispered, holding him. "I promise I won't lie to you anymore."

"Thank you."

"Unless it's absolutely necessary." She released him from her hug. "And in ten months, when you're all better, I'll have some more work for you."

"Ten months." He rubbed his chin. "You know, if there are other Gammas, there'll be other Greyhounds. Followers. Extremists."

"Indeed. And we shall need someone on our side to lead the charge."

DeShear nodded. "Yes, you will. Then let's talk in ten months. You have my number." He smiled at her. "And I'll be around."

THE END

• • • •

Hamilton DeShear returns in

Rogue Elements

The Gamma Sequence Book 2

CLICK HERE to buy Rogue Elements.

• • • •

KEEP READING FOR THE next book in Fractured

• • • •

Get on the list to find out about new titles, bargains, giveaways and more!

AUTHOR DAN ALATORRE'S READERS CLUB

INTERNATIONAL BESTSELLING author DAN ALATORRE has published more than 30 titles in over a dozen languages. His unique writing style can make you scream, chuckle or shed tears—sometimes on the same page. Regardless of genre, his novels always contain unexpected twists and turns, and his brilliant characters will stay with you forever.

Readers agree, making his string of #1 bestsellers popular across the globe.

You'll find heart stopping chills in the medical thriller series The Gamma Sequence, action-adventure in the sci-fi mystery The Navigators, a gripping roller coaster ride in the paranormal mystery A Place Of Shadows, an atypical comedy-romance story in the very sexy The Italian Assistant, spine-tingling chills in the short story horror anthology series Dark Passages, and much more. In addition to being a bestselling author, Dan has achieved President's Circle with two different Fortune 500 companies.

SUZANNE JENKINS: SLOW DANCING

---

SLOW DANCING
BY SUZANNE JENKINS

Author's Rating:

Language: ** Sexuality: ** Violence: ****

For your convenience each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

Slow Dancing. Copyright © 2014 by Suzanne Jenkins.

All rights reserved.

Created in digital format in the United States of America. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission of the author except in the case of brief quotations in blog posts and articles and in reviews.

Slow Dancing is complete and total work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are the products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously.

After midnight, a mysterious stranger appears at the edge of the woods and the peaceful life fifteen-year-old Ellen Fisher has with her beloved stepfather Frank is turned upside down. Small town gossip, jealousy and murder strive to tear them apart in a tale of secrets and unrequited love.

FIFTEEN-YEAR-OLD ELLEN MacPherson sat on a wooden step off the porch of her house in Seymour, Alabama. It was getting late, after eleven, her stepfather Frank watching the news in the living room just behind her. The smell of beer wafted out of the screen door while he listened for the weather report, familiar and comforting voices echoing out onto the porch. The light from the TV cast a blue glow through the window, competing with the yellow lamplight from the street. Their front lawn stretched to the river's edge, the smooth, green expanse broken by a thread of dirt road. She waited for Frank to shut the lights off in the house so she could watch the fireflies, the light from the moon revealing the disturbance in the water as the bugs hit its surface. When she first saw the pings make concentric circles on the smooth sheet of the river, she thought they were fish coming up for air, but Frank said it was the bugs.

"Watch careful," he said. "You'll see the bugs hit the water, and the rings travel away from where it hit." She did as he said, and sure enough, the bugs came in for a drink. The circles drifted out from the center, stronger at first until they faded away, back into the smooth surface of the river.

She heard the TV switch off. "I guess I'm goin' to bed, Ellen. Don't stay up too late." She turned around to look at him standing in the door behind her, just as he glanced over at the woods, concerned leaving her, but wanting to show her he understood she was growing up and needed time alone.

"I won't Frank. Night," she replied. He turned the lights off in the house but left the one over the kitchen stove on so she could see her way back in the house when she was ready. With the dim, yellow light coming from the streetlamp, the black outline of the trees to the right of their property came into focus. The neat lawn stopped at the woods; tall oak and pine trees with little underbrush. Sunlight didn't penetrate deeply enough to support undergrowth, and the trees grew so tightly packed together that it was difficult to walk through. Ellen had lived next to the woods as long as she could remember and she knew what was on the other side, downriver.

The thread of the road ended in front of her house, at the woods. Every so often, a car would come down the road and stop at the woods. The driver would look around confused, put the car into reverse, back up onto their lawn, and drive off again. Rarely, someone would come up to the door and ask for directions, but neither Frank nor Ellen knew much about the area beyond the village, even after living there all of their lives, so they were of no help. They went to town to buy food, Ellen to school, and Frank to his garage. That was about it.

When Margaret was alive, they drove to Hallowsbrook to visit her, in the town of Beauregard. Ellen normally didn't want to think about Hallowsbrook, built on the same river she was looking at now in front of their house, ten miles downriver. But when she got melancholy, she liked to remember what it was like to get ready on visiting day.

Frank would wake her up earlier than usual on Saturday, the one day they had to sleep in. He'd have her breakfast made, and it was always something special; pancakes or corn muffins or scrambled eggs with cheese and biscuits. She'd walk into the kitchen, and Frank would be dressed with his suspenders on, his white shirt draped over the back of the chair. The ironing board would be down from the wall where it was stored in its own recessed cabinet. Standing at the ironing board, he'd be ironing one of her pretty dresses; something with a full skirt. They dressed as if they were going to a party when they visited Margaret. He always asked Ellen the same thing.

"You ready for this, sister?" and she'd nod her head and say the same thing she always said.

“Ready as I’ll ever be.”

Since she was just a little child she’d say the same thing, and Frank laughed. It was the way they’d get through the ordeal. Frank tried to do everything he could to soften it for her; the breakfast, the pretty clothes, shopping when they left the hospital, even a movie if she wanted it. But more often than not they’d be so exhausted, Ellen would reach over the seat from the back and tap Frank on the shoulder.

“I guess I want to go home,” she’d say, and he’d nod and look at her in the rearview mirror.

“Me, too. I reckon we both had enough adventure for one day.”

Finally, in March right before Ellen turned fifteen, Margaret died suddenly. It was a relief. Although in the weeks preceding her death Margaret appeared to be getting better, it must have been just a smokescreen. Several months after she was admitted, she ceased acknowledging them half the time, and eventually they stopped trying to engage her.

“We visit just so the nurses know she’s cared about,” Frank said. “They’ll know once a month someone will come to see she’s okay. That’s why we gotta mix up the times, not let ‘em anticipate it.”

They’d walk into her room and look at her skin and her hands, make sure her nails were nice and her hair was clean. She was well taken care of; they didn’t need to worry after all, but still were untrusting. They’d sit with her in silence until someone brought her lunch. She’d feed herself, which hit home to Ellen. If she can feed herself, why won’t she look at me? She asked Frank about it.

“Margaret’s a lunatic, sister. Don’t take it personal if you can help it. She checked out long ago. We kept ‘er home as long as we could, but it ain’t fair to you when she got bad and started wanderin’ off.”

Ellen looked out the window as they drove. It wasn’t so terrible, having a mother locked up, out of town. Not many people in the village who knew the real details about it; that Margaret got sick shortly after she and Frank were married and the mechanic had his hands full taking care of her and her toddler, and those that did know never spoke of it to their faces.

Gossips embellished the story with cruel lies about Margaret, that she was a kleptomaniac or worse. Word got back to the family that people in town said Frank was a better parent than Margaret ever could be, but when Ellen was old enough to understand, she didn’t think that was fair. How’d they know? She could feel that way, but didn’t want others to say it. She and Frank made a pact that they’d never speak ill of Margaret to others. To each other, anything was fair game. But if someone would dare to say anything untoward, they planned to look to the ground and sniff, like tears were near the surface. It worked every time.

After a few months of responding in this way, no one inquired after Margaret again. “It’ll make ‘em too sad if you ask,” people around town whispered. It was as if she had died long before it really happened.

Ellen, brooding, so out of character, had teenaged angst. She tried to reason it away, but couldn’t. Her mother dying might have had a little bit to do with it, but she disregarded the idea.

There isn’t much to look forward to, she thought. Her school friends got summer jobs in Beauregard; waitress jobs and babysitting jobs. Finally, she asked Frank if he’d let her come work at the garage.

“I can answer the phone,” she said. “Check people in. I’m gettin’ too old for a babysitter, and Mrs. Edwards is gettin’ too old to babysit.” He chuckled while he rubbed his chin, thinking. It made sense letting her come into town. He didn’t want her alone all day; the thought frightening him.

“Just for the summer, now, not during school. You got to do good in school so you can go to college,” he said.

“What’ll you do if I leave for college?” Ellen asked. The thought of leaving him alone frightened her more than going away.

“I reckon the same thing I’ve been doing all along. Goin’ to work and waitin’ fer you.” They laughed out loud. Then seriously, he frowned. “You keep gettin’ good grades, sister. You’re a smart girl. No point in hanging around this place jus’ cause you grew up here.”

“You stayed! What good did college do you?” she asked. He went to college for four years so he could take over his father’s auto garage.

“If I’d gone away, I’d never met you and Margaret. So you need to go to college, regardless.”

“Not too far, though,” she said. “I want to come home each night, like I was workin’ a job in the next town.”

“We’ll see about it,” Frank answered.

By the middle of June, the routine was set. She got up with Frank as usual, but instead of sitting with him while he had his coffee, she had a cup, too. He’d put her bicycle into the back of his truck so she could leave a little earlier to start dinner each day, and they would drive off to town together. Ellen loved being in the garage right from the start. It smelled like clean oil and cigar smoke.

“How’s oil smell clean?” her best friend, Marisa Dalton asked.

“You can tell it’s from the earth,” she replied.

“But the earth isn’t clean,” Marisa would argue. “You need to come with me to Dairy Bar. I made six dollars in tips Sunday afternoon.” But Ellen didn’t want to be away from Frank; spending the day at the garage with him had always felt right to her. Since she was little, walking home from school and waiting for him at the garage was something she looked forward to.

The oil smell and the bubble gumball machine Frank polished up each week and refilled with colorful, shiny gumballs were memories from the childhoods of the children whose parents brought their cars in for repair. The garage was in the center of town, on the same side of the street as the auto supply store and Miss Logan’s Beauty Parlor and across the street from the post office, the grocery store and the café. Frank set up a low table and chairs with coloring books and crayons for the children to use while they waited, a fresh box every week. At the end of the week, he dumped the broken bits of crayon into a big metal can bolts originally came in and although a few children liked using the new crayons, most children preferred the nubs, sifting through the big can to choose just the right color. Frank papered the window facing the beauty parlor with the most recent works of coloring book art. Women getting their hair done inside would brag about their child’s page of coloring book drawings.

“That’s my Wendy’s elephant in Frank’s window today!” Whenever Frank had time, he’d box up the drawings left behind and drop them off at the local nursing home, to distribute among the residents.

For the adult customers, instead of the typical row of uncomfortable chairs with ripped vinyl seats like other garages had, he set up a bigger table and chairs, and an electric coffee pot. In the center of the table, a neat pile of current magazines he picked up at Family-Owned waited for customers to look through. Every hour he faithfully made a fresh pot of coffee. When Ellen came to work, she asked him if he’d like her to make the coffee.

“No, no, that’s all right, I’ll keep doin’ it,” he answered. “When school starts again and you leave, I’ll forget and the coffee will get thick and black and smell up the place.” She knew what he meant. Once, when she was thirteen, she got her hair cut at Miss Logan’s and the first thing she noticed when she went into the beauty parlor, above the rank ammonia smell of the hair dye and the chemicals women used to put permanent curls in their hair, was the odor of old coffee. She thought it was odd that her mechanic father kept his coffee pot shining clean and used good coffee and real cream, a little half pint carton set in a bowl of ice. Yet in a beauty shop with a bunch of women, they'd have horrible powdered junk to lighten coffee often left over from the day before. Customers coming into the garage remarked that they patronized Frank's Garage because it was so clean and Frank made the best coffee in town.

Frank put a stool behind the counter for Ellen. He never needed one because he didn't have time to sit down. He'd finish with a car and walk behind the counter to write the bill, and then after the customer paid he went back out into the garage to work on the next car. Now that Ellen was there, he'd walk into the office and write the bill, but give it over to Ellen who'd take the payment while Frank lotioned his hands up. "When you go back to school, my hands are gonna miss this care," he said, teasing.

While she waited for customers to come in, Ellen read. She always brought a book with her and when she finished whatever little tasks Frank found for her to do that day; sorting nuts and bolts into their proper bins, or transcribing sales receipts into a ledger, she took her book and went back to the counter to read. Sometimes he'd have her come into the garage, which was her favorite place, and she'd do inventory of the belts and parts and other items necessary to keep an auto repair garage in business. At four each day, he'd come into the office and say the same thing. "You about ready to call it a day, sister?" She'd hop down from the stool.

"Okay, I guess it's time," she'd answer. He'd watch her put her helmet on, buckling the strap snugly under her chin, and he'd resist the temptation to check it for safety.

"Be careful, now, you hear? Walk your bike across First Street, and stay up on the sidewalk as far as you can." Ellen smiled, didn't get ornery or defensive the way some kids got when their parents fussed. She knew he was just worried about her. "And please call when you git home." She never forgot to call; the moment she unlocked the door and went into the house, she reached for the phone. If he couldn't get to the phone, she'd holler into the answering machine so that her voice echoed throughout the garage.

"I'm home, Frank!" He'd grin at the car he was working on and when he got a chance always called back.

They'd have stayed in this mode of mutual love and respect forever, if it hadn't been for that one summer night when she couldn't sleep. After the lights went off in the house, and she saw that he'd left the light on above the stove for her, she put her head down on her knees and swept a little sand that had accumulated on the step into a pile. Meditatively, she swirled the pile into a design, first this way and then that, until she was almost mesmerized, sure she could go to sleep as soon as she could get the gumption to go inside for the night. When she started to lift her head, she knew.

The hair on her arms rose up, and the goose bumps appeared on her skin; someone was there. She could feel the difference in the way the air was coming off the water. Too afraid to move, to turn her head to look, she waited until her heart slowed down from the racing pace to which it had climbed, her throat dry, closing up so that screaming for Frank wasn't an option. She got the courage to slowly turn her head while keeping it down on her knees, and that's when she saw him. He was on the edge of the woods, just at the bank of the river. Having crept out of the woods, or along the bank, she could clearly see the outline of a tall, lanky man, watching her in the moonlight. His was a black silhouette, but the moonlight shone on his head as a beam of light.

With speed and precision, she leapt up from the porch and opened the screen, slamming the big door shut and locked it while she yelled for her stepfather, her voice trembling. "Frank!" There in seconds, dressed in t-shirt and sweatpants, handgun in his right hand, he grasped her arm.

“There’s someone out there,” she breathed. He went to the door and looked out the four by six inch window at eye level, automatically looking to the wood line, but seeing nothing.

“No one’s there now,” he said. “No one I can see. Man or woman?”

“Man, I’m pretty sure it was a man. He was right at the river edge, right by the big pine.”

A tall pine tree towered over the rest, its roots in the soft embankment of the river so the weight of the tree was slowly pulling it over, but it was still the tallest tree.

“Stand back, stay inside,” he said, gently pulling her around behind him as he unlocked the door and opened it.

Stepping out on the porch, he looked close to the house before scanning the wood line and the riverbank, but nothing popped out. “It looks like the coward retreated into the trees.” He turned to her.

“You okay?” She nodded. “It’s a darn shame a person can’t sit on their own porch after dark.” He came inside and locked up the door again. “No need to be frightened now. I’ll see to the windows and doors if you want to go back to your room.”

She nodded her head. Tonight, they’d sleep with the doors to their rooms open. He called out for her, asking permission to come into her room to check the window, low and facing the front of the house.

“Just as a precaution, tonight I’m gonna pull your dresser in front of this window,” he said.

“Okay,” she answered, watching him work. Slowly, the fear the interloper instilled in her was fading; she was safe in her own house and her stepfather wouldn’t allow anyone to harm her.

THE NEXT MORNING, FRANK called the postmistress, Jessie. "I have a big favor to ask, to one as busy as yourself," he said, chuckling.

"Go fer it, Frankie," Jessie answered. "I ain't got all day."

"Can you write a note that I'll be in at nine-thirty today and tape it to my door? I got a small job that I got to attend to here before I come into town." She agreed to it, to tape a hand-lettered sign in her neat penmanship.

Frank be late today. Not exactly what he had asked for, but close enough, and people in town knew what it meant.

He was standing at the stove frying potatoes when Ellen came out. "Sorry about last night, Frank," she said. "Think my imagination must be gettin' the best of me."

"No, no. You did the right thing. Intuition saved many a life, I reckon." She went to the coffee pot and poured two cups. "I'm going out to look at the river's edge after breakfast."

"What about the garage?" she asked.

"Jessie' gonna put a note up," he answered. "This is more important for now." They ate in silence, the possibility that someone meant to do Ellen harm foremost in Frank's mind. He wasn't sure what she thought, and didn't want to alarm her. When they were finished, he adjusted the holster attached to his belt and stood up to put their dishes in the sink.

"I'll get those, Frank," she said.

"No, I will. It's my job to do the morning dishes." He was a creature of habit, but more, didn't want Ellen to think her lot in life was to wash up after a man, even her stepfather. "I'll take care of it when I come back in."

"I'm going with you," she said.

He paused for a moment, doubtful at first but then seeing the wisdom in it. It might be good for her to go, to see exactly where the man stood. It was dry last night, so footprints in the sand should be visible. They walked out the door together, pausing at the house to survey the formal garden that surrounded it; beautiful roses, peonies and perennials that bloomed throughout the summer months and into the autumn, annuals they planted together, and an herb garden; herbs like sage, said to protect the people who lived within. Ellen bent over to pull sheep sorrel out of the herb bed.

"A vicious, invasive weed, delicious sautéed in olive oil," Frank said, all traces of his Alabama accent gone. Ellen laughed out loud.

"Yes!" They walked to the wood line, the edge of the forest that bordered their property. It was never a scary place; as a child she'd set up her little tent there with friends each summer, a perfect, quiet place away from the adults to play Barbie. Now, not so sure, she didn't think she'd feel safe out after dark ever again.

"I wish we could put up a fence," she said, shaking her head.

"Haft' to be awful high though," he said. "Haft' to have barbed wire on top. When it gets that bad here, we best move away."

"This is it," she said when they reached the area. "I think this is where he stood."

They were careful not to step off the lawn, because clearly, right under the big pine, a line of large footprints were visible in the sand, the edge just beginning to be lapped up by the water as the gentle tide came in. It looked like whoever it was had walked along the water's edge, to avoid the forest.

“Where did he come from?”

“I’m going to call the sheriff before we do anything else,” Frank said.

He wanted to follow the footprints, to discover their origin. He looked up across the river at the opposing bank. It was desolate across the river, directly in front of their place; there were more cottages upriver, less down. The woods were thicker on the other side, the current was swift, and there was no dock or place to tie up unless the boater used a tree. He doubted whoever it was came from across the way, but crept along the river’s edge from the same side.

“You go on now, find something to do. I don’t want my conversation upsettin’ you,” he said when they got to the house.

She smiled at him, but didn’t argue. It was making her queasy, the thought that her imagination wasn’t playing tricks. A stranger possibly wanting to do her harm had taken the trouble to make his way along the desolate coastline to spy on her.

“Okay,” she said. “I’ll go read awhile.” He nodded at her and waited until she was out of sight to call the sheriff. Well known in the county as a reliable and trustworthy auto mechanic, Frank did the work the county needed on many of their patrol cars. So when he called with a dilemma, they took him seriously. It was the first time he’d needed to call in years, since Margaret disappeared into the woods one day ten years ago.

• • • •

THE THREE OF THEM, five-year-old Ellen included, were in the yard puttering, watering the roses and pulling weeds. When Frank stood up, Ellen was beside him but Margaret was gone, the hose with the precious water still running left on the ground. He looked in the house and then taking Ellen by the hand, walked to the river’s edge, just in case. It didn’t look like she’d gone for a dip, so they proceeded to the woods. Holding Ellen’s hand, they walked as far as they could into the forest, until the trees grew so close together he couldn’t get between them.

“Okay, I guess she’s not in here,” he said, smiling down at Ellen, not wanting to scare her. “Let’s git’ back to the house and make a few calls. Maybe she went to see her friend, Mary.”

“Momma doesn’t like Mary,” Ellen said, frowning. This was news to Frank.

“No? Why’d you say that?”

“She said Mary got the cooties,” Ellen said, obviously repeating what she’d heard Margaret say.

Frank turned away, frowning. Margaret’s use of the word cootie to her five-year-old daughter transcended inappropriateness in spite of its truthfulness; he tended to agree with his wife.

“Oh, well maybe momma didn’t feel good when she said it,” Frank explained making an excuse for her. He was going to call Mary regardless. He reached out for Ellen’s hand. “Come on, sister, let’s get inside.”

Then, on second thought, he reached down and scooped her up. She yelped with glee. When they got inside the house, he put her down.

“Run along now, darlin’, go on and play for a while.”

She did as she was told and ran off to her room. He picked up the kitchen phone and dialed the sheriff’s office.

“Boyd here,” Boyd Dalton said when he answered the phone.

“It’s Frank McPherson, Boyd. I gotta slight problem here,” he said. “Margaret done took off again, but this time she did it right under our nose. I turned my back for a second and she was gone.”

“Okay, I’ll come out,” Boyd replied. They said good-bye and hung up. Frank walked to the back of the house to the bedrooms to get Ellen. It was a tiny house, cottage style.

Frank's father built it after the war, and when he died, Frank left the apartment above the garage and moved back to his childhood home. Two months later, he met Margaret and her baby daughter, Ellen.

MARGARET FISHER'S CAR, a vintage Buick, broke down as she was driving from Saint Augustine to Galveston. She just made it into the village limits when it started to spit, the engine sputtering for seconds until it died. She looked in her review mirror as it came to a rolling stop. Ellen was just two years old, in her little car seat, smiling and shaking a toy at her mother.

"Momma, go!" she said leaning forward.

"Nope, can't do it. The car is broken, sweetheart. We have to stop here, unfortunately." She looked around the dusty street and saw the line of storefronts, the gas station and the post office, and across the street, the blue painted cement block building with a neon sign out front spelling Frank's Garage. "Thank God, there's a garage." She got out of the car and opened the back door, reaching in to unbuckle her toddler from the car seat.

"Walk!" Ellen hollered squirming to get down. On the sidewalk, Margaret put her daughter down.

"You have to hold my hand, honey," she said, gripping her child's hand, the terror of a dream she'd had the previous night in which unseen forces, still vivid in her memory, took the baby from her. Ellen didn't fight her, staying close by. Locking the car, Margaret wasn't sure what sort of town this was, whether she and her belongings were safe or not.

Looking around the area, Margaret saw an old-fashioned place, quaint almost; a throw back to another time with a café in the center of town and a small, family-owned grocery store crowded with locals, the sign out front; Family-Owned Grocery Store. She chuckled, first noting the women chatting with each other on the sidewalk and then, more sobering, groups of motley looking men sitting along a wooden bench near the entrance. They were waiting to assist shoppers as they packed their cars. She decided if she lived there, she could never shop for food at a place that hired such intimidating help, not knowing the men were indigents the storeowners allowed to work for tips. When she reached Frank's, a customer was just leaving and he held the door for her to enter, smiling at her. Frank was still behind the counter.

"Help you?" he asked.

"My car just broke down, luckily, practically right outside of your door." She pointed to the car across the street, and Frank came around to the front of the counter to look out the window.

"Let's take a look," he said. Just then, Ellen looked up at him and with her free hand, grabbed his.

"Dada," she said. Margaret burst out laughing. Frank stopped in his tracks and looked down at the little girl, clearly moved.

"Oh, sorry! Pay no attention. She's at the age where every man is daddy," Margaret said, chuckling. And then under her breath, "I'm not married to her father."

A raise of her eyebrows and a grin said it all. She wasn't married to anyone. Frank, not used to being flirted with and ignorant of the ways of women, took the little girl's hand, sure his face was red.

"This yers?" he said, nodding his head toward the car and she said yes. "Better stay up on the sidewalk now." Gently withdrawing his hand from Ellen's and giving it to Margaret, he reached over and popped the hood. He looked it over, but couldn't see anything obvious.

"Why not go get something to drink at the café and I'll pull it into the shop to take a closer look."

She agreed and walked away from him after giving her car keys over. She made sure she walked with just a hint of wiggle, and turned slightly to see if he was watching her. But he was already on the phone, calling Paul's Auto Supply asking for help to push the Buick into the shop. Margaret wasn't used to being ignored; she got plenty of attention from men, so his disinterest fired something within her that would help keep her in the small town for longer than she expected, Galveston put on hold. She would call Alan and let him know there had been a delay. She was going to be stuck in Seymour for a day or two.

She still wasn't sure how she happened to get there; it was far off the path she was taking, a wrong turn in Mobile probably. "Come on, sweetheart, let's get some breakfast," she said to Ellen, who was tired and ready for a nap.

Margaret picked Ellen up and with her head on Margaret's shoulder, fell asleep quickly. No doubt tired from the previous night, after pulling over to the side of the road when she'd realized she was lost, they slept in the car with doors locked. In the morning, she drove to a gas station to use the ladies room and get a wash up.

Now she had no idea where she was, exhausted with a broken down car. But Margaret never got disheartened. It was her nature to look to at the bright side of everything. When she sat down, the sleeping Ellen slid down to her lap, Margaret cradling her with an arm while she drank coffee and ate eggs and toast. She'd ordered an egg sandwich for Ellen to eat when she woke up. The waitress, a young woman named Mary, was a talker.

"You just get into town?" she asked.

When Margaret explained what happened with the car, the woman launched into Frank's history, he was a bachelor all the single women in town had eyes for, but he wasn't interested. No one said out loud that he might be a homosexual, although some of the women wondered secretly.

"In high school, he dated the same girl till he left for college." Margaret frowned; where she came from it was inappropriate to guess about someone's sexuality. Either you were, or you weren't. Maybe, hopefully, he wasn't.

"He's got his own little place down by the river, a real gem of a piece of property, and he owns that building the garage is in. You see how he looks; we women around these parts wait all summer for Frank to take his shirt off and work in his t-shirt. It raises the temperature a few degrees, let me tell you." Margaret looked out the window, across the street to the garage. The door opened to the bay and she could see the back of her car but not the activity.

"How old is he?" Margaret asked Mary, now more than curious.

"He graduated high school the year I started. So he must be about thirty," she said, sideling up to Margaret. "Don't you think he's dreamy?"

"I haven't given it much thought," Margaret said, thinking about nothing else but the handsome business owner with his own house on the river. "What's the rent like in town?" She finished breakfast just as Ellen stirred.

"Not bad. You lookin' to stay?" Mary said, interested. Margaret shrugged her shoulders, not willing to reveal anything about her history or motives to a stranger, not even knowing herself what the next hour would bring.

"Let's find a ladies room, okay sweetheart?" Mary pointed to the back of the café. Margaret and Ellen walked between the tables, diners curious about her, the men glancing up at her face after taking in her figure and she didn't miss their interest.

While in the bathroom, she dug out her wallet from her purse and counted cash. She had exactly fifteen hundred dollars. It was her savings from her secretary job, enough to get her and Ellen to Galveston and have a little nest egg in case it didn't work out with Alan, or if he didn't have money for her after all and she needed to move on or get back to Saint Augustine. Now this darn car thing; hopefully it wouldn't cost too much to fix. She looked in the mirror and reapplied her lipstick, then washed up Ellen's hands and face.

"Let's go sweetheart. Let's see if that car of ours is going to get us out of town today." They left the restaurant waving to a disappointed Mary, and crossed the street. She walked through the bay door of the garage and saw Frank standing over the engine compartment with a tool in his hand.

"Hi," he said. "It's gonna to take me longer than today to fix this. You gotta place to stay tonight?" She shook her head.

"No. I don't even know where I am. We got lost back at the river." He nodded his head. People were known to take a wrong turn in Mobile, ending up in town as a result.

"Mary over at the café rents out rooms in her house. You want I call her for you?"

"No, that's okay. I'll go back and ask her myself. We were just talking, her and me," Margaret said.

"Come back in an hour. I should have a better idea how long it's gonna take by then." She nodded at him, finally catching his eye. He'd looked at her beautiful face and huge blue eyes, auburn hair tumbling over her shoulders. She saw the admiration in his eyes and smiled back, giving him the approval he needed to keep looking.

"Okay, bye for now," she said.

Ellen waved. "Bye bye, dada."

Frank chuckled and waved to her. "Good bye."

Margaret walked back across the street to the café. It was past breakfast and the space had cleared out. Mary was wiping down a table when she looked up as Margaret came back, and couldn't help but smile.

"Frank tells me you might rent a room for the night. Looks like my old car is going to take longer than we thought to repair."

"Yes! I'm the only place to lay your head in Seymour. I have a crib, too," she said, suppressing her excitement that Margaret and Ellen were going to stay. Reaching into her pocket, she pulled out a key and a card with an address on it. "That's my only key, so hold tight to it. Go on over now if you want. You both look tired. Your room is right off the living room. The one with the crib. You can freshen up and have a rest. It's right down that street, to the left." She pointed to the street next to the beauty parlor. Five oh five First."

"Thank you so much," Margaret said.

The thought of a cool place to sit with her child was heavenly. Taking the card, they left the café again and proceeded down the street. It occurred to her that Mary was pretty dumb to hand a house key over to a stranger. What if she was a burglar? The lock was stubborn, but she got it open, and the cool air inside rushed out at them. When they went inside the house, she understood why she'd hand over a key; it really was a rooming house with no personal objects around or anything of value that could be stolen. It made Margaret feel better for some reason. It appeared Mary didn't have much more than she did.

"House?" Ellen asked, and Margaret confirmed it. "House."

"Let's walk back to the garage and get our suitcase," Margaret said. Frank was standing in front of the auto parts store talking to the owner Paul, when he saw her walking towards him, the sight of her rendering him speechless for a moment.

"I need my suitcase," she said demurely, looking up into his eyes.

"Suitcase," Ellen repeated. They laughed, walking back to the garage. Frank opened the trunk of her car so she could get a bag out, and feeling its weight, offer to carry it back to Mary's for her.

They didn't talk as they walked side by side, Margaret carrying Ellen on her hip. But if they had admitted what they were thinking they'd have been surprised that it was similar thoughts. Margaret imagined the kind of couple they made; people would take notice. Frank thought of the empty cottage he'd recently moved to, filled with a ready-made family. They arrived at Mary's but he didn't linger explaining he had to get back because he'd left the shop open. It was that kind of town; you could leave your business wide open and it would be safe.

The rest of the day Margaret and Ellen spent dozing, playing, and chatting. At three, Mary came home with a bag of sandwiches for their dinner. A door at the back of the living room led to her personal apartment, and Margaret was happy to see that Mary's space wasn't quite so Spartan after all.

"I'll charge you seven dollars a day. No food allowed in the rooms because of bugs, but you can have space in the kitchen. You can use my washer and dryer 'cause of the little one. Does that sound like a deal?" She was willing to let them stay with her free of charge if it would mean having Margaret close by. Margaret nodded and smiled; it was more than fair.

"What do I owe you for dinner?" Margaret asked.

"It's on the house," Mary said. "I can bring home food from the café from time to time if there are leftovers that won't keep for the next day. If you're going to be here for a few days, I'll bring something home each afternoon if you want me to, should save you on your food bill."

"Okay, thank you." She didn't think it would take longer than the next day to fix her car, but it was better to have something lined up, just in case. A knock at the door brought Mary to her feet; she rarely had guests but when it rained, it poured. Surprisingly, it was Frank.

"Hey there, Frankie," Mary said. Frank grimaced at the use of the name, but good naturedly, as Mary stepped aside to let him pass by.

"Can I talk to Margaret?" Mary waved him on.

"Follow me; we're back in the kitchen." His eyes visibly brightened up when he saw Margaret and Ellen. Ellen was standing at a chair running the bowl of a spoon back and forth, like it was a car. He chuckled, the sight of the little girl making him happy for some reason.

"She likes cars, eh?" he asked.

"I didn't bring enough toys for her, obviously," Margaret said.

"Your car should be ready tomorrow afternoon. Sorry it's takin' me so long to get a part. I have to wait for delivery tomorrow."

"I get it," she said. "It's no problem at all."

"Have a seat, Frankie," Mary said. "Have dinner with us. Just leftovers from the café."

"Okay, it sounds better than what I was gonna have, that's for sure." The women waited for him to tell them what it was. "A can of Pork and Beans."

"Ew!" They cried in unison, laughing. "You'd better eat with us." They chatted until the sun came around to the other side of the house, taking turns holding Ellen, sharing stories. Margaret asked questions, getting the others to talk about themselves.

"It's about time for this young lady to go to bed," Margaret said, reaching for Ellen who was rubbing her eyes. "If you'll excuse me?" Frank stood up and nodded at her. Mary was excited that she had Frank McPherson in her house, but it looked like he was going to go now that Margaret was going to her room.

"I'd better get back to the garage and lock up," he said. "If there's anything left to protect." He was teasing, of course, the whole town in the habit of leaving things open, trusting, helping. It was just the nature of things. "Thanks for the coffee and sandwich, Mary." She followed him to the door.

“You don’t need to leave,” she whispered, giving a last effort to engage him. But he wasn’t interested. She thought for a moment that there was a glimmer of something, but it must have been for Margaret’s benefit. He smiled down at her.

“I’d better get goin’, Mary, but thanks. And thanks for taking her in for the night.” He was a nice guy, just not interested in her. She locked the door after him. It was early; she’d fix her hair and go out for the evening, hopeful she’d find someone who was interested.

THE NEXT DAY, THE PART needed to repair Margaret's car didn't arrive at Paul's as expected. It was coming from Dallas, so he couldn't hop in his car and fetch it as he could if it were coming from Mobile. Frank walked over to Mary's house and knocked on the door. This time, Margaret answered. She was still in her nightgown, and without meaning to, against his will, looking at her aroused him. The gown was of a soft, gauzy fabric, virginal and feminine. The way the fabric swirled around her curves, his imagination took flight. He looked away.

"I'm so sorry," he said. "The part I need didn't arrive as we expected it would. Won't be here now until Monday. Don't blame you none if you're angry." She looked down at her hands. A weekend here in this village with kind Mary and handsome Frank wasn't such a bad thing.

"Have coffee with me," she said. "I'll be fine right here at Mary's place." He looked at his watch.

"I'm supposed to open up at nine. I'll make a call." He went to Mary's phone, a yellow Princess model with a rotary dial hanging from the wall. He dialed the number of the post office.

"Jessie," he said when she answered. "Can you do me a favor and put a note on my door that the garage will open today at nine-thirty?" She agreed to do it, so Frank could have coffee with his new friend.

"So yesterday I talked all afternoon about myself. Now you tell me about you," he said, smiling.

Margaret was a good storyteller. "There's not much to tell," she lied. "I work in an office back in Florida. But I needed a break, so we're headed to Texas to see a friend. It won't kill me if I alter my plans a little."

"We're you born in Florida?"

"Yes, Saint Augustine. The only family I have is an aunt and my brother Peter who is in an asylum there."

"Oh, I'm sorry," Frank said. He was curious why, but too courteous to ask. She didn't mind telling, though.

"He's mentally ill. Doesn't speak or communicate at all. Can't take care of himself. It's really rather sad. I'm glad my child is okay. There's nothing shy about Ellen!"

"No, there sure isn't," Frank agreed. "Was your brother always sickly?" Margaret hesitated, grateful.

"I never looked at it like he was sick. But yes, he was always mentally ill. From the time he was a little one, he would hide from our momma, or refuse to eat, or steal. He was devious." Frank didn't think any of those things sounded that unusual, especially for a boy, but didn't offer his opinion.

"Sorry to hear it," he replied. "Must be difficult on the family." She nodded her head.

"We coped," she said. "My momma tried it all; beatings, makin' him sit in the corner, any punishment you can think of, and finally one day she just gave up." Frank didn't want to upset Margaret, so he changed the topic.

"Since it looks like you're going to be around this weekend, do you want to go to a movie?" She brightened up at the suggestion, Peter forgotten.

"Oh yes, I'd love it!" and then crestfallen, "But what about Ellen?" He paused and then had an idea.

"We'll go to a drive-in and then she can come with us."

"Okay, that's even better," she said. So their first date was set.

"I'd better get back to the garage." He dug through his pocket and came up with a business card. It had a cartoon of a man with a blue uniform on, smiling and saluting. At your service! Handing it to her, he told her to call him if she needed anything. He averted his eyes, not wanting to gaze on her in her nightgown again. She was as unselfconscious as could be.

The day went by quickly for Frank. He had another complicated repair in addition to Margaret's Buick, which sat forlorn, waiting. He was secretly happy the part didn't show up in the morning deliveries. Back at Mary's house, Margaret used the Princess phone and left a message for Alan; her car had broken down and she'd be delayed until next week.

She and Ellen were getting cabin fever, so they left in search of a park, finding a nice, grassy area in the center of town, with swings and a duck pond. At lunchtime, they walked to the café, and Mary took her break as soon as the lunch crowd left. She was genuinely happy for Margaret when she told her about the drive-in movie date.

"Having a child really changes the way you spend your social time, I guess," Mary said. Margaret nodded her head. It surely did.

"But I wouldn't change anything about my life," Margaret said. "I love being a mother, and she is the sweetest little girl." Mary wanted to ask about Ellen's father. She already could tell Margaret was secretive, holding her personal information close.

"What's Ellen's daddy like?" she asked.

"Alan's okay," Margaret answered, but was reluctant to elaborate and Mary didn't press her. She'd learn what she wanted to know in time.

After lunch, Margaret and Ellen went back to Mary's house for naptime. When her shift was over at the café, Mary returned home with a bag of food containers. They were having roast turkey for dinner, compliments of the village café. Mary put the food away then tiptoed to Margaret and Ellen's door just as Margaret let out a blood-curdling scream. Opening the door right away, Mary saw her in the throes of what appeared to be a nightmare, while Ellen was snoring softly in the crib, unfazed. Mary went right to the bed, crawling in next to her and put her hands gently on Margaret's shoulders to shake her.

"Margaret, wake up!" Her eyelids flickered slightly, and finally opened as Mary embraced her.

"I'm awake," she said, getting up on one elbow, face flushed and eyes shining. "Thank you. I don't have anyone to wake me up and they have to run their course like dreams do." Mary nodded her head. She knew the disadvantages to living alone, and suffering through nightmares was definitely one of them. "I'm okay now."

"I really like you, Margaret. I don't want you to leave Seymour," Mary said. Margaret smiled at her.

"That's really nice to hear. I don't have any girlfriends where I come from. Not a one. I wonder why that is?" Mary chuckled.

"I bet I know why," she said. "They're jealous of you." Margaret shook her head.

"Aren't nothing to be jealous of. I got nothing, except Ellen." She looked over at the sleeping form in the crib.

"Where's her dad?" Mary asked softly. She was feeling the pain of being alone with a small child.

"Alan's gone. Never was involved. You know the story I'm sure. I listened to lies and got caught. I was just glad my folks was dead. They'd 've been so angry with me and I don't want that anger around my little girl."

"And you got the girl, that's a big dividend." The women nodded their heads, both looking over at the crib. Ellen was worth it. Mary hugged Margaret, and they held each other, lying in bed side by side. Mary smelled Margaret's hair; it reminded her of the outdoors, cool breezes and grass. Margaret nestled her head in the crook of Mary's neck, kissing her there.

"Thank you for caring for us," she said, sighing. "I feel safe here."

"I'm glad for it," Mary replied. "It's nice havin' you and the little one here." She pulled back from Margaret and smiled.

"Well, you hungry? We're having roast turkey with the fixins' for dinner. If you'd like, I'll invite Frank."

"You sure you don't mind?" Margaret asked, sensitive to what his interest in her might mean to Mary.

"Naw, he's not interested in me. I'm glad he's found someone, if you're the one." She got up and went to the phone in the kitchen, dialing the garage number by heart. Frank was grateful for the invitation.

"I have to go home and get cleaned up and then I'll be back," he said. They'd have dinner together and then go to the drive-in.

The couple enjoyed the movie, sitting across the bench seats with little Ellen in the middle. Around nine, she fell asleep with her head next to Margaret. When the movie was over, Frank drove to a drive-in restaurant on the other side of town for a snack. They drank milkshakes and talked until midnight. Margaret stifled a yawn.

"I better think about heading back to Mary's," she said. "Ellen doesn't know the meaning of sleeping in yet."

"Okay, I guess you're right," Frank said, leaning over to turn the key in the starter. "Thanks for goin' with me tonight. I guess it's the first movie I've been to in a long while."

"You're welcome," she replied. "I never go myself. No one to go with before Ellen and certainly no one to go with since." She looked over at Frank, and he was looking at her intently.

"How'd you feel about takin' on another man's child? If it ain't too early to talk of it." She'd slipped into her old, comfortable way of talking about half way through the movie. City Margaret segued to country girl Margaret.

"I think it would be mighty fine," he answered. "I like her very much, seems she's fond of me, too." They laughed out loud. "And it definitely is not too early to be talkin' about such things. At my age, I'm not wastin' time playin' games."

"You don't know anything about me," she said. "And I don't know your age."

"I'm thirty-one," he said. "I reckon you're not older than twenty or twenty-two." Margaret turned her head. She was over thirty-five, but she wasn't letting on.

"You're close," she said, smiling. "I don't like to talk about my age. Is that a problem for you?" He quickly shook his head.

"You could be any age and I won't care," he answered. "So I guess I'll take you back to Mary's now. Does this mean you'll be sticking around? Or do I have to drag out the car repairs for a little longer?"

"I'll be staying here, I guess," she said, smiling. "I like it here." He smiled back at her and pulled out of the parking space. When they got to Mary's, he carried Ellen into the house and helped Margaret get her ready for bed and into the crib.

"I'll talk to you tomorrow," he said, bending over to kiss her on the cheek. She put her arms around his shoulders and hugged him, letting her body cover the length of his.

"Thank you, Frank," she whispered. "Thank you so much."

AFTER ELLEN AND FRANK discovered the footprints in the sand, the sheriff didn't waste any time getting to the McPherson place. He and his deputy looked around and decided to call a forensic team to make impressions of the footprints, just in case.

"Don't want to regret that we didn't do this if the person shows up again."

Frank grimaced, frowning at Boyd. "Please, keep yer voice down," he said under his breath, nodding toward Ellen who was standing at the counter making a fresh pot of coffee. She perked right up.

"So you're thinkin' there's a chance he'll come back," she said, frightened. She'd stopped pouring water into the coffee maker, concerned, looking at Frank and Boyd. Frank had an I warned you look on his face, and he let Boyd answer.

"Oh no, no, no, that's not what I meant. He might be peeping on other families in the area, that's all. Best we have casts of his footprints in case he does it someplace else, then we'll have something to compare it to." That explanation seemed to satisfy her and she went back to measuring water.

Once the casts were made and the sheriff and his deputy and the forensic workers left, Ellen and Frank decided that no good would come to them if they hung around all day, stewing. "Let's go to town," Ellen said. "You got work to do and I could use a change of scene." Bypassing the bike, she would ride home with Frank for today.

When they arrived at the garage, Mary was waiting for them. "You two goofing off today?" Frank shook his head.

"We had an intruder on the land last night," he said as he unlocked the door for Ellen. There was no reason to hide it, he decided. The more people who knew, the better.

"Oh my! That sounds so foreboding. Did you have the sheriff out?" He nodded his head.

"Just now. There's nothin' they can do, of course. But we wanted it on record, just in case." He nodded his head over toward Ellen and made a "shush" sound. Mary caught on and nodded in return, following him into the office. Ellen was frowning, watching the two of them, concerned Frank might succumb to Mary's flirtation now that Margaret was dead. But she needn't have worried. He'd never look at another woman again after Margaret, and it was certainly too soon to even consider it, her being gone just a few months. Especially not Mary.

But in spite of Frank discouraging her, Mary had never given up flirting and coming on to him steadily since Margaret was committed. The day Margaret disappeared ten years ago, when five-year-old Ellen revealed that Margaret said Mary had cooties, the sheriff came out right away that day, too. They took a picture of Margaret; the most recent one Frank had and went back to town to file a missing person's report. With Margaret's history and all, they didn't want to waste any time. By now, Frank knew a lot more about her, knew it was Margaret who was mentally ill, who spent time in a mental hospital, and not the fictitious brother, Peter. Margaret, who just happened by in a car with a burned out motor, on her way from Saint Augustine to only she knew where with a toddler, would steal Frank's heart.

The positive part was that she functioned at a very responsible rate most of the time. For the three years they were together, Frank learned the warning signs when life was getting to be too much for her, and if he was swift to take action on her behalf, nothing bad ever happened. She learned to trust him, to tell him if she needed an outing or some fun or more of his attention, and usually if he gave her what she said she needed, she'd be fine. On the rare occasion, when all of those things failed to comfort her, thirty days in Hallowsbrook with intense psychotherapy and drugs were somewhat beneficial until she was discharged, good as new for a brief time.

At first, during those thirty day bouts, Mary would watch little Ellen for Frank in the afternoon when she got off her shift at the cafe. She offered to keep the child overnight, but he wanted her home with him, and she wanted to be home. One day however, Ellen overheard Mary whispering to someone on the phone, using the words, something not right between stepfather and stepdaughter, and little Ellen repeated it to her stepfather as soon as she could.

Frank refused all Mary's offers of help after that, the implication was so seedy, so disgusting. Bringing the child to work with him, Frank and little Ellen became a novelty in town. When it was too hot to bring her into the garage, he fielded trouble calls from home, going in together only if someone needed a repair. He got the office air conditioned during this period, while they waited for Margaret to come home.

Within days during the last disappearance, police found Margaret sleeping behind a vacant store downriver. They notified Frank and he drove as fast as he could to the police department to identify her, but it was too late. A judge was committing Margaret to Hallowsbrook permanently. The courts told Frank when he attempted to fight the decision that he was putting himself in jeopardy of losing Ellen if he fought it, that Margaret had proven to be an unfit parent. So the trade off was leaving his wife in a mental institution to keep her child. He never told anyone what he was forced to do.

"How is he going to raise a girl child alone?" Mary said to a customer in the café one day, as they watched Frank arrive at the garage, little Ellen riding his back like a chimpanzee baby while he carried baskets of toys and pink items, transforming the garage office into a Toyland.

The office door was kept locked now, the room utilized as a giant playroom, and customers were expected to enter through the garage door. During the summer, a teenaged neighbor became Frank's helper. Mary, put out, complained to anyone who would listen. Soon, everyone in the village knew that Mary was angry with Frank. If they don't need my help, to hell with them. But she continued to haunt Frank, coming into the garage after having had too much to drink in the afternoon, trying to kiss him, or worse.

The weekly trips to Hallowsbrook started soon after, with Margaret lucid and pleasant at first. But the longer she stayed, the crazier she became. "It's the drugs they're giving her," Boyd said. But the drugs were keeping her alive. She'd become paranoid, then suicidal and it was taking more and more psychotropics to keep her stable. Frank and Ellen made fewer and fewer visits as Margaret got worse; decreasing to the monthly checkups until those last weeks before she died when she seemed to be getting better.

Mary continued to visit Margaret weekly, trying to mollify Frank, and it helped, he softened toward her again in spite of the gossip she'd started, until she showed up at the riverside cottage one night.

"Mary, you know this would never work," he said. But she was determined, wrapping her arms around his neck, nuzzling his neck with her lips, and going straight for his crotch.

"Please, I need you Frank, and I can feel you want me," she said, discovering he was aroused, but he shoved her hand away seconds after she tried touching him.

"Mary, my wife is still alive, and my child is right inside the house. This would never work," he repeated.

The final blow came by telephone call in the early morning hours; Margaret had died of unknown causes. Boyd hinted that Frank should take legal action against Hallowsbrook since they couldn't determine the exact cause of death, stating natural causes on the death certificate in spite of the coroner hinting at suicide with a vague substance overdose as the source when he added possibly self-inflicted.

“What the hell does that mean?” Boyd asked. “Frank, you need to take a stand.” Faye Baker, the ADA wouldn’t even talk about opening an investigation unless the family was in agreement.

“Her death certificate says natural causes,” Frank said. He didn’t need another hobby, following the course of a lawsuit. And it wouldn’t be fair to Ellen, who agreed secretly with her father that Margaret was at peace at last no matter how she died. Rarely talking openly before, they continued skirting the issue. The pain was simply too intense for Ellen.

After Margaret’s hospitalization when Ellen was five, she ceased to be a parent. All Ellen needed was Frank who provided for her, protected her, guided her. He was a real parent. She may have called him Frank to his face, but he was dad to everyone else. “My dad” or “my father.” Frank had the purest intentions of any human being she’d known. He was incapable of being negative, at least in her presence. “Don’t even ask my dad’s opinion,” she’d say. “He’ll only look at the bright side.” When Margaret died, it was a relief.

“Now don’t be surprised if you still mourn,” Frank said.

Ellen knew all that, but once she allowed herself to feel the sadness, she realized it was sadness that her mother was incapable of being a mother to her, her illness making her the most self-absorbed, selfish person imaginable. She even attempted to counsel Margaret.

“Mother, perhaps if you tried to focus on somethin’ else, somethin’ other than yourself, you’d feel better.”

But of course, Margaret wasn’t able to do so; she’d looked at how everything related to her and how it made her feel for so long that it was all she was capable of. Ellen’s challenge made her retreat further into herself, at least when her family was around. Ellen confessed how she felt to Frank, and it was during the visit Frank told Ellen Margaret had always been insane allowing the word to be spoken out loud for the first time. He wouldn’t say more than that at first, but slowly over the three months since she’d died, he opened up to his stepdaughter about what his life had been like, falling in love with a lunatic.

ALAN JOHNSON SOLD CARS in Saint Augustine, the number one used car salesman four years in a row. Corporate even took notice. Summoned to Galveston to head up the sales team there, “I’m gonna teach those Texans a thing or two about the way we do it here in Florida,” he said, bragging. Margaret looked the other way to hide her smirk; she was so sick and tired of Alan’s boasting about promotions and raises, advances and at-a-boys, yet she never saw evidence of it. She worked fulltime in a secretarial pool, paid her own bills, loaned him money with promises that he’d pay her back, and then she got pregnant. It was a shock; she’d been sexually active for years, never took a precaution, and never got pregnant. What was different now? She thought the difference was that, confronted with the possibility to finally be free of Alan, she’d be bound to him for eternity.

Trying to break up with him was impossible. He just wouldn’t be alienated. They’d started dating a year before; he was very attractive at first, tall and built, jet-black hair that he confessed he dyed to hide a shock of white across the front, like a skunk. “It’s a birthmark,” he said. “My mother has the same thing.”

His cocky attitude was barely tolerable and until the incessant bragging began that never seemed to result in anything real, Margaret thought she could deal with him. She never saw a paycheck, wasn’t even sure he really worked. They didn’t live together because she wisely resisted it, refusing to have him over for even a night. Within a month’s time Margaret also made the decision she would not introduce him to her friends; they would hate him and she didn’t want to be put in a position of being his defender.

When he was about to leave for Texas, her period didn’t come. She didn’t tell Alan; not sure it would have made much difference anyway, and she didn’t feel any obligation to him. After he left, the long phone calls began, saying he was getting a place for them in Galveston that he’d send for her as soon as he got settled, but he never did and he never sent her a dime. The money she’d lent him became an icon; the phrase life would be easier when Alan repaid her peppered her inner dialogue, conversations she had with herself when the fear of caring for a newborn overwhelmed her. She’d given Alan most of her savings and now the possibility that she would lose her job loomed large. Looking the other way as the pregnancy progressed; her boss did what he could for Margaret. It was after the delivery that would be the problem because her company didn’t make allowances for maternity leave; it was not mandatory in the state. Faced with losing her apartment just as she needed to care for another human being, her solution was to downsize and move from a two bedroom to a studio apartment. Chances were good she’d never entertain a man again, certainly not overnight.

For the next eight months, she saved every cent she could and sold anything of value she had, including her television and radio. Only her bed, table and chair in the kitchen and a rocking chair in the living room remained, and her car, a used Buick LeSabre with seventy-thousand miles on it. But soon, the place filled up again as friends brought by their cast-offs. Her coworkers gave her a baby shower and she received everything she needed to care for a newborn.

Nine months went quickly. Mildly nauseated at dinner the night she went into labor, she forced herself to eat soup and crackers, just in case. Hearing about women who went without eating for days while they were in prolonged labor, Margaret didn’t have any extra weight in reserve. At bedtime, she brought a cup of tea, a package of cookies and a book into bed and the last time she looked at the clock, it was well after midnight. At about two, she woke up with a stomachache. She went into the bathroom to brush her teeth deciding she'd get ready to leave and if it was a false alarm, at least she'd be prepared for the day. But it wasn't false, it was the real thing. By three, she was keeping track of the contractions, leaving for the hospital before they got so bad she'd be unable to drive.

The car park was a block away, but her suitcase was small so it wasn't bad walking to the emergency entrance. When a wave of the contraction came, she stopped and put her hands on her knees breathing through it. Just as she got to the ER reception desk, her membranes ruptured, sending a flood of amniotic fluid cascading down her legs. She leaned on the desk and looked down at the puddle she was standing in. "Lovely."

Ellen Marie Fisher was born the next day at two in the afternoon. Labor wasn't that bad after all, Margaret decided. Once the barbaric part of it was over, the evacuation of anything left in her body, the sewing up of parts too small for the stretching they'd require, it was sweet, lying on the delivery table with all eyes upon her as she held her newborn daughter for the very first time. Nursing Ellen was not an option for Margaret. She wanted her body back as soon as possible; wanted her life back. When twenty-four hours were up, she was ready to leave. Lying to the nursing staff, she said a friend was picking her up, and when they wheeled her out to the front entrance in a wheelchair, insisted she'd wait alone. When she was sure it was safe, she walked the distance with a newborn and a suitcase to her parked car and drove home.

Getting used to mothering was easy for Margaret. Ellen was a built-in friend, a little companion, guaranteed to amuse and entertain. Wherever Margaret went, Ellen went with her. When she was two weeks old, Margaret started taking her to work, the thought of leaving her with a sitter too frightening.

"Now don't make a peep," Margaret told her.

Walking into the office with the infant in a little plastic chair, she stashed Ellen under the desk with her diaper bag, picking right up where she left off before the birth. During breaks, the baby came out of hiding and got her bottle and diaper change. By Friday, her boss came up to her desk with a smirk on his face.

"So, I hear we have a new employee. Can you introduce us?" Margaret pushed her chair back and reached down for Ellen who had both fists up to her mouth.

"It's almost lunchtime," Margaret explained. Her boss scratched his head.

"I'm afraid of setting precedence," he said. "And I'm sure not every baby would be as quiet as this one."

Margaret was terrified he was going to tell her to leave. She imagined the scenario; cleaning out her desk, walking out to a car that very well wouldn't start, having to take the bus to the welfare office, paying for formula with food stamps.

"Please don't make me leave," she pleaded.

"No, no, I'm not going to. But I need to figure out something else. It's not fair to; what's her name?"

"Ellen."

"It's not fair to Ellen to have to spend the day in the dark under a desk, like a leprechaun. We can do better than that. Give me the weekend to think about it."

The following Monday, Margaret was directed to take Ellen to a room down the hall from the office. A nursery with one other child was in place, waiting for Ellen. It was as ideal as it could be while it lasted. Before Ellen's second birthday, the company was sold and Margaret was terminated along with many of her co-workers.

Desperation set in. The only thing she could do was ask Alan one more time to pay her the money he owed her; over ten thousand dollars.

“Come here to Galveston and I’ll see to it you get your money,” he said.

Although the few friends who knew she’d been with Alan figured he was the father, most of them didn’t know Ellen’s paternity, but they’d encouraged Margaret to file for child support from whoever it was. Doing so would alert him that he had a child and he might insist on sharing custody. The idea that he’d be entitled to taking Ellen terrified her.

While she still had a little money and her unemployment about ready to expire, Margaret made the tough decision to go to Galveston and confront Alan. He didn’t need to know Ellen was his; she was small enough to pass for an eighteen month old.

“How can I be sure you’ll keep your word?” she asked him. “It’s a long way there. I’ll be using the last of my cash.” She didn’t add, “Thanks to you.”

“I’m crushed that you have so little trust in me. What did I do to deserve it? I thought I took good care of you while I was there.” The allusion was sexual in its undertone and the hair on her arms lifted in gooseflesh. Had she really been that needy to succumb to him?

“Whatever, Alan. All I know is that you asked me for a loan which I freely gave, trusting you completely when you said it would be repaid. I’m unemployed, broke and desperate. Maybe you could send me money to get there.” He was silent on the other end of the line.

“I guess I could do that; send you a little something.”

“If you did, I might be able to trust you again,” she said.

“Send me your bank account info and I’ll make a deposit,” he said, suddenly hopeful. But she was on to him.

“I had to close my account,” she lied. “Just send a money order. I can get that cashed anywhere.”

“Oh, okay,” he said, trying but failing at hiding his disappointment.

But the money order never came and before she had to pay her rent again, she loaded up the car, buckled Ellen in her seat and headed west. She didn’t put a lot of thought into what she was going to do once she got to Galveston. But thankfully, she never had to worry again. Frank took care of all of their needs.

• • • •

AFTER THE DATE, THE leftover-café-turkey-dinner, drive-in movie date, Frank and Margaret knew they would be together. He dropped her off at Mary’s house, and before they walked up to the door together, the sleeping Ellen on his shoulder, he asked her to marry him.

“I know it’s ridiculous, asking this fast. But pretty much what you see with me is what you’re gonna get. How long do we have to wait to make it seem less ridiculous?”

Margaret laughed. “We don’t have to wait at all, if you don’t want to. But maybe we should, just for Ellen’s sake. Don’t want her growing up with people talking about her folks getting married the week after they met.”

“Okay, how about a month? Will you marry me in a month? Your car should be fixed by then, at least,” Frank said, teasing.

“Yes, Frank. A month sounds very nice. Let’s get married in a month. I wonder if Mary will let us stay here for a whole month.”

“I don’t see why not,” Frank said. He didn’t want to warn Margaret not to tell Mary too much of her business. It might appear he was worried about her knowing too much of his business. He decided a little information might be a good thing. “You probably figured it out that Mary is the town crier.” He looked over at her, the corners of her mouth turning down.

“I wondered. Thanks for the heads up.” She reached for Ellen. “Thank you for tonight. It was very nice getting out.” She stood on her toes and kissed him gently on the lips. It startled him for a second. He’d been anxious, worried about the right time to hold her hand, the best time for a kiss.

His lips were soft and dry, and she could feel the bristles of his whiskers, long past five-o’clock shadow. After they said goodnight he fell to thinking about her lips, how soft and warm they were. Her breath was nice, too; chocolaty from the milkshake. He didn’t allow himself to think more because they’d be married in one month if everything fell into place. Dreaming, she would come to the little house and share his bed and the little girl would grow up in the bedroom across the hall from their room. He’d drive into Beauregard to get new bedding; shopping in the village was out of the question; the raised eyebrows and comments infuriating. It was none of their business.

The next afternoon, he closed up and drove his pickup truck north. The traffic was nerve-wracking in the city. He found the department store he wanted; the same one his mother and grandmother had shopped. Without wasting time, he chose a new mattress and box springs. A saleslady helped him pick out new sheets and bedspread. It wasn’t frilly, but it wasn’t something he’d have thought of.

He arranged for the new mattress to be delivered; he didn’t want to be seen driving through town with it in the back of his pickup. They would haul the old away, too. He wanted to call Margaret, but having to speak to Mary first put him off. He might as well drive over there before he headed for home. Mary greeted him at the door.

“Come on in, Frank. We’re just talking about dinner.” He put his hand up.

“Nope, I won’t impose upon you for a meal again. Next time, it’s my treat. If I’d been thinkin’ clear, I’d of brought something with me.” Margaret came to the door with Ellen in her arms.

“Hi, Frank,” she said, smiling, with just enough smoothness to her voice that Mary took notice, but didn’t say anything. It was clear she hadn’t heard the news. “Can we have dinner together tonight?” Without thinking, and especially without thinking about Mary, he nodded.

“Come home with me, tonight. I want to show you my garden, anyway.” It was a lame excuse, but it served in front of Mary.

“Frank’s ma had a green thumb,” Mary said refusing to be excluded. “You’ll see. Margaret told me she likes to garden, Frank. You’re in luck!” Mary had a smirk on her face; they weren’t kidding her with their secrets. He smiled, ignoring her.

“Get the baby’s things,” he said to Margaret.

Ellen put her arms out to him and Frank took her, and unabashedly kissed her cheek. Mary turned away; sad it was a stranger’s kid he was kissing and not hers. Hers or theirs. Another fantasy, squashed. Oh well. Maybe just temporarily.

“I’ll be home early,” Margaret said, smiling sweetly at Mary.

Maybe. With Ellen in one arm, Frank opened the screen door and stepped aside for Margaret to move out first. He glanced over his shoulder and smiled at Mary.

“Next time, dinner’s on me,” he said.

Mary smiled back, but in her head the chant Fuck off, Frank, circulated through her brain until she was seething. She didn’t respond, keeping her head down, closing the door as soon as he was outside on the porch. The motor of his car starting up, pulling away from the curb brought a fresh torrent of a combination of jealousy and sadness.

It was a contradiction; Margaret was a fun companion, smart and easy to talk to, and her little girl was so sweet. Having them in the house brought her renewed joy that living alone for so long had depleted. Frank’s interest in Margaret was a nice twist. It wasn’t Frank that made her angry. It was the combination of the two she took exception to. Why Margaret? Anyone else in town she'd have dealt with, but she wanted Margaret as her friend, or more, and Frank was screwing it up.

During the afternoon, they'd shared confidences, Margaret on the cusp of confessing the story of Ellen's paternity, just the mention again of the man named Alan. Frank's surprise visit ruined it. "Oh what the hell," she said, going to her apartment. She'd get dressed for the evening and take a ride into Beauregard. She wasn't sleeping alone tonight.

Ellen sat in between Frank and Margaret, chattering while the adults drove in silence. Margaret looked around the area, the sandy road leaving the village, entering a rural area where a few hardier souls lived. Houses were set back from the road, driveways obscured by trees. "Is your place isolated like this?" she asked. Frank shook his head.

"We're in the middle of a wide open space. My father built the house by his-self. It's in a valley the big river runs through. You'll see. The trees come right up to my land, but they was never part of it. 'Cleared natural,' my father said. 'Just waitin' for a house.'"

The sandy road wound through the pine forest for a mile to big clearing.

"This yours?" Margaret asked. Ellen tried to sit up to look but her seatbelt and little chair held her down.

"Up!" she demanded.

When Frank pulled into the driveway, Margaret unfastened her seat belt and the child stood up with her hands on the dashboard.

"My house," she screamed. Margaret looked at Frank.

"What's this all about?"

"We was talkin' about a house," he replied. "She just picked up on it. Smart little girl."

He put the gearshift in park and as natural as if he was taking his coat with him from the front seat, the little girl leaped into his arms. He met Margaret in front of the truck and put his free arm around her shoulders as they walked down the path from the barn to the cottage.

"What a great place," she said, smiling. "I'll be happy to live here." Frank looked down at her.

"That right? That's a relief. It's nothin' much. You might change ye'r mind when we get inside."

"I don't think so." She let him have a very small glimpse of what her prior life had been like.

"In my last place, I slept on a mattress on the floor. Anythin' is an upgrade from that."

"What happened?" Frank took his arm off her shoulder and dug in his pocket for the key.

"I was tryin' to save money in case I lost my job when Ellen was born. Whatever I could sell went out the door. My friends came to my rescue, but it was still a bare bones existence."

He felt awful hearing her story, deciding right then he'd make their life much better than it was.

"We can buy whatever you want for the house," he said. "If I can afford it, it's yours."

But as it turned out, she was content to let things stay as they were. His mother's furniture was just fine, comfortable, old pieces of overstuffed sensibility. She'd spend the rest of her days there with Frank sitting on a chair that had belonged to his mother, with her feet on a small stool covered in his mother's handiwork.

Ellen transferred her needs to Frank within days after the wedding.

"Dada," she'd yell from her bedroom. He'd get up out of bed and open her door to find her standing in the crib with her arms out.

"It might be time for a big-girl bed," he'd say.

"No, no big-girl bed." Ellen stayed in the crib until she was four.

"It's not right," Margaret said. "We should force her." Frank frowned.

"If you think it's important, I guess we could try it."

“Don’t you? It’s not seemly that a grown child should sleep in a crib.

“Maggie, she’s only four. She feels safe in it, so I say if you’re all right with it, let ‘er be.”

Margaret looked at her daughter, how tall and lanky she was for a four-year-old, her vocabulary incredible. Why’d she still need to sleep in a crib?

“Do you want to try your big-girl bed tonight?” she asked.

Ellen looked over at it. It was low to the floor, made up like every little girl’s dream bed with lacy pink satin and piled with stuffed animals. The child shook her head and pointed to the crib.

“I’ll stay in the crib,” Ellen said, determined. Margaret sighed.

“But why? You can’t even stretch out in it anymore.”

“I like the crib,” she said, her mouth set.

“Well, I guess that’s that, for now,” Frank said, frowning. He knew that Margaret was capable of latching on to something like a dog with a bone, and he didn’t want the crib to become one of her obsessive issues. He looked at her standing in the child’s room with her hands on her hips.

“I think we need to use some bribery here,” Margaret said. Frank’s ears perked up. He wasn’t beyond using a little reward system.

“Now you’re talkin’,” he said. “What’ch you got in mind, Mother?” She looked at Ellen who was standing partially behind Frank. Toys and dolls wouldn’t do it for her. Although they never came out and said it, Ellen was a tomboy.

“I’m thinkin’ it’s time for a bike. Not a tricycle, but a real two-wheeler. With trainers.” Ellen came out from behind Frank.

“A bike? I’d like a bike.”

“But will you leave your crib for a bike?” Margaret asked firmly. “We want you to sleep in a big-girl bed and get the bike in return.” Ellen didn’t have to ponder it; she’d wanted a bike for a while but her parents thought she was too young. But if she was old enough to sleep in a big-girl bed, she was old enough to ride a bike.

“Okay,” she said. “I’ll leave the crib.” She looked over at the old crib longingly. She’d never felt safer than when she was in her crib. Her memories really started in earnest when she was three. Frank kissing her goodnight, gently lowering her onto the soft mattress, covering her with a fuzzy blanket was the strongest recollection.

“Good night, little one. Sleep tight.” He said the same thing every night until she repeated it.

“You sleep tight, too.” When Margaret went away, Ellen never missed her. Frank did all the nurturing, and Margaret was glad to relinquish it to him; the first two years of Ellen’s life had drained her of needing her child again. As long as she was safe and cared for, the little Margaret had to give seemed to be enough.

It didn’t take long after the wedding for the couple and their child to form a tight bond that resisted any interaction with the outside world. Margaret seemed happy to stay on the property. When she wanted to get outside to stretch her legs, Frank noted that she was content to walk within the boundaries of their yard. She rarely wanted to go into town, but when she did, she’d drive in with Frank and he would drop her off at the café where she’d sit and drink coffee all morning, talking to Mary. Even that relationship had changed. Frank encouraged his wife to invite Mary over if she missed her, but Margaret just shook her head.

“We were never really friends,” she said. “Mary needed me more than I needed her.” Now, after the wedding, Mary’s voyeurism was out of control. Mary was hungry for stories of their wedding night, but Margaret would only smile a slow grin and shake her head.

“That’s private,” she said. But Mary wouldn’t take no for an answer.

“You did do it though, right?” The red was creeping up Mary’s neck onto her cheeks.

“Of course,” Margaret said. “I will admit that much.” But she kept that sly smile on her face and just shook her head when Mary whispered, “Was it good?”

“It’s none of your business,” Margaret answered. “And if you keep asking, I’ll leave.”

She was dead serious. During that month before the wedding, just as Margaret was getting comfortable with Mary, confiding in her, going where she’d never gone before with anyone else, Mary wanted Margaret for more than friendship. They were sitting in her private living room late one night; long after Ellen had gone to sleep, working on a bottle of wine. It was warm and cozy in the room with the dim lights and the radio on low. Margaret put her head back on the couch and closed her eyes for a moment and just as she was going to allow herself to doze in an alcohol haze, she felt the couch cushion depress next to her as Mary leaned over to kiss her on the mouth. Margaret had never kissed a woman. Mary’s mouth was soft, smelling of wine and lilacs. Sighing, Margaret relaxed into the couch, and then she thought of Frank. Sitting up, she pushed Mary away.

“No, I don’t want to.”

“You don’t want to...but I thought it was mutual,” Mary complained.

“I was minding my own business. It was never mutual.”

“You didn’t resist!” Mary said.

“Keep your voice down Mary. I don’t want to scare Ellen. I’m drunk. You started kissing me. That’s the end of the story. I’m gettin’ married in two weeks and I’m sure Frank wouldn’t understand. Let’s just let it go.” Mary started to cry, pacing back and forth.

“I don’t get it. You’d just arrived and bang! He’s asking you to get married.”

“What don’t you get?” she asked, adjusting her clothing. “I never even flirted with the man.”

“I’ve been here all along, and he never so much as looked in my direction. You show up and I finally have a friend, and he sweeps in like a vulture.”

“Are you jealous of him?” Margaret asked, unbelieving.

“Yes! Yes, I’m jealous of him. We clicked right away, you and me. And he ruined it. He can offer you more than I can,” she said, crying. Margaret reached out for her hand.

“Mary, Mary. You have to believe me when I tell you that you were never even an option for me, at least not as anything more than a friend. If that sounds harsh, well I’m sorry.” Mary stormed out of the room while Margaret struggled to get up and get into her room before Mary came back.

Drunk for sure, she didn’t feel like she’d done anything wrong. Mary came on to her. Thinking of Mary’s age, twenty-six, ten years younger than she was. Frank would never believe it if she told him what had happened. Love between women was something Frank wouldn’t understand; he was so innocent. Nothing must come between Frank and her, nothing. Frank was their savior. No matter what happened, Frank would love Ellen and take care of her.

After the wedding, life with Frank fell into a pleasant routine without Mary. Margaret kept house for him, but he did the cooking and organizing. Ellen loved him with all of her heart, and Margaret was pleased with her foresight of having gotten lost in front of his garage. Ellen started school, and with her gone all day, and nothing to occupy her time, Margaret started to deteriorate. Slowly at first, so that Frank almost didn’t notice, she stopped taking care of herself. Beautiful Margaret, who put so much into their romance, surprising him with her knowledge of what pleased a man that he’d have to remind himself that she’d had a child with someone whom he didn’t know.

The wedding night was beautiful; after Ellen went to sleep, Frank turned the radio on and reached for her, leading her into a slow dance.

“How’d you learn?” she asked, her head on his chest. “You’re really good at this.”

“School dances, I guess,” he replied, grinning. “They say I have natural rhythm.”

“Who says it? All your women?” she asked, giggling.

“You know better than that,” he replied softly, kissing the top of her head.

“I guess we never talked about your past, the women you’ve been with. You know all about me,” she said, a little haughty lilt to her voice.

“I know what I need to know. For starters, you’re the most beautiful woman I have ever seen. You’re a good mother. I love you and your child. What else is there?”

“Well, do you have any old girlfriends lurking who might resent me?” He pulled back from her.

“You ask me that on our wedding night?” he gave a loud laugh and she grinned. “Nope. None. Well I did have a girlfriend in high school, but she’s married with two kids now, so she won’t bother you.”

“How serious was it?”

“I guess serious,” he said. “We slept with each other, if that’s what you mean. And what good did it do? No good. I’m sorry for it now.”

“I’m not,” she answered. “I didn’t want to be tainted while you’re pure as snow.” He looked into her eyes and started laughing.

“You are not tainted, not by a long shot.” He pulled her closely and they rocked together as the music played softly. She intertwined her fingers into his and stretched up to reach his mouth. He bent down to return the kiss, and they started their wedding night swaying in an embrace with Johnny Rivers singing in the background.

Frank would always remember the way Margaret looked that night. When she’d stopped caring about him and Ellen, almost forgetting they’d existed; he’d remember their wedding night. He’d used the hallway bathroom to give her some privacy, and when he came back into their bedroom, she was stretched out on his bed; on top of the bedspread the lady at Sears helped him pick out, naked. He’d never seen such a beautiful body. Later, he’d rationalize that he loved her, she could’ve had a beard and he’d think the same thing. Those early days of bliss would sustain him through the next years, of her diminishing lucidity and increasing craziness.

While Margaret was losing her mind, Frank and Ellen fell in love, the father she never had and the daughter he’d always worship. There was a mutual respect and understanding as in a true father/daughter relationship, they chose to be father and daughter. It wasn’t forced upon them, or a product of anything. He wanted to be her father and she wanted to be his daughter. It was simple logic.

They discovered similar qualities about each other that surprised them because there was no shared genetic material. A phrase Ellen often heard was, “You look so much like your father!” Maybe through living together with little other input, Ellen took on many of Frank’s inflections in speech, and mannerisms. And they shared the love of dancing, from the time she was a little girl, watching Margaret dance with Frank, Ellen was enchanted by ballroom dancing. On Halloween, she wasn’t a princess or a queen like other little girls; she was a dancer.

Dancing beautifully together at parties and community picnics, other fathers and daughters and mothers and sons tried to imitate the McPhersons. The principal asked Frank and Ellen to lead the first dance at the ninth grade graduation party because they made it look so easy. “It’ll get more people out on the floor if they think they can look as smooth as you two.”

Frank took Ellen shopping for the dress she would wear to the dance. Taking the armload of dresses on hangers they’d picked out together into the dressing room, she tried one after another until she walked out of the dressing room in a white cotton pique.

“That’s the one, sister,” Frank said. She looked over her shoulder in the mirror and then stood this way and that, frowning.

“You think so Frank? Oh, I’m not sure.” Her uncertainty was coming from the neckline; but she didn’t feel comfortable calling attention to it in front of her genteel stepfather.

“What’s yer problem with it then?”

“I think it might be a little too grown up for me.” He turned beet red, seeing right away what she was eluding too.

“Okay, I gotcha. Yep, you may be right. Try another then, we got all day.” She giggled; he meant just the opposite.

“I’ll be right out.” She went back and took the white dress off, choosing a pale blue cotton shirtwaist dress with a full skirt. She came out of the dressing room and spun around, the skirt lifting in the air, showing off her blue jeans. “What about this?” He had his hand on his chin, looking at her, making twirling gestures with his hands to get her to move this way and that.

“That might be it, by golly,” he said. “You look like a princess in it, sister. What’d you think?” She stood still for a moment in the mirror.

“This is it. You know, I thought of Mother there for a moment. Wonder what she’d say if she could see me in this dress.” Frank smiled at her.

“She’d be so proud of you; I bet she’d just be grinnin’ ear to ear.”

“I think so, too,” Ellen said. “I feel like she’s tellin’ us this is the one.” He nodded, happy that she was getting some psychic direction. Or that her own intuition was kicking in.

“Let’s git goin’ if we’re havin’ dinner out tonight. We got the drive home and all.”

She took the dress off, unconsciously smiling. They’d shop for shoes on the weekend; that was something she could get in Seymour. And underthings were never a problem because Frank saved all of Margaret’s for her and she was slowly growing up to fit into them. The shoes and clothes were still too big, but it wouldn’t be long before she’d have the entire wardrobe to wear.

When the weekend for the dance arrived, Ellen dressed quickly so she could help Frank. “Let me iron your shirt,” she said, fidgeting. “It’ll give me something to do.” He laughed, pulling the iron away from her grasp.

“I won’t have my daughter ironing my clothes,” he said firmly. “Sit a bit and keep me company.” He put the shirtsleeve on the board first while Ellen sat carefully on the kitchen chair so as to not wrinkle her dress.

“I’ve got Mother’s slip on,” she said. “We better go through her things; I thought I saw a moth on the floor of your closet.”

“You can have whatever you want of her stuff and then we can get rid of what you don’t want,” he said. “You know how styles go around in circles. Maybe someday it will be worth somethin’ to someone.”

“You mean like take it to the thrift store? Never, Frank. Can’t you see Mary sneaking over there as soon as word got out that Margaret MacPherson’s clothes have just arrived?” Frank let out a chuckle.

“Never thought of that, sorry. You’re right, again.” There was something obscene, almost worshipful about the way Mary Cook spoke of Margaret.

“But maybe we can find a way to preserve them, you know. For my own girls,” she said, looking at him shyly. So, she was thinking of her future already.

The ninth grade graduation dance was a turning point for Frank and Ellen. After having stayed under the radar, watching them float so smoothly over the dance floor gave the people of the village something more to talk about than just the words of Mary. The simple-minded people whispering ugly lies about the father/daughter team now had real ammunition, while normal people were in awe of their talent. It put them on the map.

ALAN JOHNSON FORGOT about Margaret Fisher six months after arriving in Galveston, after catching the eye of exotic dancer, Janelle at the Bensalem Gentleman's Club. He'd been going there nightly for weeks, trying to get the attention of any dancer who would look his way. Finally, on a Friday night in November, Janelle noticed Alan when he sat at the front row table every night, drinking something tan in a glass and never sticking more than a wrinkled dollar bill in her G-string.

"Who's the loser in the front row?" Melanie asked Janelle. "Looks like he's getting ready to shove his bar tab in my bra."

Janelle laughed. "I got a buck. It's all he ever gives out. But I think he's kinda cute."

"Yuck," Melanie said. "You can have him."

Janelle was tired. She was thirty-eight to Melanie's twenty. The Bensalem was her last gig; no other legitimate club in town would let a girl older than twenty-five get up on the stage. The clubs on the other side of town hired tips-only dancers, girls whose faces and figures destroyed by drugs or booze looked just fine at closing time. The Bensalem was a step up from those places for the working man. When Janelle started dancing twenty years ago, she was looking for a meal ticket, but he never showed up. Alan was eager, almost pathetic in the yearning written all over his face. She was ready to call it quits and she needed supplemental income. He was the only one interested.

"Wait for me at closing," she said softly, squatting in front of him. "I'm off at two." He nodded at her, mouth hanging open. She stood back up maintaining eye contact with him as she moved on to the next guy. Alan watched her slowly walk along the edge of the stage, running her hands down her body and turning first one way and then the next, glancing over at Alan when she could and smiling sweetly at him.

Even Galveston could be cold in November after the sun went down, but Alan waited outside for Janelle as she asked him to, freezing in his shirtsleeves. He took a last drag and threw his cigarette on the ground, grinding it with his heel when she opened the door, putting her coat on. "God it's freezing out here," she said, looking at his bare arms. "Are you okay?"

"I'm good," he said. "My car's right over there." He pointed down the block. "Do you want to meet somewhere or are you okay about leaving with me?" She thought he was being very considerate.

"I can leave with you," she said, gesturing over her shoulder to the building. "They know who I'm with." They walked in silence to his car. She was ready to sleep with him if she had to.

"Where's your place?" He asked.

"I rent a room in the East End," she answered, looking at him concerned. "I know it sounds strange, but my landlady doesn't allow men in the rooms."

"Oh, well, I can see the wisdom of that. For safety sake," he said. "My place isn't in the best neighborhood." He looked concerned. "I don't keep the neatest place, either."

"I don't care about that," she said. "Do you have any food?"

He did, having just shopped. And Alan liked to cook, too. So their first date involved cleaning his kitchen so he could fix her breakfast, a shower for her and sleep on his couch.

At noon the next morning, she woke up to the sound of a key turning in a lock as Alan came home for lunch. "I figured you might need to go home to get ready for work."

"Yeah, I guess I'd better," she said, sitting up.

"I'll make you some coffee now," he said. "But I thought, if you'd like, you can pack a bag and come back here tonight."

She looked around his living room, at the piles of papers and dusty furniture. It needed cleaning, but it wasn't bad for the crappy neighborhood it was in.

"Okay, I guess I'd like that, if you're sure."

"We can be roommates unless something else develops," he replied with a smile. So that's how he forgot about Margaret.

Moving in together, they played house for almost a month until she discovered photographs of beautiful Margaret Fisher. It had taken them a few days to work their way back to the bedroom, and a few weeks for Janelle to grow tired of the squalor of his messy apartment. It was during a cleaning spree she came across an envelope filled with colored photos of a naked woman. Alan forgot he had the photographs; his version of artistic poses using a Polaroid. The images could have been random, taken by anyone, but Alan the ego-maniac had to make sure he was in several of them, laying on the bed next to the woman, holding the camera arms length to get both faces in the frame, as well as one perky breast. Nagging Alan about Margaret, she was jealous and suspicious.

"She's someone from the past," Alan said. "Haven't seen her since I moved to Galveston."

"How long were you together?" Janelle asked. She was standing at the stove, debating whether or not to distract him with egg frying, or throw the pan in his face.

"Not long," Alan said, trying to remember exact dates. "Less than a year."

"Why'd you split up?"

"I moved here and she wanted to stay in Saint Augustine." He was lying, but he didn't want to admit he'd borrowed money from Margaret to run away. He'd lied to Margaret, too. There had never been a better job, or corporate begging him to head up the sales team. The bill collectors and loan sharks were closing in on him, and he was in so deep he had to leave.

When Janelle grew tired of Alan's lies, Becky the secretary moved in, and when she moved out, Cynthia the dental hygienist moved in and so on for ten more years. Alan didn't think about Margaret again until he lost his job.

Car sales plummeted and the dealership folded during an economic downturn and hard working, generous Margaret popped into his thoughts. The only number he had for her was one that she'd had disconnected when she was supposed to be coming to join him. Then she'd called one night, leaving a message at the boarding house, that she was going to be delayed.

"You got a person to person call from Seymour last night," the landlord said. "Margaret has car trouble and won't be here till next week."

"Seymour? Where the heck is Seymour?"

"Some place in Alabama, I reckon." She never arrived, and he figured she went back to Saint Augustine after all.

Now, years later, with no other options, he had nothing to lose by heading back to Florida, the town of Seymour forgotten. But when he arrived in Saint Augustine, there wasn't anyone left who knew Margaret. He went to her aunt's house, but the woman had died. Tracking down her friends was impossible because he'd never met any.

Remembering where Margaret worked, Alan walked around the building, finding a directory posted on the wall next to the elevators. A maintenance man walked by and Alan caught his attention.

"Can you tell me what happened to Hartland?" Alan asked. "An old girlfriend worked there and I'm trying to look her up. I don't see it listed here."

"Hartland sold out to Reynolds a while back. I worked in Hartland offices."

“Do you remember Margaret Fisher? She was in the pool. About five six, a hundred ten pounds, auburn hair and blue eyes.” He told the man about waiting for Margaret to show up in Galveston.

“She’ be hard to forget,” he said when Alan questioned him.

“She was a looker,” Alan said, feeding his memory. “Do you remember when she left?”

“She got throw’d out like all of ‘em. How late you say she was?”

“Thirteen years,” Alan answered, frowning.

“Yep, it be around thirteen years. She had a baby, a little girl it was. The boss let her bring the baby to work with her.”

Alan reeled. A baby? “You sure about this?” Alan turned away to hide his face. Margaret never mentioned a baby, didn’t even hint of one. Maybe it wasn’t his. He turned to the man. “Do you remember when she had the baby?” He screwed up his face and looked at the ceiling.

“No, but the child was walkin’ along side her when she left. I’d say she was two or three years,” the man said. Alan thought about this for a moment; he’d left Saint Augustine fifteen years earlier so she must have been pregnant. It made him angry that she didn’t tell him. He didn’t like sneaks, forgetting he’d taken her money and lied to her, his part in the end of their relationship, how he took off for Texas leaving her high and dry. How would he ever find her now? Where was Margaret Fisher?

No money for a private investigator, before the time of internet searches and online family trees, the only research tool Alan had was attached to his body. Deliberating, he guessed he needed to find out more about the birth of Margaret’s baby to determine if it was his. The only place he could think of to get the information was the hospital in Saint Augustine.

Hanging around the coffee shop adjacent to the local hospital, Alan met Noelle after a week of diligently going there for breakfast. She was a big girl, five more pounds and she’d be chubby. Her hair caught his eye, shiny auburn, almost plum; she wore it in a long braid down her back. The opportunity to approach her would come about after seeing her there three days in a row. That day, on a mission to get coffee for her co-workers, Alan was sitting at table near the cash-register when she came in to the shop.

“I’ll take four regular, two black and a decafe,” she said to the waitress. Turning to sit down while she waited, Alan quickly pulled a chair out from his table for her.

“Join me,” he said. “Saw you here yesterday.” Not sure if he was serious, or if she even wanted to sit by him, she paused. “Please. Join me.”

Hesitantly, she pulled the chair out a little further and sat down. “Thanks,” she said. “My feet are killing me.”

“Nurses are always on their feet,” Alan said, noting she was in a navy blue scrub suit.

“I’m not a nurse,” she replied, holding out her hand to shake and holding up her hospital identification card. “Noelle. Noelle Carson. Housekeeping.”

He made small talk to get her to relax, but he could tell it might not be as easy as he hoped. She was so shy, her face expressionless except for a mean mouth, the corners turned down. He wondered if she smiled if she’d be more attractive, but the more he said the more awkward their conversation got, her defensiveness growing. Studying her face, he could see makeup skillfully applied hid the ravages of acne or maybe something worse. Several bandages were stuck to her arms. Housekeeping must be dangerous work, he thought.

Noelle didn’t catch on that Alan was trying to engage her. Getting through life was exhausting for her; just as she would have something approaching success, some Lothario would come along to disrupt her equilibrium and she’d have to start back at square one. Subtlety wouldn’t work with her due to the huge wall of defense she had up. Redoubling his efforts, he increased the charm. Alan was so handsome and so engaging with his compelling story, she decided to let her guard down, just a little. He chipped away at her resistance with chatter and compliments but nothing worked. Until he mentioned Margaret.

Somehow, hearing about another woman put her at ease. If Margaret had a baby at that facility fifteen years ago, there would be a record of it somewhere. Telling more lies, he fabricated a story about being away at war, not sure what war was going on at the time but he thought it was something in the Persian Gulf, and that he'd just discovered his girlfriend at the time had had a baby while he was gone.

"I have to find her if I can. She and her mother disappeared into thin air."

"Oh how sad," Noelle said, understanding the pain of having lost a child after losing custody of her son fifteen years ago. His father took him back to Mexico and she never saw the baby again. She didn't share this with Alan, although the parallels between them were amazing.

"I don't even know the baby's name. She's not a baby any more," he said, bowing his head. "I don't even know if they're alive."

"What about her friends?"

"Margaret didn't have many," he said. "It's been so long ago, I don't remember any names."

"Gosh, it seems pretty hopeless," Noelle replied, softly, not used to offering encouraging words. "Do you know who her doctors were?"

Alan shook his head. He remembered he was supposed to have been overseas. "We'd just started to date when I got orders. I'd only met her aunt, and she's dead now."

"I just had an idea. Why can't you go to admissions and find out if she had the baby here?"

"They won't give me that information because we weren't married."

"What about getting an attorney?" She was on the path he wanted, hopeful, thinking of ideas.

"I don't have the money for an attorney, Noelle. I barely have enough to pay my rent this week." He'd rented a room in town with the last money he had. "I'm looking for work, but until I find something, I've just got unemployment." If she was wondering why a man his age didn't have any money set aside, she wasn't saying. Grabbing her hand, he laid it on.

"You're my lucky star," he said, smiling. "I feel like we were meant to be together, the first person I talked to when I arrived. I have a good feeling about us." He was putting it on thick, but she was lonely, and he hoped, desperate. She smiled and it changed her appearance, for which he was grateful.

"That's so sweet of you, Alan. I wonder if there isn't a way I can find out something for you?" He feigned surprise. From their first meeting, partial honesty about his reason for being in Saint Augustine would make the request for snooping seem less like he was using her to gain access to hospital records.

"In what way?" he asked. "You mean by asking around at the hospital?"

She was looking off, chewing on the inside of her mouth. "I know some of the women from medical records," she said. "My cousin is the receptionist in the department." Not showing much interest, like his heart rate didn't just increase exponentially, he nodded his head.

"Gosh I wonder if they'd help."

"It couldn't hurt to ask, I guess," she said uncertainly. Rather than rouse her suspicions, he'd ask her to dinner.

"Would you like to have dinner with me tonight?" He'd avoid any mention of lost children and disappearing girlfriends, the Persian Gulf and Army service. He'd never even held a gun.

She frowned. “You want to have dinner with me,” she said cynically. It just didn’t feel right. He was too handsome. “Why?”

“Why? Because I do. I think you’re pretty and interesting. Isn’t that enough? We’ve had coffee everyday. Now, let’s have dinner.” His flattery hit its mark because as she felt better about herself, she smiled more, which changed the shape of her face. She was almost pretty.

Alan was eager to start a relationship with her, albeit a strange one, so he could better take advantage of her connections. Locating her apartment the first time wasn’t easy; in a dark neighborhood outside of Saint Augustine, he had to navigate behind an abandoned factory, reaching a dead end at a chain link gate. Backing up, he found the street, little more than an alley, and turned into it, looking for her building. Checking his appearance in the rearview mirror first, he was then careful to look around the area before he unlocked to get out. After he knocked, he looked over his shoulder again nervously before she answered. She was surprised he didn’t just beep the horn for her.

“Nice neighborhood,” he let slip out. But she didn’t take offense, chuckling.

“I like the rent.”

“You look nice,” he said finally looking at her. He was relieved, not having seen Noelle in anything other than scrubs he wasn’t sure what she’d wear. They went to a seafood restaurant he remembered being fancy years before, but seemed to have fallen on hard time.

“I’ve always wanted to eat here and now I hope we’re not too late,” he said, worried.

“It’s fine,” Noelle said. “They stopped having entertainment about five years ago. But I hear the food is still good.” Alan made the effort getting to know Noelle, but wondered about his ability to take it to the next level. He didn’t see her becoming a scout for him unless he slept with her, and that might take some effort.

Noticing odd wounds on her legs and arms, almost too precise, Alan began to worry they were self-inflicted, but didn’t want to call attention to them. There was definitely something not quite right about Noelle, but he decided to let it go. Her value was in the facts she could gather.

The following week, he moved into her cramped apartment. Interspersing talk of their relationship with hints that he’d be going back to Galveston some day, he was trying to soften the blow for when he did take off again. “When I go back to Texas,” was a frequent phrase. But Noelle wasn’t listening, hearing only “I love you, I want you, I need you,” when they had sex, always with the lights off. She was in love with Alan and would do anything for him, anything at all.

“I’d even kill for you,” she said one night in the throws of passion.

“It’ll never come to that!” he replied. “Where’d you get a notion like that?” He rolled off her, frightened and disgusted.

Getting up and adjusting her clothes, Noelle fidgeted with something on her nightstand. “Chill Alan, it’s just a figure of speech. Talk about a mood buster.”

“I’ve got to admit it was a shocking thing to hear while in the middle of...well you know.”

“You can say it out loud, Alan. Sex. It was the middle of sex.”

Unable to contain his aversion, he got out of bed and went into the bathroom, locking the door. Something would have to happen soon because he didn’t know how much longer he could playact. Noelle was simply peculiar.

ON MONDAY OF THE WEEK before the stranger spied on Ellen, an envelope with a New York return address was in the stack of mail Jessie passed over to Frank. “Looks like one of them TV producers heard about you and the girl and yer dancin’.” Frank looked at her, confused, rifling through the pile.

“This is the dance hall in Beauregard,” he said, waving the envelope at her. “Must be the New York headquarters on the return address.”

“Here, open up.” Jessie passed him a letter opener, wanting him to find out what it contained before he left the post office. He’d never share it with her otherwise.

He used the opener and pulled out a photocopy of a newspaper article; the city paper downriver got wind of Ellen and Frank dancing at the ninth grade graduation when someone sent in a picture. No one in the village saw it yet or they’d have plastered the article all over the beauty shop and café, and someone would have surely brought a paper into the garage.

“Bother,” he grumbled, frowning.

“What is it?” Jessie asked, craning her neck to see. Frank unfolded it, reading the letter that accompanied the article out loud.

“Dear Mr. McPherson. The Phillip Anderson Dance Academy is a nationally recognized school of dance.” Hardly a TV producer. “Our representative will be in your area soon and we would like to take the opportunity to speak with you about up-coming competitions.’ There’s a phone number to call.” He looked up at Jessie.

“Don’t get any ideas,” he said. But she just laughed.

“No worries, I got better things to do around here,” she said.

“You go do ‘em then,” Frank replied, but laughed. “See you tomorrow.” He nodded his head and she laughed back.

“Yep, tomorrow it is,” Jessie said and as soon as he was out the door, she picked up the phone to call Mary over at the café.

The talk of the town was the first dance at the ninth grade graduation dance. The lucky witnesses passed tissues around as the lovely young girl and her devoted father floated across the floor, bringing observers to tears. “She was born to dance,” Miss Logan, the owner of the beauty parlor said, wiping her eyes.

“And they’re not even related,” Margo Portland, the local nurse practitioner whispered. “Like two peas in a different pod.” Mary, also standing in the school gymnasium watching the dancers, frowned at the distorted expression.

“What’s that supposed to mean? It doesn’t make any sense, Margo. It’s like sayin’ dance partners gotta be related to dance well together. Seems to me it would be just the opposite.”

“Well, I don’t care,” Margo said wistfully. “He’s so handsome and she’s so cute. Some lucky woman will inherit that beautiful family... now that his wife is gone.”

“That’s an awful thing to say, Margo,” Mary burst out. “Jesus, show some sensitivity.”

“Why? You planning on moving in on him?” Miss Logan asked. “Little bird said you already did.”

Looking at Mary with a critical eye, at her city haircut and dye job, Miss Logan’s Beauty Salon wasn’t good enough for her. The beginnings of crow’s feet and jowls displayed on an otherwise attractive face belied that time was marching on, even for the popular Mary Cook. Misdirected snobbery comin' from a waitress, Miss Logan thought. Mary was aging and not well, at that.

"This stupid conversation started because Margo called Frank and Ellen two peas in a different pod. What the hell does that have to do with dancing?"

"So now you're a dance expert," Miss Logan said, sniffing. Margo leaned over to Mary standing on Miss Logan's other side.

"Your jealousy is showing, Mary," Margo said, grinning, egging her on. But she was serious.

"What? Of you? That's a load of crap," Mary said. "Shut your mouth, Margo Portland." Mary and Margo were two of the single women in town who'd vied for Frank McPherson's attention before Margaret's car broke down and she drifted into his life. Now that she was dead, Mary would start haunting him again.

"Not of me, you idiot. Of Ellen," Margo hissed. "It's written all over your face, just so you know."

"Why would I be jealous of a fifteen year old child?"

"You're a story teller, Mary," Miss Logan whispered. "I heard 'em. You got a filthy mind."

"I never said anything," Mary murmured. But it wasn't the time nor the place to talk about gossip she'd started, so rather than stay there engaging the women, she walked away.

While Frank and Ellen were gliding across the floor, they were whispering to each other about Mary, too. "Momma said she had cooties," Ellen said. "I think she was right."

"As wrong as it might be to say such a thing, I'm thinkin' I got to agree with you," Frank said, frowning. "She's looking over here right now."

"I see it," Ellen said. "That's my point. Watch yourself, Frank. She's trouble." The implication was clear; Ellen knew Mary was on the hunt.

"I got no interest in her whatsoever," Frank said. "None. Never."

"I'd be okay with it," Ellen said softly. "As long as it weren't Mary. I like Miss Portland, though. She might be someone. It's not right that you're alone."

"Remember, your mamma's only been gone a few months," Frank replied. "It just seems like forever." Ellen put her head on his chest.

"It has been forever," she said sadly. He held her a little tighter; the only time they touched was when they danced. What she said was the truth; Margaret hadn't been there for her daughter once she'd lost her mind.

"I don't need no other," Frank said tenderly. "At least not today." He looked down at her and smiled, kissing her hair. He didn't think about other women. Working, taking care of Ellen and enjoying each day; those things filled his life and made it satisfying.

"What about Margo?" Ellen asked, pressing. "I like her a lot."

"Really sister, I don't need any of 'um right now."

The words were out of his mouth when Mary tapped on Ellen's shoulder. "Mind if I cut in?" Not wanting to be rude, Ellen mumbled, "No" and moved away from Frank, but he pulled her closer to him.

"I do mind. This is Ellen's special day, Mary." He swirled her away, leaving Mary in the middle of the dance floor alone, with the eyes of the town burning into her.

RUNNING A ROOMING HOUSE and working at the café kept Mary busy for part of the day. In the afternoon, she tried to relax or take a nap. But when the sun went down, Mary got restless. Wanting a husband and family before it was too late, the driving force behind her social life was facilitating the opportunity to meet a man. Mary hadn't given up on Frank, his disinterest only increased her desire. She wasn't going to wait around for him though, and sunset triggered her need for companionship. "What am I sitting around here for?" she asked the empty room. Her closet was full of alluring outfits, and she'd dress to the nines with one goal and that was not to sleep alone that night. None of the one-night stands ever amounted to anything though, so she decided to try to snag Frank yet one more time, the rebuff at the dance still fresh in her mind but not humiliating enough to stop her.

Since he never went out at after work, holing up in that cottage with the girl, she'd make an excuse to stop at the garage on her way out before he closed. She'd walk around the block so she didn't have to pass Miss Logan's Beauty Salon, it obvious to Miss Logan why Mary was visiting the garage. Frank saw her coming and moaned; the woman wouldn't take no for an answer.

"Since you don't have one, I know you're not here to get your car repaired," he said, frowning. But Mary just laughed.

"Frank, come out with me. We'll have fun. I've seen you dance with Ellen; we can go to Beauregard to the dance hall. No one from Seymour will know you're there. Come on, please?"

When Margaret was still alive, it was the best excuse he had to reject her advances. "I'm a married man, Mary. I'm not going out with you, ever." Once he started, he was often unable to stop. "I thought you were Margaret's friend. She'd be crushed if she knew you were doin' this."

He'd made excuses so as not to hurt her feelings when the fact that his wife was still alive wasn't enough; Ellen's sitter had to get home, he was tired, he had work to do around the house.

Then, she used Ellen to get at him.

"Your girl needs a momma, Frank. I've known her since the first day they arrived in Seymour. I can do for her what you can't. What will you do when she becomes a woman? She'll need a momma then." But he wouldn't budge.

Incensed that he was still loyal to Margaret, Mary exploded. "How'd she know? Unless you told her, she'd be none the wiser. And my feeling is that she wouldn't give a damn, Frank. Not a god-damn." After Margaret died, he had to be brutal.

"I'm not interested, Mary. Is that clear enough for ya? Now go on home and leave me alone. Have some self-respect for durn sake."

Livid, Mary stamped off, forgetting to cross the street, passing the salon with Miss Logan shaking her head in disgust and pity.

In ten years, Mary visited Margaret once a week. She made the twenty mile round bus trip to Hallowsbrook. Being with Margaret was like old times, like the first time at the café when she and Ellen came into town.

Bringing along coffee in cardboard cups for every visit, they'd sit in Margaret's private room and whisper like conspirators, Mary sharing gossip from town and Margaret news she'd picked up eavesdropping on the nurses. When the coffee was gone, they'd walk the grounds together, reminiscing, talking about their fake futures. Margaret spoke of going back to work in the city in an insurance office, which clothes she'd buy, who'd she hire to watch little Ellen, and then bigger Ellen, and finally, teenaged Ellen. Mary talked about her wedding, who she'd ask to stand up for her.

"Margaret, you would be the matron of honor."

"Oh, that's a terrible sounding title," she said, moaning. "I don't want to be the matron of anything. Let me be the maid." She watched Mary fiddling with something on her bedside table. "Who are you planning on marrying, anyway?"

"No one, yet. I wish Frank had a brother, though."

"If you wait long enough, I'll be dead and then you can have the real thing instead of wishin' for a brother."

"Don't say that! Frank's just a friend. And you'll live a long time."

Margaret looked at her out of the corner of her eye. She wondered if Mary was bothering Frank since she'd been locked away, the way Mary was bothering her. She didn't try every visit, but Margaret could tell when an assault was coming.

"No, I don't want to," she'd say pushing her away. "What if a nurse walks in?" or "What would Frank say? He'd be so hurt."

"Let's be together, Margaret, I miss you," she cried. "No one will ever know. Why do you care if Frank's hurt or not? It's his fault you're in here." Mary heard the gossip about Frank making the choice, deciding not to fight the courts for his wife's freedom in return for keeping her child.

"How's it his fault?" she'd ask. But Mary didn't tell her.

Once the conversation rolled around to Frank, it would decelerate, and Margaret would withdrawal. She did not want to talk about Frank to Mary. Nothing had changed from the days she was free, living at home and Mary a voyeur.

"I guess you probably need to head for Seymour," she said when she wanted Mary to go, or straight out, "It's time for you to leave, Mary. I'm getting tired."

Finally, Margaret stopped speaking to Mary, same as she had to her family.

"If you aren't going to talk to me, I guess there's no point in my coming all this way," Mary said. Margaret tossed her head, but she didn't say a word, and Mary, unable to stay away from her would still come every week, or more often, stopping for carryout coffee on the way just like she always had.

Slowly deteriorating, schizophrenic episodes of longer duration were replacing the short periods of normalcy, and visitors could never be sure what they'd be faced with; the lucid, sweet and talkative Margaret, or the suspicious, hostile, mumbling Margaret. Even the sweet Margaret was sneaky and if they didn't watch carefully, stole knives off patient trays or hoarded her medication.

"Be sure to watch your back," the nurses warned one another. Margaret could be violent, too, lashing out at the nurses who resorted to restraining her. In time, the drug side effects took a toll on her, and she became lethargic and finally, somnolent. It was during these times that Frank felt most helpless. He and Ellen would sit at her bedside and wait for her to wake up. Aware they were in her room, she would ignore them or play possum.

"Your family was here all afternoon," the nurse said. "You missed seeing your husband and daughter. He is so handsome and she's so cute."

"What do I care?" she drawled. "They mean nothing to me. He's not even her father." The nurses were appalled; the staff witnessed the love and tenderness between the father and daughter, and they told Margaret as often as they remembered to that she was a lucky woman to have such a caring man for a husband.

“You really don’t know how lucky you are, Margaret. I’ve seen patients whose husband’s bring the girlfriend along. You might want to try a little harder to stay awake when Frank visits.” Margaret started laughing.

“You are clueless,” Margaret retorted. “I wish the man would move on with his life. Do you think I enjoy the two of them coming here in their dress-up clothes, waiting for me to perform? It’s bad enough that I’m here and not seeing my daughter growing up.” She turned her back and lay back down. “I wish I was dead.”

The nurse left the room, but she recorded her conversation with Margaret. It was the first time she’d mentioned death. And then, as though contemplating how selfish she’d been, as if she had any control over her behavior, Margaret’s mental state made a complete turn around. The nursing staff wrote it was as if the drugs she’d been getting for years suddenly started to work.

Claiming she felt better, more aware and in touch than she had in years, Margaret told Margo, her nurse practitioner, that she wanted to get better so she could go home. She wanted to raise Ellen. “I feel like my friend, Mary is just chompin’ at the bit for me to give up the ghost so she can make a move on my family.” So if that was what was motivating Margaret, they would use it, reminding her how much her family loved her.

Frank and Ellen were stunned. “You’ve become such a lovely young woman,” Margaret told Ellen. “I’m so proud you’re my daughter.”

And to Frank, “I can never thank you enough for the father you’ve been to her.” They were thrilled with what was happening, agreeing it was time to petition the county when word reached them she was dead. Margaret had made such a startling improvement that her death was completely unexpected. Reams of paper with facts were filed away, just in case the family decided to sue. But Frank and Ellen had those last words of praise from Margaret.

The funeral planning was drudgery. Ellen and Frank went through Margaret’s clothes, trying to choose a dress for her to wear in the casket. Finally deciding on her wedding dress although it was much too small, it didn’t have to fasten down the back. Makeup applied skillfully and her hair just so, she looked like the young, beautiful, sane Margaret Frank first met.

MEDICAL RECORDS IN Saint Augustine belonging to patient Margaret Ann Fisher were waiting for discovery. Already scanned onto microfilm, the canisters gathered dust on rows of metal shelving along with the records of thousands of other patients, none as sought after as Margaret and Ellen Fisher. Noelle worked quickly, worried that unless she produced evidence for Alan he'd be on his way back to Texas. Not meaning to, she'd fallen in love with him. His pompous hot-air-bag personality was just the opposite of her pathologically shy, hesitant timidity. Whatever she could do to get him to stick around, she'd do. After their discussion about Margaret, a friend in medical records gave her copies of microfiche of all the deliveries that took place the nine months after Alan left for Galveston. In the basement of the library, they divided the film manually scanning each roll. After four hours, Alan found it.

"Here it is!" He yelled. Noelle got up from her chair and moved closer to him so she could peek in the eyepiece.

"Margaret Fisher, aged thirty-two," she read. Alan gasped.

"Thirty-two? No way," he announced. "She was younger than me. Keep reading. I don't think I can, I'm so nervous."

"It's her address. 85 Oak Lane, Saint Augustine. Secretary, Hartland Insurance." She skimmed unimportant facts.

"Okay, are you ready?" She pulled back from the eyepiece and looked at him.

"I don't know if I am or not," he said nervously.

"Well, you better make up your mind, because once you know for sure about having a child, it will change your life." Alan wasn't sure how Noelle would know about such things since she'd never mentioned having a child.

"All right. Read," he said.

"Okay, here goes. Live birth of a six pound, eight ounce female at two pm." She leaned back to look at him again and he was pale, sweat on his forehead. "Are you going to be okay?"

"I'm not sure," he replied. He thought, I've been a selfish asshole all my life and now when I'm preparing to take advantage of yet another woman, I discover I have a kid. What the hell? Before he opened his mouth, he came back to his senses. "Keep reading."

"There's not much more here, just what they did to her, and her date of discharge. It looks like she only stayed a day."

"Is there a name?" he asked. "For the baby?" Noelle turned the knob on the side of the machine as she scrolled through the film.

"Ellen Marie," she said. "Fisher. Ellen Marie Fisher." Alan was numb. He never thought of having his own kid. Now, here was this thing; he had a daughter. He looked off into space and tried to figure out how old she'd be.

"When was this?"

Noelle repeated the date. "She was fifteen in April." Alan turned to look at her.

"I have a fifteen-year-old daughter?" he asked, incredulous. His face was twisted, the handsome Alan reduced to the distressed Alan, all cockiness and ego swept away. "How the hell is that possible? That bitch! Why didn't she tell me?" Noelle grabbed his shoulder.

“Shush,” she whispered. “You left for the Persing Golf, remember?” Alan did remember; he left with Margaret’s ten grand. Capable of feeling shame, that did it for him.

“Is there any more to see? Because if there isn’t, I want to get out of here.” She bent over and looked in the viewer, scrolling through more documents.

“Nope, looks like it was a normal birth and she left the next day.” He pushed away from the table, eager to be in a place where he was free to explode.

“Now what the hell am I going to do? She’s nowhere around here. We’ve looked.” Noelle resisted telling him to grow up.

“Be patient, Alan,” she said soothingly, desperate. “I’ll think of something.”

The next morning, Noelle left for work and Alan set out on foot, walking to Margaret’s old neighborhood again. He didn’t know what to do or how to begin searching for her. When he reached the house, Margaret’s landlady was in front pulling weeds out of the flower bed.

Alan cleared his throat to give her a warning he was behind her on the sidewalk. She turned, shielding her eyes from the morning sun. “All full,” she said. “Expectin’ a vacancy next Friday, if you kin wait that long.”

“I came to ask about one of your former tenants.” He reached out his hand to shake, but instead she took it trying to get out of the crouching position and grunted, using it to pull her body up.

“Who might that be?” she asked, wiping her gloved hands over her dress.

“Margaret Fisher,” he said. She screwed her face up and looked over her shoulder, and then back, giving him the stink eye.

“That was a long time ago,” she answered. He launched right in with the facts and his lies, no reason to keep back a thing because it would give him more clout. A child always made a big difference in a sob story. She nodded her head.

“Ay, she did have a baby. Moved from a big apartment right there,” she pointed to the front first floor, “to a studio up on top. ‘To save money,’ she told me. She sold all her furniture. I bought a few pieces myself. ‘That table belonged to my mother,’ she said. I can show you if you want.” Alan was trying to stay calm.

“When did she leave?” he didn’t want to rush the woman, but needed to ask the questions as they came to him. The landlady screwed up her face again in thought.

“I don’t remember exactly,” she answered. “But the little girl been walkin’ for a long while already. And talking. She was talking real good.” Alan tried to remember the exact date that Margaret had contacted him about moving to Galveston. It was in late spring, thirteen years before. The little girl, little Ellen Marie, would have been about two, talking and walking.

“Why’d they leave?” She screwed her face up again.

“Let me think. She got family somewhere out west, I’m pretty sure that’s what she said. It’s been so long my memory can’t be sure. She sold all her stuff again, what she collected since having the baby and all. I do remember that. We made a deal that I’d hold on to a few things for her and if it didn’t work out and she’d be back, she’d get it. But I never heard from her again.” Alan was afraid to walk away from the landlady because he might remember to ask something.

“If I think of anything else, do you mind if I come back?”

“No, not at all,” she said. “And the same with me. How can I get in touch with you if I remember anything?”

“You got a pen?” Alan asked. She waved him to the porch.

“Wait here while I get one,” she said, pulling herself up the steps by the handrail. She went inside and returned with a pen and paper. He recited Noelle’s phone number.

“Anything you think of, don’t hesitate to call me,” he said. “And thank you very much.” He tipped an imaginary hat as he walked down the path from her house. He didn’t know anymore more than he did before he approached her, but she confirmed that Margaret left Florida for Texas thirteen years ago with a two-year-old daughter.

Noelle knew he was struggling with the new information that he had a child, but that was no reason for him not to look for a job, too. She handed him a section of the classified ads, possible jobs circled. “You need to keep looking, even with unemployment. The payments are apt to stop if they find out you aren’t going on interviews.” The next morning, Noelle left for work at five and he left Florida for good, driving toward Texas with one thought; try to find out what had happened to Margaret and his daughter thirteen years ago.

ELLEN WAS SORTING THROUGH a bucket of bolts in the garage when Frank walked through the door with the mail. “We made the city paper last Friday,” he said, digging through the pile. Pulling out the envelope from the Phillip Anderson Dance Studio, Inc. he passed it over to her. Frowning she delicately took the folded paper out of the envelope.

“Oh boy, this is an awful picture of me,” she complained, holding it up. “Look at how skinny my legs are. I should have worn nylon stockings. I’m too old for anklets.” She handed the paper off to her stepfather and they looked at the picture together.

“But it’s a good picture of you, I think. We make a fine lookin’ dance team, Frank.” She started to laugh.

“Your legs look fine,” Frank said. “But my paunch.” He clicked his tongue and they laughed together. “We’ll never be satisfied.”

“No, I don’t guess we will,” Ellen said.

“Do you have any desire to take dance lessons?” Frank asked.

“We already dance nice,” she said. “Keep that for my scrapbook, but no other reason.” He folded the article up and threw the envelope in the trash, Phillip Anderson forgotten.

While Frank went about repairing the cars that lined up outside of the garage and Ellen turned to her fiction novel, flipping through the pages to find her place, Alan Johnson pulled into the Overlook Drive-in in Mobile for lunch. He’d been on the road since Noelle had left for work that morning. It was getting hot already, too hot to eat in the car. The air conditioning hit his face when he entered. “Sit where you want,” a man in a white apron said. He slid onto the first stool at the counter although he had the whole place to himself. Pulling the greasy menu from the holder, he flipped through it and decided quickly.

“Grilled cheese and a Coke,” he said to the waitress, poised with her ticket book in her hand.

“Pickles and chips?”

“Just chips,” he said, glancing over at a booth under the window; a folded paper on the bench seat forgotten by the last patron. “Mind if I take a look at that paper?”

“Help yerself,” she said.

“Afraid I’ll fall asleep while I’m eatin’ if I don’t have something to read,” he said.

“Been drivin’ a long time?” she asked, putting a glass filled with ice down on the counter in front of him. She got a bottle opener out and popped the cap off a bottle of Coca Cola.

“Since daybreak,” he answered. “Got my wife off to work and headed west.” As planned, the wife reference would either shut her up if there were ideas of a possible connection, or not faze her if she was just being talkative.

“Where you comin’ from?” she asked, turning to look at the greasy wall clock. “Lord, that’s six hours worth of drivin’.”

“Saint Augustine,” he said, stifling a yawn. A bell rung and she turned to the shelf, his sandwich was waiting under a red heat lamp.

“Here you go,” she said, sliding it to him. “Mobile your destination?” Alan looked at her sideways. “I ask ‘cause we get a lot a travelers headin’ to New Orleans.”

“In that general direction,” he answered. “You got any tips for travelers?”

“Just be careful at the next intersection,” she warned. “We get people in here for lunch who make the wrong turn and then they’re back at dinnertime after wastin’ a couple a’ hours drivin’ around.”

“Okay, I’ll be careful,” he said. “Where’d they end up?”

She pointed over her shoulder. “Upriver. Towns up north. A lot of ‘em in Seymour.” Alan froze, hearing the name again after thirteen years, Margaret leaving the message for him that her car broke down in Seymour.

The bell rang and she turned to get another lunch order. Alan bit into the sandwich, the grilled bread crispy with butter on the outside, the cheese oozing. He reached for the paper, unfolding it on the counter leaving greasy fingerprints. It was Friday’s paper, old local news, but not to him. He read while he chewed, about unemployment and a murder downtown, rising food prices and the weather. Nothing important registered, even as he skimmed over the picture of a young girl and her father, dancing together at her graduation. Ellen Fisher and her stepfather, Frank McPherson, dance partners at Longbow Middle School Ninth Grade Graduation. The significance of what he read wouldn’t hit him until later, having already forgotten the baby’s name.

The infamous wrong road was a two-lane highway, dotted with abandoned buildings and small gas stations and an occasional road sign pointing to towns east and west. He imagined Margaret on the same road, not realizing she was lost at first, with a small child in the backseat. Driving north for an hour, he pulled into a gas station to call Noelle before she left work. She’d have to monitor her words and the time she kept him on the phone would be limited, unlike a call to her apartment.

“Where are you?” she asked, keeping her voice low.

“I’m going to stay here for the night,” he said, ignoring her question. “I took a detour from the main highway, and there’s a string of small towns that I want to check out.”

“Alan, it sounds like a waste of your time. It’s like a wild goose chase.” Something about her tone struck a cord; she was bossing him and he couldn’t abide by it. But he needed Noelle and her money if this turned out to be what she was prophesying; a wild goose chase and he had to return to Saint Augustine.

“Yes, well it’s all I’ve got right now.” He told her what the waitress at the restaurant said about people often taking a wrong turn, heading to the towns north, the familiar sounding name of Seymour. All he wanted to do was hang up on Noelle. He tried to remember the circumstances of Margaret calling him the last time; her car had broken down on a Friday and she would see him the next week. Did he hear from her again once she was on the road? He recognized that he’d used her like he was using Noelle, taking her money with no intention of paying it back. No wonder she didn’t tell him there was a child; he couldn’t be trusted. “I better hang up. It’s getting late and I need to find a place to stay.” Noelle was reluctant to let him go, she could hear the tension in his voice, the change when she criticized him.

“It’s not that I don’t think you’ll find her,” she said. “Just that it’s so unlikely.” There was silence on the other end of the line, but she could hear him breathing.

“Think of someway to find the child,” he said. “I’m hanging up now.” She reluctantly said goodbye, realizing after that she didn’t have any more information about him than his name. If he didn’t call her again, she wouldn’t have a clue where to find him.

“Wait!” she yelled, but it was too late. He’d already hung up.

Alan got back in his car and continued north. A sign for Beauregard, Pop. 12,000, larger than the other signs scattered along the road, directed him to make a right turn. It looked promising, the small shacks he passed switched to larger homes with well-kept lawns guiding him into town. The road led to a bridge across the river and on the other side of the river the houses changed again, this time into brick apartment buildings and older, Victorian homes, some with elaborate signs in front announcing rooms for rent. It was getting late, the sun starting down its course, casting shadows and bathing what was in its path in golden light. Pulling into the driveway of the least pretentious of the houses, he got out his wallet to count his cash. His last unemployment check was seventy dollars and he had half of it left, along with a new credit card with a five hundred dollar limit from which he'd taken one hundred dollars. He'd better make it last. Not bothering to lock his car, he got his bag out of the backseat and walked around to the front door of the house. A large, hand painted sign said this house was Towering Pines. He looked upward and sure enough, towering above the high peaked roof were pine trees. The house had a deep porch with shabby but inviting seating interspersed with tea tables running the length of the house. A large window next to the door revealed a lighted desk at which a young woman sat reading. Alan knocked on the door and the woman looked up at him, put her book down and walked to the door.

"Can I help you?" she asked, unsmiling.

"I need a room for the night," he said. "Maybe longer." She stepped aside so he could pass through. The house was dark, the only light coming from the desk lamp.

"Ten dollars cash a night includes breakfast. If you want dinner, it's another five a day." He looked down at the floor. It was more than he wanted to pay but didn't think he'd find anywhere cheaper. She added, "Or fifty a week, paid in advance." Taking five tens out of his wallet, the place could be his command center. If he didn't discover anything in a week, he'd go back to Saint Augustine.

"Okay, I'll stay a week, to start," he said, looking at her for the first time. She was not as attractive up close, one of those women of indeterminate age, but she might be older than he thought; maybe more like thirty than twenty. "This your folks place?" She looked up at him, surprised.

"No," she said sharply. "Mine. Why do you ask?" He scrambled, trying to cover his faux pas.

"I'm sorry," he replied quickly. "I'm impressed, that's all. This is a lovely town and an impressive house." He didn't add what he was thinking. I can't even afford to rent a room let alone own a house.

"Beauregard is a great little town," she said, relaxing.

"What's the industry here?" She looked at him curiously.

"The mental hospital," she answered, amazed. "I thought everyone knew that." His original plan was to be honest about why he was there, looking for Margaret and his child. But his nature was to sneak around. Common sense caught up with him and he changed his mind.

"I'm not from these parts," he said, scrambling again. "In addition to the mental hospital; any commerce? I'm looking for a job." She turned to a stack of paper behind the desk and handed it to him.

"There are a few small places around, some hiring, too." He nodded his head to her.

"Thank you very much," he said.

"Your room's at the top of the stairs, to the right. Just three others here now; Mr. Rosen, on this floor, Emil in the lower level, and Miss Logan above the garage. Miss Logan owns the beauty shop in Seymour. On Sunday's she'll cut your hair free if you buy her lunch."

"Who's talking about me?" an attractive, middle-aged woman walked into the room from the back of the house.

"When'd you get home?" the owner asked. She looked at Alan. "I'm Cate by the way. This is Miss Logan."

“Just now,” she answered, sticking her hand out to shake Alan’s. “Well, you’re tall.” Alan burst out laughing.

“I guess I am to some people,” he said. He was anxious to get started looking around town before the sun was down, but forced himself to relax and listen to their banter.

“Can I make tea?” Miss Logan asked Cate. “The salon was steady all day and I’m famished but too tired for dinner.”

“I’ll make it,” she answered. “That’s the reason for tea time. Will you have tea, Mr. Johnson?”

“Okay,” he said, fighting the urge to look at his watch. “Where’s your salon again?”

“Seymour,” Miss Logan answered. “It’s upriver, a raggedy little town with one café, my salon, a garage and a crappy grocery store.” Cate laughed out loud.

“Seymour’s not that bad,” she said. “It’s just too far from Mobile. If you want to hop on a plane, you need to go to Mobile. Need a big department store? Mobile again.”

“I’m there everyday,” Miss Logan replied. “It’s got a small town mentality. Beauregard is more convenient to Mobile and it’s just nicer. I wish my shop was here.”

“Don’t let that get around,” Cate said.

“What do you mean by the small town mentality?” Alan asked. He didn’t really care, but was trying to be polite. He was back at Seymour. That name would haunt him.

“Entitlement,” Miss Logan said. “The old timers think they should be making the decisions for everyone.” A look came over her face, and she looked at Alan out of the corner of her eye.

“If you ever go there, watch out for the single-women,” Miss Logan said. Cate gasped.

“Oh my God yes, he’d be a huge hit,” she said. Alan frowned, but he was secretly pleased.

“What do you mean?” he asked, playing dumb.

“No single men in town,” Miss Logan said, hinting.

“Unless you count the baggers at the grocery store,” Cate replied.

“You mean the unwashed bearded fellows?” Miss Logan asked. “They don’t count, unless you’re Mary.” Cate gasped again.

“I don’t think even Mary would be hard up enough to go on a date with a bagger, Miss Logan!”

“Who’s Mary?” Alan asked.

“If you stick around long enough, you’ll meet her,” Cate said. “She’s a regular here in town, goes to the clubs and bars. There’s no place to hang out in Seymour, not for young single women.”

“Mary is not young,” Miss Logan said, sniffing. “She’s well into her thirties.” They looked at Alan, inquiringly.

“Forty-five,” he answered, laughing. “Is that too old?”

“No, it’s perfect,” Cate said, nodding toward Miss Logan. “You’ll have a huge range of pickins if you don’t mind ladies a few years older than you are.”

“Geez, thanks a lot! Besides, he might be married,” Miss Logan said. Both sets of eyes riveted on his face, hopeful the answer would be no. Alan was a rogue, always on the lookout for another pretty face, but he had a mission there along the river, and he wanted to try to put his best foot forward. People might be more willing to help him locate Margaret and her daughter if they thought they’d been married.

“Yes, I’m married,” he said. “But we’re separated.” Hopeful stares turned to compassionate.

“Oh, we’re sorry,” Cate said.

“Don’t be,” Alan said. “It was amicable and happened a long time ago. I’d like to move on with my life, maybe find a job here.” He flushed, angry that he’d said so much. Because of his big mouth, someday he might have to admit that he hadn’t seen his child in years. With his lie about being married, he opened another can of worms. What kind of a father was he that he'd let his child out of his sight? He quickly changed the subject.

"So tell me about you both?" he said, not caring at all. He took a sip of tea and it had grown cold and tasteless. He put the cup back down.

"Cate you go first," Miss Logan prompted. "He's already heard about me."

"There's nothing to tell," she said smiling. "I spend my days making repairs on this place and cleaning the rooms."

"You must meet a lot of interesting people," Alan said, smiling. "And serve them tea in the afternoon." Cate's looks were growing on him. She was attractive in a plain, athletic way. He was guessing her age to be closer to forty now that he was talking to her. She'd be a good one to have in his cache if it rolled around to that. If he grew desperate again.

"Yes, I guess I do," Cate replied. Miss Logan smiled a broad, happy smile. She'd love a romance right under her nose if it couldn't happen for her.

"If you're looking for work, you must be planning on staying here for a while," Miss Logan said. The subject thrown back on him, he kept backing himself into a corner. Not really wanting a job, he just needed to keep looking to keep the unemployment check coming. But this wasn't information he wanted the world to know. His old ways of wanting to be front of center were not working for him this afternoon.

"We'll see how things go." He stood up and extended his hand, eager to get away from teatime before he said something too revealing again. "Thank you both for a fascinating afternoon. I think I'll go to my room and prepare for the evening." Miss Logan gave him her hand first.

"How long are you staying?" she asked.

"He paid for a week," Cate said. "We have seven days to drill him for more information." But she said it teasingly.

"I'll go back to my car and get my bags," he said. Noelle popped into his mind. He wasn't going to go back to Saint Augustine, but he wasn't going to let her know.

AFTER SUNSET, ALAN Johnson left the boarding house to walk along the riverfront. Restaurants and shops stayed open late, and the streets outside of pubs and cafés were crowded with bistro tables and chairs. Those lucky enough to get seating after an hour's wait were eating and drinking outdoors, people watching. Alan was in a quandary. He knew all he had to do was ask and someone was bound to know where Margaret was. It was while he was strolling along, that the name Ellen Fisher hit him. Ellen Marie. Ellen Marie Fisher. Ellen Fisher and her stepfather; the newspaper at the Overlook Drive-in. Ellen Fisher and her stepfather, Frank McPherson, dance partners at Longbow Middle School Ninth Grade Graduation. His heart was thumping in his chest.

Pushing his way through the crowded streets, he stopped at an open drug store and went inside, asking for a phone. It was at the back of the store, and he went in, shutting the folding door behind him. It was hot in the booth, but he didn't mind it, the sweat beading on his upper lip as he thumbed through the Clarke County phone book. He came to McPherson, grateful his memory didn't fail him. He pointed to the first names and went down the list; Albert, Cosmos, Benjamin, David, Enid, Frank. Step-father, Frank McPherson. He saw the address and tried to memorize it. Putting down the book, he opened up the folding door.

"You gotta map of the area?" he asked the pharmacist. The man dug around behind the counter and came up with a tattered map.

"You can go in the back room if you need to spread that out," the man said. Alan thanked him, nervous about being so conspicuous. Checking the index of towns, he found Seymour, the address smack dab on the river. It looked easy enough to get to from Beauregard if he just went upriver ten miles. He'd have to figure out how to get through that wood; Comstock Forest, a green area that extended from the address to a large tan area called Hallowsbrook.

"What's Hallowsbrook?" he asked, bringing the map back to the pharmacist.

"Why it's the state hospital," he said. "One of the few left in the country. For the criminally insane."

"Is that right?" Alan asked, intrigued. "Thanks for the use of the map."

"My pleasure." Alan walked back to the boarding house, and when he got there, he decided he was going to go to Seymour and find Ellen. He might not approach her, but he wanted to know where she was. He didn't want to call, either. What would he say?

At Towering Pines, he didn't go inside. Cate wouldn't know he'd come back unless she looked out and saw that his car was gone. He remembered the way to the edge of town and the state hospital according to the map. It was a winding road through what appeared to be a lovely, although poorly lit neighborhood. Reaching the hospital, he parked his car outside the gates at the river. He was going to creep along the banks past the forest. Dark woods didn't bother him, but river creatures did, so in the places where fallen logs obstructed his path or marshy areas ruined his shoes he cursed, sorry he hadn't changed them to a pair of sneakers. After an hour of bushwhacking through the black woods, he reached a clearing.

He saw her right away. The house was modest; a small cottage in the clearing and a young girl on the porch with her feet up on the step, her head resting on her knees. He watched her for at least ten minutes, and then suddenly she sprung up and ran into the house, yelling "Frank."

Alan turned back and trudged as quickly as he could back to his car, covering the miles in less than an hour this time. He drove to Cate's, happy there wasn't anyone to see his return, just in case trespassing was a crime. His shoes were dry by the time he'd arrived, and he took them off and slapped them together to rid them of the sand that clung to the soles. He tiptoed up to his room and it wasn't until he shut the door and leaned against it that he realized he was breathing hard, frightened. He'd seen his daughter. Ellen Fisher.

The next morning, he woke up as soon as he smelled coffee. Miss Logan and a rangy looking character by the name of Emil Magda were sitting at the large rectangular table, having coffee and scrambled eggs and toast.

"We help ourselves for breakfast," Miss Logan said. "Scrambled egg casserole with bacon and toast this mornin'. Cate does good by us in the food department." Alan nodded and went to the sideboard. There was a stainless steel pan with a can of Sterno under it. Seemed like overkill for so few people, but he supposed it kept her from having to serve everyone separately. Next to a bowl of fruit salad stood a toaster and a loaf of white bread. He decided the more he could eat at the house, the less money he'd have to spend on food, so he put two pieces of bread in the toaster and heaped up the eggs and fruit. He pulled a chair out next to Miss Logan.

"Emil Magda, meet Alan," Miss Logan said. "Emil here works maintenance down at the state mental hospital." Alan looked over at the man; was he a man? It was difficult to tell, he was very slender, and appeared to be tall, with shoulder length, thick wavy hair and brown eyes with long eyelashes, like a cow. Alan looked at the man's chest; he might have small breasts under his clothes. Wearing a standard khaki short-sleeved work shirt with a pocket protector in the pocket, he also had dark-rimmed glasses and dirty fingernails. His hands confirmed his gender for Alan; no woman would go around with fingernails like that, even if she were a grease monkey. It made him sick to watch the man eat, scooping up eggs with a knife and toast instead of using a fork. He nodded in Emil's direction after the introduction but didn't try to engage him and he didn't seem interested in Alan, either, thank God.

Alan anxiously waited for the man to finish and go to work if that's where he was headed, so he could find a way to get Miss Logan to talk about Seymour. Surely if she was a hairdresser in the town of Seymour, she'd know of the Fisher women. Or was it Margaret McPherson?

Miss Logan took a carafe of coffee off a trivet in front of her and poured a cup. "You want coffee, Emil?" He shook his head.

"Gotta get going to work," he said, pushing his chair from the table.

He put his plate and napkin in a bin for dirty dishes and left without saying goodbye. Alan slowly exhaled. The guy gave him the creeps.

"Coffee for you?" she asked Alan and he nodded, pushing his cup toward her.

"Do you work today?" he asked. She nodded her head.

"Yep, goin' in a moment. Sleepy old Seymour, the women there need to get their hair done just like the big city dwellers do."

She had no way of knowing that a sheriff's car would zoom through town on its way to Frank's that morning, looking at footprints in the sand at the river's edge and that she was talking to the very culprit.

"What do the women in town do for a livin'?" he asked. "Doesn't seem like much industry there."

"No, that's true. But we have the café and they hire two waitresses who've been there twenty years. Mary and June. And of course, the grocery; they got two women workin' the cash registers. Over at the clinic, Margo is the nurse practitioner. And that leaves the Post Office and Jessie the postmistress. No one else hiring but me, and my beauticians come from other places, just like I do.” She smiled at Alan. “And you know what? They’re all single. Not a married one among em’, not a one. What do you suppose that stems from?”

“You must have a lot of bachelors,” he said, amused.

“Well, we got the baggers at the grocery; most of them homeless, too, or live in a trailer home down in Mobile and take the bus in everyday, and then of course, there’s Frank. But I doubt if Frank will give any of the gals in Seymour the time of day. He never did before his wife showed up and now she’s gone, it don’t look like he’s much interested again.”

Margaret was gone? Alan’s heart skipped a beat. He wondered before why the picture didn’t mention a mother. And the little girl yelled for “Frank,” not Mom when he frightened her last night.

“What happened to his wife?”

Alan tried not to seem too interested, or too eager, but it made no difference to Miss Logan because she launched right in.

“Oh, that’s such a sad story. I remember the day Margaret came to Seymour. She had the kind of looks that make everyone; man, woman and dog stop and take notice. The car she was drivin, an old beat up thing, died right in front of Frank’s garage.”

“Why’d she come to Seymour?” Alan interrupted.

“Evidently, she was on her way to some place in Texas and got lost. Travelers make a wrong turn back in Mobile and end up in Seymour, but Margaret was the first I knew of that stayed. Anyway, she had a little one with her, so Frank had her to wait over in the café across the street from his garage. If you ever visit the town, you best try the pie at the café. Any kind is delicious. My favorite is the cherry.” She sipped her coffee and Alan waited.

“I will definitely try the pie,” Alan replied patiently. “What happened next?”

“Frank needed a part for her car so he couldn’t get it fixed for a few days. Mary, the waitress I told you about at the café, also rents rooms in her house and arranged for Margaret and the little girl to stay there. Over that weekend she and Frank fell in love and she never left Seymour.”

Hearing this, Alan became livid. It took one weekend for that whore of a woman to hook the only single guy in town. He struggled to slow his breathing down so Miss Logan would keep talking; he wanted to yell at her but knew he wouldn’t get much more out of her if he did.

“When did they get married?” Alan asked softly, his pulse pounding in his throat.

“They waited a month. The town talked regardless. Frank was a bachelor and didn’t date much at all that we could see after high school.” She leaned closer and whispered. “There was even talk that he might be, you know, sweet.”

Disgusted Alan ignored her. Getting her to talk about what was happening in Frank and Margaret’s lives now might anger Miss Logan once the truth about him came out, but it was a risk he was willing to take.

“Their marriage has lasted all these years, so that mustn’t be an issue,” he stated, trying to get down to business.

“Oh yes, that’s true. They were happily married until she took sick. Spent the last ten years of her life in the mental hospital, right up until she died last March.” The wind sucked out of Alan’s lungs, he gasped, but Miss Logan didn’t notice and continued talking. “They were only together those few years and then the judge committed her to Hallowsbrook. Me and the rest of the people thought it was premature; it didn’t seem like they’d given her much time to clean up her act. But the judge threatened Frank, or so the story goes. Either allow the commitment to stay in place or lose the girl.”

Alan thought of what it would mean for a man to have to care for a small child all those years. He remembered Ellen's scream for Frank in the dark. He was her source of protection when Alan didn't even know she existed. Strange feelings of jealousy were trying to work to the surface, but he wasn't going to pretend he was something he wasn't. He might not have been involved in the kid's life even if he'd known about her when she was an infant, thinking back to a time when it was so easy to take the woman's money and skip out on her. She'd pleaded with him and he wondered now if it was because she knew she was pregnant. The janitor back in Saint Augustine said she'd lost her job; she must have felt desperate. At the time, if he was honest with himself it wouldn't have mattered.

He felt differently now. Margaret was dead and the kid was his flesh and blood, maybe. He had to know. If she wasn't his, he'd be fine with it. But she might be. There were new tests, blood tests that could determine almost one hundred percent if a child was a man's own. He read the paper, he knew about such things. Getting to the point of demanding such a test had to be navigated with finesse. It would mean approaching Frank McPherson. Miss Logan could fill in the blanks and make it possible for him to sound like he knew what he was looking for when the time came.

"How'd Margaret act that got her into trouble? Was it something Frank knew from the get-go? Or did it take him by surprise?"

"Oh no, no one knew about it. She was insane. Mary said she saw right away, but it wasn't her business. Now Mary is a busy body, so you can't be sure to trust what she says. I myself didn't see anything untoward. Right after the wedding, they stayed isolated out at Frank's place. He did all the shopping and what have you, Margaret stayed home with the child and did the garden. The garden is fabulous, by the way; you need a treat for the eye, go out to Frank and Ellen's and see it for yerself." Alan stifled a yawn; he'd have to keep steering Miss Logan back to the story.

"So when could Frank tell she was sick?" Miss Logan looked at him strangely.

"She was mental, not sick. If I remember correctly, she kept takin' off. He'd have to enlist the aid of the sheriff's office from time to time and they usually found her within an hour. But the last time she was gone over a period of days and the judge thought that was enough reason to lock her away for good. She'd already had thirty day stints and they'd give her drugs and electric shock." Alan reeled and this time she noticed. "Yep, you heard me. Even that wasn't enough."

As much as his curiosity was peaked, he'd heard all he could bear. He was a man, not a monster. He did have feelings of a sort for the woman at one time. Imagining her being kooky enough to have to be electrocuted made him feel awful. But he had one more question.

"How'd she die?" He was almost afraid to ask, but his curiosity got the best of him.

"No one knows," Miss Logan said. But then she leaned in and whispered. "Mary, Miss Busy Body, visited Margaret every week. She was the only one allowed to go in. She said she took her own life."

"She killed herself?" Alan asked, horrified.

"That's what it means," Miss Logan replied. "She was perfectly fine one day and dead the next."

"How? How'd she do it?"

She shook her head. "No idea. Don't even know if it's true. There was something not right between Mary and Margaret, you ask me."

Once again, she'd managed to shock him. Appalled Alan stood up. He'd heard enough out of her. He wanted to run away, to tell her she was disgusting, but the thought came to him that he better keep Miss Logan on his side in case of more pressing matters, like paternity questions. The Margaret Fisher he knew wouldn't answer the door without full makeup on; he didn't see her committing suicide.

She was looking at him from the corner of her eye. "You seem pretty upset for not knowin' the family." He decided to keep his ruse under cover for now.

"Well it was an awful story, Miss Logan. I beg your pardon if I'm upset by it. I cannot imagine what the poor husband must have felt, getting that news."

"Tell you the truth; they didn't make much of it. The funeral was simple; no one spoke on her behalf except Frank. Mary was the only other person who knew her well enough to say anything, and they didn't invite her to speak." Miss Logan leaned in again. "I thought it very strange that they put her in her wedding dress, too. You could see the side seams running along the front of her bodice; the dress was so small. It was a crime Frank didn't get her something more appropriate to lay in. Being a hairdresser and all, I looked for evidence of the, um, suicide, but couldn't see anything. Crazy people go to such lurid lengths to end their lives, I thought for sure her wrists would be cut or her neck; something dramatic. But there wasn't nothin' to see."

Alan moved away from the table and nodded his head in her direction, but was afraid to open his mouth. She was awful; the little respect he had for Miss Logan vanished for the time being.

Quickly going up to his room, he wanted to think about Margaret for a bit before he drove into Seymour. After he called Noelle, he was going to go to the café for lunch and hopefully hook up with Mary, surely a better source of information about Margaret since she and Ellen had lived with her for a brief time and according to Miss Logan, knew Margaret.

He couldn't associate the Margaret who would kill herself with the one who was so generous and happy back in Saint Augustine. It didn't meld. Was she that good an actress? Or did his poor treatment of her, the taking of her money and abandoning her push her over the brink? Alan Johnson had just the kind of deluded ego that would make him think he was worthy of driving a woman insane.

"Poor Margaret," he said out loud. "I'm sorry." He sat on the edge of the bed and thought about what he'd done with his life, the people he'd used, the lies he'd told. It didn't feel like he had much choice to do otherwise, always with an excuse. There was still part of him disappointed because he couldn't get anything more from her, now that she was dead.

He got up and ran a comb through his hair. He could make a collect call from the phone in the hallway downstairs, but he wanted privacy when he talked to Noelle, so he decided to go back to the drug store. Thankfully, the dining room was empty when he walked past, Miss Logan on her way to Seymour. The sulfuric smell of breakfast egg casserole lingered.

"Have a nice day," Cate said, sitting at her desk, startling him. Annoyed, he forced a smile and said goodbye. He needed to keep it pleasant in case he ran into money problems. It looked like Cate's rooming house might have to be his address for a while.

THREE CARS WERE WAITING for service when Ellen and Frank arrived at the garage the next morning. “Oh boy,” he said. “Busy day ahead.”

“I’ll get the mail,” Ellen said.

“Careful crossing,” Frank said, distracted, nodding his head at the street.

Ellen looked both ways before stepping off the curb. Going into the post office was one of the things she liked least about coming into town with Frank, but never complained for it was such a simple thing to do. Jessie was annoying in that she was always looking for a story. When she handed the mail over to Ellen this time, Ellen didn’t even look at it.

Jessie couldn’t help herself. “You got somethin’ else from that dance academy,” she said nodding her head toward the pile. “I bet they want you two to dance in Beauregard.” Ellen paused, trying to decide if she should laugh it off or give in to Jessie’s curiosity and open the letter.

“You’ll be the first to hear if that’s what it is,” Ellen said respectfully, hurrying out the door. She waved and gave Jessie a little smile so the woman couldn’t complain to the rest of the village that Ellen had been rude.

As soon as she opened the door to the garage office, Frank called to her. “Now I need you to run over to the auto parts store. Are you okay with going?”

“Of course,” she answered, forgetting the letter from Phillip Anderson Dance Academy. The garage was busy all day, and it wasn’t until they were getting ready to leave and Frank scooped up the pile of mail that Ellen remembered the letter.

“Oh! Frank I forgot. We heard from that dance place again,” she said as they walked to the truck.

“The academy?” he replied, snickering. “Such a grand name for a ballroom next to a pool hall. Read it to me if you want.”

She carefully tore the envelope open. “Dear Mr. McPherson. You and Miss Ellen are cordially invited to attend our June Extravaganza. Prizes will be awarded for the following categories...” The invitation listed the possible entries. Ellen looked over at Frank as he drove. There was a slight grin on his lips.

“What’d you think?” she asked. “It might be fun. Something different.” She imagined getting dressed up again and twirling around the dance floor, how good it made her feel to know they danced well together and that people admired them. In Beauregard, onlookers would be strangers, not the gossipers of Seymour. Picking up the letter, she started to read again. “Prize for the couple who wins First Place will receive Five Thousand Dollars. Fireworks will follow the dance.”

“If we won First Place, I’d make my own fireworks! Do you want to go, sister?” He was smiling now, pleased that she was asking something for herself, a rarity.

“I think I might,” she answered hesitatingly. “I can wear my dress from graduation.”

“Oh, I think a new dress is in order. This will be our first real dance in the city.” Not that Beauregard was a city. “It won’t make you sad now, will it?”

“You mean Hallowsbrook and all?” Ellen asked and Frank nodded. “Nope, I don’t even think of it, tell you the truth. When I do every so often, I just get mad at her. But that’s all. Not sad, not even sorry. Just mad.” Frank reached out for Ellen’s hand. They weren’t used to touching or gestures of love unless they were dancing. The squeeze of his hand had the immediate affect of comforting her.

“Okay then, it’s a done deal. We go to Beauregard for the June Extravaganza. I might wear my hula girl tie, if you talk me into it.”

Ellen began to giggle, covering her face with her hands. “Oh no, please Frank, not that tie!”

“You talked me into it!” Frank laughed. Reaching the house, they got out of the truck, happy to be home.

Once inside, Frank asked her to start dinner for him tonight. “I’ve got a call to make. I’ll just take a minute.” He’d removed a package of chicken from the freezer before they left for the garage that morning. Measuring flour into a bowl, she added salt and pepper and mixed it with a spoon, straining to hear what he was saying, but his voice was so low and he was speaking so softly, there was no point. She’d make fried chicken. The chicken preparation occupied her so that when he came to her, she jumped.

“Sorry for scarin’ you,” he said. He picked up a fork and pierced the chicken with it but it was too tough. Trying not to laugh, she’d fried a stewing chicken. “Sister, I think we might have a time eatin’ this, no offense.” She paused and looked at the pan with the pieces bubbling in the hot oil.

“What’d I do, Frank?” Ellen’s hands dropped to her side, and the look of defeat was too much for Frank, so he hugged her to his chest, stroking her hair.

“That’s a stewer’ you got there, that’s all. Cook it up good and crisp and we might be able to get our teeth in into it.” He couldn’t help himself; he started to laugh as he released her, putting his arm around her shoulder. They looked at the pan of chicken and laughed out loud.

“Leave dinner,” he said. “Let’s dance.” She held his hand as he led her into the living room. Putting the radio on, and as smoothly as if they were at a ballroom, Ellen fell into his arms and they started to sway to the music, singing along with the words.

From the field to the south side of the house near the riverbank, the embrace appeared more passionate than paternal, the angle was just wrong, so that the observer, cowering in the tall grasses, blood pressure building would make sure to spread whispers about the stepfather and his stepdaughter and their inappropriate touching around town.

• • • •

THE NEXT DAY WAS ANOTHER busy day at the garage. One customer after another brought their cars in for Frank, so that neither father nor daughter noticed groups of women standing at the edge of the building, looking inside at Ellen, or even the baggers whispering. After the stewing chicken mishap of the night before, they decided to cook dinner together from now on. At five, Frank came into the office.

“Bout that time, sister,” he said. On the way home, they talked excitedly about the dance in Beauregard, talking about what Ellen would wear.

“I think something with a circle skirt would be nice, something that will twirl,” Ellen said.

“We need to make sure it matches my hula girl tie,” Frank said, laughing as he turned into the driveway.

“I don’t think that’s possible, Frank,” Ellen said happily, getting out of the car. It wasn’t until she reached the porch and as was customary, looked off to the side of the house where the gardens were that she realized something was amiss.

“The peonies are gone.”

“They’ve just fallen over,” Frank said, distracted, unlocking the front door lock that was temperamental in the best of times. Ellen was looking around the yard, to the edge of the wood.

“No Frank, they’ve all been cut. Just the flower heads.” She yanked on his shirtsleeve until he stopped fussing with the lock and looked over to the flowerbeds. The peony bed was one Margaret planted the first year she moved into the house. Ellen tended the flowers with her until she left for Hallowsbrook. She knew the names of each hybrid, what their care involved, how to stake the stems to keep the flowers upright.

Frank looked up from the lock, frowning. “That’s impossible.” But Ellen was pointing at the cut stem ends, and Frank followed her finger with his eyes.

“You’re right,” he said, moving over to the edge of the porch, going back down the steps to the side of the house. “See anything else out of place? I’m callin’ the sheriff again.” Ellen followed him down the steps to the edge of the lawn where the annual flowerbeds started. Frank’s mother had gardens here, and then Margaret, and now Ellen and Frank.

“Oh,” she said sadly. “Look at what he’s done. All the roses, too.” Not a flower left; it was only mid summer. The garden was at its peak, everything in bloom, laying in wait for dog days, when the spent blooms would shrivel up and no amount of watering could make them return to the glory days of spring and early summer. Whoever had picked every flower head and bud. It was an ugly, green mess. Frank looked up at Ellen and took her by the shoulder, turning her around.

“He?”

“I suppose it was the man at the edge of the wood.”

Frank frowned, concerned. He couldn’t have her worrying about the stranger. If he in fact was responsible for the destruction of the garden, Frank himself would kill the man with his bare hands.

“Let’s let the sheriff figure it out, okay sister? You put this out of your head right now. We’ll plant more flowers until these plants bloom again.”

“It’ll be forever. He took the buds, too.” Frank scratched his head, not prepared to coax Ellen into good humor; he’d never seen her as distressed, even when her mother died.

“Let’s get inside and call the sheriff,” he said again, gently pushing her toward the house, wishing he’d made her go inside as soon as they got home. What if the perpetrator was lurking in the wood, observing them now? The thought sent chills down his arms.

Submitting to him, Ellen stumbled back into the house distraught. Why would anyone pick her flowers? It had to be personal. It wasn’t as if they lived in town and a passerby might take a pretty flower. No, this was deliberate. Someone had gone out of the way to upset her, the message of the culprit heard loud and clear; he was trying to frighten her. He guided Ellen into the chair that had been Margaret’s so he could make his call. She sat, listening to the droning of his voice, remembering when she was small, laying in bed at night and hearing that same voice followed by the light, musical voice of her mother, how safe it made her feel. She closed her eyes and imagined that sense of safety in the house now.

“They took a report, but there’s nothing can be done,” he said, jolting her out of a trance. “Send a car around every few hours is about it. I reckon we’d better take precautions with the house and truck at night. Make sure we lock the windows and keep the basement door bolted tight.

“You don’t think he’ll try to break in the house, do you Frank?”

“Oh no,” he answered, cursing himself for being so thoughtless. “Just being careful.”

“I was just thinking of momma, how nice it was when she was home. I think I miss her tonight.” Ellen laughed. “That’s a first.” Frank came over to her and kneeled in front of her, his hands on the arms of Margaret’s chair.

“I miss her, too, Ellen.

SALLY LOGAN LEFT FOR her salon soon after breakfast. The new boarder had spiced up her morning with his dashing good looks and interesting conversation, after no one else but Emil for a long time, and she hummed a child's cartoon song as she gathered her belongings, a new spring in her step walking toward the front hall.

"Someone's in a good mood," Cate said.

"It's nice having that handsome man around here after Emil and Mr. Rosen," she whispered.

"I hear you," Cate replied, loyalty preventing her from saying more.

"I wonder how long it will take Mary to discover he's here."

"Before the week is up?" Cate replied. Miss Logan let out a laugh.

"Jeez, that's even quicker than I was going to say. But you got it. Before the weekend."

"Have a nice day," Cate said. Miss Logan waved and opened the door to the porch, a blast of hot summer air hitting her in the face. The walk to the bus stop loomed ahead, but she concentrated on what lay before her. She loved her shop, albeit in the town of Seymour. The women who worked for her were her family, the customers from the town, her friends. Everyday was full of adventure. But she'd decided she was keeping Alan Johnson to herself. If his name eventually came up, it wouldn't be because she'd introduced it.

The air-conditioning on the bus wasn't working that morning. "Are you serious, Hal? It's ninety out there already."

"I'm sorry, Miss Logan, I'll have it looked at as soon as I get into Seymour."

"It's a travesty that the only garage for fifty miles is in godforsaken Seymour," she muttered under her breath.

"Sally Logan, I heard that!" Miss Logan looked behind her and Margo Portland was sitting two rows down.

"Now why on earth didn't I see you when I got in this hot tin can? Don't move," she said when Margo started to get up. "I'll come back to you." She was careful walking down the aisle as the bus turned the corner for the highway.

Margo slid over on the seat. "Why're you in Beauregard so early in the morning?" Miss Logan asked.

"I had files to take to Hallowsbrook and Frank's lookin' at my car."

"Gotcha," Miss Logan said. "I've got news. You have to swear you won't tell a soul. I'm not talkin' about it at the salon because I want to watch the scene unfold." She made a dramatic arc with her hand, forgetting the promise to herself that she wouldn't talk to anyone.

Margo laughed. "I hear you! There's nothing better than keeping a little bit back for yourself when there's a story to tell. Do you want to wait and let me find out on my own?" Miss Logan turned her head, shocked.

"You're kidding right? No! I'm bustin' to tell someone." She leaned in to whisper, although no one else was on the bus yet, Hal Baker was a known blabbermouth. "Cate got a new tenant and he's a looker. Tall, dark and handsome, goin' through a divorce, lookin' for work here." Although she'd love to take a shot at Alan Johnson, she was under no illusions; too old for him at nearing middle age. But she'd love it if Margo Portland landed him over Mary. Mary might be better looking, but she was not as smart and didn't have the personality Margo had. "I want you to get a crack at him before Mary does."

Margo leaned her head back in the seat and guffawed so loudly, Hal looked in the rearview mirror to make sure everything was okay. "I could never compete with her," Margo said, regaining composure. "I mean, look at her. She's stunning. Why didn't she do more with her life?"

“Her folks left her the house and I guess that little extra income sucked all her ambition up. She didn’t need to make much to get by,” Miss Logan said, sympathetically.

She didn’t add, for someone with as much education as you have, you didn’t do you much better, now did you? But she kept her mouth shut about it.

“Mary did okay by herself,” Miss Logan continued in her defense. “She certainly doesn’t let any grass grow under her feet.”

“She goes out all the time, weekdays and weekends, yet she never has a boyfriend. What’s that all about?”

A sly expression came over Miss Logan’s face. “Maybe not a boyfriend...” Margo looked at her, shocked.

“What are you saying, Sally Logan?”

“Oh don’t tell me you never heard the rumors,” she replied.

“I have no idea what on earth you are talking about,” Margo said emphatically. “None.”

“She goes both ways,” Miss Logan said, comically lifting her eyebrows up and down.

“That’s a lie,” Margo said. “It’s a bunch of gossips from your hair salon, jealous of her youth and beauty.”

“Now why’re you defending her?” Miss Logan said, exasperated. “We keep taking turns being loyal to her.”

Margo laughed again.

“We must be true friends, I guess. Mary is many things, but she’s no lesbian. I’d have gotten an inkling about it and there’s never been even a hint.”

“Maybe she’s just not attracted to you,” Miss Logan said, putting an end to the talk.

She knew for a fact that Mary went both ways because she’d come on to her. It wasn’t something she’d admit to Margo Portland though; keeping it to herself, often wondering what would have happened if she’d responded. It was material for nighttime fantasies.

The temperature in the bus rose as it bumped along, the women weary and sweating by the time they reached their destination in front of the post office. “Can you squeeze me in today? I just need a wash and blow-dry. The cut can wait.” Margo asked as they got off, waving goodbye to Hal. Miss Logan was grateful for Margo’s loyalty.

“Of course I can. When can you get away?”

“Around one, if that will work.”

“See you then,” Miss Logan said before she walked away.

Ellen watched the women getting off the bus from her garage office perch across the street. It was a familiar routine every morning; the men waiting to help customers with their grocery bags at the food store, Miss Logan coming to open up by ten, Mary walking across the street to start her shift at the café. The simple order of life in their village used to bring Ellen security; she was part of Seymour, her father was an important businessman, they were well thought of in town as far as she knew. But last night changed all that.

Coming home to her decimated garden so soon after the late night visitor frightened her caused something to shift, a sense of well-being exchanged with fear. Someone didn’t like her or Frank. A childlike confidence in which she felt she was the center of an adoring universe was replaced with anxiety. In her orderly way of thinking, Ellen tried to understand what possible reason someone would do what had been done to the garden; jealousy of Frank, anger over the unlikely possibility of a botched car repair, a classmate who suddenly no longer liked her. But the extent of the damage was such that her reasoning was flimsy. “Wonton destruction of property,” she heard Frank whisper to Sheriff Dalton. Coming on top of the stranger who lingered at the edge of the forest, this was too much of a coincidence.

THE BOARDING HOUSE kept Cate Ashbury busy until noon daily. She was a fanatic about bed making and bathroom cleaning, going from room to room as soon as the boarder vacated even temporarily, just like at a hotel. “You should only have to do it once a week,” Miss Logan had advised. “Most boarding houses don’t even offer cleaning services; the tenant has to do it.

“Yes, and that’s how a house gets bugs. No thank you. I want to see what condition the room is in every day.”

After three years, Emil Magda had finally gotten it through his thick skull that he was going to keep his room neat or Cate would throw away everything that he left out. She couldn’t force him to bathe, but she did relocate him to a neat single in the basement when the others complained about his hygiene. Mr. Rosen was able to convince him to stay out of the dining room unless he bathed, and although there was some debate about his adherence to the request, he was less smelly than he’d been in the past.

Each evening, Cate prepared the breakfast items, making fruit salad, assembling casseroles or the muffin batter, starting the oatmeal in a slow cooker, filling the coffee pot and setting the buffet table. The next morning, all she had to do was pop the casserole into the oven along with the muffins and turn the coffee pot on. Occasionally, she put out little boxes of dried cereal and a tray of ready-made pastries, but the lodgers seemed to like the change.

Although it wasn’t formerly part of the rent, she started serving dinner, too. Unsure how well it would be received, she was shocked when the residents showed up promptly at six every night for their evening meal. Like breakfast, dinner had evolved so they could expect certain dishes on certain nights. No one complained and no one ever passed up a meal, so she must have been doing it right and she was able to increase the rent.

After she finished cleaning the private rooms, she dusted and vacuumed the rest of the house and started dinner. Once dinner was underway, for the rest of the day she’d sit in an overstuffed chair on the porch with her feet up on an ottoman, the latest best seller in her hands. But after Alan Johnson checked in, Cate couldn’t relax on the porch, worried he’d show up and see her being lazy. Changing her routine, after cleaning up the breakfast dishes, she went to her room and primped. Hair long and straw colored; normally, she wore it in a braid down the middle of her back. Wanting something different, she twisted it around her hand and pinned the bun in place, but that was too different, so she combed it into a ponytail. Applying pale lipstick on, and penciling her eyebrows in; small changes that made a big difference in her appearance and gave her self-confidence a huge boost. She didn’t do it until Miss Logan was gone for the day; she’d make a big deal out of it and embarrass Cate. Hardly used to it herself, she wanted to feel what it was like before she showed herself off to anyone, so she stayed in her room to read after putting a sign on the door for visitors to ring the bell, hopeful that by dinner tonight, she’d be comfortable enough to dine with Alan Johnson.

Mary overslept, again. Exhausted from partying the night before, she would pay for it today, in the way she felt and the way she looked. Sleeping through the alarm, she only woke up because the neighbor’s dog barked.

“Oh, Lord,” she picked up the clock and squinted at it, unable to see the hands unless she put her dime-store magnifying glasses on. “Jesus!” she screamed, hoping He’d help her get to work on time.

Since her shift started in fifteen minutes, there wasn't time for a shower or to do much more than brush her teeth. The makeup on her face from the night before would have to do with a little fresh powder and lipstick, her hair in a ponytail. Glad she'd taken the time to do laundry the weekend before; at least her uniform was crisp and bright white. Grabbing her purse, sprinting to work, she got there just in time.

"Not like you to come in without time for a cup of," June said. "I was beginning to get worried."

"I'm sorry," Mary said, stashing her purse under the counter. "I went out last night and didn't get home until two."

"That's okay. As you can see, it's dead around here this morning. How much longer do you think you can burn the candle at both ends?" June said, wrapping silverware bundles with paper napkins. "It's gotta catch up with you, don't it?"

"It has already," Mary said sadly. "Look at me." She stood with her hands out at her sides, turning around. "I'm a wreck. I lost more weight, and not in a good way. My hair is a mess, that cigarette I sneak every so often is starting to show on my face. I've got to pull it together."

"You still look better than I ever did," June said. "I meant playing around with your health, honey. Not the way you look. You're still the best looking gal here in town."

"Aw, you're so sweet, June. Thank you." They looked up as the bell on the door jingled, and Mary involuntarily gasped. "Woa!"

"You take this one," June whispered, giggling. Alan Johnson had arrived.

"Sit anywhere you wish," Mary said, and then to June, "Why today of all days do I have to feel like I've been rode hard and put up wet?"

"You look great, as usual. No worries."

"So what can I get you?" Mary said, handing Alan a menu. "Coffee?"

Pulling the chair out from under the table, he looked around the café and then up at Mary, who was smiling at him, more than curious. This one was grinning at him, and he took it just the way she meant him to take it; she was going to flirt. The sins of the previous night forgotten, Mary would jump back up on the horse that threw her.

"What do I want? I guess it's too early for a drink," he said.

"No it's not. How about a Bloody Mary?" she asked, pointing to her nametag. Perking up at first when he realized she was thee Mary he was seeking, he grimaced and laughed, imagining the worst.

"Sorry, but that just sounds unappetizing. No offense. How about a shot of Kahlua in my coffee? I can build up to the vodka."

Mary laughed and nodded her head. "Okay. In the meantime, the french toast is to die for. They put a little rum in the egg wash."

"Thanks, but I've already had breakfast. I actually came here to see you." Mary stopped and turned back to the table.

"Me? Why?" Her heart did a little pitter-patter; was he a cop?

"Can you sit a few minutes and have a coffee with me?" She looked around the empty restaurant.

"I think that can be arranged," she said, trying to keep the flirtation out of her voice and failing. "I'll get your coffee and Kahlua." She turned to get the coffee and Alan watched her, trying to drum up interest and failing. I must be getting old, he thought. For the first time in his life, he was thinking about a woman with something other than his genitals and it was a little disconcerting. He looked around the café, at the antiquated cash register, and the linoleum topped tables and vinyl covered bar stools. It was a throwback to another time, one he wasn't crazy about. He hated anything old and moldering, maybe because of having lived in poverty most of his life. Why purposely choose to live that way?

Mary walked toward him with two coffee mugs.

“Here you go. Kahlua on the house.” Alan picked up the mug and took a sip, the egg casserole sitting in his stomach like a lead weight.

“Oh, that’s good. Thank you.”

“So what did you want to talk to me about?” she asked, sitting down next to him.

Her body language was making him uncomfortable; that was another thing. Anyone else would sit across the table to talk, but Mary would cozy right up to a stranger.

“I heard an interesting story at breakfast this morning,” he said, deciding to tell the truth without revealing his secret. “It’s just a coincidence that I’m staying at the same boarding house as Miss Logan.”

“Oh! Are you visitin’ the area?”

“Yes, but I’m looking for a job, too.” He looked around the café and then at her to prove a point, which she didn’t miss. “If I’d known about Seymour, I would have stopped here, first.”

“I rent rooms,” she said, smiling.

“I heard after the fact. But I drove to Beauregard instead. Towering Pines. Miss Logan and I talked during breakfast. Somehow the conversation went from bachelors in town, to Frank in particular.”

“Oh yes. Frank. So you want to know about Frank?”

Alan decided that allowing Mary to lead the conversation was better than conjuring up some outrageous lie to get information.

“Sure, we can start with Frank. Why aren’t you and Frank together is the first question that crosses my mind,” he said, pulling out the charm. Feed her ego, it can only help.

Without asking why he wanted to know, Mary launched right in.

“I’ve known Frank since I was a kid. He was just never interested. It hasn’t been for lack of trying to get his attention, either.”

“Who’d he date?” Alan asked, thrilled the conversation had taken the turn it had so quickly.

Mary thought back to those early days. Younger than he was, she wasn’t familiar with the kids he graduated with. But the girl, she remembered the girl. In love with Frank since she started kindergarten, when Mary saw him with Beverly Majors the first time it made her physically ill. It was the first week of high school and she was lingering with friends after classes, watching the upperclassmen walking to their cars. Frank always had the best car. He and his dad would scour the countryside looking for a wreck, and then tow it back to Seymour where they’d spend months tinkering and searching for parts. In spite of having an enviable car collection, since high school Frank drove the most unpretentious vehicles.

“Oh, just some girl from his grade,” Mary said, unwilling to relive those days in case old wounds she worked hard to suppress might fester again.

“He went away to school after graduation. Studied engineering I think. He lived above the garage after college and when his papa died, he moved into the family home. It’s nothing much; a cottage on the river.”

The derision about the cottage shocked her; a hot flash cruised through her body. She’d have given anything to live in that modest cottage. She twisted around in her seat and pointed out a window behind a row of booths.

“His shop is right there,” she said. “That’s Frank’s garage.”

Alan was leery about asking more. He didn't want Mary to get suspicious; he wasn't sure himself what his next move would be. Jumping right in, telling her Margaret Fisher was his ex and Ellen was his kid, well that might sound easier, but something told him it wouldn't be, that he'd better be careful around the likes of Frank McPherson. The man probably carried a gun.

"So," he drawled, looking at Mary with a Cheshire grin. "What's there to do around here?"

Mary tilted her head and looked at him carefully. "You mean like for relaxation? Or employment?"

Alan laughed out loud. "Both. But I'm thinking relaxation. With you. Would you go out with me?"

Mary wasn't sure about Alan Johnson. He was very smooth. But there was something about him she didn't trust.

"I don't even know you."

"Miss Logan will vouch for me, I bet. Isn't that her salon across the street?"

Mary nodded her head. But the last thing she wanted was for Sally Logan to know she was going on a date with the new guy in town.

"I believe you. Now just to keep it straight, I like my private business to stay private, and if Miss Logan has your ear, she's got everyone else's in town, as well. If I go out with you, you have to promise me that it's our secret. That woman has got a nose on her like a blood hound."

Alan started to laugh; Miss Logan said the same thing about her. But he'd remembered other, nasty things Miss Logan had said during breakfast, things that rankled. She might be capable of being vicious.

"You have my word, no conversation regarding our date with Miss Logan."

"So, what time do you get off work? I'll come back and pick you up. What will we do? You never answered me about what our choices are."

"Dancing. Everyone dances here. There are ballrooms all over the county, and every bar has a cabaret license. But the best place is Phillip Anderson's in Beauregard. The dance floor is surrounded by dining booths like they had in the old days." Alan's heart sunk; it sounded expensive and he was nearly broke. She must have seen his expression change. "Oh, don't you like to dance?"

"I love to dance," he said enthusiastically. "It's not that at all. I'm embarrassed. I'm here, looking for work." Strangely, she brightened right up.

"Oh, I got it. That's why you were asking about Frank! For a job, correct?"

"Well, I have spent my life working around cars," he answered.

"The ballroom is very inexpensive. Admission is only five dollars a person or eight a couple. They make their money off lessons and food. We can eat at my place first anyway."

"Thank you for understanding," he said smiling. "I'd like to take you out for dinner tonight. Eight dollars won't break the bank." He pushed back his chair.

"What do I owe for the coffee? I have some errands to run, but I'll be back later to pick you up. What's your address?"

Mary wrote the number down on the back of a ticket, along with her phone number. "See that street?" she pointed to a corner with Miss Logan's on one side and the library on the other. "I'm half way down the block. Say about six tonight?"

He took the paper from her and folded it neatly, tucking it in his shirt pocket. "Okay, six it is." Reaching in his wallet, he took out his billfold but she put her hand up.

"On the house, remember?" The doorbells jingled and they looked up as an elderly couple came in for lunch. "See you later." She smiled and walked to the counter to pick up two menus.

"Wherever you want folks," she said.

Alan waved and left the café, the sultry heat hitting him after the air conditioning. The summer weather was just like Galveston; humid, miserable. He could feel the heat radiating off the sidewalk as he walked to the car, almost painful through his shoes. Frank's garage was right across the street. He paused at his car door, looking over at the building, the front office window sparkling clean, the silhouette of a young girl sitting with her nose in a book visible clear across the street. He walked around his car and back up the sidewalk and a few steps to the grocery store. A bevy of unkempt looking men stood around, some sitting on a bench waiting to help shoppers with their bags. Looking across the street again, he could clearly see her. It made him angry that she was sitting in full view of the men. Wanting to get a better look for himself, he walked a few feet out of view of the garage before he crossed the street, trying to come up with a reason to talk to her. His car hadn't had an oil change in months. That was as good an excuse as any.

The big garage door was closed against the noonday sun so he was unable to see Frank right away. Opening the door to the office, a blast of cold air greeted him, and a beautiful, young replica of Margaret Fisher looked up from her book. She didn't smile at him, but her expression was pleasant.

"May I help you?" she asked softly.

"I've gotta Olds out front. Well, across the street, actually." He pointed down to the café. "Needing an oil change and this looks like the place."

She looked at a handwritten list tapped to the counter. "Frank can fit you in about two. Will that work for you?"

"Frank bein'?" he asked.

Ellen frowned, pointing to the name Frank painted on the door.

When he still didn't seem to get it, she slid off the stool and walked over to a door separating the office from the garage. Opening the door, Frank looked up.

"Frank McPherson," she answered, nodding her head toward Frank.

Alan looked at him, strong and handsome, probably younger than he was by a few years, and flushed. "Okay, got it. Sorry."

Frank nodded his head in greeting toward Alan.

"Howdy, bringing my car back at two for an oil change."

Frank nodded again and turned back to the engine he was working on.

"See you at two," Frank said from behind the hood. The girl was back up on her stool, waiting.

"What's yer name, please."

"Alan Johnson," he said, watching her write it down in neat small letters. Hair fell forward when she looked down, thick waves of auburn shine. Eyelashes rested on her cheeks and a small nose had a smattering of freckles on the bridge. She defined adorable.

"Okay then, Mr. Johnson. See you at two." She looked up at him, but there was no recognition on her face. Alan couldn't help himself, studying her face for that few seconds; he saw that she had his eyes and his hairline, a slightly croaked widow's peak. "Anything else, sir?"

"No, that's all," he said. She waited and he knew that if he stayed for one moment longer she'd be uncomfortable, so he nodded his head and opened the door to leave.

"You can wait, if you want," she said, misinterpreting his interest. "The coffee is fresh." Alan closed the door again.

"Okay, that sounds great." He looked at his watch; it was only a half hour wait. "I'd like that. It's hot out there today."

"Are you from around here?" She came out from behind the counter to pour his coffee and Alan was relieved that she was dressed appropriately for a teenager in rolled up blue jeans and an ironed cotton shirt, not provocatively at all like most young girls dressed nowadays. Hiding a grin, he thought it funny that he would suddenly change his opinion because she could be his daughter.

“No, from Texas actually. Just passing through.”

“Cream and sugar?”

“Yes, please.” He stood next to her in the small space, watching her thin arms perform the maneuvers necessary to fix coffee and there was something so vulnerable about her with her thinness and her pale skin and freckles, he got choked up without warning. Quickly taking a handkerchief out of his pocket, he wiped his eyes before she turned around, but she avoided looking him in the eye and didn’t see the tears.

“Thank you,” he said when she handed it to him. He took a sip. What was making him so sad wasn’t that she didn’t know they could be related, but if they were, what a horrible example he’d be for her. He had nothing to give her, no means of support. He didn’t even have a job. What would be the point of upsetting her life with Frank McPherson? If he did, it would be pure selfishness. But he longed to know her, now that he knew of her. He felt compelled to find out what he could about her, while something in him said to put the coffee cup down, make excuses and leave, never to return. But it was too late.

The door to the garage opened and a striking figure of a man stepped up into the office and extended his hand. “You can bring your car around now if you’re ready. The last job didn’t take as long as ’spected.”

“Okay, will do,” he said. “Thank you for the coffee, miss.” He nodded at Ellen and she smiled a small smile at him before he left to cross the street for the car.

“Oh look! There’s that handsome guy I was telling you about!” Miss Logan was working on Margo Portland’s hairdo when Alan left the café that afternoon. The women leaned forward, watching him walk in front of the grocery store, pause, and then walk across the street.

“He’s moving to Beauregard?” When Miss Logan said the new guy was handsome, Margo figured she meant Seymour handsome; that was any man who was clean shaven, wore a t-shirt under his overhauls, kept his stringy hair in a ponytail and had most of his teeth. This man was city handsome, black hair cut short, pressed pants, crisp white shirt.

“Well, he’s lookin’ for work,” Miss Logan answered.

“You weren’t kidding. He’s a looker alright.”

“I’m telling you, I can’t wait to get home tonight and have dinner with him,” Miss Logan admitted. “Even if it is Cate Ashbury’s cooking.” Margo laughed.

“I’m tempted to invite myself to come along,” she replied.

“You’re welcome to,” Miss Logan said. “Eat first, though. Let see, I think tonight is roast chicken and that’s usually pretty good so you might be safe to come hungry.”

“I was just teasing,” Margo said. “Can’t wait to get back to my place and put my feet up after work.” In case Boyd Dalton, the sheriff comes by.

Alan waited in the heat while the oil in his car was changed, preferring to suffer than to put Ellen on the spot. Remorse filled his chest; he was sorry he treated Margaret so badly; sorry he used her and took her money. Sorry he was such a failure. It was all too late to do anything about.

Frank opened the door to the sidewalk. “Your car’s ready, sir,” he said, holding the door open for Alan to pass. “Ellen here will ring up your bill.”

He wrote some figures down on a piece of paper and slid it over to her. “That’ll be fifteen dollars,” she said. Forgetting about his cash problem, Alan pulled out the credit card and handed it over to her. Ellen looked up him, apologetic. “Oh, I’m sorry. We don’t do credit cards.”

“Oh! Sorry, here, no problem.” He took fifteen dollars out of his wallet, cursing himself for not being more careful. No more spur of the moment purchases.

“Town talk says you’re lookin’ for work,” Frank said. “Hope I heard right and ain’t speakin’ out of turn.” Alan was speechless for a moment. Who’d he tell? Miss Logan? Cate? Mary? And already the news that he was looking for work made its way to this man?

“I guess news travels fast in small towns,” he answered, smiling. No point in being irritated. “I don’t have any car repair experience though if you have an opening. Sales are my specialty.”

“Is that right? Paul over at the auto parts store has an opening for a counter person. You want I can put a word in for you.” Alan tried not to show his disgust at the thought of the environment of parts. The parts department at the dealership was considered beneath the salesman because they weren’t paid on commission. Alan couldn’t imagine being an hourly worker again. Feeling like he’d been backed into a corner, Alan once again decided he had nothing to lose by just going with the flow.

“Well that would be mighty generous of you,” Alan replied, letting it go. Frank reached for paper and pen.

“I’ll give Paul a call and let him know you’ll be stopping by there this afternoon.”

“Okay, thank you very much.”

“Here are your keys,” Frank said, passing them off. Alan took the keys, wanting to get out before they engaged him again. “Don’t forget yer car.”

He turned around and looked at Frank, who was pointing at the garage.

“Oh, right. Excited about the job lead, I guess.” Frank nodded his head and held the door to the garage open, waiting for Alan to pass by.

When the car was out of the garage, Frank shut the overhead door.

“Anything else comin’ in today?” He leaned over Ellen’s shoulder to read the schedule and then walked over to the window, watching Alan Johnson drive away, failing to stop at Paul’s Auto Supply.

“Looks like a tune up at three, and that’s it for the day unless a breakdown comes in. I guess I could go home and start dinner,” Ellen said. Frank turned to her, thinking of the stranger at the edge of the wood, the decimated garden.

“Stay here, sister, will you? I got a feelin’ about a breakdown coming in. I know, crazy, but just in case.” Ellen laughed, and nodded her head.

“Okay. I’m glad cause I just got to a good part in my book,” she said, holding it up so he could see the cover, a beautiful couple in a passionate embrace. He laughed and nodded his head, going back into the garage to clean up from the oil change and get ready for the tune up, knowing Ellen was safe with him.

DINNER WAS READY. CATE had everything set out on the sideboard, the chicken carved, potatoes mashed to perfection, hot rolls, corn on the cob. Miss Logan, although preoccupied with something she'd seen earlier that evening, tried not to allow the distraction interfere with her anticipation of having dinner with Alan. Dressed in her most alluring hostess pajamas, she didn't notice that Cate, too had taken extra care with her appearance and was wearing something other than the usual chambray shirt and jeans.

"Gosh, I don't think we should wait too much longer," Cate said, looking at her watch. Mr. Rosen folded the evening paper and put it on the table to the side of his plate.

"Who is this man that has all the women in my house in a dither?"

"If you'd come down for breakfast, you'd have seen," Miss Logan said, disappointed, tucking her napkin in her shirt before standing up. "I'm gettin' some food. It's clear he's not comin' so no point in letting everything get cold. This looks wonderful, by the way. Margo Portland almost came down here to eat with us so she could meet Mr. Johnson."

Cate stood off to the side, wiping the lipstick off her mouth with a paper napkin. "Yeah, well it's a good thing she didn't waste her time. I guess I shouldn't have expected him because he didn't pay for dinner. I guess it's my fault."

"Are we going to eat or not?" Emil asked.

"Get up for goodness sake," Miss Logan reprimanded, out of sorts. "You want someone to serve you?" The tenants lined up silently to get their food. Next to the heated pans on a cut glass cake plate stood a whipped cream frosted angel food cake covered in fresh strawberries.

"You went to a lot of trouble for us today, Cate," Mr. Rosen said. "I appreciate it. And I'm sorry I missed breakfast. I didn't feel well this morning, Sally Logan for your information. One of these days you'll find me dead in my bed and then you'll be sorry you were such a witch."

"I might be sorry I've been a witch, but I'll never be sorry I was a witch to you."

Laughter rang out, easing the tension in the room between the women, the disappointment slowly turning to anger. How dare he stand them up?

"Children, children," Cate admonished laughing. "Don't fight during dinner. Miss Logan, no one would dare call you a witch to your face."

"Gee, thanks, Cate. That really helped."

The banter continued through the meal, but both women would be up until after midnight, listening for the sound of a door opening and shutting that never came.

Alan Johnson snuck into the boarding house at four the previous afternoon, returning right after the encounter with Frank and Ellen McPherson. Cate wasn't at the desk, having fallen asleep in her room reading the book. He quickly changed his clothes and left without her discovering him, making it back into Seymour before Paul's Auto Supply closed.

The inside of the store was as depressing as Alan imagined it would be; badly lit, stacks of greasy boxes full of metal parts, serial numbers written in black oil pencil in bad handwriting. Rows of metal shelving stood so close together, a grown man could barely get through unless he walked sideways. The counter was covered with parts manuals, one for every car manufacturer. Rows of books from years past neatly lined the shelves at the end of the metal parts shelving, sharing the space with the owner's collection of vintage metal gadgets, having the look of a steampunk library. But the coop de grace was the man behind the counter himself, the quintessential counter guy, thin bordering on anorexia, bad skin, bad teeth, fingers nicotine stained, hair in a brush cut, body contrasted contradictorily in a perfectly starched and ironed navy blue uniform looking more like a Boy Scout than a auto parts clerk.

“Help you, sir?” the man said. Alan noted that everyone in Seymour called a man sir. It was a little disconcerting because he was sure this guy was older than he was.

“Yes, I’m Alan Johnson. Frank at the garage said you might have an opening for a parts clerk.”

“That I do,” he said. “I’m Paul. Paul Sherman. Owner of Paul’s Auto Supply. You got experience in the industry?”

“Not in parts sir, that I do not. But I’ve been a salesmen in the auto industry for, well, for over thirty years now. Since high school.”

“Car salesman, is that right?” He drew out the AR in car, so that Alan wanted to laugh and it took all the self-control he had not to.

“Yes sir, car salesman.” The impulse to pronounce car the way Paul Sherman had was overpowering and Alan had to look down at the floor, pinching his hand as hard as he could to stop himself. “But I’m a fast learner. I know all about serial numbers so I think I could do a good job for you.”

Paul looked at him and scratched the back of his neck.

“Frank tells me you’re new in town. Have a date with Mary tonight. Is that right?”

Alan stepped back, shocked. Mary must have been the one to tell Frank he was job hunting then, not Miss Logan. He wanted to tell the man to mind his own fucking business, but he needed the job.

“Yes, sir.”

He gritted his teeth. Why was he doing this? He didn’t want to work in a parts store, yet here he was, practically begging this prick for a job.

“Look, Mr. Sherman, sir, can I have the job or not? I need to get over to Mary’s by six.” He thought that’d shut him up good and it worked.

“Okay, tomorrow morning at nine. I operate nine to five, Monday thru Friday, no holidays, no overtime, no weekends. Five-fifty per hour. Paid vacation after six months, no sick time but holidays that fall during the week are paid.”

Alan stuck his hand out to shake, a big mistake. “I’ll take it,” Alan said cringing.

He left quickly, hoping Mary would let him use her bathroom to wash his hands as soon as he got there. Paul Sherman’s hand left a trail of warm slime behind where he touched Alan. He was being obsessive, but didn’t care.

Mary’s house was easy to find, a smallish Cape Cod-type bungalow with a rambling addition off the back that looked like an afterthought. It was her personal apartment, which was separate from the rooms she rented to strangers. Parking in the driveway, he ran up to her porch and pounded on the door.

“Right on time,” she said, stepping aside. He was looking around agitatedly.

“Where’s the bathroom. I need to wash my hands right now.” Hesitating, Mary stepped away and pointed to a door at the back of the kitchen.

“In there,” she said. “You can use the kitchen sink if you want.” She didn’t really know this man and he was behaving bizarrely. “Is there a problem?”

“I’ll tell you in a second,” replied, stopping in the kitchen, turning the water on in the sink full blast so it sprayed the front of his shirt. Grabbing the dishwashing soap bottle, he squirted enough in the palm of his hand to do a load of dishes.

“What happened?” Mary asked, concerned. “Are you okay?”

It was obvious Alan was agitated and unable to control his response to whatever was happening. Her questions swirled in his head and he wanted to say the correct thing, not chastise her for blabbing to Frank. Certain his craziness was partly due to meeting Ellen, he pushed it down, it being something he was not going to discuss with Mary.

Vigorously scrubbing his hands like he was preparing to perform surgery, Alan doubted he was capable of pulling off any intrigue, emotions after meeting Ellen too close to the surface. His nature was to take advantage of people, not pretend to have meaningful relationships, but if he was going to reform, he had to address the betrayal of confidence with Mary. She handed him a towel to dry off his hands. “What happened?” she repeated.

“Let’s go in there,” he said, pointing to the living room. She walked ahead of him and that was when he noticed she’d changed out of her uniform. “You look nice.”

“Thank you. Now what’s going on? You’re making me nervous.” Alan was pacing, wanting to word this just right.

“It was my understanding you wanted to keep your private life private. Those were your exact words. Correct?”

“Correct.” But she knew what he was getting at, and he could tell he struck a nerve because she flushed, her tan complexion turning ruddy.

“I was taken by surprise to hear you’d told Frank we were having a date and that I needed a job.”

“Yes, well I am sorry about that. I see now that I was wrong. I shouldn’t have said anything to him. I guess I thought it would be helpful.” She was sitting on the edge of the couch, looking fetching in a strapless sundress, her knees uncovered, just a hint of cleavage. Looking at her defused his anger, causing him to lose his train of thought.

“Oh well, it’s over with.”

“What just happened? You looked like you were ready to explode.”

“Yeah, I think I have you to thank. Evidently, the only job in town is at the auto parts store. What’s with Paul Sherman? Now I’ve gotta work with the man. He touches me once and I’m outta there.”

Just thinking about the encounter agitated Alan again, and he started to pace. Mary put her hand up at her face as unobtrusively as she could and burst out laughing.

“Poopy Paul? There’s nothing wrong with him that a good scrub down wouldn’t cure.”

“And what about that uniform? He’s as polished as an admiral.”

“Air Force habits die hard, I guess. Listen, I’m sorry about everything. So you got the job? That’s good news, isn’t it?” Alan turned from her and started to pace again. The urge to get in his car and flee, maybe even return to Noelle, was strong. Noelle. He’d never called her. If he was going to turn over a new leaf, he should call her and end it, not leave her hanging.

“I guess it is if you don’t have to work with him. Mary, I have to make a call. Will you excuse me? I’ll run over to the grocery store. There’s a phone there.”

“You can call from my phone.” She pointed to the kitchen.

“It’s personal,” he explained. “I’d rather not go into it now.”

“Well, I’ll sit outside then. You don’t have to go back uptown.” She left the room before he could protest. What he was about to do was so foreign to him he hardly knew where to begin. Dialing the number, he felt sick to his stomach.

She answered on the first ring. “Alan, I’ve been so worried. I thought you’d get in touch before this.” He took a deep breath and let it out slowly.

"I'm very sorry," he replied. "But I'm not coming back. I found a job and as soon as I get paid I'll send you a money order to cover whatever I owe you." There was silence for a moment.

"What the fuck are you talking about? I don't want your goddamned money! I thought we had something going. You said you love me!" He didn't know how to respond to her. They could go on and on. So he decided to end the call.

"Thank you for your help," he said. "I'm saying goodbye; so goodbye." And with that he hung up. He didn't feel great about it, but it was better than thinking about her waiting for him all the time. Now he could start fresh with... whomever.

Walking to the front door, he looked out at Mary sitting on the porch. She had nice hair, stylishly cut one length. At the café, she had it pulled into a ponytail but this afternoon, it was down around her shoulders. "Come back in. Thanks for the use of the phone." She got up from the porch and held onto the door he was holding for her.

"Is everything okay?"

"Well, yes and no. But I'm not ready to discuss it with you or anyone else yet. Is that okay? I mean, if it's not we can break our date and I won't bother you again. I just need time to take care of something, nothing sneaky, just private. Are you up for that?"

Mary wasn't used to men talking to her like this, caring what her opinion was, or asking her for something. They usually wanted only one thing and they took it and ran. This man might be interested enough that she'd have to sacrifice something. He was asking her to trust him and she had no idea with what.

"I think so. I'm not sure what you expect of me, but I guess I'm up for it. I mean, I hope you're worth it. I hope you think I'm worth it. We're just going dancing, right? For some reason, I'm getting pulled into your life and I wonder if that's what you want."

"Well, you helped me land a job, humble though it may be. If I have to be seen in a blue uniform I might not survive."

"Pretend you're a cop," she said, laughing. "Or in the Air Force. There's a base in Mobile." It made him laugh along with her, embarrassed.

"I think I'm going to insist I wear my own clothes."

"You can do that," she said. "By the way, I brought leftover beef roast home from the café so we can eat here. No need to go out and spend money neither of us has. I don't know why but being around you is making me think with a level head."

Alan frowned. "That, my dear is a new one. I don't believe I've ever had that effect on a woman before." But he laughed. "Maybe you'll change my luck."

"Maybe you'll change my luck!" she said.

"I appreciate the meal, too," he said. "But we can go out, now that I'm making the big bucks over at Paul's Auto Supply."

"I've got the food, so we should stay in and save your money until it starts to roll in again. What did you say you did in a former life? Something with cars, correct?"

"I sold them," he answered. "That's right. I'm a car salesman, or at least I used to be. I made an okay living at it until the market crashed. It's been a struggle these past months, years. Yep, it's been almost a year. They won't go on extending unemployment forever."

Mary waved him to follow her into the kitchen so she could start dinner. "So you came here to find a job?" He debated telling her the truth, but decided it was much too early.

"Yes, among other things. I had no idea I'd find one so soon. And not in Seymour."

She turned to him with a foil wrapped pack of beef. “How far in advance did you pay for your room?” It was a nervy thing to ask.

“Just a week. I can take the bus in with Miss Logan tomorrow.” Mary laughed out loud.

“Lovely. Fill her in on your latest dating escapade.”

“Is that all you’re worried about?” he asked, his voice husky, pulling her into an embrace. “You don’t know me. Why are you bothering?”

He’d taken her by surprise, no palpable chemistry between them until that very second. “I don’t know,” she said honestly. “You’re handsome and funny, and I’m lonely. Is that enough fuel to start up a relationship?” Stroking her hair, he thought about what she’d said.

“In a romance novel, I’d be a scoundrel. I use women and don’t have a job. What more do you want to know? Wait, today I did make one change. I called a woman; I owe you for a long distance call by the way; I told her I wasn’t coming back. It hurt her, but at least now she can move on and not wait for my eventual return.”

“So are you saying you have women all over the country?”

“Well, no, not exactly. There was the one in Florida. I think the women in Texas know by now I’m not coming back there anytime soon. No point in opening up old wounds to apologize.” She laughed. He was waving his own red flag and she was ignoring it.

“Are you going to leave here in the night, too? Break my heart someday?”

“No, I don’t think so. I mean I might break your heart, but I won’t be leaving here. I’ve got reason to stay.”

“And you’re not ready to share it with me yet, right?”

“Right. You learn fast.”

“Oh golly, I really don’t,” she said, sighing. “Let’s eat.”

Sitting in her cramped apartment with the phone in her hand, Noelle wasn’t sure what had just happened. Sadness that he’d rudely ended their relationship so soon after leaving to find his daughter welled up in her chest and she started to weep. “Why? We were so good together!” All of the drivel he whispered while he made love to her came back; sweet words that melted her heart, made her feel alive and loved for the first time in her life. He did things to her body that no man had ever taken the time to do before, and her passion scared her, yodeling screams of pleasure. When she’d finish, he’d be smiling at her.

“Good, huh?” he’d whisper in her ear. Shuddering now, her hands over her face she burst into tears.

Because of it, her love for him was unlike anything she’d had before. She hadn’t cared that he was unemployed, that he ate her food and slept in her bed, used up all her gas and never offered to fill the tank while his own car sat idle. Lying in bed alone, the heat of a Florida night scorched her sore throat, the result of screaming. It would sink in after midnight; a man had taken advantage of her, again.

Instead of placing her anger on Alan right away, visions of her little son’s tiny face, stolen from her when he was just a few months old, materialized, shimmering like an apparition. She shook her head to get it to go away, the pain overwhelming, but it persisted, and left growing rage in its wake.

Fury that would fester until it was overpowering, offered itself up like a sacrifice. The next day it would fuel her; make it possible for her to go to work so she could fulfill her financial obligations. It would also nourish her creative mind, envisioning fantasies about how she’d get even with Alan, making him a scapegoat for the loss of her son years before. The ideas flowed like honey, cloying and slow moving. Becoming obsessed with Alan, the pain of his betrayal unbearable, a new goal was to find out where he was. But first, needs she'd buried while he was available to her came to the surface.

Work was torture. As soon as she got home, taking a sharp knife out of the kitchen silverware drawer, she sat at the table, pulling her navy scrub shirt up and very carefully whittled the letter A in the soft flesh of her belly. Warm blood flowing down into her waistband and between her legs diluted the pain, temporarily transferring the fantasies of what she'd do to Alan, to herself.

CATE AND MISS LOGAN tried to keep it light during dinner, but it was obvious to them both that they'd looked forward to seeing Alan again all day and when he didn't show up, they were not only angry with him, they were disappointed. "Can my life be so friggin empty that a stranger has that strong of an effect on me?" Miss Logan admitted. "I better do something about that."

"Me, too," Cate said. "I even put my eyebrows on." Miss Logan burst out laughing.

"Look at me! I haven't had this thing on in twenty years," she said, pulling the fabric of her palazzo pants out at the sides. "It's almost back in style. Oh what the hell.

The next morning at breakfast, the women were back to normal. And there was no Alan again. "So, Prince Charming didn't come home last night."

"I wouldn't know," Cate said, lying. "He could come down the stairs any minute."

"Well, don't hold your breath," Miss Logan said. "I hope he's not laying dead somewhere."

"I'm alive and well," Mr. Rosen said, walking into the dining room.

"We weren't talking about you," Miss Logan said. "Although my next question was going to be where in God's name is that old man this mornin'?"

"You're new obsession didn't show up after all," he said, unfolding the paper. "I heard Sally run to the window every time a car passed by."

"You're an ass Rosen; I never did any such thing," Miss Logan replied. Cate was in the corner, drinking coffee and had to swallow a mouth full before she spewed it all over the dining room.

"Cate, with all due respect I heard you up all night, too. Now I can't wait to meet this man to see what charms he embodies."

"Maybe you could learn a thing or two from him," Miss Logan said, high-fiving with Cate.

"I'm not sure your man can teach someone of my repute much," he said, but laughed. "What's for breakfast?"

"Cold cereal and toast," Emil said forlorn, wrinkling his nose. "I'm used to a hot breakfast."

"Then move to a house that has a sous chef in the kitchen," Cate snapped.

"Cold cereal's fine," Mr. Rosen replied quickly.

The sounds of cutlery clinking against china and coffee poured echoed through the hallway as Alan tiptoed up to his room. He wanted to shower and shave before he started his new job.

"Listen. I hear water running. There's someone else in the house," Emil said. Everyone paused, coffee cups to lips and spoons in the air.

"It's the savior," Mr. Rosen said. "Hallelujah! We can get back to normal now." Fifteen minutes later, Emil Magda off to work and Miss Logan, unusually quiet that morning about to leave for her salon, Alan came down the stairs, bothered when he saw the door to the dining room open. There was no way he could avoid a confrontation.

"Well, good morning," he said, jovially.

"You missed Emil," Miss Logan said, smirking. "He just left for work."

"Pity," Alan said, relieved.

"Alan Johnson," he said, offering his hand to the only man in the room.

"Meet Mr. Rosen," Miss Logan said.

"Ben Rosen. Pleased to meet you. Cold cereal for breakfast today." Cate gave him the evil eye.

"Coffee?"

“Yes, please,” he said, pulling out the chair next to Miss Logan.

“So! We missed you at dinner last night,” she said. “Roast chicken. One of our favorites here at Towering Pines.”

“I am sorry about that. Got a job in Seymour and ended up coming back down here to dance with Miss Cook.” He purposely let that last bit out, without Mary’s approval.

“Miss Cook as in Mary Cook?”

“You got it,” he answered. “Met up at the café for lunch and hit it off right away. Got my oil changed at Frank’s and he told me about the job opportunity at Paul’s Auto Supply.”

“Wait,” Cate said. “You took a job with Paul?” There was a look of horror clearly etched on her face and not in a good way. Miss Logan was even taken aback.

“I don’t believe it,” she said.

“Yes, well beggars can’t be choosers and I needed something right away,” he answered.

“Surely Mr. Rosen here can assist you in finding somethin’ more in tune with your skills,” Miss Logan said emphatically.

“I don’t have any skills,” he said. “I’m a car salesman. That doesn’t prepare you for much of anything else.” The guests around the table thought about what he’d said. A handsome, personable man had spent his life earning his living selling cars and was now behind an auto parts counter.

“There are several high-end dealerships here in Beauregard,” Cate said. “Why not apply to one of them. We’d all give you a reference.” Heads nodded, encouraging him.

“I’m not kidding when I say that you practically have to have a bachelor’s degree to get hired. I was grandfathered in before the requirements became so tough to meet.” No one said anything, shaking their heads in unison. A bachelor’s degree? Ridiculous.

“It’ll be fine. Something else might turn up in the meantime, and I won’t be worried about my unemployment benefits running out.” Silence came over the group as they pondered what it would be like to be unemployed.

“So where’d you dance?” It was Cate this time, sad that Mary had already sunk her claw into him.

“Phillip Anderson’s. It was great. I’d forgotten how much fun it is to ballroom dance.”

“Mary’s quite a dancer, too,” Miss Logan said. “Where’d you sleep?”

“Sally!” Cate yelled, slapping her on the shoulder. “Mind your own business.”

“That’s okay. I want you to know the truth so there will be no reason to gossip.” He said this giving Miss Logan a penetrating gaze.

“I rented a room from Mary. I had my own cozy room right off the kitchen and was in my own bed, alone by midnight.”

“I guess you’d need to move in closer to the auto parts store,” Cate said.

“Yes, I probably will do that, although I know Miss Logan buses in every day, I would like to be closer to work. But thank you so much for having me here.” He pushed away from the table. “I have to be there by nine, so I better get going. Have a wonderful day, everyone.”

“I think I’ll drop in on you today,” Miss Logan said. “Make you uncomfortable on your first day of work.” Everyone laughed, including Alan.

“And I can give you a refund if you want to stay up in Seymour,” Cate said.

“Well that is very kind of you. I think I’ll take you up on your offer.” He jumped at it before she changed her mind, following her to the reception desk. “I’ll run up and get my suitcase.”

So that was that. Alan had established himself in Seymour, had made a good impression on everyone, and already had a job and a girlfriend. With these needs met, he could sit back and wait for something to happen with Frank and Ellen because he wasn't in a position to make it happen for himself.

ON ALAN JOHNSON'S FIRST day in town, he'd returned to ask Paul Sherman for the job. Ellen and Frank were leaving for home together. Tired, she put her head back against the seat of the truck. Frank put her bike in back and had a sudden thought about running into the grocery store before they left for home. "We need a few things and I don't want to wait until Saturday when everyone else is doin' the same thing." She closed her eyes for just a second and suddenly opened them to find that new man, the one who'd come into the garage earlier that day for an oil change, standing in front of the truck, staring at her. Opening her book, she put her head down and pretended to read, but the hair went up on her arms the way it did the night the stranger was lurking at the edge of the wood. He was standing the same way, with his hip slung off to the side, tall and lanky. It scared her so she began to shake. When she looked up again, he was opening the door to the parts store and Frank was walking across the street with a brown paper bag of grocery items in his arms. He put them in back with her bike.

"That was the new man in town," he said. "Come to see about a job, I bet. Glad he took me up on it after all."

"Frank, hurry up and let's get home. I need to tell you something," she said softly.

"What is it sister? You look like you seen a ghost."

"I don't want t' say nothing till we get outta town." She was afraid he might get out of the truck and try to pummel the man, and then what would become of her? Unexpectedly, she thought of how alone she'd be in the world if anything ever happened to Frank. He was all she had. He looked at her concerned, but didn't press; starting up the engine and driving toward their place by the river.

"Okay, tell me will you?"

"That man, Frank. That new man. I caught him lookin' at me and it gave me the creeps, just like the stranger. I think it's him. I think he's the one."

Anger cruising through his body at what she'd said, Frank thought a moment before speaking. She couldn't see the man because it was dark at the edge of the wood. "What was it that makes you think he's the stranger?"

"He stood the same way, kinda with his right foot turned out so he was straight but his hips went off to the side, sort a sultry." She said the last slowly, embarrassed. "I've been reading romance novels."

"Gotcha. That all?"

"No, he's tall and lanky like that man. I guess I didn't notice in the garage because you was standing next to him at one point and sorta dwarfed him." Frank looked out his side window, smiling. She'd never referred to his appearance before. "I'm scared Frank!"

Quickly pulling over to the side of the road, he grabbed her hand. "Sister, I sooner kill the son of a bitch than you be scared for one second. You got that? You are safe with me, I promise you." He patted his hip. "I got my side arm here, don't forget."

"That's another thing, Frank. If anythin' happens to you. I'm alone. I got no one but you. Something happens to you and I'm an orphan, or worse. You best take care of yourself, please. Please! Promise, you won't do nothin' foolish, like run him over with the car or shoot him." Her wellbeing in the case of his death had never entered his thoughts before this minute. What would become of her if he was put in jail or died? She was right; they had no one but each other. The thought was sickening. He took deep breaths of the hot afternoon air, feeling the sun entering his body with the oxygen, strengthening him, increasing his reasoning.

“I promise I won’t break the law. I promise you, sister. Look at me,” he said, gently taking her chin in his hand, turning her head to look at him.

Even when her mother took sick, she wasn’t this distraught. He got up so close to her face she could smell his breath; even after all day in the garage was fresh smelling due to the mints he always had in his mouth.

“Tell me you understand what I’m sayin’ girl.”

“Oh Frank, I understand!”

And she threw her arms around him and burrowed her face in his shoulder, just as the evening bus to Beauregard passed, Miss Sally Logan observing them out of the window, shocked at what she thought she saw and would eventually tell the world.

• • • •

THE NEXT MORNING, AFTER Alan moved out of Cate’s boarding house and started his new job, and Mary got up on time thanks to her new boarder, and Miss Logan got on the bus to Seymour again, Frank and Ellen made their way into town for another day at the garage.

“Feel better today?” Frank asked at breakfast. He’d made her a favorite, waffles topped with fruit and heavy cream whipped into froth.

“I guess,” she said, stirring her coffee and then licking the spoon. “Every time I look at that garden, it makes me sick.”

“Well this weekend we’ll see about puttin’ new annuals in. There’s nothin’ can be done about the perennials,” Frank said, and then continuing with his version of an Irish accent, “But we can have that ‘spot o’ color’ like the ad says.” Ellen burst out laughing.

“Okay, that will help.” They loaded up the truck, leaving the bike behind this time. There was no sense in pretending she’d ride it home until something shifted. For now, as long as there was someone out there who wanted to frighten her, the bike was out of commission.

“You feel okay about gettin’ the mail again today, sister?”

“I can do that,” Ellen said, jumping down out of the truck.

“Watch the street,” Frank said. New perils may lie in wait, but the old ones were just as dangerous.

Jessie was watching from her perch behind the counter. Already gossip had hit her ears, hateful, horrid stories of Frank and Ellen holding each other at the side of the road. All it took was one telephone call during a lonely night to get a bunch of biddies up in arms. The same kind of sleigh bells, which graced the door of the garage, hung off the back of the Post Office door.

“Good morning, Miss McPherson,” she said. “Got your mail right here.” She passed over the bundle to Ellen who smiled her customary, dismissive smile. “Got something from that Dance Academy again.” Ellen looked up at her, wide-eyed.

“Thank you,” she answered, hurrying to get out before Jessie could pry anymore. Frank was on the phone writing in the scheduling book when she returned. After Frank hung up the phone, she handed the bundle over to him.

“Jessie said that dance studio wrote us again.”

“Bother,” Frank grumbled. But Ellen felt a little excitement at the idea as he tore the envelope open, but passed the letter on to her with a grin. “You best read.” She hesitated, her eyes skimming the words, and he could see a little excitement building.

“Dear Mr. McPherson, Our popular June Extravaganza is filling up quickly. Although you did not respond to our previous invitation, we would like to extend it to you once again.” Her eyes stayed on the letter, moving across the paper.

“We should probably go,” he said, pretending. It would be good for her to have the dance to look forward to.

“Thank you Frank,” she said softly, aware it wasn’t something he would normally care to do. “I do appreciate it.” He patted her hand.

“We’d better practice,” he said. “If we plan on bein’ awarded one of ten prizes.” Ellen did a little jump up and down, clapping her hands.

“Not here in the garage, of course,” Ellen replied, laughing, the boogieman of the previous afternoon long forgotten.

“Glad someone’s havin’ a good day,” Paul Sherman said, coming in off the street. His voice competed with the bells attached to the door, Frank and Ellen laughing together when Paul looked up at the bells and stuck his tongue out.

“You’re in a fine mood,” Frank said.

“I got problems. My new man won’t wear a uniform. I got someone at the counter lookin’ like he stepped out of a fashion magazine. I’ll be the laughing stock.” Frank scratched his head, trying to hide his smile while Ellen picked up her book again pretending to read.

“Your new man being the man I sent over yesterday?”

“You got it.”

“Sorry he’s causin’ you issues, Paul. Give ‘em the ax.”

Paul looked at him as if the idea had never occurred to him. “You mean fire ‘em after an hour?”

“Yep, you got it. You made it part of the employment requirements, right? That he wear a uniform?” Now it was Paul’s turn to scratch his head.

“No sir, I don’t believe I did.”

“Well, I don’t think it makes too much difference.”

Luckily, the first customer of the day arrived and Frank and Ellen got busy starting their workday. Word got around quickly that Paul’s Auto Supply had a new employee; a very handsome, well-dressed, single man, and business picked up just as fast. It was too easy for the wife or the working girl to stop by and get oil and windshield cleaner from Paul rather than driving all the way to Beauregard or Mobile and have the privilege of saying hello to Alan in the process. By the end of the week, Paul forgot all about the uniform.

LIFE WAS TURNING AROUND for Alan Johnson. He'd never felt so positive or so honest. Working at Paul's gave him the opportunity to see Ellen everyday. He wanted to confront Frank soon because it wasn't fair to either of them for him to keep his suspicions to himself. It would seem like he was sneaking around if he allowed it to go on for too long.

Mary was still in the dark and he'd made the decision to keep it from her until he told the McPherson's. But he wanted to know more about Margaret, first. It would help him to know if she'd bad mouthed him or if Ellen knew anything about him. He could bring up Margaret to Mary without actually saying her name by repeating what Miss Logan told him about Frank being a widow. Hopefully, she wouldn't get suspicious.

It was early in the evening, before dinner, but they were already in bed together. It was during the first week he'd worked at Paul's, his routine falling into place. Staying at Mary's was more convenient than he'd imagined; he didn't even have to move his car. Just walk up a block and turn left and there was work. Paul was patient with him after he recovered from the day of the uniform confrontation. It was easy to cross-reference parts with the books. A college kid did the packing and shipping and Paul did the deliveries. Counter business had picked up so much that Paul needed Alan more than he'd thought. On those first evenings after work, he'd walk back to Mary's and she'd already be home, dinner on the table. And although he was renting a room from her, it was just a matter of time before he'd be in her bed. Getting annoyed because it was taking him so long to make a pass, Mary took matters into her own hands and met him at the door in a negligee, naked underneath.

One night, after they'd had sex, he was resting on his back with his eyes closed while she twiddled a strand of his hair when the opportunity arose to start talking about Frank.

"I never thanked you for telling Frank I needed a job," he said. "It's worked out well."

"No, you never did. You were angry with me," she replied.

"Sorry, no malice intended."

"What'd you think of Frank and his kid?" He'd heard a hint of derision in her voice and opened up an eye to look at her, but she seemed peaceful enough.

"They seem like a very nice family," Alan said, surprised he was feeling defensive. If anything, he should loath Frank.

"Ha! I think they have a very strange relationship." Alan got up on his side to face her.

"Why do you say that?" he asked. "They appeared to be very loving and normal." Not that he'd know what normal was if it slapped him in the face.

"You know Ellen isn't his kid, right?" Mary asked.

Alan debated for a quick second. Did Miss Logan tell him that?

"No, I didn't know. Who's her father?" Alan replied.

As quick as if he'd flipped a light switch, Mary recognized something she'd forgotten from years past.

"No one knows, except....his name is Alan. Oh my God, I just remembered that Margaret, that's Frank's wife, Ellen's mother, told me his name is Alan. 'Alan's okay,' she said. Wow, what a coincidence."

Mary had leaned back and was looking at him intently.

"Lot of men named Alan," he said, hoping that was the extent of what Margaret had told her.

No matter what, he was not divulging the truth until the McPherson's knew. There was just no way in hell.

"What happened to her?" Alan asked.

Mary was getting up from the bed.

"Who?" she asked, confused.

Alan laid back down and started to laugh. "Margaret. Frank's wife. You okay?" he asked.

Mary laughed. "Yes, just a little discombobulated."

"What happened to Frank's wife?"

"She died," Mary said. "Word is she kilt herself over at Hallowsbrook."

Even though Alan heard that story, the words still stabbed him in the chest when she repeated them.

"That must have been awful for the family," he said. But Mary smirked.

"Just between you and me, it was a blessing. It had to be a relief for Frank, too. His life already revolved around takin' care of her kid, at least now he didn't have to carry the stigma of having a crazy woman for a wife, and trust me, she was nuts."

No angel himself, Alan was still appalled at the attitude of the women he'd encountered. First Miss Logan and now Mary. It must be an Alabama thing, or maybe they were glad Frank was free so they could have a shot at him.

"How'd she do it?" Alan asked softly, not really wanting to know, but thinking for the first time that this was the mother of his child they were talking about, not some insane stranger.

Mary slipped on underpants and dug through her drawer for a bra. Putting her arms through the straps, she struggled to get the thing hooked. "I don't know. We were never told and you couldn't see any marks on her body."

Alan watched her dress, feeling compassion for her, not because she wasn't attractive; she was very nice looking. But she was getting older, hearing her biological clock ticking, and he was sure, hoping he was the answer.

"I wonder why someone wasn't watching out for her, some nurse. Is it that easy for a patient to take her own life? I wonder if they'll sue. How'd the daughter take it?"

Mary stopped and looked at him, the expression on her face unreadable. Worried he might have asked one too many questions, he waited.

"You couldn't tell there'd been a loss, doesn't that explain it? It was like, oh well, another day. I was embarrassed for Margaret, to tell you the truth."

"How long was she put away? I mean in Hallowsbrook?" Mary turned to her dresser, her head down so although Alan tried to read her expression, she was hiding it from view.

"For a long time. Since Ellen was in kindergarten. So let's see, she's fifteen now. So ten years."

"So she just died?" Alan said, sitting up.

He knew that, Miss Logan had told him, but hearing it again, after meeting Ellen and Frank, the reality that they'd just had a horrible loss a short time ago made it more heartbreaking. Margaret, I'm sorry.

"In March. So not just. Like I said, she'd been away for so long that it wasn't that different for everyone. There was no longer a patient we had to visit. That was the biggest change."

"Did you visit her?"

"Yes," Mary said shortly. "This conversation is a bummer! We just made love and now were talking about Margaret. I'm ready for a change."

“Okay, no problem,” Alan replied, but he didn’t miss the look Mary was giving him, the corners of her mouth turned down, starting at him intently. And he wanted to know about the visits to Hallowsbrook. “I just asked because of Frank getting me the job and all.”

He watched her dressing, bending over to put her slacks on, mouth set; something had upset her, or angered her. Experience with women taught him that unless he really wanted to know, it was best to leave those uncertainties alone. However, if he was going to find out more about Margaret, he realized he was going to have to do a little ass-kissing.

He got up out of bed, naked. “Come here. I can see you’re upset. What just happened? We were having a great conversation.” He took her in his arms and could feel her relaxing under his care. He rubbed her back and finding her bra, unhooked it.

“What are you doing?” she murmured, smiling.

“Do you need to ask?” Leading her back to the bed, he set her down on the edge and started to unbutton her pants. He’d do it to her again, give her a lot of attention, and then maybe she’d talk more about Margaret. It was an exhausting way to get information, and getting more difficult the older he got.

“I’m sorry I got all pissy with you,” she said.

“What happened? You must be upset about Margaret being gone.” The expression on her face changed again, this time he was certain of it. But she was struggling to overcome whatever it was.

“I was upset. When she came here, I helped her out. I gave her a place to stay. She was my friend. And when they put her away, I was the only outsider the family allowed to visit her. I loved Margaret, Alan. I loved her more than I’d ever loved a friend before. She was like a sister to me, but more. To see her check out like that, well it was hard, I won’t deny it.” Mary wasn’t telling the whole truth yet because it was too difficult to dredge up those feeling and he wouldn’t understand, anyway. Men were like voyeurs; they wanted details that titillated, but weren’t interested in the rest. “Me and Margaret had a connection that was more than friendship. Of course it hurt when she left.”

“Did you play a part in helping out Frank with Ellen?”

“You mean, like a substitute mother? No. Well at first I did when she’d go away for a short stay. But not when she was committed. He wouldn’t allow it and Ellen didn’t want it. To this day, she barely will make eye contact with me. Frankly, I think whatever is going on over there is disgusting.”

“You can’t be serious,” Alan said.

“I am very serious. It’s gotten worse since Margaret died.”

“Those are some pretty drastic accusations to make.” She shrugged her shoulders.

“I haven’t made them to anyone but you,” she said.

It wasn’t exactly true. She shared her suspicions with Miss Logan as well as Jessie Brewer. They agreed that things didn’t look right over at the McPherson’s.

“A little bit too much togetherness,” Jessie said. “You ask me, the child should a’ been removed from the home the minute the mother was committed.”

“Where would she have gone?” Mary asked.

“She never told no one about the dad, ‘cept maybe Frank for all we know, and he never says nothin’,” Jessie answered. “You ask me, someone should a’ forced him to come clean. Get the real dad involved.”

“You ever see those two dance together? God Lord, it is beautiful,” Miss Logan said, feeling guilty. “They fit together like a hand and glove, gliding around the dance floor in perfect time. It is a sight to behold.”

“That’s another thing,” Mary said. “What’s with the father and daughter dancing? Where do they do it? At home, alone? It’s not right.”

“You’re jealous,” Miss Logan said. “I’ve said it before and I’ll say it again.”

• • • •

BUT AFTER SEEING THE familiar truck pulled over with the father and daughter embracing, appearing to kiss, Miss Logan was no longer certain Mary’s allegations were due to jealousy.

That night at dinner, she was out of sorts. She’d peered out the window of the salon all week, watching every move Ellen and Frank made and there was never anything out of line. She saw them talk and laugh, watched Frank as he watched Ellen crossing the street to pick up the mail like the concerned father always did. One thing out of the ordinary was that Ellen no longer rode her bike home at four like she used to do the previous weeks after school was out. “Why doesn’t Ellen ride her bike home anymore?” she asked Margo Portland, finally in for that haircut.

“Boyd told me they had trespassers out at the cottage. Twice. I bet Frank’s afraid to let her ride anymore.”

Miss Logan stopped cutting Margo’s hair, scissors and comb poised over her head, looking at her in the mirror.

“Boyd Dalton told you that?”

“Yes, and if you tell anyone, I swear to God Sally Logan, not only will I never speak to you again, I’ll tell everyone I got ringworm from your combs.”

Miss Logan pushed her in the back.

“I’ll sue your ass, you lie about my place. Since when do you talk to Boyd?”

“He comes into the clinic,” Margo said. “Just like any patient does. And that’s privileged, too.”

“And he just happened to tell you about going out to Frank’s.”

“That’s right, Sally. That’s my story and I’m stickin’ to it.” But Miss Logan was not convinced.

“I think you’re seeing him and trying to keep it on the QT.”

“Out of all the people in the world, you are the last one I would tell if I was seeing our revered married sheriff.”

“Well, are you?” Miss Logan spun Margo around in the chair. “Why’s your face all red?”

“Yes, I’m seeing him!” Margo cried furious with herself for being so weak. Now everyone in town would know and it would just be a matter of time before Boyd heard it and would break it off before his wife, an absolute moron of a woman found out.

“Oh, my God,” Miss Logan said, shaking her head. “But I can see why he would stray. His wife is awful. She’s involved with every Girl Scout, Boy Scout, 4H, fund raising crap there is. She even teaches Sunday School over at the Methodist Church. And you are so sweet. I can absolutely see why Boyd would go for you.”

“You can?”

“Of course, I can. How long have we known each other?” Miss Logan stopped cutting again and was standing with both hands on her hips, scissors dangerously pointed out to the side.

“Forever. Since we were kids.”

“Well, you were a kid and I was old enough to babysit you. But my point is that I really do care for you Margo. You’re one of my true friends. I actually have a worry that I need to talk to you about. You bein’ a healthcare professional and all.” Relieved that the topic was changed, Margo encouraged her to speak up.

“There’s nothing we can’t share, obviously,” she said.

“Well, I was on the bus, you see, so I can’t say what I saw was well, exactly what I thought I saw. And others have been talkin’ about it. Jessie and Mary.” Margo rolled her eyeballs.

“Sally, those two are the worst story tellers. I wouldn’t believe a thing either one said.”

“Well, here’s the thing. I listened to what they said, and then I saw.”

“What is it?”

“Talkin’ about Frank and Ellen,” Miss Logan said, putting her hands down again. Margo looked up at her, frowning.

“Saying what?”

“Well, you know,” she whispered. “That things ain’t right over there since Margaret died and all.”

“How do you mean?” Margo thought she knew what her friend was driving at, but wanted her to say it out loud. Because if it was what she thought Miss Logan was trying to say, she’d have to report it. She could lose her nursing license for keeping quiet about an accusation like that. It was child endangerment.

“Frank and Ellen.”

“Sally, what about them? You have to say it to me. I’m not guessing.”

“Well, I saw them together.” Margo looked up at her again. Miss Logan paused, deliberating. “They were parked in that truck of Frank’s. At the side of the road. I was in the bus, passing by, and they was turned to each other, her arms around his neck. They looked like they was kissin’.” Margo turned back to looking out of the window. The idea that Frank and Ellen were in any kind of perverse relationship was completely improbable. But now that Miss Logan had put the idea out into the universe, Margo had to act. She’d have to tell Boyd as the sheriff, not as her lover.

“Is that it? Was there anything else?”

“Mary claims to have seen them together the other night. Claims she was walking down by the river and just happened upon Frank’s cottage and they was in the living room in an embrace. She said they were standing together, kissing.”

“I don’t believe it,” Margo said, furious.

“I didn’t either,” Miss Logan said, passionately. “That is until I seen with my own eyes.” She put the comb and scissors down. “You ain’t going ta say anything, are you?”

“Sally, I have to now. I’m a registered nurse. You’ve just made an accusation of child endangerment. Ellen could be at risk if what you are saying is true. It has to be investigated. I think it’s nothing, that it’s innocent, but we won’t know until Boyd looks into it.”

“Boyd? Oh my God, Boyd?”

“He’s the sheriff, for Christ’s sake. Who did you think I was going to tell? Pastor Marks?”

“Oh this is terrible. Now Frank is going to be angry with me.”

“He won’t know, and if you’re smart, you’ll stop passing that awful story Mary is telling around. Nip it in the bud, Sally Logan. There’s a lot at stake here. And will you please finish cutting my hair?”

Hands shaking, angry at herself for being such a gossip, Miss Logan picked up the scissor and comb again and slowly and carefully finished cutting Margo Portland’s hair.

AFTER GETTING ONE OF the worst haircuts she'd ever had, Margo left Miss Logan's Beauty Salon in a quandary. She needed to act right away, just in case Ellen really was in danger. It sounded perfectly innocent to her, but if it wasn't and something happened to Ellen, she'd never forgive herself. It was safer to make the call to Boyd from work rather than her house; she went back to the office. She hated being in the office alone, it was depressing in the daylight. Shutting the shades, locking the door, her palms were sweating as she dialed his number. Dispatch would put her call through to the house and hopefully his wife, Carol wouldn't answer.

"Seymour dispatch," the officer said.

"This is Margo Portland from the medical office calling for the sheriff. I have to report a possible case of child abuse."

"Hold on Miss Portland and I'll ring his number for you." A few seconds later, Boyd answered.

"What's going on?"

"I was in Miss Logan's this evening and got an earful. I'll tell you what was said and you can take it from there."

"Okay, I'm listening." Margo detailed everything Miss Logan told her, and added what she'd said about Jessie Brewer and Mary Cook, as well. "And I just remembered at the ninth grade dance, Mary alluding to there being something inappropriate going on between father and daughter." There was silence on the other end of the line. Finally, he spoke.

"You realize this is all bull shit right?"

"Oh, I know that," Margo answered. "It's too bad for Frank. Miss Logan told me and now I'm passing it on to you."

"Shit rolls down hill," Boyd said.

"And in this case, you're at the bottom of the hill. What are you going to do?"

"I think I'll take a ride over to the cottage tonight and talk to Frank."

"Okay, well I'm sorry."

Then whispering into the phone, Boyd arranged to see her later. "I'll come around after I'm finished."

"Okay," she said, knowing it was wrong, sorry she ever said she'd get her hair cut after work.

Boyd went back into the kitchen where his family was gathered for dinner. "I've got to go out for a bit," he said. "Riding out to the McPherson place."

"Again?" Carol Dalton said. "Margo Portland going to be there?"

"No, not this time," he said, kissing her cheek. "You're welcome to come if you want."

"I'll pass. Say hi to Frank for me," she said, hiding her middle finger extended in the folds of her apron. That piece of shit was going to see Margo sometime that night, she was sure of it. But there wasn't a damn thing she could do about it.

"Hey," he said when he got out in the hall. "Come here a minute." She thought maybe he was going to hug her, but he had something else in mind.

"What is it?"

"You ever hear any gossip about Frank and Ellen?"

Carol looked into his eyes and she could see that he was serious, and what he was referring to.

“Like real gossip? Or just crap. ‘Something’s not right over at Frank’s...’ that sort of thing?” Their daughters were good friends of Ellen’s.

“Right, that sort of thing.”

“Well, yes. But it is crap, you know that and I know that. He loves that kid as if she was his own. I can’t imagine him doing anything to her anymore than I could hurt my own kids. Or you. It’s inconceivable.”

“That’s what I think. But the accusation has been made and now I have to follow up on it. I hate this part of the job.”

“Ellen’s been coming over here and the girls over to the cottage since they were in kindergarten. I’d have picked up on it if there was something going on.” She reached up and kissed him again.

“Sorry about the comment about Margo.” He frowned and turned away, but he didn’t deny it. Oh God I hope he doesn’t leave me for her.

Driving through the village after dinner always depressed Boyd. The streets were dead after five. He was born and raised in Seymour and had watched the steady decline of the town for the past twenty years. Decline wasn’t the right term. The town wasn’t declining so much as it wasn’t growing. After the shopping district, he drove through a small residential neighborhood and the further he went from town, the sparser the housing got. Reaching Frank’s he always thought the same thing; he’d like to have a little piece of land out here by the river. It was too expensive now. The big field next to Frank’s was for sale and one day a rich person was going to buy it and build one of those McMansions on the river.

The lights from Frank’s house penetrated the dusk while the sun started its decent. Shutting the lights off to the car, Boyd wanted to sneak up and catch them doing something wrong, maybe kissing in the front window. But instead, he saw a family scene with Frank sitting in his recliner, reading the paper and Ellen on the couch, her nose in a book. The TV was off and there was music playing; he wondered when the last time his wife turned the TV off and suggested their kids pick up a book. Maybe he’d take the lead.

Their front door was open, so he slammed the car door hard, hoping they’d hear. Frank put the paper down and walked to the door. “Howdy, Frank,” he said. “Sorry to come out here unannounced.”

“I’m glad you’re here,” he said. “Something happened yesterday and I want to talk to you about it. It’s got my girl here a bit upset.”

“You want to chat outdoors?” Boyd asked.

“If you don’t mind, I think it best,” Frank answered. “El, I’ll be out here with Sheriff Dalton.” Boyd saw her nod, but not react.

“Walk with me a ways, would you?” Boyd followed Frank away from the house.

“You got my curiosity going, sir,” Boyd said. Frank snickered and waved him further from the house.

“We was leavin’ the garage for home last evening. I run into the grocery and when I come back, my girl is beside herself. This new man in town, you meet up with him yet? I got him a job at Paul’s. Anyway, she swears he’s the stranger who lurked at the edge of the wood last week. The same height and stands a certain way most don’t stand, she said.

“She was so upset, she flipped out and you know as well as any my girl is not an attention seeker. I had to pull the truck over and try to calm her down.”

Boyd immediately saw the connection; the truck at the side of the road, the hysterical girl being comforted by her father. He wondered if this wasn’t what Miss Logan saw on her way home from work on the bus.

Boyd got his notepad out. "You say you got the man a job? How'd that come about? Just curious." Frank told him about Mary dating the man and calling over to the garage asking the favor. "What's his name?" Frank gave him the details, which he wrote down.

"So now what brings you out here?" Frank asked. Boyd shook his head.

"You won't believe this, sir."

He explained about the allegation that had been made, and that he thought the embrace the informer had witnessed was the one that Frank had just told him about.

Completely taken aback by the accusation, Frank was stunned. "I would never, ever harm my girl in any way. The thought of doing anything that might hurt her makes me sick to my stomach. We never touch each other except when we're dancin'. Now you say this garbage, I might have to rethink us going to a dance contest we was invited to attend."

"Don't do that, Frank. Please. I'm sure we can clear this up. I wish I could just drop it, but I have to file a report. My superiors will look it over and I'm sure it will be a closed case tomorrow."

"Oh Lord God you got to call it a case? I gotta bad feeling about this." Boyd put his hand up on Frank's shoulder.

"I'm sorry, I'm truly sorry. But don't get all worked up. Let's take it slow. I'll be in touch when I have something to tell you. Do you hear what I'm saying, Frank?" He slowly nodded his head.

But it wasn't okay. The next day, the county offices converged upon Seymour. Social services, The Division of Child Safety, made their first visit to the garage on Main Street, initiating the beginning of Frank and Ellen's nightmare. Two tired looking women drove up in a dusty car with government plates. One was tall and thin and the other was short and chubby. They were dressed as if they'd come to clean house, like women who have given up trying to look even marginally attractive.

"Mr. McPherson, we just want to question the girl about the events of the past few days. You're welcome to stay in the room when we do so, but you aren't allowed to answer for her or interrupt." Frank was speechless. What would they do to him if he interrupted? Shoot him?

"If you'll excuse us please, I'm takin' my daughter into the garage to speak to her privately." Ellen was terrified, and he could see it in her eyes, cursing himself for not speaking about it to her as soon as Boyd left the night before.

The social workers looked at each other. What were they going to do? Call the sheriff?

"Okay, go ahead. But don't leave."

Frank whipped around.

"What'll you do if I do? You better have a warrant for my arrest."

He nodded his head to her and Ellen got up off her stool to follow him into the garage, looking at the women as she left the office. Frank stood aside for her to go before him and the smell of the oil and the familiar space choked her up.

"What's going on?" she asked. "What are they going to ask me?"

Frank was embarrassed before her, it was not their usual conversation to talk of intimate things.

"Someone told Sheriff Dalton that you and I was kissin' at the side of the road the other night. That's all. You tell those two everything and be honest. We ain't got nothin' to hide."

He nodded back at the door and she turned to go back into the office. The social workers watched the brief exchange, watched the man speak and the look of distress on the girl's face and deduced they were in collusion.

The questioning was quick because they'd made their minds up that the man had threatened the young girl. "Are you afraid of your step-father?"

Visibly shrinking away from the women, horrified, she answered, "Of course not!"

“Just now, in the garage, did your step-father tell you to lie to us about what has happened between the two you?”

“No. He told me to be honest with you about everything.”

“Has your step-father touched you inappropriately?” Ellen cringed again.

“That’s disgusting! Who ever said a thing like that about him?”

“Please just answer the question,” the tall one said.

“No, never. Frank hardly ever even hugs me. That’s disgusting,” she repeated. Frank was doing a slow burn in the corner, sorry he didn’t demand to have his lawyer present.

“That’s enough,” he said. “I want our lawyer here, or I want you to arrest me, but you’re not talkin’ to my child more today.”

At home that evening, dinner was a solemn affair. “I’m not really hungry,” Ellen said, elbows on the table and head in her hands.

“Me neither, but we gotta eat. You’re already thin as you can be. You don’t want me to get smaller than the new man in town, right?”

Ellen looked at him and started to giggle; he was standing with his arms out at his sides, making bicep muscles. “No, I guess not.” The phone ringing interrupted their heart-to-heart. Frank picked it up, frowning, not wanting more news of any kind.

“It’s Boyd. Sorry to bother you during dinner, but I wanted to tell you as soon as possible, before you heard it from anyone else.” Frank’s heart was thumping in his chest. “The interview with Ellen today led the social workers to believe there is evidence that needs to be investigated further. I’m sorry, Frank.”

“I don’t get it. She denied everything they asked her.”

“Evidently, they felt she was under coercion.”

“Boyd, that’s utter nonsense. You have to believe me. The thought of what they are accusin’ me of makes me sick to my stomach.”

“Look, I know that. But what I think doesn’t matter now, although if it goes any further, I will definitely speak my opinion on your behalf.”

“So what happens now?”

“You need to show up at the courthouse tomorrow morning with Ellen’s adoption papers.” Involuntarily, Frank took a step back and gasped, scaring Ellen.

“I got no papers Boyd. This is Seymour. Who’d think that was even a necessity here?” A problem Margaret hadn’t foreseen; Frank never adopted Ellen.

“I’m no lawyer, but you have no legal rights now that Margaret’s dead and if the courts wanted to, they could take Ellen away from you and make a stranger her guardian.”

“What do I do now?”

“You get a lawyer fast.”

They said goodbye and Frank hung the phone up on the wall. He glanced around the room, at the simple furnishing in his childhood home, trying to glean comfort from it as he had in the past.

Frank had never given up on anything in his entire life, but that evening, with Ellen sitting at the kitchen table in their familiar kitchen, watching him carefully with a frightened look on her face, and the sheriff forecasting horrific consequences because of his naiveté, Frank was ready to give up. He choked back an unfamiliar sensation that turned out to be a sob.

NEWS TRAVELS FAST IN a small town, and Frank and Ellen's crisis was news. That it was the result of stupidity and gossip didn't seem to matter. The gentle man and his loving step-daughter were now fair game and even the baggers at the grocery were talking about it, pointing at the garage that had a hand-lettered note applied to the door with masking tape; Frank's will be closed until further notice. People strolling by stopped to read the note, and if they were uninformed, remarked about how sad it was, Frank's Garage had been there since Big Frank was alive and what a shame it would be if he never opened up again.

Those who were in on town gossip sneered at the sign, saying that such a one as Frank McPherson deserved to burn in hell after what he did to that little girl. Stories of bondage and other forms of darkness whispered about in the chairs at Miss Logan's Beauty Salon, in line at the post office, having lunch at the café and waiting to carry bags for patrons at the grocery store who carried the stories further, more often than not embellished in the worst possible way.

Alan Johnson was livid about what had transpired and made the decision to come forward while the pot was boiling over. Listening to Mary, he knew the torrid stories were a bunch of lies. He saw the love between his daughter and her stepfather the night he lurked outside of their property, hovering at the edge of a black wood like a Peeping Tom. Boyd Dalton sought him out first, opening the door to Paul's Auto Supply the day after confronting Boyd on the telephone.

"Ask your boss to take over the counter for a minute, will you please?" The sight of an officer of the law only confirmed what he was going to do; lay claim to Ellen as his daughter. Walking outside with the sheriff, Alan waited, not knowing what he was going to hear.

"You've been identified as a trespasser by the McPherson's. Can you explain why you'd be at their house at midnight?"

Alan looked at him carefully. He was making the assumption it had been him that night. There was a little game that needed to be played before he'd make an admission of guilt. "Night is pitch black around here. Especially down by the river. How can they be sure?"

"The girl says it was you, the way you stand and your stature. So are you denying it?"

"No sir," Alan said. "I have reason to believe Ellen McPherson is my daughter. I was in a relationship with Margaret Fisher fifteen years ago and I left Florida on a job transfer. We lost contact after that." It wasn't the entire truth, but he saw no reason to add more facts.

Boyd had removed his hat, scratching his head. "What makes you think she's yours?"

"Well look at her! But that's not all. I know Margaret wouldn't mess around, so the kid has to be mine. I got nothin' to gain by claiming she's my daughter." He pointed over his shoulder at the store. "This place is barely going to pay my room and board. I don't even want to interfere with Frank. I think he's doin' a fine job of raising her."

"Then why are you coming forward now?"

"Just explaining my presence in Frank's yard last week, that's all." Boyd thought how amazing fate was. Just at a time when it was possible Frank would be incarcerated and lose custody of Ellen, her birth father show's up. Unbelievable.

Boyd dismissed Alan. He'd follow up with arrangements for paternity testing, in its infancy at the time, but in a court of law a game changer.

Back behind the counter, Alan was shaking, sick to his stomach. The sheriff didn't say one way or the other, but Alan thought he believed him. Ellen was his daughter. Working through the day brought some relief from the anxiety that was plaguing him. The job was not as bad as he thought it would be, but living with Mary was turning out to be a nightmare. She was clingy and demanding and he thought she contributed to what was happening to Frank McPherson.

• • • •

FRANK AND ELLEN HAD an appointment to meet with his attorney, Ralph Scott in the morning. Frank made a special breakfast for Ellen, and they chose their clothes with care.

"I feel like we're headed to Hallowsbrook again," Ellen said.

"Yes, I was thinkin' the same thing." They drove into Beauregard in silence, arriving with time to spare. The attorney only needed to speak with Frank, sparing Ellen.

Although the situation didn't look good, he was confident that those who knew the two of them would vouch for Frank and charges wouldn't be forthcoming. "You need to open up the garage and get your life back to normal. Act as normal as possible. Go to Beauregard for June Extravaganza and dance in their dern contest if that's what it takes."

"Slow dancin' is the cause of all this trouble," Frank said. "I don't think we best take your advice in that department."

"Hold your head up in town, Frank. Now's not the time to back down." The intercom on his desk buzzed.

"Mr. Scott, Sheriff Dalton on line two." Ralph looked up at Frank and raised his eyebrows.

"Boyd, I got Frank McPherson here. You're on speaker phone." Boyd groaned; Ralph you're such an ass.

"Ah, this is not the news I want to give the man over the phone." Frank looked at Ralph.

"Well now you gotta say it, Boyd. Jesus Christ."

"What can it be that's worse than what we've got here?" Frank said.

"Frank, the new man in town. Alan Johnson. You know who I'm talking about, correct?"

"Yes, I know who he is. He's the one peerin' at Ellen in the middle of the night." Ralph Scott looked up at him and frowned.

"What are you getting at Boyd? We don't have all day here," Ralph said.

"I'm getting to that. Alan Johnson claims he could be Ellen's father. That's why he was out at the cottage the other night, just to see her. He claims he was Margaret's boyfriend in Florida fifteen years ago and was transferred to Galveston for a job. She was supposed to meet him and never showed up."

The words paralyzed Frank, choking his throat, numbing his hands. Ralph looked at him and could see he was distressed. "Did you know about this?" he asked gently.

"No," he sputtered. "I mean I knew there was someone else but not who or where. No one ever came forward claiming Ellen."

"What does he want?" Ralph asked.

"Nothing, just to know her. He admits he doesn't have anything to offer her. He'd like to have a paternity test to make sure she's really his child. Will you agree to that, Frank?" Ralph wanted him to take his time answering, holding up his hand to slow things down, but Frank disagreed.

"I want to know, too. Before this other thing gets worse. She's old enough to decide if she wants a relationship with a stranger. I got to tell her now."

“Will you agree for Ellen to get a blood test?” Boyd asked. “You only need to take her over to the clinic and Margo will draw the blood.” Frank nodded his head, but put his hands over his eyes, rubbing the disbelief out.

“He’s agreeing,” Ralph said. “As soon as we’re done here. Before you hang up, what’s going on with the child abuse allegation?”

“The ADA is deciding if we have enough evidence to issue an arrest warrant. I’m really sorry Frank.”

“Talk to him later, Boyd.” Ralph said, and hung up the phone. Frank stood up, having reached his limit.

“I gotta talk to my girl and then to the man with the claims. Why now? Why’d he wait? If he don’t want nothin’ from Ellen, why’d he bother?”

“Like Boyd said, Frank, he just wants to know her. Let’s pray that is really all there is because I can see things getting ugly and I want you to be prepared to fight.”

“You mean run with her?”

“No, no, not run. That wouldn’t work.” He looked at Frank and saw that he was dealing with a country boy, someone wholesome whose exposure to the seamier side of life was minimal, unless it was something he’d seen on TV.”

“What I mean is that I want you to be prepared to put everything you have into it.”

Frank might have been simple, but he wasn’t stupid. “You mean like my garage, my house, that sorta thing.” Ralph was rubbing his chin.

“Your time, too, Frank. You prepared for a fight?”

“I’ll do whatever it takes,” Frank said standing up, already defeated. He needed to talk to Ellen right away. He reached across the desk for Ralph’s hand to shake. “Thank you.”

“No problem, Frank. If anything comes across my desk today I’ll be in touch.” Frank looked at him carefully, but decided not to start the topic again. If he was arrested, his attorney would be ready. Ralph walked around his desk and put his hand on Frank’s back.

“I got a good feeling about this Frank, and I don’t toss that around lightly. It might take some work to get to the right place, but we’re both ready. Try not to worry too much. I know, easy for me to say.”

Frank smiled at him, but didn’t answer. He had only one thought and it was to talk to Ellen. Ralph reached around him and pulled the door open. He saw the girl sitting in his waiting room, and up until that moment, hadn’t realized how pretty she was, and alluring. Maybe it would be more difficult to defend Frank than he originally thought. After defending both the guilty and innocent over the years, Ralph could spot a liar. Watching Frank go to Ellen and take her hand, she looked up at him with so much trust, and faith that he would protect her, Ralph changed his mind again. His client was innocent.

“You ready to go sister?” Ellen nodded her head, letting him pull her up. “Should we go to lunch?” She shook her head.

“I think we should go to the garage,” she answered. Ralph chuckled.

“See, just like I said.”

“Well I guess that means until further notice is two hours later,” Frank replied, laughing. Things didn’t feel quite so desperate, yet.

THE FIRST PART OF THE day was busy at the parts counter, and Alan was getting used to the routine. He schmoozed with customers, filled their orders and made small talk with the women of town, and then in the afternoon he'd help pick orders for the next day's deliveries. Moving back into his own room at Mary's with the excuse that he didn't want to disturb her with his snoring, he was walking a fine line between keeping things civil with her and telling her he was leaving to move back to Cate's. It didn't take long before he regretted moving in with Mary so quickly, even as a tenant, forcing her to take money for the room so she couldn't accuse him of freeloading.

But on the day when Boyd Dalton told Frank and his attorney about Alan's claims, everything would change for him. Frank and Ellen returned to the garage and took the sign closed until further notice down. The occupants of the businesses up and down Main Street saw the sign go into the trashcan on the curb, watched as cars arrived for service pulling into the bays or waiting on the street. Ellen was silent, reading her book, thinking of the amazing story Frank had told her as they sat in the car outside of Ralph Scott's office.

"The stranger meant you no harm," he started out. They'd gotten into the car, but he didn't turn the key right away. "He wanted to see you with his own eyes because he has reasons to believe he might be your natural father." Frank looked straight ahead, waiting.

"What might those reasons be?" Ellen asked. Frank turned to her, embarrassed.

"He said he was dating your mother fifteen years ago and had to leave town. She was supposed to follow him but never showed up."

"So he come into town especially for me?" Trying not to smirk, she was disbelieving.

"That's what it sounds like. You have an objection to having a blood test? Just to be sure? Put my mind at rest and yours, too." Ellen thought about what he was asking of her. A pinprick and a look under a microscope could change the way she viewed her life. Was it even necessary?

"Can I at least think about this? It's all my decision, is that what you're sayin' Frank? I can have it or not."

Frank didn't want to admit he took it for granted it was something she had to do. Boyd asked if he would agree to it, not Ellen. Frank thought he had no say over what happened to Ellen. Maybe he needed to go back into the attorney's office. "Come with me, sister. We need to clarify a few things with Ralph Scott before we move forward." They got back out of the car and returned to the office. Frank explained what their concern was and the receptionist wrote everything down and left the room.

Ralph came out to the waiting room himself, shaking hands again. "You certainly aren't required to take the test," he said, addressing Ellen. "But it would probably be in your best interests to do so. Then, if it turns out Mr. Johnson, that is his name, correct? If it turns out he's mistaken, then you can be done with him."

"What gives him the idea that he's my father?" Ellen asked.

"Just that he was your mother's boyfriend fifteen years ago, and had to leave Florida. I'm sorry, Miss McPherson."

"It's Fisher," Ellen said, tossing her head.

"Um, right, sorry. Fisher." Frank smirked; she was no pushover.

"I guess we'll call Boyd when we get back to the garage," he said. "Come on, sister. Let's try to get out of here one more time." They walked back to the car without saying goodbye to Ralph again.

As the afternoon wore on and Frank took care of customers, Ellen was unable to focus on her book, trying to remember what Alan's face was like, his hair, what clothing he had on. He was tall, narrow through the shoulders and hips. When he handed her the money, she'd noticed his hands; nice hands that didn't work hard with pale pink fingernails. His hair was too black to be natural. She wasn't used to men who dyed their hair, and she smirked thinking about it.

"What's amusing you now?" Frank said coming through from the garage.

"I'm pretty sure the stranger dyes his hair," she said. Frank's hair was brown and always neat. He kept it short because it was easier being in the garage not to have to worry about hair getting in his eyes.

He looked at her. "I hardly know what to say to that. It must be the city way for men to fix their hair."

"Are you gonna say anything to him about it?"

"His hair?" Frank was stalling.

She laughed out loud. "No Frank, not his hair. About bein' my dad and all."

"I know. I'm just teasin you. I guess we need to call on Boyd first and see if he knows anything more about the man." Ellen took the phone off the wall and handed it to him. It was a black rotary phone with a short cord so he had to stand right at the desk while he talked, not wander away when he had to say something he didn't want her to hear.

"Right now?" he said, unsure whether what Boyd had to say was something they needed to know. Ellen was living proof Margaret had been with another man. But what if she was married to him? Although it might be positive for Ellen to have that information, it would mean he'd been a bigamist.

"Yes, please," she said. "Right now. I gotta know Frank. I wish we could talk to the man in person but I want to wait until we're sure. I mean, what if he's a windbag?"

"That he could be," Frank said softly. "I'll call Boyd." He dialed the number to the sheriff and dispatch said they'd have Boyd return the call. "Now we gotta sit around here and wait."

"I like it here," Ellen said. "Bein' at the garage this summer is one of the best times in my life."

"We gotta do something about that," he said, laughing. "A trip to the beach or a carnival, but not the smelly garage." The phone rang.

"Frank's Garage," he said.

"It's Boyd. What can I do for you?"

"Ellen wants to know why Mr. Johnson thinks she could be his daughter? What's his reasons?"

"Well, let me remember exactly what he said," Boyd replied, pausing. "He said he was in a relationship with Margaret Fisher and he left for a job transfer to Galveston and they lost touch. But he found out recently she'd had a baby after he left and he suspected the baby was his."

"That seems like a pretty flimsy reason to me," Frank said. Ellen strained to get closer to the ear piece, but Frank moved further away and frowned.

"I think it would be perfectly acceptable for the two of you to confront him yourself if you are comfortable with it. He said you were doing a fine job of raising her and he didn't want to interfere."

"It doesn't explain why he's comin' forward now," Frank said.

"I can't answer for him," Boyd said. "I'm sorry this is all coming on at once."

"Yeah, it does sort of make one think there might be a connection, doesn't it."

"I didn't mean it that way, Frank. I'm not privileged to reveal who made the accusations, but I can tell you it wasn't Johnson."

“Okay, well thanks anyway.” They said goodbye and hung up. Ellen was waiting for him to tell her what Boyd said. “We can talk to him ourselves.”

“That was his answer? Gosh, thanks a lot.”

“Yes, well he said the man doesn’t want to interfere, in so many words.”

“Then why bother coming forward? I guess I’m too young or too stupid to understand.” Frank reached over and put his hand on her shoulder. He dare not hug her in case someone was watching.

“Let’s go over to Paul’s and ask him ourselves.” He automatically locked up the garage to walk next door.

“Can’t believe I’m lockin’ up. Things sure have changed,” Frank said shaking his head.

“I see that,” Ellen replied. “Can’t be too careful now.”

Alan was going over an invoice and looked up when they walked in. Ellen had her eyes on him, trying to feel some kinship, but there was nothing. They might have shared a similar hairline, and his ears looked familiar. He was so lanky; Ellen had tried Margaret’s brassieres on and she was ample busted compared to the slender Ellen. Maybe she took after Alan Johnson’s women more than she took after her mother in that respect.

“We heard from the sheriff today. About your claim to be Ellen’s dad.”

“Let me clarify that,” Alan quickly said, looking to Ellen. “I believe I might be your father, but make no claim to it. I hope you’d be willing to take a test.”

“What makes you believe it?” Ellen asked. “What happened that made you think of me?”

“I was looking for your mother,” Alan said. “When I left Florida for Texas, she was supposed to follow me, but she never showed up. So when I got sacked I had the time to go lookin’ for her again and someone from her old work place told me she’d had a baby, that she’d lost her job and left Saint Augustine with you. The timing was right for you to be mine.”

“And you didn’t know she was gonna have a baby?”

“No, she didn’t tell me and then I left town. I borrowed money from her and never paid her back,” he answered, ashamed. Ellen thought about it for a moment before she continued on.

“Why’d you come lookin’ for me in Seymour?” Ellen asked, still unsatisfied. “How’d that come about?”

“It was serendipity,” he answered. “I stopped for lunch in Mobile and found this article.” He’d taken the newspaper article about the ninth-grade graduation dance from Mary, pulling it out of his pocket to show them. “Then I met Miss Logan at the boarding house. She started talking about your mother and I found out she’d died. I’m very sorry, by the way.

“I’m sorry I was snooping around your woods. Also, that I came here and didn’t introduce myself right away. I wasn’t sure it was really you.”

Having to navigate her manipulative mother, Ellen had a sense about people and it was telling her that Alan Johnson was somewhat the scoundrel who couldn’t be trusted completely. But he had nothing to gain as far as she could tell, by claiming her as his child.

“What’d you want from us?” Frank asked.

“Nothin’, I swear,” Alan replied, looking at Ellen again. “I don’t have anything to offer you, but I don’t want anything either. Just to know you, if you are my child. And if you don’t want to know me, well I’ll live with it.” Ellen looked at Frank and he could tell by her eyes she’d had enough.

“We’ll talk to the sheriff about what the next step should be then,” Frank said, putting out his hand to shake Alan’s outstretched. They turned and left the parts store and started walking to the truck.

“I guess I’ll take the test,” Ellen said. “It can’t hurt nothin’. But you know Frank that even if he’s my father, it don’t mean a thing to me. You’re my dad, always.”

“Thank you, sister. I appreciate it.” As they reached the truck, Frank just happened to look up at Miss Logan’s. She was standing in the window watching but she quickly turned away when she saw him looking over, not waving at him in acknowledgment, as she would have in the past. “Well, look at that. Miss Logan just turned her back on me. You suppose she’s listening to gossip?”

“Gossip probably originated with Miss Logan,” Ellen said smugly. “Know that she and Mary are closely related in the gossip department. Which one said it first might be up for debate. But it’s not very nice of me to say so, so I better be quiet.” It never occurred to Frank that it could have been Miss Logan who saw them hugging in the car until that second.

“You don’t say?” Frank said, staring at the salon. “I should stroll over there and have a little chat with her. What do you think?” Ellen looked over at the salon, at the smudged windows with the fading signage and the disintegrating brick work in front. Miss Logan was rather pathetic; not that old, but old enough, she didn’t have much of a life with her boarding house address and public transportation, her seedy building which stood next to the flawlessness of Frank’s Garage.

“No, I say let her be. If she was the instigator, it will come out soon enough. It will probably help her business.”

“I noticed business at the garage was next to a stampede today and we supposed to be closed,” Frank said, smiling. But Ellen was ready to move on, anger at Miss Logan and Alan Johnson, Boyd Dalton and her own mother surfacing again so that the few seconds of respite making fun of Miss Logan provided had passed.

“Let’s go to the clinic and get it over with,” Ellen said. “I feel sick to my stomach again.”

“I do, too. Although it don’t matter at all to me, I always knew you were another man’s child, Ellen. But it never made a bit of difference to me. Not one iota.”

He put the key in the ignition and the truck started up fine, so that he gunned it a little to give her a thrill like it used to when she was a small girl. It worked again and she laughed.

“You called me dada the first time we laid eyes on each other. Grabbed my hand and said it, so that your mother started to laugh. She told me right off that she wasn’t married to your father.”

“Why not, I wonder? It’s scandalous nowadays; it must have been horrible for her then.”

Ellen imagined her mother, alone, unwed. If Alan was the father, did he flee? Why didn’t she bother to tell him? He said he owed her money. That she’d lost her job after a time. How desperate was she?

“Poor mamma,” Ellen said. “No wonder she was off her rocker that far back.”

“She took wonderful care of you, sister. Your little dresses ironed as carefully as if she was fixin’ to wear them herself. Our first date you came with us. The drive-in movie. You sat between us and then fell asleep with your head in her lap and your feet up against me.”

“It was lucky she found someone like you, Frank.”

“I said the same thing about her. I was lucky to find someone like Margaret. Her breakin’ down in front of my garage, now that was a blessing. I don’t even want to think about what my life would be without you.”

He shook his head, trying to put the horrible thought out, and putting the truck into gear, they drove to the medical office in silence.

After the encounter with Frank and Ellen, Alan felt sick, as well. It was near closing anyway, so he simply told Paul he was leaving because he was ill. Taking his jacket off the coatrack, he left out the back door without saying goodbye to the packers. Head down, he walked as fast as he could to Mary’s boarding house. She’d be there waiting for him and he was dreading it, making the decision that if she crossed him, he was going back to Cate’s. But she was pleasant and happy, talking about her day, pattering around the kitchen fixing dinner and he was able to hide his distress. Still not willing to share his suspicions about Ellen's paternity, he'd wait until their blood test results came back.

Relaxed with his elbows on the table, enjoying a glass of wine with Mary during dinner, he let his guard down for a moment forgetting whom he was talking to and it had an untoward effect on her.

"I spoke with Ellen and Frank before closing. Ellen is very sweet. What a great guy Frank is. I'm glad Margaret ran into him."

If he'd been looking at Mary when he said it, he'd have stopped right away. But he was gazing out the window at her back yard, with the dwarf fruit tree and the ratty chain link fencing.

"Your yard could be nice if you put a little effort into fixing it up."

Those last fateful words are what caused him to shut up and regret speaking, though she was livid long before.

"What do you mean; you're glad Margaret ran into him? Margaret who, Alan? Who are you speaking of? My Margaret?"

She'd gotten up from the table and started to pace, stopping right in front of him with a look of such disdain that he reared back, frightened she was going to haul off and pop him.

"Yes, your Margaret. Take it easy."

"Don't tell me to take it easy, Alan. Why do you care about Margaret? Why the sudden interest in Ellen and Frank?"

Lips trembling, Mary's face was flushed, but she had a pale ring around her mouth that frightened Alan; it was obvious she was seething mad.

"I'm not suddenly interested," he said, knowing he would regret it when and if the blood tests came back positive. "They just happened to stop by the store before closing is all."

He didn't mention that the confrontation actually made him ill.

"You know the sheriff is gathering evidence against him. Did you realize that, Alan? Evidence that he's abusing Ellen. I heard it today. Miss Logan blew the whistle on him when no else, me included had the courage." The look of triumph on her face shocked Alan. "He's a sleaze ball, Frank McPherson is. High and mighty Frank really nothing more than a low-life child molester."

Speechless, if it was true, and Ellen was his child, Frank was abusing his child. Without warning, he jumped on her, knocking her to the floor.

"What do you know, you whore! What are you saying? Who told you Frank was abusing Ellen, who?"

Her shirt bunched up in his hands, spittle hitting her in the face, in the eye as he screamed.

Once Mary caught her breath from the attack, she started to scream.

"Get off me!"

Arching her back and struggling, he was too strong for her, as an insane person gains strength in anger, Alan could kill her with his bare hands and told her so.

"I'll wring your neck if you don't tell me what you know!"

"Sally Logan saw them kissing at the side of the road," she yelled.

"You believe the lies that dried up old bitch is spreading all over? I thought you were smarter than that."

With strength she dredged up from some deep, attention-starved place, Mary Cook shoved him off her, but not before she slipped up, just to save her own skin.

"I saw it, too. I saw them standing in the living room out at the cottage on the river, kissing. It was disgusting, I tell you! They're disgusting."

She was panting, kneeling on the hard wooden floor, hands on her knees, choking for air.

“Why didn’t you tell the sheriff what you saw?” he said, rocking back on his heels.

“I didn’t want him to know I was out there,” she said, gasping for breath.

All Alan could think of was that his child might be in danger. It seemed so unlikely, because Frank and Ellen were so good together; you could just see their love and tenderness, nothing sexual or lurid at all. But he had to tell the sheriff this extra piece of news. If Mary did see what she said she saw, he had to act.

“You call me a whore? Ha!” she gasped. “She was kissing him back! She’s the whore. Ellen Fisher is the whore!”

Without thinking, he lifted up his hand and smacked her as hard as he could across the face, the whump! echoing through the living room to the kitchen, knocking her over. She put her hand up to her face, and at first she was going to laugh, but then she realized that her suspicions about him were true. He’d just confirmed it for her.

“You’re her father, you filthy pig, you! Ha! I knew it, I suspected it. Get out of my house!” She screamed.

Without wasting a second, he got up off the floor and walked into the bedroom off the kitchen to gather his belongings. He’d been living out of his suitcase so it wouldn’t take long. Sneaking up on him, when he turned, she was in the doorway, a grin on her face, hands behind her back.

“I fucked her, too.”

Not knowing what she was getting at, did she mean she slept with Frank behind Margaret’s back, or did she steal money from her, not thinking what she meant was what it really meant. Then he got it, and he laughed.

“In your dreams, Mary. A woman like Margaret wouldn’t give someone like you the time of day,” he said, snickering.

Mary flew at him screaming again, hitting him with both fists. Surprised, he grabbed her arms but she’d caught him off guard and he lost his balance, falling over on the bed. Tears running down her face, Alan saw the frustration and anger of hidden yearning and unrequited love.

“What! Were you in love with both of them? I figured Frank, but his wife, too? You’re a piece of work.”

“She loved me!” Mary screamed. “We loved each other, you piece of shit. You didn’t deserve someone like her.”

“I didn’t know she was pregnant,” he said, dodging her flaying hands. “It was fifteen years ago. I was just a kid.”

“That’s no excuse,” she spit out, getting off the bed.

A lump in her throat hurt from screaming. Leaving him in disgust, she went back to her own apartment and locked the door. She’d never admitted that she and Margaret had been lovers to anyone. It was so delicate, Margaret refusing to discuss it in their conversations afterward because it didn’t mean the same thing to her. But to Mary, it was everything, especially after Margaret began to slip. Seeing her deteriorate was more than Mary could stand after what Margaret meant to her.

Now that Alan knew, the beauty of it was cheapened, him knowing about it ruined it. Sitting on the edge of her bed, she lowered her face in her hands and started to sob in earnest, broken-hearted. All this time after her death, the finality of Margaret dying hit her in its fullest power, grief overwhelming her.

“Why didn’t I keep my mouth shut?”

WHILE ALAN JOHNSON moved out of Mary's house, heading to Beauregard to see if Cate would take him back, Frank and Ellen were at home after having her blood drawn by Margo at the clinic. Frank was putting another flat of petunias in the ground while Ellen made dinner; meatballs and spaghetti tonight. He insisted on doing the planting alone although it was something they'd done together in the past because having to be out there among the decimated peonies was too upsetting for her. They were trying to forget and move on. It would be easier to do once the garden was colorful again.

Knowing Alan Johnson was the stranger at the edge of the wood made Ellen feel a little safer; at least it wasn't someone meaning to do her harm. Now all they had to do was wait for a week to get the blood results back, and then they would decide what to do with the information. Dinner was almost ready; a cover over the simmering sauce would keep it from spattering all over as she went out to tell Frank. Squatting down, putting the last flower in, Frank's back was to the house. After doing battle at the lawyer's office and working all day in the hot garage, he was sweating in the dirt for her. A sense of peace and of love flowing over her, Ellen was convinced that no matter what the result of the blood test was, Frank would always be her father.

"Time to eat, Frank."

"That was fast." He rocked back on his heels, sniffing the air. "I can smell Italian out here."

"The flowers look very nice," she said softly, smiling. "Thank you for doin' this."

"No problem. Can't let a spoilsport ruin it for us."

"Is that all it was?" she asked, uncertain. "It feels like a lot more. It feels very personal. Spiteful."

Walking to the porch, he reached up to take his hat off and scratched his head.

"Only if you let it. Don't give nobody that kind of power over you."

He put his arm around her and they walked into the house together. Hanging his straw hat up on the peg behind the door, Frank looked around the living room as if he were seeing it for the first time in a while.

"You know, we got the same old furniture we had when my ma was alive. I think it's time we spruce it up around here. What do you say?"

Ellen followed his eyes, to the upholstered chair with the carved wooden arms that her mother once sat in and the footstool covered in petit point that Frank's mother had worked, where Margaret rested her feet, trim legs crossed at the ankles. Behind it were ancient maple bookshelves Frank senior built, filled with Margaret's books. Next to the brass floor lamp stood Frank's recliner where he sat to watch boxing on TV every Saturday night, drinking a beer or two. The right side of the couch was Ellen's territory, and on the step table next to it was a pile of books to read and a good reading lamp.

"I don't want to change it," she said passionately. "No thank you, Frank. Unless you really don't like it, I say leave it be. I've had enough change for one day if you don't mind. The house stayin' the same is one thing I can count on."

"Okay, just a suggestion on account of everything being so turned upside down I thought a little change inside might be in order."

They made small talk over dinner, but what kept surfacing was Ellen's fear. "I just don't feel like I can ever sit out on the porch again. Or stay home alone."

“All this only just happened,” Frank reminded her. “You might be expectin’ a bit much. But I have an idea. Let’s teach you to shoot a gun. We’ll set up a target out behind the garage. I got my old bale o’ hay and we just need to attach a target to it.”

“I’d like that,” she said, holding up her hand like it was a gun. “I dare anyone to pick my flowers. Bang, bang!”

“Ha! Nope, this isn’t for flower pickers. Shootin’ a gun is only if yer life is threatened.”

“Let’s do it soon,” she replied.

“We can do it tomorrow after work,” he said. “While we still have some light.” Ellen felt instant relief knowing she’d be able to protect herself, just in case.

Mary had an old-fashioned temper tantrum after Alan left. Knowing he was going back to Towering Pines didn’t help; Miss Logan would probably hear the whole story of their fight and it would end up being chair side conversation at the beauty salon. Thinking about it, the whispers at the café, even the baggers at Family-Owned gossiping about her, she tore the sheets off his bed and stomped on them for a few minutes before stuffing them in the washer, pouring in extra bleach. Next, she took the mug he’d used for the past week out to the concrete driveway to smash to bits with a shovel, working up a sweat.

“Mary Cook, you better sweep that up good so no visitors get a flat.” She looked at what she’d done and at her concerned neighbor who was watching her antics over the fence, but waved him off. A shard of glass wouldn’t flatten a tire. “He musta been a heartbreaker to make you so mad.”

“Peter go back into your house, please,” she said, bringing the shovel up over her head again for a final smash. A little piece of the mug hit her leg and she didn’t even feel it until she went back inside for a broom and noticed a slender thread of blood running down her calf. She grabbed a paper towel and pressed it against her leg, anger abating, sadness replacing it. If she’d known he was THEE Alan, the Alan of Ellen’s father, she’d never had gotten involved. But to be honest, she’d wondered, already entertaining the fantasy of telling Margaret, IF she’d still be alive. The scenario went through her head, going to the hospital, holding Margaret, stroking her back.

“Alan’s living with me; he’s sleeping in my bed at night. I couldn’t get Frank, but I could get Alan.” But you couldn’t keep him, she thought, anger welling up again. Margaret would say that, I couldn’t keep him, but you couldn’t keep him, either. Mary began to cry, the unfairness of it. She was alone, again.

• • • •

DRIVING TO BEAUREGARD, Alan remembered that he wanted to tell the sheriff what Mary said she saw in Frank’s living room. He didn’t believe it for a second, but telling was the right thing to do, the first step toward protecting his daughter, just in case. Pulling into the gas station on the way to Cate’s, there was a pay phone outside on the side of the building. He dialed the operator and asked for the sheriff. Dispatch came on. “I need to talk to the sheriff about a child maybe being in danger.” He stumbled over the words, so foreign to his tongue and doubts about the validity of Mary’s story making him regretful for having made the call in the first place.

“Hold the line please,” dispatch said. Alan looked down at the glass and gravel ground almost into dust, intermingling with busted black top.

“Sheriff Dalton,” a familiar voice said.

“Sheriff, this is Alan Johnson. Ellen Fisher’s father.” It was premature, but so what. “Mary Cook told me she was over at the McPherson place a few nights ago and witnessed a deplorable act between Frank and my daughter. Now I don't believe it, but she says they were kissing, holding on to each other. Like lovers."

Boyd Dalton immediately thought of the destroyed garden. "Did she tell you what night it took place?"

"No sir, just that she was walkin' by the river. But like I said, I don't believe it, but I felt it was my duty to let you all know down there at the sheriff's office."

"Thank you, Mr. Johnson. I'll look into it." They said goodbye and Alan hung up and walked back to his car.

"I've got to get over to Seymour for a bit." Boyd stuck his head in the control room of the station before he headed out to Mary Cook's. He'd have an interview with her before the night was up.

• • • •

THE LIGHTS WERE ON in the dining room at Towering Pines. Alan hesitated, dreading a public admonishment from Cate and Miss Logan. He thought it might be in his favor to let them see him vulnerable since he needed something from Cate.

"I'm back," he said, announcing his arrival. But they'd watched him unloading his bag out of the front seat of the car, and were waiting expectedly, especially Miss Logan. When he glanced into the dining room, it was at a sea of smiling faces, not a wagging finger in sight.

"I see that," Cate said, getting up from her chair. "Come in and eat with us."

"Okay, I'd like that." He followed her back into the room, everyone watching, forks poised above plates. "You have a room available?" There was a stranger at the table, a lovely woman with blond hair wound into a twist in the back of her head, very 1940's.

"Yep, you can have your old room at the top of the stairs if you'd like," Cate said. "This is Miss Margo Portland, by the way." She nodded toward Margo who was smiling.

"Okay, I recognize you," Alan said. "You're over at the clinic." Margo nodded and smiled. Now that he'd revealed it to everyone, she was legally free to acknowledge him.

"My guest," Miss Logan said.

"Help yourself," Cate directed, pointing to the buffet. "Roast beef tonight." Alan took a plate and heaped on the food, not realizing how hungry he was.

"So what happened at Mary's?" Miss Logan said, launching right in.

"Sally, for God's sake, shut up!"

"That's okay, Cate. I might as well get everything out in the open. I believe I'm Ellen Fisher's father and Mary wasn't too happy about it." Margo and Miss Logan exchanged looks.

"I wondered why you were so interested in Margaret," Miss Logan said, smirking.

"Yes, and I am sorry about seemingly deceiving you," Alan said. "I knew when I was fishing for information that it might come down to this, you being annoyed, but I had to take the risk. You started talking about Margaret without me saying a thing. I blindly arrived here having seen only a newspaper article and a name. Everything fell into place. It's almost scary how easy it was; dumb luck."

The problems Miss Logan instigated by accusing Frank of passionately kissing Ellen were foremost in her mind.

"Are you going to do anything about the father messing with the girl?"

"Sally! Are you insane?" Margo yelled. "Honest to god, you are going to get your ass into hot water if you don't keep your damn mouth shut."

"I think it's a bunch of crap," Alan said. "But I'm sure the investigation will clear his name."

He didn't mention talking to Boyd Dalton earlier to tell him about Mary's accusation and Margo hadn't had her evening chat with Boyd, so she didn't know either. Miss Logan knew because she'd heard Mary's gossip from Jessie and later, Mary confirmed it.

"Don't be too sure," Miss Logan said.

"Let's change the topic, shall we?" Cate said. "Alan, how's the job?"

Giving more details than were necessary just to keep control, Alan then pulled Mr. Rosen into the conversation and even tried to engage Emil.

But Miss Logan had to bring up Mary's name again. "So, is it over between you and Mary? You made a great looking couple, by the way. A customer said she saw you two dancing and you made quite a team."

"We'll see," Alan said, chuckling, thinking of Mary laying on the floor, screaming at him. "She's a pistol, that's for sure."

When dinner was over, he had one thing in mind and that was to get to his room and crash. It had been an exhausting couple of days.

"Well, if you'll excuse me, I'm beat. Think I'll get unpacked and call it a night."

"We've been meeting on the porch for wine around eight for summer nights if you'd like to join us, I mean if you're still awake," Cate said quickly.

"Any special occasion?" he asked.

"Just in honor of the summer," Miss Logan said.

"It's already almost the end of June," Cate added sorrowfully. "I hope I get to the beach this year."

"What beach?" Alan asked, confused. He was thinking she might be talking about a beach on the Alabama River.

"What beach? What beach!" Miss Logan said. "Are you crazy?"

Alan laughed out loud. "Tell me woman, what beach?"

"Dauphin Island, of course. Didn't you say you lived on the Gulf? Galveston, wasn't it? And you don't know that beach? Good lord, man. Get with it!" Everyone was laughing. It felt good to relax and let it all out.

"Maybe I'll join you later," he said. "Unless I fall asleep. Then you'll have to knock on my door."

"Choose who knocks," Miss Logan said, a sultry tone to her usually down-country accent. "Cate or me. Or both." Cate was laughing, holding on to her side.

"Sally Logan! What in hell has gotten into you? Please, no one pay any attention to her."

"I think you're all nuts," Emil Magda said, pushing his chair away from the table. "I've lived her for four years and none of you ever made a big deal out of me coming down for summer nights."

"Don't feel left out, Emil. They don't give me the time of day, either," Mr. Rosen said sadly.

"Okay, if I'm awake at eight I'll come down. I'm pretty tired, though." He looked at the men. "No malice intended."

"None taken," Emil said, frowning. "I'll be there tonight, by the way. I wouldn't miss this one for a million dollars."

"Me neither," Mr. Rosen said. "I think our presence might prevent an unsuitable event from taking place."

"Mr. Rosen! I'm shocked," Cate said.

"I'm hoping it will be good and unsuitable," Miss Logan said. "As a matter of fact, I'm counting on it."

"You're impossible," Cate said.

“Well, goodnight, for the time being,” Alan said, trying to get away without being rude. He didn’t wait for a reply, but left the dining room quickly and hurried up the staircase to his room. Cool air rushed out at him when he opened the door; Cate must have turned the air-conditioner on when they were chatting during dinner. He reached over to turn the light on when the pain hit, he thought something must have crashed on him from the ceiling. But when the knife twisted in his back, he realized nothing had fallen. The pain was too excruciating to call out for help, and within seconds, he wanted nothing more than to lay down on the clean bed and go to sleep. He fell forward and face hitting the pillow, saw Ellen’s image walking toward him, smiling, saying, “Hi, Dad.”

BOYD WALKED UP THE steps to Mary's house and knocked. When no one answered, he knocked again. He looked in the living room window but it was dark; she was probably out for the evening, known for her forays to the dance clubs in Beauregard. Boyd and Mary dated very briefly many years ago, and there was still a little bit of chemistry between them. He was relieved she wasn't home. He got back into the patrol car and headed out to Frank's although he wanted to talk to Mary to confirm what Alan had said first. Concerned Mary tore up the McPherson's garden; he would use the information to try to get at the truth about Frank and Ellen.

Repeating the same procedure he had the day before, he turned his car off letting it drift up to the house, just in case there was something to see. But he needn't have bothered; the outside lights were ablaze and Frank was standing behind the garage with Ellen in front of him, a hand gun in her hands, his arms outstretched, guiding her hands as she aimed at a target. Boyd waited until the gun fired, evidently a bull's-eye because of the screams of delight and laughter that followed. He put his flashers on just to warn them he was there. They looked up, and Frank took the gun from Ellen, who removed her earmuffs as they walked to meet him.

"Good shot!" he called.

"This girl's a natural," Frank replied. "Born to it."

"What's the occasion?" Boyd asked. It wasn't unusual for father's to teach their children how to shoot, but there was usually a preceding event and although Boyd knew what it was, he wanted to hear it from Frank.

"Just in case I'm not around and she needs to defend herself. Now's the time to learn, not after it's too late."

"What's she defendin' herself from?" Boyd asked softly.

"Can I go inside?" Ellen asked, anxious.

"Of course," Frank said, looking right in Boyd's eyes, challenging him to say differently. "You don't need to talk to her, do you?"

"No, not at all. Good night, Ellen," Boyd said.

The men stood and waited until she was in the house. "I got some news tonight," Boyd said. "I heard that someone, someone who will be unnamed for now, was out here at the cottage and saw you kissing Ellen the other night." Frank started to protest, but Boyd put up his hand. "I'm not out here to accuse you again, Frank, although it might come to that later. What I'm thinkin' was this person may have been the one who tore up your garden."

"What're you sayin? That someone was spyin' on us? And then they picked every goddamned flower out of my yard? Now that makes no sense at all."

"Why would someone think you would be kissin' Ellen? Now this makes two people." Frank wanted to protest; didn't you just say you weren't accusin' me? But he was starting to get scared and decided quickly to be his own best witness.

"That night Ellen and me were practicing our dancin'. Come inside and I'll show you the letter we got. She'll tell you herself, we were slow dancin', like we do all the time. Come inside now, Boyd, I'll prove it to you."

"It's not necessary. I believe you. It just isn't looking real good for you right about now, I'm sorry to say."

Frank didn't reply, looking up the house. He could see Ellen moving from window to window, probably worried sick. Why was everything in our life turning to shit so quickly?

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, two burly men wearing hazmat suits struggled getting a blood soaked mattress down the steps of the Towering Pines Boarding House front porch. On Friday night when Alan Johnson didn't show up for summer nights wine tasting, Cate went up and tapped on his door, but he didn't answer. The next morning, everyone came down for breakfast, and waited for Alan, debating whether to delay eating or not. His car was out in front so they knew he was still home.

"I think I'll go up and invite him for breakfast," Cate said. No one answered her, watching as she put her napkin down and left the room. She grasped the stair rail and started up the steep flight of stairs, not sure if what she was feeling was annoyance or dread.

Tapping on the door, she called out his name. "Mr. Johnson, Alan. We're having breakfast. Would you like to join us?" She tapped a little louder, but there was no answer. Pulling out a key fob attached to a lanyard pinned to her jeans pocket, she pushed the key in the lock, but hesitated. There was a smell, and it made her pull back. Running down the steps, she grabbed the phone in the hallway and called the sheriff's office,

"What's going on?" Mr. Rosen asked, coming out into the hall. She put her finger up, mouthing one minute.

"This is Cate over at Towering Pines. I have a resident who isn't answering his door and I'm concerned. There is a smell coming from the room."

Dispatch replied they would send someone over as soon as they could. Cate hung up and went back into the dining room. Everyone was watching her as she poured a cup of coffee with shaking hands.

"Do you want me to go up and look in on him?" Miss Logan asked. "I saw a corpse once when I was in beauty school, right at the entrance of Buford Medical. He didn't make it to the ER." Cate grimaced, shaking her head.

"Stop with the gruesome talk, will you please? It's probably nothing; I just don't want to barge in."

"What if he needs help and your modesty is keepin' him from gettin' it?" Miss Logan said.

"She's got a point," Mr. Rosen said.

"He could be in there choking to death and we're out here makin' small talk."

"Would you mind going?" Cate asked Mr. Rosen.

"I can't stand the sight of anyone suffering. Let Miss Logan go." Against her better judgment, Cate unpinned the fob from her jeans pocket and handed the keys over to Miss Logan. She started up the steps and everyone followed, Emil Magda covering his face, fingers spread so he could see.

"I already smell death," he said. "It's the same at work."

"Shut up Emil," Miss Logan snapped. They reached the landing and Cate pointed to Alan's door.

"Go for it." Miss Logan put the key in the door and as she turned it, everyone involuntarily stepped back one-step.

"Oh! Is that blood?" she said, walking slowly toward the bed. Alan was face down on the quilt, fabric bunched up in both hands. His eyes were open, and weirdly, he was smiling. "Oh no, I think he's dead." She turned to see why no had responded and they were cowering out in the hall.

"Someone call the sheriff back, in stead of standing there like a dummy. We've got a corpse here."

"Did you feel for a pulse?" Cate asked.

“The man’s been stabbed for heaven sake. Or shot. Right in the back. Your Aunt Petra’s quilt is a goner, by the way. You should have let me have it when I asked ten years ago.”

“Not the quilt,” Mr. Rosen said, snickering. Cate flashed him a dirty look and tiptoed in the room. Seeing Alan, obviously dead, she gasped.

“Oh no! Someone came in here and murdered the man? But when?” Miss Logan pushed her aside and ran out of the room.

“I’ll call the sheriff myself,” she said, pushing by the group. “Honest to god what a bunch of useless pieces of crap you three are.” Miss Logan ran down the stairs to the phone in the front hallway and dialed the operator, asking for the sheriff. Hand muffling the phone in case one of them called out something inane, they walked down the stairs huddled together.

“What if the murderer is still in the house?” Emil asked, voice shaking.

“What if it’s one of us?” Mr. Rosen asked. Cate pushed him away, disgusted.

“I’ll go clean up from breakfast,” Cate said.

“Not yet! I didn’t eat and I’m starving,” Miss Logan said. “Oh hell, I’ve got a booked morning, too.”

“Let someone else take your appointments,” Mr. Rosen said. “The sheriff will probably want you around to question, just in case.”

“In case of what?” Miss Logan snapped. “Don’t you have something to do?”

“I didn’t eat, either,” he answered.

“Me either,” Emil replied.

“Get away from me, all of you!” Finally, dispatch answered and Miss Logan told her what they’d found.

“Don’t let anyone touch anything,” dispatch said. Miss Logan rolled her eyeballs.

“Of course I won’t.” She ended the call and joined the others in the dining room. “I’ll lock up the room again so they can’t accuse us of tamperin’ with the scene, and then I’m eatin’ with the rest of ya.”

“Nothing has ever happened like it here,” Cate said, upset. “It won’t be good for business.”

“Well, since he’s the first new person come around in a while, I think you’ll be okay,” Miss Logan said, turning her head to roll her eyeballs again.

Margo Portland stepped out of the shower and heard talking coming from her bedroom. It would be Boyd on a call. He’d come over first thing that morning and they’d had a wonderful time in bed, the first in a long while. She knew he’d have to leave eventually, but hoped they’d be able to have breakfast together.

“Do you have to go?” she asked.

“I’m afraid so. You’ll never guess in a million years.”

“Oh no, don’t do that to me,” she said. “Tell me before I burst.”

“Alan Johnson was found dead in the upstairs guest room at Towering Pines.”

“No way!” Margo plopped down on the edge of the bed watching Boyd buckle his holster around his waist. “I was there when he came back to Cate’s last night.”

“Is that right? Sounds like a murder, but you didn’t hear it from me.”

“How is that possible? Was it Frank?” she asked, the words just popping out of her mouth. Margo felt sick. Please, not Frank.

“Oh God, I hope not,” Boyd said, frowning. “I never even thought of him. I thought a jerk comes into town and pisses someone off.”

“Right, Boyd. Frank McPherson.” But Boyd was shaking his head.

“No way. I can’t see Frank killing a squirrel, let alone a man. And this was a stabbing. It was personal. Did Johnson say anything about, well about anything last night?”

“Just that he was sure he was Ellen’s father and when he told Mary, she wasn’t happy about it.” Boyd put that tidbit into his knowledge bank.

“Look, are you going to be around later? We need to talk.”

“Not that,” she said, cowering. “Don’t ruin my weekend, if you don’t mind.”

“No, no, nothing like that. Just the opposite. I want to move out of the house and move in here.” He took her by the arms and looked into her eyes. “But I have to go right now, so just think about it.”

Margo was stunned speechless, but walked him to the door and kissed him goodbye, not checking to see if they were being observed. It didn’t make any difference now, or soon wouldn’t. For a moment, guilt struggled to overtake her joy, but lost. If she couldn’t have Frank, Boyd would be just fine.

• • • •

MARY LAY IN BED WITH an arm slung over her face. Hung over, miserable, the longed-for romantic relationship was not happening for her. The thought of going into the café made her ill, but she had to do it. June was the last friend she had, the only other woman in town who understood her, who was willing to stick her neck out for her, and June had the afternoon free. She had to go in and relieve her. Sitting up at the side of the bed, the room spun for a few seconds, just long enough to raise her gorge so that she threw up with such force it hit the wall. Mostly liquid but with a few mushy pretzel bits, acid burned her throat and crept into her nostrils. It was going to be a rough day.

Showering, she hummed a tune, a child’s old Bible tune to help her keep from thinking too much. Deep and wide, deep and wide, there’s a river running deep and wide. What had happened the evening before between her and Alan reverberated through her head unless she thought of that song, and it became a mantra to her, protecting her from anguish. Remembering her mother suddenly only intensified the torment and it would take more than a nursery rhyme to chase that vision away.

Valarie Cook, town drunk. A surprising laugh popped out of Mary’s mouth. Where’d laughter come from? Living with her mother in that same house was no laughing matter. It was a sign of the times; people didn’t interfere in others lives. Their neighbors, the mother’s of Mary’s few little friends, her school teachers looked the other way when it was clear a severe case of abuse and neglect was taking place right under their noses. Margo’s well-meaning parents took her to church every Sunday and the few Bible verses she memorized entitled her to her very own vinyl bound Bible. I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me. Closing her eyes, she let the water run down her face while she prayed the verse.

The atmosphere in the town now would never stand for it; the gossipers would make sure they protected the children, even second handedly, through gossip. She stepped out of the shower and dried off, dressed for work, avoiding looking in the mirror. The night had to have taken a toll on her face, another stranger, groping in the back of the bar, a promise of a call that would never come. Help me God. Batting away a stray tear, something had to happen soon to make life worth living.

• • • •

WEARING AN OLD APRON of Margaret’s, Frank was at the stove flipping pancakes, the old radio tuned to the national news. Still in bed, the smell of vanilla woke Ellen up and she smiled at the thought of a special treat for a late Saturday morning brunch, just because. She was used to Margaret being gone, but the monthly trips to Hallowsbrook would be harder to forget. Now they could have breakfast together and laze around without having to go anywhere until six pm when they were due in Beauregard for the dance contest.

“Knock, knock,” Frank said, standing outside of her bedroom, looking in the crack of the open door.

“I’m awake,” she said, sitting up. “What do I smell?”

Frank came through the door with a tray, holding her breakfast.

Bouncing up and down, Ellen started to laugh. “My breakfast? In bed? I feel like a princess.”

“Pancakes, strawberries, and tea.” He put the tray on the table where she did her homework during the school year but which lay fallow for the past week, and helped pull pillows into place behind her back. “Here you go. Today is gonna be a day of peace if I have to kill someone. We have to save our strength for tonight!”

“Don’t answer the door or the phone. Isn’t that what momma used to say? If they come unannounced they can be ignored.” Placing the tray across her knees, he left the room to get his coffee.

“Here’s what I’d like to do,” he said, coming back in and sitting on her desk chair while she ate. “I’ll get the grill out of the garage. Let’s drag those old chairs out, too and hose them down. And the picnic table; the benches need to be sanded.”

“I can sand,” Ellen said.

“Okay, sister, that’s your task. We can cook chicken on the grill and I’ll make potato salad,” Frank said. “That just feels like summer to me. If you want, we can get your old wading pool out, too and fill that thing up.”

“The rings have air leaks,” she replied laughing. “That thing is as old as I am.”

“I gotta tire repair kit around here somewhere. Sittin’ in four inches of water cold from the well on a hundred degree day just sounds refreshing.” They looked up when loud knocking at the front door disturbed their morning.

“Bother,” Frank grumbled, standing up.

“Don’t go,” Ellen said. “Remember we said we wouldn’t answer the door.” He walked to the window and pulled aside the curtain.

“It’s Boyd Dalton.”

“Again?” she said, annoyed. He left the room to answer, a sick feeling in the pit of his stomach hit him out of nowhere.

“This is beginning to feel like harassment,” he said, opening the door.

“I know,” the sheriff said. “Can I come in? I need to talk to both you.”

“Ellen’s still in bed having breakfast. Come on back.”

“But this is bad, Frank. You might want her to come out here, no bad associations in her bedroom.”

“What is it?” Frank scratched his head. Did the garage burn down? Margaret was gone, there wasn’t anything else they cared about that could be upsetting.

“Well, maybe it’s better if I tell you first. You can tell her when the time is right. Alan Johnson was murdered last night.” He watched Frank’s face, and the man truly looked shocked. Confused, and then shocked.

“How?” Nervous stumbling over his words, “Why? The man just came to town. What enemies could he have?” Sheriff Dalton looked intently at Frank, although his name hadn’t come up yet, the truth was Frank was probably the only person who had anything to lose by Alan’s presence.

“You don’t think I had anything to do with it now, do you?” he asked, shocked. “When did it happen? I’ve been here all mornin’.”

“Last night, after dinner,” the sheriff said. “Down in Beauregard.”

“Well there you go, no one’s safe on those streets, the town has risin’ crime,” Frank said, breathlessly. “Besides, you was here, remember? I ain’t been away from home since we got here after work yesterday.”

“He was staying at Towering Pines,” the sheriff replied, pointing over his shoulder, south. “It happened in his room. His body was discovered this morning.”

“Towering Pines? I thought he was stayin’ over with Mary. The women was talkin’ about it so loud at Miss Logan’s I could hear it over the compressor.” It was the sheriff’s turn to snicker.

“Anyway, I needed to tell you because of, well, the paternity thing. How you think it’s going to affect Ellen?”

“She’s gonna be upset, what else?” Frank said. “The girl just met the man, thinkin’ here’s a real family member. I hate to be the one have to tell her, truth be told.”

“Do you want me to say something?” Frank shook his head.

“Naw, that’s my job. But the other, you can’t think I had anything to do with it.”

“Don’t worry about it now,” the sheriff said. “Not yet. You might be asked to come into the station for questioning.” He stepped over to the door. “Sorry to upset your morning. What’s the occasion?”

“For what?” Frank asked, confused.

“Breakfast in bed,” the sheriff asked, turning to look at Frank again.

“Somethin’ special. We’re still gettin’ used to not going to Hallowsbrook Saturday morning. Today was our visitin’ day. And we got a dance contest tonight.”

“Oh, right,” the sheriff said, extending his hand. “I’m sorry Frank. I keep forgetting about your loss. Forgive me,” he said, nodding his head. Frank shut and locked the door after the sheriff and turned to go to Ellen’s room when he saw her standing in the hallway.

“Did you hear?” he asked, seeing the look of shock on her face.

“I don’t get it,” she answered. “Both my parents, dead within three months of each other. You’ll always be my dad, Frank, but this seems almost planned, don’t it?”

“Don’t get paranoid,” he said, putting his hand on the back of her head and pulling her to his chest. “It’s just an ungodly coincidence.”

“Does he suspect you’re involved in some way?”

“I hope to hell not, excuse my language, sister. I hope to hell not.”

However, the assistant district attorney, Faye Baker was chomping at the bit to get Sheriff Dalton to talk to Frank. “It’s time to bring him in for a chat at the very least, regarding these child abuse allegations. It’s been two days now and I don’t want to wait until Monday.”

“I’ll call him,” Frank said. “I’ve been out there daily and already once today. It’ll look like harassment if I go again. He’s already used the word.”

“Ha! I doubt the man knows what it means,” the attorney said.

“Don’t let Frank’s simple talk fool you, Faye. Still water runs deep over there at the garage.”

“Whatever, Boyd. Talk to him, please.” So after hanging up, he closed the door to his office and picked up the phone again, dialing Frank McPherson’s number yet again.

“Come on down to the station, Frank,” he said, friendly and unthreatening. “I just want to talk to you about the allegations.”

“When do you want me? I was spendin’ the day with my child, trying to make it special for her. You already ruined her breakfast.”

“I’m truly sorry, Frank, but I felt you needed to know about Alan.”

“I don’t feel safe leavin’ her here.”

“Drop her off at Margo’s, Frank. Margo would love the company and Ellen knows her.” He’d have to call Margo quickly to let her know he’d volunteered her to babysit a fifteen-year-old. There was silence over the line for a moment, but Frank finally spoke.

“Okay, I can do that. She might object, being fifteen and all, but I don’t feel right leavin’ her here alone.”

“I gotcha, Frank. I don’t know I would, either.” After they hung up, Frank went back to Ellen’s room where they were trying to finish breakfast. She frowned seeing the expression on his face.

“Who was that? I heard the phone ring,” she asked, concerned.

“It was the sheriff again. He asked me to come down and talk about the allegations.” He was embarrassed talking about it with her, insinuating their relationship was dirty tainted the goodness of it. “I’m going to drop you off at Margo Portland’s place.”

“Do I have to go?”

“I wish I could let you stay here at home, but after everything with the garden, its better this way. The station is just a few blocks away from Margo’s house and you know her.”

She didn’t argue, but he could tell she wasn’t happy, it added to the news about Alan Johnson. Still not sure of the impact it was going to have on her, Frank was silent about the murder. There didn’t seem to be much left to say.

They drove into town, pulling up to Margo’s place. “This house looks like it’s made of gingerbread,” he said, walking up to the door with Ellen. It was a tiny Victorian cottage painted pale peach and the wooden curly-cues and ornamentation were turquoise and lavender. Ellen looked at the house as if seeing it for the first time.

“Why can’t I go with you?” she asked.

“It just wouldn’t be good, sittin’ there alone while I’m bein’ asked questions. And I don’t know how long I’ll be. You got yer book and all, you’ll be fine with Margo.” He knocked and Margo opened the door right away, smiling, sincerely happy to see them.

“Come in!” she stood aside so they could pass, but Frank stayed on the porch.

“Thank you for havin’ her,” he said. “I guess I can call you when I know what’s what.”

He felt foolish having no answers, but he didn’t know what was in store for him.

“That’ll be fine. We’ll be staying here unless Ellen has something she’d like to do.”

Margo smiled at her, but Ellen was upset and looked away. Frank said goodbye and Ellen went to hug him. Margo thought he seemed surprised, like they weren’t used to hugging, but he hugged Ellen back, then took her by the upper arms.

“Everything will be okay, I’m sure of it,” he said. “You take care now. Read your book and try to have some fun.” He’d never seen her look like this, fragile almost, near tears. Ellen was not a crier. He released her and walked to the truck while she watched, waving to her before he got in and drove off.

Ellen felt like a big hole had swallowed him up.

“Are you okay?” Margo asked gently. But Ellen was afraid to speak, so she shook her head. “Well come over here and sit down. You can read your book or watch TV. Here’s a bowl of candy. I can’t eat sugar, so help yourself, less temptation for me. I can make you a snack or some tea. Anything you want.”

The room was a woman’s room, thoughtfully decorated with feminine touches, but one a man would be comfortable in. Margo pointed to an overstuffed couch covered in off white cotton canvas. There was a fat calico cat sleeping on the arm, and Ellen reached out to pet it.

“Why are they doin’ this to us?” Ellen said, finally speaking. “Frank did nothin’ wrong. He’s the best father to me.”

Margo waited for Ellen to say something about Alan Johnson, but her mind seemed far from it, the focus all on Frank.

“It’s just to protect you, honey. The authorities need to follow up on accusations they hear.”

“But why would anyone accuse Frank of messin’ with me?”

The cat stepped down from the arm of the couch and onto Ellen’s lap, rubbing its head against her chin, purring. The gentleness of the cat touched Ellen and she lost her control and started to cry.

“He has never, ever made me feel uncomfortable. You know what he’s like with me better than anyone else does. He was so concerned to keep everything right between us he wouldn’t even talk to me about my body when I was growin’ up.”

Margo remembered five years ago that Frank asked her to talk to Ellen about menstruation. It was during that time that fantasies of Ellen being her daughter and Frank being her husband began, ripening her for Boyd when he made his move and things with Frank seemed hopeless.

“Yes, he was so sweet calling to set up the appointment. I do remember Ellen. And if I’m asked in his defense, I will definitely bring it up. I’ve been seeing you since you were a toddler, I would have noticed if anything were amiss. But we’ll wait for someone to ask me. They haven’t formally accused him of anything yet. There’s no proof. You shouldn’t worry, okay?” She took a step of faith that Ellen would submit to a hug, so she scooted closer to her on the couch and put her arm around her. “You’ve had a tough year.”

Ellen didn’t respond, but she knew Margo was referring to her mother dying. It had to have affected her, but she was in denial about its impact. Seeing the garden ruined was more devastating than the day Margaret died. She’d never forget the sequence of events. They’d gone to see her the previous Saturday and she was fine, had taken the trouble to prepare for the visit by dressing, putting lipstick on and combing her hair, surprising Ellen who’d then allowed hope to sneak in since Margaret seemed so much better.

“Look how nice Mrs. McPherson looks today!” The nurses said, crowding around the door to her room. Margaret was warm and talkative, almost animated that day. It was the last time they would see her alive.

The following Wednesday, Mary visited Hallowsbrook, and reported to Frank that evening that Margaret had gotten worse. “Frank, you better prepare yourself that Margaret’s not comin’ home. You and the girl need to face reality so it’s not so hard when it finally happens.”

He took to heart what Mary said, and when he got home from the garage that evening, he repeated her words to Ellen “Mary was by the hospital today and said your momma didn’t look too good.”

“What does that mean, Frank? It doesn’t make any sense. She’s been doing so much better. Did Mary say she looked sick? Maybe we should call the hospital.” But Frank hadn’t thought to ask and sure enough, Margaret died that night. Frank felt awful and if Ellen blamed him for not making the call, she never said.

A memory as transparent as a dragonfly wing fluttered through her mind, of her mother, dressed in a gingham blouse and a pair of denim capris, canvas shoes and her hair pulled back in a rubber band, standing in the bathroom putting bright red lipstick on.

“Whatcha doin’ momma?” Five-year-old Ellen asked.

“Why, I’m makin’ up my face so we can go to the garden for a bit to pull weeds.”

“But why are you puttin’ on lipstick for that?”

“Your daddy might come home for lunch and I don’t want him to catch me without my face on.” Those few words resonated every time she visited her mother in the hospital, especially those last months when Margaret started to recover.

Ellen was blossoming into womanhood at the same time Margaret came out of her fog. “Ellen, you’re growing up. You’re beautiful and it scares me. Frank, promise me you won’t let Mary near the girl. Promise me!”

“No worries, dear, none. Neither of us want her around, now do we?” Frank was appalled the conversation had taken place in front of Ellen.

“No momma, you don’t have to worry about it, okay? Ever.” While Margo held her, she thought of those unconnected things, of her mother’s concern for her wellbeing, and then that her birth father had lived with Mary for a few days. She shook her head.

“Alan lived with Mary, did you know that?” Ellen asked, looking carefully at Margo, ready to judge her response.

“He did,” she answered. “But just as a boarder.”

“I don’t think so,” Ellen replied confidently. “They were together together.” Margo sensed that Ellen was more aware of what was going on than she was giving her credit for.

“What makes you say that?” she asked, gently.

“Mary. The way she acted when she came into the garage, all sugary. She was trying to make my dad jealous. ‘I’ve got a date tonight. A guy from Texas goes by the name of Alan,’ she said. ‘He’s lookin’ for work, if you know of anything. And I’d sure like to keep him in Seymour.’ My dad jumped at the chance to get her off his back.” Margo turned her head to smirk; Mary Cook was a piece of work.

“Yes, well it does sound like they were dating.”

“After a few days? She’s disgusting.”

“It sounds like you have strong feelings about Mary,” Margo said.

“My mother never really liked her, yet Mary pretended they were best of friends. She warned me to stay away from Mary. There’s something super creepy about her.”

The hair on Margo’s arms stood up when Ellen spoke. There was something creepy about her. Margo remembered when they were growing up, bringing Mary home with her after school so she could get a decent meal, Mary asking if she could spend the night on school nights so she could bathe.

“Our water’s shut off,” she’d say. “My ma won’t care if I stay here tonight or forever.” The truth was, Mary wanted to live with Margo’s family, but she was only tolerable in small doses, often opinionated and ungrateful. Margo’s mother and father opened the house to Mary, and she’d complain about the food she was served or stole Margo’s clothes. It was a no-win situation.

“She visited your mother every week, didn’t she?”

“Only because Margaret had no control over who saw her. She died after Mary’s last visit. That always bothered me, but I never said nothin’ to Frank. We saw her on Saturday and she was better, she’d made the effort to fix herself up for Frank and was talking to us. You know they were thinkin’ of releasing her. I know Frank had his hopes up, that maybe my mother was on the mend.

“A few days later, Mary visited and came back to tell my dad she looked real bad, like she wasn’t going to last long. That night she died. They said she could have done it herself. But I don’t believe it for a minute.” Ellen bowed her head again, crying, expressing grief long overdue. Margo, trembling, put her arm around Ellen again, patting her hair. No one knew exactly what had happened to Margaret out at Hallowsbrook.

“At her funeral, I heard Mary whispering to Frank, beggin’ him to give her a chance now that my momma was dead. She used that word; dead. Not gone, not passed away. Dead. We never even used it once. I saw Frank go pale when she as talkin’ to him. Of course, he never says nothin’ bad about anyone unless it’s in a teasin’ way. But Mary sets his teeth on edge. He never came out and said it, but I know him.” Margo didn’t know how to respond except to try to get her to continue to talk.

“You don’t believe your mother died of natural causes.”

“No mam, I do not. Not anymore.”

“What do you think happened?” Her heart pounding, Margo didn’t want to plant ideas.

Ellen sat up straight and wiped her eyes with the back of her hand. “I think Mary killed her.”

“Why do you think Mary did it?” Margo asked, chills traveling up and down her arms.

“She’s always after my dad like I said, even at the funeral.” Ellen had never called Frank her dad to Margo before. “He was embarrassed by it and tried to hide it from me. But I could see it, especially at the graduation dance last month.” Margo remembered Mary’s behavior that day. “She kept trying to break in, but Frank wouldn’t allow it and it made her angry.”

“But wasn’t your mother gone already?”

“Yes mam, but just since end of March. And she was flirtin’ with him in public at the dance. He almost caused a scene. Mary wanted my dad to herself. And he wasn’t cooperating.”

Not knowing what to say, Mary was pushy and inappropriate in the best of times, but that hardly made her a murderer. Deciding to downplay what Ellen thought, she’d let Frank know and she’d legally have to tell Boyd. It wouldn’t look right otherwise. She knew Mary didn’t kill Margaret.

• • • •

BOYD DALTON WAS WAITING for Frank’s questioning to begin, standing on the other side of the two-way glass. He looked at his watch as one of the detectives, Dave Madden came in. “What’s the hold up?”

“Faye. She was supposed to be here an hour ago.”

“She told me to bring him in right away, for Christ’s sake.” Seething, Boyd watched Frank sit with his legs crossed, tapping on the desk. He’d known Frank since kindergarten; the man was innocent of everything they’d accused him of, but it was his job to make sure the girl was safe. It was a contradiction. High-heeled footsteps in the hall signaled the arrival of Faye Baker.

“Why are you in here?” Faye asked, annoyed, looking at Frank alone in the interrogation room. “Dave, are you questioning the man or not?”

“I’ve been here for an hour waiting to do it, Faye.” She gave him a dirty look as he walked into the room where Frank was waiting. They listened for fifteen minutes as he questioned him about what the gossipers saw. Then, surprising the sheriff, Dave asked Frank about Alan Johnson. It was the same line of questioning they would ask every suspect; where were you, do you have anyone who can confirm it, what was your relationship to the deceased?

Dave shook Frank’s hand and said he’d be back in a moment, returning to the two-way mirror room. “Unless you have anything else to ask him, I think we’re done with this guy,” he said. “It’s a damn shame someone from the community is as beleaguered by gossip as this man has been.”

Faye shrugged her shoulders. “Do we have his prints on file? We should be hearing any second from CSI.”

“Frank was in the Navy, so I’m sure his prints are in the system,” Boyd replied sarcastically.

“Tell him to go home,” Faye said.

Frank pulled in front of Margo's house, surprised when Ellen came bounding down the steps, calling his name. "Frank! You're back!" Getting out of the truck, she ran into the street to meet him, and jumped into his arms. He hugged her, holding her feet off the ground, smiling at Margo.

"What's this all about? I was only gone two hours."

"Two hours too long," she said, near tears. "Let me get my stuff." She smiled at Margo as she went back into the house for her book and bag.

"Frank I need to tell you something quickly before Ellen comes back out. She said she believes Mary killed Margaret."

Frank yelled, "What?" But Margo put her fingers to her lips.

"Shush, please. I don't want her to think I betrayed her confidence. I just think you should know." Frank was about to say something when Ellen came back out.

"Let's go home Frank. Thank you very much, Miss Portland. It was nice havin' someone to talk to." She smiled and got into the passenger side of the truck.

Margo watched them drive off together, inexplicably saddened. So much pain in the world. She wondered how long it would take Frank to realize he was a free man, in every sense of the word.

INVESTIGATORS FOUND a bloody knife in one of the trashcans behind the bus stop at the end of the street Towering Pines was on. Forensics thought it was the weapon used to stab and murder Alan Johnson and would know for sure when his blood was found on it. Fingerprints in Alan's room and on the knife handle didn't match and weren't in the system.

After Frank's questioning was over, Boyd Dalton went to the lab with Detective Madden to look at the knife. "Check this out," Dave said. "There's a very tiny engraving here at the side of the knife." It was an expensive restaurant knife, a carving knife; not a hunting knife anyone could acquire easily from a hunting store.

"I'm over forty," Boyd replied squinting at the blade. "You want me to see something that small get a magnifying glass." Dave rummaged through the drawers until he found a glass with a handle. They angled the glass until the inscription was clear.

"Baker Forge, Professional Restaurant # 9490." He got on the phone to talk to the investigative team who had already discovered the knife inscription.

"The forge is located in New York," he said after hanging up. "They're waiting for a call back."

The case file open in front of Boyd, they slowly leafed through the paper. No one had talked to Mary Cook yet. "He was at Mary's house before returning to Towering Pines," Dave said. "At least that's what it says here."

"Margo was there last night having dinner when he walked in. Mary wasn't too happy about him being Ellen's father, according to Johnson."

"How's everything going with Margo?" Dave said changing the subject, concern for his friend.

"Good. I'm leaving Carol, moving in to Margo's cottage, so I guess I'll be going to hell."

"You prepared for some other guy to come along and snatch up your ex? It'll happen, and it'll hurt," Dave replied, frowning. "I've been there."

"I hope it does. I want her to be happy," Boyd said confidently. "And the sooner she replaces me the better for her."

"Oh, don't count on it buddy. You might regret it big time. Think about some greasy shmuck being with your children. Trust me, it's all well and good to think Carol will be off your back, but what if the guy she picks doesn't like your kids?"

"Jesus, will you give it a rest? I haven't even moved out yet."

"Okay, but take your time making any decisions." Boyd didn't reply, sorry he'd answered in the first place. Every man's experience was different, wasn't it?

"I'm going over to Mary's place," he said, picking up his hat. As he drove through town, he imagined what it would be like when he moved into Margo's cottage, Carol driving over to Family-Owned and slowing down as she passed the house, or if what Dave said came to pass, seeing her with another man. A light shiver went through his body at the image of her kissing someone else.

Bombarded with thoughts of Carol and Margo, murder and child abuse, he arrived at Mary's and started to pull into the driveway when her neighbor, Peter came dashing out, waving his arms and pointing to the concrete.

"Don't drive up here!" he yelled. Boyd put on his brakes and rolled down the window.

"What's going on Peter," he said, annoyed. "I was already up this driveway today."

“Your girlfriend had a temper tantrum last night after her beau left in a huff. As you can see, she smashed a mug to smithereens. It wasn’t a pretty sight.”

Boyd got out of the car and looked down at the pavement, a thin layer of glistening substance covering an area of the concrete.

“Okay, thank you for warning me.”

“My pleasure, don’t want an officer of the law gettin’ a flat tire. She was madder than hell. Run outta here half hour latter, crying and mumbling to herself.”

“Did she come back? I was here earlier and there was no answer.”

“She left for work with her uniform on about an hour ago.” Boyd tipped his hat in Peter’s direction.

“By the way, she’s not my girlfriend. I’m here on business, not that it’s any of your business,” Boyd said.

“You were a fine pair, back in the day,” Peter said. “She’d never give me the time of day.”

“Maybe if you took a bath once in a while you’d have more luck with the ladies,” Boyd answered.” But Peter just laughed.

“Take me as I am, that’s my motto.” Getting into the car, Boyd waved, thinking that Peter might have just provided some information they didn’t expect. He steered the patrol car toward Main Street and the café, fluttering in the pit of his stomach. It wasn’t unusual for officers to come in for lunch so she wouldn’t suspect he was there for her. Not right away, anyway.

A parking spot open in front of the beauty salon, Miss Logan saw him pull up, fueling her dialogue about the morning at Towering Pines, in spite of being asked not to talk about it. “Look, there he goes now. I bet you a hundred bucks he’s goin’ to talk to Miss Mary Quite Contrary about her late boyfriend.”

Boyd removed his hat as he walked into the café and heads turned, looking on in admiration as they always did when he entered a room. Mary was standing at a table full of women with her order pad poised in the air, and he swore her face turned white when she saw him as he pulled a chair out to sit down. The women looked at him, church ladies from the area frowning, and he immediately thought they were thinking of Margo and him, having an affair.

Get your head together, Dalton, he thought. Focus. Alan Johnson. Watching Mary walk to the kitchen to place the order on the raised counter window, she lingered there for a moment longer than she really needed to. Turning, she picked up a menu and walked stiltedly to him, he could see she was hesitating, that she was frightened.

“Afternoon, sheriff,” she said, handing him the menu.

“How’s it going?” he asked, watching her. “Any specials?”

“Meatloaf or lake perch. Your choice of sides, same as always.”

“What time you get off today, Mary? I was by the house earlier, but you didn’t answer. We need to talk.”

“I get off at three, same as always,” she repeated. “You want to look at the menu a while longer or do you know what you’ll have?”

“Patience, patience.” He looked around the dining room and it was emptying out. Saturdays in the summer, people went to the beach and had picnics on the riverbanks, not diner food in town. “What’d you do last night?”

“Seriously? You’re gonna ask me that? What’s wrong? Margo give you the ax?” He wanted to say how’d you know about Margo, but it was obvious. Town gossip.

Instead, he laughed out loud. "I wasn't asking because I wanted a date, Mary. I'm asking because your boyfriend was found with a knife wound in his back, dead. You know anything about that?" He knew the timing was terrible here at her place of employment, but he wanted to see her response and it was about what he hoped it would be.

"You're lying," she said, color draining from her face again, her hands gripping the pen and pad.

"I am not, Mary. Flip the radio on. It's all over the dial."

"Your timing sucks," she replied. "I got orders to give out. If you aren't going to order something get out."

"Ha! What're you gonna do? Call the cops?" She sneered at him and he laughed again, opening the menu.

Mary couldn't believe someone had murdered Alan. It was almost as though the last week had never happened, that he'd never come into the café, or moved into her house, or made love to her. Feeling as if she could throw up again, Mary passed out plates of food to the table of women, the smell of cabbage and fried onions wafting up to her nose, nauseating. When everyone had their food, she went back to get Boyd's order, wishing she could slap his smug face.

"Isn't there a law against harassing a citizen at their place of business?"

"I'll take the steak and fries," he said. "Coffee, if it's fresh."

"I should piss in your cup," Mary replied.

"Peter tells me you had a little temper fit after lover boy left your place last night." He ignored her gasp. "Rumor has it you weren't too happy about his news. Not that it's been confirmed yet. Don't want that gettin' around if it's not true."

"What news are you referring to?"

"That Mr. Johnson is, was Ellen Fisher's real father," Boyd said, smiling. "Rumor has it that you were so upset, you smashed his mug in your driveway last night after he left your place."

"Your sources don't know what they're talking about," she answered smugly. "Prove it, Dalton."

"You don't seem very upset about his demise."

"Give me a moment or two to think about it, jerk. Now I'm putting your order in and if you don't leave me alone, I'm calling the station."

"Why not come down after work, instead," he replied. "Give us a chance to talk to you in front of a video camera."

"Why? Since when is it against the law to break up china in your own driveway?"

"Oh! Is that what you were doing? Peter tells a different story."

"You goin' around questioning my neighbors for no good reason is another form of harassment," Mary said, disgusted.

She walked away to put his order in and lingered behind the lunch counter for a while. Boyd was reading the paper, the morning edition left behind by an earlier patron. But he watched her over the paper's edge from time to time, wondering. She was attractive, smart, funny. Why couldn't she keep a man interested in her? He thought of his own relationship with her before he married Carol, how for a few short weeks he'd enjoyed being with her until her craziness made it unbearable.

"Here's your steak," she said, putting down a platter of food in front of him, with a steak knife poised over the edge. She walked away before he could respond, but he was fixated on the knife. It was a smaller version of the knife covered in Alan Johnson's blood. The bloody juices seeping out of the meat and the thought of the knife at the station, while it had been wiped clean by the time he saw it, made him queasy. He picked it up with a paper napkin and though he could barely see the engraving, since he'd already seen it once that day, the letters spelling Baker Forge jumped out at him. Heart thumping, appetite gone, he waved Mary over.

"Can I have a takeout box? Our chat used up all my lunch time." She didn't reply, but retrieved a cardboard container for his food and went back to the counter without engaging him again. He left a twenty dollar bill on the table, a fifty percent tip for miserable service, but he had it coming.

"See you later," he said, waving, and left the café, anxious to return to the station with his latest find, a four-inch steak knife carefully wrapped in a paper napkin in the box his leftovers came in.

FRANK AND ELLEN SPENT the rest of the day in the yard as they'd planned after the detour to the sheriff's office. Chicken ready for the grill, they made potato salad and chucked corn and were slicing strawberries to top ice cream sundaes. More flats of petunias sat in the shade, waiting for planting. They'd weed and primp the garden, a favorite summer pastime.

"Who's that, sister?" Frank said, looking up at the road, shading his eyes with his hand. A human being walked toward the house, but its sex was unclear. "I need glasses."

"It's Mary!" Ellen replied, disgusted. "Why is she comin' here?"

"Bother," Frank mumbled. "Hide them berries. She's the last one I want to have to invite for a meal." Ellen picked up the tray of food and took it around to the back of the house into the kitchen. What did Mary want?

As she got closer, Frank could see she was in distress. They busied themselves resuming the sanding of the picnic table while they waited for her approach.

"Hi, thought I'd drop by," she called when she reached the driveway. She took a crumpled tissue out of her pocket and blew her nose. When they didn't respond, she stopped walking and called out, "Mind if I come up?"

"No," Frank said. "As you like." Caught off guard by his attitude, Mary hesitated. Frank was always polite, even when the most aggravated with her.

"Did I catch you at a bad time?"

Frank stood up. "What can I do for you, Mary?"

"I got bad news today, that's all. I came by to give my condolences to Ellen about her real father." Ellen looked up when she heard the word real.

"No disrespect, Miss Cook, but Frank here is my real father. My only father. Please remember that when you come around his house."

"You got a smart mouth on you for a girl," Mary snapped. "Frank, I'd think you'd want her to be more mindful of speakin' to adults."

"Mary, why'd you come out here?" Frank asked, exasperated. "We done nothin' to you. Your opinion about my child ain't welcome, neither."

She came closer, and then sat down with a plunk on the picnic table bench and started to cry. "I never did anything to you, yet you're so mean to me! I was there for Margaret from the time she got here. Her and you, Ellen. Took you both in and gave you what I had. I never asked for nothin' in return."

"Yet you talked trash about Frank to anyone who would listen," Ellen snapped. "Shame on you. It's disgusting."

"What did I say?" she said. "That I saw you two through the living room window, in a lover's embrace."

"That's a lie!" Ellen shouted, Frank going to her and patting her.

"Quiet up, sister, no point in gettin' yourself in a tizzy about it." To Mary, he said, "When in God's name did you ever see us doing that? Maybe in a dream, or a nightmare."

"Just this week! I was walkin' by the river and I looked up and there it was, as plain as day."

"Monday night, someone tore up our garden," Ellen said softly. "Was that you? Mary Cook, my mother's best friend. Was that you who destroyed her peonies? The roses? Not a petal left behind?"

Mary's face belied her next words as the flush came up her neck. "It wasn't me. It was a coincidence. I was here on the river's edge and I saw you and snuck up by the garage. That's when I saw the two of you, holding each other, rocking, kissing. It was disgusting."

Frank chortled loudly, slapping his hands on his knees. "Mary, we was dancin'! What you saw was us slow dancin', like we always do. You better get home. I don't think you're in your right mind, lady. Get on home before I call the sheriff and tell him you was the vandal who ruined our garden."

The three of them waited, his words sinking in. Mary, family friend albeit annoying as could be, had so much venom for them that she could do that to a beautiful garden. "How did it get to this? All I wanted was to be your wife, Frank. Be Ellen's mother."

"You can't force such things, Mary. We would have been together before Margaret ever came to town if it was meant to be."

Ellen had left so quietly they hadn't noticed. She was inside on the phone, calling the sheriff, telling the dispatcher Mary Cook had just admitted she was at their house the night the garden was ruined.

Sitting at his desk, Boyd had a new file in front of him. In it was the coroner's report from the autopsy of Margaret Fisher McPherson, nurse's notes from Hallowsbrook and a narrative from questioning Miss Margo Portland regarding the conversation she had with Ellen Fisher, daughter of the decedent.

The intercom buzzed. "Sheriff, call on line two." Boyd picked up the phone.

"It's Faye, Boyd. Prints on the trash can knife match the prints on the café knife." Sitting back in his chair, Boyd couldn't believe what he was hearing.

"What about the prints from the room?"

"They're unknown." He could hear her snickering. "Come by my office in about fifteen minutes; you and Madden go pick Mary Cook up for questioning." He put the phone down and the intercom buzzed again.

"Sorry, sheriff, line two."

"Who is it?" he asked, growling.

"Ellen Fisher." Boyd quickly picked up the phone.

"Ellen, you okay?"

"Miss Cook is here, sheriff. She's actin' strange, crying about the man who says he's my father." Boyd stood up and started to gather up his belongings.

"Oh boy, I'm sorry she's bothering you."

"That's okay, but she told Frank she was out at the house on Monday and made her silly remark about seein' us kissin'. Monday night was the night the garden got wrecked. She denied it, but I'm pretty sure it was her."

"And she's still there?"

"I think so. I left Frank and snuck inside to call you."

"You did the right thing, Ellen. I'm on my way now." They said goodbye and hung up. Ellen went to the sink and turned the water on, letting it run for a moment. She filled a glass part way and drank from it, looking out the window. She could still hear the droning of Frank and Mary's voices, rising up and then down to a whisper as they argued. Praying silently Sheriff Dalton would hurry and get there, she felt guilty about leaving Frank with Mary. She put her ear to the door.

"I don't believe you," Frank was saying, disgust in his voice reverberating. "You're sick, Mary Cook."

“It’s true Frank; I wouldn’t lie about something like that. I loved her and she loved me back. We were together before she married you.” Ellen’s heart was beating so hard, she felt faint. Straining to hear Frank’s response, it took her a few seconds to figure out he wasn’t talking, that he was just as shocked.

“We went on a date the second day she was here, Mary,” he said, finally. “If what you’re saying is true, you got on her that first day.”

“It wasn’t like that!” she screamed. “I didn’t get on her. It was mutual.”

“This is low even for you,” Frank said softly, looking around to see if Ellen was nearby, not wanting her to hear Mary.

“Believe me, Frank, it’s true. Ask the nurses at Hallowsbrook. They knew we wanted to be alone.” Ellen thought back to the few times they’d arrived on Saturday when Mary had already been there, how jealous she’d be finding Mary in Margaret’s room, her smug smile before she left. Afterward, Margaret ignored her family. What if what Mary was claiming was true?

“I loved her as much as you did. She was my best friend! I love Ellen, too. I promised Margaret I’d be there for her daughter. And I would have been, if you’d both only give me a chance. Please Frank, give me a chance. I promise I’ll do whatever it takes to please you.”

Ellen opened the door. “You’re a liar. My mother couldn’t stand the sight of you.”

“Sister, don’t do it, don’t lower yourself.”

“It’s okay, Frank. She needs to know,” she said, directing the next words at Mary. “My mother once said you had cooties. She begged Frank to keep me away from you and he has.” Frank took her arm and pulled her over to him.

“That’s enough now. Don’t lower yourself.” The sound of a car on gravel made them look over to the road, to the sheriff’s car turning into the driveway. Frank looked down at Ellen with his eyebrows raised and she nodded her head. Boyd got out of the car, pointing to the house. Frank took Ellen’s arm again, whispering to her. They went back inside, closing the heavy door after them.

“He must be confrontin’ her about the garden,” Frank said. They went to the window and peeked out the side of the drapery. It happened so fast, they’d later say that it was almost like slow motion, confusing them both.

“What the heck?” Frank shouted. “She punched him in the gut!” Throwing the front door open, they ran to Boyd who was lying on the ground moaning, holding his stomach. Mary was already at the road, running toward town.

Trying to catch his breath, Boyd was unable to talk at first. “Jesus,” he croaked. “She’s got a hell of a left hook.”

“As much as I’m sure you’d like to forget that ever happened, she just assaulted a police officer,” Frank said.

“What are you saying?” Boyd asked, as they helped him get to his feet.

“You need to report this. Sister, go inside and call the sheriff’s office again.”

“No, no, I’ll chase after her. I need to pick her up before she disappears. I came to take her in for questioning.” He didn’t elaborate and they didn’t ask what he was going to question her about when he got into the cruiser, groaning, and left without saying goodbye. Frank put his arm around Ellen’s shoulder and they watched as he turned onto the road, dust trailing behind him, as the car sped up.

“He’s probably embarrassed,” Ellen said, worried. “I thought she might have stabbed him in the belly.”

“Like Alan was stabbed?”

“Yes, just like that. Do you think she did it, Frank?” Rubbing his chin, Frank thought about it for a moment.

“I’ve said it before, Mary is trouble, but I don’t think she’s a murderer.” But Ellen’s thoughts had shifted from Mary the murderer, to Mary the seducer.

“I heard what she said about momma. She implied they were lovers, didn’t she Frank?”

“If they were, Margaret was coerced,” Frank said, stony. He remembered the early days of their relationship, how eager Margaret was to get out of Mary’s house when he would come to pick her up for a date, willing to risk town gossip to stay with him out at the cottage before they were married, never allowing Mary to baby sit with Ellen, even for a moment.

“No, I believe she’s lying. Your momma never kept any information about her past secret. She was honest with me.” She’d said it nearly the first date; she’d had a child out of wedlock, what was there to hide?

“Then what was it? Why would she say such a thing?”

“I don’t know, sister. But I do know you shouldn’t be worryin’ about it.” Not wanting to upset Ellen further, Frank’s brain was exploding with ideas of what might have happened to his wife, who might want her dead and why, but he’d keep those things from Ellen.

Mary may have taken advantage of Margaret, but she might have done much worse. He wanted to take a ride up to Beauregard and visit the hospital. Mary made the accusation herself; the nurses left them alone so they could be together. She was there on the day Margaret died. It was too much for him. Margaret was dead, and it didn’t make much difference who or what took her life. The finality of her death hit him just then.

“Boy, I’m sorry about everythin’. Sorry you had to lose your mother; sorry you had to hear what Mary had to say. We should be gettin’ on with life, not moving backward.”

“I’m ready to move on,” Ellen said.

They walked back to the house. “Let’s have our picnic, okay? We got the day off, although it seems like some people want to ruin it for us. Let’s not let ‘em.”

“Okay, Frank.” But Ellen’s teenage mind was processing Mary’s words, trying not to visualize her mother in the arms of another woman.

WHILE MARGO WAITED for Boyd to contact her, she stayed busy preparing for the next workweek. She'd navigate between the office in Seymour and the clinic at Hallowsbrook where patient physicals and updating charts would keep her mind busy. It was the most favorite part of her job; taking care of patients with mental health issues was challenging but rewarding.

Margaret McPherson's death still haunted her. Margaret petitioned the hospital board to have her involuntary commitment reversed; all the paperwork filed was in her favor. But privately, Margo wasn't sure it was in the family's best interest for Margaret's release and documented the facts in her report. The week of Margaret's death, the judge ruled in Margaret's favor, after her next doctor visit the following week, she'd be released to go home. Margo saw her the morning she died.

"I'm going home!" Margaret had told Margo, her nurse and her friend, so excited, pacing in her room at Hallowsbrook, wringing her hands in anticipation.

Memories disturbed, Margo heard the telephone in the kitchen ringing and ran to answer.

"Hello?" she said, out of breath.

"I'm headed your way in a while," Boyd said.

"Is that right?" she answered, smiling. "Well come on over."

"I need to make one stop," he said. Margo knew what it was; he was going to say goodbye to Carol.

"Okay, well I'll see you later. Love you," she said before hanging up, but he was already gone.

Busily ironing the last few items, putting the board away before he arrived, she glanced at her reflection in the mirror. She was always ready for Boyd, just in case he could find time for her. Being involved with a married man forced her to rethink the way she lived, to make room for him in her life in ways she'd never thought she'd succumb. Spur of the moment requests, cancelations, outright standups were all part of the package. Putting up with it meant relinquishing that part of herself that hoped for a marriage and a family. Maybe now, if he was going to leave Carol, she'd have that chance for a real life with him. She'd been alone for so long with no eligible men in town except Frank. Frank, just thinking about him increased her heart rate. But he was hopeless. Even with his wife dead, he still wasn't free.

DAVE FOUND MARY COOK before she made it home. Just as her foot came out between two trees; she'd run through the woods from Frank's house, the officers were waiting to catch her. Boyd had called them after he left Frank's, admitting she'd punched him in the gut. They didn't think it was funny and he was grateful for it. Now he had to excuse himself from questioning her because charges would most likely be leveled against her for the assault.

"We're you been, Mary?" Dave asked.

"Don't you two have anything better to do?" She asked, exasperated seeing them waiting for her.

"We hear you've done the unthinkable. Assaulting an officer of the law is no laughing matter. It's an automatic sentence of thirty days for a physical assault."

"Poor Boyd, got soft in the middle," she whined.

"So you admit it?" Dave asked, getting out of the car. "Put your hands behind your back, Mary Cook. You have the right to remain silent..." he read her rights and while Henry opened the back door, putting hand cuffs on her. She complained the entire time.

“I usually wear these after someone’s paid for my dinner. I have a business to run, and the weekend is my busiest time. You’ll be responsible for loss of income.”

“Oh, is that right,” Dave said. “Story is, your last boarder was murdered after you threw him out of your house.”

“Who said I threw him out?” she asked, sarcastically.

“When’s the last time you were at Miss Logan’s? Anyway, get in the car will you please? I don’t want to use force.”

“Has that bitch been talking about me again? Honestly, she’s the biggest liar.” Mary tried to get in the car with her hands bound behind her back but fell backward into the car. Dave picked up her legs and helped her get in.

“Actually, story is Johnson himself told everyone over at Towering Pines what had happened.” That revelation shut her up, and they made the rest of the ride to the station in silence.

• • • •

AFTER BOYD FILLED OUT the necessary paperwork and the physician at the clinic examined him, a large red welt on his abdomen obvious where Mary had punched him, and after he called Margo, he went home to say goodbye to Carol. Pulling into the driveway of his modest house, he noticed the peeling paint, a gutter swinging in the breeze, duct tape holding a screen in place. His neglect of the exterior screamed divorced mother. But they were still married. Guilt flooded his thoughts. He made a mental note to call a handyman and someone to cut the grass. But the inside of the house was neat and tidy, thanks to Carol. She liked order, and the house reflected it. He smelled basil and tomato, beef and garlic. She was fixing his favorite; Italian food. She always tried to please him, cooking the food he liked, trying to make the house an oasis for him.

Their boys ran to him and hugged his legs, screaming, “Daddy, you’re home!”

He put his hat down and pulled them both up to his chest by their arms, hugging them, kissing their necks. He thought of Frank, taking care of Ellen, loving her, devoted. Frank would kill himself before he abandoned Ellen. These boys were depending on him to set an example, and he was preparing to leave their mother, and ostensibly, the children as well.

“Let’s go see mommy, okay?”

They were still as could be, resting their heads on his shoulders. He walked through the dining room, noticing the table set for dinner as usual, the piles of neatly folded laundry on the buffet, waiting for her to take up stairs to the bedrooms. She was lifting a pot of boiling water with spaghetti, taking it to the sink to pour into the colander when she slipped, gasping and dropped it, splashing boiling water down the front of her legs and onto her feet.

“Mommy!” the boys screamed. Boyd put them down in the dining room, saying firmly to stay put and ran to her, picking her up and running to the bathroom with her cradled in his arms.

“You’re home,” she said, tears running down her cheeks, in shock and in pain as the burn was just beginning to take hold. He put her in the shower and turned cold water on her.

“Stay here, I’m calling for an ambulance.” He ran back out to the hallway and called dispatch, telling them what happened. The operator said a unit was on the way.

Carol was sitting on the floor of the shower when he got back, leaning against the tiles, letting the freezing water run over her body. “Where are the girls?” he asked, their two daughters, old enough to watch the boys.

“Next door,” she said, her eyes closed. Boyd went back out to the dining room, his sons frozen with fear.

“Mommy will be okay,” he told them. “Go next door and get Marisa and Gayle and tell them to come home right away. Tell Mrs. Anderson mommy is going in the ambulance.”

The boys left the house together, and he watched them running to the neighbor’s house. He went back to the bathroom to wait with Carol, wrapping her upper body in a towel, letting the water splash on him so that he was soon wet, too.

“I feel like a dope,” she said, softly. “Thank you for coming home.”

“Of course, I’m home,” he replied, kissing the top of her head.

“I don’t know why, but I had the strongest feeling you weren’t coming home tonight, like you were going to leave me.”

“I’m not leaving, Carol,” he said.

“I love you, Boyd,” she said, looking up at him, water running down her face. The siren in the distance got louder. The screams of the girls entering the house blended with the siren, each holding onto a brother, echoing into the bathroom, their neighbor running along with them, frightened for what she might find.

“I love you, too,” Boyd said, meaning it. “I love you, too.”

Delicious grilled chicken with barbeque sauce, potato salad, coleslaw, biscuits, corn on the cob, tomato salad, watermelon, and strawberry sundaes rounded out the picnic meal Ellen and Frank treated themselves.

“Oh, I am about ready to burst,” she said, leaning back as far as she could without falling off the picnic table. “That was really good.”

“I’m full, but I’m not getting up just yet, just in case I burp and make a little room for some more of that potato salad. Sister, you outdid yourself.” Ellen burst into laughter.

“Frank, you made that dish. All I did was peel potatoes and cut up celery.” Then she burped with her mouth closed, very lady-like.

“Excuse me! I believe I can eat a little more now,” she said, still laughing. She stretched her legs over the bench to get up. “You want a cup of coffee?”

“Okay, sounds good,” he said. He watched her walk around to the back of the house, could hear the sound of running water through the kitchen window. Completely satisfied, he shook his head. Here, he had so much at stake; if the law pressed charges against him, he could go to jail, and worse, he could lose Ellen. Monday was coming and he was expecting to learn something. He wondered what was happening with Mary, if they’d found her.

Ellen brought two cups of coffee out to the picnic table. “We need to practice a little bit before tonight,” she said.

“Thank you for reminding me. Between sheriff visits, interrogation and Mary, I forgot all about it.” He stood up and put his arms out, humming a tune. Slowly at first, they two-stepped away from the picnic table to a large, flat space in the yard, waltzing and the lindy hop, fox trot and samba. After ten minutes, they were both sweating and laughing out loud.

“The moral to this story is not to eat like a pig before dancing,” Frank said releasing her.

“We better clean up this mess and get ready to go. I’m getting nervous!” Ellen started stacking plates and covering dishes with foil, carrying what she could into the kitchen with Frank following.

“It will be good,” Frank replied. “You’ll do fine and make me look like I know what I’m doin’.”

MARY WAS SITTING IN the same chair Frank had sat in that morning, but instead of calmly tapping a foot, she was squirming in the chair, alternately crying and laughing, miserable. Dave and Faye watched her through the window as seasoned investigator Henry Cort entered the room to speak with her.

“Do you know why you were brought in to the station?” Henry asked.

“I have no idea, but harassment has somethin’ to do with it. I was minding my own business when you picked me up for no reason.”

“What were you doing last Monday night?” Mary screwed up her face and put her finger on her forehead, mockingly.

“You expect me to remember last Monday?” she asked sarcastically. “I can’t remember what happened yesterday.”

“Didn’t you just tell Frank McPherson you were out at his place? Spying on him and his kid through the living room window?” Henry picked up a piece of paper and began to read it out loud. “‘I was walking by the river when I saw you two.’”

“I never said such a thing. Those two are insane. It runs in the family.”

“What do you know about the family’s mental health?”

“Why Frank’s wife is, was insane. Committed for life up at Hallowsbrook.”

“Why do you say was?” Henry asked. “Did she have a healing?” Dave nudged Faye.

“Now it’s getting interesting.”

“Ha! No, she didn’t have any healing. She killed herself. I was there to visit her and she did it herself. She was acting all goofy and out of it. Kept falling asleep. It was horrible.”

“No one knew that,” Faye said, excited. “It wasn’t made public at the request of the family.” Everyone knew what the death certificate said because someone leaked it and the gossipmongers spread it around town like wildfire. Faye pressed a buzzer to get the investigator attention. He excused himself, leaving Mary alone in the room. She immediately began to primp in front of the mirror, and then examined it carefully to see if she could see through to the other side.

Henry entered the room. “What’s up?”

“Stop the interview. You just got her to admit to the coroners report. No one knew she might have done it herself.”

“Faye, everyone in town knew it.”

“Shut up, Henry. You’re talking gossip. We just needed someone to slip up in front of an officer of the law. Call Frank and tell him we have cause to question Margaret McPherson’s cause of death.”

There was a knock on the door and Rosalie the dispatcher opened the door. “Thought you guys should know, Boyd’s wife Carol was just admitted over at Beauregard Medical with second-degree burns on her legs and feet.” Faye and Dave exchanged looks.

“Thanks, Rosalie,” Dave said. “Let us know if you hear anything more.” She nodded her head and closed the door.

“Tell Miss Cook to go home, but she should stay in town.”

“She never goes anywhere,” Dave said, snickering.

“Just tell her,” Faye snapped and left the room. Dave knocked on the interrogation room door.

“Mary, you’re free to go.” She looked up at him, squinting. He thought she was very attractive for a woman approaching middle-age, but she was a nut job.

“How am I supposed to get home? This place isn’t exactly in the middle of town.” He shrugged his shoulders and waved her over.

“Come on then. I’ll give you a lift.” It was a scary proposition being alone with her in a car. No one trusted Mary, for their safety or for the stories she might carry. She followed him out of the station, pausing as he stuck his head in the dispatch room.

“Rosalie, I’m going to drive Miss Cook home.” Making sure everyone knew where he was and whom he was with was more for his own peace of mind, but Rosalie looked at him with concern.

“Okay,” she answered. “I just saw Fred’s cab drive by. You want I should call him over?” Dave smiled and laughed, shaking his head.

“See you in fifteen. Call out the troops if I’m not back by then.”

When they got outside, Mary finally spoke. “Jesus, you act like I gonna ravish you. You’re not that cute, Dave.”

“Ha!” He laughed out loud. “That’s the problem with a small town, Mary. Everyone knows who the troublemakers are.”

“I’m highly insulted,” she answered.

“Yes, well be that it may. I’m to tell you not to leave town this week.”

“Where the hell am I going to go? Oh wait, tonight is June Extravaganza at Phillip Anderson. I can’t miss it.”

“Beaugard doesn’t count,” he answered. “You dancin’ in the contest?”

“No, just watchin’. But I’ll be dancing the rest of the time. You going?” she asked.

“Wife doesn’t dance,” Dave answered. “She’s about ready to hatch.”

Mary didn’t reply, resentful that yet another local woman was going to have a baby and she was still alone and barren. The car pulled up to her house just as a stranger, a woman was walking down her steps.

“A boarder! Let me out of this damn car.” She opened the door before he was fully stopped but he slammed on the brakes as she jumped out. The woman stopped on the sidewalk, shocked to see the police car.

“Thanks so much for the lift, honey!” Mary said, waving at Dave as she climbed up to the sidewalk, smiling at the woman. “Just my boyfriend. Help you?”

“Is this your place?” She pointed over her shoulder at Mary’s house.

“Yep, it’s all mine,” Mary said walking up to the porch.

“I was told you rent rooms,” the woman said, taking in Mary’s disheveled appearance.

“Who told you? Frank?”

“No, some man at the grocery store. Bearded fellow.” Mary frowned; those characters at the check-out really were a nuisance most of the time. Turning the key in the lock, she pushed the door open and the familiar smell of her house wafted out along with the cold air.

“Just passing through?”

“Yep, just for the night. Took a wrong turn down in Mobile I guess.”

“Come on in,” Mary said, stepping aside so the stranger could enter. “No one here at the moment so you’re in luck.” She turned to close the door, looking on the street for her car.

“Leave your car uptown?” Mary asked. The woman didn’t answer so Mary turned to look at her and repeated the question. “Leave your car uptown?”

“Ah, yes. Uptown,” the woman answered.

• • • •

THE REST OF THE WEEKEND was uneventful. Frank and Ellen had fun dancing in Beauregard Saturday night, helping them forget what was happening back in Seymour. Sunday morning, trying to brighten Ellen's day, he drove into town and got take out fresh pastry and french toast for breakfast, the café's specialty. Although they tried their best to recover from the week, worries about the possible charges pending made them both ill, waking up Monday morning with a feeling of dread. Trying to sweep it aside by sticking to his routine, he got into the shower and ended up cutting himself shaving, his hands were shaking so badly. They were supposed to learn something about the allegations against him that day. Hopefully, the investigation would be dropped, but if not, he couldn't imagine what he would do about Ellen. Margo came to mind; Ellen liked her and she was kind and trustworthy, so as soon as he was dressed, making sure Ellen was still asleep, he went into the kitchen and dialed Margo's number.

• • • •

LATE SATURDAY NIGHT, Boyd left the hospital. He was tempted to stop by Margo's, but forced himself to head straight home. Once he was sure his children were okay, he went back to the bedroom and called Margo.

"I was worried about you," she said, angry. "When you left this morning you said you'd call me, that I'd see you. I expected you to be here for dinner."

"Please forgive me Margo," he answered, grasping for the right words.

"Are you home now? What happened, Boyd?" He told her about Carol's accident, and although she felt sorry for the woman, she was livid that a clumsy mishap was enough to drive Boyd back to her and leave Margo in the dust. Incredulous, Margo needed to hear him say the words. They were through. "So are you saying you're not leaving her now?"

"Please forgive me, Margo. I know it sounds like a lame excuse, but I can't do it to my kids." It was more than that, he couldn't do it to Carol, either. But he was trying to avoid a blowup and using finesse was the only way to do it.

"Fuck you, Boyd. Don't ever call me again." She slammed the phone down and burst into tears. Immediately regretful, she tried to call him again but he didn't answer. It would be a sleepless night.

Sunday was hell; she knew he was at the hospital with his wife but had no way to contact him and he probably wouldn't have taken her calls anyway. She debated going to the hospital to confront him, but aware it would be unprofessional, maybe enough for her to lose her job, she dropped it. Between bouts of uncontrollable sobbing, in which she'd listen to melancholy love songs, and forcing herself to do something productive, she got through the day. Longing to hear his voice after two days of silence, she stayed busy wishing Monday morning would hurry up and arrive so she could go to work.

Standing in the kitchen, she drank morning coffee while holding an ice bag to her swollen eyes, looking out over the lawn. The heat of summer would soon do a number on her garden and this year, she wouldn't fight it, let nature take its course. The ringing phone snapped her out of her stupor.

"It's Frank, Margo. I hope I didn't wake you."

"Oh, no, Frank. I'm awake. Just waiting to start my day as usual. Everything okay?"

"I don't know yet," he admitted. "I should hear something about the prosecutor making a case against me."

“Oh, right,” Margo said, empathy for him driving some of her own angst away. “I don’t think it will come to that, Frank.”

“I need to be prepared, just in case,” he replied. “You’re about the only person in town Ellen and I trust. You are the only person. I know this is a lot to ask. If I’m put in jail, or if they take her away from me, can she stay with you? I’m sick thinkin’ they might place her in one of those awful foster homes you read about in the paper.”

Margo’s heart rate sped up. Frank just paid her a compliment she didn’t deserve. It was her call to Boyd that started the whole mess against him, giving the words of gossips life, fueling their hatred.

“I don’t deserve this,” she said, fighting tears, self-pity and condemnation flooding over her. “Frank, I would be honored to take care of Ellen if it comes to that. But you don’t know what you’re saying. I’m not that great.”

“Look, all I care about is my kid is taken care of by someone I trust and admire and that’s you. There ain’t no one else, Margo. No one.”

Margo sat at on a stool at her kitchen counter and started to weep. Thinking of her empty life, in which getting involved with a married man was the most exciting thing she could conjure up, persuading him to leave his wife and kids, Margo really didn’t deserved the trust Frank was placing in her. It was an answer to prayer. He was waiting for her reply.

“Okay, Frank, don’t worry about Ellen. She has a room here with me if need be. But I don’t think that it’s going to be a problem, okay? Let’s not be premature.”

“Thank you, Margo. Thank you,” he said, choked up. “I have to wake her up now. But I’ll be in touch later.” They said goodbye and hung up.

The sound of Frank’s voice, the praise he gave her and trust he put into her, although undeserved, triggered a complete one hundred-eighty degree change in Margo’s mood so that what Boyd had done in betraying her no longer mattered, as a matter of fact, his timing was perfect. She stopped thinking about him all together. What she’d wanted was a chance to get Frank’s attention and it looked like she’d succeeded. Everything was falling into place. Looking in the hallway mirror on her way out, Margo was pleasantly surprised how pretty she looked. “Have a nice day!”

• • • •

FAYE BAKER WAS AT HER desk early Monday, her boss and two detectives sitting across from her, deliberating. “So it’s agreed, we have no case against Frank McPherson.” The others nodded their heads.

“Agreed,” they echoed.

“Good. Now we can concentrate on Alan Johnson.” They closed one file and opened another, thicker file. “We have two knives, one a steak knife from the café and the other a carving knife from the same manufacturer, both covered with Mary Cooks fingerprints.”

“The only problem is that she works at the café,” Dave Madden said. “Boyd was able to smuggle his steak knife out without a problem after she gave it to him with his lunch. How do we know the same thing wasn’t accomplished with the carving knife?”

“We don’t,” Faye replied. “Does the café do a knife inventory?”

“They do, and that knife is missing. We have her neighbor’s testimony that after Johnson left Mary’s place she had a temper tantrum and smashed the mug he used on her driveway.”

“Sounds lame to me,” Henry said. Faye hit her palm on the desk.

“Bring her back here,” she told him. “She’s at work by now at the café. Please bring me back a blueberry Danish.”

“I’ll go,” Dave said.

“Go with him,” Faye said, pointing at Henry. “She’s trouble and God knows we don’t want any more belly punches.” The detectives left the office, laughing but feeling badly for Boyd.

Faye sat across from her boss. “What’s next?” he asked, looking at his watch.

“I want to reopen Margaret McPherson’s death investigation.”

He pushed his chair away from her desk. “Knock yourself out,” he said, saluting her and left the room.

Opening the file in front of her, she reread the nurse’s testimony from Hallowsbrook, listing the onset of symptoms and the speed at which Margaret succumbed. Pulling her phone close, she dialed the number of a nurse friend of hers who might be able to unlock the mystery behind the gibberish that was the autopsy lab reports and spot something someone, including the coroner missed. It was a long shot.

• • • •

JUDY CHECKED HER WATCH, tapping on the crystal. Looking up at the wall clock, she could see that the time was correct, just as it had been when she checked it ten minutes ago. Mary was never late. She might get to work just in time, but she always arrived so Judy could leave. Today, she was forty minutes late and not answering her phone. Judy couldn’t leave the café to go check; Mary could have overslept in a drunken stupor, or fallen and hit her head.

Turning her back to make fresh coffee, the bell on the door rang. She looked up just as Dave and Henry walked in. “Sit anywhere you want,” Judy said.

“Isn’t it time for Mary to be here?” Dave asked.

“She’s late,” Judy said. “I’m getting worried because she’s never late.”

“How ‘bout we take a run down the street and check it out for you?” Henry asked.

“Oh, thank you so much,” Judy said, gratefully. The men left, returning to their squad car, just as they saw Boyd pull up to the garage.

Faye called Boyd, asking him if he’d do the honors. “Go tell your buddy to dry his tears,” she said. “No charges will be brought against him. But warn him to get something in writing as far as custody for his kid goes. He needs to do it pronto.” She wished she could arrest the old biddies in town who spread the lies, not realizing they were younger than she was.

Ellen was sitting at the counter checking their appointments for the day when Boyd came through the door. She frowned, but was polite. “Frank’s in the garage.”

“Thanks,” he said, opening the door and stepping down into the bay. Frank looked up at Boyd and the color drained from his face.

“Its okay, Frank,” he said holding his hands up. “They aren’t pressing charges.” Frank slumped against the car, his hand holding a wrench going to his forehead.

“Thank God,” he said, shaking. “I need to tell Ellen.” He put the tool down and went to the door.

“Make sure you get legal custody of her, Frank. The prosecutor asked me to remind you.”

“Okay, I’ll start that ball rolling today.” He opened the door to the office. “Ellen! It’s okay. Everything is okay,” he said and she hopped down off her stool running to him for a hug. Boyd waited until they parted so he could get through the doorway.

“I need to call Margo and let her know,” Frank said. Boyd stopped short, the mention of Margo’s name making his heart speed up.

“Why’s that?” Boyd asked.

“She offered to take care of Ellen if this thing took hold and I lost custody of her. I need to tell her she won’t have to now, but maybe in the future, if I die before she’s of age, Margo can step in.”

Boyd looked at Frank through different eyes, as a competitor who would be good for Margo, better than he could ever be because Frank was single. The thought bothered him, and on the cusp of a jealous outburst, he channeled it into a positive comment on behalf of Margo.

“Margo would be a wonderful parent, Frank. I think you’re making a smart move. You should consider it while you’re still alive.”

“My wife just died, Boyd. It’s too early to think about seein’ anyone else.”

“That was thoughtless of me, Frank. My apologies,” Boyd said, embarrassed.

“No apologies necessary. It’s an idea, but just not right now.”

Boyd nodded his head and left the garage before he said anything else, happy for Ellen, Frank and Margo, and sad for himself.

As Frank dialed Margo’s office, Ellen sat and watched smiling. “Margo, it’s Frank again,” he said, cheerful. “None of the charges will be filed against me after all.”

“Oh, I’m so thrilled! That’s just wonderful, Frank.”

“Yes, we’re pretty happy here,” he said. “Thank you for agreein’ to help us out. It gave me the first peace I’ve had since this mess started.”

“My pleasure,” she said. They chatted a while longer before hanging up.

“I really like Margo,” Ellen said, thoughtful. “Let’s invite her to Phillip Anderson’s Saturday.” Frank frowned, not sure what she was getting at.

“You want me to ask her for a date? It seems a little early for that.”

“Sort of,” Ellen said. “But we won’t call it a date. Just an evening out with two friends. It seems sort of cruel to ask her to be my guardian in one breath and then ignore her when she’s not needed.” Frank nodded his head.

“I gotcha,” he said. “That’s true. I might ask her if she would consider makin’ that legal in case I die.”

“Please don’t mention that,” Ellen said, shuddering.

“Okay, I’ll call her back while I have the nerve.” He dialed the office number again and she came on the line in a minute.

“It’s me again, Margo. Frank McPherson.”

“I recognize your voice,” she said, smiling at the phone. “Is everything still okay?”

“It’s fine, just fine,” he replied, winking at Ellen. “Me and Ellen here, we wonder if you’d accept our invitation to go dancin’ at Phillip Anderson.” Margo was speechless for a moment. Of course, she’d love to go out with Frank. But his wife was only dead four months and she and Boyd had just broken up. It would be cause for more gossip. Not sure that she cared, she reminded herself it was also the answer to her prayers.

“Wow, what a nice surprise,” she answered, trying to stall while she thought about it.

“I’ll be honest with you,” he said softly. “We decided that we were goin’ to ask you to be Ellen’s guardian if anythin’ happens to me. And if we would ask that of you, we should spend time with you.”

“Time ballroom dancing?” she said, smiling. “How can I say no to that offer? I don’t dance very well though.”

“We’ll practice. How about you come out to the cottage tonight and we have a practice session before the actual occasion.” Ellen was giggling.

“Okay, it’s a deal,” Margo said, laughing.

“Come for dinner,” Frank offered, excited. His happiness was palpable.

“Thank you, I will.” They discussed the time before saying goodbye.

“You asked her to dinner,” Ellen said, looking off into space. “What should we have?”

“Your spaghetti and meatballs are the best,” he answered. “What do you think?”

“I hope she likes garlic!” Ellen said laughing. “Dancing with garlic on your breath...not a good idea.”

“Oh, right. See, that’s why I need you around. How about fried chicken?”

“I guess, but it seems like a lot of work,” she said frowning. “I’ve got it. Hamburgers. Everyone loves ‘em and they are easy to fix.”

“Good idea! We better stop by Family-Owned and pick up a few items. I guess I’ll get back to work, sister,” Frank said, standing in the doorway.

He wanted to say more to her, but couldn’t find the words. It was a new start for them. She put her book down and looked at him lovingly.

“I don’t feel afraid anymore,” she said. “Now the threat of you being stuck in jail is gone, I feel safe again.”

“I’m sorry about it all,” he replied. “Sorry you were exposed to all that ugliness. All over our dancin’ together.”

“I just thought of somethin’ Frank.”

“What’s that?”

“Mary. She wasn’t at Phillip Anderson’s Saturday night to watch the contest.”

“That was an answer to my prayer,” he replied, shaking his head in disgust as he went back into the garage.

• • • •

HENRY PULLED THE PATROL car into Mary Cook’s driveway. It looked unoccupied, with two days worth of newspapers scattered on the porch, her mailbox jammed with ads and coupons. Dave tapped on the door and a dog down the block started barking.

“Big fight over there the other night,” next-door neighbor Peter called over the fence. Dave hopped down off the porch and met him.

“Is that right?” he asked. “What kind of fight?”

“About the usual for Mary. A lot of screaming and yelling and glass breaking. I was getting used to it and then not a peep all day yesterday.”

“Did you call the police?” Henry asked.

“Why in God’s name would I call the police?” Peter asked. “I’d be calling over there every night if that was the case. Take your pick. That house was last night,” he pointed across the street. “Mary here Saturday night and a few days before when that dead guy was here pissin’ her off. We got a regular cast of characters fightin’ in this neighborhood.”

“Stick around, Pete. You can tell us more in a minute,” Henry said.

“I’ll call for back up,” Dave said, reaching into the car and pulling the radio out. While waiting for Boyd to show, they walked the perimeter of the house, but nothing seemed out of place. Dave pulled a bucket over, turning it upside down and stood on it to peek in the windows but the curtains were tightly closed.

“Here he comes,” Henry called when Boyd pulled up.

“What’s going on?” Boyd asked. They told him what Peter had said, and that there was no answer, and she was over an hour late for work now.

Boyd lifted the mat and found her key, conveniently located for thieves, and opened the door. The smell was still faint, but evident. Boyd's heart sank. They entered in a line with him leading. Frightened, Boyd wanted to be the first to find her.

"Look," he said, pointing to the floor just beyond the vestibule. "Blood." Dave returned to the car to call for a forensic team. The trail of blood wound through the hallway into the tiny kitchen. A chair was on its side and the dish strainer on the floor with smashed dishes and glassware confirmed Pete's comment.

"There she is," Boyd called. The men were careful not to step in her blood. Laying face down on the kitchen floor was Mary Cook.

Henry bent over her, feeling her neck for a pulse. "She's dead."

"Who'd kill Mary?" Boyd said, flabbergasted.

"She's wearing the same thing she had on Saturday," Dave said when he returned. "I remember because when Henry hand cuffed her, she fell back on the seat and I had to lift her legs up into the car. I remember those pink pants and those sneakers. I bet if you turn her over, her shirt has Mickey Mouse on it."

"It does. I mean her shirt had the mouse on it. When she punched me in the gut over at Frank's I remember thinking why a grown woman would wear a mouse t-shirt."

"I dropped her off here after questioning her over at the station Saturday. There was a woman just leaving the house. Mary said she was a boarder."

"Do you remember what she looked like?" Henry asked.

"I'll have to think about that one," he said. "I hope I can remember something. I know she had hospital scrubs on. Peter might have seen her." He left the house, calling neighbor Pete over.

"Bad news," Dave said. Peter put his hand up to his face, stunned.

"She dead?"

"I'm sorry to say. You want to talk to me about Saturday afternoon? Did you see anyone new around?"

"I was fixin' my meal and looking out that wind'er," he pointed to a window overlooking the front of Mary's house. "I saw a woman walkin' from town, come up the stairs to the porch, knock and then leave after a bit. Then you or someone in a cop car dropped Mary off and the woman turned back and followed her into the house."

"Did you recognize the woman?"

"Nope. She was a stranger. No one in Seymour has purple hair. Miss Logan wouldn't stand fer it."

"What'd she look like?" Dave asked. Pete looked up at the house, thoughtful.

"Unattractive," Pete said. "Course I'm lookin' through a wind'er to see her, but she was tall and big. Mean lookin' with a rope of purple hair down her back like a horse."

"Did you see her leave?"

"Nope. I was lookin' for her, too. After the ruckus and all."

"When'd the fight start?"

"Bout half hour after she got there. It was a bad one. We's used to Miss Mary and her fights round here, but this was bad even for her. Is that when she got kilt?"

"Did you hear any names spoken, or anything stand out?" Dave said, ignoring his question.

"Nope, just a bunch of screamin' and breaking glass. It seemed like it lasted a long time, but thinkin' it was probably just a minute." Dave thanked him.

"I'll be around later to talk more. You open to that?"

“Yes sir. Wow,” he said, shaking his head. “I’m gonna miss Mary. She made it lively around this place.”

In minutes, sirens blasted as the rest of the crew came to Mary Cook’s house for the last time, a van with Clarke County Morgue stenciled on the side pulling into the driveway.

NEWS WOULD TRAVEL FAST through Seymour to Beauregard, thanks to Miss Sally Logan. She was standing in front of her mirrored booth in Miss Logan's Beauty Salon when the emergency vehicles rushed down First Street.

"What's that all about?" she hollered.

"Got no idea," the receptionist said. "You want me to run down and find out?" But Miss Logan was already out the front door, jogging around the corner. She saw the police car in Mary's driveway and the emergency vehicles and Boyd's car lined up.

Putting her hand to her mouth, Miss Logan let out a genuine sob. Mary Cook was a pain in the ass, but she was an old friend. Someone she'd watched grow up in Seymour, who she'd try to assist when the girl's mother was at her worst. Picking up her pace to a sprint, she got to Mary's just as the forensic team arrived. "Oh no," she said out loud. "What happened?" Boyd came down the stairs, wiping his hand on a paper towel. He went to Miss Logan, putting his hands on her shoulders. She could feel the damp; he must have just washed them. She knew what he was going to say and burst into tears.

"I don't want to hear it," she wailed. "It can't be happening."

"I'm so sorry, Sally. Let me take you back to the salon. Or home. I can take you to Towering Pines. There's nothing to be done here."

"Can I see her?" she sobbed.

"No, best not. She's been lying on her face for two days. You'll see her at the viewing, if there's one."

"Oh, there'll be one," she replied, sniffing. "I'll pay for it myself." Boyd waited while Miss Logan composed herself.

"Do you know who could have hurt Mary?"

"No, not a clue," she said blowing her nose. "Poor Mary. I still can't believe it."

"Dave said someone was staying at the house Saturday night," Boyd confided, taking a risk. "This is privileged information, Sally." He hoped she'd blab it all over town. Someone knowing about the boarder might come forward.

"I talked to her when she got home Saturday evening and she said she couldn't stay on the line; she'd just walked in the door and someone new had arrived, but that's all she said. A she. 'Let me get my guest settled and I'll call you back.' I got busy readying to go out. Frank and Ellen danced at Phillip Anderson Saturday night and I thought for sure Mary would be there unless she didn't want to leave her tenant. I called her in the morning but there was no answer. I just figured she had a date or was out with whoever it was she had stayin' here."

Boyd patted her on the shoulder. "Come on, Sally. Let's go." He put his arm around her and they walked to the patrol car together.

"What an awful thing," Miss Logan said, crying again. "Just awful."

FAYE BAKER WAS SEETHING. "Okay, I've had about enough of this small town shit. If I wanted murders every night I'd have stayed in Philadelphia."

“Calm down, Baker,” DA Thomas Walker replied. “Two murders in twenty years. Three if you count McPherson.”

“Oh, she was murdered alright. She had no glucose in her blood and a shit load of insulin. A little tidbit overlooked by our coroner who said she died of natural causes. Ha! Where the hell would she get insulin?”

“So what now?” Walker asked.

“We find out who has diabetes,” Faye said. “It’s as good a place as any to start.”

She looked down at the file again as Henry Cort ran into her office. “Jesus, take it easy,” Thomas Walker said, moving out of the way.

“You aren’t going to believe this,” Henry said. “I can’t believe it.”

“Spit it out, Cort. I got high blood pressure.”

“Fingerprints in Alan Johnson’s room match prints found at the scene at Mary Cook’s.”

• • • •

BOYD DALTON PULLED up into the driveway of Towering Pines with Miss Logan in the front seat. It was the first time he’d been in her presence without her talking his ears off. “You want me to go up with you?” he asked gently. “I could use a cup of coffee.”

“What about Carol?” Miss Logan asked shaking her head. “You should probably get over to the hospital and see her.”

“I told her we were together and she said to give you her love.”

Miss Logan bowed her head and started to cry again. Guilt from gossiping about Boyd and Margo filled her, regrets for her behavior overwhelming her in the sadness of losing Mary.

“I’ll be okay, Boyd. Give her a kiss for me. I think I want to be alone for little bit.” He nodded his head and got out of the car.

“Let me at least walk you up.”

Cate was in the window, wondering what in God’s name the sheriff was bringing Sally Logan home for and met them at the door.

He tipped his hat to Cate. “Miss Ashby. Take care of Miss Logan.”

Saying goodbye, he skipped down the steps, giving Sally Logan a wide berth so she could start telling her story. Pulling out of the driveway, he got to thinking about Margo, hoping she was okay as he drove to the hospital to see his wife. The best thing he could do was to leave Margo alone, give her a chance to get back on her feet.

• • • •

AT FIVE, FINISHED WITH his work, Frank came into the office to get his daughter. “Time to call it a day, sister. Family-Owned, here I come.”

“Can I go to the store with you? I want to see what inspires me for dessert,” she said smiling. “I want somethin’ extra special for Margo tonight.”

“You like her, don’t you?” Frank asked, wanting confirmation that it was in fact all right with her if he started to see Margo.

“I like her fine,” Ellen said.

After Mary, Margo was a breath of fresh air, someone who could be trusted with her secrets, who wouldn’t desecrate the name of her mother like Mary Cook had.

Frank gave her a one armed hug as they crossed the street together, unaware of the stares of the motley group of characters who waited to carry groceries. “Those men give me the hebbly jebbies,” Ellen said. “They seem dangerous, waitin’ there to ponce.”

“They’re harmless,” Frank said. “The sheriff watches ‘em like a hawk.”

They entered the store, patrons and employees smiling and waving at the handsome father and daughter who’d danced so beautifully the weekend before. Some even clapped, embarrassing Ellen.

“This was a mistake,” she mumbled.

“Let’s run through and get our burger and buns,” Frank said smiling and waving back, all in the name of promotion for the garage. Ellen chose a gooseberry pie with a double crust and vanilla ice cream for dessert.

“I don’t know if I can wait to eat this!” Ellen said. “I love pie.”

“I’ll teach you how to bake one,” Frank said, laughing at the notion; Frank’s pies were misshapen but delicious.

“Sounds perfect. Makin’ my own pie could be dangerous though. I hope Margo likes pie.” The excitement in the truck was palpable as they drove to the cottage, and although they didn’t say it out loud, expectations growing that Margo Portland might someday be a part of their family and that Ellen would bake her pie. It wasn’t until they pulled into the driveway that Ellen remembered Margo couldn’t eat sugar.

“What’s wrong with someone who can’t eat sugar?” Ellen asked. Frank frowned, thinking.

“Not sure what you mean,” he answered.

“When I was at Margo’s on Saturday she told me she couldn’t eat candy because it’s made of sugar and she can’t have it.”

“She must be a diabetic,” Frank said. “How awful for her.”

“I’ll think of somethin’ else to make for her,” Ellen said. “But you’re right. Not being able to have pie would be awful.”

• • • •

AFTER BOYD VISITED Carol at the hospital, making sure she was on the mend, her burns healing and in good spirits, he stopped off at the station to see if the team uncovered anything in the search of Mary Cook’s house.

“Same prints in both our victim’s rooms. Whoever killed Alan Johnson turned the air conditioning unit on. Cate Ashby said she never touched it because he’d moved out and returned unexpectedly. The same two fingers that unscrewed the light bulb next to Alan’s bed also turned the air on, and drank water from a coffee cup at Mary’s.”

“Oh man that is big,” Boyd replied. “You have DNA from the cup, too.” DNA use in crime detection was its early stages, but they would utilize it fully for this.

“Peter reminded me that the woman who met Mary on the sidewalk had an odd color hair. Sort of purple, so it could have been a wig. And she was wearing hospital scrubs. Navy blue. Evidently, navy blue scrubs aren’t standard uniforms at the hospitals in the area.”

“Everything has a way of coming to the surface in time.” Boyd said, distracted. “What file is this?” He pointed to a file left on his desk.

“Margaret McPherson,” Dave replied, sorting through paperwork on his desk. “Faye got the go-ahead to reopen her case. She had one of her nurse friends go over the lab work from the autopsy and McPherson’s glucose was undetectable, while she had a lot of insulin in her blood. The coroner said she could have injected herself with it, but the nursing staff said it would have been impossible for her to acquire the syringe. Evidently, all their syringes are kept under lock and key. What’s your take on it?” When Boyd didn’t answer, Dave looked up. Boyd was gone.

SITTING IN HIS PATROL car, waves of nausea hit Boyd. He opened the door and threw up until there was nothing left in his stomach. Starting the car, he slowly drove out of the parking lot, wondering what steps he should take. He could just leave it alone and let the wheels of justice do their job. But he didn't know if he had the patience to allow it. More about confrontation, he was an action kind of man, someone who liked to get things done quickly.

Hoping he wasn't making a mistake, he drove over to Margo's house, praying no one would see him. The idea that the two biggest gossips in town were gone; Miss Logan home in Beauregard and Mary dead, gave him peace. If anyone saw his car there, they wouldn't care. He parked in the alley and went through her backyard.

She wasn't home. He knew where the key was, but didn't want to do anything without a search warrant. "You dumb ass," he said out loud. "Why didn't you do that in the first place? Go back to the station." He went to his car and called the station on his radio.

"Is Faye Baker still there?" he asked.

"She is," dispatch said. "She's breathin' down my neck."

"What is it Boyd?" Faye asked.

"I don't want to say over the radio," he answered. "Can you stick around? I'll be right there."

"Hurry up," she said. He put his flashers on as he sped through town, getting back to the station in less than five minutes. A memory from a year ago, like a thrown shoe hitting him in the head pounded in his brain.

He was waiting in bed while Margo got out of the shower. Modest, she put a robe on before coming out, but it was silky and flesh colored, hugging her body, as enticing as if she were nude. Then as if she were purposely trying to ruin the mood, he watched her draw up insulin in the tiny syringe, then open her robe and pinch flesh on her belly, throwing the needle like a dart.

"A sure fire way to murder someone is to use insulin," Margo said.

He sat up, resting on his elbows.

"Who wants to commit murder?"

"Oh, no, no, no. No one," she giggled. "I'm just saying that it's a way to do it. The insulin works quickly and is difficult to detect."

"Well, you've got it if we need it, is that what you're drivin' at?" She got back into bed, laughing.

"I do indeed."

At the time, he wondered if she was hinting he kill his wife. But the idea sweet Margo would think of such a thing was so outlandish, he buried it.

Was Margo waiting for Frank to be free? As Margaret's nurse practitioner, Margo saw Margaret getting better, ready for discharge. It was all conjecture. She acted right away, before Margaret returned home, tired of waiting for Boyd to leave Carol. Frank would be single if the plan worked. Since she had access to her, she'd kill Margaret and get away with it. Almost. New technology could detect insulin, even in a corpse.

FAYE WAS WAITING FOR him, pacing. "I hope you have something."

"I need a search warrant. Fast."

“For what?” He told her, watching her expression turn stony.

“I need to get the judge before he leaves,” she said, running out of the room.

• • • •

“I HOPE THIS IS ISN’T a wild goose chase,” Faye said.

She and Boyd were standing with the doctor who owned the office where Margo Portland was a nurse practitioner.

“We don’t have the need to empty our sharps containers that often. So if insulin was injected and the syringe disposed of in March, it’s still here. There are two containers; one in the lab and one in the clinic. Margo would use the one in the clinic, unless she was trying to hide something. We don’t administer insulin in the clinic, ever. It won’t be difficult to find the syringe if it’s here.” Boyd didn’t think Margo was a sophisticated enough murderer to think that deeply. If she injected herself, it would have her DNA, not Margaret’s.

“Unless she got rid of it at Hallowsbrook,” Faye said, whispering.

“I doubt that,” Boyd said. “They’ve got security cameras all over that place.” Turning to the doctor, he had one more request. “I’ll need your files for Margaret McPherson.”

“We don’t keep those here,” he replied.

“You might not think so, but I know Margo brings them home each night. I’ve seen her with the files.” The doctor shrugged, looking at him, curious.

“Let’s head to her office. It’s in the clinic.” They followed him to the back of the building, the clinic off a large fenced-in parking lot, providing privacy for the patients who required clinic services. The rooms were dark and depressing, clearly not meant to be a place where a person would care to linger.

They searched her desk and file cabinet and the doctor found the file marked McPherson, Margaret. The insignia for Hallowsbrook was marked on the front, clearly not an office file. “This is highly unprofessional,” he said, handing it over. “Files are never supposed to leave the unit.”

Pointing to the sharps container outside of Margo’s office, the doctor lifted the container off the wall and deposited it in a red bag Faye was holding open.

“Let’s get out of here,” she said, frowning. “You should try to brighten up this dump for the poor folk.”

“Just because Margo Portland has diabetes doesn’t mean she’s the one who gave Margaret McPherson too much insulin,” Faye said as they drove back to the station, a red-bagged sharps container on her lap. “And if the syringe with her DNA isn’t in this bucket, we have nothing but your hunch.”

“I’ve got more than a hunch, Faye.”

“Why would Margo want to kill her? That’s what I don’t get.”

“She wanted Frank,” Boyd replied. “Margaret was getting better and up for release. Margo wanted to make sure Frank stayed free.”

Boyd kept driving, knowing if they found the proof they were looking for, he’d have to confess in a public court of law that he was having an affair with Margo when she said those damning words, “A sure fire way of murdering someone is to use insulin.”

Returning to the station, the file and each sheet contained within were dusted for prints by CSI and handed over to Faye. The first thing she noticed reading the notes was that Margo Portland saw Margaret early on Wednesday before she died. By the time Mary Cook visited later Wednesday, Margaret was already beginning to go into insulin shock.

BOYD AND DAVE MADDEN sat outside of Margo's house for an hour.

"This has got to be hard for you," Dave said. "I mean, of course it's hard. But are you okay?"

"Yes," Boyd answered. "I thought I should bow out, but Thomas Walker said not yet. So here I am."

"Where the hell did she go?" Dave said. "I hope she didn't get wind of what was happening and bolt."

"Let's drive over to Frank McPherson's," Boyd said suddenly. "I know he was talking to Margo about taking care of his kid if he was charged with abuse."

"Why would she go over there?"

"It's just a hunch," Boyd said, stony.

He started the car and drove through the night, passing the lighted houses in the residential neighborhood on the outskirts of town, and then down a lonely dirt road, unlighted. The moon was bright, the stars invisible, unable to compete.

"Is that it?" Dave said, pointing to a cottage lit up like a beacon.

"That's it," Boyd replied. "I'm going to sneak up on them." Like he always did, hoping to catch Frank doing something wrong, he turned off the lights and engine and drifted up the driveway. As clear as could be, in what appeared at first to be an intimate embrace, Margo Portland and Frank McPherson were standing together. Johnny Rivers played in the background, music floating through the open windows. But as the sheriff and the detective watched, the couple started to sway back and forth innocently as Frank led her in step. Ellen was jumping up and down, clapping.

"They're dancing! They're slow dancing," Dave said hitting his knee and laughing. "People still do that?"

"Yep, it looks like they do," Boyd said, sadly. "The busy bodies probably saw the father and daughter slow dancing, and with dirty minds thought they were doing something bad. Poor Frank. If what I think is true, it'll be the last time he dances with Margo."

GETTING OUT OF MARY'S house without anyone seeing Noelle was no mean feat. The man who lived next door hung out on his porch for a while after the fight. The screaming and commotion had to rouse the rest of the neighborhood's curiosity but no one called the police, or if they did, there was no response. Waiting until dark to go, she left Mary's house from a back door that faced an alley. Not believing she'd get away with it gave her confidence she didn't usually have. If she got caught, oh well. How would it change her life, really? Already living in self-imposed confinement; going to a job she loathed, the loneliness unbearable, and then finally succumbing to Alan's lies, at least a murder trial and life in prison would bring some excitement, not to mention she'd have companionship in jail.

After she killed Mary, she found a bottle of spray cleaner under the kitchen sink and wiped over the few places she touched, the door handles and the handle of the knife while it stuck out of Mary's back. Exhausted, she went into the living room and sat down to rest, confident no one would come to the house because Mary had said so. "You're in luck! The place is empty and I'm not expecting anyone tonight, so come on in!"

Arriving at Mary's that second time; a police car pulled up to the house just as she'd given up knocking on the door and walked down the steps to leave. It threw her into a state of panic so intense she almost ran, thinking they were coming for her. But the cop was just dropping Mary off. Jealousy surged seeing Mary; thin, animated, pretty; everything she wasn't. Imagining her in Alan's arms intensified the rage; up until that moment, she only wanted to talk to Mary but anger would be the deciding factor in Mary's demise. Following the exact same procedure she did with Alan, only this time she used Mary's very own kitchen knife, originally lifted from the café, to stab her in the back.

The logistics of killing Alan the evening before were trickier. When he called her from Mary's house earlier that week, giving her the ax, it was simple for Noelle to get the number he was calling from. Dialing star six nine, the number was repeated by a recorded voice. A wait of a few days to decrease suspicion, Noelle called the number.

"I'm coming into Seymour tomorrow and want to reserve a room," she said.

"No need for a reservation," Mary said, putting lipstick on, anxious to leave for Beauregard. "Just come by when you arrive."

"Can I have your address?" Mary gave it freely, not cautious at all.

"How'd you hear about me?" she asked. But Noelle had already hung up.

Mary Cook was the woman she was looking for, and Noelle made the decision to leave Florida and go to Alabama; there was no other alternative. Years of systematic emotional abuse by men culminated in Alan's mistreatment of her and he would be the scapegoat, paying the dues for all those who went before him.

The bus ride was awful, reminding her of nightmares of youth, going across the border with her mother to visit relatives. Arriving in Seymour in the early afternoon, the bus stop was at the corner of Mary's street, relief when the whoosh of the hydraulic doors opened and fresh air could finally flood in. The café in town offered her a chance to regroup, and it was empty, business almost done for the day. An older woman with a tired limp put a menu and a glass of water down on the table.

"Where's the bathroom?" Noelle asked.

“In back,” the waitress said, pointing to the left of the lunch counter while she returned to filling a tray of saltshakers. On the way to the bathroom, the perfect weapon presented itself; a six inch carving knife in a plastic bin of knives. Slipping the knife into her bag, adrenalin surged through her body. She just made it to the bathroom before bursting into tears, unable to bear the pain for another minute. Locking the door, she knelt down on one knee on the dirty floor and rolled up her pant leg. Using the knife from the café, she very slowly nicked the skin below her anklebone. When she was sure she missed any major vessels, she cut a little deeper, the relief coincided with the rush of air from her lungs. Wrapping the wound with gauze she always carried, she wiped the tip of the blade off and put it in her bag with her bandage supplies. She’d be able to do this.

Alan’s unlocked car parked in front of Mary’s house was a perfect place to hide and wait. She saw it on the street and her mouth filled with bile, heart thumping so hard she was afraid she’d die. Carefully opening the door, she got in the backseat and because of anxiety, immediately fell asleep.

What she wasn’t expecting was to be a witness to the fight. The noise woke her up and at first, she couldn’t tell where it was coming from. Just as she peeked up over the back door to look out the window, Alan flew down the steps with his suitcase. Cowering on the floor, she was sure he’d see her.

Fortunately, he opened the front door of the car and threw it in the passenger seat. He mumbled, calling her a bitch, gulping air in his flight, clearly furious.

Nerves building to enable Noelle to kill Alan as he drove down the deserted road, she was just getting ready to plunge the knife into his neck when he pulled into a well-lit gas station and got out to make a phone call. Now it was her turn to gulp air, heart bounding in her chest, she tried to slow her breathing down before he heard it.

He got back into the car, mumbling again, but his anger seemed to have resolved somewhat. Squatting on the floor behind him, she silently prayed for strength to carry out the murder. He deserved no mercy.

The car slowed down and finally stopped. She listened to him opening the door, getting out of the car. The passenger door opened and he got his bag, slamming the door shut. She peeked over the seat and saw a dark, hulking structure with a wraparound porch, saw him open a door and enter the house without knocking. Carefully opening the back door, she cringed when the interior light went on but she moved fast and quickly and gently closed the door. Approaching the house, she decided if they caught her, she’d just say she was there to see Alan. But no one saw her.

Waiting until he went into the dining room to sneak inside the house, no one noticed her creep by due to the fuss the tenants were making over Alan’s return. Hiding under the staircase, Noelle wasn’t sure what would happen next, listening to their conversation. A woman he called Cate said he could have his old room at the top of the stairs. Alan and another woman named Margo chatted, their attraction for each other clear in his voice and Noelle’s contempt grew. Someone brought up Mary’s name, enraging Noelle further. Barely able to contain the rage and having heard enough, she tiptoed up the stairs, opened the door she hoped was his room at the top of the stairs, the heat blasting her in the face. Not thinking it might alert someone, she turned the air conditioning on, hid next to the wardrobe and waited for him.

It was so easy to do the deed, not at all how she imagined it would be having never stabbed a person before. She was afraid of the knife resisting, of having to force it in. Aiming at the middle of his back, the handle in an icepick grip, the extra leverage gave the sharp, pointed knife strength to slice into him like butter.

In spite of the ease, she started to sweat, beads of sweat dripping off the end of her nose. Alan had once complained when they were having sex that he didn't like her on top of him because her sweat dripping on him was gross. She remembered the insult, giving the knife an extra twist. He grunted and fell forward. After the writhing stopped, she rifled around in his pockets. He only had fifty dollars. Laughing, she said, "What a poor ass."

Listening at the bedroom door, she didn't have to wait for long to make her escape. Scraping of chair legs on the floor in the room below echoed; the meal in the dining room had come to an end. Pausing at his door, she saw another staircase at the end of the hall. Luckily, the stairs led to a back door where she could make her escape undetected.

She walked in circles in the dark neighborhood for half an hour, confused, uncertain, until finally, the noise and smells of food led her to the center of town. Killing time, she hid in the library for as long as she could without rousing suspicion, and then walked down by the river for an hour. She found the bus station where she could hide out until the next bus to Seymour left in the morning. The need to confront Mary grew. Any woman who had betrayed her with Alan deserved retribution. She really hadn't intended on killing her but once it was over, she was relieved.

The bus left Seymour early Sunday morning with Noelle on board after the deed was done. When it passed by the café, she recognized the gorgeous man walking out with a take-out bag in his hand, crossing the street to his parked truck. She'd seen his photo in a newspaper article left behind in the bus station waiting room. A man and his daughter, dancing for all they were worth, won the grand prize the night before at Phillip Anderson's Ballroom.

The End

If you enjoyed Slow Dancing, you will enjoy Pam of Babylon.

CLICK HERE TO READ PAM OF BABYLON FREE

• • • •

KEEP READING FOR THE next book in Fractured

• • • •

JUMP TO THE TABLE OF Contents

• • • •

USA TODAY BESTSELLING Author SUZANNE JENKINS writes page-turning contemporary romance, mystery, and women's fiction with passionately gripping characters in over eighty books that stay with readers long after they turn the last page. The five Detroit Detective Stories, beginning with The Greeks of Beaubien Street, are compelling American fantasy with historical reality. Twenty- six Pam of Babylon books consistently rank in the Top 100 Bestsellers on Amazon in American Drama with over 1,000,000 downloads.

Be sure to subscribe to Suzanne's email list at www.suzannejenkins.com to received periodic Free stories.

TAMARA FERGUSON: TWO HEARTS UNSPOKEN TARGETS

---

TWO HEARTS UNSPOKEN TARGETS
BY TAMARA FERGUSON

Author's Rating:

Language:** Sexuality:** Violence:***

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE, each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, organizations, places, events, and incidents are either products of the author's imagination or used factiously.

Two Hearts Unspoken Targets

Copyright © 2019 by Tamara Ferguson.

All rights reserved.

Cover Designer: Adriana Hanganu

AdipixDesign.com

No part of this book may be reproduced, stored or transmitted electronically, mechanically or recorded without express permission from the author.

The single mom of a severely autistic son, Elizabeth Bowen is a full-time accountant in Illinois. But the plant where she's been working will be closing soon, due to the struggling economy in Illinois. She's had her hands full with her son Kyle, since his father's been long out of the picture, so when the opportunity to enroll Kyle in a vocational facility in Wisconsin comes up, she gladly accepts.

Retired air force captain, Zachary Logan, is a wounded warrior, searching for a new life for himself outside of the air force. When he relocates to the town of Crystal Rock at the invitation of his friend, Luke Bryant, he realizes he's found it, and accepts the position of administrator at the recently built wounded warrior facility.

When Beth and Zach meet at the beach at Dragonfly Pointe, their attraction to each other is instantaneous. And the most wonderful thing of all? Zach is accepting of her special needs son, Kyle, for exactly who he is.

But battling PTSD, Zach experiences flashbacks of a gruesome murder. Can he keep his new love and autistic son safe when they're all singled out by the killer?

October, 2014

Iraq

Their squadron was finally going home.

Air Force Lieutenant Josh Logan watched his fellow crewmen begin assembling, climbing into their one-man cockpits as he stepped into his own. After the bombs had been dropped on Kobani, each flight team had returned to the isolated airfield serving as temporary headquarters for their hand-picked elite unit. They were in a protected zone, and the Iraqi government had sanctioned the U.S. occupation of the former air base.

“Begin to assemble flight team one,” blasted out through the intercom set up near the run-down control tower. Slightly smaller than usual, the twelve-bomber squadron had been divided into three flight teams for this special mission. Each bomber would be departing from the field in fifteen-minute intervals. Now that their primary mission had been completed, pilots from another squadron would be arriving later in the day to take their place.

“Flight team two be ready,” Captain Jason Matthews called out to his other men.

Manned by Hawk Benton, Team One’s first F-22 Raptor made it down the runway safely and was easing along the short-ragged strip in preparation for take-off before disaster struck. Gunfire echoed suddenly through the air, and the insurgents seemed to be attacking the base from all directions.

Listening through headphones, Zach sat waiting in his cockpit, watching several members of base security rushing across the field as, one by one, they contained each of the five offenders before they could reach the runway. It all happened so fast. In less than five minutes three men were killed and two were taken into custody, although not without a fight.

And then chaos ensued. Fire erupted from Hawk Benton’s bomber that had been ready to depart, and moments later, after hearing another explosion, Zach realized he’d apparently been hit by gunfire as well.

“Hold back! That’s an order,” Captain Matthews roared, as Zach noticed other team members moving away from their planes, everyone ready to jump into action.

Captain Matthews must have decided it was too dangerous of a situation, Zach figured. The last thing they needed right now were more casualties after losing Hawk Benton, the pilot of the raptor that had just blown up.

Airman Luke Bryant, who’d been next in line after Zach to depart, obviously had been unable to hear Captain Matthews’ orders, because after climbing out of his raptor’s cockpit, he was working frantically to open Josh’s cockpit door.

The fire seemed to spread in a heartbeat. As Josh’s bomber became caught up in flames, Captain Matthews came rushing across the airfield while Josh kept attempting to escape from the cockpit.

But the temperature inside the plane was becoming scalding hot, and when the instrument panel failed to work, probably due to the heat, Josh pounded at the door, trying to get the jammed controls to respond.

“It’s the heat,” Luke shouted, continuing to pry at the door with a crowbar one of the mechanics had brought over in his hand.

As Captain Matthews arrived at the scene, Zach heard Luke screaming, “It’s screwing up the instrument panel, and Zach’s stuck inside.”

Somehow, Luke finally managed to wedge the cockpit open, and when he reached inside to pull him out, Captain Matthews held back the burning cockpit door.

Zach felt like his flesh was on fire and was unable to move as Captain Matthews assisted Luke with pulling him out.

Zach heard a loud crack and then someone cried loudly in pain, and the last thing he remembered was being hauled away from the scene by Captain Matthews.

• • • •

ZACH KNEW HE WAS BEING airlifted out, because someone had awoken and was screaming in agony.

Wait a minute...maybe it was him?

No, not all the moans and screams were coming from Zach. Someone else appeared to have been severely injured as well.

But he couldn't turn his head to see who it was, because something was wrapped around his neck and he appeared to be latched in place, probably so he wouldn't move around.

And he was hooked up to something – there was a tube wedged into his throat. Oxygen. That's right, his lungs. The last few minutes before losing consciousness, he'd barely been able to breathe.

Dozing, Zach found his mind drifting, returning to the past and the same recurring nightmare he'd been having for years, ever since he'd taken on his first covert assignment working with a search and rescue unit in Afghanistan.

Drugged and tortured, there were so many pieces of his captivity still missing from his brain. Zach never knew for sure whether his nightmares were based on reality or delusions from his hazy memory.

They'd been drawn into a trap, and Zach had never been able to discover why he'd been the only person left alive.

That was his last cognizant thought, and moments later Zach lost consciousness.

• • • •

ZACH WAS AWAKENED SUDDENLY by the pain, and glancing down, he noticed IV tubes seemed to be running out of him everywhere while parts of his body were swathed in some kind of strange bandages. He seemed to be pretty heavily sedated, but bits of conversation in English along with a vaguely recognizable second language floated into his consciousness as he struggled to understand what was happening.

He must be in a German hospital, he figured, because alternative services had been established at the makeshift airbase in Iraq for transporting injured service people from emergency situations.

How long he'd been here, he couldn't say. It must have been several days, he decided as his eyes swept through the sterile hospital room.

Panicking, Zach suddenly heard a voice overhead.

“Hello, Lieutenant. I'm Magda, and I'm one of the team who's been taking care of you. You've been in critical care for your burns for over two weeks now. Although it probably doesn't seem like it, your condition is improving. The best thing you can do is try and rest.”

Zach wasn't sure if he'd been given additional drugs for the pain, but he couldn't keep his eyes open any longer.

• • • •

THE NEXT TIME ZACH awakened, it was to the sound of familiar voices talking softly in his room.

Zach murmured, "Mom?"

Sure enough, it was his mom leaning over the bed, studying him intently. "Zach? Do you know where you are?"

"Germany?" he answered. "Hey. There's no more tube in my mouth, but geez my throat is sore."

"They just took it out," Zach's father, the Colonel, was now standing next to Mom. "I'm glad to see you talking, even though you're croaking like a frog. You sure had us worried."

Zach said hoarsely, "I'll admit, I was a little worried myself. How long have you been here?"

"Nearly a week, now," Mom answered.

"I'm on an indefinite leave of absence," Dad said. "I'm not going back to work until we have you situated on a plane going back to the U.S."

"I'm glad you're both here," Zach said softly, his eyes suddenly closing.

• • • •

NEARLY A MONTH LATER, Zach was being flown back to the states to the veteran's hospital in D.C. for his final checkup after his initial healing period. Future surgeries along with skin grafting procedures were being recommended because of the severity and location of his burns.

The sooner, the better, Zach had been told. Supposedly, he was lucky, but after the sight of his scarred neck and body in the mirror, it was hard for Zach to agree.

But now he was going through a slew of emotions. At least he was up and moving around, ready to move forward, while Luke Bryant was stuck in the hospital in Germany indefinitely.

Zach was concerned about Luke. Not only was he in bad shape physically, his leg had been amputated, but his mental state was going to be questionable as well once he completely understood what was happening. Luke was ten years younger than Zach, and Zach was having trouble himself accepting his own limitations. Since Luke had been planning on making the Air Force his career, how would he adapt?

But Zach needed to consider his own recovery, and supposedly Luke had lots of support back in the states, so for now, Zach needed to concentrate on getting well himself.

Zach had been able to speak with Luke before he'd left the hospital, but Luke was still in and out of consciousness from the painkillers, even though he'd finally been upgraded from critical condition. He was improving, although much more slowly than Zach because of the amputation.

Zach probably wouldn't be alive if it weren't for Luke, so he'd move forward as best he could. Hopefully, he'd have an opportunity to show Luke how grateful he was someday.

Provided Zach could feel appreciative to be alive himself eventually, once he decided how to go on with his life. He was definitely feeling depressed about the future. At thirty-six years old, he'd planned on the air force being his career, just like his father, since three generations of Logans had served proudly.

But working in an office had never appealed much to Zach, so maybe after eighteen years it was time to consider retirement? Especially if he had to go through all the surgeries he'd been told he'd need. Although he'd come close once, he'd never been married, so most of the money he'd earned had been put into savings and investments, since he'd never lived in one place for long.

And his parents were not exactly destitute either, they would do anything for their only child. Zach's father had even told him years earlier that he didn't expect Zach to follow in his footsteps, which was unusual considering his dad was pretty far up in the chain of command. Puzzled at the time, Zach suspected his mom might have had something to do with his father telling Zach that he'd be proud of him no matter what he decided to do about his future.

Concerned about his lack of motivation for recovery, Mom and Dad had stuck around the entire month to make sure Zach was doing what he was supposed to do to aid in the healing process.

Until now, Zach had never realized just how alone he really was. When he was younger, he'd assumed by age thirty-five, he'd have a wife and family. It wasn't just that he'd never met the right woman, but he didn't really have any other interests besides the Air Force and flying.

So, it would be up to him to find something that would interest him enough to plan his future.

Three Months Later.

New Orleans, Louisiana.

His cousin, Marc Logan, was waiting to pick him up inside the airport after Zach disembarked from his plane.

In his mid-twenties, Marc was a grad student who had also started teaching.

Marc approached Zach in the airport, and after grabbing one of Zach's carry ons, he shook Zach's hand.

"I would have known you anywhere, even with the beard," Marc murmured. "Everyone keeps telling me we look so much alike."

Zach grinned. "Frankly, I don't see it."

"Me, neither," Marc answered, grinning as he led the way.

Zach couldn't get over it. Despite not having a beard and being much slimmer, Marc looked enough like him to be a younger twin.

"I figured we'd go straight to the house. I've already been forewarned that you're not taking it easy like you're supposed to after surgery."

Zach grimaced as they walked outside toward the parking lot. "I have so many more surgeries to go, I can't survive with sitting still for long."

Pointing at a truck, Marc muttered, "I can't believe I haven't seen you for over ten years. You were my idol, you know."

Zach waited for Marc to unlock the truck, and after throwing his bag into the back seat, he sat in the passenger seat. "I thought about you a lot when I was overseas. To tell you the truth, I kind of hoped you'd change your mind about enlisting."

Marc laid the bag he'd been carrying beside the other before slipping behind the wheel of the truck. "You tried so hard to teach me how to defend myself. I'm still an uncoordinated klutz. Even Dad was relieved when I decided to go to college instead."

Zach laughed as Marc revved up the engine, backing up in the parking lot and steering toward the exit.

"I can't believe I haven't been back here since Katrina," Zach murmured.

"You never really liked living here, did you?" Marc asked as they reached US 90 and began traveling east.

"It's not that I didn't like it," Zach answered, giving Marc a side glance. "New Orleans is pretty cool. It's the house. Every time I'm staying there, I'm kind of creeped out, and it was ten times worse when I was a kid. Most kids are unhappy when they have to move, but I was actually glad when Dad ended up transferring to Virginia and then Atlanta before he was deployed again."

"Did you stay at the house last time you were here?" Marc asked, looking puzzled.

"After Katrina? I did," Zach answered. "That's when I got rid of the twin sized bed in my room and moved in a queen size from upstairs."

Marc nodded. "I was away at school. I offered to come home, but Dad wouldn't have it."

Zach answered, "It was a mess. We had emergency personnel staying at the house."

Marc continued, "Our home, along with the three others down the lane, are located at the highest elevation in the area, which is why the house has been standing as long as it has. Our ancestors worked with various construction engineers through the years to ensure that the property remained above sea level.”

Becoming thoughtful, Zach answered, “I didn’t understand that until Katrina. I know the property has been in the family for over one-hundred and fifty years, so it’s something we want to hold on to, but I’m really glad that your parents moved in to take care of the place after we moved away.”

“It was a dream come true for me,” Marc muttered. “I can’t wait for you to see the plans I’ve drawn up for remodeling the place. Your mom and dad figured it would keep you busy, helping me decide whether everything I’m thinking about doing is feasible.”

“You know, Marc? That’s something that would work for me. I have some construction experience from when I was employed at a local lumberyard in Atlanta during high school. I really enjoyed it too.”

Marc gave him a wry grin. “Exactly what Uncle Niall said.”

Just then, they reached their turnoff, and uneasiness swept through Zach as Marc pulled into the long narrow road leading across the Logan estate. He was hoping he might feel better this time around, but now he was breaking into a cold sweat. After Katrina, it had been a little easier to deal with staying here with a house load of people assisting with the rescue operations and cleanup, but now it would only be Zach and Marc alone at the house since Marc’s parents had retired and spent a lot of time traveling.

Marc glanced his way and frowned. “Are you going to be alright?”

“I’d better be,” Zach growled. “After everything else I’ve been through, I’m determined to put this stupidity behind me. Every time I’m here, I feel like I’m walking into a gothic horror novel.”

“This should be interesting,” Marc grimaced, pulling into one of six parking spots located in the garage. “Maybe it’ll be easier after we begin the restorations.”

Zach was pleasantly surprised when he walked into the house from the breezeway which connected it to the garage. The former servants’ quarters had been transformed into additional kitchen space with a new pantry included.

But the biggest change? The atmosphere inside. At one time dark and gloomy, the kitchen was bright, airy and inviting.

Zach looked at Marc in astonishment. “How did you...?”

“Mom always hated this kitchen,” Marc grinned. “We added skylights in the old servants’ quarters and bigger windows around the perimeter of the kitchen. It was my first project. What a difference, huh?”

“I’ll say. It’s incredible. You’ve even included a family room with a fireplace,” Zach muttered, his eyes scoping the other side of the room, where an oversized couch and a couple of modern recliners had been placed on either side of the fireplace.

Marc continued, “I spend most of my time in here, since I’ve been living here by myself.”

Zach shook his head dazedly, noticing the desk set up near a large picture window overlooking the oceanfront.

“What a view,” Zack murmured, stepping up to the window. “I can’t believe this side of the house never had windows.”

“Back when this house was originally built, it was a safeguard for preserving the warmth in the house. The winds blowing in can be pretty fierce.”

“That’s true,” Zach answered. “I don’t remember too much about living here. I was pretty young when we moved away.”

“Can I get you something to eat?” Marc asked.

“Tell you what? I’m kind of burned out right now. If I rest up for a little while, how about going out with me tonight to eat? My treat, of course.”

“That’ll work,” Marc replied. “I have someone hired to come in and clean once a week, so I had her air out your room and put some sheets on the bed. I hope that’s okay?”

“That’s fine. I have a feeling moving into my old room is the only way I’ll get over this weirdness I have about staying in this house.”

“Did you know that your parents sent over all your belongings from your house when they moved from Atlanta? Everything is packed away in boxes in your bedroom closet.”

“Funny, I never thought about that when they moved.” Zach pursed his lips. “I have some stuff coming here from my apartment too, either tomorrow or the next day, and then I decided to hire someone to deliver my truck, so I won’t have to depend on you for transportation.”

“Great. I’ll keep an eye out,” Marc said, picking up Zach’s largest piece of luggage and heading up the back staircase to the second floor.

Zach followed Marc up the stairs and along the old familiar hallway, carrying his smaller suitcase and duffel bag.

“Everything is still in great shape, isn’t it?” Zach asked.

“Structure-wise, anyway. It’s the outside that needs all the work, since being so close to the ocean degrades the exterior,” Marc answered. “I have a trustworthy cleaning crew coming in every two or three months when I notice everything upstairs getting dusty.”

Zach murmured, “Four stories with sixteen bedrooms along with ten bathrooms makes for a lot of upkeep.”

“Most of it stays closed,” Marc said, walking into the bedroom at the end of the hallway, its door opened wide. “When we had the kitchen redone, we had a new heating and cooling system installed that works by zones. It should really be done to modernize the remainder of the house, instead of using window air conditioners and electric wall heaters, just for the convenience.”

“I imagine if we’re talking about restoration, we should make the right kind of improvements to maintain the value of the house?” Zach asked distractedly, walking into his old bedroom.

“For sure. Not everything has to be done at once,” Marc answered.

Unfortunately, that same feeling of doom overtook Zach as he stood, glancing around his old gloomy bedroom.

“Is it me or does it feel cold in here?” Zach asked, walking over to the dormer windows overlooking the rocky shoreline.

“I turned down the temperature on the wall unit earlier,” Marc said, strolling toward the wall mount air conditioner, reaching up and switching it off. “You’ll get a nice cross breeze if you open the window at the end of the hallway and leave your bedroom door open. I’m in the room upstairs above yours, but since I’ve been here by myself, I’ve been sleeping on the couch downstairs.”

“I don’t blame you.” Zach raised a brow. “By any chance, were you hearing strange noises during the night while you were growing up?”

Looking startled, Marc turned back from walking through the doorway. “How did you know?”

“That’s when all my nightmares began,” Zach murmured, just realizing it himself. It’s funny how he remembered so little about growing up here. He’d always associated his nightmares with the years he’d served in both Afghanistan and Iraq, since he’d been captured while on active duty overseas.

Marc was looking at him strangely. “We’ve lived here since Dad opted out, but I was about twelve, and began hearing stuff then. Me and one of my friends used to search upstairs in the attic and down in the basement, trying to figure it out. We never really did discover what it was.”

Zach became thoughtful. “Maybe we’ll come across something while we’re working on the restorations?”

Marc nodded his agreement. “Maybe. But most of the changes are cosmetic since apparently there was some reconfiguring of the floor plan inside back in the eighties.”

Zach opened both windows. “As long as I’m staying here indefinitely, the first thing I’m going to do is paint these walls. What an ugly shade of blue.”

Marc laughed, walking back toward the door. “This room and your parents’ room haven’t been touched because of all the personal items inside. There were plenty of guestrooms to use on the two upper floors when we had company.”

“Well, I’m going to put my stuff away, and try to rest for a while,” Zach said, laying his luggage on the bed.

Marc walked through the doorway into the hallway. “Good idea. I’m going to go downstairs and work for a while, since I’ve got class tomorrow, but I’m usually around during the afternoon. It’ll be great to have you here, because then you can supervise the construction crews and make sure the guys are doing what they’re supposed to.”

“Sounds good to me,” Zach murmured, pulling a bunch of new oversized t-shirts from his bag.

“Hey, Zach?” Marc called out from down the hallway.

Zach peeked into the hallway through the doorway. “Yeah?”

“Check out your bathroom. It’s a gift from your parents.” Marc grinned, before galloping down the staircase.

Puzzled, Zach walked through the bedroom, opening the door leading into the bathroom.

Stunned, his mouth gaped open, staring at the completely remodeled bathroom, tripled in size from what it had once been. Not only was there a large walk in shower for him to use, but a huge whirlpool tub with jets had been added.

There’d been a small bedroom on the other side of Zach’s room that had once been used for Zach’s father and uncle’s live in nanny, and Mom had used the room for storage when Zach was young.

Apparently, the room had been sacrificed for Zach.

Heading back into the bedroom, he grabbed his duffel bag, and lugging it into the bathroom, he began unloading the vast array of supplies he needed to use daily because of his scars.

He took a few painkillers, which he’d avoided taking earlier today, and then his antibiotics.

And then sighing heavily, he stacked small tubs of antibiotic lotion, bandages and a thermometer on the granite vanity surface so everything was easy for him to get to when needed.

Grinning, he began running water into the tub, and then turned on the jets. He missed his workouts, which he’d been forced to cut off. He’d have to keep the water tepid, and he wouldn’t be able to fill it very high, but at least it would help relax him, hindering the constant cramping in his legs.

Maybe he’d finally be able to sleep a little better.

Zach and Marc settled into a routine during the next month. In fact, Zach was enjoying keeping busy, even though he was still supposed to monitor his activity and not overdo it.

The only problem Zach had to deal with was some trouble that had occurred when the company he'd hired to deliver his truck wasn't able to do it. Supposedly, the brakes had failed for the driver as he'd been coming through Mississippi on his way here. Luckily, the driver was fine since he'd been traveling along an isolated roadway surrounded by flatlands, so he'd been able to stay in control of the vehicle while continuing to slow down.

Marc had driven Zach to Jackson, which was only 150 miles away, and after getting estimates to repair the brakes, Zach had decided that instead of bothering to have it fixed, he'd just trade it in for a similar new vehicle since he'd been thinking about purchasing something that was a little more comfortable for him to drive. Meanwhile, his insurance company would evaluate the issues and determine the payout quickly.

But the brake failure was strange, since Zach had always taken excellent care of his vehicles and didn't recall any issues with the truck before he'd left for the mission in Iraq.

Zach had made the trade and in a matter of hours he was driving a roomier truck. He and Marc took their time driving back to New Orleans in separate vehicles, and made a stop to eat, even though the driving didn't bother Zach at all. It had been a huge issue traveling on a plane the month before when he'd flown here from D.C., feeling pain and discomfort.

At the beginning of February, he and Marc decided which of the renovations would be happening first, and by mid-February, Zach was supervising the construction crews working outside on the house. After some much-needed work was done on the foundation and the entire roof was replaced, they would begin repositioning and replacing windows. A million and one problems seemed to come up though because of the age of the house, and the cost of improvements needed had more than doubled since the original estimate.

His parents weren't too happy to hear he had decided to hold off on more surgery for a while. But part of his discontent was having to be restricted afterwards, so being more physically active was great for improving his attitude about his limitations.

Zach was beginning to think his fear of living in this house as a kid had been unwarranted, and that everything he thought he'd heard or seen had been a figment of his imagination. But with some help from Marc, Zach had completely remodeled his bedroom, painting and moving around furniture after polishing the wood floor.

Once the workmen were ready to do some window installation, both Zach and Marc's bedrooms would be first on the list, along with rebuilding the balcony and deck which had been integrated in the original layout of the house, referencing one of the old pictures Marc had discovered when organizing the library on the ground floor. Marc was still trying to locate the original floor plans, but so many records on file in town had been destroyed by Katrina, so his only hope at finding the plans, if there actually were any, would be continuing to search the house, which had a lot of hidden nooks and crannies. During the kitchen overhaul, Marc had even discovered a couple of doors which had been hidden by walls from someone's previous remodel.

It was approaching spring, and Marc had been dating a girl from town, when he surprised Zach with a suggestion when they were sitting in the kitchen, eating breakfast on a bright sunny day in April.

“How about going out with me and Denise? She’s got an older sister who just arrived in town and is going to be visiting for a couple weeks.”

Zach snorted. “I don’t think so. I’m not up for dating anyone right now.”

“It’s not really a date. She’s got a boyfriend serving overseas.” Marc shrugged. “We would just have dinner and then go somewhere and maybe listen to music afterwards while having a couple beers.”

Marc had been getting on Zach’s case a little about never leaving the house.

“I’ve been avoiding people, haven’t I?”

Marc asked softly, “Because of your injuries?”

Zach sighed heavily. “That’s part of it, I suppose. You’ve seen the scars.”

“They’re pretty awful,” Marc agreed. “But not if you meet the right woman. Surgery won’t improve the appearance?”

“Possibly, but since I have the least sensation in the areas with the most scar tissue, the surgery will be done to try and improve the flexibility of my skin. All this scar tissue could lead to a lot more issues as I grow older. And I have to be so careful about infection. Now that the weather is warming up, my skin seems to be bothering me a lot more too. I can’t sweat, and sometimes I feel like there’s something crawling all over my skin.”

Marc seemed thoughtful. “And you haven’t found a shrink?”

“You’ve noticed, huh?” Zach sighed heavily. “I’m not ready to rehash my issues with someone new.”

“Are you planning on returning to D.C. then? I get the feeling that this is only temporary.”

“Maybe.” Zach gave Marc a wry grin. “I like the doctor I’ve been seeing, but even he’s been getting on my case about having more surgery and seeing a shrink. If I’m going to continue with the next round, I suppose I’d better go back within a month or two.”

“Will you return here?”

“Probably,” Zach answered. “I’ve actually come to like it here. But a lot of that has to do with you, and your support.”

Marc grinned. “And me not getting on your case?”

Zach smiled widely. “You’ve got it, man.”

• • • •

ZACH ENJOYED HIMSELF when they went out that night. They went to dinner at a small restaurant Marc recommended in the French quarter which featured local bands for entertainment.

Like Marc had said, Denise’s sister, Jan, had a boyfriend overseas who was an Army Ranger and she was deeply concerned about the fact that she hadn’t heard from him in over two months.

“I’m not saying you shouldn’t be worried, but two months is really nothing in the scheme of things, Jan,” Zach reassured her. “You tend to lose track of time, depending on your mission. At this point, I’d say no news is good news.”

“Thanks, Zach,” she’d said at the end of the evening. “You’ve helped me more than you know. I sure hope that you find what you’re looking for now that you’re home for good.”

Zach had smiled. “Me, too.”

She’d kissed Zach on the cheek, whispering in his ear. “And it’s just like Marc said – the right woman won’t care about the scars.”

They’d dropped the girls off at Denise’s apartment before heading home.

“I’m glad you talked me into this,” Zach murmured, as Marc pulled into the driveway. “It felt good to get out. And when it comes down to it, no one is really looking at me.”

“Well, maybe, maybe not,” Marc answered. “It they are looking at you, it’s not for the reason that you’re worried about. I’d love to have abs the size of yours.”

Zach laughed. “But I’m shrinking. I’m surprised I can do as much as I do physically, but low impact exercise and not overextending my arms because of the damage on my chest is keeping me somewhat in shape. I went to a physical therapist in D.C. too, so I have a long list of dos and don’ts.”

Marc frowned, looking at the house as they approached the garage. “Is it me, or does it look like there’s a light flashing around near those new windows upstairs on the second floor?”

Zach peered upwards as Marc slowed down. “No. It looks like someone’s roaming around with a flashlight. Has anyone else got keys besides us?”

Marc stopped his truck in the middle of the drive, meeting Zach’s gaze. “No. We just changed all the locks after we put in new doors, remember?”

“We’d better get that new security system installed soon,” Zach answered.

“I just pulled out the old one in February before we started the construction because it was outdated and wasn’t working right anyway,” Marc murmured. “The sensors were screwed up.”

“Someone’s up there, alright,” Zach said. “I’ll go check it out. I’m still pretty good at stealth.”

“Wait,” Marc said, as Zach slipped from the truck. “You don’t even have a weapon.”

“I won’t need one.” Zach smiled grimly. “Call the cops, Marc. If you see the hallway light turned on upstairs, it means that it’s safe to come inside.”

Zach heard Marc say something else, but Zach ignored him.

By that time Zach was close to the house, slipping around the perimeter and approaching the breezeway that led into the kitchen.

Carefully unlocking the back door, Zach crept into the house, climbing directly up the staircase. But by the time Zach moved stealthily through the hallway, no one appeared to be anywhere.

Methodically, he explored each room on the second floor, switching on lights and listening carefully as he made his way through each bedroom, checking inside closets and even in the bathrooms.

Completely mystified, Zach finally made his way into his own bedroom, staring in shock at the mess that had been left in his closet. All Zach’s things, old and new, had been packed away in those boxes, and someone had been going through them.

Whoever it was seemed to have completely disappeared.

But what in the hell had they been looking for?

By the time Zach heard the police arrive a few minutes later, Marc was standing beside Zach studying the mess that had been made by whoever had been inside the house. About half of the boxes stacked in the closet had been completely dumped out, and Zach's belongings were scattered across the floor.

Appearing dazed, Marc asked, "What do you suppose they were looking for?"

Zach answered, "I don't have a clue. It's funny how whoever it was looked like they were planning on going through everything."

"So, how did they get in and out without either one of us seeing them?"

"More importantly, how in the hell did they know that neither one of us was here?"

Marc's eyes went wide. "What should we tell the cops?"

Zach made a decision. "Nothing, for now. Let's say we interrupted a robbery and leave it at that."

"Alright. You probably have your reasons?"

Just then, Zach heard knocking at the front door, so he and Marc walked toward the bedroom door.

"I do. I've always felt like something strange has been going on at this house and judging by how uneventful life seemed to be while you and your parents were living here, crazy things seem to only happen when I'm involved."

Making their way through the hallway, Marc hurried down the front staircase while Zach trailed behind. Zach was probably never going to be able to walk without a limp since his left upper thigh was badly damaged from burns.

Two cops walked inside the house, looking around, and Marc knew them both, introducing them to Zach.

They had a quick discussion and decided they might just as well file a report, even though nothing appeared to be missing.

Or, so, Zach thought anyway. Tonight, he would leave everything as it was, and begin going through the boxes himself tomorrow.

• • • •

SINCE THE NEXT DAY was Saturday, Marc had no classes, so he and Zach searched the upstairs of the house for signs of another entrance.

After a couple hours scouring walls and the insides of closets as well as the attic, they were both still stumped. How in the hell had anyone gotten inside and left so quickly?

"There's got to be something we're missing," Marc said, scratching his head as they both sat at the kitchen island drinking coffee.

How had whoever it was known they weren't home?

A sudden thought came to Zach's mind, and reaching over, he laid his hand over Marc's arm nodding his head at the door.

Marc's eyes went wide.

But after Zach stood up carrying his coffee, Marc followed behind as Zach made his way along the terraced pathway leading to the property's ocean overlook.

"What is it, Zach?" Marc asked as they took a seat on the bench of the deck.

"This is great how you've added this terrace. What an amazing view," Zach murmured. "I haven't been this close to the cliffs since I was a kid."

Marc blinked. "Really? Why?"

Frankly, Zach was puzzled about that himself.

"I'm not really sure," Zach answered. "I get this cold and clammy feeling when I even look this way. I might have to ask my parents if something happened when I was a kid, because I can't really think of a reason. I don't have a problem anywhere else. I've hiked, climbed and worked in search and rescue at some of the most dangerous places overseas."

Zach continued, "Anyway, what I wanted to say? I think someone is either listening or watching us with some kind of eavesdropping device."

Marc's mouth gaped open.

Finally closing his mouth, he asked abruptly, "Why?"

"I don't have a clue," Zach answered. "But how else would they have known that neither one of us was home?"

Marc sighed heavily. "One of the workmen installed it?"

"Most likely," Zach answered. "They were in and out of the house when they were installing the doors and windows. I was around, but I couldn't watch everyone."

"I take it we're not going to try and find the devices?"

Staring down at the jagged rocks along the water's edge, Zach shook his head. "No. We can't be obvious about it anyway. How else would we have a chance to discover who put them there? Whoever is listening or watching is obviously able to do it on a phone."

"I'll be careful what I say. Maybe I should sleep in my room?"

"I wouldn't change your habits right away," Zach murmured, standing up. "Let's get out of here. I'm feeling kind of sick to my stomach."

"Alright," Marc answered. "Maybe we should come up with a signal if we discover anything?"

"Good idea." Zach pointed as they approached the house. "Let's do palms up, and then we can move outside to the gazebo over there. I doubt if there's anything to worry about inside since we never use it."

"Alright," Marc answered.

"I'll be coming up with a list of questions. Why don't we meet out here tomorrow about the same time so we can talk freely?"

"What kind of questions?" Marc halted since they were nearing the house.

Zach stopped, pretending to examine one of the new windows. "I want to know about all the neighbors, and who's living down the lane, and whether they're in residence or not."

"Good idea. We need to start somewhere."

"Exactly," Zach murmured.

The following afternoon, Zach and Marc met at the gazebo and took a seat at the patio table inside.

“Until you brought it up yesterday, I forgot about how colorful some of our neighbors are,” Marc said, pulling out a list. “We have Ryan Carlton, who’s property is at the very end of the road. Although his uncle was a pretty seedy character, I’m pretty sure that Ryan is on the up and up. He’s the CEO of one of the largest companies here in New Orleans, and he seems to have a lot of friends.”

Zach was curious. “What do you mean by seedy?”

Marc cleared his throat before answering, “There were rumors that Frank Carlton was a mob boss.”

Zach blinked. “Ohh-kay. Maybe a little more than seedy if it’s true? And the mansion beside it?”

“Well, I’m not sure who owns the place anymore. Occasionally, I see visitors at the mansion. I have a sneaking suspicion that a woman’s shelter, or rehabilitation clinic, has been set up on the property, where a new structure has been built. I think Ryan Carlton coordinates whatever is going on over there, and everyone seems to stay on the grounds. The square footage is probably more than ours and it also has an adjoining beach with Ryan’s.”

“Does Dad’s buddy, Lieutenant Colonel Ed Jackson, still own the property next to ours?” Zach asked.

Marc grimaced. “He does. I can’t say I like him very much. He’s always complaining about something or trying to order me around. He’s here a lot during the summer, more often on weekends.”

“I haven’t seen him for a long time,” Zach admitted. “When we were living in Atlanta, he used to stop by and go out to dinner with my parents all the time. He and Dad used to play golf together too. Truthfully, despite the Air Force connection and being neighbors growing up, I’ve never been able to figure out why they’re friends. Dad recommended him for a promotion and the job as the commander of the air base nearby instead of taking the job himself. Of course, Dad said he and Mom always wanted to travel and go overseas. But I always got the impression that Dad owed him a favor, although I don’t have a clue what it could possibly be.”

“I guess he kept an eye on this house years ago before we moved in when no one was living here. But didn’t he and your dad grow up together?”

“I think he was your dad’s friend growing up. He’s actually a few years younger than mine,” Zach murmured.

“Really?” Marc grimaced. “Well, if they were friends once, they aren’t anymore. Dad can’t stand the guy.”

Zach nodded thoughtfully. He’d always thought the Colonel was kind of strange himself, and Zach had sometimes felt an odd sense of discomfort when he was around. Actually, it was more than discomfort. Jackson had been in charge of interrogation back in Afghanistan, and he really didn’t know anyone who had anything nice to say about the guy, including the men serving under his command. Supposedly, he’d been married for a while when Zach was active overseas, but his wife had passed away less than ten years later.

Zach and Marc sat outside for another few minutes discussing the remaining neighbors who lived inland along the coastal road in the subdivision nearby. Marc admitted he used to ride his bike along the road as a teenager and still knew some of the families. There never seemed to be any trouble though, and the homes were modern and well kept. A new gated community had even been added as well.

“I can introduce you to Ryan Carlton,” Marc said as they began walking toward the house.

“Sounds good,” Zach answered. “And meanwhile, in case our internet is being monitored, I’ll take my laptop in town and check further into him and see if any other strange happenings or robberies have occurred in the neighborhood.”

Marc nodded. “Yes, that’s a good idea. I rarely talk to anyone around here, and we’re kind of isolated where we’re located. There’s free wi-fi at the library in town and at a couple of the fast food places too.”

Zach nodded.

Marc sighed. “We’re probably not really getting anywhere, are we?”

Zach snorted. “No. But like you said yesterday, we have to start somewhere. I went through the boxes that were dumped out and repacked everything, but I barely remembered half of the stuff Mom saved for me. I’ll go through the other boxes today.”

Marc grimaced, as they walked into the kitchen. “The construction crew is back tomorrow to start rebuilding the porch.”

“I’ll stick around until you get home from class. You’re home by one on Monday, right?”

“Right,” Marc answered.

• • • •

“SPEAK OF THE DEVIL,” Marc murmured, a few hours later, when Zach came downstairs and was preparing to go outside and start the grill.

Zach had just finished opening and shuffling through the rest of his things upstairs, but without knowing what he was looking for, he felt like he was wasting his time.

“Who’s that?” Zach asked, hearing a knock at the back door.

“Jackson’s out there,” Marc said. “I just saw him through the window, walking along the path.

Zach grunted, heading to the back door and opening it.

According to Marc, Lieutenant Colonel Jackson had been back and forth to his home here several times during the last three months, and Zach found it interesting to see that the Colonel didn’t look surprised when Zach answered the door.

“Captain,” Jackson murmured, nodding his head. “I heard you were here in town.”

“Colonel,” Zach answered, automatically giving him a quick salute.

“I saw some police cars here the other night when I was driving by. Is there anything I need to be worried about?”

Zach studied him thoughtfully. If anything, now that the Colonel was getting older, he was looking even creepier than he had when Zach had been a kid. He was thinner with sunken eyes and sallow skin, accentuated by the color of his hair, obviously dyed raven black.

“Nothing to worry about, Sir,” Zach answered. “Someone was in the house, but nothing appeared to be missing afterwards.”

“It was probably just some kids messing around,” Marc said, after approaching and standing beside Zach. “Since we disconnected our alarm system because of the construction, we were probably more vulnerable.”

“Good to hear,” the Colonel murmured. “I’ll just have my caretaker double up on his rounds of the property.”

“Would you like to come in for a beer or drink?” Zach asked.

If Lieutenant Colonel Jackson was surprised at the invitation, he didn't show it. "No, thank you. I need to start on my way back to base."

Turning away and walking along the path, the Colonel suddenly looked back. "It's good to see you again, Zachary. Glad you made it home safely."

Zach answered, "Thank you, Sir."

Marc's eyes met Zach's in obvious astonishment as he and Zach moved outside from the kitchen.

Zach murmured, "I believe that as much as I believe I've got a hole in my head."

Marc grimaced. "Geez, he sure gave me the creeps, the way he said that."

"Tell me about it." Zach smiled grimly. "It sure doesn't feel like a coincidence that he stopped by, does it? But I can't think of one single reason why he'd have anything to do with the break-in."

"Me, neither," Marc agreed. "Plus, most of that stuff has been sitting there in your closet for years. It has to be unrelated. None of this makes any sense. Does it?"

"It doesn't," Zach admitted. "If it wasn't for the strange sophistication of the break-in, I would have probably written it off right away."

Marc had invited his girlfriend Denise and her sister over for dinner last week, but after what had happened Friday night, Marc had decided he'd go into town and meet Denise a little later tonight instead.

Zach thought it was a good idea. The strangeness of what was going on had him worried and since Marc hadn't appeared to have any unusual happenings until after Zach arrived, Zach somehow sensed that whatever the reason, it was definitely all about him.

Zach was settled in for the night, watching baseball on the television downstairs when he heard his phone ring.

He'd been checking in with his parents weekly, and very few people had the number, so he was definitely curious when he couldn't identify who was on the phone by the caller ID.

"Hello?" Zach answered.

"Lieutenant Logan? Er, I meant to say Captain. I heard you were promoted."

Zach sat up attentively. "Luke?"

"Yes. It's me," Luke muttered, sounding sheepish.

After standing and walking toward the kitchen door, Zach grinned from ear to ear as he stepped outside and made his way toward the gazebo. "Well, how in the hell are you?"

"I'm good." Luke cleared his throat. "Great, actually, Captain."

"I can't tell you how glad I am to hear that," Zach answered. "And start calling me Zach, Luke. I'm retired now."

"Alright, Zach," Luke answered. "I'm living back in Crystal Rock, Wisconsin with my girlfriend, Kelly. I've been going through rehab, and I've been fitted for a prosthetic."

Listening to Luke, Zach was still grinning. "You sound happy."

"Happier than I've ever been in my life," Luke admitted quietly. "But let's talk about you. Captain Matthews said you're hiding out and avoiding rehab and not having your recommended surgeries."

Zach groaned. "I was wondering how you got my number."

Luke answered, "I have a feeling you might actually like what I have to say, since I've heard you've been living in limbo. I have a proposition for you Zach..."

The next morning, Zach kept a close eye on all the workmen while he sat on one of the comfortable stools at the kitchen island preparing a short resume on his laptop. His conversation with Luke had him thinking a little more about the future, and just because he was retired didn't mean he didn't want to work. Since they were nearly through with all the renovations at the estate for now, Zach wouldn't have much to do in a few more weeks.

His conversation with Luke was like a wake up call, and it was time for Zach to decide what he wanted to do with the rest of his life. He would be visiting here for sure, but he really didn't want to make New Orleans his home. At least not yet.

As Zach stood up and opened the fridge, Marc came walking through the doorway into the kitchen. "I brought lunch," Marc murmured, laying a couple of subs on the kitchen island. "I knew we were low on groceries, but maybe we can go into town later today when the workmen are gone. Also, coincidentally, I just ran into Ryan Carlton, and told him about someone breaking into the house. Did you realize he used to keep an eye on you occasionally when you were growing up?"

Zach blinked. "It's weird, but I hardly remember even being here when I was young. It's like I have a blackout when I try and think about it."

After grabbing them each a bottle of water from inside the fridge, Zach handed one of the bottles to Marc.

Marc sat down, taking a sip of water before unwrapping one of the subs.

And then Marc glanced at the screen on Zach's computer. "It looks like you're thinking about the future a little, huh?"

"Yeah, a little." Zach showed Marc his palms. "Want to go eat outside since it's a pretty nice day?"

Marc grimaced. He'd definitely forgotten about the possibility of them being watched. "Sure. Let's go sit in the gazebo."

A few minutes later, they were settled at the table.

"Ryan said if you have any questions, feel free to stop by this afternoon," Marc murmured. "He'll try and fill you in the best he can about the people who've been living here for the last thirty years."

"You want to come along?" Zach asked, biting into his sub.

"Nah. While I was in town, I talked to a friend of mine about a security system for the house. I think he's coming by this afternoon to give us an estimate. He might even be able to begin the installation right away if it's a system he keeps in stock."

Zach took a sip of water. "I'm glad you've already talked with someone about security because it was the first thing I was going to suggest taking care of after speaking with the neighbor."

As they ate in companionable silence, Zach gave Marc a wry smile. "A friend of mine called last night. He was injured pretty badly, but he's doing everything he's supposed to be doing, so he gave me a lecture. It was definitely a wake up call. We'll be done here in a few weeks, so I'm trying to figure out what's next."

Marc grimaced. "I'll miss you. Having you here has been like having an older brother."

"I'll miss you too, Marc," Zach admitted. "You're definitely like a younger brother to me, but better."

"Why's that?" Marc asked.

Zach grinned. "We never argue."

Marc blinked, and then laughed.

• • • •

ZACH HAD A FEELING that deep down, Marc had been hoping he would stay in New Orleans, and even though Zach would definitely make an effort to return soon, right now he was just too restless to hang around once the construction was finished.

They decided that splitting up their tasks for the afternoon would be easier. After visiting Ryan Carlton, Zach would go into town and use his computer where he could remain unobserved. Maybe it would be a waste of time trying to discover anything unusual which might have happened in the past, but truthfully, he couldn't think of anything else to do. Since nothing appeared to be missing, the cops hadn't bothered with any sort of investigation, and trying to take fingerprints would have probably been useless, anyway. When he was finished with what would most likely be a short computer search, he would pick up some groceries so Marc could remain at home and hopefully have some kind of alarm system installed today at the house.

As Zach made a left and headed down the road toward Ryan Carlton's estate, he realized he'd only taken out his new truck about a half dozen times. Zach had a feeling Marc wanted Zach to love it here as much as he did, because Marc liked driving Zach around town, showing off a little more of the rebuilding progress that was still happening after Hurricane Nina.

There was a high security fence surrounding the Carlton estate, so Zach stopped at the gate. Speaking into the intercom and giving his name as requested, Zach waited for the gate to open, following the drive toward the house.

When Zach knocked on the door, it was answered by a man who appeared to be about ten years older than Zach. But apparently, he was having some health issues, because he was pale and very thin.

"Zach?" He smiled. "You probably don't remember me, but everyone calls me Rye."

"Wait a minute." Zach suddenly did remember. "Didn't you used to come by with your girlfriend?"

"I did." Rye gave him a rueful smile. "Vanessa. Her dad never really liked me, so we would get together and babysit for your mom, who was here alone a lot because of your father's tours."

"Until I saw you again, I didn't remember," Zach murmured, following Rye as he led him through the house toward a sunny three season porch.

A woman appeared at the doorway. "Can I get you and your guest something to drink, Rye?"

Rye looked at Zach. "How about some coffee?"

"Yes," Zach answered, smiling. "Black would be great."

"I'll have it black too, Sandra," Rye said.

"Give me about ten minutes," she responded, smiling and walking away.

They conversed for a few more minutes, before Rye got to the point. "I've heard you had a break in, and you wanted to find out a little more about some of our neighbors?"

"Well, let me tell you what I'm most worried about," Zach answered, grimacing. "We can't figure out how they got inside."

Not seeming to be surprised, Rye sighed heavily. "Your home and the Danielson home next door were originally the only two estates located here along the Gulf. We're talking about hundreds of years ago by your great, great grandfather. In fact, maybe you can even add another couple of greats to that. So, take a guess why those homes were built here in the first place? Although the homes that are there now, are not actually the very first homes that were built."

It only took Zach a moment to figure it out, even though it was strange that he'd didn't know much about the history of the property. The steep cliffs, the long sandy beach down below. The caves that he remembered going into with his dad as a kid. "Smuggling?"

"You've got it," Rye answered.

"Isn't it weird how I don't know much about the estate?"

Just then, Sandra walked into the room with their coffee, handing a cup to Zach first before resting Rye's on the table beside him.

As Zach took a sip of his coffee, Rye answered, "Not so strange really. You were probably only about five or six years old when your dad was transferred to Virginia."

Rye continued, "Both of the original homes were destroyed by a hurricane and flooding, so the original owners, Ronald Logan and Rene Breunard, who were friends, set themselves to work trying to find ways to elevate the property before rebuilding, since the location was so secluded, which made it perfect for their nefarious activities."

"How were they able to make that work?"

"Don't forget, slavery was common back in the early 1800's. What they did was haul rock and soil and whatever else was available to stabilize the property. And the structural changes had to be monitored constantly to prevent erosion. There were canals and levees built, but a lot of deaths of slaves and Irish immigrants occurred for many years. It's rumored that your ancestors were way ahead of the times and were doing these things way before the city was."

Zach asked, "So, I'm presuming there are passages in and out of the houses?"

Rye nodded his agreement. "Most of them came later as the structural changes became more advanced, like steel became an easily available commodity in the mid to late 1800s. The passages were eventually reinforced like mine shafts, although most of them were supposedly sealed off eventually. The smuggling went on for years, but then there was a rift between Ronald Logan and Rene Breunard, the original owners sometime before the civil war."

"Let me guess," Zach murmured. "One of them got greedy?"

"Apparently, yes. Ronald disagreed with Rene on what, or rather who, was being smuggled. Rene Breunard branched into human trafficking and trading slaves, while Ronald Logan continued operating by smuggling only goods and did whatever he could to deter Breunard until his family was threatened by Breunard. No one was able to confirm it but, Logan's eldest grandson might have been kidnapped and murdered."

Zach grimaced.

Rye didn't know much more than that. Supposedly, Zach's mom had searched for some kind of records or blueprints for the house long before Katrina, but nothing had been found. Rye remembered her having a keen interest in the history of Louisiana and particularly their estate while she'd been living here, because it had kept her busy while Zach's dad was away on tour.

Zach and his mom really needed to do some talking one of these days. Zach had never even had a clue she was interested so much in history, but Rye seemed to think it had more to do with their ancestry, and Zach agreed, since Mom's parents had passed away when she was young.

Another thirty minutes later, Zach stood up, reaching out a hand.

Smiling, Rye rose from his chair and shook it. "So, I probably haven't been much help. It could almost be anyone who snuck inside your house, although it's more than likely a local. There's public access to our beach, and even a dock on the other side of the Danielson property. Sam used to live here in town, but he inherited the property from his wife when she was killed, so he doesn't know much about the house. He visits regularly but he's actually the police chief for a small town in Wisconsin, and it's complicated, but I'm handling his interests for him here in New Orleans."

A small town in Wisconsin? That was kind of a coincidence, but then again, there were a lot of small towns in Wisconsin.

"Here, let me give you my card." Walking towards a desk, he slipped a card out from inside a drawer, bringing it over to Zach. "That's got my phone number and email address in case you have any other questions."

"Thanks for your time, Rye," Zach murmured. "I really appreciate it."

"Good to see you again, Zach," Rye answered, walking with him toward the door. "Get in touch if there's anything you need to know. I hope you're able to get back on track with your rehab and surgery. Marc mentioned you might be leaving soon."

He gave Rye a rueful smile. "I can't put off the future much longer."

"It's good that you came back and confronted your demons," Rye muttered.

Zach was startled.

Rye must have noticed because he smiled wryly. "I've had a lot of my own to deal with. Good luck, Zach."

"You too," Zach answered, holding up a hand in farewell before stepping into his truck.

• • • •

BRINGING HIS LAPTOP into town had been a complete waste of time, Zach decided an hour later as he was driving home with groceries. He really didn't know what he'd been looking for, but he was willing to bet that anything important was not going to just appear in front of him online.

Everything he'd discussed with Rye about the house predated any information available on the internet, so what Zach had done was looked into Ryan Carlton, who had impressive credentials, before trying to discover more about some of the other surrounding neighbors. One couple had only purchased their home ten years ago, and both of their teenage sons were of age and living in other states. Another neighbor was a millionaire with high visibility, who spent a lot of time traveling, and only visited New Orleans near Christmas because he'd been born in the state.

Zach had still checked into the Colonel, although he knew there would be nothing to find. On paper, Lieutenant Colonel Edgar Jackson's record was impeccable.

After driving across the long Twin Span Bridge from town, Zach was approaching the treacherous roadway leading back to the house when he suddenly had trouble accelerating and frowned.

"It's a brand-new truck," he muttered. "How in the hell could it be giving me trouble?"

Zach was still able to drive, but at a much slower speed, so taking out his phone, he gave Marc a call.

"Hello?" Marc answered.

"Hey, it's me, Zach. I'm having a problem accelerating my truck. I just came over the bridge and I'm on that narrow roadway about five miles from home."

Marc answered, "Since you're close to home, I'll call for a tow, and then come and get you. Don't take any chances. Find a place to park if you can."

"Gotcha," Zach answered, switching off his phone.

And then suddenly, a huge pickup with dark tinted windows was coming straight at him from the opposite direction.

"What the fuck is he doing?" Zach shouted, looking at each side of the road to consider his options.

And before he was hit by the truck, Zach was able to reach the end of the roadway where a small rest area had been constructed and swerve off into the narrow parking lot, flooring the brakes.

Turning to look through the window from where he'd stopped in the middle of the lot, Zach swore that the guy on the roadway must have been a stunt driver. The brakes on the monster truck squealed as he came to a halt before backing up on the narrow roadway.

“What the heck am I going to do now?” Zach growled, searching the area. He wasn't getting around well enough to run, especially with his limp. “I definitely need to get back into rehab.”

At that moment, a couple of cars appeared on the road, one coming from town and the other from the opposite direction.

Squealing its brakes again, the driver of the monster truck halted, jerking the truck into gear and moving forward, speeding along the narrow roadway.

“I sure wish I knew what the hell was going on,” Zach muttered, scratching his head.

When Marc appeared fifteen minutes later to pick up Zach, he must have noticed how worried Zach was.

Marc called out, "Just leave the key under the front mat for the tow truck."

"Will do," Zach answered.

"What happened?" Marc asked as Zach stepped into the passenger seat after they loaded the groceries into the back seat of Marc's truck.

"Someone deliberately tried to run me off the road."

In the process of accelerating, Marc hammered the brakes, turning and staring at Zach.

"Who in the hell would do that? And why?"

"That's what I'm trying to figure out," Zach answered.

Marc remained quiet as he continued to drive, and ten minutes later he was pulling into the garage.

Once inside, Zach showed his palms.

It was an obvious warning for Marc, who seemed taken aback.

Marc murmured, "Let's put the groceries away and sit outside with a couple of those beers you bought."

Zach nodded his agreement. "Sounds good to me."

Fifteen minutes later, they were sitting outside in the gazebo with beers in hand.

"When I thought this was just about something that someone wanted from me, I wasn't so worried. But after what's happened today, I think it's time for me to consider your safety, Marc."

Marc sighed. "What do you think we need to do?"

"Well, since I'm a pilot, when I heard the engine of my truck start to sputter, I had a pretty good idea of what was happening. Someone put water in the gas tank, most likely when I was in town, otherwise I would have had trouble on the way there."

"My buddy Will is checking it out and he'll be giving you a call tomorrow."

Zach nodded thoughtfully. "So, what about your friend who's doing the alarm installation? How advanced is he with his knowledge of electronics?"

Marc snorted. "Jeff went to MIT. And yes, I trust him."

Zach's eyes went wide. "Then what's he doing here putting in alarm systems?"

"He owns the company. I think he said he's up to five cities now and growing."

"So, I guess he won't have any trouble jamming signals for those devices I think we have in the house?"

"I can ask," Marc answered, grimacing. "Why didn't you want to talk in the car?"

"Precautionary," Zach murmured. "But I think they knew where I was because of my phone."

"I'll admit at first, I thought you were being paranoid. But this has been getting crazy. Someone really tried to run you down?"

"Someone in a monster truck with tinted windows. Do you know anyone who has a truck fitting that description?"

Marc rolled his eyes. "About a quarter of the population around here."

"That's what I figured," Zach murmured. "I've been considering how best to handle this. I'll probably leave sometime next week after the workmen have finished, if your friend is able to jam the signals. Hopefully, we can do it one room at a time so whoever is doing this doesn't realize we're onto them. I'm kind of glad I bought a truck with a topper."

"What have you got in mind?"

"Taking away all those boxes in the closet so you don't have to worry about anyone else breaking in, at least for something I have inside them. First, I'd like for you to have some kind of alarm set up inside the house on each floor, since we still don't know how that person got in. If we can jam the signals, we might be able to catch them unawares."

Marc pursed his lips. "I'm no expert, but I think to jam a signal, you need to know the frequency and where it's coming from, but if anyone knows how to do it, it would be Jeff. I'm thinking he has to jam the whole network though."

"Let's see what he has to say and go from there. The next best thing would probably be doing it during the middle of the night. If someone is keeping an eye on us, more than likely, it's during the day."

"Where will you go?" Marc asked.

"Not to D.C.," Zach answered. "I have a friend in Wisconsin who invited me to live in his guest house and told me about a job he thinks I should apply for. But I'm not going to spread the word about where I am. And since Mom and Dad are in Europe, they really don't need to know anything more than I'm continuing my therapy and surgeries."

Marc nodded his agreement.

"We need to get a couple burner phones. I'll turn off the phone I have now and quit using it. I'll expect you to keep in touch."

"Of course I will," Marc muttered. "Just be careful, and make sure you take care of yourself."

Grimacing, Zach continued, "I won't use credit cards and I'll probably stick to online banking. Maybe I'll make a cash withdrawal before I leave town, so I'll have enough money to get by, since I'll have to make several overnight stops on the way to Wisconsin because of my injuries."

"Is there anything we should do tonight?"

"How about we just have a few more beers?" Zach replied. "Maybe after we talk with your friend tomorrow, we'll have more options."

"Sounds good to me."

• • • •

BOLTING UPRIGHT, ZACH let out a blood curdling yell. What was freaking him out the most was that even though he couldn't recognize faces, this time he'd finally seen the events clearly through a cloudy haze.

Zach was standing witness as a woman was being raped and tortured before she was shot in the head.

Zach had been having PTSD bouts and flashbacks ever since he'd awakened in the hospital in Germany, continuing even after he'd arrived in the states. But Zach's nightmares had suddenly become worse during the past month. Although he didn't speak about them with Marc, Marc had come running into the bedroom a time or two to make sure Zach was alright and offer his silent support.

The same thing was happening right now, Zach realized, opening his eyes.

Marc was sitting beside him on the bed looking extremely concerned.

"Zach? Zach? Are you alright?"

His face caked with sweat, Zach shook his head dazedly. "I...I don't know if what I'm seeing really happened."

“You’re going to be seeing a shrink right away when you get to Wisconsin?”

“I am,” Zach muttered.

“What can I do for you now? Would you like some water?”

Feeling shaky, Zach moved to the edge of the bed, sighing heavily.

“I’ll be alright Marc. I think I’m going to take a quick shower.”

“Alright. If you need anything, just yell. I was half awake when I heard you.”

“Thanks. I really appreciate your help, you know,” Zach murmured, standing from the bed.

“I know you do,” Marc said, patting Zach’s shoulder before he made his way from the bedroom.

Instead of a shower, Zach went into the bathroom and ran a bath instead. He wanted a few minutes to think about what he’d seen in that nightmare.

Stripping off his t-shirt and shorts, he sat down in the tub while the water was filling.

What was concerning him was the fact that he’d had two different visions. In one, he’d been captured and strung up high, while one of his unit members was being tortured, raped and killed, and in another, someone was being shot right in front of him.

And it had been happening when Zach was just a kid.

• • • •

MARC ONLY HAD ONE CLASS to attend the following morning, so he was back before ten. Grabbing a cup of coffee first and laying it on the counter, he showed Zach his palms.

Standing from where he was sitting at the island checking some information on his laptop, Zach picked up his coffee before following Marc outside.

“They found a magnetized tracking device in your truck bed. Shall we leave it there for now?”

“Yes. You can show it to me before I leave and when I’m traveling out of town, I’ll drop it off somewhere in a creative place,” Zach murmured. “I’m glad I’m not losing my mind.”

Surprisingly, Marc laughed.

A few minutes later, Marc’s friend Jeff pulled into the driveway in his van.

“I stopped by and talked with him before coming home, and I told him you were military, so we needed to keep all of this quiet.” Marc pursed his lips. “The guy was actually excited to hear what we wanted. I guess what he’s doing now isn’t as glamorous as he thought it would be.”

Zach grinned. “I’d be happy myself for the monotony. Little did I know what I was getting myself into when I came here for a break.”

Marc grinned back. “I can’t believe how well you’re taking all this crap, Zach, with everything you’ve been through.”

“I will say one thing, the Air Force sure prepared me to expect the unexpected.”

“Hah,” Marc muttered, leading Zach toward the van.

A tall guy with dark hair stepped outside and smiled. “Marc.”

Marc said, “Jeff, this is my cousin, Captain Zach Logan.”

“Nice to meet you, Jeff,” Zach said.

“Same here, Captain. Step inside the van if you’d like. I’ll need to take a quick look at your router inside the house, and then I’ll see what I can do.”

“I’ll show you where it’s set up,” Marc said, leading Jeff toward the back door.

When he saw them returning from inside the house, Zach stepped into the van.

“What a setup,” he murmured, when Jeff and Marc were standing beside him. “It looks like a surveillance van.”

Jeff hung his head, clearing his throat. “Ah, well...uh, to tell you the truth...”

“I presume you do some surveillance work on the side? Don’t worry about what I think,” Zach murmured. “We’re the ones asking for help.”

Jeff took a seat in front of a huge computer screen and started typing on a keyboard.

“Hmm,” he finally murmured, while checking something out onscreen. “The connection has to be close. There are about a half dozen other Wi-Fi setups in this neighborhood. But that doesn’t mean anything, if it’s set up in an outbuilding or structure close by. And then there are the tunnels and passages Marc was telling me about, although if it’s part of a network, there would have to be a satellite nearby. It could even be running through someone else’s network without them knowing.”

“What are our options?”

“Unless we can figure out who has what router, you’ll have to jam them all at the same time.”

“There’s not a way we can see whether a mini cam is active or not? I think that’s what they’re using, anyway,” Zach said.

“You want me to see if I can spot anything while I’m hooking up security for your windows?”

Zach shrugged. “Sure. If you think you can do it discreetly?”

“That shouldn’t be a problem. I’ll have to run some wiring upstairs anyway.”

“Let’s do it then,” Marc murmured.

• • • •

A FEW HOURS LATER, all three of them were back in the van looking at a diagram of the cameras Jeff had discovered in the kitchen and the rest of the ground floor.

“I saw four in the kitchen alone but only one in each of the living spaces,” Jeff said, pointing out their locations. “I gather the kitchen is where you spend most of your time?”

“Not as much lately, although we try not to make it obvious,” Marc admitted.

“I’ll work on the second floor this afternoon, and try and finish up for you tomorrow,” Jeff said, sounding reassuring. “I’ll bring along something I think will work for jamming up the signal. I’d rather you would pay me cash for that, for obvious reasons.”

Zach nodded his head. “I understand.”

Jeff hesitated. “Is there a reason you’re not going to the cops about this?”

Zach answered, “We’re not sure why someone is doing this or what they want. I have a feeling if we get the police involved, we won’t get any answers. And if we remove the devices, whoever it is could return and do more than just watch us or eavesdrop, and the situation could become even more dangerous.”

“Makes sense to me,” Jeff answered, nodding his head approvingly. “Alright, I’ll get back to work.”

• • • •

ONE WEEK LATER, ZACH’S truck was loaded, and he was finally ready to get on the road. He’d been withdrawing money in increments from his account in town, and he figured he had enough to last a week for motels and food.

But before he left, Marc handed over five thousand dollars’ worth of traveler’s checks, murmuring, “Pay me back next year when you’re working. This should help you lay low for another six months if you don’t have to pay rent.”

Shaking his head numbly, Zach asked, “Are you sure you can afford this?”

“Puh—leeze,” Marc answered, grinning. “I have a girlfriend who expects nothing and a father and uncle who insist on paying for the renovations and everything having to do with the house, since they claim they would have to hire a caretaker. I save pretty much all I earn.”

“You ought to consider a side business as an architect,” Zach said. “You’ve got your burner phone in a safe place?”

“I do,” Marc answered. “And it’s nice to know there weren’t any cameras in either of our bedrooms and they were only placed at each end of the hallway, monitoring the staircase.”

“Yes, and that explains how whoever it was knew I was climbing the staircase that day. Jeff said the camera had a motion sensor which would just ping on someone’s phone if they set it up.”

“It’s amazing how many eavesdropping devices are out there these days.”

They’d moved the boxes from the closet in increments during three different nights, jamming Wi-Fi signals in the neighborhood for about an hour each time. Zach had left each box at the top of the staircase, and Jeff had come by to assist Marc with loading them up in Zach’s truck since it was difficult for Zach to carry things up and down the staircase because of his injuries.

Zach had packed most of his clothing but had waited to load everything in the truck early this morning before daylight when Jeff had assisted for the final time.

Zach would take his time driving north, since there was no need to be in a hurry. The job in Crystal Rock he’d applied for wouldn’t officially begin until next year. He would make one final trip into New Orleans, leaving the tracking device in the parking lot of the bar and grill he and Marc frequented weekly.

When he wrapped his arms around Marc for a quick bear hug, Zach could tell that Marc was feeling as emotional as he was. They’d become good friends, and Marc would miss Zach as much as Zach would miss him.

As Zach pulled out of the driveway, he glanced into the rearview mirror at Marc, who was waving goodbye, and lifted his hand in farewell.

*Six months later.
Bloomington, Illinois.*

“Marry me, Liz?”

Elizabeth’s jaw dropped. Just when she was ready to leave town, Jim was finally willing to make a commitment...now, after dating her for nearly five years? For a moment, Beth was tempted. She was so tired of being a single parent.

Then she remembered, being married to Jim probably wouldn’t be much of a help as far as that was concerned either.

But she still found herself asking, “What about Kyle?”

Jim hesitated. “I’m sure we can find a place for him to live, as long as we both look hard enough?”

Oh, yeah, Beth thought, as her heart sank lower. Too little, too late. The offer had just been too good to be true. After all, she had a pretty solid reason for deciding to break it off with Jim and starting over somewhere new. She wouldn’t be leaving much behind. These last few years had been...well...interesting, would probably be about the closest word she could think of for describing it. Her son, Kyle, would always be her number one concern, and she’d been telling Jim that from the beginning.

When the announcement had been made, that their plant would be shutting down within the next six months, Beth had been devastated. Diamont Motors had been operating for around twenty-five years in the Bloomington area, and Elizabeth Bowen had been the head accountant at the company for almost fifteen of those years.

But the state of Illinois was going through a major budgetary crisis, and maybe it was time to take a chance, she’d decided, and follow her dreams. Despite the fact Kyle was mentally impaired, and required regular medication to control his behavior problems, she’d managed to put away a tiny little nest egg for the future. And even the financial assistance she received for Kyle’s home services and medication was in jeopardy of being eliminated if the new governor got his way.

So, she was taking the early retirement package which the company she worked for was offering. Now, hopefully, her house would sell, since she’d purchased a huge fixer-upper in the town of Crystal Rock, located in northwest Wisconsin.

Wisconsin was in a little bit better shape financially than Illinois. But the factor that had swayed her most was the new vocational facility which had been built in Crystal Rock for the mentally and physically impaired. Crystal Visions was getting rave reviews, and Beth had had some pull with the center’s founder. Her cousin, Cal Callahan, was Jake Loughlin’s best friend, and had done all the construction work for the privately-owned facility. Jake’s wife, Danielle, had contacted Beth six months ago about beginning the application process for acquiring the funding Kyle needed to enter the program.

Beth sighed, her eyes meeting Jim’s, since he appeared to be anxiously awaiting her answer.

“I just don’t think it would work for us, Jim,” she finally said softly.

Jim looked stunned. “But, Liz?”

And that was another thing that annoyed her, that stupid nickname of Liz. She couldn’t remember how many times she’d mentioned it to Jim, during the last five years they’d been dating. He never seemed to listen to anything she said. If she hadn’t been such a coward, she would have broken it off with him a long time ago. She'd just been lonely, she'd realized, and had wanted some extra companionship, as well as someone to hold her at night sometimes.

It was difficult going out with friends because of her situation with her son, but Jim would come over to her house on the weekends to watch baseball, football or basketball, depending on the season. She'd cook and...well, that was about it. Jim would just sit on the couch and watch TV, while he drank a few beers and ate. She and her son would either hang out in the kitchen, since Kyle loved anything to do with food, or go outside, or into the basement, where Kyle would play with his toys.

Anything, really, to stay out of Jim's way.

Inwardly, she sighed. Come to think of it, maybe she was escaping just in time.

"We talked about you moving with me to Wisconsin, remember? You said you weren't interested."

He shrugged. "Well, since I had that job offer from Stan's Automotive, I thought you'd rather stay here in town, and move in with me." Jim cleared his throat, looking uncomfortable. "After we found somewhere for Kyle to live first, that is."

No way. She was definitely doing the right thing by starting over. Beth was almost relieved now, when she said to him, "I know it's a job, Jim. But you'll barely be making minimum wage, and you won't have any benefits or a retirement plan like you've had at the car plant."

Although he drove an expensive truck and owned his house, Jim already liked to live above his means, and judging by the thick book of payment stubs she'd seen on his desk, the truck wasn't even close to being paid off. Beth was pretty sure he wasn't putting any money back into his house, because it had definitely needed a new roof for a while now. He'd never really let her in on the state of his finances, but she had a sneaking suspicion that Jim was gambling a bunch of his money away, too.

Beth hesitated. "You know how important it is for me to get Kyle into this vocational program? I have to go north."

"Yeah, I guess. But there's still gotta be a place you can get him into around here, isn't there?"

She sighed. Nope, Jim never paid any attention to what she had to say, did he? How many times had she mentioned to him that the waiting list for a facility equipped to handle someone with Kyle's disabilities was over twenty years in Illinois? Illinois was at the bottom of the ranks when it came to human services. That's why the governor's quest to cut the budget for the most vulnerable and dependent individuals in Illinois was basically pretty heartless, as far as Beth was concerned.

But enough of that.

"No, there isn't anywhere, Jim. Believe me, I've looked into it. I don't want to live in Bloomington anymore, either."

How many businesses had closed their doors during the last few years? When her dad had been transferred to the main branch of his insurance company here in Bloomington, and Beth had been forced to move here in the eighties, the town had appeared to be stuck in the middle of a corn field. The area had grown and prospered, until all of a sudden, the economy had declined because of the state budgetary crisis, which had been developing during the last ten years. Although she had a lot of friends here, Beth had never really liked this town. It was kind of unbelievable to think that she'd remained here, even after her parents had retired and moved away.

"I'm still pretty sure you could find a better job than with Stan's Automotive, if you moved somewhere else," Beth murmured.

Jim appeared hesitant when he shook his head no. There was no doubt about it, he was afraid of change. He wasn't a bad-looking guy, with dark brown hair that was graying at the temples and warm hazel eyes. Maybe he wasn't as thin as he used to be? But heck, for someone approaching fifty, he still looked pretty damned good.

But as far as anything special between them?

Nah, not really. And there hadn't been any genuine spark between Beth and Kyle's father either. Come to think of it, there had never really been any special guy in her life. Kind of sad, considering she'd just had her forty-fifth birthday the week before.

Jim hadn't even remembered. And what did that say about their so-called relationship?

Yes, Beth was even more relieved, now that Jim had decided he wasn't coming along with her. It saved her the trouble of having to tell him that she didn't really want him moving along with her to Crystal Rock, anyway.

But it would probably hurt his feelings if she came straight out and told him to his face.

Two weeks later, Beth was pulling off the highway and slowly driving into the town of Crystal Rock in her SUV. At least Kyle had been content during the entire eight-hour drive. They'd made a few pit stops to use the restrooms, and after purchasing fast food, she'd pulled into the parking lot of a scenic rest area, so they could stretch their legs and eat.

It had been years since she'd taken a trip with Kyle, because of his behavior problems. In fact, she'd purchased the SUV immediately after he'd hit her so hard on the head, she'd nearly run the car she was driving off the road. Beth had owned a four-door sedan back then, and Kyle had always sat right behind her. Now, at least, he was settled far enough away from her in the backseat to allow for some reaction time for her to prepare for the worst.

Beth peeked through the windshield excitedly as they drove through the center of town. When she glanced at Kyle in the rear-view mirror, his deep blue eyes were as big as saucers as he stared at the Christmas decorations lining the streets. It was two weeks before Christmas, and an awful time of the year for the car plant to be closing, she thought for about the millionth time since it had been announced. But at least the long-time employees had been offered early retirement benefits, along with decent compensation packages.

Beth had only seen pictures of the house before purchasing it online. She'd depended on her cousin, Cal, who'd checked it out thoroughly beforehand. Callahan Construction had been working on the demolition work for the past four months, so that Beth would be able to complete the finish work on her own. She'd learned a lot about remodeling from all the updates she'd done on her house in Bloomington, after purchasing it twelve years ago.

Hopefully, the house in Bloomington would sell, because she really needed the proceeds to complete all the projects that needed to be completed in this house. It was four times the size of the property she'd owned in Illinois. But she hadn't been able to resist, because according to Cal, the price Beth had paid was a steal. Although her former home was located in what was considered a prime area of Bloomington, the real estate market just wasn't what it used to be, because of the economy.

Beth glanced at her watch. Even though she had the address logged into her GPS, she was still supposed to meet Cal at his office in about an hour, so he'd be able to take her directly to the house and show her around. Maybe she'd give him a call to see if he was already waiting? But looking back at Kyle, who was obviously excited, she decided to take a drive around the lake instead.

Crystal Rock was her mother's home town. But once the family had moved from Bloomington to Arizona, her mom and dad and two younger sisters hadn't visited here much. Since Beth had remained in Bloomington after graduating from Illinois State, she'd never made it back here at all. The members of each branch of the family still managed to remain close though, and Beth's cousins had flown out several times to Phoenix, where her parents had continued to reside, even after they'd retired.

It was rather amazing she still remembered how to get to the lake, Beth thought, as she followed the access road leading toward Dragonfly Pointe. The last time she'd been here was back in the eighties, when she'd been around sixteen-years old.

Oh, my God, she thought, stretching up in her seat as she and Kyle drove by the Dragonfly Pointe Inn. It was everything she'd heard it had become, but a heck of a lot more, Beth realized, staring in shock through the passenger window. The last time she'd been in Crystal Rock, the inn had been about one quarter of the size it was now. And it had been literally falling apart, nearly ready for demolition.

The Dragonfly Pointe Inn rose majestically above the lake, amidst a backdrop of towering pines. Now, with its columns and crisp white siding, it looked stately, magnificent really.

Turning her attention back on the road, Beth managed to jerk the wheel of the SUV just in time, as she came only inches away from running down a floppy-eared dog, wandering along the edge of the road.

"Damn," she muttered under her breath. He looked to be a Bassett hound. Well, partly, anyway. Led on a leash by a jogger, who was running on the gravel bordering the side of the road, the dog scrambled over the blacktop.

When she began to slow down, the man lifted his hand in acknowledgement, while continuing to keep pace with the dog.

Relieved, Beth blew out a long deep breath as she kept on driving. Hopefully, she was going in the right direction?

Yeah, she was, she discovered, because soon she was pulling the SUV off the road and into the parking lot of the deserted Dragonfly Pointe Beach.

She'd always loved this place. Beth had lots of great memories from spending summers here with her cousins. And despite the fact that she'd never actually lived here, the town of Crystal Rock had been the only place in her entire life that had ever felt like home.

She turned to Kyle, who was looking hopeful, with his endearing smile and big blue eyes. Kyle had just turned twenty, but he'd always been a handful, particularly after outgrowing Beth by several inches. Although he'd had some increased behavior problems associated with puberty, Beth considered herself fortunate compared to some of the other parents she'd met. Many of Kyle's classmates had much more severe problems than he'd had. Kyle's temper had always been relatively manageable, even though she'd eventually given in, putting him on medication during his teenage years for the sake of his teachers and caregivers.

Ah, what the heck? It was a crisp cool day, and a little fresh air would be good for them both after the long drive. Why not just go for a short walk along the beach?

Bundling herself up into her winter coat and slipping her earmuffs over her ears, Beth hopped out from the van, sliding open the passenger door behind her.

"Put your coat back on, sweetie," she said, smiling at Kyle.

Kyle grinned, slipping into his coat, and pulling his hat on over his head.

Reaching over, she yanked the stocking cap down over his ears, before zipping his coat up to his chin, and then pulling his hood over his head, Beth tied it securely.

Definitely excited, Kyle began to giggle.

Probably because he was already thinking about when he was going to be able to sneak that hood off from his head, Beth thought, grinning and reaching for Kyle's hand.

As they headed toward the beach, peaceful contentment invaded her senses once she and Kyle began making their way across the crunchy sand. The air was crisp, but Beth had been told that it wasn't nearly as cold as it usually was at this time of the year, because Cal and his crew had been able to work around the clock at her new house. Normally, the lake would have been completely iced up at this time of the year, but with the breeze blowing in across the lake, choppy waves crashed over the sand.

When she let loose of Kyle's hand, he began running immediately beside the edge of the water. Obviously delighted, he laughed harder, and harder still, as he rushed down the length of the beach.

Yep, this place still seemed magical, Beth thought, closing her eyes. The soothing sound of the pounding waves along with the haunting squalling of the gulls infused her senses. She breathed in the crisp cool air. It smelled so fresh.

Tipping her face toward the sun, she felt exactly like she'd felt vacationing here as a kid.

Happy and at peace.

All of a sudden, someone grunted loudly, and soon, the next moan Beth heard was accompanied by a long soulful howl.

Opening her eyes, she spun around and searched the vast expanse of beach.

Finally, she spotted him. "Kyle. What have you done?"

Covering her mouth with a hand in horror, Beth began running across the sand, rushing over as quickly as she could toward Kyle.

Apparently, he'd tackled someone, and sitting on top of a flat prone body, Kyle was giggling with a stranger laying beneath him, leveled on the sand.

The man's faithful friend was obviously alarmed, because he began cleaning the man's face frantically with his tongue. Damn it, she inwardly swore. It was the same do she'd nearly run down in the SUV only a few minutes earlier.

Zach sputtered and spit when Emily began licking his mouth and beard, after cleaning the rest of his face first. “Okay, Em, you can just quit that right now. I’m fine,” he muttered at the dog reassuringly.

And then as a shadow fell over Zach from above, a woman began talking to him in a breathless voice. “Oh, I’m so sorry! I’ve never seen Kyle do anything like this before. Although he does like to watch football sometimes...”

Her voice was so soft and sexy, was the first thing Zach thought. He’d been jogging along the beach, trying to decide whether to steer clear of her or stop by and say hi. And then he’d been ambushed by what had felt like a tank.

Zach opened his eyes and looked up to try and see the woman who belonged to that voice. But his eyes were blinded by the sun, and he was seeing double.

His eyesight seemed to be adjusting a little better by the time he got a hold of himself.

And then he was able to focus on her face. Damn, I think I’m in love, was the second thing he thought. He hadn’t had a real good look at her through the windshield of the van earlier, although it had been long enough to notice she appeared to be pretty damned hot.

And, whoa, he admitted to himself dazedly, hot didn’t even begin to describe how lovely she was.

Zach started, turning his attention on the kid who was giggling like crazy, using Zach’s body like a beanbag chair.

But he really wasn’t a kid, was he? He looked to be a little bigger than Zach had thought when he’d first set eyes on him. This woman was his mom? Must be, he supposed, because she grabbed the boy by his hand and yanked him off Zach’s chest. She just didn’t look old enough to have a kid who was probably in his late teens or early twenties.

The woman continued holding the boy’s hand. He was nearly a foot taller than her, but she seemed to have him under control.

Grimacing and biting her lip, she bent down and began looking Zach over. “Are you sure you’re alright? I’d like to help you up, but I’m afraid if I let Kyle go, he might jump on top of you again.”

Zach blinked and shook his head in confusion. And then he began to laugh, because he just couldn’t help it. The situation was pretty damned ridiculous.

A smile began to tug at the corner of the woman’s mouth, before she was laughing along with Zach.

And then Emily stuck her snout into the air and began to howl.

When her kid began giggling again, the woman rolled her eyes upward.

Finally, their laughter subsided into awkward silence.

Zach was shaking his head numbly, when he slowly sat upright from the sand.

Yep, she was really lovely, Zach thought, once he finally stood on his feet. She had deep blue eyes and shoulder-length, white-blond hair. Maybe she was a little older than he’d thought at first? But, wow, he loved the way she laughed, soft, slow and kind of breathless, and the way she smiled, like the sun was coming up after one of his long restless nights.

Zach shook his head dazedly, because everything about this woman seemed to be turning him on.

And when Zach looked into her eyes, he was feeling something that he’d never felt before. Something that he’d never thought he was capable of feeling.

Ever.

What was wrong with her? This man, this stranger, was doing something really crazy to her insides, and her heart was thumping madly in her chest when her eyes met his.

And what beautiful brown eyes they were, with flecks of gold, but warm and creamy like melted chocolate. Usually, she didn't care much for facial hair. But, on him, that neatly trimmed beard and mustache somehow looked right.

When was the last time she'd ever felt tongue-tied around a man?

She shook her head numbly. Never! This was silly, the guy was young. He had to be at least ten years younger than her.

Taking in a deep breath while attempting to regain her normally rational sensibilities, Beth stuck out her hand, introducing herself. "I'm Beth Bowen."

When his hand clasped hers firmly, Beth sucked in an unsteady breath, when a jolt of awareness shot through her senses.

"Zachary Logan. Nice to meet you Beth," he said, in a smooth southern drawl, while staring deeply into her eyes. "And this is Emily," he added, nodding at the dog.

Even his voice sent shivers down her spine. She couldn't believe all the things she was thinking about, as she looked Zach over slowly. Although he was wearing a scraggly hooded sweatshirt, she could tell his shoulders were broad, and his hips were narrow. Just the way he stood there before her, seemingly relaxed, made him look so sexy.

She blinked. Get a hold of yourself, Beth.

She searched for something else to say. "Uh...this is my son, Kyle."

Even to herself, she sounded rather breathless.

Reaching for Kyle's hand, Zach shook it firmly.

Kyle gave Zach a huge smile, but when Kyle acted like he was ready to pounce on Zach again, Beth took a firmer grip of his hand.

"I'll bet Kyle's going to be included in the program at Crystal Visions?" Zach asked.

"Yeah," Beth answered, somewhat surprised. "He sure is."

Zach grinned.

Uh, oh, Beth thought as her heart began beating irregularly again.

"I work there part-time," Zach admitted.

Beth's eyes went wide. "Wow, that's some coincidence."

Zach nodded his head in obvious agreement. "For sure. But it's a small town, especially in the winter when a lot of the resorts are closed."

Zach looked at Kyle. "I definitely know a few kids who are going to be really happy to meet you, Kyle."

Beth smiled at her son.

"I'm glad to hear that," Beth said, turning back to Zach. "I know that the program is only a couple of years old, and there's not a whole lot of funding available for too many kids to be enrolled right now."

Zach shook his head up and down slowly, giving her a seemingly uncertain smile.

She searched for something else to say. Beth still couldn't believe she was tongue-tied. It was really kind of crazy, considering she'd always been a rather talkative person.

Even around great looking guys.

But the weird thing about it was, as he continued to stare into her eyes, Zach appeared to be searching for something to say to her as well.

He hesitated, looking first at Kyle and then at her. “Well, I should probably get moving, before my muscles begin tightening up.”

Bending down, he picked up Emily’s leash.

Suddenly startled from her silence, Beth checked the time on her watch. “Oh, man. We’re running a little late now, too.”

She looked at Zach and grimaced. “Are you sure you’re alright? You look like you might be limping a little.”

“Yeah, I’m fine. Previous injury,” he answered, sounding rather gruff. “I’ll walk you guys on up to your vehicle. I don’t live too far away from here.”

Beth smiled at Zach, before they all made their way across the sand toward the parking lot.

• • • •

AFTER WALKING WITH Beth and Kyle and delivering them to their SUV, Zach continued jogging with Emily across the road and down the path leading to the guesthouse he was still living in, which belonged to Luke.

And here Zach was now, fifteen months later, feeling not quite as whole as he’d been expecting a year ago, when he’d been released from the hospital and traveled to New Orleans. Luke had said he was welcome in the guesthouse for as long as he wanted to stay. But now that Zach had decided to make Crystal Rock his permanent home, he wanted to get his belongings out of storage, so he’d begun searching for somewhere else to live.

Besides, Luke would be getting married soon, and once the weather became warmer, Luke and Kelly might want to use the in-ground pool, which was situated near the guesthouse, for some romantic time alone together.

Zach grinned at the thought, stepping out from the shower, until he caught a glimpse of himself in the mirror across the room. Studying the puckering scars and the mangled skin covering much of his torso, along with the skin over his lower back and buttocks, his frown was fierce as he stared at his naked body in the mirror. The first of the new series of skin graft operations had begun, not so much to make his appearance presentable, but to increase the flexibility of his skin while hopefully decreasing the amount of pain and discomfort in the future. There was a lot of heavy scar tissue covering his torso and upper arm, along with some more extensive scarring running down one of his thighs.

What in the hell had he been thinking, earlier today? Sure, the burns only covered about twenty percent of his body. It could have been a heck of a lot worse. Although there was still a lot of scarring covering his neck and the underside of his chin, his face had been saved.

But looking at himself in the mirror, he couldn’t help thinking what female would even want him, the way he looked now? His chest was a mess, all wrinkled and mangled, with the hair on his chest beginning to grow back in spotty patches. And one of his nipples was barely recognizable. He couldn’t even stand looking at himself. What had made him think he could ever expose any woman to the horror of his naked body, the way it was right now?

“Quit feeling sorry for yourself, you idiot,” he muttered out loud. “Luke lost his limb saving your life, and his burns were a hell of a lot worse than yours. You don’t see him feeling sorry for himself.”

Zach smiled wryly, still staring at himself in the mirror. At least his anatomy was still in working order.

But what kind of woman would ever want to make love to a guy like him?

He inhaled a long deep breath. Beth? Something weird had happened to him, when he'd seen her standing alone and isolated on the beach at Dragonfly Pointe. She'd reminded him a little of himself, at peace, but not quite whole, as if she was searching for something elusive, something...

Hmm. Zach supposed unspoken would be the right word to call what was definitely undefinable.

What a chore it must be, raising that kid of hers. The dedication, the time involved was inconceivable.

He began getting dressed as he thought about Kyle. After pulling on some sweats, he hesitated, before tugging a t-shirt on over his head. Could this, by any chance, be the new kid from Crystal Visions Zach was supposed to be working with in the new year?

He smiled wryly. Maybe. Zach had been training since the fall as a volunteer at the school, to get the feel of things, and now he was supposed to become a personal assistant for one of the kids during the day. Supposedly, the kid was entering the vocational program, and was slated to begin working at Callahan Construction with Zach, come spring.

Zach began whistling as he made his way into the kitchen to feed Em and begin cooking dinner. He knew it was stupid to be thinking like this, especially since they'd just met. But the idea of having an actual excuse to keep in touch with Beth Bowen was making him happier than he'd felt in a long, long time.

Beth had tears in her eyes when she said, “It’s beautiful, Cal.”

They’d just taken a tour of her nearly remodeled four-story home which overlooked Stone lake.

“It’s a lot of house,” Cal answered, smiling.

Sometime during their walk, he’d grabbed Kyle’s hand and was keeping him in line for Beth with hardly any effort. She could count on one hand the number of times Jim had attempted to help her with Kyle. In fact, he’d downright avoided it, even when she’d obviously had her hands full on the weekend after working all week, catching up on chores around the house while cooking for him.

She hesitated, as her eyes searched the kitchen, which was still completely unfinished. “I hate to point out the obvious, but I was really counting on moving in here right away.”

Cal’s smile became wider, waving at the back door. “Ah, I know. But it’s time to show you the surprise that I mentioned, when I was talking with you on the phone last night.”

Opening the door, she walked outside onto the porch.

Cal asked loudly, “See that house that’s lit up over there, extending over the top of the boathouse?”

Her eyes went wide when she turned to stare at Cal. “That’s the rental house? The one that you told me would bring in a little extra income every month? It’s huge!”

Cal began to laugh. “And completely finished. The main house here should be move-in ready within two or three months, and you and Kyle won’t have to live amidst construction.”

“Oh, Cal. I expected some dinky little one-bedroom house, when you talked about a rental.”

Cal murmured, “There are three bedrooms, and it even has a basement. The family room extends over the lake, so Kyle should get a real kick out of it. It used to be another vacation property before the homeowners decided to buy the house, so they’d have more privacy. Then the next owners tried to turn the entire place into an inn, while they lived in the house next door.” He shrugged. “But that went belly up twenty years ago, before Jake Loughlin remodeled the Dragonfly Inn, making this town a prime vacationing spot again.”

Still staring at the rental, Beth nodded her approval. It looked so cute, clad in the same light green siding she’d chosen for the main house. “So it’s move-in ready?”

He nodded yes. “I know I switched up your directions a little.” Cal grimaced. “I just thought – why not have the rental house ready to go, so you can rent it out as soon as you move into the main house? Then you can use the extra money you make for additional improvements here, in case your house in Bloomington doesn’t sell right away.”

“I couldn’t be happier.” Beth grinned. “I’d hug you right now, if you weren’t still holding onto Kyle. I’ll admit, I’m starting to feel pretty worn out from that drive, and it’s nice to have a little help with him.”

Still holding onto Kyle’s hand, Cal laughed again as he led him through the doorway and onto the porch. “Well, come on then. Let’s get you two settled in.”

Beth laughed along with Cal, following him and Kyle down the steps from the porch and along the path.

SHE AND KYLE WERE SETTling in nicely, Beth decided, as she stood sipping coffee in the family room. It had been nearly a week now since they'd arrived in town. Preparing for their move into the main house in February, she'd only unpacked winter clothes, along with the bare necessities. The last few days they'd been decorating for Christmas, and after they attended the party they'd been invited to at the Dragonfly Pointe Inn this afternoon, she and Kyle would go pick out a Christmas tree at a farm nearby.

This second house on her property was nearly as big as her home in Bloomington, and even though she hadn't had any input about the remodeling of this home, she wouldn't have done anything differently than Cal had done, Beth had reassured him. Cal had wanted to surprise her, and he'd been hoping he had a good enough grasp about her design and color choices to make her happy with the results.

Located above the boathouse, the family room's three outer walls were encased in thermal glass, and a gas fireplace, which had been tiled in shades of blue and seafoam glass, gave extra warmth to the room despite its vaulted ceiling.

And what a view, she thought, staring across the lake through the glass. In fact, Beth had loved this room so much that Cal would be creating a similar space in a lakefront addition at the main house, after gutting the sorely neglected porch.

Snow was in the forecast and was beginning to trickle down across the semi-frozen lake. Beth had mounted a bird feeder outside of the family room on a sturdy oak. Preparing for the harsher weather coming in, blue jays and sparrows were battling over the seed, and a couple of squirrels scampered along the branches of the tree, patiently awaiting their chance to dig into the seed once the birds were finished.

Beth grinned. Kyle was unusually animated because of all the visual stimulation and his nose was pressed against the glass. She kind of hated to leave the house today because of the weather. But she'd only made it into town a few times this past week. She and Kyle had eaten dinner with the Callahan family, before Beth had driven to the store and stocked up on groceries while Cal and his wife, Jenny, had kept an eye on Kyle. Beth was able to make short trips to the grocery store with Kyle, but if she had more than a few items to buy, Kyle would invariably misbehave because of his short attention span and he'd become disruptive by grabbing other items from the shelves, or trying to leave before Beth had a chance to pay for her groceries.

"Okay, kid." Beth smiled at Kyle. "Are you ready to go to a party, and make some new friends? You're going to get to meet all your new teachers, and some of the kids you'll be going to school with."

Kyle was definitely becoming excited when he smiled at her before waving his arms and jumping up and down.

Zach was holding his breath. According to the school administrators, she was probably coming to the party with her son today, so he'd been watching everyone coming through the doorway leading into the solarium for at least a half an hour now. He just hadn't been able to help it. Zach hadn't stopped thinking about Beth Bowen since they'd met.

He hadn't had a reaction like this to a woman since...

Zach blinked, startled to realize the answer was never.

Dazedly shaking his head, he scolded himself. Quit being such an idiot!

Taking in a deep steadying breath, Zach turned, resuming his conversation with friends. Luke had an arm wrapped around his fiancé, Kelly, and he was wearing a huge smile on his face as he glanced around the room.

After losing a limb in Iraq, Luke had somehow survived burns covering sixty percent of his body. But he'd undergone several surgeries to remove scar tissue and regenerate his skin. The number of operations Zach would require wouldn't even come close to the number Luke would need.

Looking at how well Luke had adjusted after so many debilitating injuries, Zach was suddenly ashamed of himself for the way he'd been behaving. He'd always been kind of a loner, but during this past year, he'd avoided going anywhere in public. Plus, he hated to admit it, but he'd been suffering through some pretty deep bouts of depression too.

But that's why he'd moved to Crystal Rock, at Luke's suggestion. It was a great town, and with the new wounded warrior facility about to open, Zach had finally begun sessions with the psychologist, who'd be in charge of the head-shrinking aspects of the program, while a rotation of doctors would be in and out of the clinic on a weekly basis to take care of the patients' medical issues.

Kelly asked, "Have you finished shopping for everything you're going to need for your new office, Zach?"

Zach had been picking up office supplies, even discovering a massive oak desk at a second hand furniture store which Kelly's father, Cal, had recommended. The construction of the wounded warrior facility would be completed sometime during the next month, and everyone working there had agreed to pick up their own supplies and furnishings, since the facility's funding was still somewhat limited.

"I think I've found pretty much everything I'm going to need, Kel. I might have to pick up a filing cabinet eventually, though."

"I'll be on the lookout for something you might be able to use," Kelly murmured.

Zach continued, "Thanks again for letting me store everything in your garage."

"Not a problem," Kelly answered.

Luke squeezed Kelly with the arm he still had wrapped over her shoulders.

Zach couldn't get over how lucky Luke was to have found someone who seemed to understand him so well. Plus, somehow, Luke had become engaged to the most incredibly beautiful woman Zach had ever seen. Well, she'd been a model, he'd heard, and she was tall and thin, with white-blonde hair.

In fact, she reminded him a little of Beth Bowen, Zach thought suddenly, although Kelly was quite a bit younger. But, wow, what Zach would give, to have a woman look at him the way Kelly looked at Luke. Sometimes, it kind of took his breath away.

Especially since Luke had never exactly been considered handsome, even before his injuries.

Zach grinned at Kelly, scratching his chin. "I don't get it," he said, turning to stare at Luke. "What do you see in this guy?"

Luke barked out a laugh, rolling his eyes upward.

"I was never able to help myself." Kelly's smile was definitely wry, when she answered Zach.

Gazing at Luke, she continued softly, "And it's been that way ever since I can remember."

Her feelings were obviously mutual, because Luke gave Kelly a tender smile, pulling her a little closer to his side.

"There she is," Kelly said, staring at the door and waving her hand in the air.

Turning and glancing at the woman waving back, Zach started. Kelly had been waiting for Beth?

Beth smiled, and tugging on Kyle's hand, she began making her way through the crowd.

But obviously noticing him, she hesitated for a moment before coming closer.

Hmm. What did that mean, Zach wondered? And what the heck was wrong with him? He was having the same kind of stupid reaction that he'd had when he'd met her the other day.

But, whoa. She really looked lovely today, wearing a furry white coat, with matching earmuffs and tall boots that nearly covered her knees.

Kyle had on his bulky parka again. He sure was a good-looking kid, and although he towered over his mom, since he was about six-foot two, he looked just like her, with white-blond hair and big blue eyes.

After Beth and Kyle managed to make their way through the crowd and were finally standing beside them, Kelly smiled, reaching for Kyle's hand. "Hi, Kyle."

Kelly motioned at Zach. "Zach, I'd like for you to meet my cousin, Beth. She'll be taking over the accounts at Callahan Construction after the first of the year. And this is her son, Kyle."

Zach and Beth answered in unison, "We've met."

Zach smiled sheepishly at Beth.

Kelly's gaze was definitely speculative when she looked at Zach. "Really?"

Zach frowned at Luke, who was grinning and rolling his eyes upward.

But then Beth spoke, in that breathless voice of hers, and it started doing all kinds of crazy things to his insides again. "The first day I arrived in town, I drove over to the beach at Dragonfly Pointe, to check things out, since I used to spend a lot of time there as a kid."

"And I was taking a jog with Em along the beach," Zach cleared his throat, "when I got run over by a tank."

Luke and Kelly were both visibly curious, so Zach looked at Beth and grinned.

"The tank was Kyle." Beth grimaced. "He knocked Zach off his feet to the sand and sat right down on top of him." She rolled her eyes. "I think he was trying to say hi."

Kelly snickered, staring at Luke, who blinked and snorted before they both began laughing loudly.

Shaking his head at Beth, who was smiling widely, Zach grinned wryly, turning to Kyle. "Guess what, Kyle? I'm actually going to be the one working with you, when you begin the program at Crystal Visions."

Beth started. "Really?"

Zach nodded his agreement, looking deeply into her eyes. They were a sapphire blue, with silvery flecks, and even more beautiful than he remembered. Just as he was about to say something more, Jake Loughlin's voice shot out from across the room, and everyone began taking their seats at the rows of tables which had been set up inside the solarium.

Kelly was obviously manipulating the situation, Zach noticed, because he found himself seated next to Beth. Kyle sat between him and Luke, while Kelly took the chair next to Luke near the end of the table.

When Beth slowly tugged off her coat, Zach's breath began to seize. She was wearing a creamy silk blouse tucked into jeans riding low on her hips, and looked to be as thin as Kelly, who was probably nearly half her age.

And, yes, Beth's figure was just as...

Stop it, Zach thought to himself, shaking his head dazedly.

But Beth looked younger than he was, Zach thought, definitely no older than thirty. Although he'd ticked off the numbers in his head when he'd first met her, Zach had been a little shocked to discover she was actually forty-five, after he'd received Kyle's academic files and history this past week.

Zach had been reassured because Beth was only eight years older than him.

It was no big deal.

Zach started, squirming in his seat. What the hell was he thinking now?

"Even though I know there's a coat check in the lobby," she said, giving Zach a smile. "I like to hang onto our coats, just in case Kyle begins acting up."

Zach nodded agreeably.

She hung her coat over the back of her chair, before helping Kyle remove his.

The servers began handing out food at the table, and quiet murmurs echoed throughout the room while everyone ate. With a five-star rating, the Dragonfly Pointe Inn had one of the most popular restaurants in northwest Wisconsin.

"This is delicious," Beth said, as she forked another bite of ravioli.

"Hamburgers even taste like steak here," Zach answered, with a grin.

The school's planning committee had gone with simple fare today. Many of the kids who were here had disabilities and required some assistance while eating.

Soon the kids were gathering around the huge Christmas tree, because Santa had arrived with presents for each and every one of them.

Kyle had a huge smile of excitement on his face, and Zach watched him closely. He got along well with the other kids, which was a very good thing since many of the other mentally impaired kids from the school sometimes remained isolated, and had difficulties interacting with others. But Kyle seemed to be unusually outgoing.

Unless he tried to pull a stunt like he had the other day, when he'd jumped on top of Zach.

Zach smiled wryly, as Kyle began opening his gift. Zach would have to keep an eye on Kyle to prevent anything similar happening in public and especially at school. Kyle was big, and kind of muscular, while a lot of these other kids were much smaller, and more vulnerable, and some could easily be hurt.

"Oh, wow." Beth bent over to take a look at the digitalized keyboard Kyle was unwrapping with Zach's help. "Isn't that nice? Someone must have known about Kyle's interest in music."

Zach smiled sheepishly.

"You?" Beth gave him a huge smile, and Zach's heart began hammering hard against his chest.

Again. It had been beating at an irregular pace the entire afternoon.

"Most of us who work at the school donate the gifts for the exchange. The keyboard's got a built-in radio too." He gave her a wry grin. "I figured I might as well give him a gift that was useful, in case he never learned how to play it."

Her laughter sounded like music in his ears.

The party was beginning to wind down, when Luke and Kelly finally approached them to say their goodbyes.

“You guys need to come over for dinner sometime and see our place. It’s pretty cool,” Kelly said. “We live right on Dragonfly Pointe.”

“We’d love to.” Beth grimaced. “Are you sure you can handle us?”

Beth was watching him with Kyle, and a beautiful smile suddenly lit up her face.

Zach was trying, with difficulty, to concentrate on what he was doing. He’d managed to find a plug in for the adapter of the keyboard nearby, and Kyle was busy running his fingers over the keys. Zach sucked in a deep breath and began playing a simple tune for Kyle.

Kelly answered Beth with reassurance. “Of course, we can!”

“We’re family,” Luke said to Beth. “If you can’t turn to people like us for help with Kyle, who can you turn to?”

Kyle was smiling widely at Zach while Zach continued playing Jingle Bells.

But Zach was listening intently to the conversation Beth was having with Luke and Kelly.

“I was going to have the tree delivered tomorrow. Your dad told me about the tree farm nearby, so Kyle and I are going to drive out there, when we’re finished here today.”

Since Kyle wanted to try to play the tune himself, Zach handed over the keyboard before standing up and joining in the conversation.

“Well, I’ve got a truck. I could load up the tree for you today, so you could begin decorating it tonight, if you’d like?”

After Zach said it, he couldn’t believe the words had come out of his mouth.

Luke looked a little surprised himself.

Kelly smiled broadly, giving Zach that speculative look again when she added, “And Zach could drive you out to the farm. The roads leading out there aren’t very well marked.”

Beth looked hesitant, turning to Zach. “Are you sure you don’t mind? You’ve already devoted the entire afternoon to Kyle, as it is.”

“Nah,” Zach answered, giving her a wry smile.

“Well then, come on Kyle,” Beth said, reaching down and tugging Kyle to his feet. “Zach won’t let anyone walk off with that keyboard,” she added, when Kyle tried to pick it up and take it with him.

“I’ll keep an eye on it, Kyle,” Zach murmured, wearing a smile.

Beth grinned at Zach. “Let’s go meet a couple more of the teachers and say thank you to the Loughlins for everything they’ve done for us.”

Beth clasped Kyle’s hand as they began strolling through the room.

A few moments later, Zach glanced furtively at Beth and Kyle, making sure that they were far enough away before turning to Luke.

“Alright,” Zach muttered, grimacing. “You’d better tell me quick. Where’s that Christmas tree farm?”

Luke barked out a laugh as Kelly began giggling.

• • • •

“SHE’S A LOT OLDER THAN him.” Luke glanced at Kelly, where she sat behind the wheel of the truck as they made their way home from the Dragonfly Pointe Inn. Their house was only a skip and a jump away, but with the snow coming down hard, Kelly hadn’t wanted Luke to risk the chance of slipping while he was wearing his prosthetic. He hadn’t had much practice walking with his artificial limb in these kinds of conditions yet.

“Not that much, Luke,” Kelly said, peering through the windshield. “He’s definitely attracted to her. And besides, when was the last time you saw him with a woman?”

Luke watched through the window as Kelly slowed down, after the truck began sliding across some patchy ice.

He frowned. "They'd better get some salt on these roads, soon."

Luke became thoughtful. "Let's see...the last time I saw Zach with a girl?" Luke became somewhat grim. "Probably back in Madison, before we went off on that final mission."

Kelly nodded, carefully turning the truck into the driveway and steering along the incline toward the garage. "He just seems so lonely."

Absentmindedly, Zach pressed the button for the remote of the garage door opener, hooked over the visor above. "He's always been a magnet for women, you know. Even now, although he doesn't really see it."

Kelly slowly pulled the truck into the garage.

When she shut down the engine, she turned in her seat and looked hard at Luke. "You know, he doesn't let anyone see those scars. He's so self-conscious. If he continues like this, I doubt if he'll ever let any woman get close to him again."

Luke grimaced. "Yes, I think you're right. Even though I had the scars, with me, it was all about the missing leg."

She nodded her agreement. "But you eventually accepted it. You've had an equal amount of time to adjust. It seems to me that it's time for Zach to move forward and accept himself for who he is now. After all, you finally did, Luke."

"But that was different, babe," Luke said softly, staring into Kelly's eyes. "I had you."

"That's what it is exactly, Luke" she said quietly, reaching over and squeezing his hand. "Beth wouldn't care about Zach's scars. She's the kind of woman who'd fall in love with a guy for who he is inside." Her smile was tender when she gazed into his eyes. "And nothing else would matter."

God, he was so good-looking, was the first thing she'd thought, when she'd first laid eyes on him again. The second thing she'd thought about was how good he smelled.

And inwardly, she'd smiled. There was something really strange about the fact that she loved his scent. Was it his soap or cologne? What would he think if he knew she'd been dreaming about him every single night since the day they'd met?

Beth frowned. It was kind of warm in the room. But for some strange reason, Zach seemed to be overly dressed and bundled up, wearing a gray fleece pullover, with a high zipped collar covering his neck. She noticed he looked slightly uncomfortable, tugging at his collar as he talked with one of the school administrators.

The three of them stuck around the inn for another thirty minutes after Kelly and Luke took off, and Beth had some difficulty separating Kyle from the keyboard when it was time to depart. It was strange, maybe she was just imagining it? But Kyle seemed to be making lots of sense with his choice of keys when he was playing. His fiddling around almost sounded like actual music.

"You can play with it again as soon as we get home, Kyle," Beth said.

Kyle had struggled a bit with Zach, when he'd attempted to slide the keyboard back into its box.

Looking slightly uncertain, Kyle stood up on his feet.

"How about we go and pick out a Christmas tree?" Beth asked.

Kyle began jumping up and down, ready to be on the move again.

Once Beth had managed to bundle him up into his winter coat, Kyle was giggling uncontrollably by the time they were trudging through the snow into the parking lot.

Zach hesitated. "So, where are you guys living?"

"On Stone Lake," Beth answered.

"We'll be going north to the farm," Zach said, glancing at the sky. "Looks like the weather's eased up a little, for now. Why don't you follow me through town in your SUV? You can park it in the grocery store lot, since it's at the junction of the road leading toward Stone Lake. Let's just take my truck to the farm, okay? It's probably got better traction over the snow and ice."

Beth nodded agreeably. "Sounds good. I brought along some extra gloves, hats and scarves."

When Zach grinned before answering, Beth's heart skipped a beat.

"Bring them along," he said. "I'm not sure what I've got in my truck."

Soon after warming up the SUV, Beth was following Zach's truck carefully along the snow-covered road as they drove through town, and then finally into the parking lot of the grocery store.

She parked the SUV, stepping out and sliding open the back door.

"No, Kyle," Beth muttered firmly. "We don't need to bring the keyboard along where we're going."

Zach barked out a laugh from where he stood waiting nearby, standing outside and leaning against his truck.

Even though Kyle was still revved up when he was loaded into the back seat of Zach's truck, they somehow managed to quickly be on their way.

Although Zach and Beth remained mostly silent, it was a magical twenty-five-minute drive. The trees were coated with ice and there was a family of deer wandering beside the road when they pulled into the entrance of the farm.

The three of them bundled up tightly in their coats, and were each wearing hats, scarves and gloves, before making their trek along the paths through the trees. Kyle laughed and giggled the entire time. He was sure loving his new life in Crystal Rock.

After twenty minutes of studying the trees, Beth finally made her choice. She turned to Zach, who had somehow ended up holding Kyle's hand while Beth had been wandering ahead of them along the path.

She pointed at a lovely eight-foot Blue Spruce. "This one here," she said excitedly. Its needles were sharp, but it would definitely discourage Kyle from fiddling with the ornaments once the tree was decorated.

"Ohh-kay." Zach grinned. "If you don't mind me saying so, it doesn't look much different from the other one you looked at first." Letting go of Kyle's hand, he dropped down to his knees near the tree and began sawing at the base of the trunk.

Beth grimaced as she studied the tree. "No, it really doesn't, does it?"

When Zach's eyes met hers, they laughed.

In a matter of minutes, the tree was felled, and she and Zach were discussing the easiest way to haul it along the path. Zach wrapped Kyle's hand around the tip of the tree before grabbing a hold of the base of the trunk, alongside Beth.

They pulled off their gloves, to get a better grip on the trunk.

When Zach's hand brushed accidentally over hers, Beth stilled as her eyes met Zach's.

Was that desire she saw in his eyes? All Beth knew was whatever this was, it was filling her with a longing that she'd never ever experienced before.

Zach cleared his throat, asking, "Ready?"

"Ready," she answered, feeling dazed snapping out of her trance.

Beth gave Zach a side glance as they slid the tree along the snow coated trail. Soon the enchanting afternoon would be over, she thought regrettably. She'd never laughed as much with a man in her entire life.

Other people seemed to think of Kyle as a burden, whereas she chose to think of him as a blessing. He was as he was, and what-ifs weren't going to change him or the situation. It was wondrous sometimes, looking at life through Kyle's eyes, like the first time he'd ridden on a merry-go-round, or had gazed into the sky to see fireworks. So many people took the simple joys in life for granted.

And the most astonishing thing of all? Zach seemed to understand, and to feel exactly like she did.

Beth, Kyle and Zach finally reached the path leading back to the greenhouse. After they left the tree to be wrapped and loaded into Zach's truck, Kyle grabbed Zach's hand, attempting to pull him inside

Zach grinned at Beth. "Want to take a look at the Christmas decorations in the shop?"

She hesitated. "Are you sure you don't mind?"

"Nah," Zach answered. "Come on. It looks like they've got a lot of cool stuff for sale."

Apparently, the weather hadn't interrupted everyone's preparations for the holidays, because a couple of other trucks pulled into the parking lot while the three of them wandered around the greenhouse, studying the decorated wreaths and ornaments for sale.

Beth turned to Zach when she noticed some outdoor ornaments fashioned from bird seed. "Kyle's fascinated with watching the birds and squirrels through the windows in the family room. I think I'll get a few of these to use when the weather's bad. I can hang them outside of the window without having to make a trip through the snow to fill the feeder."

When she and Zach reached up at the same time to grab a handful of prepackaged ornaments, Beth found herself nearly wrapped within his arms. And there it was again, Beth thought, when she searched Zach's eyes.

She held her breath. Was he going to kiss her?

Zach broke the spell when he abruptly pulled away. "Sorry."

As Kyle began wandering down the next aisle, Zach scrambled to catch up with him.

Why was she suddenly feeling so disappointed? She barely knew the guy, Beth admitted halfheartedly.

After counting out a half a dozen ornaments, she took in a shaky breath before strolling over to where Kyle and Zach stood waiting near the checkout counter.

Before long, they were back on the road, with the radio switched onto a channel exclusively featuring Christmas music.

When they pulled into the parking lot of the grocery store, Kyle was asleep in the backseat of Zach's truck. Lifting his finger to his mouth, Zach motioned at the SUV with a nod of his head.

In silent understanding, Beth grinned, leaving Kyle with Zach in the truck.

Twenty minutes later, she was pulling the SUV into the driveway of her lakefront property, with Zach following closely behind.

When Zach stepped out from the truck, Kyle was beginning to stir, and reaching into the backseat, Zach hoisted Kyle into his arms.

Beth laughed, watching Zach wobble from side to side as he trudged through the snow, nearly dropping Kyle.

"He can walk, Zach. Didn't you say you have a bad leg? Besides, it's way too early to let him sleep. He'd be waking me up in the middle of the night."

Zach grunted and grinned, letting Kyle's feet drop to the ground.

Kyle must have remembered the keyboard, because he was suddenly wide awake, and running over to the SUV and sliding open the back door, he grabbed the box.

Watching Kyle, Zach smiled and muttered, "I think I'd better just bring in the tree."

"Both of us will get out of your way," Beth said, pointing at the door leading directly into the family room. "You can bring it into the house through there. I'll need to unlock the door from the inside. I've got keyed deadbolts on all the exterior doors, because of Kyle."

Zach grimaced. "Good idea."

"Yes." She gave him a rueful smile. "But I really wish I hadn't learned the hard way that I needed them."

Zach grinned, answering dryly, "I've got a feeling there's a story or two behind that observation."

"That's for sure," she said, laughing as she walked towards Kyle, where he stood waiting for her to unlock the front door. "I'll get that porch door open for you in a minute."

As Beth unlocked the door, Zach made his way to the rear of the truck, pulling down the hatch.

• • • •

WHAT A PLACE, Zach thought, dragging the spruce inside through the wide opened doors from the deck. Even at dusk, the view across the lake of the vibrant setting sun was absolutely amazing.

Beth helped him place the tree into the stand she'd already set up near the fireplace. Once they were finished, she stood back to make sure it was straight, obviously admiring the tree.

Her question came out of the blue. "Do you happen to know anyone who'd be interested in renting this place, when I move out of here in a couple months?"

“Me,” he answered without thinking.

“Really? Cal is still working on my house. But it should be move-in ready in a couple of months.” She pointed through the window at the huge Victorian home next door, and grimaced. “The house needed a lot more work than Cal realized.”

“Just you and Kyle are going to live there?” Zach grinned. “That place is huge.”

“Yes, once I actually saw it, I was kind of worried about what I was getting myself into. It used to be an inn, I guess. It was more of an investment property.” She gave him an impish grin. “It’s always been my dream to refurbish and live in an old Victorian home.”

“Really?” He hesitated, wondering about how much to say about himself, and his reasons for moving to Crystal Rock. With all the physical activity this afternoon, he was beginning to feel lots of discomfort from the fleece he’d been wearing around his neck all day. He’d say nothing, he decided, suddenly feeling disheartened. “I knew I wanted to stick around Crystal Rock and make it my home after visiting Luke. It’s time to get my stuff out of storage, though. I need to move out from Luke and Kelly’s guesthouse.”

“Well, if you’re really serious about moving in here, you can talk to Cal. I have no idea about what to charge for rent for a place like this. I’d just like to rent it out as soon as possible, because I’m still waiting for my house in Bloomington to sell. Of course, you’d have your privacy. We’re far enough away where Kyle wouldn’t be able to bug you. Besides, you’ll probably see too much of him at school and in the work program, anyway.”

Understandably impatient for his mom to begin decorating the tree, Kyle rushed over to Beth, grabbing her hand and attempting to lead her toward the tree. When he began fiddling with the jeweled Christmas tree pin attached to her collar, Beth gave Kyle a tender smile, before glancing at Zach and smiling at him.

Zach felt like he’d been punched in the gut.

It was right at that moment he knew, this time, he was really in trouble. It had taken thirty-seven years to find a woman he felt like he could actually relate to.

And, for the first time ever, he knew it was actually love.

• • • •

ZACH HAD STUCK AROUND and helped them decorate the tree. Well, Beth had kind of insisted upon it. She’d brewed some coffee, and they’d sat and talked while Kyle played with his keyboard after drinking hot chocolate.

Zach was a retired pilot who’d been in the air force but had been working part-time at Callahan Construction since the fall. He’d decided to stay in town, after he’d been asked for his input about the wounded warrior facility being built. Even though she hadn’t noticed anything other than a limp, apparently, Zach’s injuries in Iraq had prevented him from continuing with his planned military career. Although he’d been offered the opportunity to work from behind a desk in D.C., he’d decided it just wouldn’t be enough for him.

“Why?” Beth asked, as they sat beside each other on the couch.

“The work they were offering seemed pretty boring. Plus, I wanted to do something where I’d actually be getting some exercise during the day.” He hesitated. “Sometimes, I have a little trouble with my leg, and I can’t stand it when I don’t move around enough.”

“And you’ll be able to do that while you’re working at the wounded warrior facility?”

“Yes, I will,” Zach answered. “I’ll be scheduling and coordinating the programs, but I’ll also be interviewing some of the patients beforehand as an advisor and asking questions about their injuries.”

He grimaced. "The doctors have reassured me that these men and women are better off talking to someone who's been there and knows what it's all about overseas."

"Ahh," Beth said. "And as an assistant to kids like Kyle, you'll also be working in the community, and getting some of that exercise that you seem to need too?"

Zach nodded. Somehow, he'd been caught up in the day by day operations at Crystal Visions and had apparently decided he wanted to be part of that as well. "Plus, our funding for the wounded warrior facility is somewhat limited right now, so we won't have many patients to begin with."

Wow, was all Beth could think. He became so animated when he began talking about the projects he was involved in. She frowned when she noticed him fidgeting with his high collar. Why wasn't he taking off that jacket, she wondered? Maybe he wasn't wearing a shirt underneath the fleece?

She took in a deep breath when he became silent, asking hesitantly, "Would you like to stay for dinner?"

For some strange reason, his expression suddenly turned grim. "I really should get home," he answered rather abruptly.

Why? She wanted to ask. But she and Kyle had been with him nearly the entire day already, and she really couldn't expect him to give up any more of his time.

Although it was a shame, she thought, because for about the millionth time that day, she'd really felt like they'd shared a connection.

When Kyle began playing a tune on the keyboard, Beth and Zach's eyes met in mutual astonishment.

Beth began, "You don't suppose...?"

"That he could be one of those autistic kids with latent talent?" Zach grinned. "Maybe. I'll have to give him a few lessons. I used to play a pretty mean keyboard at one time."

When Beth lifted a brow, Zach appeared sheepish. "I was in a high school band. Amateur stuff, really."

Beth grinned. "I used to sing soprano, myself."

Zach's smile lit up his eyes. "We'll have to have some fun with that sometime." He suddenly looked serious again, and standing on his feet, he headed toward the door.

Beth followed him through the doorway and stepped outside with him onto the deck.

• • • •

"ZACH?"

Her cheeks were flushed, and her hair was mussed, but Zach had never met another woman who'd looked as lovely.

"Thank you so much," she said softly.

And then he groaned, finally giving in and reaching out for her. He'd been wanting to kiss her the entire afternoon. He held her face within his hands, staring deeply into her beautiful blue eyes. Bending down and laying his mouth over hers, Zach eased Beth gently into the kiss.

When her lips finally parted with a shudder of anticipation, his tension melted, and Zach deepened his kiss, hungrily wanting more.

Needing more...

Zach crushed himself against Beth, her lips parting further under the force of his kiss.

Her tongue met his and explored with an urgency that sent fire shooting straight to his toes.

Not to mention another part of his anatomy.

He suddenly broke away. And with something akin to horror, Zach looked down at Beth in absolute disbelief, muttering, “Oh, my God. I’m so sorry.”

Beth seemed dazed, her hand covering her lips, and when she looked back at him, clearly puzzled, her big blue eyes were shimmering with tears.

He had to get out of here, before he did anything else he’d regret.

Rushing down the steps from the porch, he made his way around the house and quickly approached his truck, opening the door and stepping inside.

Once he’d started the engine, he laid his head against the steering wheel, waiting for the truck to warm up. Finally, he yanked down the zipper of his pullover and studied his neck grimly in the rearview mirror. Even in the dark, the lumpy scars stood out like welts crisscrossing his skin.

He shook his head dazedly, jerking the clutch into reverse.

He’d just have to avoid her, Zach decided, as he pulled the truck onto the main road. He couldn’t stand the idea of Beth ever having to look at him like this.

It was difficult after what had happened with Zach, but Beth attempted to get wrapped up in the spirit of the season since Kyle was so excited. After purchasing a bunch of gifts for him, she hid them in the main house.

But all she kept thinking about was Zach, and that beautiful kiss they'd shared the week before. She just couldn't understand what was going on. If he wasn't interested in beginning a relationship, why had he kissed her? He'd run away from her that night like a bat out of hell, and he hadn't even said goodbye.

Could it be her age? She frowned, feeling somewhat insecure. She was probably about seven or eight years older than him. But she'd always taken pretty good care of herself, as a single mom of a kid like Kyle. After all, Kyle's future was in her hands. His father had passed away ten years ago, although he'd never been any help as far as Kyle was concerned. All she'd received from Greg was a little bit of court-ordered child support, since he'd moved from job to job.

It was Christmas Eve, and Beth was getting Kyle ready to make the rounds with friends and family. First, they'd visit at Luke and Kelly's house, and then they'd have dinner with Cal and his family.

Would she see Zach tonight?

She'd actually bought him a gift, which was kind of funny. She hadn't even purchased a present for Jim last Christmas. Why bother? During their five-year relationship, he'd never given anything to her.

When Beth pulled the SUV into the driveway of Luke and Kelly's house, the first thing Kyle saw were skaters whizzing across the iced over bay. Apparently, the Dragonfly Pointe Inn maintained an ice rink for visitors, and even sponsored a local hockey team.

Kyle's arms went whipping up and down in excitement when he stepped out from the SUV, and he suddenly began jumping in place. Since he had no verbal skills, Kyle used his hands for everything. He was even pretty skilled with sign language, and Beth had picked up a lot of the signs herself. But she and Kyle's teachers had discovered years ago that pictures were the most effective way for communicating his needs more quickly.

She heard the sound of Christmas music echoing from inside, so she knocked, and entered the house through the back door.

Wow, what amazing views, Beth thought, as they made their way through the doorway and into the kitchen. Although there were windows everywhere, it was warm and cozy inside because of the roaring fire blazing in the fireplace.

"Finally. Here they are." Luke was grinning when he approached, carrying a heavy coat in his hand. He winked at Beth, looking down at Kyle. "I see you're wearing heavy sweats, Kyle. Perfect for a first-time skater."

Beth grinned. "Thanks for doing this Luke."

"It'll be fun. We're going to swing by the guesthouse first and see if we can talk Zach out of his sulking."

Beth was taken aback. "Sulking?"

Luke stared into her eyes somewhat intently. "You wouldn't know anything about that, would you, cuz?"

"Well," Beth answered, hesitating. "I'm not sure, Luke. I thought we were getting along great..."

Luke cocked a brow. "But?"

She knew she was blushing when she answered, "He kissed me."

Luke started.

And then he began studying her quizzically. "And I take it, you didn't object to this?"

She answered rather breathlessly, "Not at all."

Luke began to laugh. "Kelly was right then."

Beth was puzzled by the cryptic remark.

Finally, he sighed. "Be patient with him, Beth. I wish I could say more, but his story isn't mine to tell."

Beth was startled. Story?

She began thinking back about the conversation they'd had last week. Zach had mentioned he'd taken charge of coordinating the new wounded warrior program. But what made Zach qualified to run the program, besides the fact that he'd served overseas?

And it suddenly occurred to her.

Was he injured?

He couldn't be. Could he? Besides his leg, there weren't any obvious problems on the outside, like there were when you looked at Luke.

"Let me guess. He's part of the wounded warrior program, Luke? And not just coordinating it?"

After glancing nervously through the room at some of the guests, Luke nodded his agreement grimly. "So, just give him some time, Beth," he muttered, looking back at her. "I never would have come around myself, when it came to accepting Kelly into my life, if it hadn't been for one of my friends talking some sense into me."

Giving Luke a rueful smile, Beth slowly nodded her acceptance.

Taking in a deep breath and squaring off her shoulders, she turned to Kyle. "Are you ready to go skating?"

She'd caught his attention just in time. He looked like he'd been ready to pounce on the food spread out on the buffet.

Kyle giggled, and began jumping up and down.

• • • •

HE LET THE BLINDS FOR the living room window drop back into place. "Well, they're both over there Em," Zach muttered, looking down at the dog. He found himself talking out loud to her quite a bit these days. With that perpetual look of concern on her face, she reminded him a little of his therapist. "So, do I put in an appearance or not?"

Emily cocked her head, definitely appearing to be considering the question. She suddenly barked, and Zach had his answer.

"Alright, already. I guess I can't hide away from her forever?"

Zach grinned, when Emily barked again. She sure was a sweet little dog. When Danielle Loughlin had talked him into adopting a dog from the no-kill shelter, once he'd decided to stay in town, Zach had envisioned himself with a lab or golden retriever. The last thing he'd expected to do was walk out of the place with a basset hound.

When someone began knocking at the front door, Zach jumped nervously when Emily began to howl.

He gave her a rueful smile. Em still had a few bad habits that he'd really like to break her out of.

Zach answered the door and blinked.

Speak of the devil, Zach thought, when Kyle plowed inside through the doorway.

Zach held his breath, peeking outside to search behind Kyle.

“Just me,” Luke said, appearing from around the corner of the house.

Studying Zach intently, Luke grinned, cocking a brow.

Just then, Luke’s black lab Hawk came barreling along the path, and Emily ran outside through the doorway to greet him.

“He looks bigger every time I see him,” Zach mumbled, grinning.

“Yeah,” Luke muttered. “That’s the same thing I just said to Kel.”

“Well, don’t just stand there. Get in here.” Zach wasn’t really sure who he was talking to when he said it.

But inwardly, he was scolding himself. Why was he so disappointed?

Because Beth wasn’t with Kyle? Zach had never been this infatuated with a woman before in his life.

Emily scrambled inside through the doorway with Hawk on her heels, and Luke strolled into the living room behind Hawk.

When Hawk began licking Kyle’s hands, Kyle dropped onto the floor so Emily could climb into his lap.

Both Hawk and Emily began licking his face, and Kyle started giggling madly.

Zach rolled his eyes upward. “And you guys are here because...?”

Luke was laughing, and Zach couldn’t blame him. The living room had been turned into a three-ring circus, just like that.

“Dude, get yourself ready. We’re all going skating.”

Zach stared down at Luke’s prosthetic leg. “This ought to be interesting,” he muttered dryly.

Luke just laughed harder.

• • • •

BETH WAS ENJOYING HERSELF with Kelly and Luke’s friends, she decided, as she sipped on some wine and loaded a plate with chips and dip. It was nice to get a little time away from Kyle, even though that would all change in about a week, when she’d take up her accounting duties at Callahan Construction while Kyle went to school.

The best thing of all about her job? The hours were flexible. If Beth finished what she needed to do for the day, she could leave, according to Kelly, who’d been handling the family’s accounts even before she’d attended college.

Nearly forty-five minutes later, Beth started thinking about looking for Kyle, because they were expected at Cal and Jenny’s for dinner soon.

Kelly must have noticed Beth glance at her watch, because she walked through the hallway and opened the closet, grabbing Beth’s coat along with her own.

Beth had her camera ready when she walked down the path towards the lake with Kelly.

The first thing Beth noticed was Luke wobbling and laughing, as he struggled to stand upright.

Kelly gasped, as soon as she noticed Luke. Covering her mouth in obvious horror, she ran onto the ice to steady Luke.

Beth grinned. What would it be like to have a guy look at her like that? And then her eyes moved over to the handsome man standing beside Luke.

Zach. He was grinning too. And he was also holding onto Kyle’s hand so Kyle wouldn’t slip on the ice in his skates.

Lifting her camera, Beth snapped a quick shot.

Zach was looking a little uncertain when Beth approached them.

“How’s he been behaving?” she asked.

Kyle was still excited, and happy to see her too, but he definitely seemed tired.

“Good,” Zach answered softly.

“We probably need to get over to Cal’s pretty soon, for our Christmas Eve dinner.”

Zach motioned at Kyle with his head. Kyle and Zach already seemed to have their own way of communicating, and Kyle began hobbling slowly across the ice.

“I can’t believe he’s standing up,” Beth murmured.

“Oh, he’s fallen down quite a few times,” Zach muttered, grinning.

Zach and Beth followed Kyle toward the blazing bonfire, entrenched in a pit near the edge of the beach.

Kyle sat down on a bench, and started fumbling with the laces of his skates, so Zach bent over and began untying them.

Once he saw Zach was finished, Kyle pulled his boots out from underneath the bench and switched them for the skates on his own.

Zach seemed to be searching for something to say, so Beth took up the slack. “Kyle picked out a little something for you for Christmas.”

Zach seemed surprised, but he grinned at Kyle. “Thank you, Kyle.”

Kyle smiled.

Beth murmured, “I’ve got the bag in my van.”

Zach cleared his throat. “Do you have all your things from inside the house?”

Beth nodded yes.

“I’ll walk you both to your van, then.”

Kyle stood up, and soon, they were hiking along the path from the beach and strolling around the house.

“God, what a beautiful place this would be to live,” Beth said, looking at Zach.

He finally smiled. “Your place isn’t so bad either.”

She grinned. “Yes. I’m pretty excited to be living beside the lake.”

He hesitated. “I said something to Cal about renting your house.”

Beth was surprised. She’d assumed...well, she’d been trying hard not to think about it one way or another.

They were standing near the van, and reaching for the handle, Zach slid open the back door for Kyle.

After Kyle was settled inside, Zach turned to Beth, looking rather uncomfortable. “About that kiss...”

She covered his mouth with her hand. “We’re not going to talk about that right now,” Beth said firmly. “Since you’re not going to tell me what I really want to hear, don’t say anything else.”

Beth reached for the door handle, tugging open the door. “Unless you’re ready to tell me something I do want to hear?”

Zach looked startled.

Grinning, she reached inside the SUV, grabbing a gift bag from the passenger seat and handing it over. “This is for you.”

And then she winked, before stepping inside the van.

Zach just stood and stared as she started up the engine and pulled the SUV onto the road.

Beth grinned when she peeked at him through the rearview mirror as she drove away.

Zach was studying the festive fleece pullover, along with the matching doggie sweater, that he'd pulled out from inside the bag.

And he appeared to be laughing loudly.

It was Christmas day, and after Zach had taken Emily for a short walk along the snowy beach, he'd returned her home. Zach was strolling along the road heading toward the Dragonfly Pointe Inn to eat his Christmas dinner. Although Kelly and Luke had invited him over the Callahan's, he didn't want to intrude on their family Christmas.

Zach looked down at the colorful fleece he was wearing and grinned. Emily had also loved her winter coat. The bright blue and gold colors of the fleece had kind of reminded him of the clothes he'd worn back in high school, and weirdly, Zach had suddenly recalled some of the arguments he'd had with his dad about the way he'd dressed.

Of course, that had all changed once Zach had enlisted, and he and his dad had become closer through the years. His father was an air force colonel handling sensitive matters for the government, and now he was stationed and living in Europe with Zach's mom. Zach made a mental note to give them a call and wish them Merry Christmas as soon as he returned home today, because of the difference in the time zones.

It was pretty quiet inside the inn today, Zach discovered, after stepping into the dining room and grabbing an empty plate from the buffet, and only about a third of the tables appeared to be in use.

Zach settled onto a seat near a window and began to eat. After helping himself to a second plate and finishing with dessert, Zach scooped up his check from the table and went to pay the cashier.

Once Zach was finished, he headed through the lobby and down the hallway encased in glass. Apparently, everything for sale in the gift shop was designed by local artisans. He'd had this destination fixed in the back of his mind, he supposed, since he'd awoken this morning from a night with little sleep. Once again, Beth had invaded his dreams.

He saw what he wanted right away, when he looked through the glass at the jewelry on display.

"I'm surprised you're open today," Zach admitted, walking into the shop. "You're the owner and designer, aren't you? I talked with Kelly Callahan last night and she said I should stop by because you were probably going to be open."

"Yes. Kelly's a good friend." The pretty dark-haired woman behind the counter smiled. "I'm Dawn Wellman. Usually, the shop would be closed, but I had some work to do today for my year-end inventory, so I figured I'd open up the shop for a few hours."

"I'm Zach," he murmured.

Dawn pursed her lips. "It looks like you already know what you want, Zach?"

When he pointed at the piece in the storefront window, Dawn grinned, asking, "Would you like it wrapped?"

"Yes, please," Zach answered gruffly.

Once it was wrapped in shiny silver paper, she smiled at Zach. "How about a card?"

He hesitated. What would he even say?

Zach cleared his throat. "Nah. It'll be fine like that."

When Zach left the gift shop with the box in hand, he was wearing a rueful smile on his face. He'd made a few decisions during the last few days, when he hadn't been able to quit thinking about Beth.

He wasn't going to put off his reconstructive surgery any longer. If the scarring had covered his back or even run over his shoulders, like Luke's, he probably would have been able to cope a little better with the sight of his naked body in a mirror. He'd had one operation so far, along his lower belly, and it looked to have worked pretty well. The trick was to remove patches of healthy skin from other parts of his body, and then insert it around the edges of his scars regenerating tissue growth.

But, unfortunately, the most severe scarring was on his upper chest. Zach thought he looked hideous. Since that area was not only central to his burns, but the most sensitive, the final operations would be a little trickier. He'd also be looking at some reconstructive surgery, much like what was done after a woman's mastectomy, he'd been told.

Meanwhile, he didn't know what he was going to do about Beth. All he did know was that he couldn't stand the idea of her seeing him like this.

BETH AND KYLE HAD A lovely Christmas. Cal and Jenny's two oldest kids were at the Callahan house with their spouses and families when Beth and Kyle arrived to celebrate Christmas Eve with them. Beth's other cousins had apparently joined the entire family on Christmas Day. Although she and Kyle had been invited, Beth had chosen to spend the day at home with Kyle. She'd be going to work all too soon, and Kyle would be in school and vocational training, even during the summer, so she wanted to spend as much quality time with him as possible.

She'd called and talked with her entire family in Arizona. Next year, they'd all be coming here to celebrate Christmas with her and Kyle.

There had been several more inches of snow accumulating during the following week, and Cal had arranged for a friend to regularly plow her driveway.

But the snow kept falling down. Beth had gone outside to shovel a little bit wider path around the back door when she'd discovered a bag, containing a gift, hanging from the doorknob.

Even now, Beth fingered the lovely pendant hanging from her neck. It was a simple design, with two dragonflies encircled by a silver filigree heart. But it was the most exquisite piece of jewelry that she'd ever seen.

There had been no card with the gift, and she was becoming more confused. Although his intentions remained unspoken, Beth knew that it had to have come from Zach.

It was February now, and Kyle was going to school, where he was thriving.

Beth had been told by Kyle's teacher that he wouldn't begin in the vocational program with Zach until late spring. There was only one other student Debbie Abrams was working with, so she could give Kyle and his classmate her undivided attention. They'd slowly begin initiating Kyle into the work program for a few hours every afternoon during his school day, and having him spend more time on the job would be dependent on how well he trained, as well as his behavior.

It took every effort in Beth's power to keep Kyle awake during the evening until ten though, so he wouldn't wake up too early in the morning. He was increasingly excited for each new day to begin.

After working and keeping accounts for a huge company, Beth found her job at Callahan Construction to be much less stressful. Kelly Callahan had overhauled the entire company accounting system during the past five years, and Beth's method of accounting was wholly compatible with Kelly's. This left Beth the time to get to know her fellow employees and their families and make a bunch of new friends.

The construction work inside her house was nearly done. Even though much of the house would still need some finishing touches, the kitchen had finally been completed, so she and Kyle had been able to move in.

After receiving the dragonfly pendant, Beth had been secretly hoping the situation between her and Zach might change after the holidays.

But, no. She hadn't spoken with him since Christmas Eve. Since the house in Bloomington still hadn't been sold, Beth was relieved to discover Zach was still planning on moving in next door though, on the first of March.

And then she got the shock of her life, on Valentine's Day, when she had an unexpected visitor at work.

"Jim?" Her mouth gaped open when he strolled into the office. He looked thinner, and wearier than he had the last time she'd seen him.

"Hi, Liz." He walked up to her, apparently expecting her to stand up and welcome him with open arms.

Amazing, considering she hadn't even heard a word from him since she'd moved here. Why hadn't he called? It's not like he didn't have the number for her cell.

When she remained seated at her desk, he began looking uncertain. "I thought I'd take you up on that offer and move in with you."

Beth's mouth gaped open further. And then she quickly pulled her thoughts together and spoke. "I'm sorry, Jim. That plan's not going to work for me anymore."

When Jim dropped into the chair beside her desk, he was looking wearily defeated. "But...why not, Liz?"

It was time to be firm and tell him the truth. "Because we don't have the same priorities, and you wouldn't know how to be a good father for Kyle." She hesitated. "Besides, I'm not in love with you. I didn't have the heart to tell you before I left Bloomington."

"Ouch." Jim grimaced, suddenly bending over and dropping his head into his hands.

"Okay, Jim. What's this really about?"

And then he told her.

ZACH CHECKED HIS WATCH as he stepped out from his truck and began approaching the house overlooking the lake. Cal would be meeting him here momentarily to give him a tour of the house, while Beth was at work.

What a view, Zach thought as he stepped onto the deck surrounding the family room. Stone Lake was miles wide and connected to a chain of lakes that extended nearly one-hundred miles north.

“Who in the heck are you?”

Zach started, turning to stare at a stranger who was standing in the doorway leading outside from the family room.

Zach frowned. “I’d like to ask you the nmsame question?”

All of a sudden, Cal appeared from around the corner of the house. As he made his way up the staircase and onto the deck, Cal murmured, “Jim, I presume? Beth told me you were staying here. This is Zach. He’s going to be renting the house.”

Looking uncertain, the man held out his hand to shake Cal’s. “Oh. Beth didn’t mention anything about it to me this morning.”

Jim turned, and appeared to be sizing Zach up.

“Here for a visit?” Zach asked politely.

“Yeah,” Jim growled.

And then, strangely, he smirked at Zach. “I missed Beth. We’ve been dating for over five years, and my life hasn’t been the same since she left.”

Dating? Zach took a closer look at Jim. The guy was older than Beth, with a receding hairline and a slightly thickening waistline. But Zach supposed he wasn’t half-bad looking for someone who had to be close to fifty.

Did that mean Jim was living here with Beth?

For a minute, Zach felt like punching Jim out. Instead he just glared at him, before following Cal through the doorway into the family room.

Zach paid little attention to Cal as he led him through the house. They made their way through a huge kitchen attached to the family room, and down a staircase into the basement. A laundry room was located underneath the staircase. Inset into a cliff, the basement had a unique layout with a bar, a huge picture window overlooking the lake behind it.

But there was only one thing Zach was interested in when they were traveling up the staircase toward the bedrooms. How many of those three bedrooms were in use?

Zach recognized Kyle’s room right away, since it was loaded with stuffed animals and toys. Peeking into another bedroom situated beside Kyle’s, Zach noticed it was devoid of furnishings.

Last on their tour was the brightly lit master bedroom and bath further down the hallway. And Zach couldn’t believe how upset he was, when he saw the open suitcase laid out on a chair.

Because it definitely belonged to Jim.

• • • •

IT WAS THE THIRD WEEK of February, and Zach had been recuperating nicely from the surgery he’d had nearly two weeks ago, until he’d visited the house he was supposed to rent from Beth.

Kelly had sent over something to eat, and as Zach laid resting on the bed in the guesthouse, Luke was staring down at him with concern. “Feeling better today?”

“Yeah,” Zach answered. “Those damned pain killers really knocked me out.”

Luke grimaced. “You sure it doesn’t have anything to do with what you saw the other day?”

“So, what? She has a boyfriend, and he’s staying at her place,” Zach muttered, trying really hard not to let the situation bother him.

Yeah, right, Zach thought, giving Luke a humorless smile. That’s why he’d been hiding away from Luke and Kelly since he’d discovered Jim living with Beth.

Luke grinned. “Hey, man, you’re sneering.”

Zach growled.

“Well, I just thought I’d let you know that you were misinformed. Jim’s not actually staying with Beth.”

Zach sat upright in the bed. “What do you mean? I saw Kyle’s stuff in one of the bedrooms. And Beth’s clothes were definitely hanging in the closet of the master bedroom, because the doors were wide open.”

Luke shrugged. “Beth and Kyle had already moved into the main house a few days earlier. I guess she hadn’t finished moving everything over there yet. Apparently, Jim’s returning to Illinois within a week or two. Supposedly, Beth broke it off for good with the guy even before she left Illinois.”

Immediately beginning to feel more energetic, Zach slipped off the bed. Besides, Kelly was an excellent cook. “So, what was it you said Kelly sent over for me to eat?”

Luke began laughing.

• • • •

A FEW HOURS LATER, Kelly stepped into Luke’s home office, asking, “Is Zach any better?”

Luke and Kelly were working together with Jake Loughlin to reopen the Crystal Rock Airport, so Kelly had her own office headquarters inside of the Dragonfly Pointe Inn where she served as a liaison, while Luke worked from home.

Luke grinned. “Yeah, he perked up right away when I told him Beth’s ex-boyfriend was returning to Illinois. Zach’s surgery went well, I think, and he was already up and moving around before he decided to drive to Stone Lake, and take a tour of the house before moving in.”

He sighed. “I was hoping when he discovered Beth had a boyfriend, Zach would go back over there later that day and confront Beth.” Luke rolled his eyes upward. “I didn’t expect him to hide away in the bedroom all week. God, I hate seeing him like this. The guy’s lost all his confidence.” Luke hesitated. “I tell you, Kel, if you could’ve seen what Zach was like in Iraq? All of us under his command would’ve done anything for the guy!”

“Well, I didn’t exactly have it easy with you, you know.” Kelly frowned. “The scars must look pretty bad?”

Luke started, staring hard at Kelly. “You know what?” He shrugged. “I don’t know. I’ve still never actually seen them.”

Kelly stilled, finally moaning, “Oh, Luke. They must look pretty awful?”

“Probably, babe,” he answered, with a grimace.

“We’re just going to have to keep on trying,” she said firmly, settling down onto his lap.

Luke had rolled his wheelchair behind his desk, and she wrapped an arm over his shoulder and around his neck.

“It’ll be your turn to think of something next.” But Luke was distracted, gazing into Kelly’s eyes.

“Alright,” she answered, looking thoughtful as she stared outside through the window. “There’s got to be a way to get them to spend more time together. It should help that he’s finally moving into the house next door to hers.”

“Yeah,” he muttered. “But Zach says Beth’s promised him his privacy, since he’ll be spending a lot of time with Kyle in the work program.”

“Hmm.” Kelly snuggled deeper into his lap and laid her lips over his.

Finally breaking away from the kiss, she muttered. “I’ve got an idea. We’ll have to wait until the weather gets a little warmer first.”

But Luke was too busy pulling her closer and kissing her again, to ask what she had in mind.

February turned into March, and soon Zach was moving in next door. But two weeks later, Beth had yet to talk with Zach.

It was a hazy Friday night, and a winter storm watch was in the forecast for the weekend. Beth had seen Zach pull into the garage next door in his truck a few hours earlier, and she'd bundled up Kyle tightly into his winter coat, and they were walking along the shoreline as large wet flakes of snow began dropping like crazy from the sky. Kyle was giggling madly, of course, and stopping and spinning around on the heels of his boots with his arms stretched upward.

Beth heard a shark yip, and there was Emily scampering along the icy shoreline, jogging as fast as she could on her short little legs, trying to catch up with Kyle. Beth grinned, because Emily was wearing the festive doggie sweater she and Kyle had gifted Zach at Christmas.

Beth turned and studied the pathway, searching to see if Zach was following on Emily's heels. And trying hard not to feel disappointed when she didn't see him, Beth sighed as she and Kyle continued their walk. The temperature was dropping quickly, and a sharp breeze was blowing in. They would have to get back to the house soon anyway.

The vegetation along the edge of the shoreline was definitely in need of a heavy trim. She and Kyle moved further along, and when Beth saw a heavy birch branch laying on the ground and blocking their way, she decided it was time to turn back.

Reaching for Kyle's hand and spinning around, she was surprised to see someone walking further along the shoreline in the opposite direction. It definitely wasn't Zach, because whoever it was had a stocking cap pulled over his head and a chain saw in his hand. In fact, Beth was disappointed not to run into Zach, since she'd noticed he had a habit of jogging along this path on a daily basis.

The wind was gusting fiercely, and the temperature was dropping quickly as they struggled to reach the staircase leading up toward the house. A cacophony of sounds echoed through the woods and across the frozen lake. Branches from trees were becoming heavy and when they became laden with ice, they were literally snapping from the trees and dropping to the ground.

It was when Beth began following Kyle up the steep staircase when trouble struck. She heard a sharp crack, and before she could escape completely from its path, a huge pine came barreling down, smashing into the staircase, and pinning her leg underneath the broken steps.

Oh, no. What was she going to do? Luckily, she'd escaped any real damage. She could wriggle her leg, foot and toes just fine.

Emily stuck her snout into the air and began to howl, as Kyle stared at Beth uncertainly from the top of the staircase.

Zach. Hopefully, he'd be able to pull her out? Kyle knew Zach was living in the house next door, because he'd been trying to sneak over there during the last few weeks. Of course, maybe Kyle was slightly confused after moving to another new house, but would he be able to fetch Zach? Well, she really didn't have any other choice, she thought.

But before she could decide how to best direct Kyle, Zach suddenly appeared at the top of the staircase, and Beth sighed with relief.

"Beth," Zach roared. "Are you okay?"

"Yes, I'm fine." She grimaced. "But I seem to be stuck."

Turning to Kyle, Zach layed his hands over his shoulders, moving him away from the staircase as Emily followed closely behind. "You stay here with Emily, Kyle."

Beth watched as Zach made his way gingerly down the staircase, obviously making sure each step was secure before putting his full weight down.

He studied the thick broken railing she was leaning against. "Can you stay balanced without the railing?"

Beth rotated her shoulders.

Zach reached around her and took a hold of the railing. Twisting and yanking, he pulled apart the long board from the base of the staircase.

"Okay. I think I can use this railing to prop up the trunk just long enough for you to slip your foot out from underneath." He frowned. "Otherwise, I might have to attach a chain to my truck and hook it around the tree trunk. Hopefully not, because the ground is a sheet of ice, and I'm not sure how much traction I'll have, even if I manage to get the truck close enough to the edge of the cliff."

Beth watched as Zach took the thick eight-foot board, inserting it under the trunk of the pine near the edge of the staircase. Walking down the staircase and positioning himself behind Beth, he steadied her with a hand underneath each arm. When he stepped on the end of the board, putting his full weight down, he continued to hold onto Beth as she wriggled her foot free from beneath the pine's trunk.

"Oh, thank you, Zach." Spinning around, Beth wrapped her arms around him. "I don't know what I would have done, if you hadn't been here tonight."

"Yeah, you really gave me a scare," he muttered into her ear. "What the heck were you guys doing down here, anyway, in this kind of weather? We had a couple of tornadoes pass through last summer, and it doesn't look like any work was ever done to clear away the debris."

For a moment she stilled. He seemed to be angry, but staring into Zach's eyes, Beth could see they were filled with obvious concern.

"That's my fault," she said. "I told Cal not to worry about the exterior property until spring."

For some weird reason, Zach looked at her again and froze. Slowly disentangling himself from her arms, he tied his hood more securely around his neck.

Stepping down to the ground beside the staircase, he reached for Beth's hand.

Beth grimaced as they struggled to climb the icy bank. Although she'd been wearing boots assembled with extra thick padding inside, her foot was beginning to feel sore.

Zach must have noticed, because when they finally reached the top of the cliff, she suddenly found herself being scooped into his arms.

Kyle began giggling, and he and Emily followed behind Zach while he carried Beth toward the main house. Beth was ready to protest before looking into Zach's eyes, which definitely held a warning. No way would he be putting her back down.

Beth grinned. Why complain? After all, this was exactly the kind of situation she'd been secretly hoping for, so she could spend some time with Zach.

Kyle opened the front door for them as they approached the house, and Emily scampered inside after Kyle.

"Where to?" Zach asked, carrying her through the doorway into the huge entryway.

"The family room is down the hallway, near the kitchen," Beth answered. "That's alright, I can walk. You can put me down now."

"Not a chance," Zach muttered, looking grim.

Reaching the family room and making his way toward the fireplace, Zach settled Beth onto the end of a sectional couch, propping her foot atop the matching ottoman.

He pulled off her boots carefully, while Beth began wriggling out of her heavy winter coat.

Zach must have noticed where Kyle had hung his coat on a hook near the kitchen door, because he picked up her boots and coat, making his way through the family room and into the kitchen. After resting Beth's boots on the floor next to Kyle's, he hung up her coat.

Kyle had switched his boots for slippers and was sitting on the floor with Emily on his lap.

Beth grinned, when Kyle began to giggle. Emily was licking his face, and it didn't look like she was ever going to stop.

Zach was smiling too, she noticed, when he returned to the room.

"Would you like me to get a fire going?" he asked, nodding at the fireplace.

Beth pointed at the wall switch near the mantle. "Just flick on that switch. I had gas piped into this room to save on the mess, because eventually, it's going to be my dining room."

"That will be nice," Zach murmured, flipping the fireplace switch.

Grimacing, Beth continued, "I splurged in the new family room, overlooking the lake. Along with an outdoor kitchen, I'm having an indoor-outdoor fireplace inserted into the exterior wall. It's really going to be cool, if it ever gets finished."

"I was wondering what all the other construction material was for," Zach said, warming his hands near the fire. "I saw Cal unloading more lumber inside of your garage just the other day."

"Yes. Kyle loved the family room so much over there in your guesthouse, I decided it was definitely worth building something similar here. He has such a short attention span. The visual stimulation helps keep him occupied. Some days, I don't have as much patience with him as others."

Zach nodded, and Beth noticed he seemed uncertain as he stood on his feet.

She stared into his eyes. "You'll stay for dinner, won't you? I made a huge batch of potato soup."

Beth held her breath, because Zach definitely seemed hesitant.

But he finally nodded his agreement. "I'd like to keep an eye on you for a little while, and make sure you're okay."

"Oh, I'm fine," she mumbled.

"Oh, really?" he answered.

Stepping towards her and bending over the ottoman, he carefully removed her sock.

"Whoa," she murmured, startled. Her foot was swollen to nearly twice its size, its color an ugly black and blue.

She shook her head in consternation. "How did that happen?"

"I'm pretty sure it's just bruised." Zach grimaced. "Usually, I'd say go to the doctor. But not in this weather. Besides, it's obviously not broken. Better to just stay off of it as much as you can during the weekend. It'll probably look better after a day or two."

Beth nodded.

• • • •

NO WAY WAS HE LEAVING her alone tonight. No doubt, the first thing she would do was try to stand up.

Ever since he'd moved in next door, Zach hadn't been able to stop watching out for her whenever he was home. Whether she was taking a walk with Kyle or shoveling snow, she never seemed to sit still. Zach had even seen her moving furniture through the windows when he'd been outside walking Emily one evening last week. It had sure been difficult to sit back and not offer his help.

With a blizzard in the forecast for tonight, Zach had been settled in the family room with the television on, going through the emails on his laptop computer. Looking outside through the window after arriving home from work, he found it odd to see a stranger climbing down the staircase toward the bank. The guy had a chain saw in his hand, so more than likely he was one of the neighbors clearing debris along the community path, gathering lumber for firewood before the storm arrived.

Only a few of the homeowners in the area had generators since most of the houses and cabins on Stone Lake were used seasonally. Zach had a routine, and he ran along the trail every day to keep in shape, but the blacktop was also used regularly by snowmobilers.

When he'd seen the pine go tumbling down over the bank a few hours later, Zach's heart had nearly stopped, because he'd watched Beth and Zach travel down that staircase thirty minutes earlier, close to the time Zach normally went on his run.

Barely taking the time to sign off the computer, he'd scrambled through the house to retrieve his heavy coat, gloves and boots, returning to the family room and staring through the window just in time to see Kyle and Emily climb up from the staircase.

Zach had breathed in a sigh of relief, until he'd noticed Kyle gazing downward over the cliff, standing glued in place with Emily beside him.

By the time Zach had made it outside, Emily's howls were echoing through the air. Zach had run toward the staircase, never feeling so relieved to see anyone in his life as he had when he'd seen Beth. Although, outwardly, he'd tried to appear calm, his heart had been pounding rapidly in his chest as he'd studied her.

Something had concerned him about the position of the tree trunk after it fell, as well as the wear and tear of the staircase steps where they'd broke. But he'd decided to puzzle it out the following day, since it was more important to extricate Beth.

And once Beth's foot had come loose, when she'd turned, wrapping her arms around him? He'd nearly reached his breaking point. Beth probably hadn't had a clue at how close she'd been to being thoroughly kissed...again.

But then he'd remembered his neck was uncovered. Had Beth seen the scars? Probably not, he guessed, studying her now. Her hair was mussed, and her nose was shiny, but she looked so cute wearing jeans and a fuzzy sweater.

"Potato soup, did I hear you say?"

Beth smiled, and his heart did a flip flop. "It's my own recipe, with sour cream, bacon, onions and red potatoes. I'll have you know, I'm a pretty darned good cook."

Zach grinned. "I'll bet."

She wrinkled her nose. "And Kyle likes to help."

Zach laughed. "Yeah. I kind of figured."

"He's getting to be pretty good at peeling potatoes."

"Cool," Zach answered, looking over at Kyle. Emily was really becoming attached to the kid. She hadn't moved from Kyle's lap, and Kyle seemed equally happy having her there.

Beth was studying Kyle as well. "We're getting a break from the keyboard. Usually, it's the first thing he goes to once we're finished with our walk. Well, besides heading toward the kitchen for a snack, that is. In fact, I don't want to keep you here, if you have things to do. Would you like to eat right away? Kyle's probably ready to eat now, too."

"What do I need to do?" Zach asked, moving toward the kitchen.

"The soups on the stove. In fact, it's probably still hot. I turned the burner down before we went for our walk. And the bowls are in that cabinet up on top, on the left side of the sink."

"Wow, the inside of this place is looking pretty amazing." Zach studied the handcrafted cherry cabinets as he pulled out bowls from inside. Dark granite countertops wound around the exterior walls, while a lovely shade of light seafoam glass covered the backsplash. The large island in the center of the kitchen was designed from a beautifully patterned slab of buttery quartz, complementing the granite.

“Is this a heated floor?” Zach asked, staring down at the tile that was intended to resemble wood.

“Yep,” Beth answered. “Wish I’d have had one of those in my house in Bloomington.”

Soon, Zach had scooped soup into bowls for the three of them. After carrying a bowl for Beth to eat in the family room, Zach sat beside Kyle in the kitchen at the island, where they ate theirs.

Afterwards, Zach prepared them all hot cocoa before sitting beside Beth on the sectional where they watched TV.

When the satellite signal was coming in, that is. The storm was getting worse outside, and he was pretty sure they’d be snowed in until tomorrow.

They talked about Kyle, and about how they would communicate with each other about his progress in the work program. Zach was surprised when he found himself telling Beth a little about his past. Zach had been raised in New Orleans, and had family property there, which had suffered some damage from Hurricane Katrina. His cousin was living there now, overseeing a bunch of repairs since Zach’s father had been assigned overseas.

Beth told him about her past, and how she’d been devastated to move with her family to the town of Bloomington while she was still in high school. She’d never really felt at home there, like she did in Crystal Rock.

Finally, Zach stood up, preparing to depart.

He gazed at her uncertainly, looking for any kind of excuse he could think of to stay longer, he supposed. “Can I help you get Kyle ready for bed?”

“I think we’re just going to sleep here in the family room tonight. It’ll be easier for both of us to use the rest room.” Beth grimaced. “My foot is feeling pretty sore.”

“Have you got some ibuprofen? That should help a little.”

She nodded yes.

Zach murmured, “I can get it for you.”

“It’s in the kitchen, over the fridge, in a cabinet with a child guard lock. But I can get it. I need to use the bathroom anyway.”

“That’s alright,” Zach answered. “I’ll find it for you while you’re in the bathroom. Can I brush Kyle’s teeth, get him into pajamas, or do anything else to help you out?”

She studied him uncertainly, clearing her throat. “You don’t have to leave, do you? I mean, have you got things you need to do at home? Or maybe you’d rather have something more to drink than hot chocolate? There’s beer or wine in the fridge, you know.”

“I…” Zach couldn’t believe he was actually thinking about staying and keeping Beth company. The last thing he really wanted to do was go home to an empty house. “Ah, no. I don’t have to leave. And hot chocolate is fine. I’m not as much of a drinker these days.”

In fact, the last time Zach had a few extra beers, he’d become incredibly depressed, and had begun feeling sorry for himself.

He finally continued, “I’ll stay in case you need some help with Kyle.”

Zach grinned, looking over at Kyle. He’d been making music for a while on his keyboard, but now he was looking sleepy, sitting in a huge chair near the fireplace with Emily in his lap. “A sleepover, huh?”

Beth was looking slightly sheepish. “Well, truthfully? It’s not so much that I really need your help, as much as it is that I like your company.”

Zach started. Was she blushing? It was too difficult to tell as she stood up from the couch, hobbling toward the bathroom.

But Zach grinned.

• • • •

WHEN BETH RETURNED to the family room, Zach already had Kyle in hand and was changing him into the pajamas he'd apparently managed to retrieve from the laundry room, located beyond the kitchen near the back door.

Settling on the couch, Beth swallowed the ibuprofen, drinking the glass of water Zach had left resting on the coffee table.

Zach quickly refilled the water bowl he'd laid on the floor for Emily at dinner before leading her outside.

A few minutes later when Zach and Emily were back in the family room, Beth thought how heartwarming it was watching Zach with Kyle and Emily, tucking them into the chair near the fireplace under a heavy blanket.

When he'd pulled off his coat earlier, Beth had gotten a kick out of seeing Zach wearing the festive fleece pullover Kyle had picked out for him at Christmas.

Somewhat nervously, Beth looked at Zach when he was finished. Where was he going to sleep?

After hesitating momentarily, he settled in beside her on the sectional, pulling a blanket over the two of them.

Beth rested her head against his shoulder. And, much to her surprise, after picking up the TV changer from the coffee table and surfing through the channels, Zach wrapped an arm over her shoulders.

The day must have been catching up with her, because she began dozing off immediately.

"Glad you like the fleece," she muttered softly.

She could hear his muffled laughter, as he tugged her closer beside him.

Where she felt warm, contented and oh so secure.

She clung to him throughout the night, and she was certain he was holding onto her as well. Beth barely recalled moving from her upright position on the sectional and laying down beside Zach through the night, where he kept his arms wrapped tightly around her.

But the next morning, Zach was gone. It was almost as if he'd never been there at all.

Zach didn't know what to do about his feelings for Beth, so he decided to concentrate on learning about his new job at the Crystal Rock Wounded Warrior Home, which would begin after the first of the year.

Zach would share an office with the visiting shrink, who would only be here at the home a few days a week after the facility opened. Once the home was open longer and became established with more patients, Dr. Wes Endicott might become a permanent fixture. About the same age as Zach, Wes came highly recommended by Luke, who was one of his patients, so Zach had begun seeing him too.

"So how do you feel about that?" Wes asked, during one of their sessions.

Zach started to laugh.

Wes blinked. "What's so funny?"

Zach answered, "What have we had – about fifteen sessions now? That's the first time you've asked that question. I expected to hear that one during our first session."

"I'll admit that the question's slightly overused on television and in the movies," Wes answered dryly. "But?"

"Oh, yeah, right," Zach muttered.

"So, you were trying to distract me?" Wes asked gently.

"I think that I'm falling for her. Hard. So, it scares the hell out of me," Zach mumbled.

Wes raised a brow. "Why?"

"Besides the unexplained accidents? You know why," Zach answered.

Looking thoughtful, Wes crossed his arms, leaning back in his chair. "She's going to have to know about your injuries sometime if you intend moving forward."

Zach sighed heavily. "I know if she's someone who I care for, I shouldn't be thinking like this. But I can't stand the idea of being rejected."

"Then wait. Neither one of you are going anywhere. Give yourself some time and get to know her better." Wes pursed his lips. "But you might be surprised."

Zach grimaced, standing up. "Thanks, Doc."

Wes grinned. "You're cutting out five minutes ahead of time."

"I'm supposed to see Jason Matthews about my schedule," Zach answered. "Plus, I wanted to fill him in about what was happening in New Orleans before I arrived in Crystal Rock."

"Good. It's better if tell someone else besides Luke and me, especially since you're not living in Luke's guesthouse any longer. And I'm glad you're moving forward with the surgery. But remember there won't be significant changes to your appearance for a long while, and even then, you might not like what you see."

Zach grunted, nodding his agreement tightly as he walked toward the doorway.

"See you next week," Wes said.

"Thanks, Doc," Zach answered, pulling closed the office door behind him.

Zach was getting to know a few of the people working behind the scenes. Two nurses would begin their rotations next week, handling the patients who would be moved from other facilities once the doctor arrived, and physical therapy was already in session in the new gym, where Steve Ryder, Luke's physical therapist, had been hired to head up the program.

Zach continued through the hallway until reaching the doorway at the end. Opening the door leading into Jason's outer office, Zach walked inside and over to Jason's door, which was open wide.

Zach grinned, studying Jason as he worked behind his computer at his desk. “You wanted to see me, Colonel Matthews?”

Jason looked up, rolling his eyes. “You heard, huh?”

“About your special promotion? I sure did,” Zach answered.

Jason stood, motioning at a chair placed near his desk. “Come on in Zach. Help yourself to coffee if you want and sit down.”

A few minutes later, Zach settled into the chair with a cup of coffee. “That’s pretty impressive, Jase, making colonel at such a young age. You’re only like what – thirty-two?”

Jason studied him suspiciously. “You were one of the men who recommended me, weren’t you?”

Zach smiled widely. “I also put in a good word with Dad.”

Jason shook his head, and then smiled wryly. “I had the best Christmas I’ve ever had. I ran into a girl I was crazy about as a teenager. She’s moving here and starting a new business in Crystal Rock, and then I found out about this big promotion.” He frowned. “I was surprised to hear you wanted to retire.”

“I loved the action, and the flying, but I don’t know...knowing I’d have a lot to overcome physically? I didn’t want to be stuck in an office full time, when I wasn’t recovering from all the surgeries I’m supposed to have,” Zach murmured. “I felt like I needed something new in my life, and it was time for me to leave.”

“Maybe you just need someone new in your life?” Jason asked, grinning.

Something about the expression on Zach’s face must have given him away.

“Ah, hah? You have met someone, haven’t you? Is it someone here in Crystal Rock?”

“Oh, it’s nothing,” Zach muttered. “It’s someone I just met who recently moved to town. We barely know each other.”

“Maybe we can all go out sometime? I’m still going to be traveling a lot, but Crystal Rock will definitely be home base.”

Zach blinked. “It’s too soon to say.”

“That doesn’t sound like the Zach I used to know,” Jason answered, his expression definitely thoughtful.

Zach decided it was time to change the subject. “So, what kind of schedule have you come up with for me?”

And Jason explained to him that his hours would be flexible, depending on how many incoming patients began to arrive. Zach would assist with paperwork, give tours of the home and accompany the patient’s family into town to their hotel if they were planning on attending family therapy.

Jason asked, “Will it be a problem to be on call?”

“Only when I start over at Crystal Visions with my student in the vocational program. It’ll be anywhere from four to six hours a day.”

“Okay,” Jason said. “When does that begin?”

Zach murmured, “Either March or April, depending on the weather.”

“We should have some volunteers working for us by then, who could assist you, so we can work with that. There will be blocks of time you won’t have much to do, until we start operating full scale.” Jason pursed his lips. “Did I mention you’ll have to take some certification courses?”

“I don’t mind,” Zach answered.

“And if this doesn’t work out, Zach, there will be other jobs opening up. I guess what I like is having someone who’s been there and understands what it’s like being a wounded warrior. People have always warmed up to you. How many times did the men turn to you instead of me?”

“That’s probably cause I was older,” Zach answered dryly.

“I always thought you’d be the one in charge, Jason.”

“I don’t think Dad is disappointed. I’ve always been looking for something, but I’ve never really found it.”

At that moment there was a knock on the outer office door.

Jason stood up, calling out, “Come in.”

Jason turned to Zach. “I forgot to tell you. A friend of your fathers is here today, touring the facility. He asked if you were going to be around today.”

Trying not to appear as shocked as he was feeling, Zach stood up slowly as Lieutenant Colonel Edgar Jackson walked into the room, nodding curtly at Jason. “Good to see you, Matthews.”

Jason nodded back. “Sir.”

Out of habit, Zach stood, saluting the Colonel.

How had he discovered Zach was here, miles away from New Orleans?

As if he sensed there was trouble, Jason appeared thoughtful as he stared between Zach and the Colonel.

It was as if he read Zach’s mind when Jason said, “When you’re done giving the Colonel a tour, why you don’t return to my office so we can finish talking about the extra duties I’ll be expecting you to handle?”

“Sounds good,” Zach answered, turning to the Colonel. “What would like to see first, Colonel Jackson?”

“I’ll leave that up to you, Zachary,” he answered, walking back through the doorway into the hallway.

Jason looked concerned when Zach grimaced before following the Colonel.

Each time she ran into him during the next several weeks, Zach seemed to be genuinely happy to see her, but made a point of escaping from her as fast as he could. She really didn't know what to think sometimes. Had she just imagined their near relationship?

Apparently escaping from Josh a few times, Emily came over and visited her and Kyle several times. But Zach really wasn't at home very much anymore. He was working a lot of hours on behalf of the Wounded Warrior facility, according to Luke and Kelly.

Kyle was getting ready to begin his vocational training, so Beth was busy herself, attending meetings at the school and filling out tons of paperwork. But no one had bothered to tell her that thanks to Cal, Kyle would be working at Callahan Construction.

By the time April came along, Kyle was outfitted for his new job with work clothes and steel-toed boots. He'd begin his job in the warehouse, helping load lumber and supplies on the trucks. And if that went well, he might be able to work on site someday, not only to drop off lumber, but to assist with numerous odd jobs.

By the end of April, Kyle was on the job five days a week, for two hours every day. A notebook would go back and forth between her and Zach, and Beth would keep him informed about any behavior issues Kyle was having, so that he would know what to watch for if Kyle was having a bad day. Sometimes, she'd have to adjust Kyle's medications because of all the changes he was undergoing in his life. In turn, Zach would write Beth about any problems Kyle had been having at school or at work during the day.

She always kept trying to read between the lines in the notebook. Zach's handwriting was surprisingly neat and precise, while Beth wrote with a nearly-illegible, squiggly scrawl. With their constant communication, she was still thinking about Zach way too much.

Soon it was May, and finally northern Wisconsin was coming into bloom nearly a month behind central Illinois. It was Mother's Day today, and Beth peered through the kitchen window, staring at the house next door.

Seeing no sign of Zach, she sighed.

When Beth heard the timer buzz on the oven door, she made her way across the kitchen, pulling out the cheese potatoes and leaving them cooling on the stovetop. She and Kyle were heading to a cookout at Luke and Kelly's this afternoon, and cheese potatoes were one of Kyle's favorites. Beth smiled at Kyle where he sat eating his lunch at the kitchen island. Come to think of it, pretty much everything layered with cheese was Kyle's favorite.

Nearly an hour later, Beth was pulling the SUV next to Zach's truck in Luke and Kelly's driveway. Luke and Kelly had gone out for breakfast with their family that morning for Mother's Day, and even though Kelly had said that she and Kyle would be their only guests, why should Beth be surprised to see that Zach was here? It had been pretty evident this winter that Luke and Kelly had been attempting some matchmaking.

When Zach, Emily, and Hawk appeared to help unload the van, Zach gave her what appeared to be a rueful smile.

Beth grinned. "They didn't mention we were invited here too?"

Zach shook his head, and rolling his eyes, he muttered, "Nah. They're at it again."

Beth rolled her eyes too, and they both began laughing.

She pointed at the cooler containing the potatoes, along with the drinks and snacks she'd brought along for Kyle, and grabbing the cooler, Zach carried it into the house.

The view across the bay was amazing, Beth thought, as they sat on the deck of the front porch. It was a lovely afternoon. But even though it was unusually warm for northern Wisconsin, it was still a little too cold today for swimming.

"The water is freezing, buddy," Zach told Kyle, before he grinned at Luke. Kyle had been trying to drag both of them down to the beach ever since he and Beth had arrived.

It was fun to sit and relax while drinking a couple of glasses of wine before dinner. Beth just listened to Zach and Luke talk as they'd recalled some of the most humorous moments from their time in the Air Force.

And that sexy voice of Zach's? It seeped through her senses like honey, and his slow southern drawl was doing silly things to her insides again.

Kyle seemed content as he ran along the pathway through the woods with the dogs, even a few hours later when they'd all finished dinner.

Everyone continued to sit outside and talk, taking in the breathtaking view of the colorful sky as the sun began to set.

When a long loud howl came echoing through the woods, interrupting their conversation, Zach's eyes immediately met Beth's.

"Something's wrong!" they both shouted in unison.

Beth was familiar enough with Emily now to know when that howl of hers meant trouble, so Beth shot up from her seat and began staring down the trail. "Where's Kyle?"

Panicking, she called out his name again and again, and after searching the area, Zach grabbed Beth's hand, rushing her down the steps from the deck, running along the main pathway leading to the guesthouse, following the sound of Emily's howls.

When they finally approached the guesthouse, there was Kyle, giggling madly, wading right through the middle of the in-ground pool, which had recently been filled and heated. He hadn't reached the deeper water yet, but he was nearly there.

Luke and Kelly's dog, Hawk, was swimming beside Kyle in the pool as Emily continued howling with her nose pointed up into the air.

Without hesitation, Zach began removing his clothing while Beth tried coaxing Kyle toward the shallower end of the pool.

But Kyle wouldn't listen, and he was beginning to take in deep gulps of water, when he finally seemed to realize that he might be in trouble.

Suddenly, he began to panic, and his arms went flailing on top of the water.

Stripped down to his underwear, Zach jumped into the pool, first wading and then swimming as quickly as he could to reach Kyle.

Clearly relieved to see Zach coming to his rescue, Kyle jumped on top of him, and wound his arms around his neck.

Zach's head nearly plunged under, and he coughed up some water. He seemed to be having a little bit of difficulty loosening Kyle's grip.

"That's alright, buddy," Zach muttered. "You're hurting me a little here, kid. I really need to get some air."

Kyle still had his arms locked around Zach, but Zach somehow managed to walk with him into the shallower end of the pool, and soon he and Kyle were near the staircase.

Kyle must have finally decided it was safe to let Zach go, because he hurriedly climbed up the staircase on his own from the water.

Beth rushed toward Kyle, and as Kelly ran along the pathway leading back to the house, she called out from over her shoulder, "I'll go get you guys some towels and extra clothes."

Luke had a frown on his face, walking toward them as fast as he could. "Is everyone alright?" He grimaced. "It's times like this that I really regret the loss of my leg."

Beth was looking Kyle over and shaking her head in exasperation. He was soaking wet, still wearing all his clothing.

"What am I going to do with you?" She was nearly in tears when she wrapped her arms around him. "Sometimes you can be such a dope."

Kyle appeared visibly shaken when he clung to her momentarily. But then he quickly pulled away as he began tugging off wet clothes.

Zach cleared his throat. "I left a few of my things here in the guesthouse when I moved out. I can take him inside and get him into some dry sweats and a t-shirt."

And then Beth froze.

Her eyes had gone wide when she'd looked over at Zach. Her gaze traveled down from his face to his neck, and then moved over his torso.

Glancing down at himself, Zach was clearly horrified. Quickly reaching out for Kyle's hand, he rushed him around the perimeter of the pool and pulled him inside of the guesthouse through the doorway.

Beth's eyes were filled with tears by the time she glanced over at Luke, who was looking like he was ready to cry himself.

"I haven't seen the scars either, you know," he said gruffly. "I never had a clue that they were so disfiguring."

Beth sighed heavily.

Luke hesitated, studying her.

"Don't you dare look at me like that, Luke Bryant. It doesn't make any difference at all about the way I feel about him." Beth scraped the tears from her eyes. "But I really want to kill him for thinking that it would!"

Luke laughed softly. "Well, Beth. Zach has always been a magnet for the ladies."

"Yeah, I can only imagine," she answered dryly.

"But I've never seen him care about anyone as much as he seems to care about you. Kyle, too. He talks about him all the time. Zach was always a loner."

Just then, Kelly appeared with the towels and a couple pairs of sweats and some t-shirts. She was wearing a worried frown on her face when she stared at Beth and Luke.

Evidently noticing the look of determination upon Beth's face, Kelly stepped up to Beth, handing everything over.

Carrying the towels and clothes in her arms, Beth smiled grimly as she marched around the edge of the pool, entering the guesthouse through the doorway.

Zach was in the bedroom wrapping a towel around his waist when he heard someone coming inside the guesthouse.

Taking in a deep breath, he sat down on the edge of the bed, recognizing Beth's voice when she began talking with Kyle. Kyle had pulled off his wet jeans and sweatshirt as soon as he'd walked inside the living room, and Zach had handed over dry clothing for him to wear.

Zach had already hopped in and out of the shower. The water in the pool was heavily chlorinated and had a tendency to burn his supersensitive skin. He needed to apply antibiotic cream regularly over his skin to prevent infection, and Zach was ready to begin digging his hand into the jar when he heard Beth step up to the bedroom door.

Zach didn't want to look at her face. How much longer would he have been able to hide this from her anyway? He'd always figured he'd stood a better chance with Beth as long as she didn't know about the scars.

And now he was feeling totally bleak about the future, since he'd been having this fantasy in his mind about him and her.

But much to his surprise, a throw pillow from the couch came flying through the air, hitting him square on the head.

Zach looked up, his mouth dropped open, when Beth began flinging another pillow across the room.

This one hit him in the face. "Hey!"

Damn, she looked angry, her lovely blue eyes flashing fire. She had another pillow raised high in the air when Zach finally stood up and stopped her.

"Beth, don't," Zach pleaded, wrapping his hands around her wrists until she finally dropped the pillow.

She stared hard into his face, moving her gaze over his neck and chest.

But then she did something totally unexpected. She wrapped her arms around him, clinging to him tightly.

And then she began to cry.

Uh, oh, Zach thought, his heart constricted in his chest.

"What kind of woman do you think I am? Why would you think it would matter to me?" The question came out between gulping, heart-wrenching sobs.

"Oh, Beth," he whispered hoarsely. "It's just that you were so important to me, babe, I couldn't stand the idea that it would."

Zach wrapped his arms around her snugly. He hadn't held a woman for such a very long time. And this was Beth, he thought, inhaling the light soothing fragrance of lavender that clung to her skin.

But this whole situation was a little mind-blowing for him to take in, and Kyle was still out in the other room, so Zach slowly pulled away from her arms when her sobs gradually began to subside.

When she smiled at him through her tears, it nearly took his breath away. He'd been in love with this woman since the moment they'd met, and now, with her acceptance, he finally understood why.

There were tears in his eyes too, when he kissed Beth, almost reverently, on the forehead.

LUKE AND KELLY HAD taken charge of Kyle and the dogs, leaving Zach and Beth alone in the guesthouse to sort things out.

He and Beth had talked a little, but when she'd picked up the ointment and had begun rubbing it into the skin over his shoulders, and even over the bumps and furrows of what had once been his abs and his chest, Zach's voice had seized in his throat. She was seeing every horrifying inch of him when he began getting dressed, and she wasn't turning away from him in disgust.

When they were ready to depart, she gave him a watery smile, reaching for his hand.

Once they were heading along the pathway, Zach dropped her hand and wrapped his arm around her shoulders as they continued walking toward the house.

Luke and Kelly were both smiling at them from the deck outside their house when Beth and Zach returned. Kyle and his toys, along with Beth's cooler and purse, were already packed in the SUV, Luke informed them as they said their goodbyes.

Kyle was obviously exhausted and dozing off in the back seat of the vehicle when Zach attached his seat belt. And smiling at Beth, Zach slid the back door of the van closed after Emily hopped in beside Kyle. Since Zach had moved in next door, Emily attached herself to Kyle like an extra limb every chance she got.

Once he finally left Luke and Kelly's, Zach was still in a daze, following Beth in his truck behind her SUV. As he was driving, he kept thinking to himself, was this really happening?

Apparently yes, because Beth waited for him to pull into the driveway first. They'd hardly said a word since they'd left the guesthouse, and they continued to remain silent, even as Zach reached into the backseat of the van to unfasten Kyle's seat belt and assist him into the house.

He, Emily and Kyle followed Beth up the staircase, and into Kyle's room.

"Is there anything I can do?" Zach asked.

She smiled. "Nah. He's pretty exhausted."

Zach stood watching while Beth took Kyle into the bathroom to brush his teeth and wash his face, before changing his clothes for bed.

Soon, Kyle appeared in his pajamas, and hopped immediately onto his bed. After Emily jumped into the bed beside him, Kyle seemed to fall instantly asleep.

Zach blinked. He hadn't even had a chance to say goodnight.

Beth laughed softly. "It's the medication. He sleeps like a log. I'm pretty grateful for it now, even though I never really wanted to put him on medication when it was suggested. He used to have some pretty bad behavior issues, though. He's a big kid, and it was awfully hard to handle him by myself."

Zach nodded his agreement. "I haven't had any issues with him at all. He's been really great."

Beth nodded her approval. "Hopefully, it won't change. Right now, it's the newness of everything. I haven't had a whole lot of trouble with him these last few years, now that the puberty issues are out of the way. But every time I need to change his medication? It's really difficult, because sometimes he becomes worse before he gets better. It usually takes about a month for him to adjust."

Beth closed the door softly behind them when they left Kyle's room.

They made their way down the hallway toward what must have been the master bedroom.

She smiled suddenly. "Well..."

Zach smiled back. "Well...?"

Seconds later, he was taking her into his arms, and it was the most natural, most right thing he'd ever done. He kissed her once, and then he kissed her again, and then he deepened the kiss until the heat of it melted away the last rational thought still left in his head.

He began inching his way into the bedroom, but Beth was making him dizzy, with the way she was kissing him back.

Finally peeking at the room through the corner of his eye, he could see the huge four-poster bed, and for a moment, he broke away from their kiss. "You sure it's big enough?"

Beth laughed, staring over at the bed. "What can I say? I got a deal at an auction. Besides, this is a huge room, and it needed a big bed."

Zach growled, "Especially with everything I've got in mind to do with you in it."

And then he gave her a wicked smile.

Beth's eyes went wide. But then she grinned and led him over to the bed.

When Zach reached over and began tugging at her t-shirt, she lifted her arms so that he could pull it off over her head. He laid his hands over her shoulders, as his tongue ran down the silky soft skin of her cheek, to the underside of her neck, until it reached the deep soft hollow of her throat.

Gently, he pulled the straps of the lacy bra that she wore down over her shoulders while he continued to nuzzle her neck. After unfastening the bra, he let it slip and puddle to the ground.

He gazed over her body with tenderness. "You're so lovely, Beth. I thought so the minute I saw you," he said softly. In fact, he found her body even more beautiful than he'd imagined, studying her soft curves.

She grinned back at him wryly. "When I met you, the first thing that I thought was man, that guy's so sexy."

Zach began laughing.

Beth grimaced. "And way too young for me to be feeling the way that I was feeling about you."

"There you go again, worrying about something that doesn't even matter," he said softly, shoving her gently on top of the bed. "You know that we had an instant connection."

"Take off your shirt, Zach," she said softly.

Hesitating for a moment, he pulled his shirt off over his head, and settled down beside her in the bed.

The tips of her fingers ran over his chest and scars.

"I was getting such mixed signals from you," she said in an unsteady voice.

And then she did something he wasn't prepared for. She ran her lips over his face and down from his shoulder to his chest and began tending each and every one of his wounds.

Closing his eyes, Zach nearly began to cry, because the moment was so emotional that it hurt.

But when she began to unfasten his jeans, he stood up from the bed and stripped them off himself.

"Later," he whispered softly. "Now, it's my turn to take care of you."

Reaching down, he slowly unzipped her jeans, and helped her slip them off.

Beth's breasts were full and firm, and her body was, well...unbelievable was the only word he could think of to describe it. She looked so lovely with that white-blond hair of hers spread out on the pillow. And those beautiful blue eyes? Somehow, he couldn't manage to get over the fact that the heated desire burning within them was for him.

He bent over her. His tongue ran down over her cheek, to the underside of her neck. And then he moved his mouth down further to the nipple of her breast, before moving over to the other. He felt the pounding of her heart as her fingers slid into his hair. Eventually, when his mouth moved down further still, Beth began to moan as her hands clung to his shoulders.

Her body peaked and broke into tight convulsions, and Zach came into her with a deep hard thrust that carried him immediately over the edge. Buried inside of her, deep and deeper still, he felt fulfilment, even as he hungered for more.

He rode her and filled her, watching as he pushed her step by step closer to the edge. Without breaking their rhythm, he shifted his hips.

And then they fell, hearts thundering, senses surging.

Their ragged breathing filled the air, and a small smile curved the corner of Beth's mouth.

Zach kissed her softly and tucked her against him, thinking that he'd be perfectly happy laying still like this with Beth for the rest of his life.

Although the words remained unspoken, Zach knew that Beth was thinking exactly what he was. Mere words would never come close to describing what they'd found together.

• • • •

DAWN'S LIGHT WAS FILTERING through the room, when Zach turned to her and propped his head up on the palm of his hand.

He cleared his throat. "I don't have anything to worry about with this ex-boyfriend of yours, do I?"

Beth's mouth dropped open.

And then it finally closed. "This sure is a small town." She shook her head dazedly. "Yes, I invited him here when I was still dating him last fall. But when I realized that I actually didn't want him moving here with me, I never bothered to clarify it, because I didn't want to hurt his feelings." She hesitated. "If I ever in a million years would have known he'd actually show up here expecting our relationship to resume, I would have definitely made a point of letting him down easily before I left Bloomington." Beth grimaced. "But he didn't really want to resume our relationship."

Zach lifted his brow.

She gave him a wry smile. "He lost his house. He got behind on his payments once he was laid off. He worked with me at the car plant, you know. That's how we met. We got a great compensation package, too. He must have been even more in debt than I realized when we were dating."

When Zach began laughing, she sat up and grabbed her pillow.

Zach murmured, "Alright, put down the weapon. I'll quit laughing. But let me guess what happened next. When you said no, he wanted to move into your house in Bloomington?"

Beth started. "How did you guess?"

Zach grimaced. "Well, there was this girl I was dating..." He laughed when Beth picked up the pillow again. "But we really don't need to get into that."

Beth stuck out her tongue at him. "The good news is, my house has finally sold."

"Cool. So, what're we going to do with that boyfriend of yours?"

This time, she did whack him over the head with the pillow before she grinned. "He's moving in with his mother."

Zach gave her a slow smile that transformed him completely.

Beth blinked. She realized it was the first time she'd ever really seen him smile like that, boyish and carefree.

And it made him look ten years younger.

That's when her own insecurities began kicking in again.

Zach must have sensed her change in mood, because he was taking her reaction personally. "What's wrong?" he asked. "You're not...? He's not...?"

"Oh, no. Nothing happened between us when he was here." She hesitated, practically in tears. "Nothing that I ever had with Jim would even come close to what I have with you, Zach." She hesitated. "It's just that, well...I'm still older than you."

Zach blinked. “Is that all you’re worried about?” And then he started giving her that slow sexy smile again. “I’m not really sure how to say this, so I’m just going to come right out with it. Don’t you know that I’ve been in love with you from the moment we met?”

“Then you’re not allowed to smile at anyone else like that,” she said crossly. “You look like a teenager when you do it!”

Zach barked out a laugh. “You ought to see what I look like without a beard.”

Beth grimaced.

Zach sighed exaggeratedly. “I can’t believe I fell for a cougar.”

Beth snorted and began laughing unwillingly.

He snickered. “Don’t worry, babe. We’ll get through it.”

Zach’s gaze became heated as he pulled her into his arms, patting her on the back. But then, he hesitated, whispering into her ear. “What about you, Beth? Have you got anything you want to tell me?”

“Of course I love you, Zach,” she answered softly.

It was the end of June, and Zach and Beth strolled slowly along the beach at Dragonfly Pointe, trailing behind Kyle and Emily. Kyle had taken off his shoes and was running in and out of the shallow water on the edge of the beach, while Emily watched over him, occasionally belting out a long haunting howl.

Zach shook his head good-naturedly and began to laugh. “I sure wish that I could break Em out of that habit.”

“Don’t you dare!” Beth grinned. “What if Emily hadn’t been there that day, when Kyle hopped into the pool at Luke and Kelly’s?”

Zach’s expression suddenly turned serious as he stared at Beth. “Not to mention a few other things that probably wouldn’t have happened either, like us?”

“No kidding,” Beth answered, as she fingered the pendant she was wearing around her neck. “This was from you, wasn’t it?”

Zach had his hands stuffed into his front jean pockets, when he looked her over grimly and muttered, “Don’t tell me you’ve gotta another boyfriend hanging around somewhere that I’m going to have to worry about?”

Beth blinked, and suddenly laughed, and Zach began laughing along with her as they continued walking along the edge of the water.

Zach was so easygoing these days. It was great to see the real man behind the scars, and Beth was falling a little more in love with him every day. Even though he’d had another skin graft procedure, he’d decided to spread the operations a little bit further apart because of the exercise factor. It was difficult keeping in shape if he was constantly laid up for weeks afterwards.

And it might’ve had a little to do with the fact that it was problematic for them to make love, not only because of the positioning of the grafts, but because of the harvesting of Zach’s skin to be used for the grafting...from some very inconvenient areas.

And Zach’s other scars? Today, he was wearing a t-shirt. Although the scars along the right side of his neck were clearly visible, he wasn’t nearly as concerned about them anymore.

Abruptly, Zach halted, staring deeply into her eyes. “I think that we’d better get married, Beth.”

Beth knew that her eyes were wide as she gazed into Zach’s. Even though Zach was pretending to be casual when he stated what was obviously a question, she saw right away that he was completely on edge. She felt such a deep outpouring of love for him right at that moment, she almost began to cry.

“Okay,” she answered quickly, and grinned. “Since we’re already living together anyway.”

Zach had explained everything that had been happening before they’d met, and Beth was not going to let it interfere with their future. Although he was still deeply worried about the trouble in New Orleans following him here to Crystal Rock, Zach had moved in with her and Kyle only a few weeks after Mother’s Day. Besides being able to keep a closer eye on all of them in case problems arose, it was silly for him to live next door, when they spent nearly every free moment together anyway. Everything between them just felt so right.

His stance immediately relaxed. “It’ll be a heck of a lot easier for you and Kyle with me around to help you out.”

The three of them settled into a routine during the next month. They made regular trips to the beach since Kyle loved swimming so much and toured the surrounding parks and did a little traveling to see some of the sites.

Zach was seeing a shrink regularly, but sometimes he had awful nightmares. He reassured her that it wasn't happening nearly as much as it had in New Orleans, and according to the doctor, he could very well continue having them for the rest of his life.

But Zach told Beth he had a feeling that it was up to him to find a way to resolve what he was seeing in his nightmares, and if they continued as vividly as they had, he might consider seeing a hypnotist, even though he didn't really believe in that kind of stuff.

It was an ideal existence and Beth couldn't have been happier, until one day in mid-July when Zach seemed withdrawn, obviously worried about something. After a brief hello when he walked inside the house, he headed down the staircase into the basement with Kyle.

With the help of Luke Bryant and the wounded warrior home's physical therapist Steve Raynor, Beth had surprised Zach with his own therapy space and specialized workout equipment as a Father's Day gift.

To say Zach had been surprised was an understatement. There'd been tears in his eyes when Beth and Kyle led Zach downstairs.

But Zach wasn't eager to work out like he usually was after coming home from work. When Beth followed him down the staircase, he barely noticed, as he sat in his recliner which was set up in their family room with his big screen TV. Kyle was watching a movie in his play space on the other side of the room with Em laying beside him on the couch.

"How about we all go for a walk and you can tell me what's wrong?" Beth suggested, sitting across from him on the couch.

He gave her a quick smile. "You know me that well already, do you?"

She smiled wryly.

"Okay," he said. "You're right. I do have something I need to discuss with you. I'll grab a bottle of water and wait for Kyle to have a snack and finish watching his movie."

Beth stood back up. "Alright. I'll be upstairs, having another cup of coffee."

Thirty minutes later, they were walking down the staircase leading to the trail that wrapped around the lake.

"It's my parents, Beth. They'd like to meet you and Kyle," he murmured, when they finally began strolling along the trail. Kyle was giggling and skipping ahead of them with his arms in the air while Em scrambled along beside him.

Beth felt deflated. "And you don't want me to meet them?"

Zach halted. "What? Where did you get that idea?"

Beth pursed her lips as Zach cupped her chin, staring into her eyes.

"Let me start again." He heaved a sigh. "They want us to come to New Orleans, and I'm scared to death about bringing you and Kyle down there with me after everything that's happened. Since the episode with the tree, nothing's happened here in Crystal Rock or at our home in New Orleans, although when my cousin Marc called me the other day, he told me about some personal information he'd discovered hidden in the house, which he wanted to show me. But I have this terrible feeling that if we all go down there together, I'm just inviting trouble."

"Well, you're just going to have to deal with it, because we're definitely all going." Beth kissed him, and then smiled serenely. "We can't be looking over our shoulders for the rest of our lives, Zach. If there's a way to resolve this situation, we need to find it."

"Alright. I'll be coming up with a few safeguards regarding your security, then." Zach smiled. "Like I've said a million times before, you're something else, Beth."

"Actions speak louder than words," she murmured, grinning slyly.

And then he kissed her, like he was never going to stop.

On the first day of August, they were on their way to New Orleans by private plane. They hadn't considered the fact that Kyle had never flown before, and rather than letting them fly commercial, Luke had explained the situation to his boss, Jake Loughlin, who was planning on installing adaptive equipment for Luke's prosthetic. Once Luke was recertified he would eventually be able to pilot for him. Jake had offered the use of his private plane and pilot, since Jake and his wife had nothing currently going on.

Beth brought along several toys for Kyle, and he would also be able to watch movies once they were in the air.

Although the takeoff definitely scared him, Kyle seemed to enjoy the flight, and was especially fascinated with the scenery looking down through the window. Thankfully, they'd been able to bring Emily along, because Zach felt much more at ease knowing that Emily, as usual, would be sticking with Kyle like glue during their visit.

When they disembarked from the plane at the airport, Marc was waiting for them inside with a smile on his face.

Zach smiled widely when Marc approached and pulled him into his arms for a big bear hug before turning and making introductions.

"Marc, I'd like you to meet Beth. And this is our Kyle. Emily should be here shortly. Since she had to travel in her crate, they'll be rolling her in with the luggage."

Marc grinned. "Hi, Beth. I've sure heard a lot about you."

Smiling, she reached out a hand. "It's nice to meet you too, Marc."

"Eh, we're going to be cousins soon," Marc said, tugging her hand and pulling her into his arms.

After seeing his mom being hugged, Kyle decided he should have one too, and Marc laughed when he wrapped his arms around Kyle, patting him on the back with obvious reassurance. "And I've sure heard a heck a lot about you too, Kyle, including the fact that if it hadn't been for you, my cousin probably wouldn't be engaged to your mom."

Zach was taken aback, because there was a strange clarity in Kyle's eyes when he began to laugh.

• • • •

STANDING NEAR THE FRONT door, Beth nudged Zach in the ribs after Marc had circled around the driveway to drop them off so they could unload their luggage.

"You never mentioned your family was this well off," she said. "You lived in a fricking mansion, Zach."

Grinning, Zach shrugged. "Does it matter?"

"Not a bit," Beth murmured. "Although it might be a little overwhelming staying here."

After grabbing the last bag from the pickup bed, Marc opened the back door for Kyle, who looked around the property with obvious curiosity when he stepped outside hanging onto Emily's leash.

Barking a short "woof," Emily scrambled out from the truck with Marc's assistance.

Smiling widely, Marc murmured, "Let's take your stuff upstairs to the bedroom first, Kyle, and then I'll be happy to show you around."

Zach said, "I see you've had some landscaping done this year, Marc. The place is beginning to look a little like I remember it did as a kid."

Marc grinned. "I've actually been doing most of this myself. Since Denise and I split up and she moved away, I've taken up a few more hobbies. Mom was never into flowers, but I'm kind of enjoying learning about them myself."

As they walked inside the front door, the scent of fresh flowers filled the air. Zach glanced into the living room, where the furniture had been rearranged and some new pieces had been added.

"Looking good," Zach murmured, turning to Marc who was halfway up the staircase with some of their luggage.

Marc paused. "We've got both sets of parents visiting, so I finished remodeling the office and living room because there will be some hired help and caterers going in and out during the week. School starts soon and I'll be teaching a new class, so I'll be working from the library for a while since everyone will probably congregate in the kitchen."

"I didn't realize you and Denise called it quits," Zach said, picking up one of Beth's bags.

"It was mutual," Marc answered. "We still keep in touch, because we work better as friends."

Zach nodded his understanding. Marc just hadn't met the right person yet.

"You can go ahead and follow Marc, Kyle," Beth said, picking up Kyle's luggage. "I think you can let go of Emily's leash so she can look around?"

"Yep, that's fine Kyle," Zach murmured. "It will be hard for Em running up and down the stairs. Why don't we let her find the way into the kitchen since it's straight down the hallway, and we'll unpack her food as soon as we come back downstairs?"

"I already laid a bowl of water on the floor for her before I left," Marc said. "I'm sure she'll find it."

Marc had even considered Kyle, putting him in the room next to theirs. It was much smaller than theirs, since Marc had borrowed some space to create Zach's new bathroom, but since it had an attached bathroom and shower, it would work ideally for Kyle and Em.

"This is so cute," Beth murmured, walking into the room and laying down Kyle's bag on the full-size bed. "This room is still as big as his room at home, which is a pretty good size."

"This is great Marc." Zach punched Marc in the shoulder, noticing the dog bed in the corner. "Geez, you thought of everything. Look Kyle, there's even a place for Em to sleep."

Kyle came inside, laying down his basket of toys as his eyes went wide. There were shelves lining the walls on each side of the fireplace filled with kids' books and a small selection of toys. The décor was simple, with a couple of small recliners which had been placed on each side of the fireplace, and the curtain and comforter were patterned with navy blues and white stripes.

"Don't worry about the fireplace, the logs in there are electric, because I thought it would be nice to have a night light for Kyle since he's sleeping in a strange place."

Beth walked up to Marc, kissing him on the cheek. "Thank you so much."

Marc grinned. "I'm just trying to make it as easy as possible for you guys to get here more often and visit. Kyle, this room will always belong to you."

Zach laughed as Kyle began pacing the room with his hands in the air. After testing one of the chairs with obvious approval, he stood up, pacing the room once more.

As Marc walked back into the hallway, Beth murmured, "Kyle? Put your clothes in the drawers. Okay? Zach and I are going to go put our things in our room."

Kyle moved over to the bed, opening his bag and dumping his clothes on top.

Grinning as she followed Marc, Beth murmured, "He'll get there eventually."

AN HOUR LATER, THEY were all sitting downstairs in the kitchen eating a huge assortment of pizza, chicken wings and ribs which they'd had delivered from a local take out joint.

The rest of the family would be arriving the following day, and Marc's parents would fly into the airport from California an hour before Zach's, so they had already arranged their own transportation, an SUV rental they would use during the next two weeks.

It was after dinner when Marc, Zach and Beth sat drinking coffee that Marc's expression suddenly transformed as he frowned.

Resting his coffee on the table, Marc turned his palms up, looking at Zach. "Let me show you the restorations I've done in the library. Beth and Kyle? Why don't the two of you come along too?"

When Zach stood up, following Marc as he walked through the kitchen, Beth looked at Kyle, picking up her coffee from the kitchen table. "Come on, Kyle. Let's go see more of the house."

Grabbing the Lego mobile he'd been putting together and pulling apart, Kyle followed behind Beth with Emily shuffling closely behind.

Distracted by the beauty of the room lined with books and its massive fireplace, Beth was surprised when Marc's expression suddenly turned grim when he walked into the library.

After everyone was inside, Marc tugged the wide sliding doors closed, looking at Zach. "The cameras have been disconnected in here. That's why I decided to do the major renovations now rather than later, so that there would be a plausible reason as to why they were no longer working. I wanted us to have somewhere we could talk inside the house without being monitored. Plus, I hired an investigator to dig up some info about the devices themselves once they were disconnected. It seems they have serial numbers, and they might have been here for a while."

"Damn it, Marc. You didn't tell me about any of this," Zach muttered.

"I was so happy you were finally moving on with your life," Marc admitted, heaving a sigh. "But now things have changed. That's why Uncle Niall and Aunt Celine are on their way here. Your parents have some explaining to do."

"Why?" Zach growled. "What have you discovered?"

"A lot of nooks and crannies in this room for one. I'm sure I haven't even come across everything," Marc answered, moving toward the fireplace. "Once the first secret panel was discovered by the workmen, we pulled all the bookshelves away from the walls and made it look like we were doing demolition beforehand, and then I had Jeff disconnect the cameras after knocking down the one wall that did need replacing because of water damage."

Marc laid his hand on the top of the mantle, and Beth heard a click as one of the panels within the fireplace surround popped out, revealing a long narrow space stacked with paperwork and albums.

"Your dad had to have known this space was here," Marc murmured, pulling out an album from inside and handing it over to Zach. "Besides a lot of bookkeeping records for the house, these are clippings from the nineteen eighties, when you were about five or six years old."

Sitting down in a chair and opening the album, Zach began thumbing through the pages.

And then his eyes went wide, looking at Marc. "There were kids being kidnapped from New Orleans when I was young?"

"I did some research," Marc answered. "Apparently, there was a human trafficking ring going strong in the area."

Beth approached Zach, looking over his shoulder, and as Zach continued thumbing through the pages, Beth noticed the last few newspaper clippings were about a young boy, supposedly rescued after being taken. No names were mentioned, but the background of the featured picture looked vaguely familiar. She and Zach had taken a walk to the edge of the property overlooking the Gulf before dinner had arrived earlier tonight.

“That’s our beach down below,” Zach growled.

Marc murmured, “I’m not one hundred percent sure, of course, without talking with your parents.”

“Oh, Zach. That explains your confusion and nightmares.” Beth said, before covering her mouth in shock.

“Yes. Everything’s beginning to make sense now,” Zach said grimly. “I think I was kidnapped.”

Zach felt surprisingly lighthearted during the remainder of the evening. It was like a dark cloud had drifted past and now he was finally seeing the light.

Marc had another surprise for Kyle. A keyboard had been set up in the living room, and while Kyle fiddled with making music, Zach and Marc had a few beers and Beth sipped on wine.

When they finally decided to make it an early night, Marc and Zach decided they would wait a day or two to confront Zach's parents. After all, they thought they were flying in specifically to meet Beth, their son's new fiancé, along with her son.

After telling her she was free to raid the guest rooms on the upper floors, Beth had already added some finishing touches to Zach's room, including a mirror, since all he had inside was the bed, one dresser and a single high back chair. After painting it a deep blue-green turquoise last year, which Beth said complimented the mahogany woodwork in the room perfectly, Zach had decided he would purchase new furnishings for the room once he returned.

"This is such a beautiful house, Zach. And so well kept for as old as it is," Beth murmured, once they were ready for sleep.

Kyle had been exhausted, and had gone willingly to bed with Em, who had laid in the dog bed for the time it took Kyle to brush his teeth and put on his pajamas. As soon as he'd laid on the bed, Em had hopped on top, burrowing into the covers beside him.

"Since I pulled out all my old furniture and painted, thankfully, I feel like I'm sleeping somewhere else," Zach admitted. "I used to have such terrible nightmares, and always thought I was hearing things in the wall. I even woke up a few times and thought someone was here in the room with me."

"I hate to say this," Beth murmured. "But maybe there was? Someone came inside and went through your boxes, after all."

Zach sprang up in the bed. "I hadn't even thought of that. I'm still trying to process what we learned about the kidnappings."

"I hate to say this, but there's another reason to be worried, Zach. Didn't it say in the paper that whoever had taken the boy had been shot by the person who rescued him?"

"Yes, it did. I poured over those clippings. That's probably why I keep having nightmares about someone being killed."

Beth sighed heavily. "If someone was here in your room last year? Maybe the kidnapper is still alive?"

Zach groaned. "That makes a lot of sense."

"And I know Marc said the kidnappings stopped, but maybe they just stopped around here. Maybe who was doing it simply moved their operation?"

"Geez, Beth. That's pretty darn analytical, and it makes perfect sense."

"I read a lot of mysteries," Beth murmured. "I have an idea."

"What's that?" Zach asked, feeling overwhelmed.

"Let's do something to get our minds off of this for a while? Especially since there's nothing we can do about it right now."

Turning to look at Beth, he grinned. "What have you got in mind?"

"You'll see," she muttered, sliding onto his lap.

Zach laughed, wrapping his arms around her.

HE WAS BEING PULLED by his hand through a cave in a dark tunnel, when a woman appeared.

“Take him back,” she yelled. “I can’t believe what you’ve done. There’s just too much chance we’ll be found, and it’ll ruin the whole operation.”

Zach could hear voices behind him, and one of them sounded like his dad.

A shot rang out...

And the woman’s face was gone.

Zach awoke suddenly, emitting a loud piercing scream.

“Zach,” Beth murmured. “Zach. It’s me, Beth. You’re shaking so badly. Are you alright?”

Zach dropped his face into his hands, hearing the words of his shrink. “Breathe in, breathe out. Breathe in, breathe out.”

Inhaling one more deep breath, he pulled Beth into his arms.

“I’m fine,” he murmured. “I just remembered more than I ever have about the shooting. And for sure, I was kidnapped.”

“Did you remember enough to identify the kidnapper?”

“Not quite, but I know that the woman who was blamed for it was actually part of the operation, but she wasn’t working on her own.”

Beth continued to keep her arms wrapped around him, and it was the most comforting feeling in the world.

“I’m so glad I found you, Beth,” he murmured.

“The feeling is definitely mutual, Zach,” she whispered.

Zach's parents hadn't even made it into the door, when his mother turned to Beth, asking, "So, when are you two getting married?"

Zach blinked. "Geez, Mom. I only asked her to marry me a couple weeks ago."

But he was trying to get over the initial shock of his mother accepting Beth as quickly as she had. She must have really liked her, because she'd never been too keen about the girls he'd introduced her to in the past.

Of course, Zach had never proposed to anyone either.

Zach noticed Beth was looking dazed, but she was smiling widely.

"You and my mom would get along great, Mrs. Logan," Beth mumbled. "That's the first thing she asked when I told her Zach and I were engaged. And she hasn't even met him yet."

Everyone laughed.

Zach looked at Beth. "You never told me about that, but we did talk a little with facetime on the computer, and I had a few words with your dad, too," Zach murmured, smiling. "For sure, you two would get along, Mom."

"That's good to hear," Zach's mom answered. "And please call me Celine, Beth."

Emily suddenly came scrambling through the hallway to acknowledge the newcomers, halting as Kyle approached from behind.

Emily cocked her head. "Woof."

"Hi, Emily. Nice to meet you." Zach's dad came walking into the house with some luggage and smiled. "Beth? I go by Niall."

Beth smiled. "Alright, Niall."

Zach's mom turned to Kyle and smiled as he approached. "And you must be Kyle?"

Kyle walked up to Zach's mom, wrapping his arms around her loosely.

Zach noticed his mom had tears in her eyes when she said, "My, you're a handsome young man."

Kyle laughed as she patted him on the back.

THE CATERERS WERE CLOSE friends of Marc's who owned a restaurant in town, and even though everyone had been in and out of the kitchen most of the day, Melanie and Kevin didn't have a problem with it at all as they put together an assortment of snacks, appetizers and side dishes. Kyle sat at the island several times just watching them with fascination.

Everyone sat outside in the screened in porch during most of the afternoon, where they'd be grilling steaks later on that evening in the new outdoor kitchen Marc had decided to add at the end of last summer.

The pathway leading to the overlook was even lined with flowers now, and Marc had obviously hired someone to take care of the grounds regularly.

As Kyle raced around the yard, Emily ran after him, ears flying when she halted and howled after discovering his hiding place. Aunt Katie and Uncle Bill laughed especially hard at some of their antics.

They were all having such a great time, having a few drinks and sitting outside, enjoying the breeze coming in from across the Gulf. Zach would hate the confrontation he was going to be forced to have with his father.

But it could wait until tomorrow.

“I hope you two are planning on having more kids?” Zach’s mom asked Beth.

In the process of slugging down some beer, Zach suddenly spit it out, wiping his mouth with a napkin Marc had magically produced.

“You alright?” he asked softly, grinning. “You ought to see the look on your face.”

“The question is, is Beth alright?” Zach murmured.

Beth was definitely looking taken aback when she answered, “Well, I am a little bit older than Zach, you know.”

Zach smiled widely when his mother’s jaw dropped.

Finally, his mom spoke. “You sure don’t look it.”

“Thank you,” Beth answered.

His mom suddenly looked crestfallen. “Then you probably won’t have any?”

“Mom,” Zach growled.

Suddenly, Beth started laughing.

Hard.

Beth’s laugh was infectious, and everyone couldn’t help but join in. Even Kyle.

“Well, Zach and I haven’t even had a chance to discuss it,” Beth finally answered, looking at Zach. “But I’m willing to try if he is.”

His family fell in love with her at that moment, Zach could tell.

And if he wasn’t already head over heels in love with Beth yet, he sure would have been now.

Beth loved Zach's family. They were warm and caring without even an iota of snobbery involved, which she'd been concerned about after realizing how wealthy they were. Her first husband's parents had been just the opposite of Celine and Niall, and they'd ignored Kyle as if he didn't exist, blaming his issues with autism on her side of the family, as if his problems were totally dependent on genetics.

Zach had another nightmare, but it was basically the same as it had been the night before, and he hadn't recalled anything other than what he'd already remembered.

Except for Em, everyone was going out for lunch today and to take a short tour of town, which Beth was sure they were doing for her benefit since she'd never been here before. It was off season, so Beth, Celine and Aunt Kate did a little shopping while the men had a couple beers at one of the more colorful restaurants where they'd eaten lunch. There was entertainment, a small trio of jazz musicians had played and sung, and Kyle had sat watching in fascination. In fact, Beth couldn't believe how well he'd been behaving. But it might have had something to do with the fact that Kyle rarely got to do these things, and everything was new and exciting.

When they arrived home, everyone was a little sleepy, so they sat outside again on the porch for a while. Eventually, Zach's dad went off to make some calls for work while Zach's Uncle Bill went upstairs to their room to take a nap.

Celeste and Aunt Kate decided to check on the progress in the kitchen. Later on, they were apparently having guests for an open house dinner and the caterers were back today, finishing their preparations, and supervising the employees who would be here to serve the food and drinks tonight. Many of Marc's friends would be here along with some of the neighbors.

Beth was sitting alone in a rocking chair nearly dozing off, when she heard some unusual activity coming from Kyle's keyboard set up in the living room.

Standing and walking into the house, Beth murmured, "What the...?"

When she arrived in the living room, Zach was sitting beside Kyle watching as he skillfully combined notes to play one of the jazzy renditions they'd heard earlier today in the bar.

Both Aunt Kate and Celeste were standing nearby, open-mouthed.

Finally, Celeste murmured, "I've never in my life seen anything as amazing as that."

"I agree," Aunt Kate said, looking dazed.

Beth was speechless for a moment herself. This talent Kyle had seemed to be transforming into something wonderful. But how in the world could she channel something like that?

As Kyle continued to play, Celeste approached Beth. "Beth? How long as he been doing this?"

"Just since Christmas," Beth murmured.

Her eyes going wide, Celeste continued, "I used to be a music teacher, and I have never seen anyone with an ear like Kyle's. He's even getting the inflections right, as if he senses the emotions behind the music. I wonder if..."

"What...?" Beth asked.

"Let's just see what the future brings," Celeste answered. "I think he could benefit from specialized training. He obviously understands everything going on around him better than we think." Reaching out, she squeezed Beth's hand. "We'll talk about this more at the end of the week."

"Alright," Beth answered, catching Zach's eye.

He was looking muddled, just like she was.

UNTIL LIEUTENANT COLONEL Jackson walked inside through the front door, veering straight towards Zach and his dad, Zach had been enjoying himself immensely at the open house later that night. Noticing a slightly familiar younger man following Colonel Jackson inside, Zach frowned, puzzled. He was probably about Marc's age, but where had Zach seen the man before?

Zach turned back to his dad, who was greeting the Colonel.

"Ed," Dad said. "Good to see you again."

"Same here," the Colonel answered, noticeably disregarding a salute, along with not addressing him as sir.

Zach guessed it was something Dad had accepted years ago since they were friends.

Dad asked the Colonel, "Was the mission successful?"

"Eventually," he murmured. "Four months was too damn long."

"I'll say," Dad answered. "Help yourself to food and drinks. I hope we'll be seeing you during our stay?"

"I'm sure you will," Colonel Jackson murmured, sounding rather odd. "Nice spread. Guess I'll help myself to something to eat."

"Good," Dad answered. "Talk with you later."

The Colonel nodded, turning to Zach. "Zachary."

"Sir," Zach murmured, saluting.

Zach and his Dad watched as the Colonel walked away.

"Dad?" Zach said softly.

"Son?"

Zach heaved a sigh. "We need to talk. Tonight, after everyone's gone."

Strangely, his father looked resigned.

"Okay. Let's meet in the library," Dad said.

"I think that everyone, including Uncle Bill, Aunt Kate and Marc, should be there too."

"Alright, Zach," Dad murmured. "I'd better go mingle."

ZACH COULDN'T BELIEVE it, but Kyle was doing it again. Granted, not as well as he had with the keyboard, but this time Beth was sitting beside him at the grand piano playing a few notes along with Kyle.

"I didn't realize you played too," Zach murmured, sitting on the other side of Kyle.

Beth grinned. "You never asked."

"So, he's had experience on a piano?" Zach asked.

"I had an old out of tune one in our basement which I gave to a friend before we moved. Kyle used to mess with it, but not for very long," Beth admitted.

"Probably because it was out of tune," Zach said. "Maybe he couldn't match up the music with the chords, and it bothered him."

Beth grimaced, her eyes going wide. "You might be right."

Music was playing in the background tonight. Marc had set up a Bluetooth speaker and it was loaded with familiar songs. Kyle kept tinkling with the piano keys, until suddenly, he began playing one of the popular songs he must have heard coming from the Bluetooth.

"Alright," Marc murmured, now standing beside them. "This is really freaking me out. I feel like we're hosting a virtuoso, here. Everyone's gone quiet listening."

Beth's eyes met Zach's and they both began laughing.

• • • •

WHEN RYE CARLTON STOPPED by at the end of the evening, he'd mentioned to Marc that he had some important information to share with Zach about the kidnappings in the past. The word had spread in the family about the meeting in the library, so Marc had invited Rye to join them. After discussing a few things with Rye, Marc told Zach that he was sure the information was relevant to what was going on now.

Less than an hour later, Zach and Beth were tucking Kyle in under the covers after Beth had given him a quick bath. Zach had taken Emily outside and carried her upstairs to Kyle's room, laying the dog on the bed next to Kyle, who'd fallen immediately asleep.

The electric fire was burning bright and flickering in the fireplace, when Zach bent over, giving Kyle a quick kiss.

And then he turned to Beth. "Are you ready? I have a feeling Dad knows what we're going to be talking about."

"Hopefully, it will give you closure, Zach," Beth murmured.

Pulling her into his arms, he kissed her quickly, and after wrapping his arm over her shoulders, they left Kyle sleeping in the bedroom, heading downstairs.

A few minutes later, the remainder of the guests had left, while the caterers and their team began the cleanup in the living room and kitchen.

“Okay, Zach. Why don’t you start?” Marc asked, after closing the sliding door to keep their conversation private.

Mom and Dad were sitting on one couch while Uncle Bill and Aunt Kate sat across from them on the other. Rye Carlton was situated a little further away on a club chair near the fireplace.

Beth was standing near Zach, who was leaning against the desk beside Marc.

Zach picked up the scrapbook, holding it up in his hand.

Mom gasped when she saw it. “Zach? Where did you find that?”

Zach answered, “Marc found it a few months ago Mom, behind a secret panel in the fireplace surround.”

Dad looked at Mom quizzically. “What is it Celine?”

Reaching for his hand, Mom looked into Dad’s eyes. “It’s a scrapbook I made. I needed closure after everything happened, Niall. My doctor suggested I put together a book with all the clippings I’d collected, and I didn’t have the heart to throw it away. I did so much busywork when you were on tour, and I started reading about the kidnappings, and before long, I was saving everything I read.”

Dad turned to Zach. “You’ve discovered what happened?”

Zach murmured, “Marc didn’t know for sure, but he guessed. It was me they were talking about in that last newspaper article in Mom’s scrapbook. I was kidnapped, wasn’t I?”

Dad heaved a sigh. “Yes.”

Zach rubbed a hand over his beard. “Why didn’t you guys ever tell me about it? I’ve been having flashbacks and nightmares since I’ve been a kid.”

“It was because of me, Zach,” Mom said, closing her eyes. “We’ve never told you because you almost had a little sister. When it happened, I was five months pregnant, and I lost the baby. Your father and I decided it was best to put it behind us because I couldn’t have any more kids. And we really wanted more. But that’s part of the reason why we moved away.”

Zach walked over to his mom and rubbed her shoulder reassuringly before Dad laid her head on his shoulder.

Rye Carlton cleared his throat. “Let me tell you a little more about what happened back then. If I’d have known you were the little boy who was kidnapped from this area, Zach, I would have told you more last year when you came to visit. I’d already been sent away to school, so I wasn’t living here at the time of your kidnapping.”

“Alright, Rye. Let me explain a few things to my parents first,” Zach murmured, helping Marc grab a couple chairs from the corner of the room and resting them near the fireplace so Beth could sit beside him. “Mom and Dad? Let me tell you what this is all about.”

Zach went on to explain what had happened the previous year, first with the discovery of the packed boxes upstairs in his closet which had been gone through, then about the cameras and surveillance, and next about the strange attempts he’d been sure had been made on his life.

“But, I don’t understand,” Uncle Bill murmured. “What’s it all about?”

“That’s the thing Uncle Bill,” Zach answered. “We just don’t have a clue why. But that’s why I left for Wisconsin last summer. Someone even had a tracking device attached to my new truck.”

Marc stood up. "I have some information to share with you too, Zach, but let's wait to hear what Rye has to say."

Rye looked grim. "Everything that I have to tell you happened after you and your parents moved away, Zach. First, regarding the Gerards? Vanessa Gerard was the girl I was seeing back then. None of you were living here when her father Peter was found murdered in the house next door to mine."

"You know, it's funny how I remember being shocked about the murder, but I never heard anything about who did it or why," Dad muttered. "I knew the Boviers fairly well. They were very sociable until Geneviève married Peter Gerard. And then her parents both died in an accident, which was too convenient to be coincidental. After that, Gen turned into a recluse."

"You're right, Colonel Logan. But this stays between us. Alright?" Rye said, glancing around the room. "There's still an active investigation going on, even though it's been years."

"Not a problem," Zach murmured, feeling puzzled.

"Peter Gerard was not only molesting his daughter, but he was part of a highly active human trafficking ring, that used to operate here in our neighborhood."

Everyone was suddenly looking at each other in stunned silence.

"There are too many details to explain, so I'll give you the short version." Rye heaved a sigh. "Vanessa was forced to marry Sam Danielson, and we finally discovered that Sam's mom had property in northern Michigan on Lake Superior, which was being used for transporting kidnapped trafficking victims. Anyway, Sam's a police chief in Wisconsin and eventually became a member of the special task force investigating this, and he's pretty sure that the trafficking was set up there after they had no choice but to lay low down here."

"But how could it still be operating?" Dad looked puzzled, scratching his head. "We killed the woman who kidnapped Zach."

"Dad? When you say we, who do you mean? I've been having this crazy dream about a woman who's pleading with a man to bring me back to my family, because it's just too risky to kidnap me." Zach cleared his throat, adding hoarsely, "And then right in front of me, the person who's holding my hand shoots a gun, and the woman's face is blasted away."

Dad looked horrified, staring at Zach.

"It couldn't be. The man's a hero," Dad finally whispered. "He said he saved you...and I've been paying him back ever since."

"Who, Dad?" But Zach already knew.

"Ed," Dad whispered. "Ed Jackson."

“I’ve always despised that man, Niall,” Celeste muttered. “I can’t believe we’ve been kissing up to him all these years when he’s the one who’s probably been responsible for this trafficking from the start.”

“He has to at least be a big part of it, Mrs. Logan,” Rye murmured. “Sam always suspected someone else living here in the neighborhood was part of the organization. There are underground tunnels and caves that have been hidden for years because of the early smuggling, and someone has to know this area pretty damn well to be able to hide all these victims.”

Colonel Logan let out a series of expletives before continuing, “I just remembered something strange. My father told me once that the Jackson family was related to Rene Breunard, and the family had been trying to purchase the Gerard home because it was originally theirs. Somehow, the family lost it during one of the wars. I can’t remember the details.”

“As far as the tracking devices and video surveillance? They’re supposedly military issued, according to my source,” Marc informed them. “But considering both Dad, Uncle Niall and Zach are Air Force, retired and active, I figured there have been a lot of friends in and out of the house. I think you’ve let a few people stay here when the house was vacant too?”

“Yes, you’re right Marc, we have,” Uncle Bill muttered.

“Jackson has always had access to anything he wants, with no accountability,” Niall growled. “He was in interrogation, so most of his missions have been top secret. I shudder to think about what he’s been getting away with during the years.”

“I think you should make a complete list of everything that’s happened during your life that might be suspect, Zach. Anything that might look like an accident, but you’ve never really been able to explain,” Beth said grimly. “It’s obvious, he’s worried about the fact that you might remember it was him who killed his female coconspirator that night. But there’s still something off about all of this, almost something fanatical, like there’s another motive for everything he’s been doing.”

Marc seemed to agree. “If he wants you dead, why not just shoot you?”

“He’s sure had plenty of opportunities,” Zach admitted.

Niall’s eyes went wide, staring at his son. “Zach?”

Zach blinked. “What is it Dad?”

“How much do you remember about your time in captivity, when all the members of your unit were tortured and killed except you?”

Zach swallowed. “God. You don’t think...?”

“You were drugged, but we could never identify what was used, and Jackson has access to everything, including something called scopolamine, which would explain your complete memory loss.”

Zach continued shaking his head, looking dazed. “But why, Dad?”

Rye asked, “Maybe jealousy?”

Dad nodded his head thoughtfully. “Maybe. But what was he trying to accomplish, if he’s responsible for having those men and women killed?”

Rye stood from his chair. “Tell you what? Maybe we should sleep on this for a night and get back together tomorrow and make a few decisions? And Zach? Do what Beth said to do and make a list.”

“That sounds like a good idea,” Zach answered, heaving a sigh.

Everyone began standing as Rye slowly made his way into the hallway.

Suddenly, a long loud howl echoed through the air.

Zach's eyes met Beth's in horror.

"Alex," they cried in unison, as Emily continued her long soulful howls.

Zach watched Beth run up the staircase as quickly as she could.

As Zach began to follow, he turned to Marc, who was poised to assist. “Don’t worry about me. Can you please go with Beth, Marc, in case someone is in there with Kyle?”

“Damn, I wasn’t thinking. Sure thing, Zach,” Marc answered, reaching the top of the staircase and running through the hallway and into Kyle’s room.

“Kyle? Kyle? Where are you?” Beth cried.

When Zach reached Kyle’s bedroom, the first thing he saw was Emily, acting strangely, barking at the fireplace.

And Kyle was definitely not asleep in his bed.

“Where is he?” Zach growled.

Zach couldn’t believe what was happening. Had someone actually snatched Kyle from right under their noses?

Beth flung herself into his arms. “Oh, Zach. Why would someone take Kyle?”

“I just can’t understand it,” Marc growled, checking inside the closet first and even under the bed. “Where is he? And like you said – why?”

Emily continued standing near the fireplace, howling now, with her nose up high in the air.

Before long, Mom, Uncle Bill, Aunt Kate and even Rye Carlton were searching the floor. Soon, they spread themselves out, continuing the search upstairs.

Zach was feeling overwhelmed when Dad walked into the room, whispering in his ear, “Son, we’ve received a ransom demand. You mentioned there were no cameras in the library? See if you can get your mother downstairs to meet with us there. Whoever it is, they’re requesting no one else be involved but you and I, but I don’t know what the hell he’s talking about when he’s requesting the medallion as his ransom. Maybe your mother knows, since she was the one comforting you after you were returned to us while I conferred with the police.”

Zach muttered, “Okay. So, say the two of us meet downstairs, and then everyone conveniently walks into the library like they’re looking for us?”

“That’ll work,” Dad answered, checking his watch. “But we need to hurry. We have less than an hour to figure out what this medallion is and meet someone down below who will take us to Kyle, where he’s hidden in one of the caves.”

“Alright, Dad,” Zach murmured, watching him leave the room.

“Mom,” Zach said, getting her attention. She had her arms wrapped around Beth, who had become surprisingly calm, while Marc continued studying the interior of the room.

Poor Emily still hadn’t quit howling.

“Zach?” Mom answered.

Zach showed his palms to Marc, who nodded his head imperceptibly as Zach held his Mom’s gaze.

“I need to go talk with Dad,” Zach announced. “Give me five minutes.”

Zach made his way downstairs, entering the library, where Dad was pacing the floor.

“He’s demanding only you and I deliver this medallion,” Dad growled. “But I can’t help thinking Zach, that he has something else in store for us, and I wonder if Kyle will be safe, even if we do figure out where this medallion is and hand it over.”

“I agree with you completely, Dad. But what else can we do?”

About five minutes later, Mom, Marc and Beth walked into the room.

Beth stood silent, definitely still in shock.

“What is it, Niall?” Mom asked.

Dad promptly handed over the note.

Mom shook her head decisively. “Hold on. I know where it is. Where is that album Marc?”

Marc rushed over to the fireplace, opening the secret compartment and then pulling the scrapbook out from inside.

After he handed it to Mom, she laid it on the desk, pulling a letter opener from inside the top drawer. Opening the album, she very carefully inserted the tip of the opener into the binding of the outer cover. After splitting it apart, she tipped the album and the coin fell onto the desk.

“I wasn’t sure what to do with the thing. Zach held onto it for over a week and then I finally got it away from him. At that time, I thought the case was solved and didn’t bother handing it over to the police, and I thought it would be too traumatic for Zach to hang onto it.”

Marc came over to inspect the medallion.

“Holy crap,” he murmured. “I do believe this is a rare Spanish doubloon which is worth thousands of dollars if not more. There’ve always been rumors about hidden treasure down in the caves because of the smuggling going on for so long.”

“It’s probably worth more if it’s important enough for him to demand it as ransom,” Zach growled. “I wonder if that was why all my belongings were rummaged through?”

Marc’s eyes went wide. “More than likely.”

Dad looked at his watch again. “We’d better get going, Zach.”

Suddenly, Beth seemed to snap out of her daze, and flung herself into his arms. “Oh, Zach. Please be careful.”

“We will. I swear I’ll get Kyle back, safe and sound,” he murmured, hugging her tightly and then meeting his father’s gaze. “Dad? Bring your Beretta.”

“I was planning on it, Son,” Dad answered grimly.

As they made their way down the trail along the face of the man-made cliffs, Zach realized he hadn't walked down here even once after he'd been kidnapped. He used to love the mystery of it all, imagining himself as a pirate sailing the seven seas.

Once he and Dad reached the narrow beach, a man moved out from the shadows.

"Come with me," he growled.

Stepping inside the cave, the man seemed to know where he was going, following at least six different turnoffs, and halting in the middle of a large open space.

"I'm puzzled. I never even knew this was here," Dad murmured. "And Bill and I did quite a bit of exploring as kids."

Moving further inside, Zach halted as the gravelly surface under his feet began to crumble and fall, causing an echo through the cavern. Zach realized there was a deep dark drop off where he heard water distantly thrashing against the rocks.

"Stop right there," Colonel Jackson murmured, aiming a pistol directly at Zach. "I want the two of you to back up – now – and stand against the wall."

They did as he said, and Zach asked, "Where's Kyle?"

Ignoring the question, the Colonel growled, "Have you got it?"

"It's in my pants pocket," Zach answered.

Reaching over and continuing to hold the pistol on Zach, the Colonel attached a shackle to Dad's arm.

Zach had failed to notice the hooks and chains attached to steel beams lining the walls. In fact, they lined the entire interior of the cavern. This must have been some kind of holding cell for slaves or maybe trafficking victims, come to think of it. The chains and shackles appeared to be relatively modern, so the original passageways must have been updated and restructured somehow since Dad had been young.

"Get it out," the Colonel snarled. "And do it slowly. Tyler's got a shotgun trained on the two of you, so don't get any ideas. Plus, you'll never see that kid again if you give me trouble."

Zach pulled the medallion out from his pocket, handing it over to the Colonel.

The Colonel sighed with obvious relief, muttering strangely, "I never thought I'd see you again, my lucky charm."

The Colonel's expression had become diabolical. "And now, what I've been waiting to do for years, after plotting my revenge. I've finally got the two of you where I want you."

Continuing to point the pistol at Zach, he motioned with his hand toward the deeper end of the cavern. "I want you there. Move."

When Zach approached the deeper darkened interior of the cavern, his eyes went wide in shock. A huge flat stone was centered toward the end of the room and it was covered in pools of dried blood. Along a ledge rested hundreds of tools of assorted types and sizes Zach recognized as items used for torture, while several more devices hung on the wall.

The Colonel smiled slyly, staring at Zach. "Lay down."

AFTER DISMISSING THE caterers, Marc had taken Beth back upstairs to keep her distracted. Rye and Marc's mom and dad had retreated to the library with Celine and were anxiously awaiting word of not only Kyle but of Zach and Niall. Marc had told them what was going on after the fact, and Uncle Bill had not been pleased to be left out.

Maybe they could figure out how Kyle had been abducted? Grabbing a bowl of water for Emily first, since she hadn't stopped barking and howling since Kyle had disappeared, they returned to Kyle's room to go through it again.

Let's look at this logically," Marc murmured. "There has to be a secret passageway, Beth. There's no other explanation."

"Emily keeps barking at the fireplace," Beth said.

"Okay. It's been closed up for years, so right there I'm thinking of a possibility." Marc looked down at the floor. "Let me get a flashlight. We keep a couple in the linen closet for emergencies."

Walking from the bedroom and returning a few minutes later, Marc laid on the floor with the flashlight. "It's recently been cleaned and polished. Let me see if there are any marks which could give me a clue."

"Alright," Beth answered, fingering the mantle like Marc had downstairs.

"I definitely see something here on the right," Marc observed.

And standing back up, he began studying the left side of the fireplace first, shining his flashlight where the brick met the wall.

His eyes went wide, glancing at Beth. "I think I see hinges."

"Really?"

Moving over to the right, Marc started flashing the light along the edge of the fireplace.

"Here," he murmured, wedging his finger behind, and flipping down a switch. "I think it's on some kind of wheels."

And when the right side of the fireplace popped out about an inch, Marc opened it wide like a door.

After a sharp yip, Emily went running inside.

"Emily. No," Beth cried.

"Shoot, shoot, shoot," Marc growled, attempting to shine his flashlight into the dark space where Emily had disappeared. "I still hear her running."

Beth moaned, "We have to go after her."

"I'll go," Marc growled.

Beth stomped her foot. "They're my family too. You're not going without me."

"Okay," Marc answered, rubbing a hand over his face. "Let's do this sensibly. Hurry up and change out of that dress you have on. I don't know what we'll find, so put on some jeans and a sweatshirt, and I'll do likewise. I'll get my weapon and a stronger lantern from my room upstairs. Alright?"

Pursing her lips, Beth nodded yes.

"Hurry, Beth."

And she did.

Zach felt like he was ready to be sacrificed, laying down on the stone altar. But he knew that the Colonel had something far worse in mind since Zach had noticed the power cord hanging from above. The cavern was well lit where Dad was shackled, and Zach noticed several electric powered lights strung from the irregular stone ceiling.

There was really no chance of rescue, but why invite the inevitable, so Zach did something he did best under duress.

He talked.

Zach asked grimly, "It was a trap in Afghanistan? Wasn't it?"

Like Zach figured, Jackson was going to take the time to gloat.

"And it would have worked, if your dad hadn't called in reinforcements. I needed him to follow instructions and come alone."

Dad growled, "So you killed ten men and women, just for some screwed up idea for revenge? You let a band of terrorists take control of them. All except Zach, so you could use him to lure me there. What in the hell did I ever do to you, Ed?"

Zach could see the expression on Dad's face, and he realized that Dad had just remembered something important.

"You and your father are the reason my father is dead," Jackson screamed.

Dad answered, "He had to be turned in, Ed. He was molesting little boys. Hell, Ed...he tried to assault me. What was my Dad supposed to do – let it go? How did you even know about it?"

The Colonel stayed silent.

Zach answered, "Because your friend Ed was being molested by his own father, Dad. From what Rye Carlton mentioned, it was common practice in their organization to hand out their own children to their friends."

"There's nothing wrong with that," Jackson growled, moving back to his equipment.

Dad asked suddenly, "When did you have all these passageways added and reinforced? None of this was here when we were young."

"Back in the 1960's, Peter Gerard and I hired Robert Moses, who'd planned the overpass and underground highway system for New Orleans. I'd invested in the project, but the feds and idiots responsible for the historic preservation of New Orleans wouldn't let it be finished. I was impressed by the completed reinforced structure underground, which, by the way, is still there, although it's been altered and reinforced."

"What's the importance of the medallion?" Zach asked, not really expecting a reply.

"It's our family's legacy, since Rene Breunard, that we should always control this province," Jackson answered, sounding maniacal.

Turning his head from where he laid shackled on the stone altar, he studied Jackson's face.

He was completely and irrevocably mad.

When Jackson held up an electric iron, Zach knew he intended to start inflicting torture by brandishing it into his chest. Zach's capture in Afghanistan had revolved around imposing torture using many of the same techniques, except the burning had been exacted on his back and buttocks instead.

Suddenly, Zach heard a strange noise coming from one of the tunnels. It sounded like a wild animal was approaching, ready to strike.

A moment later, Zach was never as surprised as he was to see his basset hound Emily attacking Colonel Jackson, snarling.

Startled, Jackson dropped the iron, reaching for his pistol and getting off a shot.

Luckily, it missed Emily, but clearly understanding Colonel Jackson intended harm, she sunk her teeth through his pants.

Jackson let off a loud piercing scream as Emily kept going after him, obviously ripping into his skin.

Dad shouted, "Ed watch out."

But Emily refused to quit, and suddenly Zach heard the earth beneath the Colonel crumbling, where he must have reached the edge of the shallow ravine which dropped into the manmade pit that Zach had nearly stepped into when they'd arrived.

The Colonel yelled, "Stop, noooooooooo..."

Still snarling, Emily stood watching as the Colonel went over the edge, screaming as he dropped out of sight.

Dad sighed loudly. "Holy crap, I can't believe any of this. There was no possible way to save him."

"Dad," Zach answered grimly. "He dug his own grave. We can't feel sorry about any of this. I wonder how many people he's been trafficking through the years?"

"God, Zach. I'm not sure how we're going to get out of this, but I'm so glad you're okay. You know this area used to be a haven for alligators? I wonder if that manmade pit Ed just fell into is related somehow? You don't suppose...? I know I haven't said it in a while, but I love you, Son."

Zach answered, "Same here, Dad."

"Well, what have we here?" The man who had led them into the cavern had returned.

Damn it, Zach had forgotten all about him.

Strangely, Emily had stopped barking, approaching the stranger timidly as the man glanced around, grimacing, obviously realizing what had happened to the Colonel.

Zach couldn't have been more surprised when he patted Emily on the head, murmuring, "Come on. Let's get everyone out of here, where they're safe."

The man unlocked the shackles from Zach first, and then moved over to Dad, doing the same.

"This didn't quite work out the way it was supposed to. I was just waiting for the right opportunity to draw him away from the two of you." The man heaved a sigh. "Hopefully, I haven't wasted years of moving up in the organization to try and get the goods on some of the main players."

Zach blinked, "You're a fed?"

"I am," he answered, holding out his hand. "Tyler Jackson, AFOSI."

After Zach shook Tyler's hand, Dad shook it too.

Tyler continued, "I think part of the reason he wanted that medallion back was for financial security. You wouldn't believe how much that coin is worth. I'm sure he suspected the feds were catching on. He was running low on funds, since the operation was forced to move north and west, into Texas."

Rubbing his wrist, Zach asked, "So, what will happen now?"

"I'll more than likely move up in the organization. This attack the Colonel made on you two was unauthorized."

"He was going mad, wasn't he?" Dad asked.

"Worse," Tyler answered. "He had no moral compass or compassion. He could be classified as a high functioning sociopath."

Just then, Emily began howling again.

Zach grimaced, asking, "How's Kyle?"

Motioning for them to follow, Tyler gave them a fleeting smile. "Good. I think he thinks it's all some big adventure."

As Dad followed with Zach, looking a little dazed, something suddenly occurred to Zach. "Did you say your name was Tyler Jackson?"

For a moment, Zach saw the vulnerability in Tyler's eyes before he turned away and kept walking. "Yes. The Colonel was my father."

Dad looked shocked. "He had kids?"

Tyler sighed heavily. "Unfortunately, more than one."

Emily suddenly emitted a quick woof, running to Kyle when he saw him sitting on a couch, listening to music from an iPod.

Jumping onto the couch, Emily licked Kyle's face until he started giggling.

Bending over him, Zach gave Kyle a kiss on the forehead. "Your mom is probably worried sick, not to mention your Grandma Celine, Uncle Marc, Uncle Bill and Aunt Kate. We'd better get moving Kyle, so they know you're safe."

Kyle stood up with the iPod.

Rubbing Kyle's shoulder, Tyler said quickly, "He can keep it."

"Thanks for taking good care of him," Dad murmured.

"I'd like to stop by tomorrow and tell you a few things to give everyone closure," Tyler said, leading them back toward the cavern. "Plus, it's important for me to keep my cover, because you might still be seeing me around. Maybe like three in the afternoon?"

"That'll work," Zach murmured, as they walked into the cavern.

Suddenly, Beth came running inside the cavern along with Marc.

"Kyle. Thank God, you're okay," Beth said, wrapping her arms around him.

Kyle giggled, shoving her away.

When Beth bent over to rub her affectionately, Emily started licking Beth on the face as Beth kissed her back on the nose. "Thank you, Emily, for watching over him for me."

Zach blinked. "Where did you two come from?"

Marc pointed behind him. "There's a secret passageway leading here from Kyle's room."

"Ah, hah," Dad murmured. "That must have been how they captured you when you were a kid too, Zach."

Beth stood up, rushing to Zach. "I can't tell you how happy I am to see that everyone's okay."

"We did have some trouble. But we'll talk about it tomorrow," Zach said. "Beth, Marc, meet Tyler, who helped us out."

Beth said, "Thank you, Tyler."

"Yes, thanks," Marc murmured. "Say, aren't you the Colonel's caretaker who was at the open house?"

"Yes. But my relationship with the Colonel is a long story. I'm going to be stopping by tomorrow," Tyler answered. "It's lighter on the beach, and it might be easier for all of you to walk Kyle back to the house that way." Tyler directed them toward another pathway. "He's scared as hell of the dark."

Marc looked confused. "Where's Jackson?"

"Dead, I'm sure," Zach answered.

“I’ll be checking on him now,” Tyler admitted. “It’s complicated, but there’s a way I can squeeze into the entrance where he would have fallen. There’s very little chance he would have survived though, since the basin is composed of rock.”

“Good luck with that,” Zach answered, grimacing. “We’ll see you tomorrow, or rather later today.”

“At three,” Tyler agreed, sighing heavily.

Zach motioned at his Dad, Beth and Marc. “Come on, everyone. It’s been a long night. Let’s try and get some rest.”

Marc still had his jaw dropped down in disbelief as they made their way from the cavern.

• • • •

“SO, LET ME GET THIS straight,” Zach murmured, later that day. “All the accidents I was having were non-accidents, and you staged them for the Colonel?”

Tyler nodded his agreement. “Why do you think I left you headroom when I pretended I was trying to run into you last year? I timed it, plus I added the water to your tank, so I knew you’d be coming over the bridge pretty slowly. I simply waited for the tracker to tell me when.”

“And you messed with the brakes of my other truck?”

“Not until it was in Jackson. I simply drained some of the fluid. They must have lied about it needing new brakes, by the way. I knew you’d be coming through the flatlands, and I thought you would be the one driving it.”

Zach scowled. “That was stupid of me to take their word. I didn’t even check under the hood.”

Marc laughed. “It’s not like you weren’t under a lot of stress, because of your injuries.”

“I was feeling sorry for myself,” Zach growled.

And everyone laughed, including Beth.

“The cameras?” Tyler looked at Zach’s dad, grimacing. “Some of them were already here, Colonel Logan, and Jackson simply took advantage of that. Plus, the Air Force had been looking into Jackson’s activities for years, and you were suspect because of your association.”

Niall frowned. “Thank God, I didn’t know that. I would have been chewing everyone’s head off if I’d ever had wind of it.”

Tyler continued, “I’m not sure what happened in Wisconsin? Obviously, you came through it alright. I didn’t know about that until after the fact. He discovered he was being transferred into an interrogation unit in Iraq, and he would be gone for months, so he went up to Wisconsin for about three weeks. I think it took him months to discover where you were, Zach. Whatever you did, it got you off his radar.”

Beth blinked, looking at Zach. “The tree?”

“The tree,” Zach murmured. “There were marks from a chainsaw on both the large pine that fell into the railing and the staircase leading down to the trail. You and Kyle just happened to be walking there when I usually did my workout and jogged along the path.”

“That’s why we were down there, hoping to run into you,” Beth growled. “I was tired of you avoiding me.”

“Well, you did run into me,” Zach answered, grinning. “Luckily, I was there to get you unstuck.”

Zach’s mom was laughing the hardest. “I can’t tell you how relieved I am that Zach found you and Kyle, Beth. I never thought he was going to get married.”

“Or possibly have kids,” Niall murmured, causing Zach to look at him in shock.

“Did you just tell a joke, Dad? You’re not running a temperature or something?”

Dad laughed. "I've always liked the idea of being a grandfather, but since I have Kyle now, I'll be happy with whatever the future brings."

Tyler stood up, wearing what was definitely a sad smile. Beth wondered about his past, and the courage it must have taken to stand against his father.

"There's one more thing I think you have the right to know about Zach, although it needs to stay secret. You can't speak about this to anyone, if I tell you. Alright?"

Zach's eyes met Beth's as they nodded their agreement.

"It's about the airbase in Iraq. The problem with all the occurrences overseas was that I wasn't privileged enough to be let in on his schemes. The insurgent attack which caused all your burns?" Tyler heaved a sigh. "I don't think it was a random event. I'm sure it was planned by my father."

Zach looked shocked.

"Thanks for telling us, Tyler," Niall answered, looking grim.

"I informed my superiors as well. I'm pretty sure he was involved in treasonous activities, and if that was the case, there could be similar setups against our troops that he planned in advance. If he had terrorists working for him, they would expect reciprocation, so there could be trouble if he set any plans in motion with some of the terrorist groups."

Standing, Zach and Beth both escorted Tyler to the back door.

Zach asked, "What's the word about your father being killed?"

"He's simply disappeared," Tyler answered. "I've taken care of the body. And I have the medallion. I guess I'll hang onto that for now and put it somewhere safe, since it wasn't stolen. Who knows what the future's going to bring?"

"You know where to find me if you need my help?"

"I do," Tyler answered, suddenly smiling. "Best of luck to you both."

He turned, following the path.

And then he was gone.

Two weeks later.

Crystal Rock, Wisconsin.

“I can’t believe your parents sent us a baby grand piano as a wedding present,” Beth murmured as she and Zach walked along the Dragonfly Pointe Beach.

Today Kyle had on his swimming trunks and was sitting in the water looking out across the lake, while Emily, who didn’t enjoy swimming, had her nose in the air and was howling at Kyle.

The beach was rather deserted today, since school had begun in the area for all the local kids. Kyle wouldn’t start until the following week, although his routine would remain much the same as it had during the summer, working at the lumberyard with Zach.

“I can’t believe we caved under pressure and picked a date for the wedding,” Zach muttered.

Beth rolled her eyes. “You picked the date for the wedding.”

Zach grinned. “Everyone can stay with us for Christmas.”

Beth laughed. “I’m glad most of the rooms are nearly finished. Now I just have to make sure we have enough furnishings for the bedrooms since all of them will probably need to be used.”

“We’ll still have the house next door, since it’s vacant,” Zach murmured.

“At least until after Christmas,” Beth said. “It’s a great idea that you had about eventually making the house available for some of the families of the wounded warrior patients receiving care at the clinic.”

Zach grinned. “My idea? Ah, Beth, you’re something else.”

He’d been talking about families of some of the future patients when they’d been eating dinner together one night, and Zach had been trying to figure how they would all be able to be included in the therapy sessions if they had long distances to travel, once the subject had come up at a meeting that day at work. A certain amount of privacy would be needed so that family members could focus on their loved one’s rehabilitation.

Zach grabbed Beth by the hand, and they continued strolling along the beach, keeping an eye on Kyle.

Beth suddenly became serious. “Do you think we have anything to worry about from the Jackson family, since Tyler said there were more kids? What if one of them is as fanatical as his father?”

“I’d like to think Tyler would keep everyone in line. It’s funny how he never told us how many kids there are,” Zach murmured.

“Yes, it is. Or who their mother is,” Beth added.

Zach sighed. “With the way Jackson operated, I’m willing to bet there was more than one, and none of them willing.”

His glance was seemingly thoughtful a few minutes later when he asked, “What about Kyle’s father?”

“How come he’s not in the picture?” She hesitated. “Well, we met in college. I married Greg before I really got to know him well. He passed away nearly ten years ago, by the way.” Beth gave Zach a wry smile. “Let’s just say that he wasn’t very accepting of Kyle and didn’t want to take on the responsibility, so he divorced me.”

Zach raised a brow.

“His family was equally unsupportive. After that, he didn’t think he needed to pay any child support.”

“What an ass.” Zach’s voice was vehement.

Beth shrugged. “You know, he drank too much, he partied too much, he went from job to job after he graduated college.” She rolled her eyes. “He was on his fourth wife when he died, at only thirty-six years old.”

Zach grimaced, looking down at her. “What a guy.”

“He was an overweight wreck when he passed away. It’s weird how sad I felt when I heard about his death from liver failure though.”

They halted, and Zach gazed into her eyes. “You still had a connection with him, Beth, since he was Kyle’s dad. You probably always tried to look for something good in the guy, because there’s so much good in Kyle.”

They both gazed at Kyle, and there were tears in Beth’s eyes when she turned back to look at Zach.

“I never thought it could be possible for me to love you any more than I already do,” she told Zach emotionally.

Kissing her gently and pulling her into his arms, Zach whispered into her ear, “You know, this place is notorious for bringing people together who should be together, according to Luke.”

“Dragonfly Pointe? You mean all the tales about everlasting love and new beginnings?” Beth grinned, leaning back in Zach’s arms and looking into his eyes. “I even heard about those stories while I was visiting here as a kid.” She hesitated. “I never would have thought back then, that it would take me over forty years to actually fall in love.”

Zach grimaced. “Until I met you Beth, those words had always remained unspoken by me.”

She nodded. “Even though I was married, that relationship was pretty much over before it began.” Beth became thoughtful. “Unspoken? Yes, that about sums it up for me, too.”

“I’ve got something for you,” Zach murmured, reaching into his pocket.

Beth’s eyes went wide when Zach opened the box. “Oh, Zach. What a beautiful ring. Are those blue diamonds?”

“They sure are. It belonged to my grandmother. My mother wears the one that belonged to my great grandmother,” he said, slipping the ring over Beth’s finger. “When mom handed it over to me when we were visiting New Orleans, I took it as a sign, seeing the dragonfly setting. When we returned here, I had it cleaned and sized for you.”

Beth held out her hand, admiring the ring and blue diamonds, its sterling silver setting shaped from two dragonflies.

Zach looked around at where they were standing on the beach, and grinned. “This spot looks awfully familiar.”

And before Zach could say another word, he was knocked down onto the sand by Kyle, who’d apparently come running along the beach because he’d decided to torpedo Zach again.

Beth covered her mouth in horror. “Kyle!”

Emily began to howl when Kyle started giggling.

But Zach just kept laughing harder and harder.

• • • •

The End

• • • •

Want to read more from The Wounder Warrior Series?

Click Here To Get Two Hearts Surrendered

DON'T MISS AN UPDATE from Tamara, Join Her Newsletter for information about new releases as well as free books and available promotional sign ups and giveaways.

Sign Up Here!

KEEP READING FOR THE next book in Fractured

JUMP TO THE TABLE OF Contents

WRITING STEAMY YET sweet compassionate stories of fate that are wonderfully romantic, TAMARA FERGUSON is the multi-award winning, #1 international and USA TODAY BESTSELLING AUTHOR of the Tales of the Dragonfly Romance Suspense Series, the Kissed By Fate Series, the Two Hearts Wounded Warrior Romance Series, the Daydreams & Dragonflies Sweet Romance Series, and the Tales From Dragonfly Pointe Short Story Series.

Since 2015, she's earned more than 30 awards in the multiple genres of mystery, romantic suspense, short story fiction, novellas, women's fiction, new adult romance and military fiction for her series titles, including 2 Bronze, 2 Silver and Gold Medals, for a total of 8 from Readers' Favorite, and 12 awards from the Independent Authors' Network, including the 2019 OUTSTANDING FICTION NOVELLA WINNER For Two Hearts Under Fire.

A member of the RWA, the Authors' Billboard and the Independent Authors' Book Network, her stories have been included in several #1 bestselling anthologies.

Since she remains a full-time caregiver for an autistic son (along with a bunch of adopted pets!), you can usually find Tammy working at home, where she spends a lot of time not completing her numerous home improvement projects, because she's writing or helping author friends promote their books on twitter.

CHRIS PATCHELL: IN THE DARK

---

IN THE DARK
BY CHRIS PATCHELL

Author's Rating:

Language:*** Sexuality:** Violence:****

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE, each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

Text Copyright © 2019 Chris Patchell. All rights reserved. Except as permitted under U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, no part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed or transmitted in any form by any means, or stored in a database or retrieval system, without prior written permission of the author.

First published as an eBook by Chris Patchell on Kindle Press.

Marissa Rooney stands in her daughter's empty dorm room, a half-used vial of insulin clutched in her trembling hand. Brooke has been missing for days. Her roommate hasn't seen her since that night in the bar. And if Marissa has Brooke's insulin, it means that Brooke does not.

But Marissa isn't alone in her terror. A phantom from her past is lurking in the shadows, waiting in the night, and holding her family captive...in the dark.

Prologue

---

The heavy gate groaned shut. After engaging the lock, he pulled the backpack out of his Jeep and slung it over his shoulder. It was a rare fall day in the Pacific Northwest, and he planned to take full advantage of the good weather.

He had work to do.

He walked a quarter of a mile along the fence line and stopped. Then he pulled a “No Trespassing” sign from the pack and propped it against the fence. With a few sure strokes of a hammer, he nailed it to the post. The dull blows echoed in the quiet woods.

Branches and fallen leaves popped and crackled beneath his feet as he worked his way methodically along the ridge, checking the barbed wire fence for gaps. The cinnamon smell of the turning leaves was a sure sign that hunting season would soon begin, and he couldn’t afford to have strangers stumbling onto his property.

He nailed the last sign to the post.

There. That should keep the bastards out.

He turned and started down the rugged trail carved into the steep hillside. A couple of hundred feet below, the valley floor glimmered like an emerald in the late-day sun. Three cabins stood in the clearing beside the Tolt River. A half dozen more were scattered along the upper ridge, overlooking Lake Langlois.

The place had been a youth camp once, before the drowning of a teenage girl had destroyed its reputation. Afterward the camp had closed and the cabins had fallen into disrepair.

It was a shame, really. He had fond memories of the place. While his father had spent the summer basking in an alcoholic haze, he’d spent it exploring the woods, far away from his father’s violent mood swings. By any measure it was a win-win.

Dappled sunlight shone through the thick canopy of branches overhead. He loved days like this. Alone in the woods, he felt at peace with the world.

A scream rent the air, shattering the stillness of the afternoon.

It was shrill. Human.

Crows fled the safety of the trees, a torrent of black wings flooding the blue sky. Heart racing, he started to run. The uneven ground slid beneath his boots. Branches slapped at his face, and he ran faster, driven on by her panicked cries.

The valley floor was muddy after the long weeks of rain. The spongy earth slowed his pace as he raced toward the river.

Another scream. Louder.

“Help me. Oh God. Please.”

It was coming from the cabin farthest from the water’s edge.

His boots pounded up the wooden steps. Hinges squawked in protest as he crashed through the door.

The stench hit him hard—stale sweat and human waste. His stomach churned.

At first he could see nothing, his eyes blinded in the dim light. Then her slender form materialized out of the darkness—a slip of a girl, barely more than a hundred pounds. She was standing near the center of the room, her hands bound behind her back. A soiled University of Washington T-shirt hanging from her skinny frame. Pink panties. And nothing else.

The relief on her face froze the instant she spotted him. A small sob escaped her lips. She stepped back, retreating into the shadows.

As if she could hide.

“Now, Kim,” he said. “What was the rule?”

Her jaw worked, but no sound emerged. She took another pitiful step back, her wide eyes brimming with fear.

“What was the rule?”

His voice boomed in the small cabin. She flinched like a beaten dog.

“No calling out,” she mumbled.

“I can’t hear you. What’s the rule?”

“No calling out.”

“No calling out,” he repeated, smiling thinly. “That’s right. You leave me no choice.”

“Please,” she said, voice trembling, tears leaking from her eyes. “I’ll do better, I promise. I promise . . .”

He stepped toward her, his tread echoing on the bare plank floor. She shrank back, trembling, and stumbled over the bucket. Without her hands to stop her, she crashed to the floor.

He stopped. His six-foot frame loomed above her. She averted her gaze, looking anywhere but at him.

This will not do.

He hunkered down and gripped her narrow chin, forcing her gaze to meet his.

“Please,” she whispered.

Her mouth trembled.

“Aw, princess,” he said, running his thumb slowly across her swollen bottom lip. “I’m afraid it’s too late for that.”

He reached down and unbuckled his belt.

There was something seriously fucked up about turning a mortuary into a bar, Drew Matthews thought as he walked through the heavy oak doors of the Chapel. While much of the original architecture of the 1920s building remained intact, the interior displayed the tumors of decades of evolving taste. There were a few recent growths, like the U-shaped bar in the center of the former embalming room. Lit up like a runway at Sea-Tac International Airport, it guided him in.

The drink menu read like the King James Bible, with parables about sins and martinis. Arm propped against the bar, he ordered the Bruce Lee, a fast, tawny drink that howled like a banshee with fists of fury. It was named after the famous Seattle martial artist whose embalming had reportedly taken place in this very bar.

But there was nothing dead about the place now. Swarming schools of urban hipsters out for their Saturday-night fix swelled like dividing cells. So many desperate souls crowding the bar, looking for that elusive thing missing from their lives. Attention. Sex. Connection. Drew felt the pulsing need, so palpable he could almost taste it.

Tension rippled across his shoulders, into the base of his brain. If ever there was a night he'd felt like getting good and truly shitfaced, this was it. He knew he couldn't give in to the impulse though. Meeting the friends was a rite of passage he must endure for his relationship with Alicia Wright to progress. And he had every intention of taking their relationship to the next level.

He'd already picked out a sparkly new ring.

A hand ran up his back and he turned. Alicia had dressed well for her starring role. A fitted white blouse hugged her athletic curves, the plunging neckline low enough to reveal a delectable view of her cleavage. A tight black miniskirt rode up her well-toned thighs. In high-heeled boots, she was almost at eye level with Drew. He found the accumulated effect arousing.

Alicia leaned in close. He caught a whiff of her perfume. Dark. Floral. Orchids. Her ruby lips brushed his ear, sending sparks jangling along his taut nerve endings.

"Hey, look who finally decided to show up," she said in a sexy, throaty murmur.

"Sorry, I had to work a little late. Came straight here."

"Well, grab your drink and let's go. Gretchen's waiting."

Drew raised a finger and drained his glass in a long swallow. Alicia raised her eyebrows.

"You okay?"

"I've got some catching up to do."

So what if he was a little nervous? Who wouldn't be? Alicia and her pack of prep-school friends had grown up in a different world. While their nannies had dropped them off at private schools and playdates, he'd watched cancer devour his mother and his father fall to pieces. What could they possibly know about being hungry enough to steal food, or hiding in the woods all night, afraid to come home because your father was a mean drunk? Or being left behind, abandoned by your evil stepmother?

Alicia grasped his hand and tugged him away from the bar. Drew followed her up a narrow staircase to a wide balcony overlooking the main floor. The speakers blared and the upper deck swarmed with life.

He definitely needed another drink.

Alicia threaded her way to the front of the platform, where she stopped. Her back to the railing, she looped an arm around the shoulders of a chubby girl.

“Drew, this is Gretchen Lange. We’ve been friends since we were kids.”

“What she means to say is that we’ve been BFFs since third grade,” Gretchen tittered.

Bright-blue eyes sparkled in her doughy white face. A ridiculous mass of strawberry-blond curls bounced and jiggled when she laughed.

Drew stretched out his hand.

“Gretchen, at last. Alicia’s told me so much about you.”

“Not too much, I hope.”

“She didn’t tell me you were so lovely,” he said.

She wasn’t really. Clad in a skintight floral dress, she looked like a gaudy pink hibiscus. Smelled like one too. Up close, her perfume made his eyes water. But he knew the comment would score points with both women, so he said it anyway.

“Shame on you, Alicia, for keeping this one all to yourself.”

“She was afraid I’d embarrass her,” Drew said.

“You? Looking all James Bond? Not likely.”

“James Bond?” Drew asked, his lips stretching into a grin.

“Careful, Gretchen,” Alicia said. “You’ll only feed his ego, which is enormous, by the way.”

Drew’s mouth dropped open in mock incredulity.

“Don’t you believe a word of it,” he said, splaying a hand across his chest. “I’m the very embodiment of modesty.”

“Oh, I can see that,” Gretchen cried. “Modest and charming. A killer combination.”

Gretchen wasn’t very bright, but watching her was fun—in a train-wreck kind of way.

Alicia shook back the dark curtain of her glossy hair and leaned into him. The warm press of her body had him thinking more about the after-party than the festivities at hand, and he wished he could push the fast-forward button on the evening. Get to the part where she was his alone.

Glancing around, he spied the waitress on the other side of the platform. Raising his hand, he caught her eye. She hustled over and he ordered another drink—a nod to the serial killer Ted Bundy this time.

Moments later more of Alicia’s friends arrived. Amid a flurry of hugs and kisses, Alicia made the introductions.

“Tracy, Madison, and Liam,” she said, her bright eyes glittering.

The anorexic spandex twins could have passed for sisters with their long blonde hair and skintight dresses. The guy was tall, with a swimmer’s build and a bored, pouty look that said exactly what he thought: they were all beneath him. Ice-blue eyes stared at Drew through a fringe of wispy blond bangs in a messy, chin-length cut that could easily have cost a couple of hundred bucks.

Liam’s hand wedged into the small of Alicia’s back, his little finger inches above the curve of her ass. Eyeing Drew with the clinical stare of a scientist assessing his subject, Liam smiled. The bastard was baiting him. Wondering just how far he could push before Drew lost his shit.

He wanted to plow the prick in the face. Instead he grasped his ring and twisted it around his finger. The bloodstone ring glimmered red in the light. He remembered his father’s fist lashing out, how the ring had gashed his cheek. But he was no longer that boy. Now he knew there was more than one way to win a fight.

Drew tore his gaze away from Liam and scanned the upper deck.

Where the fuck is the waitress?

Apparently the universe heard him because just then the beer wench appeared, hefting a tray of jewel-colored cocktails. Like a frat boy at a freshman party, Drew inhaled half of his in a single swallow. Vodka burned a fiery path down his throat, and he realized with regret that he should have ordered a double.

“Drew, is it? Tell us how you met Alicia,” Liam shouted over the throbbing house music.

“We met at the investment firm where she works. I was meeting with my financial advisor when she walked in. She took pity on me when I asked for her number.”

Alicia smiled. “Pity had nothing to do with it. He asked me out for dinner, and the rest is history.”

“Investments, eh? Tell me about your portfolio,” Liam said, swirling an electric-blue drink around in his glass with his free hand.

“Why? Do you have some wisdom to share?” Alicia asked.

“Not likely,” Gretchen scoffed. “You see, Drew, Liam here is Seattle royalty. His father founded one of the first successful dot-coms and sold before the bubble burst. Unlike the rest of us working stiffs, he doesn’t worry about petty things like money.”

“I like to dabble in stocks,” Liam shrugged, sipping his drink.

“That’s sweet,” Gretchen quipped with a small, sour look that made Drew smile.

“Don’t you have people to do that for you?” Drew asked.

“Sure, but everyone needs a hobby.”

“A hobby? Now that’s funny,” Gretchen snorted, sloshing her drink onto her dress.

Cheeks flushing red, she glanced around for a napkin. Drew handed his over. Dabbing at her dress, Gretchen scowled at Liam.

“See what you made me do?”

“Not me, Gretch. You always were a sloppy drunk.”

“Liam!” Alicia said.

“It’s true. Don’t you remember the time we all went to dinner at that place?” Liam said, snapping his fingers like he was trying to recall. “You remember, Alicia, the posh little place in Madison Park.”

“Crush?”

“Yeah, that’s it, Crush. Gretchen got so wasted, the maître d’ hauled her out of there . . .”

“Escorted her, you mean,” Alicia said.

Liam waved a hand. “Whatever. The whole way out of the restaurant, she’s yelling at him, calling him names . . .”

“Until she threw up on his shoes,” Alicia blurted, before slapping her hand across her mouth like she’d just spilled a secret.

“Sweetheart,” Liam said. He paused and turned his affectionate gaze on Alicia. “You stripped down to your panties and danced in the fountain.”

“That’s right,” Gretchen said, her flaming-red face breaking into a smile.

“It was epic,” Liam roared, and the whole group erupted in laughter.

They spent the next half hour reliving highlights from their glory days—like the time Liam and Alicia took his father’s private jet to Paris for the weekend—while Drew stood at the edge of the group and looked on. An outsider. He laughed at the right moments. Feigned interest. Checked his watch. The minutes crawled by.

By eleven thirty the party was in full swing, but he was done. Alicia turned to him, as if suddenly recalling his presence.

“Get me another drink?”

It came out sounding more like a command than a request, and Drew bristled. Liam shot him a condescending smile and smoothed his hand over Alicia’s ass.

A hot burst of anger surged through Drew.

“Sure,” he said.

He grabbed Alicia by the hand and tugged her toward him. His eyes boring deep into hers, he leaned down and kissed her hard. Through the thin fabric of her shirt, he felt her stiffen, resist. So he deepened the kiss. His tongue probed the depths of her mouth.

All conversation stopped. The throbbing beat of the house music pulsed, and Alicia’s face glowed bright red as she pulled away.

Drew released her and winked at Liam on his way by. Last call. He had to get out of here before he did something stupid. But first he needed another drink.

And then what?

Then he’d do the smart thing. He’d go home and cool off. He’d deal with Alicia later.

After all, she wouldn’t have any trouble finding a ride home.

“Give me that,” Brooke Parker said, trying to snatch her ID card out of Tess Turner’s hands. But her roommate was too quick. With an impish grin, she held it beyond Brooke’s grasp and squinted at the photo.

“Seriously, this is the worst fake ID I’ve ever seen. Were you drunk?”

“Very funny. Like yours is any better.”

She grabbed Tess’s arm and managed to wrestle the card from her grip. Tess laughed.

“At least mine looks like me.”

“And you’re passing yourself off as twenty-three?” Brooke said, tucking her ID card back in her wallet.

“Hey, it was good enough to get us in here,” Tess said, sipping her drink. “This was your idea.”

They were both nineteen. Underage. And while Tess had wanted to go to an on-campus party, Brooke had convinced her to sneak into the Chapel instead.

“Your boyfriend was right. The guy at the door wasn’t exactly the sharpest tool in the shed.”

“He’s not my boyfriend,” Brooke said, looking up in time to catch a glimpse of Jesse Morgan holding court. Halfway down the bar, he handed an older woman her drink. There was nothing subtle about the hungry look on the woman’s leathery face as she eyed him, and Brooke frowned.

Assessing the situation in a flash, Tess leaned into her and shouted, “Careful, girls, tanning kills.”

Brooke laughed. She drained the few remaining drops of alcohol from her glass and winced. At least Jesse wasn’t skimping on the vodka. Three drinks in and already she felt as if she were floating on a soft cloud rather than sitting on a hard barstool.

“Not your boyfriend, eh?” Tess said. “Why not? He’s cute.”

Brooke shrugged. “We’ve got a history. We sort of dated in high school.”

“What do you mean, sort of dated?” An eyebrow arched in Tess’s pixie face. As always, she wanted to hear all the juicy details, but Brooke dropped her gaze to the empty glass and shook her head.

“My mom didn’t like him. Said he was too old for me. After graduation he moved away and I hadn’t heard a word from him until a few days ago.”

“Okay, so Prince Charming shows up looking this good, and you’re telling me you’re just friends?” Tess flashed a wicked grin. “I suppose that’s why you’re dressed like that. Because you’re just friends.”

Brooke glanced down at her sequined tank top, matchstick jeans, and high heels. “What, this old thing?” she said, and both girls laughed.

Brooke watched Jesse shake up the next cocktail and pour it into a chilled martini glass, this time for a curvy brunette. The girl said something and Jesse smiled. Brooke remembered that smile—the dimples carved into his cheeks. And how his eyes, as blue as a tropical sea, could make you feel like you were the only girl on earth. She missed that. She missed him.

Tess propped her chin on her palm, nudging Brooke with her shoulder.

“Earth to Brooke. Maybe you need to give him a reason to notice you.”

“Meaning?”

“Look around. The place is packed with gorgeous guys. Find one to flirt with.”

Tess had a point. There was no shortage of hot guys crowding the bar.

“Most are here with their Barbie-doll girlfriends,” she said.

“Don’t let that stop you. You look hot, girl. You shouldn’t waste it. So if Prince Charming is too busy to notice, find someone else. I’m even willing to play Cupid.”

“Wait, you’re going to pick out a guy for me?” Brooke asked, wishing she had a full drink in front of her. “No offense, Tess, but . . .”

“But what?”

Brooke grinned. “It may surprise you to know that we don’t exactly have the same taste in men.”

“Or women.”

A wicked glint twinkled in her roommate’s eyes, and Brooke shook her head.

“You’re so bad. Okay. You remember the last guy you hooked me up with?”

God. What a disaster that was.

“Yeah, he had that thing about picking his nose,” Tess said.

“I could have dealt with the nose thing, but when the police crashed our date to arrest him on an open bench warrant . . .”

“Come on, he wasn’t that bad.”

“Tess, he was a felon.”

A sheepish smile spread across her friend’s face. “Okay, you got me there, but everyone’s allowed an off day.”

“Is that what you call it?”

“The next one’s a can’t-miss, right?”

Brooke laughed and shook her long blonde curls over her shoulders. Tess laughed too. It was getting late, and Brooke swung her gaze back toward Jesse, wishing that just once he would glance her way. He didn’t though. He was too busy fist-bumping some guy when she heard a man’s voice close beside her.

“Hey, beautiful, buy you a drink?”

Brooke glanced around. A brawny guy leaned against the bar, staring straight at her. He had a boxer’s face with a crooked nose, like the kind that had been broken more than once. She shied away from the cloud of beer breath wafting her way.

“No thanks. I’m good,” she said, turning back toward Tess.

“Anything you want. Sky’s the limit. The name’s Sully. Charles Sully.”

Brooke groaned. Really? Could this night get any worse? She pulled out her phone, pretending to read a text message.

“No thanks,” she said again, sounding distracted.

She hoped the dismissal would send the guy packing, but she could still feel him standing beside her.

“You’re not one of those stuck-up girls who thinks she’s too good to talk to a nice guy like me, are you?”

She wasn’t trying to be a bitch, but he wasn’t her type, and there was something about the look in his eyes she didn’t like. Brooke searched for something to say, some kind of polite brush-off that wouldn’t upset him.

Her roommate saved her the trouble.

Tess smacked her hand solidly on top of Brooke’s. Quick as lightning, she snatched Brooke’s phone off the bar and stuck it directly in Sully’s face. The flash flared, and the phone’s camera clicked, recording his ruddy image. Light glinted off the stud in Tess’s eyebrow.

Easing forward, Tess eyed Sully with a hard look.

“Back off, shit-for-brains, she’s with me.”

Sully's thick lips parted in a predatory grin. Brooke caught a glimpse of sharp incisors. She inched closer to Tess.

"That's okay, bitch. I'm man enough for both of you."

"I doubt that," Tess said.

"Sorry I'm late," a voice, deep and male, said behind them.

Brooke spun, looking up into his face. Her stomach lurched. Talk about Prince Charming. He was gorgeous. Six feet tall, he had a lean, muscular build. Straight nose. Angular cheekbones. There was something oddly familiar about him, like maybe she had seen him on campus.

His chocolate-brown eyes locked on hers. She searched for something to say, but her mind went blank. As usual, Tess didn't miss a beat.

"It's about time you got here," she said, sounding annoyed.

"Yeah. Sorry about that. Is everything okay?"

He turned his steady gaze on Charles Sully's broad face. Sully stared back. Brooke's stomach tightened another notch as the two men eyed each other like a pair of pit bulls facing off.

"Have we got a problem here?" the newcomer asked.

Jaw clenched, Sully looked away. He pushed off of the bar and dissolved into the crowd.

Brooke's heart still pounded. She was glad Sully was gone. He might not have scared Tess, but there was something about him that had set her nerves on edge.

"Thanks," Brooke breathed.

"Looked like you could use a hand."

"You can say that again. That fuck-wad wouldn't take no for an answer." Tess rolled her eyes.

"I was kind of hoping he'd make a thing of it."

"I'm Tess, by the way, and this is Brooke."

Brooke smiled.

"So, ladies, who do I have to screw to get a drink around here?" he asked, shifting his gaze away from Brooke to the bar.

"Unfortunately, that guy."

Brooke hooked a thumb toward Jesse, stationed at the far end of the bar. The handsome stranger grinned and raised his hand to flag down the nearest bartender. She caught a flash of gold and red, and her gaze lingered on his ring. It was old. Unusual. Like a class ring, with a dark-red stone embedded in a thick gold band.

A strong sense of déjà vu tickled the back of Brooke's brain. She knew him from somewhere. She tried to think, but her brain was still foggy from the last cosmo she'd inhaled. The memory refused to click into place—maddeningly aloof, like a word poised on the tip of her tongue. She shook her head.

Tess hopped off of her barstool.

"Where are you going?" Brooke hissed, grabbing her arm.

"To the ladies' room. Why? Do you want to watch?"

Brooke released her grip and Tess winked. Gone in a flash, she was swallowed up by the crowd. The guy shouted his drink order to a skinny bartender with a neck tattoo and a scruffy hipster beard.

"Want anything?" he asked.

"A cosmo."

Before he'd shown up, she'd been thinking it was time to go. Now Brooke didn't see the harm in staying for one more drink.

Her phone buzzed on the bar. She picked it up and read the new text.

Go for it. If you don't, I will.

Tess.

She glanced around, looking for her partner in crime, but the press of bodies made it impossible to see more than a few feet in any direction. Brooke tucked the phone back in her pocket, hoping he hadn't seen the text.

"What did you say your name was?" he asked.

"Brooke Parker."

She held out her hand. His grip was warm and strong. A shiver of electricity passed through her at his touch. A memory clicked into place, and just like that, she had it. She remembered who he was.

"You're Andy. I knew I recognized you."

"What's that?" he asked, craning his head back toward her.

"Andy, right?"

All at once his expression changed. His eyes narrowed and she was caught by the intensity of his stare. Brooke blushed. The fact that she embarrassed so easily was infuriating, but she couldn't look away either. Her gaze focused on the taut line of his mouth. He glanced at the balcony. Then he smiled.

"Brooke Parker. It's been a long time. Look at you. All grown up."

His eyes roved over her slowly, appreciatively, triggering another infuriating blush.

"You don't look so bad yourself, Andy."

He tipped his head close and whispered in a conspiratorial tone, "I go by Drew now."

His warm breath tickled her ear, sending shivers down her spine.

"Are you here with your girlfriend?" she asked, half dreading the answer.

"Are you?" he asked, looking amused.

"Tess is my roommate. It looks like she's abandoned me though."

"Your stalker hasn't." He glanced across the bar.

Sully's acid glare was fixed on the two of them. Goosebumps prickled Brooke's arms. Andy—or was it Drew?—placed his hand on her back. The warmth of his touch burned through her thin tank top, and for a moment she forgot all about her stalker and Jesse. Brooke inched closer to him.

"Mom will be so surprised when I tell her I saw you. Kelly has a music recital tomorrow afternoon. Why don't you come with me? I mean, if you're not doing anything. I know Mom would love to see you."

"Let's play it by ear," he said, squeezing her shoulder.

She pulled out her phone, aimed it at him. He raised a hand in front of his face.

"What are you doing?"

Playfully she batted it away and snapped a photo. It wasn't the best picture. The low light made it a little blurry, but it didn't matter. She could tweak it later.

"Well, if you're not going to come to the recital, I need evidence that you actually do exist."

He stared down into her upturned face and smiled. His warm fingers brushed her skin, unleashing a torrent of butterflies in the pit of her stomach as he drew the MedicAlert dog tags from beneath the neckline of her tank top.

Running his thumb overtop of the caduceus medical symbol etched into the front face, he frowned. "What's this?"

Her cheeks burned. She hated this—admitting she had a condition. Waiting for the inevitable look of shock on someone else's face. Or worse, their pity.

"I'm diabetic."

She'd expected a look from him that said she was broken, but his expression didn't change. Letting go of the dog tags, he let them fall against her chest.

"Well, I don't know about you, Brooke Parker, but I've had enough of this place for one night. Where's your little friend?"

Brooke shrugged. Tess was doing a good job of making herself scarce.

"I hate to sound all big brother on you," he said, "but you really shouldn't stay here alone, not with your stalker lurking close by."

"Big brother. That's funny."

He grinned and cast his gaze across the crowded bar. Brooke didn't have to follow the trajectory of his stare to know whom he was talking about.

"You can't leave. You just ordered drinks," she said.

"And they're not going to get here anytime this century. I'm out of here."

"Okay." The tightness in her muscles was a subtle warning that her blood sugars were on the rise. She could use a shot of insulin. "You're probably right. It's time to go. Do me a favor and walk me outside?"

"Sure."

The crowd parted around Andy as he made for the exit. After grabbing her coat and purse from a hook underneath the bar, Brooke followed in his wake. He glanced up toward the balcony. Brooke looked up too, but no one seemed to be looking their way.

They stepped outside into the brisk night. Brooke shivered. The denim jacket that had looked so perfect in her dorm room did little to ward off the chilly night air. She pulled the phone from her pocket and launched an app to summon a ride back to campus.

"Shit," Drew said, stopping dead in his tracks. "I left something at the bar. You'll be all right?"

She smiled. "Of course."

He turned and jogged back inside, leaving her alone on the stairs. Brooke tucked the phone back into her pocket. It was darker out here than she'd expected. The sparse line of streetlights did little to penetrate the inky blackness around her. The one closest to the parking lot was out. Broken glass littered the pavement below. A cold wind ruffled her hair, and she folded her arms across her midriff.

The door opened. There was a burst of laughter and clicking high heels, then nothing but the gentle buzz of cars zipping by. Brooke glanced behind her and took a couple more steps away from the stairs.

It was creepy out here in the dark.

Brooke glanced at her phone, checking the time, wishing her ride would hurry up. It was cold, and she didn't like being out here alone. She glanced back toward the doors, knowing she'd feel a whole lot safer with Drew by her side.

The deep growl of a car engine roared close behind her. Startled, Brooke stepped back. A car squealed out of the parking lot in a flash of green and black. Tires squawked to a halt. Red taillights flared. Her pulse raced.

The car backed up. The window lowered. She recognized his crooked nose.

The high, airy sound of the flute faded, consumed by the deeper, earthy strains of the cello. The final notes settled in the darkened auditorium, and Marissa Rooney pressed a button on her cell phone. The digital display sprang to life. The woman beside her glowered, but Marissa ignored her. No new messages. Sighing, she flipped the phone facedown in her lap and brushed a hand over the empty seat beside her, the one she had saved for her daughter, Brooke.

The house lights rose and the crowd erupted into thunderous applause. Proud parents sprang to their feet. The conductor and the members of the Renton High School Orchestra bowed in unison, accomplishment and pride shining in their faces.

Marissa felt exposed in the bright glare from the overhead lights. She watched the couple in front of her. His fingers stroked the woman's hair, golden brown tinged with gray. She nestled close to him, her shoulder brushing his chest. They turned and looked at each other. And such a look. Pure devotion. The woman smiled and Marissa averted her gaze.

No one had ever looked at her that way. She had been married three times, and never once had any of her lovers gazed at her with such naked adoration. Perhaps it was the kind of look you earned only after years of enduring life's triumphs and trials together, or maybe the woman was just plain lucky, having met the right man at the right time. Whatever it was, Marissa was sure she would never know that kind of love.

She turned away from the stage and searched the back rows to see if Brooke had slipped in at the start of the performance. Just yesterday they'd exchanged texts confirming the time and place, so it wasn't like Brooke could have forgotten.

Why wouldn't she at least send a text? Irritated, Marissa slid the phone into a front pocket of her jeans.

All around her, families congratulated students on their performances. Colorful bouquets of fresh flowers were given and received. Marissa frowned. She should have brought Kelly flowers. She was never any good with that stuff, and maybe it was just as well; flowers were a luxury she couldn't afford on their tight budget.

Marissa stood amid the crowd, solitary and empty-handed. Surely she wasn't the only one who'd come alone? But everywhere she looked she saw families—mothers with their daughters, fathers with their sons, grandparents and siblings.

All she had were her two girls, and with Brooke starting college and Kelly giving her the cold shoulder, she'd never felt more alone.

An older woman with kind eyes in the row behind her smiled and leaned toward her. "Is your sister in the band?" she asked.

"My daughter," Marissa said.

"Oh."

The woman's eyes widened in surprise, and Marissa knew what came next. A swift mental calculation followed by a judgmental look. Ironically, the same people who treated her like she was a lower life-form for getting pregnant with Brooke at sixteen were often the first to picket an abortion clinic.

Marissa curved away.

Finally she spied Kelly striding toward her. Her long, smooth gait cut through the crowd, quickly closing the distance between them. Kelly had shot up over the past year. She now stood a good two inches taller than Marissa, and while she wasn't conventionally pretty, she was striking. She had her father's strong nose, jutting cheekbones, and flinty green eyes.

Marissa draped an arm around her daughter's back, drawing her close for a hug. Kelly's shoulders remained rigid. She tolerated the awkward embrace for the required two to three seconds before pulling away. Marissa bent to retrieve her coat and masked the painful twinge she felt in the pit of her stomach at the cool reception.

There had been a time when Kelly would rush into Marissa's arms at the end of the day, her small face beaming as if there was no person in the world she would rather see. But that had been a decade ago. Three failed marriages and half a dozen jobs later, she didn't know how to win back Kelly's trust.

"Where's Brooke?" Kelly asked, casting her gaze beyond Marissa toward the back of the auditorium.

"She didn't make it."

"Figures."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Brooke's pretty into herself these days."

"She said she wanted to be here."

"But she's not, is she?"

Marissa sighed. Truthfully, she couldn't blame Kelly for being disappointed. She was disappointed too. Brooke was usually so responsible. It wasn't like her to blow them off, not without a word. Whatever her own misgivings, though, Marissa brushed them aside, reluctant to criticize Brooke in front of Kelly.

"Something must have come up."

"Why do you always defend her?"

A familiar scowl darkened Kelly's expression, and Marissa let it go. The last thing she wanted was a fight. Not today. Not after Kelly's first performance at her new school. Sidestepping the question, she changed the subject.

"You played very well. I've heard you practice the piece before, but hearing it with the orchestra really brings it to life. How did it feel to be up on stage?"

"Okay, I guess."

Kelly avoided her mother's gaze and strode down the aisle. Marissa hurried to catch up. They had almost reached the back when she caught sight of a familiar face. The bottom dropped out of her stomach at the sight of him.

Logan.

Kelly must have seen him too, because she picked up the pace, threading her way through the crowd on a course that led directly to him. His bright-blue eyes crinkled at the corners, and he opened his arms wide. Kelly stepped willingly into his hug.

Logan glanced over the top of Kelly's blonde head. As he caught sight of Marissa, his smile faded.

Just looking at him hurt, like an empty ache inside her heart. She hadn't laid eyes on him in six months, not since she'd moved out of his house. Although he wanted to remain part of the girls' lives, she'd resisted the idea. Claimed they needed time to gel as a family. It was a poor excuse. In truth, she needed time to lick her wounds.

Anger, hurt, and betrayal rushed to the surface like the blood surging into her cheeks. Logan's expression remained neutral, as if seeing her again didn't make him feel anything at all. Lucky him.

Then again, he was a master at hiding his feelings, while hers had a maddening tendency to bubble over.

“I hope you don’t mind I came,” he said.

What could she say? He was already here. Vowing not to pick an argument, Marissa shrugged.

“It’s Kelly’s day. She’s free to invite whomever she pleases.”

Skepticism clouded Logan’s blue eyes and he looked away. For a moment Marissa studied his perfect profile. She’d been blinded by his sophistication, his beauty—doomed to see what she wanted to see instead of what was actually there.

“You were great, Kel,” he said.

Logan reached down and plucked a bouquet of flowers from the empty seat beside him. Marissa’s lips twisted into a pained smile. White daisies, yellow roses, and purple delphinium—all of Kelly’s favorites were tied together with an airy silver bow.

“Thank you. They’re beautiful.” Kelly sank her nose into the flower petals and sniffed.

“You deserve them.”

His eyes met Marissa’s again.

“I won’t keep you. I’m on my way to the airport.”

“You’re flying out?”

Marissa cringed at the disappointment she heard in Kelly’s voice. As a pilot for Alaska Airlines, Logan spent two weeks of each month traveling. She’d realized too late that the long absences from home allowed him to keep the two parts of his life separate.

Kelly blamed Marissa for the breakup. And why not? Logan had been her third husband, and she’d struck out again. That she was shielding Kelly from the ugly truth behind the split provided little solace. She supposed her daughter’s anger was the price she paid for her silence.

“I enjoyed seeing you play. You’re very talented, Kelly. Keep it up.”

Kelly clutched the flowers close to her chest, her cheeks glowing from his praise.

“I’m glad you came.”

Marissa felt a stab of guilt as she watched the pair hug one last time. There was nothing stiff or awkward about their embrace, and she wondered what good she was doing by keeping them apart. Whom was she protecting, anyway—Kelly or herself?

Logan grabbed his coat and followed the crowd toward the exit. Pausing with his hand on the door, he glanced back at Marissa. A blast of cold, damp wind blew into the auditorium, and Marissa shuddered.

“Where’s Brooke?” Logan asked.

Marissa frowned and glanced behind her. That seemed to be the million-dollar question.

Dull light filtered through the dirty windows of the commuter train. Marissa pressed her fingers against her ears, blunting the noise around her. Beyond the window the Seattle skyline emerged like a ghost ship from the pale mist as Brooke's recorded voice blasted cheerfully through the cell phone's speaker. Marissa's heart sank as she listened to the message for the twentieth time.

The beep sounded, and Marissa matched Brooke's upbeat tone.

"Hi, honey, it's Mom again. I know I must sound like a crazy helicopter parent, but I missed you at Kelly's recital. Give me a call back just to let me know everything's okay. Thanks."

The train jerked to a halt, and Marissa stowed the phone back in her purse. She followed the throng of Monday morning commuter zombies up the two flights of concrete stairs into the cold morning drizzle. Trudging down Second Avenue, Marissa looked up. The peaked pyramid of the Smith Tower had disappeared, swallowed by a thick layer of low-hanging clouds.

Marissa had always loved this building. It had history. Character. Built by New York tycoon L. C. Smith, the Smith Tower was the first skyscraper to grace the Seattle skyline, and for many years had been the tallest building in North America west of the Mississippi.

A century later the white, neoclassic building stood out against the other hulking monoliths like a white rose in a garden filled with dandelions. On a typical morning, walking into the marble-and-bronze lobby made her feel special, like someone who had done something with her life.

But this morning nothing was typical.

Worry buzzed like a swarm of bees inside her head. She strode through the lobby, ignoring everyone and everything around her. Stepping off the elevator onto the sixth floor, she found the law offices of Holt, Regis, and Grant deserted.

Marissa settled into her chair behind the reception desk and placed her cell phone beside her keyboard, willing it to ring.

Oblivious to her need, it remained stubbornly silent. She snatched it up and thumbed the small silver button to power up the display. No voice mails. No texts. No messages of any kind since the last time she'd checked. Twenty minutes ago.

Damned phone.

She rubbed her temples.

Why wasn't Brooke pinging back? There were at least a half dozen reasonable excuses for not responding, she knew. Right now, though, short on sleep, she couldn't think of many.

Would she be this worried if Brooke weren't diabetic? Certainly she didn't hover over Kelly in the same way. But it wasn't a fair comparison.

When Brooke had been diagnosed with diabetes at age thirteen, Marissa remembered how overwhelmed she'd felt by the complexity of managing her condition—learning how diet, exercise, and insulin all worked together to strike the complex balance necessary to keep Brooke healthy, while trying to forget the nightmare of things that could happen if her sugars went off the rails.

So she hovered. What parent wouldn't? Brooke hadn't seemed to mind. Until now. Did her daughter's silence signal a change in attitude? Was it time for her to back off and let Brooke live her life?

Maybe.

But Marissa couldn't let go. Not yet. Not until she knew Brooke was all right.

Her eyes burned with fatigue as she glanced past the flat-screen monitor toward the frosted-glass doors. Surfing the web was against company policy, she knew, but this early, who would notice? She'd be quick—on and off before any clients entered the lobby. No one would be the wiser.

So she launched a web browser and logged into Facebook. A few clicks later, she reached Brooke's wall. The cover photo was a pretty picture of Brooke hugging the huge purple W outside the gates of the University of Washington. Like most girls her age, Brooke posted frequent updates to her Facebook site for her four-hundred-plus friends to see.

Struck out in search of adventure. Need to get out of the rain for a while. Peace, Brooke.

Marissa read the post twice. Her gut twisted like a rusty turbine in the wind, and she knew something wasn't right. Brooke studied her ass off, earning grades that had assured her a place at UW. She wouldn't just take off. She wouldn't jeopardize everything she'd worked so hard for. It didn't make sense.

Hoping to find out more, Marissa clicked on the recently uploaded photos. There was one posted from inside Brooke's dorm room on Saturday night. Brooke and Tess stood with their cheeks pressed together, smiling wide for the camera.

There was another photo, uploaded last night. The young man in the picture was not smiling. Beneath an unruly forelock of wavy hair, he looked angry.

The hair stood up on Marissa's arms. Anxiety cranked another notch tighter in her gut.

Who was he and why had Brooke posted his picture? Was she trying to send a message? Was he the reason she wasn't calling back?

Desperate for answers, she clicked on Tess's profile. If the girls had gone out together, maybe Tess had posted something more, but Sunday morning's status update was all about Tess's epic hangover.

Friends had offered a litany of hangover remedies ranging from the ridiculous to the downright disgusting. Hair of the dog. Canned fish. Pickles. Sex.

Sex? What ever happened to Gatorade, vitamin C, and a catnap?

The heavy glass doors swung open, and with a quick click of her mouse button, Marissa minimized the Facebook window. Just in time too. A slim, well-dressed woman in her late thirties entered.

Paige Benoit was Marissa's direct supervisor. With a sharp face and an even sharper tongue, she squawked orders with a drill sergeant's charm. If she caught Marissa online, there would be hell to pay.

Instinctively Marissa straightened in her chair as Benoit neared the desk. She glanced back at the monitor, ensuring Facebook was minimized and her calendar was showing.

"Marissa, Elizabeth Holt will be arriving at ten sharp for a meeting with Regis," Benoit said, all business.

"Yes, ma'am. It's on my calendar."

Benoit's nod was curt. Her sleek dark hair brushed the collar of her starched white shirt. Arced lines bracketed her thin lips, giving her a sour look.

"She'll want tea sent in. Earl Grey with milk, not cream. Don't forget."

What kind of idiot would put cream in tea? Based on her boss's dragon breath and coffee-stained teeth, she figured Benoit might not appreciate the difference.

"I'll have it ready," Marissa said.

Benoit's lips stretched into a chilly smile. Marissa made a note about the ten o'clock tea, knowing full well Benoit would shit a chicken if she forgot.

Elizabeth Holt was a founding member of the law firm and, by all accounts, a formidable woman. In the year Marissa had worked here, she had seen Holt only a handful of times. Rumor had it the old woman was sick, so whatever the ten o'clock meeting was about, it was important enough to warrant a rare visit.

As soon as Benoit closed her office door, Marissa maximized her browser window. She skimmed Tess's wall to see if she could figure out where the girls might have gone on Saturday night. Nothing. One by one she clicked through the candid snapshots of Tess's fresh-faced college friends, hoping to catch a glimpse of the man posted on Brooke's page. No luck.

Marissa's fingers stalled as a black-and-white image filled the screen. Tess stood half-naked; her tiny hands barely covered her small breasts.

"Oh, Tess," Marissa groaned under her breath.

No doubt Tess considered the picture artistic, but Marissa thought about all the people who would see this image. From personal experience, she knew Tess would find no shortage of men ready to objectify her. She didn't need to help them along.

Staring intently at the screen, Marissa didn't hear John Ervine approach. He was a short, round man with glasses and a waxy smile. The way he looked at her gave her the willies. This morning was no exception. His small black eyes shifted from the monitor to her face.

Caught red-handed, Marissa clicked the red X, and the browser window closed.

"Good morning, Marissa," he said in a high, nasal voice. "Was that your daughter?"

Marissa's cheeks reddened.

"Sorry, Mr. Ervine. I shouldn't have been looking at a personal site during business hours."

"She's pretty, like her mother."

His smile made her skin crawl, and his gaze dropped from her face to the opening of her shirt. Her outfit wasn't revealing. A crisp white blouse, a straight black skirt, and business-sensible pumps—there was nothing provocative about her attire. But the way he looked at her still made her feel like a bimbo.

Marissa angled her chair away to block his view down her blouse. She forced a civil smile and handed him his mail.

"I don't typically look at my daughter's Facebook site at work, but . . ."

Ervine waved a dismissive hand, his grin widening. "I get it. You want to keep an eye on what your kid posts. Don't worry, I won't tell a soul what I saw. It'll be our secret."

He winked at her and slithered down the hallway. Marissa cringed.

Great. She'd been caught violating company policy. Benoit didn't like her and would seize any opportunity to get rid of her. And now Ervine thought she owed him a favor. She could only imagine the types of payback he had in mind—maybe a lap dance in his office or a quickie in the copier room. She was no intern, though. One wrong move from Ervine and she'd go straight to Mr. Regis. He wouldn't want the firm's reputation sullied by a sexual harassment suit.

It was still early, before eight o'clock, but most of the attorneys were in the office. Clients would arrive soon. Marissa scratched the patch on her left arm and glared at the silent cell phone on her desk.

The nicotine patch was supposed to curb her craving for cigarettes. Maybe if she ripped the damned thing off and smoked it, she'd feel better. Of course, that could get her into trouble too. She'd picked a hell of a time to give up her best vice. Her oldest friend, she amended.

Ring, damn it. Ring. Please. Please, Brooke, just call.

But if there was a God up there in the sky, he wasn't listening to her, and Marissa relaunched Facebook. She didn't want to be caught online again, but she didn't know how else to get a message to Tess. Hoping for good news, she started to type.

The door opened and a stately gray-haired man in a long black coat entered. Marissa's fingers froze. She forced a smile and clicked on her calendar to hide the Facebook window.

"Good morning, Marissa. How are you?"

Mr. Regis was looking at her eyes and not at her chest. It was a refreshing change, and she handed him a short stack of mail.

"Fine, Mr. Regis. You have a few messages this morning."

"Thank you."

With a kind smile, he turned down the hall toward his spacious corner office. Marissa dismissed her calendar and finished the message.

Tess, I'm looking for Brooke. Have you seen her?

The glass doors swung open again. Marissa pressed send and closed the browser window, hoping Tess would respond soon.

Perched precariously on the tips of her toes, Marissa wrenched the teapot down from the cupboard's top shelf. She lifted the top off and peered inside. It looked clean enough, but just in case, she rinsed the pot with warm water. God help her if Ms. Holt tasted dust in her tea.

She'd freed the first Earl Grey tea bag from the plastic wrapping when her cell phone rang. The tea bag slipped from Marissa's grasp as she lunged for the phone. Her stomach sank. It wasn't Brooke. She didn't recognize the number. Bending to pick the tea bag up off the floor, she answered the call.

"Ms. Rooney?"

The voice sounded young. Nervous. Familiar. Marissa's heart took off at a gallop.

"Tess?"

"I saw your message on Facebook, and well, here's the thing. Brooke wasn't in class this morning."

"What do you mean?"

The teakettle whistled, steam gushing from its spout. Marissa stepped away from the counter and angled her head to the side so she could hear what Tess was saying.

"Well, I actually haven't seen Brooke since Saturday night."

Marissa's knees turned to water. A nauseating wave of heat washed over her, and she slumped against the wall, grateful for its strength.

Behind her the kettle wailed, but she couldn't hear it over the pounding pulse in her ears.

"Saturday night? Are you sure?"

Two days? That can't be right. How could two days go by without word, without a call? Where the hell is Brooke?

"Marissa," she heard a voice snap behind her, and she swung on her heels.

Paige Benoit filled the doorway. Her red lips peeled back from her teeth in a snarl. With a clawed hand, she reached out and plucked the kettle's plug from the wall. The shriek of the whistle dipped into a low, plaintive cry before falling silent.

Marissa swallowed the knot of fear in her throat.

"Tess, can I call you back?"

She dropped the phone from her ear and straightened away from the wall. Angry red splotches stained Benoit's gaunt cheeks.

"Marissa, the kettle. Didn't you hear it?"

She shook her head slowly, barely understanding the words coming out of Benoit's mouth. Benoit snapped her fingers.

"Tea. Now. Elizabeth Holt will be here any minute."

Marissa's lips parted, but it took a full two seconds to find her voice.

"I can't."

And suddenly she didn't give two shits about what Benoit wanted or the upcoming meeting, and she cared least of all about Ms. Holt's tea. She had to get out of here.

Marissa brushed past Benoit and raced down the long hallway toward reception as fast as her heels allowed.

She arrived in the lobby in time to catch Elizabeth Holt's grand entrance. She swept into the lobby along with her large entourage. Mr. Regis smiled. He gripped both of Holt's hands in his own and planted a kiss on the old woman's cheek.

Benoit's heels clicked close behind.

"What do you mean, you can't?"

As Benoit grasped Marissa's elbow, her long nails dug into the soft flesh of Marissa's arm. She spun Marissa around until they stood face-to-face. Inches away, Marissa could smell the rank stench of coffee on Benoit's breath. A fierce bolt of anger flashed through her, and she wrenched her arm free of the other woman's grip.

"Look, I don't have time to explain. I have to go."

Hunkering down, Marissa grabbed her purse and jacket from beneath the desk.

"Go? Now?"

Benoit reached for Marissa's arm again, but this time Marissa was faster. She whirled away, her hair whipping around her cheeks. She fixed her hot stare on Benoit's pinched face.

"Don't you ever touch me again. Do you understand?"

Benoit's dark eyebrows scrunched so close together on her forehead they almost touched.

"You listen to me, Ms. Rooney. If you walk out of this office, don't bother coming back," Benoit said, her shrill voice carrying through the lobby.

The lobby fell silent. Suddenly all eyes were on Marissa. She looked up in time to catch Elizabeth Holt's curious gaze. Slinging her purse over her shoulder, she glared at Paige Benoit.

"Do what you will. I have to find my daughter." She turned toward Mr. Regis. Shock and concern were reflected in his lined face. "I'm sorry, Mr. Regis, the conference room should be ready for your meeting. Ms. Holt, the kettle is boiled. Perhaps Ms. Benoit can make your tea."

Without another word, she marched out the door.

• • • •

RAIN DRIZZLED DOWN in a fine gray mist from the sky. A murder of crows flapped overhead, their black wings smudged against the low ceiling of clouds, like pooled mascara beneath a woman's eye. Marissa plowed through the heavy doors to the student union, looking everywhere for Tess. This close to lunchtime, torrents of students flooded the hall, all talking, yelling, and laughing. The sound of their eager young voices echoed off the high ceilings.

Tess was nowhere to be found. Marissa paced the perimeter of the hall, trying to make sense of this crazy situation. There had to be some explanation. Maybe Tess knew more than she was saying. Someone had to. Brooke hadn't just vanished.

Pacing the student union wasn't calming her frayed nerves. With each step frenzied thoughts filled her head, choking out all rational thought. Despite her throbbing feet, she couldn't stop. Anxiety thrashed inside her like a trapped bird, barely contained, desperate to get out.

Her gaze passed over the message boards, looking but not really seeing. Colorful flyers pinned to the surface announced study groups, yoga classes, meet-ups, and a multitude of other on-campus events. Her eyes skimmed across the flyers, her thoughts filled with Brooke, until her eyes locked onto the face of a young woman staring out from a missing-person poster.

She stopped. Kim Covey had disappeared from a party four weeks ago, and suddenly Marissa recalled the local news stories about the missing girl. She'd thought about the girl and hoped she was safe. She'd thought about the family and the hell they must be going through.

But she really hadn't understood anything about the girl's disappearance until now.

Heart pounding, she stared into the girl's photocopied eyes. The realization struck her with crippling force. This girl looked like her daughter. Same blonde hair and blue eyes. Same slender build. Kim Covey was two years older than Brooke, but the two girls could have passed for sisters.

Marissa's pulse throbbed at the base of her throat.

Without thinking, she stretched out her trembling fingers and ripped the missing-person flyer off the message board. She stared at it horror-stricken, no longer seeing a stranger's face, but seeing her own daughter staring back at her.

She spun on rubbery legs and swung toward the entrance, stuffing the flyer into her pocket just as Tess Turner burst into the hall at a run.

Tess led the way across campus, from the student union toward the dorms. Despite her diminutive size, she set a blistering pace, and Marissa struggled to keep up. The cold drizzle chilled her to the bone. She couldn't look at the faces of the other students they passed. They were safe. Their parents knew where they were. She kept her head down, shoulders hunched against the rain. All she could think about was her burgeoning fear.

"I figured Brooke spent the night at your place and I'd see her in class this morning. When I saw your message, I knew I had to call."

"When was the last time you saw her?"

Tess unlocked the door to their room. "Saturday night at the Chapel."

Two days ago, and not a word? How could that be? Frustration and fear welled up inside Marissa. She shook her head, overwhelmed by the enormity of the situation. If she let herself get carried away by the spiraling trail of what-ifs crowding her brain right now, she'd be lost. Instead Marissa focused on Tess, desperate to learn something that might help clear up this mess.

"You went to a bar?" Marissa asked, her frantic gaze bouncing around the room.

Dirty clothes trailed across Tess's half of the room while Brooke's was as neat as a pin. Nothing looked missing. Nothing looked out of place.

"That's right. Brooke wanted to go," Tess said, sliding a balled-up pair of leggings across the imaginary boundary from Brooke's side of the room to her own.

"It was Brooke's idea?"

She could hardly believe it. Brooke wasn't the type of girl to break the rules. Tess, on the other hand . . .

"She went there to see her ex."

"Who?"

"Some dude named Jesse."

Jesse Morgan. She remembered him, all right. Brooke's case of puppy love had bordered on obsession. While Marissa had been relieved when Jesse moved away, Brooke had gone through a grieving period that made Bella from the Twilight books look fickle. She'd spent weeks moping in her room, playing depressing music on her iPod and shunning calls from her friends. When Brooke had finally snapped out of it and started dating someone else, Marissa had been relieved.

It seemed more than mere coincidence that Jesse's reappearance coincided with Brooke's disappearing act. If there was one person Brooke might take off with, it was him.

"Did she leave with Jesse?"

"I don't know. I went to the bathroom, and she was gone."

"She didn't tell you she was leaving? Not a text? Didn't you think that was weird?"

"Not really," Tess said. "She doesn't always share her plans."

Tess averted her worried gaze, picking away at the frayed strings hanging from the knee of her ripped jeans.

Marissa brushed her hand along the straight line of clothes hanging in the closet. Sweaters and tank tops, jeans and sweat shirts slid against her open palm, and she caught the scent of Brooke's perfume. Sweet. Vanilla. Like she was standing beside Marissa instead of God knew where.

Marissa pulled the hem of a dress aside and saw Brooke's gym bag on the floor. Something wasn't right. She could feel it.

“She would have taken something with her.”

“What?” Tess asked, hovering close by.

“If Brooke was leaving, even overnight, she would have taken something with her,” Marissa repeated, whirling toward the bed. “A sweat shirt. A jacket. Something.”

The lavender quilt looked crisp and untouched. Even Brooke’s UW nightshirt was folded beneath her pillow. It was like at any minute her daughter would come bursting into the room.

Marissa sank onto the bed, her hand drifting across the soft pillowcase, the silence of the room surrounding her. Tess fidgeted by the window, arms folded, a worried look on her face.

“Where does Brooke keep her insulin?”

No sooner had she said it than she spied the dorm-size refrigerator tucked underneath the desk. She hunkered down and opened the door.

She saw the open box of insulin pens and counted them. Each box held a dozen. There were five left. She grabbed the vial of insulin off the top shelf.

Brooke needed daily shots from the vial to keep her blood sugars steady overnight. As she stared at the vial in her hand, another thought struck her. Marissa wrenched open the nightstand drawer and there it was.

She saw Brooke’s insulin travel kit stowed neatly in the corner beside her glucometer, small and insulated, about the size of a pencil case. Marissa picked it up in her hands, and she knew.

She knew there was no way Brooke would leave without taking this with her.

“You say she went to the bar with her roommate,” Officer Reardon said in a monotone, like he’d heard this story a hundred times before.

Perched on a hard chair in the middle of the bustling squad room, her back ramrod-straight, Marissa nodded.

“That’s right. The Chapel on Capitol Hill.”

The keyboard clacked as Officer Reardon recorded her answers. Marissa fidgeted with the leather strap of her purse. The squad room stank like sweat and bitter coffee. She breathed in the stale air. Unbidden images surfaced in her mind, and she remembered the last time she’d been in a squad room. Instinctively her tongue probed the top row of smooth, even teeth, searching for jagged edges and gaps. She kept her gaze focused tight on the officer, pushing the memories back. Not wanting to remember.

“And the roommate says she was there to meet her ex-boyfriend?”

“Well, yes. He tends bar there.”

“And what makes you think she’s gone missing?”

Marissa squirmed in her chair. She knew she sounded like an overprotective mother reporting her kid late for curfew, but that wasn’t it. Her every instinct was telling her that something was very wrong. What kind of mother would she be if she didn’t do what she thought was right?

She drew in a deep breath and released it slowly before answering.

“Brooke’s not answering her cell phone. She’s missing classes. Her medication travel kit is still in her dorm room.”

Reardon cocked his head. His sharp brown eyes met Marissa’s. “Hold it. But didn’t you say she had her medication with her?” He scanned the computer screen, checking the report.

She’d already said this. Wasn’t he listening?

Marissa pushed back the waves of frustration crashing over her and explained it to him. Again.

“She probably does have an insulin pen with her, but she would pack her vial of insulin and a syringe in the kit so it wouldn’t get damaged.”

“But she could still carry that stuff with her, right? The kit just makes it more convenient. So you don’t know for sure she doesn’t have her insulin.”

“It’s possible, yes, but . . .”

Marissa’s words trailed off when Reardon’s gaze stayed focused on the screen. By the look on his face, she could tell he didn’t buy her story.

“Any other reason to think something has happened to . . .” He paused to check the screen. “Brooke?”

He doesn’t even remember her name.

It was too much. Her jaw clenched and she glared at him with burning eyes.

“You mean other than jeopardizing her life by not taking her medication as prescribed? Look, I know my daughter. She wouldn’t just disappear.”

A condescending smile appeared under Reardon’s bushy moustache, and Marissa sprang from her seat. She couldn’t waste another minute of her time waiting for him to take her seriously. Slung her purse over her shoulder, she spun away from the desk. His voice stopped her.

“I’m sorry, Ms. Rooney. I don’t mean to make light of the situation. I know you’re very worried, what parent wouldn’t be?” He leaned forward, his elbows propped on the desk. “But looking at the situation with objective eyes, you shouldn't jump to conclusions. Maybe she reconciled with her ex and they decided to spend a few days together. I know it's hard to accept, but college girls aren't high school girls. They don't have curfews, and they don't always check in with their parents. They're free to make their own decisions."

"Why would she leave without taking her clothes or her medication?"

"Do you know for a fact there is nothing missing from her room?"

It had sure looked like there was nothing missing from Brooke's dorm room, but could she swear to it? No. She didn't know how many vials of insulin Brooke usually kept on hand. She didn't know if Brooke had makeup and clothes stashed in an overnight bag.

But her gut was screaming at her that something was wrong. After two days without insulin, her daughter could be dead by now. She couldn't ignore her intuition. She had to act. Two days was an eternity.

Reardon continued, more gently now.

"Look, Ms. Rooney, there's a good chance she'll show up tonight or tomorrow on her own. We get twenty thousand missing-persons reports every year. Most of these people show up all on their own with no intervention. When you were a kid, didn't you do anything crazy and impulsive?"

She knew firsthand that rash decisions made in the heat of the moment could change your life. Brooke was living proof of her first crazy, impulsive act, going to bed with the first guy who paid attention to her.

"Can't you just check her cell phone to find out where she is?"

"Your daughter is an adult. She has a right to privacy. We would need a warrant to check her cell phone records, and for that, we need some sort of evidence indicating foul play. It will take time."

"We don't have time," she said. Marissa could feel eyes boring into her, but she didn't care. Let them look. "This isn't a normal case. This is a kid with a very serious medical condition. We at least have to find out if she's okay."

"Here's what I think we should do," Reardon said. "I'm going to file the missing-persons report. It will get assigned to a detective who will conduct a preliminary investigation. He can check in with the ex-boyfriend. From there we'll decide how to proceed."

"And how long does that take?"

"I can't give you a specific time frame. You're going to need to trust us."

Trust? How could she trust him when he clearly wasn't taking her seriously? But what choice did she have? Bone-tired and emotionally drained, Marissa stood. Without another word she marched out of the police station and back out into a gray blanket of rain.

• • • •

TRAFFIC BLED OUT OF the downtown core in a sluggish trickle of flashing red taillights. Cars slithered in an unbroken line heading south, like a monstrous snake all the way down Interstate 5. Marissa gripped her steering wheel tight. The slick roads made for slow going, and a drive that should have taken no more than forty-five minutes took a grinding hour and a half in the rain.

It was well past dark when Marissa turned onto her street. It wasn't the best neighborhood. In the yellow glow of the streetlamps, the small houses crowding the sidewalks looked grim and dirty. A far cry from Logan's hilltop home in Redmond, it was all she could afford within commuting distance of the city.

The house lights were on and Kelly was home. Raucous music blared from the speakers in the living room. Back in her day, they would have called it punk, or maybe grunge, but Kelly called it something else. Alternative. Kelly's new favorite band, G-String Jesus, grated like an electric shock on Marissa's frayed nerves.

Marissa found her fifteen-year-old daughter hunched over the kitchen table, ignoring the stack of books strewn around her, texting on her phone. Marissa marched into the living room and turned the music off. Kelly looked up, shooting her mother an indignant glare before turning back to her phone.

"Any word from Brooke?" Marissa asked.

Kelly shook her head, still typing into the damned phone.

Feeling a thousand years old, Marissa dropped into the chair opposite Kelly. She stared at the dark rings of eyeliner that circled Kelly's eyes. Kelly's high school friends probably thought dark makeup made their eyes pop, but Marissa thought it made Kelly look cheap. It was a phase. She would grow out of it. Somehow the knowledge didn't make it easier to bear.

The chasm between them filled her with sadness.

What happened to my sweet girl?

"What?" Kelly asked, feeling her mother's stare.

"I filed a missing-persons report today."

"You what?"

Kelly dropped the phone into her lap and gaped at Marissa like she'd just dropped an f-bomb.

"Brooke missed class today. She wasn't at her dorm room."

Kelly rolled her eyes in an oh-my-God 360 that set Marissa's blood boiling.

"Mom, you saw the message she put on Facebook. She probably just met some guy and took off. And you've got the police hunting her down like she's some kind of criminal."

"Brooke wouldn't leave without telling me. Aren't you the least bit worried about your sister?"

Kelly shook her head and eyed Marissa with a scathing look. "Your perfect little Brooke may not be as perfect as you think."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

Kelly shrugged, gathering her books. "Just because she's not answering you doesn't mean that something's wrong. She doesn't tell you everything."

Marissa's head reeled with the implications of what Kelly meant. What was Brooke hiding from her? A boyfriend? Something more?

"Have you heard from her? An e-mail? A text? Anything?"

Kelly slammed her cell phone on the tall stack of books and huffed out an exasperated breath. "No, but I'm not bugging her either. Maybe she's sick of you controlling her every move."

Marissa's head snapped back; she was stung by the accusation in Kelly's voice.

"You think I'm controlling?"

A short bark of laughter escaped Kelly's lips.

"You think you're not?"

"Brooke's roommate hasn't seen or heard from her in two days. Of course I'm worried. If you were missing, wouldn't you want me to do everything I could to ensure you were all right?"

"Me? I'd hope you wouldn't come looking for me. I'd hope you'd leave me alone to live my own life, instead of dragging me through another shitty relationship, another shitty divorce, only to move me back to another shitty rat-hole like this one."

"That's not fair, Kelly. Sometimes families have to make hard decisions, but we stick together."

"Family," Kelly scoffed. "You don't know the first thing about family. You've destroyed any family we've ever had. I've never met my father or my grandparents or cousins. You stayed with that asshole Rick long after you figured out what a lunatic he was. God, I remember all of the drinking, the fighting. It wasn't until Rick knocked out your teeth that you came to your senses and left the bastard.”

“Kelly . . .”

“What about Logan? What did he ever do to you? He was the only one who gave two shits about me, and you left him. Why? Because he didn't worship the ground you walked on? Because for once I was happy and you couldn't stand it?”

Marissa sat in stunned silence as Kelly snatched her stack of books off the table and ran to her room. The kitchen walls shuddered with the force of the slamming bedroom door.

Tears welled in Marissa's eyes. She pressed her palms against her closed eyelids. Her whole world was collapsing around her and she didn't know what to do. Brooke was gone. Missing. And she had no idea how to find her.

Kelly hated her. The acid pouring from Kelly's lips had gone leagues beyond teenage angst. God, she couldn't do anything right, and there was no one she could talk to, no one who cared. Kelly was right about that much. She was alone. She had driven everyone away.

She raised her head and raked her fingernails across the nicotine patch on her arm.

God, what I wouldn't give for a cigarette right now.

Marissa crossed the room and turned on the teakettle. A cup of herbal tea was a damned poor substitute for a cigarette. A shot of whiskey might be better, but she never drank the hard stuff. Her ex-husband's drunken rages had turned her off anything stronger than a glass of wine.

Rick. What a disaster.

Rick had been the assistant manager at the grocery store where she'd worked. He was a single parent too, so he never gave her a hard time about missing work because the kids were sick or having to leave early to pick them up from day care. All she'd wanted was a real family for the girls.

He'd seemed so normal. Stable. And he was—for a while, anyway.

On his meds, Rick was a nice guy, and without his support, there was no telling where Marissa and the girls would have ended up—on welfare, or worse. So they moved in together quickly and married shortly after that. A few months into their marriage, Rick stopped taking his medication, and everything went off the rails.

No amount of pleading could get him back on his meds. Soon his drinking binges intensified. The first time he hit Marissa, he cried, and she forgave him. Six months later, though, she realized the situation was hopeless.

Marissa ran the tip of her tongue across her gums, feeling the scars, and this time she couldn't hold back the memories. They flooded her mind with vivid, chilling detail.

Fourth of July, and Rick had been drinking all day. Marissa was clearing the dinner dishes from the table. The Dixie Chicks were playing on the kitchen radio and the girls were in high spirits. Soon they'd be going to the lake to watch the fireworks—they were all talking and laughing. Marissa asked Rick if he was coming.

The first hit took them all by surprise. The kitchen light flashed off Rick's bloodstone ring, catching Marissa squarely in the mouth. White-hot pain burst through her and she fell back on the floor, lips splitting and blood pouring out of her mouth.

Nine-year-old Kelly screamed for him to stop, but he didn't. Desperate, afraid Rick would turn on her next, Marissa shouted at Kelly to go to her room. Kelly didn't move. Her red, tearstained face full of fury, she screamed at Rick to stop. He cocked back a meaty fist and Marissa dropped her head to her knees, bracing herself for another blow.

But it didn't come. Rick's son jumped in front of her.

Seventeen-year-old Andy was as tall as his father now and done with Rick's shit. He raised his arm, deflecting his father's blow. The bottle of Jack Daniel's exploded against the edge of the countertop in a starburst of glass shards. Glass and liquor rained over Marissa's crouched body. Silver light flashed along the jagged neck of the bottle as Rick swung it wide in a wild, desperate arc. Glass sliced through Andy's hand, spraying red blood across the white linoleum floor.

Andy roared. He lunged, and Rick went down with a thunderous crash.

Brooke raced into the kitchen and slipped on the slick combination of whiskey and blood. She came down on her knee, screaming. Chunky shards of glass embedded themselves in her tender skin. She still had a patch of bumpy scars just under her kneecap where doctors had pulled the glass out.

To this day Marissa didn't know who had called the cops. Probably the neighbors. The wail of the police sirens drowned out Kelly's shrieks. Rick left the house in handcuffs, stuffed into the back of a squad car. Marissa tucked Brooke under one arm and Kelly under the other as she marched through the back door.

After filing a domestic violence report and a protection order, she never went back. They abandoned their belongings, not wanting to see Rick or that house ever again. That was six years ago.

Exhausted, Marissa propped her hands against the countertop and stared out the window. Rain streaked down the glass like a river of tears.

Kelly's bitter words still cut deep, and as much as it hurt to admit, there had been truth in what Kelly said. Her string of failed relationships spoke for itself, and as a result of her poor choices, she'd dragged her daughters through hell.

Maybe Kelly was right about Brooke too. Maybe Brooke was sick of her interference. Maybe she'd met some guy at school and fallen head over heels for him. Maybe Marissa needed to back off and do the impossible . . . wait.

Marissa picked at the edge of the nicotine patch, then ripped it off her arm. The adhesive clung stubbornly to her skin, peeling a few strips off with it. Her breath hissed through her clenched teeth. The newly exposed skin was red, irritated, and painful as hell. She rubbed the spot with the palm of her hand and went rifling through the drawers in search of a cigarette.

The line moved at a glacial pace. Drew shifted his weight from one foot to the other and pulled out his phone. He had time to kill while the morons in front of him hemmed and hawed their way through the decision-making process. How hard was it to order a fucking coffee?

They should have two lines—one for regulars, one for the galactically stupid.

Drew pulled out his phone and clicked on his Facebook app. A smiling photo of pretty Brooke Parker filled his screen. He saw the photo of that asshole Charles Sully from the bar and some others posted by Tess.

Running into Brooke had been a shock. She was part of the past he'd buried years ago. And with his father safely tucked away in the loony bin, he'd severed all ties with who he used to be. There was no way he was going back. He had no intention of sharing that part of his life with anyone—not his new set of friends, not his coworkers, and especially not his girlfriend. Alicia wouldn't understand.

The line shifted, and Drew looked up. His favorite barista was working. She was big and black and beautiful, with a quick wit and even quicker smile.

“Tall dark Americano, with an extra shot,” she said.

“You know how I like it, baby.”

“Oh yes,” she said with a flirty grin. “Mama always knows.”

Drew handed her a five-dollar bill.

This was his favorite neighborhood coffee shop. Though it was predominantly a geek hangout, he came here for the great coffee and free Wi-Fi. The location was perfect, a short jog from his condo and close enough to Alicia's office. She'd sometimes join him for an afternoon mocha Frappuccino.

Speaking of Alicia, she'd sent him a text this morning. He'd ignored this one too. After all, she'd ruined their evening out by inviting Sir Liam Douchebag to the party. So instead of bonding with Alicia's inner circle, he'd been shoved to the sidelines and treated like an outsider.

Judging by the number of messages and phone calls, Alicia didn't like being ignored. That was fine. She could spend the time alone mulling over her own shitty decisions.

Not too long though. He didn't want to lose her. In many ways she was the best thing to have happened to him. She was exactly the type of girl he'd always wanted. Beautiful. Fun. Wealthy. She would complete his transformation from a boy raised in a poor train wreck of a family to the successful man he wanted to be.

“Tall handsome Americano,” the barista called, batting her eyes. The line jostled.

Drew elbowed his way through the throng of waiting sheep and scooped up his drink. He might have walked out of the shop without looking around if he hadn't heard the snort.

Gretchen sat hunched over a table near the window. Her unruly mass of red hair tumbled around her hunched shoulders. She shifted in her chair, and he caught sight of Alicia. She gazed out the window with a sober look on her pale face.

A public confrontation wasn't at all what he had in mind, and he knew he should turn around and leave the coffee shop before she spotted him. He wanted Alicia in the right place, in the right frame of mind, so he could control the outcome of their discussion. The last thing he needed was Alicia's fat little friend lobbing more fuel on the fire.

Drew's curiosity got the better of him though, and he edged his way toward the table, drawing as little attention to himself as possible. He settled in a nearby chair with his back to Gretchen, staring down at his phone while he listened.

Eavesdropping wasn't hard. Gretchen's obnoxious voice carried.

"Liam said he saw Drew chatting up some blonde at the bar. You really haven't heard from him since Saturday night?"

"Not a word."

"You've texted him?"

"Of course I've texted him. I've left messages. He's ignoring me. He's . . ."

Alicia's voice caught, and she stopped. Gretchen sighed.

"Look, Alicia, I didn't want to say this, but I'm your friend and I don't want to lie to you. Something about Drew gives me the willies. I mean, he's cute and all, but how much do you really know about him? You guys are awfully serious for the short time you've been together. Maybe you should take a break. Maybe . . ."

"Enough," Alicia snapped.

Behind his coffee cup, Drew smiled, but Gretchen pressed on.

"Hey, I'm not the only one who thinks so. Liam said he was worried about you. Being with Drew, I mean."

"Worried. What do you mean?"

"You know, that Drew might be the jealous type. Like he might do something crazy."

"Crazy? Really? And what puts Liam in any position to judge?"

"Are you forgetting about the girl at the bar? What if Liam's right and Drew really did leave with her? What if he's been playing you all along? You know how shallow guys can be."

Drew's hand clenched around the cup. Hot, bitter steam rose from the lid. He should have followed Liam home from the bar and taught the prick a lesson. Instead he'd waited, and Liam had joined forces with Gretchen the Witless in hopes of undermining his relationship with Alicia.

"Drew wouldn't just leave with some girl," Alicia said, but the tone of her voice lacked conviction.

Gretchen heaved another dramatic sigh.

"He's gone dark, Alicia. Do you know where he is and what he's doing? Look, I'm not trying to cause trouble or anything, I'm just saying that if it were me . . ."

Drew couldn't sit and listen to this crap another second more. Gretchen's blather encroached on dangerous territory. He spun in his seat and glared directly at her.

"If it were you, what, Gretchen?"

Gretchen looked like a guppy with her mouth dropped open wide. She looked so ridiculous he would laugh if he weren't so fucking furious. Alicia was shocked to see him too, but she recovered more quickly, composing her face into a stony mask of indifference.

"Oh, Drew, I didn't see you there."

Drew cocked an eyebrow. "Mind if I join you?"

He didn't wait for an answer. He scraped his chair across the tile floor and sat down at their table. Avoiding eye contact, Alicia angled her gaze out the huge glass window and watched the traffic pass by. Drew's knee grazed Gretchen's and she flinched away, as if stung by the sudden, unexpected contact. Anger bubbled in Drew's gut.

Gretchen tugged on a fat red curl and glanced across the table at Alicia, who was still staring out the window. She shifted uncomfortably in her chair and cleared her throat.

"Alicia and I were just talking about Saturday night," Gretchen said.

"I gathered. So Liam has been spreading rumors about me and some blonde?"

Bull's-eye. Gretchen's cheeks flushed a deep, unflattering shade of red. She looked mortified, like she'd rather be anywhere else right about now. She'd much rather whisper her poisonous lies into Alicia's willing ears.

"Well, Liam said he saw you talking to some girl at the bar."

"Did he now?" Drew took a sip of his Americano, letting the awkward silence stretch out. He wanted Gretchen uncomfortable. He wanted her to regret opening her mouth. "I'm surprised he noticed. He seemed to be pretty intent on impressing Alicia."

"Liam and I are just friends," Alicia said.

"Really? Because he's the only friend whose hand was on your ass. Or didn't you notice?"

Gretchen sputtered coffee across the table. Covering her mouth, she coughed.

"That go down the wrong way, Gretchen?" Drew thumped her on the back.

"I'm fine," she croaked.

Holding up a hand, Gretchen swabbed her face with a wad of paper napkins.

Alicia looked directly at him. "Let's leave Gretchen out of this, Drew. This is something we should discuss alone."

"Why? It seems like Gretchen is anxious to tell you all about what happened after I left the group on Saturday night. Maybe we should listen."

Gretchen cleared her throat and held up a hand, palm out. "Not me. I didn't see anything."

"Well, it just so happens I was talking to a blonde at the bar. Some creep was hitting on her, so I interrupted. I wanted to make sure she was all right."

Drew waited. The secret to telling a good lie was seeding it with enough truth to make it ring true. This one was sure to shut Gretchen's big fat trap.

"Who was she?"

"Just a girl. I don't remember her name, but it certainly wasn't anything you should be concerned about."

Gretchen's phone beeped. She checked the display.

"Excuse me," she said, looking relieved. "I have to go. I'll call you later, Alicia."

Drew's eyes met Alicia's, and he wondered if she would flee too, but she didn't. She stayed put.

"Where did you go Saturday night?"

"Home, Alicia. What about you?"

She pursed her lips and eyed him warily. "Why haven't you been answering my calls?"

"Because I'm pissed."

"Clearly."

"Anybody in my shoes would be."

"What do you mean?"

"Your ex-boyfriend comes to the party, plants his hands all over you, and you expect me not to react?"

"His hands weren't all over me."

Drew arched his eyebrows, and Alicia dropped her gaze. Her cheeks flushed red, and he sipped his coffee, letting the silence stretch out like an elastic band ready to snap.

"Are you sure about that? You two seemed quite cozy."

"Honestly, Drew, I didn't know he was coming. Gretchen invited him."

"How convenient."

Alicia frowned.

Was Liam using Gretchen to stir up trouble, or had she come to Alicia all on her own? Either way, they were a problem. He might be able to get Gretchen on his side. Liam was a bigger problem.

“Look, Alicia, I’m not going to compete for your attention. If you want Liam, just say the word and . . .”

Drew met Alicia’s gaze. This time she didn’t look away.

“I don’t,” she said, looking worried.

“Okay. You may consider him a friend, but are you sure that’s all he wants from you?”

Alicia looked troubled. Her dark eyebrows pulled together over her blue eyes.

“What he wants is irrelevant,” she said at last. “I’m with you. That is, if you still want to be.”

Drew set his coffee cup on the table and offered his hand. After a second’s hesitation, Alicia took it, and Drew smiled.

“Of course I want to be with you,” he said. “You already know that. You also know I’m not the jealous type. But I want you to think hard about something.”

“What?”

“Think about Liam and his motivations. Is it possible he still has feelings for you?” Drew shrugged. “Look, I can’t blame the guy. I’m crazy about you too, and if I lost you, I would do everything I could to get you back, including telling lies about him.”

“You wouldn’t do that,” she said.

She covered his hand with hers, and Drew knew that he’d won. Leaning across the narrow table, Drew kissed her. The press of her lips tasted sweet, like victory.

Rain drizzled down in a fine mist and mingled with the sweat on Charles Sully's face. He'd already worked out, and the ache of swollen muscles in his chest and arms was a pleasant reminder of what Lara would call his "penance." Penance. That was a fucking joke. Other than his grandfather's funeral, he'd never been to church in his life.

He'd been thirteen then, and his mother had dressed him in a borrowed suit, some ugly gray piece of shit. She didn't care it was too small. She wanted him to look decent. But he hadn't looked decent. He'd looked like a fat, pizza-faced kid with the jacket buttons straining around his gut and the cuffs of the pants riding up on his ankles. The suit pinched. It was itchy and he couldn't wait to take the fucking thing off. That was the last time he'd been goaded into wearing a suit. It was also the last time his mother had forced him to do anything against his will.

The constant thrum of cars speeding past on nearby Aurora Avenue was barely muted by the sparse greenbelt bordering the parking lot outside his condo. Hunkered down over the trunk of a bright-green Dodge Super Bee, he examined the coarse fabric of the lining with a flashlight. Small bits of debris—leaves, twigs, torn fabric—he deposited in a white Safeway bag. The earthy smell brought him back to the forest.

As a kid, when things got bad at home, Sully escaped into the trees. Deep in the woods, he couldn't hear his mother nagging or his father yelling. Alone he would slide into the trees and become invisible. Even now the forest offered the isolation and escape he needed.

He slowly swiveled the light back and forth, and a glimmer of metal caught his eye.

A gold hoop earring had woven its way into the fabric. Carefully he wiggled the thin metal with his thick fingers, freeing it from the bottom of the car's trunk without tearing any of the fibers loose. He held it up for a brief examination. If he'd overlooked this, what else had he missed?

Beads of sweat raced down the back of his neck, and Sully scratched them away, casting a quick glance over his shoulder. He was alone. Casually he strolled across the parking lot and dropped the gold hoop through the broad slats of the storm drain. If there had been two earrings, he might have been able to pass them off as a gift, but one did him no good at all. If Lara had found the earring, she would have had lots of questions about where it came from and who it belonged to and on and on.

He didn't need that shit.

Sully returned to the car and resumed his examination of the trunk—more slowly this time, determined not to miss a single thing. He froze. Captured in the yellow beam of light was a red speck on the charcoal-gray fabric near the opening for the spare tire.

"Fuck," he growled.

Reaching down, he smudged the speck with his finger. It caked off under his nail like dried mud, but he knew it wasn't mud. He would need to do a more thorough cleaning soon.

The whine of the handheld vacuum cleaner masked the sound of her footsteps. She was directly behind him when he finally heard her high-pitched voice.

"Carlos, aren't you going to drive me to my mother's?"

The shrill tone of her voice was every bit as annoying as the slow screech of fingernails scraping down a chalkboard, and he cringed. He wanted to ignore her, but he knew Lara wouldn't shut up until she got her way. He used to like that about her, back when what she wanted was him. Now he wanted to drill his fist into her fat mouth to stop her from saying another goddamned thing. He stared down into the trunk, flexing his twitchy fingers.

“Carlos, turn that damned thing off.”

He hated when she called him Carlos. Like he was a spic.

Sully’s jaw clenched. Who the fuck did she think she was? His own mother didn’t speak to him that way. You’d have thought she’d have learned her lesson by now. Maybe she was just plain dumb.

He thumbed the switch, and the vacuum cleaner ground to a halt. With all the control he could muster, he turned to face her.

Lara was a good half a foot shorter than he was. Her black hair was scraped back into a ponytail, and her fisted hands were propped on her ever-broadening hips. How many times did he have to tell her he wanted her hair loose and flowing down her back? The stupid bitch didn’t listen. Maybe she needed another lesson in respect. Maybe then she’d remember. Maybe a black eye would provoke her into wearing some makeup.

Didn’t she care about looking decent?

“Carlos, do you hear me?” she squawked again, her dark eyes boring into his.

“Of course I hear you. I’m not fucking deaf.”

“Then answer me. Are you going to drive me to my mother’s?”

“For lunch? You don’t look like you need to eat to me.”

Lara’s face went slack. Hurt flashed in her eyes, and he knew he’d struck a nerve. Before she’d gotten fat, Lara had had an insane body. Normally Sully favored blondes, but Lara in a tank top and skinny jeans had caught his eye. Ever since she got knocked up, though, she’d let herself go.

“What are you doing out here anyway?”

“Cleaning my car. What does it look like?”

Lara crossed her arms. Her dark eyebrows thickened as she frowned up at him. Goosebumps pimpled her caramel-colored skin. He could see her nipples hardening through the light cotton top she wore. At least he still liked her tits. If there was one upside to the pregnancy, it was her bulging bra. At least that could still get him going.

“You spend more time with that damned car than you do with me.”

The top of the Safeway bag fluttered in the wind, and he lowered the trunk lid, blocking her view. He couldn’t argue the point. A classic car like this cost a lot of money. It was an investment. His father had owned one just like it when Sully was a kid. Of course, it was a beater. His old man never took care of anything, while Sully prided himself on keeping the Dodge in pristine condition. What was the point in owning something if you didn’t take care of it?

“Forget it, Carlos. If it’s too much bother, I’ll ask my mother to come get me.”

His fingers curled into fists and he looked past Lara to where the neighbors shuffled by. Great. Now they had a fucking audience.

The nosy couple who lived across the hall sauntered across the parking lot. They were staring. Sully nodded his greeting. The woman screwed up her pinched face and ducked into the car, but the guy offered a weak smile.

Sully deliberately lowered his voice.

“I’ll be ready in twenty minutes.”

“The car is spotless. I don’t know why you need to . . .”

He shot her a look that stopped her midsentence. Her head dipped, and she cringed away from him like a beaten dog.

“I’ll wait inside,” she said.

He waited until she’d waddled around the corner, her round hips swaying under the weight of the growing baby; then he turned the vacuum cleaner back on.

Once he dropped Lara off at her mother's, he'd look for a dumpster to stash the Safeway bag in. He didn't want it anywhere near his home. Just in case.

The howling wind snaked around the edges of the small cabin, clawing at the tin roof. It clanged and clattered, sounding like it might actually tear free of the trusses and launch itself up into the sky. Shivering, Brooke pulled the thin edges of the blanket around her. The ratty, stinking thing barely took the edge off the damp chill that drilled deep into her bones, but it was better than freezing to death.

She stared at the plastic bucket wedged into the corner, hating it, hating every single thing about being trapped down here. Chained up. Scared. Alone.

She crossed her legs and tried to hold it, but with her blood sugars soaring sky-high, there was no way around it. She had to pee. Her stomach churned. She hated the indignity of squatting over the bucket and smelling her own foul waste, but what choice did she have?

Teeth clenched, she marched over to the corner. She pulled down her panties and squatted over the bucket. Her thighs screamed like she'd just run a half marathon. Urine trickled out like water leaking from a hose, and Brooke grimaced.

Business done, she trudged back to the bed. The chain hissed along the floor behind her, the links digging into the thin flesh around her bony ankle, and she slumped down onto the mattress. She peeled back the corner and pulled out the insulin pen. Six inches long, it was the same length as a writing pen and four times the size around.

The plastic housing encased a small vial of short-acting insulin. She pulled off the cap, revealing a short, slim needle.

Brooke studied the pen in the waning light, her stomach tied up in knots. Under normal circumstances a pen would have lasted her a week. But that was when she was supplementing her shots with long-acting insulin. Trapped here, she had nothing but this. Without refrigeration, the medication lost some of its potency. This small device, with the one hundred units of insulin it contained, was the only thing keeping her alive.

And while she knew she had to use it, she also knew she had to use as little as possible. She had to let her sugars run as high as she could stand, because once the insulin ran out, she was as good as dead.

Brooke grabbed the dial at the end of the pen and twisted it slowly, carefully measuring out a dose. Twelve units? No. She cranked the dial back to eight. It wasn't enough. It wouldn't quench her cottonmouth, ease her aching muscles, or stop her skin from crawling like an army of ants marching up and down her body, but it was enough. It would keep her alive.

A violent gust of wind sent branches battering the tin roof. Brooke's eyes cut up toward the bare cedar beams, like at any minute the big bad wolf would huff and puff and blow her house down. The walls shuddered but stood firm, and Brooke looked down at the insulin pen in her hand.

She stabbed the short needle into her thigh. The dial clicked as the insulin pen dispensed, and she replaced the cap, still holding it tight in her fist . . . reluctant to let it go. Knowing it was the only thing that kept her going. And if she lost it, she would slip quietly into a coma and never wake up.

Brooke sank onto the mattress, her knees pulled in close to her chest, still gripping the pen. Fear and despair wrapped tight around her like the moldy woolen blanket over her shoulders. Tears threatened to fall, but she willed them back. Tears would do her no good. She had to stay strong; she had to survive.

The wind howled like a wolf through the woods. The lonely sound filled the empty cabin, and Brooke closed her eyes, letting it fill her too. Her breathing evened out, and she felt herself drifting toward the edge of sleep.

Then she heard it. A crack. Her heart jolted and Brooke bolted upright on the bed. She heard a hiss and another crack. The cabin rocked and Brooke tumbled off the bed. Bright sparks of pain exploded behind her eyes as her head hit the floor.

A rumble. Up above. Brooke rolled underneath the bed frame for shelter as something hard and heavy crashed through the roof. Chunks of beam and branches rained down around her. The floor shook. Her head throbbed. She pressed her palm tight against the wound at her temple. Warm trails of blood slid down her forehead onto her cheeks.

Violent gusts of wind shuddered overhead. The smell of wet pine filled the air. Hard, slashing rain blew through the gaping hole in the roof.

She waited for more—for what was left of the cabin's roof to cave in, for the massive trunk of the tree to pin her to the floor, for the bed frame to collapse on top of her. But that didn't happen. She was alive. It was enough.

The wind kicked up. Branches from the laurel hedge outside the window scratched against the windowpane. Unable to sleep, Marissa drifted down the darkened hall to Brooke's room. She crept into the deep shadows, bumping into the boxes and stacks of books piled on the floor. So many of Brooke's things hadn't made the college cut, a treasure trove of personal belongings too dear to donate, but not vital enough to cram into her small college dorm room.

How can a place so full feel so empty? Here among Brooke's things, fear flashed bright in her mind. She could have handled anything if she'd known Brooke was going to be okay.

More nights than she could count, Marissa had peered through cracked bedroom doors, checking on the girls while they slept. Kelly stretched out like a starfish on her back, a tangled mess of sheets wound around her torso and her arms and legs flung wide. And Brooke, curled up on her side, neatly tucked under the covers, her face serene in sleep.

In the weeks since Brooke moved out, she'd found herself worrying about all the little things that could go wrong. Was Brooke eating right? Taking her insulin? Making smart choices? Marissa wasn't stupid. College was a time when most kids experimented. Brooke wasn't like most kids though. Her diabetes set her apart, so some of the normal things kids did—partying, binge drinking, and drugs—were more risky for Brooke.

Marissa sank down onto the bed and clutched Brooke's pillow tight in her arms. She breathed in her daughter's scent still clinging to the pillowcase.

Alone in the dark, she let the tears come. For once she didn't hold back. She let it all out—the fear ratcheted tight in her chest, the frustration of not being able to do a damned thing to help find her daughter, and, most of all, the agony of not knowing. Smothered sobs racked her body until exhaustion finally overtook her and she slept.

Marissa awoke with the full light of morning shining in her face.

What time was it? Marissa craned her neck around and stared at the clock. The digital display blinked, and she realized the storm must have knocked the power out overnight. By the time she bolted out of Brooke's room, Kelly had already left for school.

Gritting her teeth, she endured a three-minute spritzing underneath the shower's bracing spray, then grabbed the first clean outfit from her closet before bolting out the door. After the scene she'd caused in the lobby yesterday morning, Paige Benoit might just make good on her threat to fire her, but Marissa needed her job.

She had the whole train ride into the city to regret her hasty wardrobe choice. The low-cut blouse defied the firm's conservative dress code. And although Marissa's legs would have been the envy of a Las Vegas show girl, she tugged self-consciously at the hem of her skirt as it rode up above her knees.

Clearly Ervine liked the view. His beady eyes never made it past chest level as he leered.

"Finally decided to show up for work today, Marissa?"

The look of contempt on her face was lost on him, since he was too busy staring at her cleavage to notice. She rose from her chair and handed him a stack of mail, forcing him to look up.

"If you have any concerns about my performance, feel free to discuss them with Ms. Benoit."

Ervine's round face flushed, and he sneered.

"No need. I hear she's already on the warpath. I'd start updating my résumé if I were you."

Marissa's stomach tightened another notch and she sank back into her chair. She wasn't surprised Benoit was out for blood. She was not known for her empathy. Still, Marissa needed this job. Maybe if she apologized and explained the situation, Benoit might understand.

The first chance she got, Marissa pulled her phone out of her purse and glanced at the display. No messages. She'd talked on the phone with Detective Crawford about Brooke's case last night. Since then, she'd heard nothing, and she was going nuts. The lobby was empty as she dialed Crawford's number. Before she could finish, someone called her name.

"Ms. Rooney."

Startled, Marissa looked up. Evan Holt stood by the desk. He was tall and thin with dark hair and deep almond-shaped eyes. His wide mouth wasn't smiling, which was a shame, really. He might actually be handsome if he didn't look so damned uptight.

Although Evan Holt was a lawyer, he was not a member of the firm. He worked closely alongside his Aunt, managing her personal matters. Marissa quickly scanned her calendar—Tuesday morning and she found nothing to explain his sudden appearance. At a loss, she forced a smile.

"Mr. Holt, what can I do for you?"

"Ms. Rooney, could you come with me, please?"

His tone was curt, his words more an order than a request, and Marissa's stomach sank in a sickening spiral of dread. She stood on rubbery legs, staring dumbly at him.

"Bring your things."

This was it. They were going to fire her for violating company policy and there wasn't a damned thing she could do to stop them. They didn't want to hear excuses. They didn't care what was going on in her personal life or why she'd left the office in a panic. The only thing she couldn't figure out was why they'd sent Evan Holt to deal with her. Surely Benoit wanted the honors.

Perplexed, Marissa collected her coat and purse and followed Holt toward the elevators. Paige Benoit's chilly voice stopped her in her tracks.

"Just where do you think you're going?" she demanded.

"Ms. Rooney is coming with me," Holt said.

Benoit folded her arms, glaring at Marissa. "I wasn't notified of this."

"Then perhaps you should take that up with Mr. Regis." Holt's lips stretched into a condescending smile.

Leaving Benoit openmouthed and ready to spit fire, they exited the lobby and marched down the hall. Marissa supposed he was trying to be discreet, taking her away from prying ears to fire her. After yesterday's fiasco in the reception area, the last thing anyone wanted was to cause another scene.

Marissa and Holt stood on opposite sides of the brass-and-copper-caged car without speaking. The elevator operator pressed the button for the thirty-seventh floor. They were going up instead of down. Confused, Marissa frowned and glanced over at Holt. He cocked an eyebrow and eyed her from head to toe, not undressing her with his eyes like Ervine had, seeming more like a scientist assessing a test subject.

Marissa shifted uncomfortably in her heels, well aware that today she did not fit the conservative profile of the firm. Today Holt's mute assessment made her feel like a low-class bimbo.

"Nice shoes," Holt said, breaking the silence at last.

"They're Jimmy Choo knock-offs."

"I know."

He smiled. Confused, Marissa stood ramrod-straight, staring straight ahead as the floors slid smoothly by. Despite the brave front she presented, her apprehension grew as the elevator continued its steady climb.

If they fired her, she was screwed. Her savings account would evaporate in a matter of weeks. With Brooke in college, she was barely scraping by. Not only would she lose her family's sole source of income, she would lose her medical benefits too. There was no way she could afford private medical insurance, and Brooke needed insulin. Without insulin . . .

She clutched her coat against her chest, and the knot in her stomach tightened. Finally they arrived at the thirty-seventh floor. The elevator doors opened, and Marissa stepped out into a sumptuous suite. The floors were dark hardwood, polished to a lustrous glow. Flawless white walls stretched up to high, arched ceilings. Huge banks of windows showed a bird's-eye view of the city skyline to the north and the football and baseball stadiums to the south. To the west Marissa glimpsed the turbulent waters of Elliott Bay.

She had always loved this view. On her lunch break, she would often ride the elevator to the observation deck overlooking the city. Not only did it get her away from the lunchroom gossip, seeing the city from this angle made her feel larger than life, like a god staring down from atop Mount Olympus.

Marissa followed Holt down a long hallway to a conference room. He closed the door behind her. A bitter taste filled Marissa's mouth.

Yes. This would be a closed-door conversation.

Holt stood tall at the head of the table, his narrow face solemn as a clergyman's. Marissa settled into a chair at the other end, staring past him out the huge bank of windows, where a thick layer of dark clouds hung low over Elliott Bay.

Slowly he opened a fat manila folder at the end of the table. A severance package? She could hope.

"So, Ms. Rooney, it looks like you've been with the firm just over a year."

"That's right. I got hired after finishing my legal secretary certification."

"At North Seattle Community College," he finished. "Night school."

The arrogance in his tone piqued her, and Marissa raised her chin.

"We don't all go to Ivy League schools," she said.

Holt's expression remained flat, and Marissa wondered if there was a heart beating beneath his marble skin.

"Before that you worked for the Boeing Company."

"It's a good local company."

"I've heard of it," he said with a dry smile. "Why did you leave?"

Holt cocked his head, and Marissa wondered what was written in that magic file of his. Why she'd resigned was none of Holt's business. In truth, her old boss made Ervine look like an altar boy, but she'd never complained and the terms of her resignation had been generous. The money she got had kept the family afloat while she went back to school.

"I decided to upgrade my skills," Marissa said.

"Your attendance record has been good. I see no complaints in your file, and yet Ms. Benoit claims you walked out of the office yesterday without giving notice. Why?"

She saw nothing, no compassion, no curiosity, nothing in Holt's expression to compel her to confide in him. But if she wanted to save her job, she had to tell the truth.

"I had a family emergency."

“What type of emergency?”

Marissa pressed a hand against her flat belly. She wanted to tell Holt to shove his job up his uptight ass. Instead she forced the words from her lips.

“My daughter is missing.”

Saying the words out loud made the situation painfully real. Tears pricked her eyes, but she blinked them away. She wouldn't cry in front of Evan Holt.

Surprise registered on Holt's face, and something else. Sympathy? Acid churned at the pit of her stomach. She didn't want his pity. She needed her goddamned job. He glanced back at the file.

“Which one?”

“Brooke. She's a freshman at UW.”

“You've been married three times . . .”

“And divorced,” Marissa cut in, her patience at an end. “What's your point?”

His pawing through her private life, though amusing to be sure, was a waste of time, and Marissa was about done with the games.

“Just collecting background information.”

“Do you care to tell me how my marital history relates to my employment status? My kid is out there somewhere, and you want to know how many times I've been married? You're kidding, right?”

Holt ignored the question.

“How long has she been missing?”

“Four days.”

“And you've filed a missing-persons report?”

“Yes, of course. I'm not an idiot.”

“How much of this did you tell Ms. Benoit before you left the office yesterday?”

Marissa glared at him, her eyes boring holes in his Burberry suit. She didn't want to answer any more of his questions. Fuck the job. Fuck him.

Count to ten, she told herself, pulling in a deep breath. But she only made it to five.

“Do you have children, Mr. Holt?”

“No.”

Marissa's chin jerked up and down in a rigid nod. She doubted Holt had ever cared about another human being more than himself in his whole self-centered, trust-fund-brat, entitled life.

“If you did, you'd know their safety is more important to you than anything else in this world. If the firm can't see fit to grant me some leniency based on my excellent work record and the extreme circumstances of—”

Holt held up a dismissive hand, stopping her in midsentence.

“I get it, Ms. Rooney.”

Marissa's anger sizzled white-hot. The arrogant bastard didn't even have the decency to let her finish. Her hands clenched into fists as she fought to suppress the string of epithets she wanted to hurl in his face. Oblivious to her rage, Holt closed the folder.

“Would you mind waiting here?”

“What for?”

“I won't be long.”

Left alone, Marissa scratched at the nicotine patch she'd applied before leaving for the office. If she'd had cigarettes in her purse, she'd have lit one up right now. Damn the rules. Damn the consequences. Damn him.

Marissa raked her hands through her hair. What the hell was she going to do? Best-case scenario, they'd pay her severance. That would help, but it wouldn't be enough. She closed her eyes, knowing full well there was only one option. As much as she hated the idea, she was going to have to ask Logan for money. She had no other choice. She needed health insurance for Brooke, and she needed to keep a roof over Kelly's head.

She opened her purse and pulled out her cell phone. She thumbed through her contacts and was about to hit the dial button when she saw Kelly's name on the screen. A flicker of hope flared in her chest, and she answered.

"Did you hear from Brooke?"

Kelly hesitated. Tension crackled on the line before she finally spoke.

"No."

"Is everything okay?"

"Yeah, Mom. I'm calling about something else. Do you remember my friend Ashley?"

Marissa closed her eyes and kneaded her forehead.

"From Redmond. Sure."

"Well, her parents are heading to Napa Valley for Thanksgiving weekend. Apparently they've got this amazing place. Anyway, Ashley has invited me to go with them. What do you think?"

The words tumbled out of Kelly's mouth so fast, it took Marissa a second or two to catch up.

"About?"

"Can I go with them to Napa Valley for Thanksgiving?"

The question caught Marissa off guard. She opened her eyes and stared out the bank of windows. Outside, a green-and-white ferry bobbed across the white-capped waters, struggling to hold its course against strong winds buffeting Puget Sound.

"It wouldn't be expensive, Mom. I've already checked flights online. If I book now, it will cost less than three hundred dollars. What do you say?"

Kelly sounded so excited it hurt Marissa's heart to say no. But what choice did she have? She dropped her gaze to the empty conference room table, gripping the phone tight in her hand.

"Look, Kelly, things aren't good at work. We can't afford—"

"But, Mom, all I'd have to pay for is my flight. They'd take care of everything else. I could get a part-time job and pay you back. It's not like it's a lot of money, only a couple hundred dollars. Please?"

"It's money I don't have to spend. Besides, with your sister missing, how can you even ask?"

Silence greeted her, and she could picture Kelly's expression all too well. Hurt. Angry.

"I could ask Logan. He'd—"

"Kelly, I said no."

"Since Logan works for the airline, maybe he can get me a free seat."

"No."

"You're such a bitch. No wonder Logan doesn't want you anymore."

Marissa's mouth dropped open, but before she could utter another word, Kelly hung up. Tears filled Marissa's eyes. She blinked them back, knowing any minute now Holt would march by, passing judgment, and there was no way she was going to cry in front of him.

What the hell was taking Holt so long?

Unable to sit still another second, Marissa stood and paced the length of the conference room. How long would he keep her waiting? And for what? He was just going to fire her anyway. He could damn well mail her the paper work.

She snatched her purse off a chair, slung it over her shoulder, and stalked toward the door. Her hand was stretched out toward the door when it opened. Marissa jumped. Holt stood in the doorway, his face revealing nothing.

“Ms. Rooney,” he said, “please come with me.”

Holt led the way to a pair of mahogany French doors. He stopped and knocked once. Marissa scowled. Visions of a firing squad flashed through her brain, and for one brief moment she thought she could smell the seductive scent of cigarette smoke. Holt threw open the door.

“Lizzie,” Evan Holt said in a disapproving tone of voice.

Elizabeth Holt sat behind a huge, ornately carved desk. Her yellowed skin was the same color as parchment paper. Pale, lined, and thin, it covered her sagging cheeks and drooping chin. Evan glared at the cigarette pinched firmly between Ms. Holt’s fingers like it was a stick of dynamite. Marissa watched the silvery ring of smoke swirl up into the air above Ms. Holt, curving around her head like a halo. A pang of longing shot through her. The smell filled her lungs and she could almost taste the warm buttered-toast flavor of a cigarette.

Ms. Holt looked unconcerned by Evan’s censure. Her lips curled up at the edges in an impish smile. Defiance twinkled in the old woman’s eyes.

“That’s Ms. Holt to you, or Aunt Elizabeth, if you must.”

Her voice was like coarse sandpaper, hard and grainy. Evan frowned. His upright stance stiffened and he glared across the desk at his aunt.

“You know what the doctor says.”

“He is not here. Besides, at this point, what difference would it make?”

“Well, if you don’t care about your doctor’s advice, then perhaps you could consider my welfare. I work here too and have no wish to inhale your secondhand smoke.”

Ms. Holt stared at him for a long moment, her sagging chin angled up. She placed the lipstick-stained butt between her lips and took another long drag, as if goading him to say something more. Evan’s mouth opened, but no words escaped as she reached over and flicked on the purifying air filter. The hum of the fan interrupted the silence, and smoke was sucked down into the blunted end of the device.

While Evan evidently found the aroma of cigarette smoke revolting, Marissa drew in a deep, longing breath and held it. Her fingers scratched absently at the patch on her arm.

“Ms. Rooney,” Ms. Holt said, turning her attention to Marissa. “Thank you for coming to see me. If you would be so kind as to take a seat, we can get started.”

Started? Start what? Ms. Holt wasn’t the type of woman you argued with, so Marissa stepped forward and perched on the edge of a high-backed leather chair. Her short skirt inched up her thighs, and she tugged it back into place again, grimacing, regretting her hasty wardrobe choice again.

Holt swished her hand through the air.

“Evan, you may go.”

Dismissed like a lapdog, Evan exited the room. The door clicked shut behind him, and Marissa's apprehension grew.

"Would you like a cigarette, Ms. Rooney?"

Marissa touched the patch on her arm. Would she? Absolutely, but there was no way she was going to sit here and smoke with Elizabeth Holt. Instead she shook her head.

"I'm trying to quit."

"A noble effort. I, myself, have never been the quitting type."

A thin smile stretched Holt's lips, and she took a final drag on the cigarette. The smoke was released from her lungs in a luxurious, silvery stream. Marissa watched it fade from the air like mist on a sunny morning. Holt crushed the glowing end of the cigarette in the heavy ashtray. Long, bony fingers plucked a file folder off the desk, and Holt opened it without glancing up. Her sharp eyes scanned the first page quickly.

Holt looked draped in wealth. The long, flowing cobalt jacket matched her eyes. The matching dress fell from her slim shoulders in a flattering neckline appropriate for a woman her age, low enough to show the glimmer of the gold necklace around her throat, but not too low. Her steel-gray hair brushed her shoulders in a sleek bob, and huge diamond earrings completed the look.

Holt's laser stare met hers over the top of the manila folder. Next to Holt's elegance, she looked like a ladder-climbing bimbo in her ill-fitting outfit. Marissa tugged at the neckline of her blouse and smoothed the hair away from her face.

"In the lobby yesterday, you said you were leaving to find your daughter."

Marissa's frustration bubbled over. "Aren't people in the firm allowed to have family emergencies?"

She regretted her defensive tone as soon as the words escaped her lips, but Elizabeth Holt didn't look offended. She looked curious. Her lips angled up in a ponderous smile. The smug expression irked Marissa.

"Of course, Ms. Rooney."

"I know Ms. Benoit was upset when I left yesterday, but when I realized my daughter's roommate hadn't seen her since Saturday, I had to leave. Quite honestly, Ms. Holt, I would do the same thing tomorrow."

Holt dipped her sagging chin in a slow nod. "Given the circumstances, it is entirely understandable."

Marissa's eyebrows wrinkled. Understandable? Bullshit. Why had Evan Holt grilled her? Why was she sitting here, if not to plead her case? Marissa had no idea what game Holt was playing, but she no longer cared. She was done with their games.

"So what do you want? Are you hoping I'll quit?"

"I want to know more about your daughter's disappearance. What have the police said?"

The abrupt change in topic took her by surprise, and Marissa clasped her hands in her lap.

"Not much. I spoke to Detective Crawford at the SPD. He asked a bunch of questions, and I haven't heard from him since. I left him a voice mail this morning and am waiting to hear back."

"You must be frantic with worry."

Was Holt screwing with her? Of course she was frantic with worry. Anyone in her shoes would be. She shouldn't be sitting here; she should be out looking for her daughter. She was wasting precious time.

Marissa stood up, looking down at Elizabeth Holt.

"Let's stop playing games."

Holt's eyebrows arched. She probably wasn't used to people giving her the straight goods, but Marissa was out of patience.

"Just what game do you think we're playing, Ms. Rooney?" Holt tented her fingers beneath her chin, waiting for Marissa to respond.

Marissa flipped her hands, palms up, returning Holt's stare. "Come on. It's obvious, isn't it? If you're going to fire me, I'd prefer you just get on with it."

Holt's lips thinned, and she regarded Marissa with a curious look.

"Very well then, Ms. Rooney," she said, and swished a hand through the air like a magician waving a magic wand. "You're fired."

The words didn't come as a shock. Marissa had already been braced for the blow. Expelling a breath from between pursed lips, she snatched her purse off the floor.

"Send the paper work to my home address," she called over her shoulder as she strode to the door.

She could probably sue for wrongful dismissal. God knew she needed the money, but right now it was the least of her worries. All she could think about was finding Brooke.

"Just a moment, Ms. Rooney, if you please."

What now? Marissa turned and glared down into Holt's lined face. Holt raised a gnarled finger.

"I do have another job opening . . ."

"Another job?"

"Yes. One for which I believe you're uniquely qualified. Please sit."

Marissa gripped the purse strap tight, torn. Was Holt screwing with her? Part of her wanted to march out of the office and never look back. Part of her knew she had to listen. Reluctantly she resumed her seat across from Holt. The old woman smiled.

"You see, I'm starting a new foundation. That's why I was visiting the office yesterday morning. I've asked Regis to draw up the papers for me."

"What kind of foundation?"

"Its purpose is to help victims of violent crimes and their families."

Marissa's head swam. She tried to grasp what Holt was saying. Hugging her purse to her chest, she shook her head.

"I don't understand. How do your plans for the foundation involve me?"

"My dear Ms. Rooney, I would think it would be quite obvious. Your daughter is missing, and I want to help. I'm going to need an executive assistant to help me launch the foundation, and you happen to be out of a job."

Marissa stared at Holt, dumbfounded. She was a receptionist, not an executive assistant. Why would Holt want her? Before she could utter a word, Holt continued.

"I propose we make the search for your daughter the foundation's first case."

Was she hearing this right? Was she dreaming?

"You want to help me?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

Holt eased back in her chair, a flicker of emotion crossing the old woman's lined face. Her flinty blue eyes were softer now, and Marissa waited. Holt reached beneath the collar of her shirt and pulled out a golden amulet at the end of a fine chain. From this angle, it looked like some kind of religious symbol, like a saint or an angel. Elizabeth Holt rolled it thoughtfully between her finger and thumb. At last she spoke.

"I've spent half my career, and a good chunk of my fortune, looking for ways to help families in crisis, Ms. Rooney. You see, when I was a young college student, much like your daughter, I was attacked in my dorm room. The terror of that day is something I will never forget. In the years that followed, I looked for ways to deal with my own trauma and heal my own wounds. I became a lawyer to fight for justice—not just for me, for all victims."

Holt released the amulet, and it disappeared in the folds of her blouse. She straightened.

“Eventually I realized justice wasn’t enough. There will always be more predators than there will be jail cells to house them, and predators are very difficult to catch. I want to do more while I still have time—to create a foundation that will provide resources to the people who need them most, to help victims and their families get on with their lives.”

Marissa was stunned by Holt’s revelation. Elizabeth Holt, wealthy, powerful, successful beyond measure, a victim? She couldn’t imagine it.

“I’m very sorry to hear about your daughter’s disappearance. I want to help.”

“How?”

“By giving you access to resources to help find her. By providing support for the search that you otherwise would not have.”

“And what would I have to do?”

Holt tented her fingers underneath her chin and smiled.

“Mainly, you would focus on the search for your daughter. But along the way, I will ask you to do a number of things to help make my dream of the foundation a reality.”

“It sounds too easy, too good to be true.”

“Easy?” Holt raised her eyebrows. “Oh no. Quite the contrary, Ms. Rooney, there will be nothing easy about it. You have faced many challenges in your life so far, but you have not given up. You have worked hard to better yourself, to build a life for your daughters. You are strong, and by the way you stood up to Ms. Benoit yesterday, I could see that you have got a lot of fight in you. That is good. You are going to need it. You are going to need every bit of strength you possess if you are going to survive this ordeal.”

Holt’s words chilled Marissa. Crossing her arms, she settled back into her chair.

“First, you are going to need to trust me. Can you do that?”

Marissa squirmed under Holt’s appraising eye. Trust? Everyone she trusted had betrayed her. Her mother. The men in her life. How could she learn to trust a woman she didn’t even know?

“You want to find your daughter?”

“Of course.”

“Then join my foundation. Let me help you find Brooke. I am warning you, though, as a prosecutor I have seen a number of these types of cases. They are often hard and ugly. Happy endings are a fantasy reserved for the movies. This ordeal will change you. It will change your daughter in ways you cannot begin to imagine. Let me ask you, Ms. Rooney, are you ready to face the road ahead, no matter how painful it might be?”

“I have no choice.”

Holt leaned back in her chair, eyebrows raised. “Indeed you do not.”

Marissa swallowed, her mouth as dry as sandpaper. “So, where do we start?”

Holt inclined her head, a slight smile on her lips.

“First we go to the police. We find out what on earth they are doing to find your girl. Second, you write a press release.”

“A press release?”

How the hell was she going to do that? No doubt Holt could whip one off in her sleep, but Marissa didn’t know where to begin.

“We need to engage the media in the search for Brooke. A press release is the first step.” Holt paused, her cobalt eyes never leaving Marissa’s face. “Shall we get started?”

“Yes,” Marissa said.

Elizabeth Holt stepped out of the limousine. The wet wind whipped off Puget Sound. Holt's black coat billowed around her narrow frame like a cape. She swept up the staircase, entering police headquarters like she owned the place. Marissa followed close behind. They crossed the lobby, heading for the front desk, where a young, clean-cut officer sat. He looked up as they approached, recognition registering on his narrow face.

"I'm here to see the chief," Holt said before he opened his mouth.

He glanced at a flat-screen monitor in front of him.

"Do you have an appointment, Ms. Holt?"

"I do not."

Still staring at the computer screen, the young officer angled his head to the right.

"I'm afraid his schedule is booked."

Holt cast a withering smile in his direction and pulled her phone out of her purse. She dialed a phone number and waited. With each passing second, the apprehension on the young man's face grew.

"Elizabeth Holt here. I need to speak to Marty. No, he most certainly cannot call me back. I need to speak with him now."

Marissa's eyes widened. Marty? She couldn't even get the police to call her back, and here Holt was calling the mayor. What must it be like to have such powerful connections?

"Interrupt him. This will only take a few minutes," she said in a hard voice, the thin veneer of civility stripped away.

Holt waited. Marissa stole a sidelong glance at the officer manning the desk. He was pretending to ignore Holt, but she could tell he was hanging on every word.

"Marty, I have a situation. I need to see Chief Abrams. Now. It's about a missing-persons case."

Holt bent her head, her sour mouth pursed, looking displeased as she listened to the mayor's response. Marissa's hopes plummeted. They weren't just going to waltz in there to see the chief. Even the great Elizabeth Holt's influence had limits.

"No, Marty, I am afraid that is not good enough. Did you hear the news? I've made Fortune magazine's list of most powerful women." She paused. "Thank you. I'm planning to talk to Lesley Stahl from 60 Minutes about the nomination tomorrow, but now . . . well, turns out the publicity might aid my cause, though I was hoping to discuss the matter with the chief first. Of course, if he's too busy . . ."

Marissa gaped at Holt's brazen play. She wasn't just cutting through the bureaucratic red tape—she was shredding it.

"That would be fine. The girl's name is Brooke Parker. She's a nineteen-year-old college student from UW. I also want to meet the detective assigned to the case." Holt's chin jerked in a tight nod. "Excellent. Thanks for your help, Marty."

Elizabeth Holt dropped her cell phone in her purse. Two beats of silence passed before the telephone at the front desk rang. The officer stared at it as if it were a ticking bomb. His eyes flicked to Holt's face. She raised her eyebrows in expectation, and Marissa waited, hope coiled like a spring in her chest. He answered.

"Yes, sir," he said, and hung up the phone. "Ms. Holt, the chief will meet you upstairs in twenty minutes. I'll have you escorted up immediately."

They entered a large conference room and Elizabeth seated herself at the head of the long cherrywood table. Too keyed up to sit, Marissa paced the length of the room. Holt hadn't been exaggerating her influence. She was astonishingly well connected. After her phone call with Detective Crawford, Marissa hadn't heard a peep; now here she was, waiting for an audience with the chief of police. And all it had taken was a short, contentious phone call to the mayor.

The chief of police, John Abrams, marched crisply into the room, a phalanx of uniformed officers in tow. Abrams was a trim man in his midfifties with salt-and-pepper hair and piercing brown eyes. He had an erect military bearing and moved with a quick, efficient stride. After taking up a position at the foot of the table, Abrams introduced the two other police officers.

"This is Captain Moses Lindquist from the West Precinct and Lieutenant Brad Alvarez."

Each man reached across the table to shake their hands—Holt first, Marissa second—before everyone settled around the table. Tension showed in the men's tight, polite smiles. They didn't want to be here, but they had no choice.

"Ms. Holt, it's a pleasure to see you," Abrams said. "How can I be of service?"

"Good of you to see me, Chief Abrams. Who has been assigned to the case?"

"Detective Crawford."

"And where might this Detective Crawford be?"

"He's out in the field, ma'am. We don't need to wait for him. I'm sure we can handle this," Lindquist said.

Abrams had a good poker face. He looked pleasant, as if he were meeting with a colleague for coffee, with no trace of resentment on his face. She shouldn't be surprised. Political savvy was a must for anyone in his position.

"As I'm sure the mayor informed you, I am here because Ms. Rooney's daughter has gone missing. I was hoping you could get us up to speed on the investigation."

Holt's stern gaze swept the room, from Marissa to Chief Abrams, and settled on the police officers, who were seated to his right.

Captain Lindquist spoke first. He was a middle-aged man with a powerful build, thick through the shoulders and chest. He swung his bright-blue eyes toward Holt.

"So far we have found no evidence indicating that Brooke Parker was abducted."

Lindquist's matter-of-fact tone rattled Marissa. All illusions she'd had of the police snapping to evaporated.

Holt jumped in.

"Evidence? You mean an eyewitness swearing that some monster swept Ms. Parker off the steps of the Chapel and shoved her into a van? Is that the type of evidence you are looking for, Captain?"

Lindquist's eyes narrowed.

"Of course not. We've talked to people who saw Ms. Parker at the club that night. No one saw or heard anything that leads us to believe Ms. Parker left against her will. Additionally, she posted a message on her Facebook page saying she was heading out of town . . ."

"And I suppose no one has ever hacked a Facebook site?" Holt asked with mock naïveté.

A grim smile stretched across Holt's lips, and Marissa realized the old woman loved this; she loved going to war.

"It's presumptuous to think someone would go to such lengths to—"

"Cover up a crime?" Holt interrupted, eyebrows cocked. "Surely you don't believe that, Captain Lindquist." She flattened a bony hand against her sagging chest and said, "If I was brazen enough to snatch a girl up from a local bar, is it that much of a stretch to think I might cover my tracks?"

“And can you hack Facebook?”

“Me?” She touched her fingers to her chest and grinned at Captain Lindquist. “Hardly. I am barely capable of using my cell phone. I would be willing to wager that in less than twenty minutes, I could find someone who can.”

Lindquist’s lips compressed into a thin, angry line.

“So tell me, just how will the department look if it fails to investigate the disappearance of a teenaged girl?”

“Hold on, now. Let’s back up,” Chief Abrams said, raising a hand. “No one is saying we’re not investigating the case. However, at this point, we have no reason to suspect foul play. So, Ms. Rooney, help us understand what you think happened to your daughter.”

Marissa fidgeted in her chair and her mind went suddenly blank. She had been foolish to think Holt would handle everything for her. Her mouth bone-dry, she struggled to compose her response as all eyes turned toward her. Marissa fixed her gaze on Lindquist. There was nothing friendly about his answering look.

“Captain,” she began in a shaky voice, “I haven’t seen or heard from Brooke in three days. I believe something has happened to her.”

He grinned. She hated that grin. It made her feel small and stupid.

“No disrespect intended, Ms. Rooney, but your daughter is not a kid anymore. She doesn’t have to tell you where she’s going or ask your permission.”

Marissa glanced over at Holt, hoping she would jump in and crush all remaining doubts that Brooke was a runaway, but Holt was staring back at her. They all were.

“Brooke’s a diabetic. She needs her medication to stay alive.”

“Yes,” Lindquist said. “A condition your daughter has managed for years. There is no reason to think that she can’t manage it now, right?”

“Not necessarily. If she was taken, she might not have medication with her.”

“Any way to know that for certain?”

“No,” Marissa said, rattled but still determined to plow ahead. “She missed her sister’s recital. Brooke is not the kind of girl who would fail to show up, not to something she knows is important to her sister. I haven’t heard a single word from her. Normally she sends me a text or calls almost every day. It’s unusual for her to go dark, especially for this long.”

“Ms. Rooney . . .,” Lindquist said. He was going to dismiss her again. She could tell.

A slow flush of anger warmed Marissa’s cheeks. She couldn’t let him shut her down. Not now. She had to fight for Brooke. She couldn’t let them intimidate her into silence. The police said they were investigating the case, but she knew time was their enemy. She knew in her gut something was very wrong and stalling could cost Brooke her life.

Marissa’s gaze hardened and she leaned forward in her chair.

“Do you have teenagers, Captain Lindquist?”

“Yes,” he admitted, angling back.

“Is your teenager surgically attached to her cell phone? I know my daughter is.”

Lindquist reluctantly dipped his head in acknowledgement.

“Have you checked Brooke’s phone records?”

Lindquist’s gaze dropped to the table and Marissa knew what that meant—she’d scored a point. Her confidence grew.

“In the eyes of the law, Ms. Rooney, your daughter is an adult with a right to privacy. We need to compel her service provider to release her cell phone records, and in order to do that, we’d need a warrant.”

“Then get a warrant,” Marissa said. She pushed out of her chair and eyed each of the police officers in turn. “Even her roommate hasn’t heard from her since Saturday night. Brooke is missing classes, and that’s not at all like her. She’s coming up on exams. She wouldn’t just leave town without a word to anyone. I don’t care what her Facebook page says; there is something wrong. I know it. I need you to find out what it is.”

Lindquist cast a glance over at Chief Abrams. The chief nodded. But before he could speak, Lieutenant Alvarez jumped in.

“We’re working on it, but I have to tell you, Ms. Rooney, I get calls like this all of the time. Just last month there was a girl reported missing. Everyone agreed she was a responsible kid that would never just leave without letting her parents know. She met a boy at a party and took off for a weekend without telling her parents or her boyfriend where she was going. If we spent our time running down every single one of these cases . . .”

“Tell me, gentlemen, is Brooke Parker the only girl missing?” Holt interrupted, staring at Lindquist like she already knew the answer.

In the burgeoning silence, Holt beckoned toward Marissa. Hands shaking, Marissa pulled the missing-person flyer from her purse and slapped it on the table.

“What about Kim Covey?” Marissa asked. “Have you found her yet?”

Marissa slid the flyer into the center of the table. All the cops in the room glanced at it, then quickly looked away. Marissa caught Holt’s approving nod.

Alvarez looked like he was about to explode.

“We know how to do our jobs, Ms. Rooney. At this point there is no reason to think your daughter knew Kim Covey. They moved in different circles.”

Marissa slammed her palm hard on top of the flyer. The sound echoed in the room.

“Have you found her yet?”

She stared directly into the lieutenant’s eyes. Alvarez looked away first.

“No, but the last thing we need is for the public to panic about some psychopath out there abducting college girls.”

“Then you had better find my daughter soon, because I think it’s time the press heard about Brooke and what you’re doing, or, more importantly, not doing to find her. I’m sure they will be interested in a potential connection between Kim Covey’s disappearance and Brooke’s—two girls who went out with their friends and never made it back to the university campus. Take a look at this picture,” Marissa said, shoving the paper across the table toward Alvarez. He recoiled like she’d just flung a snake at him. “Look at her. Kim Covey looks so much like Brooke they could be sisters. Tell me you don’t see it.”

Marissa stared across the table at the police officers. All traces of apathy had vanished from their faces. Only Elizabeth Holt looked pleased.

Chief Abrams’s brow furrowed and he turned to Lindquist with a look as hard as stone.

“Call Crawford.”

“He’s on his way.”

“Call him,” Abrams commanded.

Lindquist’s lips pursed and he gave a brief nod. After rolling his chair away from the table, he stood and marched from the room. Moments later he returned and placed his cell facedown on the table.

“Rest assured, Ms. Rooney, we will continue to look into your daughter’s case.”

“And do what?” Marissa demanded.

They were pissed. That was good. So was she.

“We’ve got procedures,” Alvarez said.

“Procedures?” Marissa shook her head. “Brooke is an insulin-dependent diabetic, and yet it doesn’t look like she’s taken enough insulin with her to be away for days at a time. I found a full vial of insulin in her dorm room. Do you know what that means, Lieutenant? If she doesn’t have enough insulin, she will die. My daughter is out there somewhere without the medication she needs to stay alive. So while I’m busy waiting for you to follow your procedures, she may already be dying.”

A heavy silence answered Marissa. She met Alvarez’s hostile stare without flinching.

“How long will she survive without her medication?”

Marissa whirled toward the doorway. Her eyes collided with the newcomer’s. Shock jolted through her.

Thick, ropy scars disfigured the right side of his face. The puckered red skin arced beneath his eye, swept taut across his cheekbone, and ended at his jawline.

Marissa didn’t want to stare, but somehow she couldn’t tear her gaze away from his wreck of a face. He didn’t seem to notice. He met her eyes with a level gaze.

“You’re late, Crawford,” Alvarez said.

“Yes, sir. Traffic’s a bitch.”

Alvarez looked irritated by Crawford’s response, while Chief Abrams masked a grin behind his square hand. The detective was still looking at her, awaiting her response.

“With an insulin pen, a week, maybe two if she cuts back on her medication, but without the insulin in the vial, she’s going to run her sugars high.”

“What does that mean?” Crawford asked, sounding like he wanted to understand.

“It means she’ll be in constant pain as the muscles in her body feed on themselves to consume enough sugar to stay alive.”

Captain Lindquist grimaced. Marissa wondered if he was thinking about his own children now and how he’d feel if they were suffering. The other faces around the table looked equally sober.

“I looked at Brooke’s phone records and bank statements,” Crawford said. “There’s been no activity since eleven o’clock on Saturday night. It’s a definite break in her regular pattern. I was on my way over to the university to talk to her roommate when I was redirected here.”

Crawford wasn’t here to cover his ass, Marissa realized. He was actually doing his job. He was looking for her daughter.

“We will find out what happened to Brooke.”

Brooke. He remembered her name. For the first time in days, Marissa felt like she could breathe again. She forced herself to look past the hideous scars on Crawford’s face and into his steady gray eyes.

“That’s all I’m asking, Detective Crawford.”

“Does that meet your expectations, Ms. Holt?” Chief Abrams asked.

“Indeed it does. I do, however, request daily progress updates.”

Lieutenant Alvarez’s face turned a deeper shade of red. “In all appreciation for your interest in the case, Ms. Holt, Detective Crawford is carrying a full caseload. I will not ask him to provide you with daily updates.”

“I’ll do it,” Crawford said. He wasn’t looking at Elizabeth Holt. His gaze met Marissa’s squarely.

Alvarez stormed out of the conference room, a man on fire. On the drive back to the West Precinct, Alvarez barely said a word. Seth didn't mind the silence. It gave him time to consider Marissa Rooney and what she had said about her daughter's medical condition. Insulin affected the timeline in a big way. Without it Brooke would survive hours, maybe a day, until it was too late. They had already wasted too much time.

Alvarez paused in the break room and poured himself a cup of coffee. He turned toward Seth.

"So, Crawford, how did you like getting your balls busted by the great Elizabeth Holt?"

"I don't know what your problem is, Lieutenant, I love politics," Seth quipped.

"Yeah, you're known far and wide for your astute political savvy." Alvarez flashed a fierce grin. He gestured with the coffee carafe and Seth shook his head, declining the offer. Alvarez set the pot down. "You couldn't pay me enough to do the chief's job. The way I heard it, Holt was hell on wheels back in the day. She knows the system inside and out. Lucky us. We'll get to smile as she shoves this case down our throats."

Seth couldn't blame him for being pissed. No one liked being called into the chief's office. It wasn't like they were sitting around on their collective asses. But instead of getting bent out of shape about it, he did what his shrink advised him—he ignored the stuff he couldn't control and focused on the missing girl.

"So what's your plan with the Parker case?" Alvarez asked.

"I'll bump it to the top of my list for the next day or two. With any luck she'll pop back up at the dorm with a story about how she went out partying. No harm, no foul."

"Wouldn't that be nice?" Alvarez said, his expression grim. "If not, we'll have the chief and the dragon lady breathing fire down our necks. At least the mother's not hard on the eyes."

Alvarez cut a sidelong glance his way. Seth shrugged.

"If you say so."

"Like you didn't notice."

Of course he'd noticed. What guy wouldn't? But it wasn't her pretty face that lingered in his mind. He couldn't quite shake the look of panic in Marissa Rooney's eyes.

"Keep me posted on your progress."

"Yes, sir." Seth snapped a flippant salute and strode across the busy squad room toward his desk.

Seth's fifteen years on the force had left him short on optimism. Experience had taught him to treat every missing-persons case like a homicide. Politics aside, this case was no different. One missing college student was bad news. With two on the books, the sooner he could uncover or rule out a connection between the cases, the better.

Brooke's Facebook page was a treasure trove of information. While the techies were busy scouring her circle of friends to uncover any potential overlaps with Kim Covey, Saturday night's post told him that she and her roommate, Tess Turner, had spent the evening at the Chapel. One of Brooke's Facebook friends, Jesse Morgan, tended bar there. A quick phone call later, he learned that Jesse's shift was just beginning.

Seth opened his desk drawer to retrieve his car keys.

The photograph stuffed in his drawer stopped him cold. A stab of pain sliced through his heart. Golden-brown eyes stared up at him, bright and brimming with life. Holly. Two years had passed, and still not a day went by that the memories of her didn't burn through his soul like acid.

His shrink said he should get rid of the pictures—pack them away in a box where he didn't have to see them. But what good would that do? The memories stayed with him. So he kept the picture locked away in his drawer, a private pain only he could see. Some days he looked right past her face, barely flinching. Days like today, though, with a missing girl and a scared mother on his mind, the hole in his heart gaped like an open wound.

Reaching over the photo, he grabbed his car keys and slammed the drawer shut.

• • • •

MIDAFTERNOON PATRONS perched like vultures around the Chapel's U-shaped bar. Large arched windows reflected the gray afternoon sky. House music blared, and Seth was surprised he recognized the artist. Madonna. Though he admired her ability to keep up with the trends, he had little use for the song, electronic and hollow. He found himself missing the days when bands played real instruments. He knew his fondness for wailing guitars dated him, but what the hell.

The bartender was busy slicing up enough fruit to garnish a sea of jewel-colored cocktails. He glanced up as Seth approached. Catching sight of Seth's face, the kid did a double take before quickly looking away. He recognized Jesse Morgan from his DMV photo.

Jesse was a good-looking kid. Medium build. Sandy, shoulder-length hair. Blue eyes. A colorful sleeve of tattoos wound its way up his arm from wrist to shoulder.

A slight young woman perched across from him. With spiky black hair, pale skin, and bright-green eyes, she looked like a wood sprite. Seth didn't have to hear what she was saying to see she was pissing Jesse off. It was obvious—Body Language 101. There was no mistaking the clenched jaw and the way he glared at her, eyes as hard as metal.

Seth stepped close enough to hear her voice over the pounding music.

“Why invite us in the first place if all you were going to do was ignore us?”

Jesse glowered at her. He tossed a lime into a container and shook his head.

“So you're not going to answer,” she said, folding her arms like an angry wife.

“You saw how busy it was. What did you expect me to do? I was working.”

“Working? That's what you call it?”

“Look, I don't give a fuck what you think.”

Seth recognized the girl from Brooke Parker's Facebook page. Tess Turner. She was supposed to be in class; instead here she was, harassing Jesse.

Jesse looked up and caught Seth's gaze.

“What can I get you?”

Seth flashed his badge and Jesse rolled his eyes.

“Drinking on duty, Officer?”

“Just here for a friendly talk, but I see Ms. Turner beat me to it.”

Looking directly at him, Tess grinned. “You're the cop I talked to on the phone.”

“One and the same.”

Seth wasn't a big man, but in his grasp, her hand felt as small as a child's.

“Can you make her leave before I throw her out?” Jesse asked, pointing the business end of the paring knife in Tess's direction.

Tess scowled. “Throw me out? For what?”

Jesse pointed toward the glass on the bar and Tess raised her palms.

“It's soda water, Einstein. You weren't so self-righteous on Saturday night.”

“If I'd known what a huge pain in the ass you were going to be, I'd have . . .”

Jesse stopped midsentence. His face flushed red, and Tess leaned across the bar, planting her bony elbows wide.

“You’d have what, tough guy? Come on. Out with it. They say confession is good for the soul.”

Jesse shot Tess another murderous glare. She returned his look with a grin.

Seth sighed. “That’s enough, Ms. Turner.”

“You heard the police officer.” Jesse sliced the tip of the paring knife through the air, pointing toward the doors. The sharp metal edge glinted silver in the light. “Go home, little girl.”

Tess opened her mouth, ready to argue, but Seth stifled her response with his upraised palm.

“Ms. Turner, if you would be so kind as to wait over there”—Seth gestured to a booth in the corner—“I’ll speak with you after I finish with Mr. Morgan.”

Tess flashed a haughty show of teeth. With a light thump, her boots hit the floor, and she padded over to the booth with quick, graceful strides. The two women at the end of the bar held up their shot glasses, and Jesse gave a curt nod. The dark-haired woman smiled. The dimple in her cheek, so like Holly’s, sliced through Seth’s heart, and he turned away.

“You’re here about Brooke,” Jesse said.

He grabbed two shot glasses and slammed them onto the bar in front of the women. A splash of Galliano in each, a sugar-coated lemon on each rim. Then he poured a shot of sambuca into a brandy snifter and set it on fire. Blue flames filled the bowl. Slowly spinning the snifter, Jesse warmed the alcohol.

Unable to tear his eyes away from the flames, Seth watched, his fingers stroking his scarred cheek. Jesse poured the flaming sambuca over the two shot glasses. Fire rolled over the rims and pooled on the bar. Blue flames flickered. The women laughed, looking delighted.

Seth missed drinking—how the sweet oblivion of alcohol made everything fade from his mind until there was nothing. His shrink called drinking a crutch. His sponsor called it a problem. He called it a solution, but they couldn’t all be right.

“When was the last time you saw Brooke?” he asked.

“Saturday night.”

“Where?”

Jesse’s hands splayed wide. “What do you mean, where? Here, obviously.”

“You were working?”

“Right. They were sitting at the end of the bar.”

“Did you leave the bar with her?”

He shook his head, long bangs obscuring his eyes. “Around midnight, I looked up and she was gone.”

“Did you see her leave?”

“The place was a zoo.”

“What about Ms. Turner? When did she leave?”

“I couldn’t tell you. There must have been a hundred people hanging around the bar. It’s tough to see any one person. We’re hustling all night.”

“Poor baby,” Tess called from the table. “How many phone numbers did you get?”

Jesse’s brows furrowed and he fixed his angry gaze on Tess. “Contrary to popular belief, I’m not a man-whore.”

Tess looked skeptical, but let it drop.

“What time did you say you left?” Seth asked.

Jesse grabbed a bar cloth and ran it under the tap.

“After we closed, around two thirty.”

“Anyone see you?”

“Sure, there were a few of us who hung around for a drink before we went home.”

“Did you leave with anyone?”

“Look, I moved back to town a week ago. I’m still looking for a place. For now I’m crashing out on my buddy’s couch. He can vouch for me. I went back to his place after my shift. Alone.” Jesse wrung the cloth dry and wiped some smudges from the bar. His expression sober, he shot a quick glance at Tess and lowered his voice. “You don’t really think something bad happened to Brooke, do you?”

“She’s missing, you moron. What do you think?”

Jesse’s hands clenched into fists. Seth sighed and cast his stare over at Tess. She shifted in her seat and looked away.

“Ms. Turner, must I ask you to wait for me outside?”

She scowled and shook her head. Jesse propped his hands on the bar.

“How well did you know Brooke?”

“We were friends in high school. Well, more than friends, actually, but after graduation I moved away and we didn’t stay in touch.”

“How long ago was that?”

“Five years. So when I moved back, I looked her up.”

“And what made you want to get back in touch with her?”

Jesse cocked his head. “You saw her, right?”

Seth nodded. Brooke Parker was a pretty girl. She looked like her mother. Jesse dropped his gaze and continued.

“We were close once.”

“That’s all?”

“Maybe I was interested in seeing if there was something still there. You know, the road not taken.”

“And was there?”

He shrugged with his palms up. “We barely had time to talk. Like I said, it was crazy in here.”

Seth paused. The easy answer was no, so either the kid was a skilled liar or he was telling the truth. Seth was inclined to believe him. Still, he pressed on.

“Can you think of anything else that might help locate Brooke?”

Jesse’s expression was grim.

“I wish I could. I tried texting her on Sunday, but heard nothing back. I thought maybe she was pissed.”

“Why would she be pissed?”

“Because I didn’t spend any time with her. You know how touchy women can be.”

Seth waited for more, but Jesse fell silent. Dropping his gaze, he pushed back onto his heels. His lips tightened into a grimace. “Christ, I hope nothing bad happened to her. I feel responsible, you know, like if I hadn’t invited her here on Saturday night, none of this would have happened.”

He sounded sincere, and checking his story out would be easy. There were plenty of people Seth worked with who could tell him what kind of kid Jesse was.

Seth placed his business card on the bar. Jesse stared at it for a moment before stowing it in his pocket.

“If you see or hear something that might help, call me.”

“I’ll talk to the regulars. Maybe they saw something.”

“Thanks.”

Seth pivoted away from the bar and crossed the room to join Tess at the corner booth. She wasn’t looking at him though. Her gaze was locked on Jesse Morgan.

Reaching out a hand, he picked up her glass and gave it a sniff. It smelled like pool water. The sulfuric scent of soda and lime filled his nose. His curiosity satisfied, he set it back down. She looked amused by the gesture.

“How long have you been sober?” she asked.

Surprised, Seth glanced up, and his eyes locked with hers.

“That’s an odd question.”

“My father’s retired army. He has a lot of friends in the program. After a while you get to know the signs.”

Seth rubbed a hand across his jaw and studied her. Small, pierced, and edgy, Tess was easy to dismiss—just another kid trying desperately to stand out. Her keen instincts were hard to ignore, though, and the total lack of a filter between her brain and her mouth was going to get her into trouble someday.

“It’s not him, you know,” she said, with all the certainty a nineteen-year-old could muster.

Seth suppressed a grin.

“Is that your professional opinion, Ms. Turner?”

“Tess,” she corrected him. “For starters, he’s not smart enough. Second, if he wanted Brooke, he wouldn’t have to work too hard. It’s not like she goes out to bars, so I figured she must like him to come here.”

“Does she have a boyfriend?”

“Not really. I mean, she hooked up with a guy at a party a few weeks back, but it was no big thing. The next day, she told me what a jerk he was.”

“Was he the type of guy who would stalk her?”

“They hooked up. That’s all. It was no big deal.”

No big deal, Seth thought. Sex had always meant more to him than that. But then, he’d married his college sweetheart. What did he know about teenage girls playing the field?

“Can you think of anyone who may have held a grudge against Brooke?”

“Well, there was that asshole at the bar.”

“The guy whose picture is posted on Brooke’s Facebook page?” Seth pulled his phone from his pocket and showed her the photo.

She nodded. “Yeah, that’s him. He was hitting on Brooke and it was creeping her out.”

“Creeping her out how?”

“Most guys will go away when you blow them off, but not him. He got angry. He started asking if she was too good for him, you know?”

“Is that why Brooke took his picture?”

“I snapped the photo, figuring if he was some kind of psycho-pervert, the fact we had his picture would freak him out.”

“Good thinking. Do you recall his name?”

“Who? Douchebag? I don’t know. I was just happy to see the back of him.”

“Did you see him leave the bar?”

Tess shook her head. “Lover boy was right about one thing: it was pretty crazy in here.”

Nobody liked getting snubbed, but was he crazy enough to do something about it—especially considering Brooke had his picture? If he took Brooke and her phone, he might have thought he was safe.

“Did you see Brooke post the photo?”

“No.”

“What happened after that?”

“I went to the bathroom. When I got back, Brooke was gone. I assume she got tired of lover boy ignoring her.”

“Did she drive here?”

Tess shook her head, the barbell stud in her eyebrow catching the light. “She’s got an app on her phone.”

Seth made a mental note to check Brooke’s account to see if she’d taken the service home.

“What did you do after that?” he asked Tess.

Cheeks turning pink, she twisted her small hands together on the table.

“Well, I met up with these other guys and left with them about one.”

“Where did you go?”

“A party at their house on Capitol Hill.”

“And when did you get back to the dorm?”

“Sunday afternoon.”

“Oh,” Seth said.

Tess looked away, and he wondered if she was thinking the same thing he was—he could just as easily be sitting with Brooke asking questions about Tess’s disappearance.

“And that’s the last time you saw Brooke?”

“I tried calling her later, but her phone went right through to voice mail. I knew her sister had some kind of music thing the next day. I didn’t think much about it until her mother called.”

“Did you think it was unusual for Brooke to take off like that?”

“I guess I didn’t think that much about it. Not until she missed class, I mean. She was pretty religious about school.”

Seth’s brow furrowed. No doubt the bar had surveillance cameras, but the quality of the video would depend heavily on how up-to-date the system was. Best-case scenario, he could track Brooke’s movements more closely, see if anyone had tailed her out of the bar. Worst case, they’d be chasing a shadow.

“Thanks for all your help, Ms. Turner, but I’ll take the investigation from here.”

Her lips pursed and she glared at him through narrowed eyes.

“I’m sure,” she snapped. She stirred her drink as a silence stretched out between them. “Have you ever considered plastic surgery for your scars?”

“What?” Seth asked. The bluntness of the question took him off guard.

“Your scars. I know it’s none of my business, but one of the guys from my brother’s unit had some pretty nasty burns from an IED in Afghanistan. The doctor he’s been seeing does really good work. You can still tell he has a burn, but it’s much better than it was.”

Seth blinked. Most people avoided uncomfortable topics, but Tess plowed ahead without the tiniest trace of embarrassment. She was honest. Real. Not something he saw much of in his line of work. Maybe that was why he liked her.

“Your brother is military?”

She nodded. “It’s the family business. He’s currently deployed. Afghanistan.”

Abruptly Tess jumped to her feet and pulled on an oversize army jacket. Her tiny frame swam in it. A patch above the pocket read Turner.

“One more thing, Ms. Turner. Do you know this girl?”

Tess’s face paled as she stared at the image on Seth’s phone. She gave her head a tiny shake.

“But you know who she is, don’t you?”

“I’ve seen the posters on campus enough times to recognize her. That’s Kim Covey.”

“Do you think Brooke knew her?”

She shifted her weight between her feet, looking grave. “You don’t think the same psycho who took Brooke also has her, do you?”

“We’re trying to rule out any connection between the two cases.”

Tess angled her head and looked away. “I don’t think so.”

Seth nodded and stowed the phone back in his jacket. He looked up and eyed Tess thoughtfully.

“What are you studying in school, Ms. Turner?”

“Forensic psychology,” she said, her lips curled in a trace of a smile.

Seth shook his head. A grin spread slowly across his face. “Figures.”

His cell phone rang.

“Crawford,” he answered.

“We’ve got a match on your photo.”

Jasmine-scented steam swirled from the brim of Alicia's teacup. She wrapped her long fingers around the porcelain, leeching as much heat from the glass into her hands as possible, and shivered like a flower petal in the wind.

"How are you feeling?" Drew asked.

She certainly looked like shit. Her face was pale and her eyes glassy. She should be home under a blanket, not huddled over a teacup fighting to stay awake.

"My throat hurts and my head's killing me. Seriously, would it kill them to turn up the heat in here?"

Drew reached across the table and pressed his palm against her forehead. She was burning up.

"It's not cold in here, sweetheart. It's you. Let's get out of here."

He looked around for the waitress but didn't see her. She was probably in the back flirting with the cook or the dishwasher, or checking her Facebook site, or whatever it was that kept her from doing her job. Alicia burrowed deeper into the folds of her sweater.

"You finish eating first."

Drew wasn't about to argue. This was his favorite Thai place in the city. From the outside it looked like a dive, with its pitched roof and rotting shingles. Bar none, it had the best pad thai. He shoveled another heaping portion into his mouth and savored the sweetness of the sugar, the warm, luscious noodles, the crisp, slightly bitter tang of the sprouts, and the crunch of the peanuts. This was sex on a plate.

Alicia's phone chirped. She pulled it out of her pocket and scowled at the screen.

"Who is it?"

"Gretchen."

Drew's lips twitched. Gretchen was the worst kind of friend. With no life of her own, she inserted herself into the lives of others, planting her poisonous little lies like seeds in fertile soil, waiting for them to sprout roots. That's what unhappy people did. Of course, Alicia didn't see it for what it was. They'd been BFFs since third grade, and Gretchen had probably been doing this sort of thing their whole lives.

But Drew knew a thing or two about manipulation. He knew there was nothing benign about Gretchen's meddling. She wasn't an overprotective friend looking out for her circle's best interests. She was a parasite.

"So, what's good old Gretchen up to tonight?"

"She's getting drunk and wants me to come join her."

Alicia held up her phone. Gretchen was a big white blur against the dark sea of humanity behind her. Even with the bad lighting, Drew recognized the U-shaped bar of the Chapel well enough.

He took another bite of pad thai, but the thought of Gretchen left a bad taste in his mouth. He swished a gulp of jasmine tea around in his mouth and swallowed.

"Are you going?"

Alicia thumbed the button on the side of her phone and stowed it back in her pocket.

"Are you kidding? It's Tuesday night. I've got work in the morning and I feel like crap. The only place I'm going is home to bed."

Drew looked up and caught the waitress's eye. He motioned for the check.

"That's a good idea. Some extra sleep and you're going to feel much better in the morning."

By the time he dropped Alicia off, she was coughing, and he figured that after downing a healthy dose of NyQuil, she'd be out for the night. He didn't drive home though.

Opportunity awaited him on a barstool on Capitol Hill.

• • • •

GRETCHEN HUNCHED OVER her phone. The black wraparound dress she wore gaped away from her cleavage and dipped low enough to reveal the edges of a turquoise lace bra. From all the way back here, he could tell she was frowning.

She looked desperate. Begging to be noticed. Slamming the phone down on the bar, she looked dangerously close to tears. Drew pushed away from the wall, knowing there would never be a better time to make his move.

Poor little Gretchen needed an ally.

"So, what's a nice girl like you doing in a place like this?" he asked, perching at the bar beside her.

"Fuck off," she said without glancing up.

Drew smiled. "Ugly talk for such a pretty girl."

"Where's Alicia?" she asked, her words a little slurred. She wasn't drunk yet, he realized, but she was on her way.

"She's sick. I'm afraid you're stuck with me."

Gretchen rolled her bloodshot eyes.

"What do you want, Drew?"

"I'm hurt, Gretch. You don't look happy to see me."

She glowered, but didn't comment. A long-haired bartender deposited a fresh ruby-red drink in front of her.

"Hey, weren't you here on Saturday night?" he asked, squinting at the two of them.

"Yes," she said, a smile blossoming on her face.

Drew smirked. Jesus, she was easy to read. One glance from a good-looking guy pulled her right up out of her funk.

"I was hoping that maybe you'd seen a friend of mine. She's missing."

The smile wilted on Gretchen's lips. She glanced at the snapshot, and Drew's heart jolted as he recognized the girl. Brooke Parker.

"Sorry," Gretchen said. Orange curls bobbed around her face as she shook her head.

Beneath his crisp white shirt, Drew's pulse pounded. He was a dark blur behind Brooke's blonde head. A clearer image would have sent Gretchen racing back to Alicia with another story he'd have to explain away.

"You're sure?" the bartender asked.

"Sorry," Gretchen muttered, handing back the phone.

He turned his gaze on Drew. "What about you?"

Drew had no choice. He took the phone and studied the picture. "You said she's missing?"

"Disappeared Saturday night."

Drew shook his head. "Sorry, man. I wish I could help."

"Did you take any photos that night?"

"Me? No. I'll check with my girlfriend. I'm not sure how much help they would be. We were up there most of the night." Drew pointed to the balcony.

“Thanks,” the bartender said, pocketing the phone. With a grim look, he whisked the empty glass away, leaving the two of them alone again.

“What do we have here?”

Drew lifted the martini glass off the bar. It smelled fruity, sweet—cranberry with a slight hint of orange.

“It’s called an Angel’s Kiss.”

A wicked grin crossed Drew’s face and he took a sip. Cloyingly sweet, it slid down his throat, and he grimaced.

Angel’s Kiss? It tasted more like a Tacoma Whore to him.

“Hey.” Gretchen swatted his chest. “That’s mine, asshole.”

“And you’re welcome to it. It’s too sweet for my taste.”

“I thought you liked sweet things.”

A smile tugged at Drew’s lips. He liked Gretchen bitter. She was so much more interesting than the giggling bimbo he’d met Saturday night.

“What are you doing here anyway? Did Alicia send you on a mission of mercy?”

She didn’t look up. She propped her temple against her fist and half drained the martini glass. Drew kept his gaze focused on her until finally she raised her eyes.

“Alicia went home sick and I thought you could use a ride.”

Gretchen snorted.

“Really? So you came to my rescue all on your own? How fucking noble of you. I thought you were still mad over the coffee shop thing.”

“Look,” he said, leaning in, “I know we haven’t exactly gotten off on the right foot, and I was hoping we could change that.”

“I don’t see how.”

“Let me drive you home.”

She eyed him suspiciously. “You’re serious?”

“As a heart attack, Gretch. You’re in no shape to drive, and taxis take forever. Come on. Let me do something nice for you.”

“I don’t believe you. What do you really want?”

“We both care about Alicia. Wouldn’t it be better for all of us if we tried to get along?”

Gretchen bobbed her head, her eyes fixed on the empty martini glass. She looked sad, defeated, like she didn’t have a friend left in the world. He leaned closer, his voice so soft only she could hear.

“So, what do you say we get out of here?”

“You’re not trying to pick me up, are you?”

Drew’s lips stretched into a crooked smile.

“What do you think?”

“So that’s your girl right there,” the tall, skinny cyber-tech said, pointing at the blurry footage from the surveillance video.

Seth’s hand splayed on the desk as he inched closer to the screen. It was Brooke Parker all right. “It’s grainy as shit.”

“Fred Flintstone technology. I’m surprised it records anything. Looks like the Chapel is in serious need of an upgrade.”

Seth nodded, his eyes locked on the monitor. Brooke Parker sat at the bar along with her friend, Tess Turner. A man approached them. Husky build. Frizzy, reddish-brown hair.

“That’s your guy. Charles Sully.”

“How can you tell?” Seth couldn’t make out any specifics from the video feed.

“We ran facial recognition on him from the photo you sent us and this.”

“The footage is usable?”

The tech angled his head.

“Well, not on its own. We’ve worked some of our magic on it, and even then, we needed the photo from the girl’s Facebook site.”

Seth nodded, watching the interaction between Charles Sully and Brooke. It fit with what Tess had told him. The guy was coming on strong and Brooke was pulling away and then . . .

“Who’s that?”

“The new guy?”

“Yeah.”

Seth leaned in closer to the screen. A tall, dark-haired man was standing behind Brooke. He squared off against Sully and Sully backed down. The dark-haired guy stayed with the girls. A few minutes later, Tess left for the restroom.

Why hadn’t Tess said anything about him? It didn’t make sense.

“I’m going to skip ahead some.” The tech grabbed the remote control, and the action skipped by, too fast to see, until he slowed it down again.

Seth saw Brooke trail the tall guy out of the bar. Charles Sully followed, several feet behind.

“That’s it?” Seth asked. “They left together?”

“No, the guy comes back in, like, thirty seconds later. Here.”

Seth watched the tape long enough to see the dark-haired guy stride back in through the doors. Sully did not.

“Can we figure out who the new guy is?”

“Tried that. We don’t have a good angle on his face. Even if we did, the quality isn’t good enough to run facial recognition on its own. We’d need something else to go on.”

“Thanks, man.” He clapped the tech on the shoulder and headed back to his desk.

At least now he knew the name of the guy posted on Brooke’s Facebook page. It was a start.

CHARLES SULLY WAS THE kind of sick bastard you didn’t want anywhere near your daughter. He was the kind of asshole you wouldn’t even let walk your dog, Seth concluded as he scrolled through Sully’s file. Convicted on a domestic abuse charge a few years back, Sully already had two strikes against him. One more conviction would send him away for a long, long time.

According to the police report, the beating Sully's last girlfriend had suffered was so severe that the judge ordered a psychological evaluation before Sully was released from prison. Seth made a note. He wanted that report. First thing in the morning, he'd call the forensic psychologist to see what other details he could dig up.

The other guy Tess had mentioned—the college guy Brooke hooked up with a few weeks back, was a dead end. He'd been visiting his parents in Kelso the weekend Brooke disappeared.

His phone beeped and he looked at the display. It was a one-word text from his boss, Lieutenant Alvarez.

Update?

Seth groaned. The chief wants an update. He was already an hour and a half late with his daily report. Rolling his eyes, he grabbed the keyboard, composing the e-mail in his head. If he delayed any longer, the text would turn into a call. And a missed call would turn into a summons.

Half an hour later, he sent the report. Tension coiled tight around Seth's spine. He tilted his head slowly from side to side, stretching his neck. It was late. He should go home.

Home.

The word sounded as hollow and empty as the house where he slept. He eased the desk drawer open a few inches and slid his hand inside. His knuckles scraped against wood and he hissed. He couldn't look at her face. Not tonight. Not if he wanted to sleep.

• • • •

SETH PULLED INTO THE driveway of his house. The security light flashed on, scaring off the neighbor's cat. The orange tabby leaped from the railing and landed with a thud on the hood of Seth's car. He raced by the windshield and disappeared through the laurel hedge.

Truth be told, Seth didn't mind the cat. He'd thought about getting one himself. Having another living thing in the house, even if it was a stupid cat, didn't seem so bad.

Seth glanced through the windshield at the house. The windows were black. Silent. Empty.

He put the car in reverse and pulled out of the driveway. Halfway down Fremont Avenue, he saw the bright neon lights of the Dubliner Pub and slowed down. Instinctively he looked for an open parking spot nearby. He could stop in for just one beer. Just one. Then he would go home. Then he would sleep.

The street was jammed with cars, no opening in sight. Disappointment rushed through Seth with relief following close on its heels. For a split second he thought about circling the block or maybe heading across the bridge to the Nickerson Street Saloon. Instead he pressed down on the accelerator and skimmed along the lakeside, heading south.

• • • •

MARISSA ROONEY ANSWERED the door in a white T-shirt and yoga pants. Seth didn't have to ask how she was doing. Her puffy red eyes spoke volumes about her state of mind. Marissa stared at him for a second or two, not speaking. Rain hammered against the door, and she ushered him inside.

"I'm making tea. Do you want some?"

"Sure, that would be great."

There was nothing fancy about the house. It was a whitewashed Cape Cod on a nondescript street. The rooms were small, cozy, and simple—not quite as manically precise as Martha Stewart, but close. He followed her into the kitchen. It was painted a sunny yellow that set off the white cupboards and gave a homey feel to the space.

Marissa set the teapot and cups down in the center of the round IKEA table and settled in the seat across from him. She folded her arms and crossed her legs, one foot jiggling in the air.

“Do you have news?” she asked.

“Not yet. I have a few more questions.”

More than questions, really. He wanted to know what kind of mother Marissa Rooney was. Whether Brooke had had a reason to run away.

“What about Jesse Morgan? Have you found him yet?”

“I spoke to him.”

“And?”

“He’s got an alibi for the night Brooke disappeared.”

Marissa raked her long blonde hair away from her face, looking like she had more to say.

“I understand they were close.”

“They were.”

“You didn’t like him?”

“I didn’t approve of the relationship,” she said, sounding defensive. “He was older than her, the kind of kid without a plan.”

Seth nodded, filling in the blanks. Parents instinctively wanted to protect their kids, and it didn’t take a genius to do the math. Marissa was in her midthirties, which would have made her a teenager when Brooke was born. The last thing she’d wanted was for her daughter to get knocked up by a high school loser. Whatever sins she’d assigned to Brooke’s father, she no doubt foisted them off onto the Morgan kid.

“Did he ever do anything that made you worry for Brooke’s safety?”

“Like hurt her? I wouldn’t have thought so, but now I’m not so sure.”

“Why do you say that?”

Marissa huffed out a breath. She crossed her arms and glared at him.

“It seems strange to me that within a few days of his popping back into Brooke’s life, she disappears. Doesn’t that seem odd to you?”

He’d thought the same thing initially, but Jesse’s buddy had backed his story. So, with nothing more to go on, he’d pushed this lead onto the back burner. Unless the cyber-techs found something on Brooke’s e-mail or social media accounts to contradict what Jesse had said, he had to look elsewhere.

“What about other boyfriends?”

“There were a few in high school.”

“Anyone you can think of who might hold a grudge?”

“Of course not. Everybody loves Brooke.”

He knew it wasn’t true. It couldn’t be. Unless Brooke was an angel or a saint, there was someone out there who didn’t like her. Hell, even the pope got death threats. How many parents claimed their perfect children were incapable of committing the crimes they were accused of? He knew everybody had their own version of the truth—a story you told yourself so often you actually believed it. Even him. Especially him.

Marissa leaned forward, pouring hot tea into both mugs. Seth watched her. She was stressed, no doubt about it, but nothing she’d said or done so far gave him the impression she was lying or hiding information. And for some odd reason, he was glad. He wanted to like her—believe her.

The scent of orange and spice wafted off the hot steam. He thanked her and grasped the cup. Just then the door banged open, and in walked a tall, lanky teenage girl. She had straight blonde hair, jade-green eyes, and a smattering of freckles across her nose. Catching sight of him, she stopped dead in her tracks.

“Kelly, this is Detective Crawford,” Marissa said.

Kelly nodded without saying hello. “What’s he doing here?”

“He’s investigating Brooke’s case. Come sit,” Marissa said.

Kelly dropped her backpack beside the wall. Her motorcycle boots scraped across the floor, and she slumped into the chair beside her mother.

Marissa’s brow furrowed. “What did you do to your face?” she asked Kelly, pushing her daughter’s bangs off her forehead.

A red abrasion was visible at the top of Kelly’s cheek. Kelly jerked away. She shook her head, and her hair settled back into place.

“It’s nothing, Mom.”

“What happened?”

Kelly scowled at her feet. “I cut myself shaving.”

Marissa shot her a look and Kelly dropped her gaze.

“I took a basketball in the face, okay?”

Seth watched her eyes and knew she was lying. The fine pattern of scabs was more like road rash than an impact mark, like the kind he got when he wiped out on the gravel with his bike. Whatever her reasons, her closed-off body language made it loud and clear that she had no intention of opening up.

“Your mother and I were just talking about Jesse Morgan. Do you remember him, Kelly?”

Kelly hitched a shoulder in a grudging shrug. “A little.”

“What was he like?”

“Cool. Brooke liked him. He came over after school sometimes when Mom wasn’t home.”

Seth caught Kelly’s sidelong look at her mother, as if waiting for some reaction. None came, and Seth continued.

“Did you know that Jesse and Brooke were back in touch?”

“So what if they were? I don’t remember him well, but he didn’t seem creepy, like the kind of guy who would do something crazy.”

“How would you know?” Marissa snapped.

Kelly tensed. She glared at her mother through narrowed eyes. “How would you? You were never home.”

“I was working.”

Kelly crossed her arms and lapsed into a stony silence. Seth sipped his tea.

He remembered what it was like to be raised by a single mother, long hours alone, just him and his kid sister. Cooking macaroni and cheese for dinner because his mother was still at work. Most nights they had eaten hunched over their bowls in front of the television, watching Spider-Man.

Things had changed after his mother remarried though. His stepfather was a good man. A cop. At last there had been someone else to help out around the house, someone who showed up at his soccer games and took him camping. Over the years they’d become a family. They were lucky. It didn’t always work out that way. Looked like it hadn’t for Kelly’s family.

Setting the cup back down on the table, Seth pressed on.

“Can you think of anyone who might have wanted to hurt Brooke?”

He studied Kelly’s expression carefully, watching for any flicker of emotion on the girl’s face, anything indicating she was hiding a secret. Sisters sometimes did that for each other, but Kelly shook her head.

“Family? Friends? Boyfriends?” he prompted.

“Family?” Kelly scoffed. “Mom’s been divorced three times. Apparently my father was Robert Plant. Mom screwed him in the back of a tour bus and ended up with me.”

“Kelly,” Marissa gasped, horrified.

The kid was a grade-A smartass. Barely acknowledging her mother’s rebuke, she kept her level gaze fixed on Seth.

“Well, it might as well be true. It’s not like I ever met him. Come to think of it, Rick was a bit of a nutcase. Him and his creepy son.”

“Who’s Rick?” Seth asked, trying to keep up.

“Rick Bowman,” Kelly answered, swinging toward him with two fingers raised in the air. “Lucky husband number two. The only one who hit us.”

Seth tensed as a gruesome image flashed through his mind. A woman’s face beaten to shit—shattered cheekbone, broken teeth, and vacant blue eyes. If the 911 call had come fifteen minutes later, she would have been dead. With the husband strung out on coke, it had taken Seth and his burly partner to subdue him. Days later, released from the hospital, she bailed the bastard out. She went back. Most of them did.

He wondered how bad things had gotten before Marissa had called it quits.

Seth glanced over at her. She stared down at the table, a bleak expression on her pretty face. At least she’d gotten out. Often the danger peaked when the woman left the relationship, but sometimes things happened later to trigger a violent episode. It was worth checking out.

“Rick Bowman?” Seth asked. Marissa nodded. “When was the last time you heard from him?”

“It’s been years, at least five.”

“Do you think he’s the type of guy to hold a grudge against you?”

“You think this is about me?”

“I don’t know. I have to examine a case from all angles.”

Her fingers brushed her lips as she answered in a toneless voice. “Rick and I didn’t have an amicable split, but I can’t imagine he’d come after us. Why would he? Why now?”

Rick Bowman wouldn’t be the first guy to blame his ex-wife for the bad things that happened to him. After five years of silence, it was a stretch, but he’d seen crazier shit. He’d check out all the people close to Brooke to see if something popped. The alternative was far worse. Stranger abductions were rare and difficult to solve. If a stranger had taken Brooke, odds were good she was already dead.

He felt Marissa’s gaze on him, and he was glad she couldn’t read his thoughts. Glancing down, he changed the subject.

“Is Brooke still on your medical plan?”

Marissa nodded. “I called the pharmacy. She picked up insulin three weeks ago. Based on what I found in her dorm room, the pharmacist thinks it’s unlikely Brooke has a vial of insulin with her. She probably has an insulin pen, maybe two.”

“Remind me of the difference.”

“The pen is a fast-acting insulin. She would use the pen to inject herself to counteract the spike in her blood sugar levels after she eats. She would take the other kind of insulin once a day, to lower her blood sugar levels over time.”

“Can she manage with just a pen?”

“For a while. She needs shots every four to six hours to stay in control, but when it runs out . . .” Marissa’s words trailed off. She didn’t need to say more. Seth already heard the ticking clock in his head—with each shot of insulin, time was running out.

Gretchen settled into the deep leather seat beside Drew. He shot through the yellow light and raced down Pike Street toward Belltown. Traffic was uncharacteristically light, and Drew zigzagged through the other cars like they were standing still.

“Christ, Drew. Where’s the fire?”

“Relax.”

“I just want to get home in one piece,” Gretchen said. He saw her clutch the armrest as he dodged a slow-moving Toyota Camry.

“Don’t worry, I haven’t lost anyone yet.”

Gretchen didn’t respond. She stared straight ahead through the windshield. The thick floral scent of her perfume nauseated him, and he cracked the window an inch or two, just enough to let in the fresh air. He glanced her way.

“What’s got you down tonight, Gretch? Man trouble?”

Her lips twitched and he could tell he’d struck a nerve.

“So, who’s the guy?”

“No one you know,” she snapped.

She sounded so defensive he knew she was lying. He also knew there weren’t many guys in Alicia’s small group of friends. Confident he knew the answer, he kept prodding.

“Was he supposed to meet you at the bar tonight?”

“Something like that.”

“And he stood you up?”

Her sullen silence was confirmation enough. Drew turned onto Fourth Avenue. He spotted her building up ahead on the right. Gretchen heaved a sigh and sank lower into the leather seat.

“It’s his loss, you know,” Drew said, sounding part big brother, part concerned friend.

Gretchen’s shoulders sagged. “Why do men have to be such shits?”

“Hey, we’re not all bad.”

“All you want is a nice rack and a size-two ass warming your beds.”

“Who said you didn’t have a great rack?”

Gretchen snorted as Drew slid the car smoothly into a parking spot. She stared out the window with a forlorn expression on her cheeks, like it was the last place in the world she wanted to be. In the dim light, he could see tears streaking down her face. She brushed them away.

“Seriously, are you okay?”

Gretchen swallowed. Her breath came in short, stuttering hitches. “Do you want to come up for a nightcap?”

“Sure. Why not?”

Pocketing the car keys, he trailed her down the hallway and waited while she unlocked the apartment door.

“My place is a bit of a mess,” she said, looking embarrassed. “Work’s been busy and I wasn’t expecting guests . . .”

Drew stepped inside. A mess? It looked like a bomb had gone off in there. There were clothes, magazines, and dirty dishes scattered everywhere. The sight of blue mold spores growing in the bottom of a bowl on the kitchen counter turned his stomach. Avoiding contact with the germ-ridden surface, he folded his arms and leaned up against the wall.

Gretchen slid a stack of dishes into the sink to clear a space on the counter.

“I was planning to clean up tonight, before I went out, but . . .”

“Don’t sweat it. You should see my place,” he lied.

“Really? Alicia told me you were a bit of a neatnik.”

“I clean up when I know she’s on her way over.”

“She’s always telling me I should hire a cleaning lady.”

Drew heard an edge in her voice, and he shrugged. “Easy for her to say. She’s the one with a trust fund.”

A smile played at the corners of Gretchen’s plump lips. “I know, right? We’re not all loaded like her old man.” She opened a cupboard crammed with booze. “Her father pays her rent while I’m drowning in student loans. Drink?”

“Sure.”

“Pick your poison.” She swept a hand toward her collection of liquor bottles.

“Surprise me.”

She plucked a bottle of Wild Turkey off the shelf and went in search of clean glasses. She yanked open the dishwasher and pulled two off the rack, then rinsed them under the spray from the tap. She dried them with a grimy dishtowel. He eyed the greasy sheen of slime smeared around the rim and made a face, half smile, half grimace, silently praying the Wild Turkey would kill off any fatal germs.

Ice cubes tinkled in the glass, and she poured a generous splash of bourbon into each. Holding his by the rim, she handed him the glass. Hers slipped from her slack fingers and shattered on the floor.

“Dammit,” she said.

“Don’t sweat it.” Drew shrugged and handed her his glass. Stepping around the mess, he grabbed the bottle and headed toward the living room. The couch was littered with clothes. She scraped them into a heap and pitched them onto a nearby chair.

Drew sat on the edge of the spongy red sofa. He smelled dirty laundry and rotting food. The stench reminded him of his father’s place. Rick had been a slob at the best of times, but when he was off his meds and on a bender, it had been like living in a crack house.

Drew took a sip from the bottle and eased back against the couch.

“Nice place you have here.”

“Thanks. It’s close to work.”

Looking as nervous as a teenager on her first date, Gretchen fidgeted with her hair.

“Relax,” he said. “It’s only a drink.”

Gretchen stared at him, the corners of her lips sagging down, like she already regretted inviting him up here. Taking a hit of bourbon, he glanced at her, wondering how he could get her to open up. What would he say to Alicia if she were the one sitting across from him and he was trying to make a good impression? He dropped his voice, speaking softly to her, like a friend confiding a secret.

“Look, Gretchen, I’m on your side, I really am, and I’m sorry we got off on the wrong foot. I’d like to start over, if you’re willing.”

“You mean that?”

Drew looked deep into her eyes and smiled. He reached out slowly and brushed a curl away from her freckled cheek.

“I know I come across as an ass sometimes, and I’m sorry. Guys are idiots. We know it. But if you give me another chance, you might find out that I’m really not half bad.”

She flashed a timid smile. It wasn’t much, but Drew knew it was a good start.

She sipped her drink and wiggled out of her perch. "I need to freshen up. Maybe you could find something to listen to." She gestured toward the stereo buried underneath a stack of DVDs.

He shuffled through an avalanche of fashion magazines and found the remote pinned between the current issues of Vogue and Glamour. Drew turned the stereo on. Z100 was blasting some insipid Kelly Clarkson song. He flipped stations until he found Deep Tracks. It was playing a trance remix of ZZ Top's "Asleep in the Desert" to set the mood. Mellow and psychedelic, it was the type of song you dropped acid to back in the 1970s or made out with a girl to in the back of your father's pickup truck. Perfect.

Satisfied, he dropped the remote on the littered coffee table. It rattled against Gretchen's phone.

Drew couldn't resist the temptation. Tossing a quick glance over his shoulder, he thumbed the power button. No passcode was set, so he clicked on the instant messaging client. His eyebrows arched as he read Gretchen's last text.

I guess this means you're not coming.

There was no response.

Quickly Drew scanned the message stream and grinned.

He'd known Gretchen had a crush on Liam. Anybody with half a brain could have picked up on it. But Drew had had no idea Liam had taken full advantage of the situation. Gretchen was Liam's fuck-buddy. Alicia probably didn't realize exactly what was going on between them. She wouldn't approve. Unlike Gretchen, Alicia would realize Liam was just using her friend, while poor little fucked-up Gretchen harbored fantasies of having an actual relationship with the bastard.

A toilet flushed near the back of the apartment, and Drew placed the phone on the table where he'd found it. It clattered against an empty plastic vial. He spun the bottle so he could read the label.

Prozac. He shook his head.

Gretchen settled back into place, and Drew stretched an arm out along the back of the couch. He touched her hair.

"So, tell me about this mystery guy of yours."

Gretchen sighed. She rattled the ice cubes around in her glass and took a gulp of liquid courage before she spoke.

"Not much to tell. He blows hot and cold. One minute he can't wait to see me, then he avoids me. I don't know what he wants. If he doesn't like me, why does he pretend?"

Drew propped his chin on his fist and met her gaze head on.

"Liam's a little shit, Gretchen. You know that, right?"

She gaped at Drew in wide-eyed alarm. "I didn't say anything about Liam."

"You didn't have to. I saw the way you looked at him the other night."

"You mean how he looked at Alicia?"

"That too."

Drew placed his hand on her shoulder and gave it a gentle squeeze. Gretchen didn't pull away.

"Why waste your time on someone like him?"

Her eyes misted over and she stared down at the drink in her hand. "When it's just the two of us, he makes me feel special."

I'll bet he does.

Drew paused, letting the emotional charge of her words dissipate before he spoke again.

"If he hurts you, Gretchen, he's not your friend."

"How do you know?"

Drew flashed a sympathetic grin. "Because I'm a guy."

Gretchen turned her head. Her eyes brimmed with fresh tears. They leaked over her eyelashes and flowed down her cheeks. She brushed them away with the back of her hand. Mascara pooled beneath her eyes. She looked like a crying panda.

“Why are you being so nice to me?” she sniffed.

“Because you deserve the truth.”

“The truth? Ha. That’s funny. Liam thinks you’re lying to Alicia. He’s hired somebody to check you out.”

Drew’s heart skipped a beat. He shouldn’t be surprised. Clearly Liam had no idea what a dangerous game he was playing.

Sensing the shift in his mood, Gretchen asked, “Are you okay?”

Drew cracked a wicked smile.

“You know what they say about a fool and his money? Well, if Liam wants to waste his time and money on a private investigator, let him. I’ve got nothing to hide. I’m just saying that a girl like you deserves better friends. Better than Liam, anyway.”

Gretchen took a sip of bourbon, and Drew thought about the Prozac. Mixing alcohol with antidepressants was a bad idea. Or maybe it was a good idea. The combination had sent his father into a deep pit of depression that only electroshock therapy could touch.

“I’m sorry I was such a bitch at the bar,” she said.

Dreamy guitars played in the background, and Drew curled a fat red lock around his finger. Gretchen froze like a spooked raccoon. Vulnerability and desperation flickered across her face. Her bottom lip trembled.

“Who am I kidding? I’m not the kind of girl anyone looks at twice, not around Alicia. She’s so smart, so beautiful. No one looks past her to me.”

A fresh stream of tears flowed down her face. Drew swiped them away with the pad of his thumb. She shivered.

“Why are you being so nice to me?” she asked again.

“Because you’re a good person. Smart. Funny. And pretty.”

She swiped her nose with the back of her hand, her eyes wide. “You think I’m pretty?”

“Look at you.” He ran his finger down her round cheek. “Gorgeous red curls. Cornflower-blue eyes. Perfect skin. What makes you think you’re not pretty?”

Steeling himself, Drew leaned forward and pressed his lips against hers. She tasted like salt water and Wild Turkey. Gretchen moaned. Her eyes fluttered closed. She slid against him and Drew deepened the kiss.

Music filled the silence between them. The song ended and Gretchen opened her eyes.

“What about Alicia?”

Drew brushed a stray curl off her wide forehead.

“Alicia’s not here. How about another drink?”

Rain pattered through the tree branches and pelted the forest floor. Brooke shrank back against the wall and stared out into the gloom. Her breath billowed around her in a misty cloud of dew. Fuck, it was cold out here. The damp mist cut through the layers of clothes and blankets swaddled around her shivering frame to her very bones.

The front half of the cabin had caved beneath the weight of the fallen tree. A towering Douglas fir had crashed through the roof, sending glass and debris flying in all directions. Shattered glass from the window high on the wall had gashed her arm. She'd dressed the wound as best she could with a dirty pillowcase to stop the bleeding. The thin mattress she crouched behind shielded her from the worst of the rain.

Somewhere in the dark, beyond the line of trees, a yellow light wavered. She blinked, narrowing her eyes, trying to bring whatever it was into focus. Was it real or was she just seeing things? Judging by the way she felt—burning muscles, aching joints—her blood sugars were soaring up into the stratosphere. She hurt.

It was no use. She couldn't see anything clearly.

God, she needed a shot. When her sugars were high like this, her blurry eyes were like lenses coated in gel. She clenched her chattering teeth together and kept her eyes on the light. It wasn't real. It couldn't be. Still, she couldn't look away. A tiny sliver of her heart hoped that maybe someone really was out there, someone who could help her—that she wasn't already dead.

Her mouth, as dry as sawdust, yawned wide to catch the soft rain falling through the trees. The thin moisture coated her mouth. She swallowed. What she wouldn't give for a bottle of water. Hell, right now she'd take whatever she could get her hands on and guzzle it down in seconds. Of course, in five minutes she'd have to pee again. It was a vicious cycle.

The spark of hope in Brooke's heart flickered and died under the weight of the certain knowledge that her body was dehydrating and that she was going to die here alone at the bottom of the valley.

She had, what, maybe an hour before she lost consciousness altogether, and then maybe a few hours more? That was it.

She wanted to cry, but she had no tears left. Tree branches whispered in the wind, and she thought about her mother. And Kelly. And the life she had left behind. School. About Tess, and how close to perfect everything had been until this . . .

Brooke closed her eyes. Part of her wanted to give up. Dying would be easy. But then she thought of her mother and sister, and pictured his face in her mind. Anger displaced the desperation she felt. This was his doing. His sick plan. She couldn't let him win. Not while she could still move. Her eyes snapped open.

Where was her insulin pen? She swung her head from side to side. It was so dark. She couldn't see much of anything. And then there was the debris. Somewhere under the layer of glass and wood and branches was her insulin pen. She had to find it.

If she didn't, she was dead.

She shifted, rolling painfully onto her knees. The mattress shielding her body from the rain fell away. Inch by inch she crawled as far as the chain allowed. Her fingers scrabbled across the debris field, digging. Searching.

Wet strands of matted hair fell across her face, and she shook it out of her eyes. A quick stab of pain shot through her finger and she reared back. Glass. Dammit. Rubbing the cut against her leg, she pitched forward again.

She heard a noise from out in the trees beyond the clearing. Her heart jolted. It wasn't the wind or the rain; it was something louder. Like footsteps. Something was moving out there.

An animal? A wolf? Oh God.

She sank back onto her heels and looked up. The yellow light was closer now. It darted through the trees, moving toward her. A flashlight?

Hope swelled in her chest.

Was it the police? A hunter? A search party? Had someone heard the tree crashing and come looking?

Please. Please, God, let it be help. Let it be anyone but him.

The yellow light swayed like a lantern in the gloom. She blinked. Her eyes refused to focus. Another sure sign her sugars were high and she was in trouble.

"Help," she cried, her voice dry and raspy. "Over here. I'm over here."

She could see something. A shadow. A man. Moving closer. She thrust her heavy arms above her head and waved them frantically, praying the motion would catch his eye.

She called out again. Louder. Blood rushed in her ears as his every step brought him closer. She squinted as hard as she could, willing her eyes to focus, wishing she could just see his face.

The light stabbed her eyes and she averted her gaze.

She waved her hands. Her heart pounded. It had to be the police.

Please, God, if I ever asked you for anything . . .

Footsteps scraped against the wooden floor. She wasn't easy to get to. She heard the crash of wood and debris as he cleared a path.

Her arms dropped to her sides and she wrapped them around her shivering body. She wanted to go home. She wanted to see her mother and sister again. She wanted to be safe. She wanted . . .

"I'm back here," she called, her voice cracking on the words.

Finally he stood above her. Desperate, she reached and grabbed a fistful of wet jeans. She looked up. Even this close, she still couldn't see a goddamned thing. He was a shadow, a blur, a black shape in front of her eyes.

He hunkered down. His hands gripped her shoulders. She stared into his shadowed face.

"What am I going to do with you now?" he asked.

Brooke shrank back, twisting free from his grasp. A high, keening wail wrenched from her chest. Her face dropped into her hands and she sobbed.

Marissa stepped into the Smith Tower's elevator car. Her head pounded. She'd barely slept, and what little sleep she'd managed had been plagued with nightmares about Brooke. She'd woken in the gray light of dawn, her pillow wet with tears.

All she wanted to do was hide under the covers and disappear into a cocoon of grief. But she couldn't do that. Brooke needed her. Kelly needed her. So, like a zombie, she dragged herself out of bed and faked her way through the morning routine.

Making herself small, she slid to the back of the elevator, not wanting to see anyone she knew. Trading pleasantries was beyond her capabilities this morning. She stared down at her shoes. Her arm collided with another passenger's, but she didn't look up.

"Sorry," she muttered.

"Ms. Rooney, I was under the impression you no longer worked at the firm."

Benoit's sharp face was inches from hers. Like a Doberman pinscher's, her thin lips were pulled back in a sneer to expose a small row of mean teeth. Marissa groaned.

"Ms. Holt offered me a job."

"A job? Doing what?"

Marissa heaved a sigh. "Maybe you should ask her."

There was no time for a retort as the elevator reached the sixth floor. Shooting Marissa a nasty glare, Benoit elbowed her way through the crowd and exited the elevator.

With Benoit gone, Marissa's thoughts turned to the day ahead, and her stomach sank. She had no idea what Elizabeth Holt expected from her. She'd said yes to Holt's job offer out of desperation. She needed to support her family and find Brooke, but now, in the harsh light of day, she feared the two goals of helping Holt launch her foundation and finding her daughter couldn't be more different. And she had no skills or experience to qualify her for either.

The elevator stopped and the doors parted. Marissa stepped out onto the floor. Everywhere she looked she saw people. The high ceilings amplified the noise into an overwhelming crescendo of voices. Desperate, Marissa scanned the room, looking for the one person she recognized in the crowd.

Elizabeth Holt stood tall and straight in the center of the room, a pillar of sanity amid the churning sea of chaos. Fully in command, Holt barked orders and channeled traffic, making it all look easy. Behind her, Marissa spied a three-foot image tacked to the wall. Brooke's face stared out from the missing-persons poster. Marissa's shoulders sagged. Fear clenched tight around her heart.

Holt looked up. Her cobalt eyes caught Marissa's gaze, and she brusquely waved her over.

"Good. You're here," Holt said. "There are some people you should meet."

Holt's icy hand gripped Marissa's elbow lightly as she steered her through the crowd toward a slight, dark-haired woman at the center of the group. The woman handed a stack of flyers to a man standing beside her. She turned toward Holt.

"Marissa, this is Alice Chang. She's heading up the volunteer squad."

"Volunteers?"

Though Chang's hand was small, her grip was firm and sure. She nodded, angling her head close to Marissa's so she could be heard over the crowd.

"We're sending people out to post the flyers around the city, with the heaviest concentration around the university district, Wallingford, Sand Point, and Capitol Hill."

Marissa blinked, imagining seeing her daughter's face plastered on telephone poles and store windows across the city. A wave of heat shivered through her, and she felt like she might throw up.

"Are you all right?" Chang asked.

Marissa swallowed and forced a nod. "Yeah. I mean, yes."

"Good. We have a group of volunteers manning a tip line. The number is on the flyers. Any tips that come in will be logged and passed along to the police," Chang explained. "Then there are the searches."

"Searches?"

"Local parks, greenbelts around the university and Capitol Hill. Places where Brooke might have gone," Chang explained.

Panic spiraled at the pit of her stomach. Images flashed into her head—Brooke bleeding by the side of the road; Brooke trapped, unable to call for help; Brooke left for dead somewhere on the forest floor. She could be anywhere. How were they ever going to find her?

Her gaze shifted to the groups of volunteers getting their marching orders for the day—a sea of ordinary faces, good people who were here to help. A hoarse thank-you was all she could manage before Holt directed her away.

"The police will be here at ten o'clock sharp for the press conference." Holt glanced at Marissa sternly. "Ten o'clock. You hear me?"

"Yes."

"Good. The media will spread the word about Brooke's disappearance. The chief will kick off the press conference, but you'll need to say a few words."

Marissa's knees turned to water. Naïvely she'd hoped Holt would handle the whole thing. Stupid. She had been so focused on herself, on her own pain, that she was totally unprepared.

What was she going to say? How in God's name was she going to get through this?

She trailed behind Holt to her office. The doors closed behind them, dropping the noise to a dull roar in the background. The familiar smell of lemon furniture polish and stale cigarette smoke filled the air.

A man sat behind Holt's desk. Thin, middle-aged, he had close-cropped red hair and freckled skin. Short, strawberry-blond stubble covered his cheeks. He looked up from the monitor and stood as they approached.

"Marissa, meet Henry Cahill. He's an Internet security specialist. I've asked him to look into Brooke's case to see what we can find out about her social networking site."

Cahill nodded and shook Marissa's hand. His hands were callused, not the type of hands she'd expected from someone who spent his days behind a computer.

Marissa sagged into the comfortable green armchair across from the desk and scratched at the patch on her arm. If Holt offered her a cigarette now, she'd cave in a second. Holt didn't offer, so Marissa folded her hands in her lap and focused her attention on Henry Cahill.

"I'm analyzing the photos uploaded to Brooke's page."

"Have you found anything unusual?" Holt asked.

"Yes and no," Cahill said. "It's what I haven't found that's interesting."

"What do you mean?" Marissa asked.

She hated people who talked in riddles. It was as if they delighted in being the smartest people in the room. She waited for Cahill's condescending smile, but it never came. Instead he met Marissa's gaze directly.

“The photos from the night she disappeared were almost certainly taken and uploaded with Brooke’s cell phone camera. You see, most of the photos show the time and place where the images were uploaded. These are default settings for the social networking site your daughter uses, but this last one is different.”

“The one of the guy?” Marissa pictured his angry face.

Cahill nodded.

“What’s different about them?” Holt asked.

“Well, this last one doesn’t have a location or time stamp telling us where and when the photo was posted.”

Marissa stared at Cahill, trying to put the pieces together. “Why?”

Grinning like a teenager, Cahill bobbed his head. “Exactly. It’s like someone turned the default settings off.”

“Why would she do that?”

“Why indeed,” Cahill said, turning from Marissa to Holt and back again. “Your daughter has uploaded hundreds of photos to her Facebook site, all with the default setting, except this one.”

“Could she have done it by accident?” Holt asked.

“Those settings are buried deep in the user’s preferences. They’re not easy to shut off. You wouldn’t accidentally do it.”

“Why wouldn’t Brooke want people to know where the photo was taken?”

“Her post says she’s gone on an adventure. She might turn off her settings to hide where she is.”

“I’m not buying it,” Marissa snapped. “I know my daughter. She wouldn’t just take off. She—”

Cahill raised his hands in surrender. “There is another possibility.”

“Such as . . . ,” Holt prompted.

“What if Brooke didn’t post the image?”

“But who else could it be?”

“Someone else who has her phone or has hacked her account,” Cahill offered. “I’ll need to do some more digging.”

“But why would this man, Charles Sully, post a picture of himself on Brooke’s page? Why incriminate yourself?” Holt asked under her breath, her brow furrowed in thought.

Cahill shrugged. “Maybe Sully didn’t post it either.”

Marissa absorbed this in silence.

The door opened, and Evan Holt stepped into the office carrying a tray. He poured a steaming cup of tea into a bone china glass and handed it to Holt. The subtle smell of citrus wafted off the steaming cup.

Holt scowled at the intrusion and waved him away.

“Lizzie,” Evan said reproachfully.

Her scowl deepened and she grudgingly took the cup from his hands. Marissa saw him pass off a small white pill. Holt popped it into her mouth and sipped the tea. She reached for Evan’s hand and gave it a light squeeze. A smile tugged at the corner of his lips, and Holt set the cup down. It clattered in the saucer. She turned back toward Cahill.

“Okay, so we know there’s something unusual about Charles Sully’s image. What’s next?”

“I’ve put a trace on Brooke’s phone. I’ve pinpointed all the locations she used the phone before it went dead.” Marissa flinched at the word, and Cahill cleared his throat. His cheeks flushed, and his gaze flicked back to the screen. “I mean before the battery was pulled. I’ve set up a script that will ping her phone. If it powers back up, we’ll be able to pinpoint the location.”

“Do you think that’s likely?” Marissa asked.

The look that passed between Holt and Cahill chilled her to the bone.

“We’re going to locate your daughter, Ms. Rooney.”

At least he sounded confident, and she wanted to believe him, but faith wasn’t her strong suit. She had to hope though. Without hope, there was no way she would make it through all of the minutes, hours, or days until they found Brooke and brought her home again. Hope was all she had.

“Thank you, Mr. Cahill.”

“Henry, please.”

“Henry,” Holt said. “Can you give us a few minutes alone?”

Henry rose from his chair and followed Evan out the door.

Elizabeth’s long, bony fingers stroked the amulet attached to the gold chain around her neck. She fixed Marissa with an appraising look.

“How are you holding up?”

Marissa was at a loss. How could she explain to a woman like Holt how totally overwhelmed she was by the situation? There was an army of volunteers out looking for her missing daughter. There were no solid leads. It was as if Brooke had vanished into thin air. And she was starting a brand-new job with no idea what to do or what was expected of her.

Holt was still staring at her, expecting some kind of answer. She swallowed.

“I’m okay,” she lied.

She was a lot of things—okay was definitely not among them. Holt wasn’t fooled. The old woman cocked her head and smiled kindly at her.

“I have to admit, Ms. Rooney, I’d have made a lousy doctor. I don’t have much of a bedside manner, and providing comfort has never been my strong suit. I can only offer you this piece of advice. You have to focus on your goal. Finding Brooke is the only thing that matters—not your pain or your fear. Not what the cops or the media say about the case. Sweep aside everything that distracts you from achieving your goal. It’s not helping you.”

“What happens if we don’t find Brooke?”

The words slipped out before she could catch them, and like wildfire, once voiced, the fear consumed her.

Holt arched an eyebrow. She tented her fingers thoughtfully beneath her sagging chin and regarded Marissa with the cool look of a lawyer assessing a client. “Ask yourself this, Ms. Rooney, do those thoughts make your situation easier to bear? Do they help you focus?”

Marissa stared at Holt in silent agony. She knew Holt was right, but how could she turn them off? She thought about Holt’s story about being attacked as a college student. Had Holt ignored her pain? Her hate? Maybe she was the type of woman who could compartmentalize her feelings, but Marissa . . .

Holt consulted her watch.

“We have an hour before the press conference. Let’s get to work.”

• • • •

“IT’S TIME TO HEAD TO the conference room, Ms. Rooney.”

Marissa swallowed, her mouth bone-dry. She rose on shaky legs and followed Evan Holt out of the office.

“Is there anything you need?” he asked. “A bottle of water?”

“Yes, please.”

Her hands trembled as she followed him down the hall. She balled them into fists at her sides and looked around. The conference room was jam-packed with reporters. Every news station in Seattle was in attendance. Marissa's head swam. Panic fluttered in her chest, and her mind went blank. Marissa searched for a familiar face and found Elizabeth Holt at the front of the room, standing with Chief Abrams. The two conferred quietly, expressions grave. Evan handed Marissa a bottle of water and joined his aunt at the front of the room.

Marissa twisted the cap, but the thing refused to budge. She sighed.

"Here," Detective Crawford said, taking the bottle from her grasp. He removed the cap and handed it back. Marissa shot him a look and he grinned. "You loosened it."

"Thanks."

She took a sip. Water dribbled down the front of her blouse. Crawford pretended not to notice. She wiped her lips and cleared her throat.

"You okay?" he asked.

"Panicking a little."

Crawford held her gaze, the look in his eyes gentle.

"It doesn't matter what you say, just speak from the heart. Everybody in this room is here to support you, Marissa. Tell them about Brooke. Make her real. If seeing all these people freaks you out, just pretend you're talking to me. Forget everything else, everyone else." He gripped her shoulder, giving it a gentle squeeze. His fingers were warm. Strong. "You can do this."

Marissa smiled weakly and took another sip of water. She glanced back toward the podium.

"Do you know who those people are?" she asked, inclining her head toward the middle-aged couple standing behind Ms. Holt.

Crawford nodded. "They're Kim Covey's parents."

"The Coveys? I didn't realize they were coming."

"Ms. Holt didn't tell you?"

Before he could say more, Holt motioned for Marissa to join her. She looked around for someplace to put her water. A table. Something. Crawford took the bottle from her grasp.

"You'll do great."

Wiping her hands on her skirt, she took her place beside Elizabeth Holt.

Chief Abrams took center stage. The brass buttons of his dress uniform glinted in the bright lights.

"Ladies and gentlemen, thank you all for coming today. Two young women in our community are missing."

The screen flashed, showing two images side by side. Marissa's heart jolted as she was struck again by the strong resemblance between her daughter and the other missing girl.

"Kim Covey disappeared four weeks ago. Brooke Parker has been missing for five days. We believe these disappearances are the work of a serial kidnapper. This is a very dangerous man. We need your help before any more girls go missing."

Brooke's eyelids eased open. They felt as dry and scratchy as sandpaper. Grainy light filled the cabin. Staring up, she could see the unbroken line of cedar beams overhead and the steep angle of the pitched ceiling. It was unnaturally quiet. The rain had stopped and the wind was still. She was cold, but it was bearable, nowhere near the bone-chilling dampness she'd felt huddled behind the mattress.

Where the hell was she?

Brooke jerked fully awake.

This was a different cabin. He must have moved her here last night. This one was smaller, with a long, rectangular window on the far wall, about seven feet up. If she could get to it, maybe she could find a way out.

She swung her gaze wide, searching for something, anything she could climb on.

A pair of pale-blue eyes collided with hers. Brooke gasped, jolting into an upright position. She scrambled back on the hard pallet of the bed, her back flattened against the wall and gaped at the woman across from her.

The cold eyes looked ancient and alien in the bruised and blood-streaked face. The woman was young, maybe twenty or so, but her puffy eyes and swollen cheeks aged her. She was gagged. Dried blood crusted on the dirty cloth. The smell of stale sweat and urine filled the cabin.

It took a moment for the shock to wear off. Once it had, she eased toward the woman. Brooke grasped the woman's shoulders and gently turned her around.

The gag was tightly knotted. Gritting her teeth, Brooke struggled to loosen it, but it was no use. Days of soaring blood sugars rendered her fingertips numb. She didn't have the strength or the dexterity to pry the knot loose.

Her eyes swam with frustrated tears, and she blinked them away. She couldn't give up. She was this girl's only hope. Brooke struggled with the knot a few minutes more, but nothing she tried made any difference. So Brooke did the only thing she could. She pulled the knot tighter. The fabric stretched, maybe half an inch. Maybe more.

It wasn't much, but it was enough to work the gag out of the woman's mouth. She couldn't do anything about the zip tie binding the woman's wrists. Brooke sat back on her heels. Sweat beaded her forehead. The cloth hung like a limp, bloody noose around the woman's thin neck.

Revulsion mingled with the bile at the back of Brooke's throat, and she stared into the woman's battered face. She dropped her gaze, afraid she was looking into some kind of sick carnival glass. Was this her future? Would she end up looking like the woman on the floor, if she survived long enough?

"He shot something into your leg." The woman spoke in a voice that sounded hoarse and gritty from lack of use.

"Who are you?" Brooke asked in a trembling voice.

"Kim Covey."

Kim shook the long, matted mane of hair off her forehead giving Brooke an unobstructed view of her face. The purple bruises on her cheeks were fading to a muddy brown. The thin white shirt hanging off her shoulders was soiled and torn. The woman's stench overpowered the musty smell of the forest floor.

"How long have you been here?"

Kim shook her head. A hopeless look crossed the gaunt face and sent Brooke's heart racing. "I've lost count."

"I'm Brooke Parker."

Kim nodded, but there was no curiosity in her vacant stare. No fear either. What had he done to this woman? What was he going to do with her? Fear snaked its way through Brooke's mind, making clear thought impossible. She swallowed, trying to contain it, trying to focus on Kim Covey—the one human face she'd seen besides his in days.

"How did you get here?"

"He brought me."

All kinds of gruesome possibilities sprang to Brooke's fertile mind. Had he drugged Kim? Had he carried her bound and gagged down into the valley? Or worse. Had Kim been lured?

Looking into Kim's dead eyes, she thought she knew the answer.

"You came willingly?" Brooke asked.

"Didn't you?"

The bitterness in Kim's voice corroded Brooke's composure. Brooke shook her head. Tears filled her eyes, and hate welled up inside her. Hate for the monster who had brought them both here and tied them up like animals. Like some evil kind of god, he held the power of life and death in his hands. They were wholly dependent upon him for everything. Food. Water. Shelter. Everything. If he never came back, they would die here at the bottom of the valley, where no one would ever find them.

"What has he done to you?"

"What do you think?"

"He beat you," she said. Brooke reached out to touch the deep bruises around Kim's eyes, the cut on her lips. Kim jerked her chin away and Brooke dropped her hand. He hadn't just beaten this woman—he'd tortured her. "Did he..."

She couldn't force herself to say the word.

"Did he rape me?" Kim asked. The pain in her glacial stare was unbearable. Brooke dropped her gaze. She covered her eyes with her hands, not wanting to see, not wanting to think about what was going to happen to her—what fate awaited them both.

"Why is he doing this?"

"Because he likes to," Kim said.

The simple, awful truth of it hit her with all the force of a ten-ton weight. The tears she'd been holding back leaked from Brooke's eyes and slid down her cheeks. She pressed the pads of her fingers against her closed eyelids, trying to stop the flow. Crying was pointless. How many tears had Kim cried, and yet here she was, a broken version of herself.

"He shot something into your leg," Kim said again. "Some kind of needle. I saw him do it."

Brooke dropped her hands away from her face. The shock of seeing someone else had driven the words from her mind. She brushed the tears away and tried to focus. Yes. She felt different now. Her muscles no longer screamed at her. And though she was thirsty, her mouth had lost the cotton-dry feel of soaring blood sugars.

"Insulin," she said, running her hands down her skinny legs. The jeans that had fit like a second skin days ago sagged. She was losing weight. It wasn't a good sign.

"Insulin. You're diabetic?"

Brooke nodded, and Kim's expression darkened.

"He'll like that," she said.

A stab of dread sliced through Brooke, and she forced herself to look at Kim's battered face. "We need to get out of here."

Kim's thousand-yard stare stretched out beyond Brooke. Her nod was slow. Her smile was grotesque. Terrifying. Blood crusted her swollen lips, and for the first time, Brooke saw the jagged peaks of Kim's broken teeth.

"Oh, we will."

How many of the righteous sat in this very pew day after day, praying for miracles, praying for jobs, health, wealth? A myriad of secret hopes and dreams offered up to a faceless God. Pathetic souls, looking for forgiveness or deliverance, looking for something spiritual that would lift them up out of the mire and into the rapture, to a holy place. Heaven. Whatever.

But that wasn't why Drew Matthews was here. There was nothing he needed that he couldn't already get himself. He longed for neither salvation nor deliverance.

Once, a very long time ago, he'd believed the Sunday school stories about the power of prayer and a benevolent God. Night after night he prayed. But nobody came to his rescue, and left alone with an abusive drunk for a father, he learned all fairy tales lied. There were no happy endings.

And forgiveness? He was beyond asking for that. What would his poor God-fearing mother say about him now, had she lived long enough to see what he'd become? She'd joined her Savior in the heavens above when he was no more than a boy.

So what brought him here to this same pew week after week to stare at the same rosewood altar with the ornate carving of the crucifix hanging above?

The truth was, he liked the dark, the close smell of incense, the candles burning for the righteous, the murmured prayers of the faithful.

He liked the sense of solitude, looking up at the vaulted ceilings, knowing that there was no one staring down in judgment. No vengeful hand of God, poised to reach out of the sky and smite his black soul.

There was no rescue.

Most of all, he came here because he liked the ritual. That's what Catholics were good at, right? Say the same prayer over and over and expect different results. Yeah. Wasn't that the very definition of madness?

Slowly, almost reverently, Drew withdrew his mother's rosary from his pocket, the same rosary she had spent countless hours hunched over in her hospital bed, praying for deliverance. And, well, she'd gotten it now, hadn't she? Death had relieved her of sickness and pain. Death had removed her to a better place, and left him here. Alone, and very much alive.

He worked the beads methodically through his fingers. Ritual. It had become his friend too, something he could hold on to. Something he could take comfort in. Something that gave him release.

The long string of beads passed from finger to thumb, and still he remained silent. Drew knew the rosary prayers by heart, but he did not pray. Instead, words from his favorite Tennyson poem ran through his head like a song.

Yet all things must die.

The stream will cease to flow;

The wind will cease to blow;

The clouds will cease to fleet;

The heart will cease to beat;

For all things must die.

All things must die.

DREW'S GAZE REMAINED fixed on the crucifix until his fingers reached the cross. Only then did he smile.

The soft sound of Alicia's sniffing broke the spell, and he looked over. Dark smudges of mascara pooled underneath her eyes like slick, oily puddles on a blacktop road. He suppressed the grin and arranged his features into a concerned mask. The hand not holding the rosary reached across to pluck hers from her lap. Their fingers intertwined, and his thumb grazed the naked ring finger of her left hand. He'd place a new ring there. Soon.

His gaze paused on the polished coffin at the front of the church.

"Are you okay?" he asked softly.

Alicia dabbed at her eyes. Splotches of mascara stained the damp wad of tissues, like miniature inkblots from a Rorschach test. He heard the question posed by the state-appointed psychiatrist as clearly as if the man were standing here beside him.

What does this one look like, Andrew?

Drew stared at the mascara stains on the wadded tissue and said the answer without speaking.

Pain.

Alicia blew her nose softly and the choir sang "Nearer My God to Thee." Drew looked up. A cherubic-looking priest appeared behind the pulpit. With a round fleshy nose and gin-blossomed cheeks, he looked like he'd been hitting the sacramental wine too hard.

"There are no words of comfort at a time like this. We're gathered here today to say goodbye to Gretchen Lange, who was taken from us too young."

All across the church, Drew could hear an elegy of muffled sobs. The priest turned his head toward the ebony casket at the front of the church. A spray of pink roses was draped across the coffin.

Alicia shuddered beside him, and Drew slid a comforting arm around her shoulders. He tuned out the vicar's words. Instead he heard the snort of Gretchen's bovine laughter.

After an agonizingly long funeral mass, the priest concluded the service, and the mourners lumbered like cattle toward the huge double doors at the back of the church. Drew shepherded Alicia through the crowded aisles of the church toward the exit. He couldn't stomach another disingenuous eulogy from Gretchen's family or friends. In life Gretchen had been a pathetic waste of oxygen. Everyone knew it. In death, though, her family and friends glorified her as some kind of saint. Saint Gretchen. Patron of broken-down souls everywhere.

He was halfway to the door when Alicia spoke. Her soft voice didn't carry over the noise of the assembled crowd, so he bent his head closer.

"I can't believe Gretchen would do something like this. I mean, I knew she was depressed, but I didn't think she'd actually . . ." Alicia sniffled again. "You know? Kill herself. Why would she do something so desperate?"

Drew looked down into Alicia's tearstained face.

Did you know she was on Prozac? Did you know she was fucking Liam?

Drew said neither of these things. Instead he squeezed her hand reassuringly and said what any good boyfriend would. "No one realized how depressed she was."

"She should have opened up. I would have been there for her. We all would have helped her. If only we'd known."

"Sometimes there's nothing you can do," Drew murmured into her ear. "Sometimes the world has gone so black you can't imagine any other way out."

He thought about his mother and how desperate she'd been at the end.

"Why didn't I go to the bar that night?"

“You were sick.”

Up ahead he spotted a flock of Gretchen’s clucking friends. He was in no mood to hear another word about sweet Gretchen and what a waste it had all been. Alicia was so wrapped up in her own grief, she didn’t notice he was steering her away from them and toward the exit. Ten feet short of the door, he ran straight into the one person he least wanted to see.

Liam stood tall and solemn in his slim-cut Armani suit. His wavy blond hair was freshly cut. He looked fit and tan, like he’d just stepped off a ski slope in Aspen. There was no avoiding him. Liam blocked their path. Drew stiffened. Liam’s cold eyes took slow measure of Drew before his gaze turned toward Alicia. Only then did his glacial stare soften.

“Alicia,” he said in a strained, halting voice.

She stopped in midstride.

“I can’t believe you’d show your face here,” Alicia hissed.

“Please, Alicia, I had no idea what Gretchen was going through. I swear.”

“You expect me to believe that you weren’t using her? Poor Gretchen. She thought you were sincere. She thought you cared for her when, all along, you were only getting what you wanted. You don’t give a damn about anyone besides yourself. You never have.”

At a loss for words, Liam swallowed, his Adam’s apple bobbing in his throat, and a warm, pleasurable glow filled Drew.

Really. Could this day get any better?

Ignoring Drew, Liam took a step toward Alicia, a hand splayed across his chest.

“Alicia, you have to believe me. Until I heard about Gretchen’s suicide note, I had no idea she cared about me that way.”

Alicia’s face contorted. Outrage burned in her bloodshot eyes.

“You were hooking up with her, you sick fuck. Don’t try to deny it. She had pictures of you on her phone.”

Liam ignored the shocked stares from the people standing around him and kept his attention focused solely on Alicia. He opened his mouth to speak, but before he could utter another syllable, she raised her hand, palm outward.

“Not another word, Liam. I don’t want to hear any more of your lies.”

“Why would I hurt Gretchen?”

“Because you’re a selfish douche. Because she was going to tell everyone what a shit you are. I will never forgive you for what you did to her. I never want to speak to you again.”

Liam’s face turned ashen. He fell back a step, and his gaze met Drew’s. In that moment he saw a flash of understanding flicker across Liam’s face and he knew one thing for certain.

They both knew Gretchen hadn’t written that note.

The slick black streets reflected the harsh glare of the car's headlights as Charles Sully sped south down I-5. Just past Boeing Field, he punched the accelerator down, and the car's powerful engine emitted a deep and throaty growl, like the snarl of a Bengal tiger. He blew past the little flamer in the Beemer. Superior German engineering, my fucking ass. He'd take a good old American classic over some fancy piece of Eurotrash any day.

Sully knew where he was going. The car could almost drive itself. It was still early by the clock, not even nine in the evening yet, but business on the strip would be in full swing.

He needed it.

Since Lara had gotten fat, he'd been getting his rocks off elsewhere. Maybe he'd stick around long enough to see if she lost the baby weight. She'd been smoking hot when they first got together. All that Latin spit and fire. But that was before she got knocked up. Now she was passed out and snoring on the couch by eight thirty every night.

Bad enough he had to listen to her moan about her backaches, deal with her mood swings, and eat Mexican every night because that's what she said the baby liked. If she stayed fat, he'd fucking dump her. He didn't want to be saddled with some big heifer.

At first he'd pushed for an abortion, even offered to pay for the whole thing himself, but Lara was dead set against it—said it was against her religion. He was pretty sure fucking was considered a sin too, but that didn't stop her from spreading her legs any time he wanted.

Lately he'd been thinking that maybe the kid wasn't such a bad thing after all. It might be nice to have a son. He could teach the kid about cars. Go hunting in the woods. All the things he hadn't learned from his old man, who'd spent much of his miserable life behind bars.

Sully slowed down on the long strip of the Pacific Coast Highway. The rain had quit and the local wildlife had all crawled out of its hidey-holes. Sully took his time skimming down the streets. Window-shopping was half the fun.

This car was the shit. He liked the way heads turned as he cruised on by. He'd done much of the restoration work himself, right down to the custom paint job at his uncle's shop.

The girl standing at the corner was cute, with wavy blonde hair hanging halfway to her ass. Tight jeans. White rabbit-fur coat. She looked hot. He skimmed the curb and rolled down the window.

She leaned in. She wasn't a real blonde, but that was okay. Her mocha-colored skin was a shade dark for his taste. Good teeth. Freaky green eyes. Pretty enough. Too skinny to be a cop.

"Do you date?" he asked.

"What kind of girl were you looking for?"

"Someone who is up for a bit of everything."

Sully didn't like the way she eyed him, like he was a rotting piece of meat. Fucking women and their big fucking attitudes. Would it kill her to smile and act nice? She was the one out selling her wares. A little sugar from her might help sweeten the deal.

"Fifty," she said, smacking her fat lips.

Sully's hands clenched the steering wheel. Whore.

"Are you out of your fucking mind?"

He punched down on the accelerator and the tires squealed on the wet pavement. The girl jumped back just in time, and he merged back into traffic. Fifty bucks for her skinny ass? Jesus. Who the hell did she think she was? The Queen of fucking Sheba?

He glanced in the rearview mirror and saw her standing on the corner, one hand propped on a bony hip. Her other hand flipped him the bird.

Half a block away, he spied another blonde. Black skin. He hadn't had someone like her in a while. He slowed down and she smiled. She was missing a tooth. Others had turned dark. Nasty little twaker. He sped up and cruised on by.

Pickings were slim tonight. The lousy weather wasn't helping. He might actually have to pay the bitch fifty bucks if he didn't find something better soon. He'd wipe the smug look right off her face.

Then he spied her stepping out from the shadows toward the edge of the curb.

Blonde. Skinny. White. Nice rack. Not as pretty as the first girl, but hey, what the fuck? He wouldn't be looking at her face.

He eased the car in beside her. She propped her pointy elbows on the window frame.

Up close she was young. Maybe sixteen or seventeen. Young was good. Smooth skin. Tight ass. He'd pay more for someone that young. And if she was really good, maybe he wouldn't hurt her.

"Looking for some fun?" she asked.

He felt himself stir.

"Always."

Sully pulled two twenty-dollar bills from the wad of cash in his pocket and set them on the dash. The girl stole a quick backward glance over her shoulder and climbed in.

Sully peeled off of the strip, heading east toward Military Road. Silver streetlights cut through the gloom. Houses and trees flashed by. There were a few places he liked to go—quiet, dark places where they could be alone.

The girl looked nervous. She sat staring out the windshield, digging around in her purse.

"You good?" he asked, shooting her a sidelong glance.

She nodded. Face pale. "Where are we going?"

She spoke well. Educated. Not like most of the girls around here.

Something wasn't right. Sully could feel it deep in his bones. His gaze flicked to the rearview mirror, half expecting to see a cop cruiser tailing him, but the streets were empty. Good thing too. One more conviction and the only way he'd see his son was from behind bars.

"I said, where are we going?" she said, louder this time. More shrill. Like she was scared or something.

"There's this place not far from here I like. You'll see."

Sully swerved onto a side road. One of those dead-end streets that overlooked the valley. There was a turnout a mile or so ahead. He and his high school buddies used to come out here to smoke dope. That had been before the shit was legal. He spied a break in the pine trees and took it. He slowed down, and the trees closed in around them. Tires rumbled along the gravel path. Lights twinkled in the valley below. Sully killed the engine.

Sully turned toward her. Her face was in shadow. All he could see was the soft glimmer of her blonde hair. He reached out to touch it. But it felt wrong. She felt wrong.

"Is this where you brought her?" the girl asked.

Sully frowned in the dark, sparks of anger igniting in his chest.

"What?"

"Is this where you brought her?" Louder now. Accusing.

"What the fuck are you talking about?"

Sully's hand shot out and grabbed a fistful of blonde hair. It came away in his hand. His fingers popped open and the wig slid to the floor.

“What did you do with her, you sick fuck?”

Sully’s other hand shot out toward her, fingers grasping the thin fabric of her shirt. He yanked her toward him. Without the wig, he saw it. Green eyes. Short, spiky black hair. The lesbo from the bar. The one with all the attitude.

“You,” he growled between clenched teeth.

She wrenched free from his grasp and reared back, head smacking against the passenger’s window with a dull crack. The purse tumbled from her lap.

“What did you do with her?” she screamed at him.

“Who?”

“Brooke!”

“You’re fucking crazy, bitch.”

“I know what you did.”

“You don’t know shit.”

She’d pay for screwing with him.

The girl lunged for the door. He grabbed her and yanked her back by the hair. Her head twisted around. Hate spilled from her eyes. Sully cocked his fist. She knocked his arm away and Sully heard a hiss. He screamed, covered his face. His eyes were on fire.

The passenger’s door burst open and she spilled from the car. Sully screamed. He couldn’t let her get away, couldn’t let her go to the cops with some crazy story. They would think he was guilty.

He pushed open his door and stumbled after her. He slipped on the bed of wet leaves and landed hard on his knees. He lurched to his feet and lunged straight ahead. His fingers brushed the back of her jacket.

“Get away from me, you freak,” she yelled.

She was close. Sully staggered toward her, eyes burning, tears streaming down his face. He couldn’t see shit, but there was no fucking way he would let her go.

He grabbed her coat and jerked her back. She stumbled. Cursed. Sully grabbed hold of her. Her face was a small white blur. His fist closed, poised to strike. She’d learn to keep her fucking mouth shut.

Pain. A bright flash of pain bolted through Sully’s chest. His knees buckled and he tumbled to the ground.

Seth sipped the cold coffee on his desk and dialed the number on the pink message slip. It was late and he knew the chances of actually catching Dr. Rahul Jain in person were slim. He was already composing a message in his head when someone picked up the receiver.

“Dr. Jain.”

“Hey, Rahul. It’s Seth Crawford.”

“Seth. Right. I got your message. Sorry, I was too busy to call you back. You wanted to talk about Charles Sully. What’s he done now?”

The unexpected greeting knocked Seth off stride, and he knew he wasn’t going to like what came next.

“I’m investigating the disappearance of a college student, and I’m wondering if Sully’s our guy.”

“A girlfriend?” Rahul asked.

Past behavior was the best indicator of future behavior, Seth knew, and Sully’s record spoke for itself.

“No, just a chance encounter at a bar. Sully hit on her, and she blew him off. Is he the type of guy to retaliate?”

Rahul paused, mulling the question over for a moment or two.

“Typically I see two kinds of abusers in my line of work. Both are violent. The first is an iceberg. Calm. Almost glacial. With guys like this, their pulse rate rarely spikes during an assault. They attack and move on. The second is a volcano ready to explode. They tend to pick victims close to them, like family members or partners. They are all emotion and violence. Sully is the second kind.”

“So this girl’s rejection could have triggered him?”

“Could have, but I see Sully as the kind of guy who, after getting rejected at the bar, goes home and beats the shit out of his girlfriend.”

“What’s the difference?”

“Most bullies are cowards, and the girlfriend is a safe target.”

“But he’s a violent guy. He could have snapped.”

“It’s always possible. Maybe he had a bad day—fought with his girlfriend or someone at work. Could be that he meets a girl in a bar who says the wrong thing and triggers his rage. There is no doubt in my mind he hates women. But here’s the kicker—if he’s that close to losing his shit, chances are good he’ll take it all the way.”

“And kill her,” Seth said, dreading the inevitable, bloody outcome.

“Could be. But Sully’s not a planner. He’s not a slow-burn kind of guy. If an attack occurred, it would likely be a spur-of-the-moment thing. You saw Sully’s record. His mother has a no-contact order in place. The girl he beat was messed up pretty bad. In both cases the bloody fingerprints led straight to him.”

“Is it possible he learned to cover his tracks in lockup?”

“Anything is possible. Just when I think I’ve got it all figured out, someone manages to surprise me.” Rahul paused. “So, what do you think? Are you dealing with an iceberg or a volcano?”

“I don’t know yet.”

The answer, while honest, was wholly unsatisfactory, and Seth knew he had to answer it soon. Time was ticking. And if this was a serial lunatic, it was only a matter of time before he grabbed another girl.

The phone beeped, and he saw a familiar number flash by.

“Thanks for your help, Rahul. I’ve got to grab the other line.” He jabbed a button on his phone. “Crawford.”

“Do you know Tess Turner?” Detective Linda Garcia asked.

Seth’s brow wrinkled. “Yeah. I’m investigating her roommate’s disappearance. Why?”

“I have her in custody. You need to come down here.”

“I’m on my way.”

• • • •

LINDA GARCIA HAD THE face of an angel and the voice of a hard-core smoker. A ten-year veteran of SPD, she had worked with Seth on a number of cases, and he knew she was sharp.

“Where’s Tess?” he asked.

“In there, cooling off.” Garcia hooked a thumb toward an interrogation room.

“What happened?”

“A couple of kids called it in. They were out on Military Road when they heard screaming. Ms. Turner was attacking some guy with a Taser. He’s in rough shape. Apparently she pepper-sprayed him before she tased him, poor bastard.”

“What were the kids doing out there?”

“Smoking dope. Not that we caught them with anything.” Garcia rolled her eyes.

“Who’s the guy?”

“Charles Sully.”

“Aw, shit.”

“You don’t look surprised.”

“I’m not.”

“What do you want me to do with her?” Garcia asked.

Seth brushed a hand across his eyes and shook his head. Stupid girl. He had half a mind to let Garcia charge her with assault. Maybe then she’d learn her lesson.

“I’ll talk to her,” Seth said. “Where’s Sully?”

“In the room across the hall.”

Tess Turner slouched in a chair behind a long, bare table. He barely recognized her underneath the thick layer of makeup smudged across her face. She recognized him well enough. Her chin inched up at a defiant angle as their eyes locked. Seth closed the door behind him.

“What the hell did you think you were doing?”

“Well, someone had to keep an eye on that psycho.”

Sorely tempted to slap some sense into her, Seth planted his clenched fists on the table.

“Detective Garcia wants to charge you with assault.”

“Me? What about that freak? He’s the one you should be arresting.”

“What for?”

“What do you think? He’s got Brooke.”

“And you know that how?”

Seth stepped away from the table, his hands swinging wide. Tess scowled like a petulant teenager. She crossed her arms and stared down at the toes of her boots. Hooker boots, he thought. Goes with the hooker outfit.

“It’s obvious, isn’t it? He was pissed at Brooke for rejecting him, so he went after her.”

“Do you have any evidence, Nancy Drew, or is your feminine intuition telling you this?”

Tess's mouth dropped open. Anger flashed in her eyes. "You know I'm right."

"Do I?" Seth raked a hand through his hair and reined in his own temper. "Okay, Ms. Turner, tell me about this brilliant plan of yours."

"I thought if I could get him to pick me up, I might be able to get him to confess."

"Confess? You think it's that easy? Do you know the kind of danger you put yourself in? What if he has Brooke? What if he recognized you?"

"He recognized me, all right."

"Jesus Christ."

Tess's skirt rode high up on her thighs, and she tugged it down an inch or two, still revealing more leg than was decent. Seth looked away, dropping his head into his hands.

"Maybe you should spend a night or two in jail. Maybe that would drill some sense into that thick head of yours."

"You can't be serious. I was protecting myself."

"It didn't look that way to the kids who called it in."

"He was going to hurt me."

"And what, exactly, were you expecting? You're dressed up like a hooker. You got into his car with him willingly. He drove you to a remote location. What did you think he was going to do? Read you poetry? He's a dangerous guy. Best-case scenario, you get raped and dumped off by the side of the road. Worst-case scenario, you disappear too. How does that help Brooke?"

"You could arrest him for solicitation."

"And you for prostitution?"

Tess didn't answer. She avoided his gaze, but Seth didn't let up. He glared at her. A heavy silence stretched out between them, and his anger finally subsided.

"Why didn't you tell me about the other guy at the bar?"

Tess stared at him with the wide, startled eyes of a doe. "Who?"

"Don't play games," Seth said. "I saw the surveillance video from the Chapel. Sully wasn't the only guy you talked to that night."

"Oh, him."

"Yeah, him. Who is he?"

Tess shrugged her tiny shoulders. The torn collar of her flimsy black shirt slipped down, exposing the strap of a hot-pink camisole. Crawford looked away.

"Nobody. Sully was being an asshole and this guy pretended to be Brooke's boyfriend to back Sully off."

"And it worked?"

"Yeah, Sully left Brooke alone after that."

"Did Brooke know the guy?"

Tess shook her head. "Neither of us did."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"I didn't think about it. He was a nice guy, not a creep like Sully."

"Are there any other unimportant details you'd care to share?"

Tess rolled her eyes. "No."

Seth blew out a long breath.

"I'm not going to warn you again, Tess. Stay away from Charles Sully. Now go wash that shit off your face. I'll have an officer drive you back to campus."

"I can find my own way home."

Defiance flashed in her green eyes. Seth's jaw tensed.

"I'm not kidding. I'll arrest you for interfering with a police investigation if I have to. Do you understand me?"

He stared her down until she answered.

"Yes, sir," she snapped.

"Get out of here."

Tess rose from the chair. She swayed her hips in an exaggerated gait on her way out of the room, no doubt for his benefit.

Seth rose from the chair and strode across the hall.

Charles Sully looked fidgety. Cracking his knuckles, he ran his gaze along the perimeter of the room. Looking for cameras, Seth surmised as he studied Sully through the one-way mirror.

"You want some company?" Linda Garcia asked, peering through the glass at Sully.

"Sure. It might unnerve him to have a woman in the room."

Seth opened the door. He slapped a thick file folder down on the desk, and Sully sneered. He rolled his red, swollen eyes skyward.

"Tell us what happened, Charles."

"Nothing."

"That's not what she says."

"The bitch is lying."

"Funny. She says the same thing about you."

Garcia was right. Sully looked like shit. His eyes were red and swollen, no doubt still burning from the pepper spray. Sweat beaded on Sully's forehead.

"You're a foot taller and a hundred pounds heavier than she is, and you expect us to believe she attacked a big guy like you unprovoked?" Garcia said.

Sully turned his sharp gaze her way. "That's what I'm telling you."

"Why would she do that?" Seth asked.

Sully's gaze turned back toward him. "I don't know. I wasn't doing anything."

"What were you doing out in the woods?"

"We were just talking."

"Talking?" Garcia emitted a short bark of laughter and exchanged a skeptical look with Seth.

Sully's jaw clenched. "I didn't lay a fucking hand on her."

"Then how did her shirt get ripped?" Garcia asked.

Sully's head tipped back. "I don't know."

"I'm sure."

Sully lapsed into a sulky silence.

Seth picked up the file and thumbed through the contents. He pulled out a photograph of Brooke Parker and placed it on the table. "What do you know about her?"

Sully's eyes flicked to the photo. This guy was no poker player. His cheeks flushed. A vein bulged at his temple.

"Nothing."

"Is that right? You've never seen this girl?"

Sully dropped his gaze to the floor. "Not that I recall."

"Were you at the Chapel last Saturday night?"

"I might have been."

"You don't recall?"

Sully shook his head.

“What would you say if I told you that we found Brooke Parker earlier this afternoon? She’s recovering now and soon she’ll be talking to our investigators about her ordeal. What’s she going to tell us about you, Charles?”

“Nothing. There’s nothing to tell.”

Sully’s eyes blazed with hostility. Seth closed the file folder and pitched it back on the desk. He laced his fingers on the table, his lips stretched into a smug smile.

“Okay, Charles. You’re free to go. We’ll be in touch.”

Seth watched Charles Sully stride from the squad room. He would have preferred not to push Sully right now, but Tess had forced his hand.

Garcia closed the door. “What do you think?” she asked.

“He’s lying. I have video placing him at Parker’s last known location. I have his photo posted to her Facebook page. What I don’t have is any physical evidence linking him to the actual abduction.”

“He’s an angry son of a bitch.”

“Yeah, but is he a killer?”

Charles Sully wanted to shred someone. Sprung from the police station, he beelined it to his favorite hangout, a dive bar not far from his house. The familiar smell of stale beer and cigarettes hit him as soon as he walked through the door. Management hadn't seen fit to change the carpets in the past two decades of spilled beer, blood, and puke. Some customers complained about the stink, but Sully didn't mind. To him the place smelled like home.

Some asshole stood blocking the path to the bar, and Sully shoved him out of the way. Guy was shooting pool with his buddies, too fucking stupid to pay attention to what was going on around him. The city was crawling with fucking clueless hipster douchebags. Why didn't they stick to their overpriced clubs with their stuck-up twat girlfriends? Why did they have to come here? This place had been blue-collar long before the tech industry had overrun Seattle.

"What's your problem?" the guy asked, trying to sound tough.

Sully didn't stop to answer. He just pushed his way through the herd of sheep crowded around the pool tables and followed the glow of the neon beer signs. The cell phone in his pocket buzzed. Gritting his teeth, he withdrew it.

Lara was calling. Checking up on him. Fucking bitch.

All he wanted was to sit and drink in peace, but no. The bar was crammed with stupid fucks who didn't have the common sense to get the hell out of the way. Then Lara, who couldn't spend one fucking night home alone without calling. He could already hear her whiny voice in his head.

Where are you, Carlos? When will you be home, Carlos? Can you bring me some milk, Carlos?

On and on and fucking on until he was ready to explode.

Planting his meaty forearms on the sticky bar, Sully ordered a beer and a shot of tequila. The fat bartender, Terry, nodded. Sully downed the first shot. The bitter taste of tequila burned down his throat and settled in a satisfying glow deep in his belly.

The fucking police had hauled him in. That's all he needed, the police poking around in his shit.

He wanted another drink, but Terry was gabbing with some fat fuck at the end of the bar. He eyed the slutty waitress buzzing around the bar in her miniskirt. She blew past him without sparing him a glance. Clenching his teeth, Sully pounded the shot glass against the smooth, lacquered wood hard enough to draw attention to the fact that he was sitting down here without a shot.

Was it too much to ask for Terry to get his fat ass down here with a refill instead of shooting the shit with some other douche at the end of the bar? It wasn't social hour. He had a job to do.

Terry turned, his beady eyes fixed on Sully. He held up the empty shot glass. Red-faced and annoyed, Terry nodded, getting the point.

About goddamned time.

Sully gripped the frosty pint glass in his fist.

Why couldn't they just leave him the fuck alone? Lara, the police, that fucking dyke that had set him up.

Stupid fucking cunt.

She had no idea of the hornet's nest she'd stirred up.

Sully guzzled down the pint. The chilled, frothy beer slid down his throat but did nothing to quench the burning anger bubbling up inside his gut.

The bitch should have minded her own business. She should have kept her mouth shut. She should have just left him alone. But no. She was too stupid for that.

Someone should teach her a lesson. Someone should shut the dumb bitch up.
Fists clenched, knuckles turning white, Sully downed the second shot.

Thursday morning and Marissa felt on the verge of collapse. The emotional toll of baring her soul to the press yesterday, along with the constant panic of not knowing where her daughter was, had sapped what strength remained. And it was only eleven o'clock. There was still a hell of a lot of day to get through.

Henry Cahill had called them all into the conference room to discuss his latest findings. Detective Crawford sat beside her, a skeptical look on his face.

"So, Brooke turned off the location preferences on her social media account," Crawford said, repeating Cahill's words.

"Right. For this photo. Don't you think that's odd?"

"Not really."

"Why for this photo? Presumably the picture of a guy who wiggled her out?" Cahill asked. Crawford flipped his hand palm-up, his patience wearing thin. Cahill's brows arched. "So what if I told you the picture of Charles Sully replaced a different picture?"

Crawford leaned forward in his chair, fully engaged now. "What do you mean?"

"The database record has been modified."

"Hold it. You hacked into their database?"

"Well, hypothetically speaking, if one were to do that sort of thing, one might uncover an anomaly with the database record."

"Hypothetically?"

"Hacking into their database might be considered illegal, so let's say if someone were to do just that, they may be able to find out where the person was when they edited the posting, uploading the picture of Charles Sully."

Cahill's lips broke into a sly smile.

"Okay," said Crawford, "so say Brooke uploads a photo to her Facebook site, then Brooke . . ."

"Or someone else . . ."

"Right, or someone else changes the post, replacing the original picture with Sully's."

"Exactly. And let's say the new picture was uploaded in a coffee shop in Belltown on Sunday morning, a little after ten a.m."

"Hold it. I thought the location services were turned off."

"Well, what do you think is easier? Stripping the GPS data before the picture is uploaded, or not showing the GPS data in the user interface?"

"So all that info is still stored in the database? The preference controls whether the data is shown or not?"

"Gold star, Detective Crawford," Cahill said.

"Any chance of recovering the original photo—the one replaced by Sully's?"

"Unfortunately not. But if the coffee shop has a surveillance camera . . ."

"Right."

Marissa got lost in all the technical jargon, but looking pleased with himself, Cahill handed Crawford a piece of paper with the name of the coffee shop and the time of the transaction. The group stood and filed out of the conference room ahead of Marissa.

Just outside the conference room door, her cell phone rang. Marissa's heart jumped. Brooke? Please let it be Brooke. She opened her purse and started digging.

Ring.

Why couldn't she find anything in this damned purse? A hairbrush and wadded receipts spilled onto the floor as she frantically searched for the phone. Marissa ducked into the conference room and frisked the pockets.

Ring.

Desperate, she yanked the purse open wide and upended it onto the table. Coins whirred along the smooth surface. Keys clanged. She scattered the contents with trembling hands, fingers finally latching on to the phone.

She pressed the answer button and clamped the phone against her ear.

"Hello," she said, sounding like she'd just sprinted a mile.

"Ms. Rooney, this is Clarissa Erwin from Renton High."

Kelly?

"What's wrong? Is Kelly all right?"

"Well, that's what I'm calling about. There's been a fight on school property."

"A fight? Is Kelly hurt?"

"Not seriously, but . . ." The woman's voice trailed off.

Not seriously? What the hell does that mean?

"But what?" she demanded. "Where is Kelly?"

"She's been taken to the Renton police station along with the other students involved in the altercation."

"She's at the police station? What for?"

"Like I said, there was a fight on school property."

"I don't understand," she said.

"Maybe it's best if you just went down there."

It was the first thing the woman had said that made any sense.

Marissa hung up and yanked the purse open. She grabbed fistfuls of her belongings off the table and stuffed them back in.

"Ms. Rooney, is everything okay?"

Marissa whirled around. Detective Crawford stood in the doorway. He set a handful of her belongings on the table beside the purse.

"Yes . . . no . . . shit." She pressed her palms to her burning cheeks. "There's been a fight at school and Kelly's at the Renton police station. I need to go. Now."

"Want a ride?"

Marissa stared at him. She didn't have her car, which meant waiting for the train, which would take longer. She had no idea where to go or what she was walking into. Having a police officer with her would make things so much easier. Having Crawford with her revealed a reservoir of strength she hadn't known she had.

"Would you?"

"Let's go."

Marissa opened the door to Crawford's gray Nissan Altima. The pine-forest scent assaulted her nose as she settled into the passenger's seat. The interior was in pristine condition. There were none of the empty coffee cups, fast food wrappers, or other evidence of unclean living she'd expected to see in a cop's car.

They were halfway to Boeing Field before Marissa realized she'd left without telling Elizabeth Holt where she was going. Second day on the job and she'd gone AWOL, followed Crawford out of the building like some kind of zombie.

Now they were speeding down I-5, heading south of the city. Industrial buildings flew by. They were making good time. Then Marissa looked up to see four lanes of red taillights ahead.

“Damn it,” she growled.

Crawford maneuvered his way to the left lane and flipped on a switch. The police light on his dash sprang to life, flashing red and blue. Drivers shuffled aside, grudgingly allowing them past.

“Did they tell you why Kelly was taken to the police station?”

“There was some kind of fight at the school. I’m not even sure if she’s hurt.”

“If she was badly hurt, they would have taken her to the hospital,” he said, sounding like a cop.

Marissa saw the flashing lights of a fire truck and a police cruiser up ahead, alongside a wide field of scattered debris.

“Has Kelly ever been in trouble before?” Crawford asked.

Marissa shook her head. “She’s never been a star student, but she was always able to find her niche—art, band, whatever.”

Crawford honked at a red Honda Civic blocking his way. The driver eased over and Crawford squeezed his car around on the shoulder. Closer to the scene now, Marissa saw a Dodge Ram stopped by the side of the road, trunk bunched in like an accordion. There wasn’t much left of the Subaru Outback smashed into the guardrail up ahead.

Marissa caught sight of the truck’s driver. Sprawled over the steering wheel, bright-red blood sheeting down one side of her pale face. The firemen were talking to her, but she wasn’t moving.

Marissa’s gut clenched as she thought about the woman’s family and how their lives would change. How at some point today they would get a call and their lives would take a hard right, forcing them off the path they’d been on and into the unknown.

She thought about Brooke. Alone. Scared. Hurting. Her stomach rolled. Covering her mouth, she looked away from the mangled cars.

A state trooper waved them over. Lowering the window, Crawford flashed his badge.

“We need to get to Renton ASAP.”

“Well, shit.” The state trooper looked at the scene, then back at Crawford. “Stay as far left as you can manage.”

Crawford nodded. The trooper straightened away from the car and waved them through. Glass and plastic crunched and popped beneath the Nissan’s wheels as the scene disappeared in the rearview mirror.

Bare trees lined both sides of the highway. Their naked branches scratched the bleak sky. The familiar sprawl of Westfield Southcenter Mall passed, and Marissa knew they were close. Five more minutes and they’d reach the station. And then what?

“You said Kelly just started at this school?”

“We moved to Renton in June. She was at Redmond High last year.”

Crawford whistled. “Redmond to Renton. That’s a pretty big change.”

Marissa stiffened. She knew the schools weren’t as good here. Redmond was full of white-collar professionals, folks who worked at Nintendo, Microsoft, Group Health, and other large conglomerates. Renton was a blue-collar town. Aside from the Boeing plant, the downtown was small and grimy, filled with stores struggling to stay afloat in this tough economy. Renton was all she could afford within driving distance of the city since the split.

“Yeah, well. Divorce sucks,” she grumbled.

Crawford didn't respond. Marissa glanced over. There was no ring on his finger, and she wondered if he was divorced, if he knew what it was like to cleave your life from another person's. How messy it all was.

They drove the rest of the way in silence. Crawford pulled into the salmon-colored building off Grady Way. He flashed his badge and told the clerk whom they were there to see. She was escorted to the waiting area while he disappeared through a heavy steel door.

Half a dozen people filled the waiting area. A man with a scrubby beard and overbright eyes turned toward Marissa.

"Rejoice, sister," he said. "Those who know not suffering know not God."

Marissa turned away and stared at the door. The minutes crawled by.

Finally Crawford emerged from the back, striding down the hall with Kelly in tow.

Marissa rushed forward and clasped Kelly in a fierce hug. Pulling away, she caught sight of the bruises and swelling around Kelly's eyes. Chin held high, Kelly stared at her mother as if daring her to say a word. Marissa kept her jaw clenched tight, not trusting herself to speak.

They walked to the car, and Kelly slouched in the backseat. Marissa glanced over at Detective Crawford. God, what he must think of her. Of her family. Everything was so screwed up.

Marissa was surprised when Crawford didn't drop them off at the curb outside their house. He followed them inside. Kelly dropped her backpack on the floor beside the closet door and turned on Marissa.

"Before you accuse me of doing anything, I want you to know, I didn't start it."

Marissa bristled at Kelly's defensive tone.

"If you didn't do anything wrong, what were you doing at the police station? Why did I have to leave work to bail you out?"

"Nobody bailed me out."

"Really?" Marissa fisted her hands on her hips. "You really want to get into a semantic argument with me right now?"

Kelly's face flushed red as she glared at Marissa. Her mouth opened and she was about to blast back when Detective Crawford silenced her with his open palm.

"Apparently Kelly was jumped by a group of girls. She defended herself."

"If Kelly was attacked, why was she pulled into the police station?"

Crawford exchanged a glance with Kelly before looking back at Marissa.

"Because she had a knife."

"What? You brought a knife to school?" The sudden realization of how much worse the situation could have been hit her with full force.

"Have they been threatening you, Kelly?" Crawford asked.

"Yes," Kelly said, ignoring Marissa. "They've been on my ass ever since I started. On Monday they knocked me down and took my flute."

"They stole your flute? Why didn't you say anything?"

"What could you do about it? Call their mothers?"

"Kelly," Crawford said.

She rolled her eyes. "Seriously," she muttered under her breath.

"I can't believe you brought a knife to school. Jesus."

Anger and incredulity flashed in Kelly's eyes.

"You'd rather I let them beat the shit out of me? You don't know what it's like there. You want everything to be fine, but it's not. You're not the one dealing with the shit that goes on there, Mom—" the drugs, the gangs, you name it. I'm not going back there. I'll drop out of school. I'll . . .”

Angry tears shone in Kelly's eyes and Marissa took a step toward her, desperately wanting to close the distance between them, but Kelly turned away. Marissa wrapped her empty arms around her torso. As if sensing how close she was to the breaking point, Crawford intervened.

“Can I have a minute alone with your mom?”

“Fine.”

Kelly stormed from the room. The bedroom door slammed so hard the walls shook, and Marissa was left alone with Crawford. She pressed her hands against her burning cheeks and stared at the floor.

“I suppose you're going to tell me I'm handling the situation wrong.”

“I wouldn't presume.”

Marissa leaned back against the cupboard and waited for the lecture to begin, but it didn't. Crawford sat down at the table and motioned for her to join him. She didn't want to sit. She wanted to march into Kelly's room and settle this thing. But she couldn't ignore his request. He'd been good enough to come to her rescue at the police station. She owed it to him to hear him out.

Reluctantly she pushed away from the counter and took the chair across from him.

“How much trouble is Kelly in?”

“The police aren't going to press charges, but it's quite likely Kelly will be suspended. Maybe even expelled.”

“Expelled? But what about the girls who attacked her?”

“They'll be disciplined too. Unfortunately Kelly's choice of weapon will weigh heavily into their decision.”

An angry bark of laughter bubbled up from Marissa's chest.

“So Kelly gets attacked and they're worried about what kind of knife she brought to defend herself? This is insane.”

“It's not fair. From Kelly's point of view, she felt threatened by these girls, and rightfully so. It's a rough school. While I don't agree with what she did, I understand why she did it. Bottom line, you need help.”

“Psychological help? Like a therapist or something?”

Crawford smiled gently. “I was thinking more like family support, like maybe Kelly should transfer schools.”

How was Marissa supposed to arrange that? It wasn't like she could drive across to the Kent school district and enroll Kelly there. Besides, who was to say any of the local schools would be any better? And she sure as hell couldn't afford private school.

“Do you have family? Someone who can help out with Kelly?”

“It's just me. It's always been just me.”

Marissa sighed. She was pathetic. Thirty-six years old and what did she have to show for it? She had no one she could count on, no one to support her. Tears stung her eyes. Horrified, she covered her face and bit the inside of her cheek. She wouldn't cry in front of him. If she cried now, she might never stop.

“It's going to be okay,” Crawford said, resting a hand on her elbow.

She flinched away, dropping her hands and glaring at him.

“I'm not stupid. Things are not okay. Brooke is missing. Kelly hates me. I've done everything I can to give these girls a decent life. I fed them, clothed them, made sure they went to school, stayed off drugs, didn't get pregnant. I worked any job I could get to put a roof over their heads. I tried to build a family for them, and every single time things fell apart. Shit just doesn't work out. I learned that the hard way. I make mistakes. I pick the wrong men. Maybe my mother's right. I deserve this."

She dropped her gaze to the table, wrapping her arms tight around her chest. She couldn't spend another second looking into his kind eyes without losing it.

"None of this is your fault, Marissa."

A pained smile twisted her lips.

"The day I left home, my mother said God would punish me for my sins. Apparently she was right."

"Parents say a lot of things they don't mean."

Marissa gave a shaky nod and cast her gaze toward the window at the gloomy sky. She wished she could believe him, but she'd stopped believing in God when she was just a kid. Maybe this was his punishment, his way of getting even.

"I have to get back to the station," Crawford said, breaking into her thoughts. "Are you all right?"

Marissa nodded. Crawford's chair scraped against the tile floor. She rose from the table and followed him to the door. She had a crazy urge to grab his hand. She didn't want him to go. He was so calm. So sane. She wasn't sure she could handle any of this alone.

"Thanks for helping out with Kelly today."

"I was glad to help."

His hand gripped the doorknob, and he hesitated, turning back toward Marissa.

"I don't want to overstep here, but I do have one small piece of advice. Just listen to Kelly. She needs to know you understand her side of the story, no matter what it is."

"You're heading back to the station?"

"I need to get the surveillance footage from the coffee shop where the photo of Charles Sully was uploaded."

Tree branches whipped her face. The wet wind plastered her hair to her head. She could see the headlights shimmering up ahead. She had to keep running. Faster. He was close behind.

“Brooke,” he screamed, his voice filled with rage.

Another burst of adrenaline shot through her. He was gaining.

Her muscles burned with lactic acid. Her blood sugars soared and she panted, trying to catch her breath. Her lungs were on fire, and close behind her, she could hear his heavy footsteps closing in, crashing through the brush.

The hillside was steep, and she clambered up the slippery terrain. Her feet slid. She grabbed a fistful of vines. Blackberry bushes. The spikes bit into her hands, drawing blood, but she didn't care. She climbed. The lights drew closer. She had to get to the road. Ten or fifteen feet. That was all. She was close, so close.

A hand closed around her ankle and gave it a vicious yank. She fell. She tasted mud and filth and blood.

Oh God.

The blood rushed through her ears, as fast and as constant as the rising river outside the cabin. Brooke's eyes opened. Her vision was blurred. Her blood sugar was soaring, and she was dying of thirst.

Her heart still pounding, she pressed her hand to her chest, trying to shake off the panic, but the nightmare had seemed so real. So real. Oh, shit.

She pushed herself up into a sitting position and brushed her hair back with trembling fingers.

He wasn't here. But he would come back.

Time was running out. She felt it in the screaming of her muscles, the aching of her joints. She needed insulin, but she only had one pen. How many more shots were left? Without a glucometer, she had no way of telling how much she really needed. And when the insulin ran out, she was as good as dead.

No. She didn't want to die here. She had to wake Kim. They had to find a way out. Together they could figure it out.

Pain throbbed through Brooke's body. Moving was hard. She shifted onto her knees and squinted in the waning light. But Kim wasn't on the bed.

Confused, she swung her gaze wide. Rocking back on her heels, she looked up.

Bile rose at the back of her throat. The breath rushed from her lungs, and she screamed.

Outside the window the gray sky turned black. Marissa ripped off the nicotine patch she'd applied earlier that day and rifled through the kitchen drawers, searching for the last package of cigarettes she'd stowed there—for emergencies. Well, this sure as hell qualified. She slammed the junk drawer shut and opened the next. Nothing. Dammit. She finally found a pack in the bottom drawer, shoved underneath a stack of hideous blue place mats.

Her fingers shaking, she pulled out a cigarette and lit up.

It tasted stale as shit, but that didn't stop her. She cracked the kitchen window open an inch and blew the smoke outside, not wanting Kelly to know just how weak she was. Halfway through she ground the cigarette out in the sink. Her head pounded with a blistering headache. Nine Inch Nails blasted from the speakers in Kelly's room, and Marissa knew she was stalling.

Hours had passed. She had to talk to Kelly. She had to stay calm, because Crawford was right. She needed to listen to her daughter, without interrupting, without losing her temper.

Marissa crossed the kitchen and knocked on her daughter's door.

"Kelly," she called, and waited for some acknowledgement. The music blared. "I know you're angry, but we need to work through this."

She rested her forehead on the cool surface of the door. Her temples throbbed to the bass line of "Head Like a Hole."

Marissa knocked again, louder this time, and still Kelly didn't answer.

"Look, I know I shouldn't have yelled at you, but I was scared. I couldn't stand it if something happened to you. I'll go to the school and talk to the principal. I know you don't feel safe there. We'll figure something out. I promise."

Dammit, Kelly was every bit as obstinate as her father was. Every single time they'd gotten into a fight, he had gone storming out, leaving her behind to stew. Sometimes he'd be gone for days, leaving her alone with the kids. She'd never known whether he was coming back or not. And then one day he hadn't.

Marissa hammered on the door.

"Come on, Kelly. Hiding in there won't fix anything. You have to talk to me. Are you even listening? Turn the music down."

Marissa waited. The music wailed and Kelly stubbornly refused to respond. Anger bubbling over, she grabbed the knob and flung the door wide.

The room was dark.

"Kelly?"

No answer. The bass guitar throbbed in time with her pounding headache. Marissa pressed a hand to her temple and flicked on the lights. Kelly was nowhere in sight. Her heart raced. Panic filled her chest.

"Kelly!" she screamed.

Cold wind blew in through the room. The window was open a crack. Marissa ran across the room and peered outside. The street was empty. No sign of anyone anywhere.

Marissa's head swirled in a dizzying sway just before her knees gave way. She fell to the floor. Her mouth opened, but she couldn't even scream.

“What am I looking for?” the tech asked, loading the coffee shop’s surveillance video onto his computer.

“This guy,” Seth said, handing over a grainy printout of the mystery man talking to Brooke at the Chapel.

“You’re kidding, right?” the tech said, squinting at the printout. “Don’t you have anything better? I mean, I can’t tell anything from this.”

True. There was no way of telling what the guy looked like—eye color, facial features, or tattoos. The resolution of the camera was shit.

“He’s a white male, clean-shaven, six feet tall, dark hair. It’s the best we’ve got,” Seth said.

“Right. That narrows it down.” The tech shook his head and glanced back at Seth. “I’ll call you when I’ve got something.”

“Thanks,” Seth said, heading back to his office.

Gripping his car keys tight in his hand, he yanked open his desk drawer. Holly’s face stared up at him. Her pretty smile pierced his heart, and suddenly he was thinking about the pain he’d seen in Marissa’s eyes. With one daughter missing, the last thing she needed was Kelly’s fit of teenage rebellion. But life was like that. Just when you thought things couldn’t get worse, they did.

He slammed the drawer shut and rubbed his eyes.

“Crawford.”

Seth glanced up. Lieutenant Alvarez cut across the busy squad room, angling directly toward him. Before he even opened his mouth, Seth knew what he wanted.

“Catch me up to speed on the Parker case.”

“We’ve got a couple potential suspects. First up is Charles Sully, the ex-con who was hitting on Brooke at the bar.”

“You talk to him?”

“He lied about meeting Brooke at the bar. Says he knows nothing about her disappearance. He’s got a record, convictions for solicitation and domestic assault. According to the forensic psychiatrist, Sully’s a bit of a head case.”

“Does he feel like our guy?”

“Too soon to say, but there is something definitely off about him. Just need to figure out what. Then there’s the mystery man Brooke was talking to at the bar.”

“ID him yet?”

Seth shook his head.

“Not yet. The surveillance footage from the Chapel is useless. I’ll call Tess Turner . . .”

“Parker’s roommate?”

Seth nodded.

“I’ll have her come down to the station to work with an artist.”

“Good. What else?”

“Holt’s hired a super-geek to crawl through Parker’s social media site to see what he can find out.”

“Like what?”

“Don’t know, but maybe Cahill will find something useful.”

“I suppose it’s worth a shot. What about the girl’s condition?”

Inwardly Seth cringed. He didn't like to think about how Brooke might be suffering without her medication. Investigating the disappearance of a teenager was scary enough. The extra pressure of trying to find a teenage diabetic magnified the ticking of the clock in his head. Each passing hour could mean life or death for Brooke.

"Well, if she's got her insulin pen with her, she'll be able to squeak by for a few more days."

"And if she doesn't?"

Seth shrugged. If Brooke didn't have access to her insulin, she might already be in a coma, or worse. He didn't need to spell it out for the lieutenant.

"And the mother?"

"She's holding it together. Barely."

"The chief wants your daily report. It's late."

"I know."

"Get on it."

"Yes, sir."

Alvarez strode back to his office. Seth picked up his cell phone and dialed Tess's number. He got her voice mail.

"Tess, I need you to come down to the station." His landline rang. "Call me when you get this," he said, and picked up. "Crawford."

The panic in Marissa's voice drilled an ice pick of dread into his chest. She was talking so fast he could barely understand a word she was saying. He pitched his voice low and calm as he interrupted her.

"Hold on. Slow down. Tell me again what happened."

"It's Kelly," Marissa said. "Kelly's gone."

Seth slumped back in his chair. Seriously? The odds of two girls disappearing from the same family were slim to none. After fighting with her mother, Kelly was probably out blowing off steam. Quite likely Marissa was overacting. Still, he couldn't ignore the situation.

"Tell me everything."

He closed his eyes and listened intently while Marissa relayed the events since he'd left her house a few hours ago.

"What's her cell phone number?"

Seth scribbled the number down on a note pad and made her promise to call if anything changed. He grabbed his car keys and headed for the door.

• • • •

THE KITCHEN SMELLED like Pine-Sol and cigarettes. Marissa's red-rimmed eyes looked huge and frightened in her pale face, and Seth followed her down the hallway to the back of the house, where the bedrooms were located.

The door to Kelly's bedroom yawned open. The dove-gray walls were covered with posters. Above the bed hung a framed picture of a gothic angel, ragged white wings against a stormy purple-and-black sky. Laptop and books on the desk. Clothes on the floor. Messy. A typical kid's room.

Seth scanned the room slowly, methodically, not wanting to miss a single detail.

"She's not answering her phone," Marissa said.

She stood close to him, looking small and frightened. He looked past her, his gaze darting to the window. He stepped over Kelly's orange backpack, pulled the sleeve of his leather jacket up over his hand, and slid the window wide. The peeling paint on the white frame didn't look damaged. There were no locks on the window, and it didn't look as if it had been jimmed from the outside.

"Is there anything missing?" he asked.

"No. I don't know. I . . ."

"Has she ever taken off before?"

Seth heard a choking sound and he turned. Marissa's hand covered her mouth. Tears streamed unchecked down her cheeks. He sighed. He rounded the bed and clasped her shaking shoulders in his hands.

"It's going to be okay," he said. "We'll find her."

Marissa's head tipped forward, falling softly against his chest, and nestled in the curve of his shoulder like it belonged there.

She smelled like lilacs in springtime. It had been so long since he'd held a woman. Not since his wife. The heat of her body against him stirred long-dormant feelings in him, and he knew this was wrong. He knew he should let her go, but he didn't want to. His fingers burrowed into her silky hair, and he breathed in the sweet floral scent of her for a few seconds more. Finally he gripped Marissa's shoulders and eased her away.

She swiped her eyes. Mascara smudged the backs of her shaking hands. Seth turned away, searching for a box of tissues. Spying one on the desk, he plucked two and handed them to her.

"I'm sorry. I'm usually not this much of a mess . . ."

The phone rang, cutting her off.

The color drained from her face. Seth grabbed the cordless phone off Kelly's desk and hit the talk button.

"Hello," he said.

"May I speak to Marissa?"

It was a man's voice. His eyes swung toward Marissa. She looked as stiff as a statue, with her hand clamped over her mouth, as if stifling a scream.

"And you are?"

"Logan Rooney."

Marissa splashed cold water on her face. The faucet hissed as she met her stare in the mirror. She looked like hell. Pale. Frightened. Dark circles puffed like bruises beneath her eyes. After turning the water off, she grabbed the white hand towel and dried her skin. She folded the towel neatly and hung it on the rack beside the handmade glass sink.

Kelly was hiding upstairs, afraid to face her, and Marissa felt like the worst parent in the world. She'd failed Kelly, and her daughter had run straight to the one person she still trusted. Logan.

Emerging from the bathroom, she smelled the faint scent of flowers and honey, a sure sign that Logan had brewed some chamomile tea—something to soothe her frayed nerves. But her nerves weren't just frayed; they were ragged, more in need of Valium than tea.

Logan leaned against the counter, his tanned arms folded. He looked fresh, like he'd just finished a game of tennis at the club, while she looked like she'd been dragged through the wringer.

"Are you okay?" he asked.

Marissa squelched an absurd urge to laugh, scream, cry. No, she wasn't okay. She was nowhere close to okay. Her life was a mess.

"Any news on Brooke?"

She shook her head.

"Oh, Marissa. I'm so sorry."

Logan poured them each a mug of tea and sat down at the dining room table. Marissa perched on the chair and wrapped her chilled fingers around the steaming glass mug, wishing the tea were something stronger.

Everywhere she looked she saw the elegant trappings of the life she'd left behind. The sleek modern furniture. The gleaming bamboo floors. The small telltale signs of luxury her new life no longer afforded.

No wonder Kelly resented her.

And as much as she didn't want to drag Logan into their drama, Kelly had given her no choice.

"I suppose Kelly told you what happened."

"She said some girls attacked her at school."

"I had to go to the police station to pick her up. She had a knife."

Logan landed the first blow.

"She must have been really scared to have brought a knife to school."

Marissa winced. Leave it to him to consider Kelly's motivations while she'd just gone postal.

"Yeah, and I yelled at her," Marissa admitted, regretting her choices. Hating herself.

"Don't be too hard on yourself. I don't know how you're holding it together."

Logan placed his hand on her arm. While part of her wanted someone to lean on, she couldn't forget the reasons she'd left. Marissa straightened away, and Logan's hand fell back to the table.

"She's probably going to be expelled."

"I'd like to help," he said at last.

"Help? How?"

"Let Kelly stay with me for a while. I'll call the school, see if I can smooth things over."

Gentleness was Logan's weapon of choice, and it had always been her undoing. Marissa wished it could be that easy. She needed help. Crawford had said that just a few short hours ago and he was right. She did need help. But Logan?

“I can’t let Kelly go. We’re family. We have to find a way to work things out. She’s my daughter, Logan, and you’re just . . .”

“Your ex,” he finished for her, looking resigned.

“She’s not your daughter.”

“You’ve said that already. Look, there’s no way you can handle everything yourself.”

“And you think you can? You think being a single parent is easy? You think . . . ?”

Marissa stopped herself. None of this was Logan’s fault. All he wanted to do was help, and here she was yelling at him, her anger and fear pouring out in a torrent of ugly words.

Damn Logan for being so sane. Damn him for being so . . . so right.

“Mom.”

Kelly appeared at the bottom of the staircase.

Marissa sprang to her feet and threw her arms around Kelly, never wanting to let go. Kelly hesitated. Slowly her arms circled around Marissa’s back.

“Thank God you’re okay.”

With Marissa’s arm still looped around Kelly’s shoulders, they walked side by side back to the table. Kelly sat between her and Logan. Marissa wanted to speak, but she held back, remembering Detective Crawford’s advice.

Just listen.

It sounded easier than it actually was. There was so much she wanted to say. Even so, she waited.

“I’m sorry I left without telling you. I just needed someone to talk to.”

The words landed like a punch to the gut.

“Why don’t you tell your mom what you told me?” Logan prompted softly.

Kelly swallowed. She stole a quick glance at Logan, who nodded reassuringly, before she spoke.

“Mom, I can’t go back to that school. Those girls . . . I don’t think today’s the end of it. I don’t know how they’re going to react. It will be worse next time. I know it. Then there’s Brooke. You have to help find her. You can’t do that if you’re worried about me.”

Dread settled at the pit of Marissa’s stomach. She knew where this was going. Kelly was building a case, and as much as she wanted to, Marissa couldn’t argue the facts. Kelly wasn’t safe at school and would quite likely be expelled. And with Brooke missing . . .

“I want to stay here for a while. At least until we figure out the school situation. I think it would be best for everyone.”

If she let Kelly go now, would she ever come back? It was an impossible choice. Bone-tired, Marissa turned her gaze on Logan.

“What about your job?”

“I’ll take time off,” he said. “Look, I know you’re still angry with me, Marissa, but please let me help. I can’t help you find Brooke, but I can be here for Kelly. I can do this, if you let me.”

She knew Logan was sincere. She knew staying here was probably the best thing for Kelly right now. Still, she couldn’t stand the thought of going back to that house. Alone. She’d go crazy. All of those silent hours to fill while she waited for some break in Brooke’s case, for some word about whether her daughter was alive or dead. But that was selfish.

She stared into Kelly’s hopeful face. Years flashed by in an instant—teddy bears and pigtails, lesson books and skinned knees—a lifetime full of memories.

“You can stay,” she whispered.

“Thank you, Mom.”

Kelly threw both arms around Marissa, and they held on to each other for a long moment. Finally Marissa pulled back and cleared her throat.

“Honey, I need to speak to Logan. Alone.”

“Okay,” she said. Kelly wiped the tears from her eyes and cast a quick glance over her shoulder before climbing the staircase.

“I’ll do this, Logan,” she said, once Kelly was out of earshot, “but you have to tell her the truth.”

A pained expression crossed Logan’s face. He closed his eyes and slowly nodded.

“I’ll tell her everything,” he promised.

East of the highway, the crumbling forestry roads were bumpy and slick. He turned off the radio, needing to focus. The headlights cast a narrow band of light, showing the way ahead as he wound his way toward the valley floor. He parked down at the main camp, not daring to drive all the way in. It was too wet down here. Getting stuck would spell disaster. It wasn't like he could just call AAA for a tow.

The heaving engine died. He pulled the key from the ignition and stepped out of the vehicle.

The woods came alive at night. As far back as he could remember, he'd loved the smell of pine trees in the cold air. Slinging the strap of the cooler across his shoulder, he gripped the flashlight in his hand but didn't turn it on. The dark welcomed him like a friend, enveloping him like a thick black cloak as he walked through the trees by memory.

The spongy earth dampened the sound of his boots, and with each step his anticipation grew. Each sense was heightened, which made him feel more awake, more alive. Darkness unfurled inside him. Out here he didn't have to hide who he was. Out here he was God. He held the power of life and death in his hands. The more they begged, pleaded, prayed, the more he liked it. Fear was addictive. Fear was power. Fear was a chalice full of tears, salty and delicious on his tongue. And once he had tasted it, there was nothing else like it in the whole world.

Rain fell through the trees in an ancient rhythm, an atonal symphony as old as the forest. Halfway through the stand of trees, he heard a noise behind him—a discordant note in an otherwise perfect movement. He stopped. Without the flashlight it was impossible to see more than a few feet in any direction. He turned and listened. Ears strained.

The trees rustled in the wind.

It was probably just an animal looking for food, maybe a deer. Winter was closing in. Any day now the snow would start flying, choking off the forestry roads, and hunting season would end.

He heard the noise again and picked up the pace, knowing full well he wasn't the only dangerous thing out here. A wolf's keen sense of smell would pick up on the food in the cooler in no time. Best get moving. There were two girls waiting for him—one whose time was coming to an end, and the other whose time was just beginning.

The dense line of evergreens broke up ahead. He could make out the shadowy forms of the cabins in the distance and he felt himself stir.

A week, maybe two, then he'd have to give up the game. The new one wouldn't last very long, but tonight . . . tonight was his. Tonight he would get everything he wanted, and the other girl would get to watch. Learn. See the kind of fun she was in for before the grand finale.

The porch floorboards creaked beneath the tread of his heavy boots. He stuck the key in the lock. He felt the slow, grinding clack of the metal lock disengaging.

Darkness engulfed the cabin. He swung the beam of his flashlight around the room, illuminating the small space in bright slices of light.

His heart lurched. The cooler clattered to his feet, spilling water bottles and plastic-wrapped sandwiches across the bare plank floor.

“Jesus Christ,” he roared, not believing his eyes. “Jesus fucking Christ.”

Kim's lifeless body hung from a six-inch nail protruding from a beam. How? How the hell had she done it? Then he saw. The gag. The fucking gag. The other bitch must have worked the gag from Kim's mouth, and Kim had used it as a noose.

But how? How had she gotten all the way up there? She must have climbed up on the bed, hooked the noose around the nail and then let go.

Son of a fucking bitch.

His heart slammed like a jackhammer against his rib cage. He cast his wild gaze around the room until he found her. Crouched underneath a blanket—thinking what? He wouldn't see her? She was safe? Fuck that.

He'd give her a wake-up call she wouldn't soon forget.

He marched across the room, heavy boots booming against the wood floor, and thrust his hand into the mop of yellow hair. Teeth clenched tight, he yanked her to her feet. She cried out, a feeble, pathetic cry. Pain. Terror. He didn't care which.

All at once she sprang to life. Like a feral cat, she dug at his hands with her nails. Finding skin. Ripping. Slashing. He hissed.

Breath heaved from his lungs and he dragged her across the floor. Not caring if he ripped every last hair out of her stupid fucking head. His fingers dug into the soft flesh of her chin, and he wrenched her jaw up high until she was staring at Kim's lifeless form.

"See what you did? See what you did? This is your fault. All your fault, you stupid fucking bitch."

He curled his fist and let fly. As his knuckles struck flesh, his ring ripped her skin—a bright-red gash across her cheek. She cried out, dropping to her knees, palms pressed to her face. Hot sticky blood flowed down her white skin.

She raised her hands to shield her head. He batted them away and cold-cocked her. One fierce blow to her head sent her reeling to the floor. She landed in a heap.

He kicked the cooler with all his might. It flew into the air and exploded against the wall with an earsplitting crack. Chunks of plastic rained down on the floor below. He swung back toward the girl, but she was out. A dark bruise bloomed against her pale forehead, and he wanted to hit her again. He wanted to keep hitting her until the anger ebbed from his veins, but what good would that do?

She looked like her whore of a mother and he wanted to make her suffer. She'd pay for fucking up his plans.

But not yet.

Grabbing the insulin pen off the floor, he spun the dial and plunged the needle into her leg. He pressed down on the dispenser and heard it click. Shot complete, he pulled it out, replaced the lid and dropped it to the floor. That should last her for a while.

He reached out and yanked the chain around her neck. The MedicAlert dog tags broke off in his hand. He stuffed them in his pocket.

Turning back toward the bed, he stared at Kim hanging from the rafters.

He ground his teeth together and thought about the duffel bag in the back of the cargo hold.

Then he got to work.

Marissa arrived home to a dark house. A blistering headache pounded behind her eyes. She hadn't eaten since early that morning, and she knew her body needed food. But eating was the last thing Marissa wanted to do. With her stomach tied in knots, she didn't think she could keep anything down.

Too tired to bother turning on the lights, she shuffled into the bedroom and stripped off her clothes. Marissa let them fall to the floor and slid sideways onto the bed. She prayed sleep would come, ending this hellish day.

Her head throbbed to the slow beat of her pulse. Her eyes opened in the dark, and she stared sightlessly at the ceiling. In the silence of the empty house, the day's events replayed in her mind like a trailer for a Lifetime movie. Brooke's face on the missing-person poster. The call from the school. Kelly's bruised face. And Logan.

The bed felt like a metal slab, and she rolled over onto her side, drawing her knees toward her chest. Rain pounded down on the roof, and Marissa shivered, shrouding herself in the comforter.

She tried to empty her mind, but dark thoughts flew through her brain like a flock of ravens, spiraling and twisting—dragging her to deeper and more dismal places than she'd ever been. Every mistake. Every bad moment she'd ever experienced replayed in her mind like the highlight reel of a wasted life.

Like getting pregnant at sixteen and dropping out of high school. Like everyone looking at her as if she were some kind of slut. Like her mother kicking her out of the house, saying that God would never forgive her sins. Like her back killing her after a nine-hour shift at 7-Eleven—her swollen belly sticking out for everyone to see. Like Jason screwing some waitress down at the sports bar and leaving her when Kelly was just a baby.

Rick crying after he'd hit her the first time and her forgiving him because she was stupid—because the one thing she wanted more than anything was a family. Marrying Logan, believing she'd found a happy ending at last and that she and her daughters would be safe.

All lies.

Exhaustion and sorrow pressed down on her heart, black and choking. She couldn't make it through another day. Another day of waiting for the phone to ring. For Crawford to find Brooke. For Kelly to come home. For Elizabeth to fire her. Another day of waiting to lose everything she'd fought so hard to keep.

You reap what you sow, her mother had said, quoting Bible verses while Marissa stood pregnant with her suitcase in hand, tears streaming down her face.

Maybe her mother had been right. Maybe she deserved all the shitty things that had happened to her. Her whole life was falling apart around her, again, and it was all her fault. Again.

Her mistakes.

Her bad choices.

Alone in the house with no one to hear, she let loose a torrent of tears into her pillow until there was nothing left but the rain outside, the darkness all around, and the pounding inside her head.

Three in the morning and sleep eluded her, withholding reprieve from her pain. Marissa rose from the bed and staggered down the hall, thinking that maybe if she could stop the headache, sleep would come.

A bottle of Excedrin Migraine sat on the middle shelf of the medicine cabinet, and she reached for it. Her hand stalled in midair. Beside the bottle of Excedrin sat a little orange vial of pills.

Sleeping pills. The ones her doctor had prescribed for her after the split with Logan. She plucked the bottle from the shelf and shook it. Then she twisted off the lid and dumped the contents into her hand. Tiny white pills filled her palm. She stared at the perfect white disks, transfixed, and counted each one.

Fourteen.

In the silence of the house, she heard her mother's voice whispering about how she'd failed. How she would never get her daughters back. How God would punish her for her sins. How she deserved this for being wicked. Sinful. How every bad thing that had ever happened was her fault. Her fault.

She looked down at the pills in her hand and swallowed.

Were fourteen pills enough?

Marissa closed her eyes.

Letting go would be so easy.

No more pain. Or worry. No more heartbreak or sorrow. No more fear. Or shame. Nothing. Just release.

No one would miss her. The world would be a better place without her.

Marissa opened her eyes and gripped the tap with a shaking hand. Water hissed into the stained porcelain sink. She grabbed a nearby glass, filled it with water, and stared at the pills—so shiny and white and perfect in her palm.

Peering into the bathroom mirror, Marissa saw her mother's hard face staring back. Her lips twisted into a pained smile.

She raised the glass, fingers curling around the pills in her hand.

No sign of dawn in the sky. Close to 4:00 a.m. and the rain continued to pound down, soaking the Seattle streets. He'd rather be sleeping right now, but thanks to that brainless bitch Kim, he had more work to do.

North of the city, he circled the winding suburbs of Shoreline. He knew all about Charles Sully and the incident at the bar. No doubt Brooke Parker's stupid little roommate had already blabbed to the police, making his job easier.

So he'd spent time learning what he could about the prick. Tracking his online boot-prints wasn't hard. Between Facebook and Twitter, he knew Sully was obsessed with muscle cars and porn. No shock there. A little more digging had revealed the name of the construction firm Sully worked for, as well as the locations of his last few job sites. A criminal background check courtesy of another online service confirmed Sully had a record and had served time for domestic violence.

If Sully wasn't the police's main suspect in Brooke's disappearance, he would be soon. Windshield wipers frantically swiped the hard rain from the windshield while he circled the block where Sully lived—looking for any signs of life in the dead of night. He didn't know if Sully was being watched, so he'd set a diversion to draw any unnecessary attention away from Sully's building.

Gasoline fumes clung to his black leather gloves. He had set a fire two blocks away.

Fire reminded him of who he was and where he had come from. Two boys. One can of gasoline and a blazing garage fire. How he'd loved watching the orange flames arc into the dark night. Two boys, only one of whom had paid for their crime, while the other got off scot-free.

But here's the thing. Karma's a bitch.

Karma caught up with everyone sooner or later. So while one boy paid for burning down the garage by spending two years in juvenile detention, the other didn't pay for a long time. In the end, though, everyone paid. The second boy had paid with his life. Karma was coming, and tonight was Charles Sully's night.

Glancing at the clock, he shook off the thought. He had to remain sharp. Before long all the little rats would awaken and get ready for another day in the maze. He was already pushing his luck, and Kim had made his job harder. In two short hours he needed to be tucked into bed beside his girlfriend.

He pulled off the quiet street into Sully's apartment complex.

Sully's car was easy to find. The dick-wad took more pictures of his precious car than of his girlfriend. Near the back of the lot, the bastard had straddled the line, taking up two spots beneath one of four streetlights.

At least Sully had backed in. He'd caught a break there. He angled into the spot beside the Super Bee, backing in so the two vehicles were trunk-to-trunk.

The air was heavy with the scent of rain, pine trees, and engine oil. Cold fingers of rain ran off the peak of his Seahawks cap, down the collar of his jacket.

He rounded the back of the vehicle and opened the cargo hold. He shifted the duffel bag out of the way and grasped the nylon tool kit he'd brought along.

The blinking red light on the Super Bee's dash warned him the alarm was set. The alarm didn't worry him though. You could learn a lot of skills in juvie. Breaking into cars was just one of the many things he'd learned to do while locked up with a bunch of underage felons.

The trunk lid popped open. He glanced back up at the apartment building. Yellow light spilled from more windows. Damned Boeing workers and their early-morning shifts.

He lifted the trunk lid wide, and his heart jolted as he peered inside.

What the fuck?

Hot sweat popped on his forehead, mingling with the cold rain. The unmistakable smell of death wafted up from Sully's trunk. She looked small—not much bigger than a child. If it weren't for the girl's waxy pallor, she might be sleeping.

Charles Sully was a very bad boy indeed, and now his plan was no longer simple. He supposed he could close the trunk and find someplace else to dump his body. But where was the fun in that?

He glanced up at the apartment building. Another light flickered on as fire engines and police flocked to the dumpster fire a few blocks away.

Ticktock. Time to move.

He hefted the duffel bag out of the cargo hold and set it on the pavement behind Sully's car. Then, reaching into Sully's trunk, he scooped up the dead girl. She felt light in his arms. He laid her in the back of his vehicle, placing her carefully on the tarp. Then he covered her with the ends, hiding her away from prying eyes.

The tailgate closed with a soft thump. Working fast, he muscled the duffel bag into Sully's trunk. He pulled Brooke's MedicAlert dog tags out of his pocket and tossed them in. The lid slammed down hard. The car horn blared.

Fucking hell.

He spied a large, jagged rock at the edge of the lot, back where the asphalt met the grass. He grabbed it and with one vicious throw heaved it at Sully's car. Glass rained down on the parking lot and crunched beneath his feet as he ran back to his vehicle.

He landed behind the wheel and pulled out onto the street. Half a block away, he glanced in his rearview mirror.

Blue and red lights flashed behind him.

He drove slowly through the neighborhood, stopping at a red light. The police cruiser turned left into Sully's complex. He grinned. The light turned green and he eased through the intersection.

The interstate loomed ahead. South of Shoreline, city lights glittered in the gloom. He couldn't go home. Not yet. Thanks to Charles fucking Sully, he had more work to do. And daylight was fast approaching. He had to make it home before his girlfriend awoke.

First he had to dump his cargo. But where?

He thought about all the things he'd learned about Sully—where he lived, where he worked, and where he played.

Then he knew.

Charles Sully awoke to the sound of sirens blaring. He bolted upright in bed, his heart beating faster than a 486 Hemi.

Beside him Lara rolled on her back.

“What time is it?” she yawned, rubbing her eyes.

“Early. Go back to sleep.”

Sully pulled on a discarded pair of boxer shorts. A sharp stab of fear cut through him as he jogged through the dark apartment, catching his leg on the corner of the coffee table. He swore under his breath but kept going. The patio door overlooking the parking lot loomed dead ahead.

A police cruiser was parked beside his car, lights flashing.

Sully froze. His chest constricted, making it difficult to breathe. He knew what was in that trunk. If they looked inside, he was fucked.

“What’s going on?”

Lara’s voice jolted him into action. He limped through the living room, jostling Lara on his way past.

“Jesus, Carlos. What the hell?”

In the darkened bedroom, he ignored the blood seeping down his leg and pulled on the same jeans and shirt he’d worn to the bar the night before. Stale beer and cigarette smoke clung to the soiled fabric. In his haste he slid his bare feet into his boots and grabbed the car keys off the nightstand. He was almost out of the room when he remembered.

He yanked the nightstand drawer open, grabbed the gun, and stuffed it into the waistband of his jeans.

Lara was yelling at him, but he couldn’t hear what she was saying over the buzz in his head. It didn’t matter. He had to get out of here. Now.

Sully snapped the lock open and jerked the door.

A beefy police officer filled the doorway.

“You Charles Sully?” he asked.

Sully nodded, running a hand through his tousled hair.

“Yes, sir.”

“Come with me.”

“What’s going on?” Lara called from behind, rubbing her massive belly like it hurt.

“Ma’am, are you okay?”

“You try carrying a bowling ball around in your uterus for seven months and tell me how good you feel.”

The officer preceded Sully down the hallway. Doors were opening, and the faces of his nosy neighbors peeked out. He could feel their judgmental stares follow him down the hall.

They took the elevator down to the first floor. Sully’s shirt clung to his clammy skin. The cold metal of the gun dug into his hip. His hand snaked around his back, reaching for the gun. Just then the door opened and another cop entered the building. Sully cringed, silently swearing, allowing his hand to swing back to his side. He was too late.

“Officer, what’s going on?” Lara panted behind them.

Sully cringed. Why couldn’t the fat fucking bitch stay in the apartment and mind her own goddamned business? What was she doing out here?

Now. He had to do something now while he still could. Once they saw what was in the trunk, it was all over.

“Ma’am, it appears there’s been a car prowler.”

Sully stopped. Lara ran into his back.

“Carlos!” Lara complained. Sully ignored her.

“Someone broke into the car?”

“That’s what it looks like.”

Like coolant filling a dry radiator shaft, relief flooded through Sully.

“If you’d come with us, sir, we can write up the report and get out of here.”

Charles followed along, able to breathe normally now. Lara was still yapping, but he kept his eyes on the officer ahead.

The officer made small talk with Lara, something about a rash of robberies in the neighborhood. Sully wasn’t paying them much mind. He just wanted to get the cops away from his car as soon as humanly possible, before this whole situation blew up in his face.

“You’re lucky. We were nearby,” the cop said.

“Why’s that?”

“Some asshole set a dumpster on fire a few blocks down.”

“This neighborhood just gets worse and worse. You know they found a dead hooker in the dumpster by the 7-Eleven. Awful place to raise a baby. I keep telling Carlos we should move, but . . .”

Sully clenched his teeth, wishing she’d shut up as he exited the building. But she didn’t. Lara kept on yammering. The cop seemed good-natured about it though. There was another cop shining a flashlight into the backseat of his car. Tension coiled inside Sully, but he forced himself to stay cool and to keep walking.

It took forever to cross the parking lot. Fat pelts of rain pattered on his head. Oblivious to the cold, Sully’s mind whirled. If he could just give a quick statement, the police would fuck off and he’d be fine. Fine.

“Oh, Carlos, your window,” Lara said.

The driver’s side window was shattered.

“Fuck,” he muttered, loud enough that the cop turned.

“Expensive to replace?”

Sully nodded. He glanced toward the trunk. Rain soaked his shirt, hiding the sweat stains.

“If you could take a look, Mr. Sully, to see if there’s anything missing, we’ll write up our report and be on our way.”

“Don’t bother. I can file a report later.”

The cop shrugged. “We’re here. Might as well do it now.” He turned toward his partner. “Any other cars hit?”

“Not so far,” the other cop called back.

“Looks like you’re the lucky one,” the cop said, turning back toward Sully. “Let’s take a look.”

The cop approached the car and peered inside. The other cop, the one with the flashlight, circled to the back. Sully’s throat constricted.

“Want to open her up to see if there’s anything missing?”

“Nah, it’s okay,” Sully said again. His pulse rate spiked.

“Chulito, you spent a fortune on that stereo. Why don’t you do what the officer said and take a look?”

A streak of white-hot fury shot through Sully, and he just barely stopped himself from lashing out at her. Shut up. Shut up. Shut up. He could handle this if she just . . .

“Mr. Sully?”

The cop was eyeing him now with that look that cops get. Suspicious. Accusatory. He’d seen it before. He had no choice. He fingered the car keys in his pocket and thought about the gun.

With a slight shake of his head, Sully wrenched the keys from his pocket. He opened the car door and slid the key into the ignition. The alarm died. He glanced around. The stereo was still there. Nothing had been touched, as far as he could see.

“It’s good,” he said, easing his torso out of the car.

“Dave,” the cop behind the car said, and nodded toward the trunk. The tone of the man’s voice signaled a warning.

Sully straightened. The cop was eyeing him harder now. One hand near his hip. Inches away from the holstered Glock at his side. Beads of sweat trickled down Sully’s forehead.

“Could you open the trunk, Mr. Sully?”

“You got a warrant?” Sully asked.

The cop’s eyes darted to his partner, then back to Sully’s sweating face. His dark eyes were cold and hard as marbles. Sully’s heart throbbed. This was it. They knew. Somehow. They knew. He was fucked. His kid was fucked. He’d spend the rest of his life trapped behind bars like his father.

No.

Sully grabbed a fistful of Lara’s sleep-mussed hair. He jerked her hard toward him. She stumbled a few steps, let out a yowl, and crumpled to her knees on the rain-soaked asphalt.

With the other hand, he pulled the gun from the waistband of his jeans. He jammed the muzzle hard against her temple.

Seth's heart boomed in his chest. He thrashed in the sweat-soaked sheets. Underneath his splayed hand, the green door was hot to the touch. In the far-off distance, he heard the wail of sirens, the bleat of horns. Help was on the way. But they were too late. Orange flames lapped at the windows, and Seth knew they wouldn't get here in time. He'd stood right here staring at the door more times than he could count, and they never made it in time.

She was in there.

Tendrils of smoke streamed through the cracks around the door. Sheer panic took hold, and with one vicious blow, Seth drove his shoulder into the green door. A white-hot flare of pain shot through him as the door splintered. He stepped through. Sharp spikes of wood clawed his skin, and he stumbled inside the burning house.

The roar of the fire was deafening. He swung his head wildly from side to side, desperate to find her. Smoke filled his lungs and he coughed. Burying his nose and mouth in the crook of his elbow, he dove deeper into the flames.

"Holly!" he yelled.

No answer. All he could hear was the sounds of the house dying around him. Light bulbs popped. Picture frames fell. Glass shattered. Bright-orange flames slithered up the walls. The heat was unbearable, like the fires of hell. He screamed her name.

Racing through the living room, he spotted a figure slumped on the floor. Holly lay wedged between the sofa and the coffee table. He sprinted toward her. Seth fell to his knees and turned her over.

He stared into her upturned face.

And his heart stopped. His hands jerked away. Marissa's dead blue eyes stared up at him like the sightless eyes of a broken doll.

Seth started awake. A jarring buzz sounded close to his ear. It was still pitch-dark in his bedroom, and he was woefully short on sleep. He heard the buzz again, and his cell phone shimmied an inch or two across the wooden nightstand. He fumbled for it. In the dark his outstretched fingers sent the alarm clock clattering to the hardwood floor.

"Shit," he muttered, rolling over, his fingers finally grasping the phone. "Crawford."

"You're going to want to hear this."

The voice was unmistakable. It was Lieutenant Alvarez. Seth ran a hand across his eyes, trying to shake off the remnants of the horrific nightmare. His thoughts snapped to Brooke Parker, and a half-dozen scenarios flashed through his head. All bad. All ending in a trip to the morgue.

"What is it?"

"Charles Sully is holding his girlfriend hostage. SWAT's been deployed."

The words hit Seth like a shock wave, bringing everything into sudden, painful focus, and he remembered Dr. Jain's warning. Sully was like a volcano ready to explode.

"What happened?"

"You'd better get down here. Now."

"Text me the address. I'm on my way."

Seth groaned. The heavy rain clattered against the roof. Oh-dark-thirty, and there was no hint of light in the sky. He flicked on the bedside lamp. If there was any consolation for spending his nights alone, it was times like this, when he was the only one jolted awake by a shrieking phone call.

He glanced over at what should have been Holly's side of the bed. The sheets lay cold and empty and untouched while his were a damp, tangled mess. He remembered Holly—the way the room held her scent, soft and rich and floral. He remembered the sound of her deep, steady breathing as she slept beside him and how he used to tell her she purred. A pang of loss and longing filled him. His fingers grazed the rosy scars along his cheek.

The phone chirped, pulling him back into the moment. A text message flashed on the screen. This was his reality. He'd earned this, Seth thought bitterly. Resigned to his fate, he reached down to the floor and pulled on the clothes he had shed just a few short hours ago.

• • • •

THE PREDAWN AIR SMELLED like car exhaust and bacon grease. A line of squad cars set the perimeter. Blue and red lights flashed in the muddy gray dawn. News trucks parked hastily on the far side of the street. Held back behind a series of folding white gates, neighbors gathered to watch the spectacle.

A quick flash of his badge and a cop waved Seth through the barricade. He caught sight of a familiar face in the crowd. Officer Pete Morris, recently assigned to SWAT, was approaching the scene on foot. Seth jogged to catch up to him.

“What's going on?”

“Crazy fucker snapped. He's holding a pregnant woman hostage.”

“Aw, shit.”

Seth cringed. Cold rain pelted his hair and ran down his neck like an icy torrent of tears. From across the parking lot, he could hear Sully yelling. Although the words were indistinct, he recognized the tone. Panic. Rage.

“That him?”

“Yeah.”

“Who's the negotiator?”

“Phelps. He's getting nowhere though. We're going tactical.”

“Fucking shit,” Seth muttered.

“You said it. Happy Friday,” Morris grumbled, and strode off toward the command center.

Alvarez spotted him and broke away from the tight knot of high-ranking officers huddled around the SWAT commander.

“What happened?”

“Officers were leaving the scene of a dumpster fire and responded to a car alarm. It's a high-crime area. Extra patrols every night just trying to get on top of things. Anyway, they heard a car alarm, figured it was a prowler. It was Sully's car. When they brought him outside to check out the vehicle, he freaked.”

“Do we know why?”

Even before he asked the question, Seth feared he knew the answer.

“We think there's something in the trunk.”

“Do we know what it is?”

Alvarez shook his head. Rain droplets were flung off the ends of his spiky black hair. “He grabbed his girlfriend, Lara Menendez.”

“Shit.” Seth groaned and wiped the rain from his face. “SWAT's going in?”

Tendrils of dread slithered loose in Seth's gut, like a writhing nest of pit vipers. He glanced at the Dodge Super Bee's unopened trunk. Whatever Sully had hidden inside was worth trading off not only his girlfriend's life but the life of their unborn child. His thoughts flashed to Brooke Parker. Was he going to have to tell Marissa her daughter was dead?

Alvarez shrugged.

"He's highly agitated. There's no telling what he'll do."

"We've got to keep him alive. If he's got Brooke, he's our only link to finding her."

"I know."

"Can I talk to Sully?"

Alvarez paused, weighing the request.

"This isn't our dance," he said, his expression grave.

"I know him. Maybe I can get through to him."

"We can't afford for this to go south."

"It won't," Seth said with more confidence than he felt.

Alvarez sighed. "Let me see what I can do."

He turned away from Seth and returned to the command squad. The SWAT leader shot Seth a dubious glance. Alvarez's large hands flew out in exasperation. The SWAT commander fisted his hands on his narrow hips. Twitchy as a spider, Seth pulled out his cell phone and called Dr. Jain.

"Crawford. This better be good," Rahul Jain growled into the phone.

"Sully's on television."

"Sweet Jesus."

"SWAT's going to take him out if we can't talk him down. I need your help."

"Okay. Tell me."

Seth briefed Jain with what little information he had. Jain didn't interrupt. When Seth was finished, he swore again.

"Sully's a powder keg and they've lit the fuse."

"How do we stop it?"

"The baby. Focus on the baby. Tell Sully he doesn't want his child to grow up without a father like he did. His child can have a better life, but only if he makes the right choice. You've got to clear the scene, Seth. SWAT steps in and you give Sully no choice."

"I know."

"Do you want me to come down there?"

"Couldn't hurt."

"Okay. Where?"

"Turn on the news. You'll find us."

Just as Seth hung up, Alvarez broke away from the command squad and marched back toward him. Alvarez shook his head. Seth's stomach dropped.

"I just got off the phone with Dr. Jain, and he said . . ."

"They're going tactical."

"No. Listen, I have an idea. Just let me talk to him . . ."

"Are you fucking deaf?" Alvarez snapped.

Seth's hands clenched into fists, and he fought to control the anger that bubbled up inside him.

"If we push him, he's going to go off."

"It's out of our hands."

"Fuck."

He wanted to drive his fist into the lieutenant's face and keep hitting him until he didn't get up. He was so fucking sick of the bureaucratic bullshit. Of the politics. Of all of it. Half of him wanted to disobey orders, stride into the scene, and talk Sully down. The other part of him wanted to shove his badge down Alvarez's throat and walk away.

As frustrated as he had sometimes been over his many years with the force, he had never once even considered walking away. Sully's yelling snapped him back into the moment.

Seth stepped closer to the perimeter. Alvarez's hand grabbed his arm. Seth shook him off. He pushed as close to the perimeter as he dared. His eyes fixed on the horrific scene unfolding.

Floodlights illuminated the far corner of the parking lot. Sully stood feet away from the bright-green Super Bee. His girlfriend, Lara, was slumped on the ground at Sully's feet. Seth's gut twisted. She was quite far along in her pregnancy, about seven months.

All he could think about was the baby in Lara's belly. Ten fingers and toes. A little boy or girl who didn't even have a name yet.

Sully was a man unhinged. His broad chest heaved beneath the soaked T-shirt. A combination of sweat and rain beaded on his wide forehead. His red face contorted with rage. Sully yanked Lara's hair. Her head snapped back. Seth heard her cry out. Pain. Fear. Tears streamed down her face.

Seth's eyes fixed on the muzzle of the gun pressed tightly against Lara's head. All the tension he felt was reflected on the thin, taut features of Phelps, the police negotiator.

"If you do this, Charles," Phelps called, his voice echoing across the parking lot, "there's no going back. I can help you, but only if you put down the gun."

"Help me?" Sully scoffed. "How many red dots do I have on my fucking chest? How many? Ten? Twenty? I lower my gun and you blow my fucking brains out."

"We don't want to shoot you, Charles. We want everyone to come out of this safely—you, Lara and the baby."

Sully wasn't stupid. He knew what was at stake. Seth wished Dr. Jain were here. He wished he had a chance to talk Sully down. Phelps extended a hand toward Sully in a slow-down gesture.

"Just lower your gun, Charles, and let Lara go. Let your son live."

Seth's breath caught. He leaned toward Alvarez.

"The baby. Yes. Phelps has to focus in on the baby. Dr. Jain thinks it's the only way to get to him."

Alvarez muttered into his radio. Phelps touched a finger to his ear.

"Your son, Charles. Think about him," Phelps said.

The muscles in Sully's jaw bulged, and the crowd held its collective breath. The sound of the rain driving into the asphalt filled the supercharged silence. Seth watched Sully's face for some signal, some sign of hope. Sully stood still as a statue. Seth counted the seconds ticking by.

Finally Sully's shoulders slumped. His chin dropped toward his chest, and the muzzle of Sully's gun lowered, easing away from Lara's temple. Relief flooded Phelps's face. Seth could almost feel tension drain from the crowd. It was going to be all right. Lara and her baby would live.

Then Sully's stance changed. Seth's gut heaved in a sickening twist and he reached for his gun.

Too late.

"My son's not going to jail. Fuck you, cop," Sully screamed.

The sound of the single shot was deafening. A fine mist of blood and brains sprayed across the wet asphalt. Lara's lifeless body crashed to the ground. Behind Seth the crowd screamed. Sully pointed the gun at Phelps. In the next instant, a half-dozen rounds were fired, and Charles Sully landed in a heap.

Screaming. The EMTs rushed in to check on Lara Menendez and Charles Sully. It was a waste of time, Seth knew. They were already dead. What a mess. What a goddamned mess.

"The baby," one of the EMTs yelled.

All medical personnel loaded Lara's prone form onto a gurney and rushed her to an ambulance.

Seth pushed through the crowd, heading toward the Dodge Super Bee.

"We need a crowbar," the uniformed officer closest to the car yelled.

Seth stared at the closed trunk lid. Whatever Sully had stashed inside, he'd been willing to die for it. Chilled by the cold rain, he wiped his face and willed them to hurry the fuck up. He needed to see what was inside. Was it Brooke in there? He'd promised to find her. He'd promised Marissa he'd find her. But not like this. God, not like this.

A uniformed officer wedged the end of the crowbar under the lip of the trunk and heaved. The lock gave way with a pop, and the trunk lid yawned open. Numb, Seth looked inside. A large duffel bag filled the trunk. The rancid smell of rotten meat was unmistakable, and he knew.

A young officer turned and rushed away from the scene. Dimly Seth heard the sound of retching. Seth could tell by the bulging biceps and clenched jaw of the officer heaving the bag from the trunk that it was heavy.

"Good Christ," Alvarez said.

Seth didn't respond. He didn't look over at the lieutenant. His eyes were fixed on the duffel bag. The zipper of the bag purred open.

"Jesus. Fuck," the officer said, and stepped away. Horror and revulsion contorted his face.

Seth looked inside. Was it Brooke? He turned away as he caught sight of the body. The realization struck him like a sucker punch to the gut. There would be no quick identification of the victim. The bitter taste of bile filled Seth's mouth.

"There's something else," said the cop leaning over the trunk.

Seth looked up. Surely this day couldn't get any worse. He turned to look at the object the officer held in his hand, and he realized he'd been wrong.

Things got worse all right. They got a whole lot fucking worse.

Drew eased Alicia's apartment door open. She sat at the table with a cup of coffee in one hand and his cell phone in the other.

"Where have you been?"

She fixed him with a prison guard's stare, and he knew he was in for a blast of shit. What was she doing up so early? She should have been sleeping. Her alarm wasn't set to go off for another hour. But here she was, wide-awake and spitting mad.

"I woke up early and thought I'd get us some croissants for breakfast," he said.

"I don't see a bag. Did you eat them already?"

"The line was out the door, so I thought fuck it."

Alicia arched an eyebrow like she didn't believe him.

Anger rolled like thunder in the pit of his stomach. His hands clenched into fists. Picking a fight with him now was a bad idea. If Alicia knew what was good for her, she'd keep her stupid mouth shut.

"Do you know how odd it feels to wake up and find you gone? I didn't know what to think."

"I couldn't sleep."

He didn't need to explain himself to her. If she was smart, she'd leave it alone. But she didn't. She just kept pushing.

"You're usually such a sound sleeper. What woke you?"

"You snore like a fucking chain saw."

Surely someone had mentioned this before, but looking down into her shocked face, he wondered if all her other lovers had been too polite.

"I do not." Alicia frowned and propped a balled fist beneath her chin.

Drew took a deep, calming breath and lowered his pitch.

"I couldn't sleep so I went out for a walk."

Her eyes brimming with righteous indignation, she glared at him.

"How would you like it if I left in the middle of the night without leaving a note or anything?"

"What exactly did you think I was doing? Out screwing the neighbor or something equally vile?"

It sounded ludicrous when he said it like that, and Alicia's hard expression crumbled. She dropped her gaze and looked contrite.

"I'm sorry. I know it sounds silly, but when I woke up and you weren't there, I was worried."

Drew didn't answer. He stalked into the kitchen and poured himself a mug of hot coffee. God, he needed this—needed something to help get him through the rest of the day. He downed half the mug in silence, then marched out of the room to the shower.

Hot water sprayed his face, and Drew rubbed his eyes, feeling like he hadn't slept in a week.

He propped his hand against the shower stall and dipped his head low. Water sluiced down his back, washing any trace bits of blood and God knew what else off his body.

Last night had been a huge fucking failure. He still couldn't believe Kim had taken the coward's way out and Brooke had done nothing to stop her. Not to mention what that freak Sully had hidden in his trunk. Another complication in what had already been a horrendous night.

But that's what happened when you went off script. You took risks. You fucked up. You got caught.

Back in the living room, Alicia stood staring at the television, coffee cup in hand.

"Have you seen this?"

He glanced at the screen.

The marquee read “Standoff in Shoreline,” and Drew recognized Charles Sully’s apartment building in the background. His arms went slack. A television reporter spoke into the microphone, her expression sober.

“Early this morning, police responded to a hostage situation in Shoreline. Charles Sully held his pregnant girlfriend, Lara Menendez, at gunpoint. The half-hour standoff with police ended in tragedy as Charles Sully shot Ms. Menendez point-blank. Mr. Sully was shot dead at the scene . . .”

Alicia covered her mouth, still staring at the screen.

“My God, Drew, she was pregnant. What kind of monster would kill his girlfriend and his baby?”

That wasn’t all Sully had done, Drew thought as he strode across the room to the table where he’d left his coffee cup. Behind him the reporter droned on.

“Police found the remains of a dead woman in a duffel bag in Sully’s trunk. The identity of the victim is not yet known.”

“How awful,” Alicia said.

Strolling into the kitchen, Drew allowed himself a small smile. That dumb son of a bitch had gotten himself killed. Execution by cop. A fitting end for a fucked-up night. Without Charles Sully alive to testify, everyone would believe he had been responsible for Kim Covey’s murder. And with one of Brooke’s things thrown in for good measure, the case would be closed.

Drew sipped his coffee, feeling suddenly energized. The day might have started off shit, but it was getting better with each passing minute.

Alicia whirled toward him, remote control still in hand. She clicked off the television.

“I can’t believe this city. What’s next?”

“I know. It’s terrible.” Drew draped an arm around Alicia’s shoulders, pulled her close, and pecked her cheek. “I’ll call you later.”

“Okay.”

Grabbing his coat, he stopped just shy of the front door.

This day was going so damned well, he felt like celebrating. Drew thought about the engagement ring in his dresser drawer. He thought about Charles Sully’s explosive exit from this world and how he might not have a luckier day. He turned back toward Alicia.

“Why don’t we go out for dinner tonight? Wear something nice.”

Marissa's cell phone rang. Groaning, she rolled onto her side and plucked it off the nightstand, checking the call display. Her heart lurched.

Kelly.

"Hi, Mom."

The words were like sweet rain on parched earth, soaking into her heart and easing the pain of last night. They spent a few minutes just talking—nothing profound. It was just so good to hear Kelly's voice. Marissa thought about how close she'd come to ending it all. Staring into the bathroom mirror, her hand filled with pills, she'd realized she couldn't do it. She couldn't abandon her girls. No matter what, she would find Brooke. She would win Kelly back. She would fix her broken family.

Fueled by that realization, she pushed herself out of bed and took the train into work.

"Ah, you're here, Ms. Rooney," Holt said, looking surprised to see her. "Do you mind if I . . . ?"

Her words trailed off, and she waved toward the fan on the desk. Marissa shrugged. Why should she care if Holt smoked? Her lungs were probably screwed anyway.

"You left suddenly yesterday. Is everything okay?"

Marissa folded her coat over the back of her chair and nodded.

"Kelly was attacked outside her school. She was taken to the Renton Police Department."

Holt's expression changed. Concern filled her gaze as she drew a long white cigarette from the pack stowed in her desk drawer. She flicked the button on the cigarette lighter, touched the orange flame to the end of the cigarette, and sucked deep. A plume of silvery smoke issued from her lips. Reaching out a bony finger, she turned on the fan. The whirring turbine sucked Holt's sins from the air.

"Was she hurt?"

"She's okay. She's staying with my ex-husband for a while."

Holt tapped the gray stack of ash off into a black onyx ashtray. She took another drag on the cigarette and held the warm smoke in her lungs for a beat before releasing it into the air. Looking deep in thought, Holt watched Marissa and fiddled with the gold pendant hanging from the gold chain around her neck.

"Ms. Rooney, I see now it was unfair to offer you this position. How can I expect you to focus on the foundation when you are under such enormous pressure at home?"

Marissa needed this job. Money aside, how could she possibly stay sane if all she did was sit alone in her kitchen waiting for the phone to ring? She knotted her hands together on the desk and stared across the room at Holt.

"I can do this, Ms. Holt. I need to do this," she said in a shaky voice. "This is my best shot at staying close to the investigation. Please."

Marissa rose. She pulled a piece of folded paper from her pocket. She'd spent the entire train ride into the city writing, and while she knew it wasn't perfect, she hoped it was enough to show Holt she was serious about the job.

"I've been working on a press release for the foundation."

Holt took the copy from her outstretched hand and quickly scanned it. Her eyebrows rose. Marissa didn't know if this was a good or a bad thing.

"Did you do this yourself?"

"I did a little online research." On her phone.

Writing didn't come easily to her. She could take dictation and draft business letters, but capturing the foundation's mission statement in a press release had been like composing a sonnet in Klingon. Her purse was filled with crumpled drafts.

Holt read the copy out loud.

"The Holt Foundation is here to help victims of violence piece their lives back together by providing support and services to help those in need. Our network of professionals can help victims deal with the trauma of victimization while also providing critical legal support in the courtroom and criminal justice process."

"It's a little rough," Marissa admitted.

Elizabeth nodded and picked up a red pen. She marked up the page with broad strokes, slashing some sections and scrawling notes on others before handing it back to Marissa.

If doctors were notorious for their bad handwriting, lawyers weren't much better. Holt's cramped and narrow script was worthy of a third grader. Marissa glanced at the edits and stowed the paper beside the keyboard on her desk. Anxious to show she'd put some thought into the matter, she turned back toward Holt.

"It's a good start, Ms. Rooney."

"Thank you," Marissa said softly.

Holt gripped the pendant between her fingers, looking pensive.

"Work saved me. After the attack, I mean. I decided to go to law school. That's how I worked through my grief. My rage."

"You became a lawyer."

A short bark of laughter escaped Holt's lips.

"Yes. In my weaker moments, I fantasized about prosecuting the man who raped me, which was ludicrous, of course. And while things never worked out exactly the way I planned, it was still the right path for me. The law. I think the foundation is the right place for you, Marissa."

Holt's cobalt eyes held Marissa's, and she could feel a frank sincerity in the old woman's words. Like Kelly's call this morning, they brought a measure of comfort.

"I hope so too, but . . ."

Marissa was interrupted by Holt's upraised hand.

"No. No more self-doubt. I've read your file. I know you have overcome your share of obstacles. You have raised two daughters single-handedly, put yourself through school, and worked hard to build a life for your family. I believe you can do whatever you set your mind to. It is time you started believing in yourself."

No one had ever believed in her before—not her parents or her husbands. Not herself. "I've rendered you speechless." Holt smiled.

She had.

Overwhelmed by Holt's confidence in her, Marissa focused on something concrete—the next steps for the foundation.

"I've been thinking about the types of professional services the foundation could provide. Like helping with the search for missing persons," she said, thinking of Alice Chang and her army of volunteers. "And legal support, of course. And maybe counseling."

"Counseling." Holt nodded.

"Absolutely," Marissa said, thinking about the handful of pills swirling down the bathroom sink and how close she'd come to making a desperate decision. "Families need support. And the victims, once they're safe, will need therapy."

Holt's lips stretched into a satisfied smile, and she stretched back in her chair, her sagging chin tilted toward the ceiling. She took a drag on her cigarette, collecting her thoughts.

"I like the way you're thinking. Investigators."

"Investigators? You mean like Henry Cahill?"

"Yes, and we'll need others. Private investigators, maybe former police officers. We'll need a network of people who have different types of expertise to engage in the different types of cases."

Marissa jotted down some notes. Maybe Detective Crawford knew some retired cops she could contact. More staff meant more expenses.

"All of this will cost money," Marissa said.

"I expect our network will consist of paid employees, special consultants, and experts who volunteer their time. But yes, money is key. The heartbeat of any foundation is its ability to fund-raise. You need money to do good work, and although I've already seeded the foundation with enough money to get it off the ground, it will eventually need to become self-sustaining. We need other benefactors. To that end I've arranged a fund-raiser on Saturday night. It's a black-tie affair at the convention center. I'll send you the guest list. I want you to add three more Seattle VIPs. Call them. Pitch the foundation. Get them to come."

Marissa swallowed. She didn't know any VIPs. How was she supposed to find willing benefactors with deep pockets? Why didn't Holt just give her the names so she could call them?

Then she got it. It was a test. Holt wanted her to dig. Teach a man to fish, or something like that. She had some contacts through the law firm. Mr. Regis. Maybe Logan knew some people too. It was a starting point, and if all else failed, there was Google. There had to be a list of wealthy Seattle philanthropists posted somewhere online. She would find it.

"What else?"

Holt smiled. She took another pull on her cigarette. A fierce coughing spasm rattled her gaunt frame. Holt grabbed a handful of tissues from the box on her desk and covered her mouth and nose.

Evan Holt burst through the door. Elizabeth Holt's watery eyes glanced up, and she held out a hand warding him off. Finally the coughing fit subsided. Marissa stepped back. Holt tossed the wad of tissues in the trash can, but not before Marissa noticed the bloody streaks of mucus. Evan handed her a glass of water, and Holt sipped slowly.

"Are you going to put that out?" Evan asked, nodding toward the smoldering cigarette.

Holt cocked her chin at a defiant angle and took another long drag on the cigarette. Evan frowned and shook his head. Marissa could feel disapproval radiate off him. Even she was surprised by the depth of Holt's defiance.

"Lizzie . . ."

Evan's rebuke was interrupted by a curt knock. Detective Crawford entered the room. Marissa felt a twinge of surprise, and something else. Fear.

Crawford's eyes met hers. She knew by the look on his face that something was very wrong.

"Have you been watching the news?"

Marissa shook her head, her throat closing tight.

The color drained from Holt's face. "What is it, Detective?" she asked.

Looking stricken, he locked his eyes on Marissa's.

"We found a . . . a girl."

Marissa gritted her teeth. Traffic oozed like lipid-rich blood through sticky arteries. Everywhere she looked, the city streets were choked with gridlock. Moronic drivers paid more attention to their electronic devices than what was going on around them. She cursed pedestrians for crossing against the lights. Most of all, she cursed the city planners for designing a system so fundamentally broken it took half an hour to drive ten lousy blocks.

The girl in the morgue could be her daughter. Oh God. The thought was so terrible, so unbearable, that Marissa struggled to breathe. She cracked the window an inch. Cold air blasted her face and helped quell the waves of nausea.

“Can’t you go any faster?”

“Two more blocks and we’ll be there,” he assured her.

Marissa covered her eyes and focused on her breathing. She’d always believed she could face anything as long as it was the truth. But now, faced with the horrifying possibility that her daughter was dead, she knew she’d been wrong. For the first time in her life, she dreaded the truth.

“Is it Brooke?” Marissa asked Crawford in a small, scared voice she didn’t recognize as her own. “If you know, you’ve got to tell me now, before we get there.”

Crawford shot a concerned glance her way.

“I don’t know.”

“That’s not good enough. How can you not know? What does that even mean?”

Crawford hesitated.

“I wish I didn’t have to tell you this, but the body...” He stopped and Marissa braced for more bad news. Nothing prepared her for the horror of what he said next. “This girl has been severely mutilated.”

Marissa felt the weight of Crawford’s stare, but she refused to look his way. She couldn’t bear to see the compassion, the pity in his eyes. She was barely holding it together. She needed proof. She needed to see for herself this girl wasn’t her daughter. Proof was still blocks away, though, as they continued their agonizing crawl through city traffic.

Marissa’s head pounded with a sickening thud as a migraine took root behind her eyes. She didn’t drop her hand away from her face until she felt the car stop.

The King County medical examiner’s office looked like any other office building located at the base of Capitol Hill. Modern construction, made of concrete and glass, it stretched fourteen stories up into the gray sky.

On shaky legs Marissa entered the lobby, trailing a step or two behind Crawford. It felt like they walked for miles along the arterial maze of hallways pulling them deeper into the building’s core. Each step came slower, harder, weighted down by the paralyzing dread she felt that her worst fears might soon be realized.

If it was Brooke, if it was, Marissa didn’t know how she would face it. How she would get through the rest of her life. Hell, the next few days, hours, minutes—if Brooke was dead.

She stopped, staring at the double doors ahead like she’d reached the gates of hell. Crawford turned. His compassionate gaze met hers. She trembled as her fears overwhelmed her.

“You don’t have to do this, you know.”

“I do,” she said at last. “I have to know. If it’s Brooke back there . . .” Her voice caught. She swallowed and pushed the painful words out. “If it’s Brooke, she shouldn’t be alone.”

Steeling herself for whatever truth lay beyond, she stepped toward the doors. Crawford gave a solemn nod. Placing a hand on her back, he guided her down the remaining stretch of hallway. Grateful he was standing by her side, she pushed through the doors.

• • • •

NOTHING HAD PREPARED Marissa for the smell. The sharp scent of ammonia did not mask the deeper sickly sweet, coppery smell in the room, like rotten meat. Marissa's head pounded, and her stomach took a nauseating dive. She pressed a hand against her mouth to stop from gagging.

She remembered once riding on her bike past a dead raccoon smeared on the road. She might have been ten, maybe eleven, at the time. Flies swarmed around the carcass, and Marissa had pedaled faster, desperate to get away from the stench, from the horror of the poor animal's remains. A lifetime had passed, and still she had never forgotten the smell of death.

A thin middle-aged man in green scrubs stood by the table. He turned and greeted Crawford with a nod of his head.

"Detective."

"Dr. Meeks, what can you tell us?"

"This girl is in her twenties. Approximately five foot four inches tall, she weighs between one hundred five and one hundred fifteen pounds."

Marissa stood frozen to the spot. She felt the room spiral around her and only just managed to hold on to what he was saying. Meeks's broad description fit Brooke. She looked past Meeks, her eyes drawn to the steel table like iron filings to a magnet.

Crawford's brow furrowed.

"You're sure you can handle this?"

Fear gripped her throat in its choking grasp, robbing her of any words. She wasn't sure at all, but she nodded anyway and he led her forward.

Marissa gasped, horrified by the sight of the body laid out on the cold metal table. Her knees buckled. She would have fallen if Crawford hadn't caught her arm. He held her steady in his strong grip.

The body didn't look real. It looked like someone had hacked apart a little girl's doll and reassembled it on the table in some grisly form, like a jigsaw puzzle. Marissa's stomach heaved. Bile rose in her throat. She swallowed hard, forcing it back.

"The police are still looking for the head," Meeks assured her, but Marissa barely heard him. A black rose blossomed in front of her eyes, and she swayed against Crawford. He gripped her with both hands, gently shaking her as he stared straight into her eyes.

"Look at me," he said.

She did, blinking hard, knowing she would never be the same again. Nothing would erase the horror of this moment. Unable to stop herself, she turned back and stared at the severed hand on the table. The fingers were bruised. Swollen. Unrecognizable. These weren't Brooke's delicate fingers.

How many times had she held Brooke's hand to keep her safe as she crossed the street? How many times had she trimmed Brooke's fingernails and painted them with sparkly pink polish? How many times had Marissa brushed Brooke's golden curls away from her forehead or stroked the silky-soft skin of her cheeks?

What kind of animal could do something like this? He had taken a beautiful girl and defiled her in every possible way. Only a monster would cut up another human being and discard her like trash. Only a monster would kill another person like this.

Tears filled her eyes. She turned away from the body on the table, unable to look for another second longer. Her watery gaze fixed on a set of X-rays pinned to a light box above the table. Cold, bluish light illuminated discrete sections of bones: arms, legs, hands, pelvis, and clavicle. Documenting the disembodied parts of a girl who could never be made whole again. The X-rays swam in front of her eyes. Marissa blinked her tears back.

In a flash she remembered Brooke playing on the monkey bars. She had been little, no more than five. Hand over hand Brooke swung, blonde curls fluttering in the breeze, until that awful moment when she let go.

Marissa's mouth dropped open as a sudden thought dawned on her. She turned back toward Dr. Meeks.

"I don't know if this helps." Her small voice echoed in the sterile room. "But Brooke broke her wrist when she was five years old."

Crawford shot a keen look at the medical examiner. Meeks shook his head. His narrow lips twitched.

"There were no broken bones on the X-ray."

A crushing wave of relief flooded through Marissa. It wasn't Brooke. It wasn't her baby lying here. Just as quickly, though, relief gave way to a deep, aching sadness. Slowly, haltingly, she stepped forward. Her fingers trembled as she reached out toward the table. She touched the bruised and swollen hand.

The brush of cold flesh under her fingertips felt alien, and Marissa wished the girl's family were here so this poor girl wouldn't have to be alone. No one should be alone in a place like this. She thought about the girl's family and the horrible news awaiting them. Like her, they had a missing daughter. And like her, they were no doubt desperate for news, for her safe return. Suddenly she understood Holt's mission in a way she never had before.

"Marissa?"

She turned at the sound of Crawford's voice. With a heavy heart, she followed him to the door.

• • • •

MARISSA STARED LISTLESSLY through the rain-streaked car window, feeling empty and alone. No place would ever feel like home again until both of her daughters were back where they belonged.

"How do you do it?" she asked, resting her head back against the seat and staring at the empty husk of a house.

"Do what?"

He sounded surprised, and she angled her weary gaze back toward him.

"Look at death every day and still stay sane?"

"You've got to disconnect from it."

"And you can do that?"

"My first few years on the force, I brought every case home with me. Every victim, every family, until I reached a point where I couldn't do it anymore."

"So you disconnected?"

"You have to maintain some distance so you can remain objective about a case, otherwise you're going to jump to the wrong conclusions, not to mention ruin your life outside of work."

"And do you have a life outside of work?"

Marissa wasn't sure what had spurred her to ask the question. Crawford's expression closed, and she realized she'd pushed too far. Whatever the truth was, she imagined he kept it close to the chest.

She hoped she was wrong. She hoped he had family to go home to, something more than just his job. But the more she thought about it, the more certain she was that Crawford's life was as empty as the house awaiting her.

Marissa climbed out of the car. She hesitated, feet glued to the sidewalk. Cold drizzle chilled her to the bone. All the adrenaline-induced panic had drained from her body, and she felt like she had aged twenty years in the blink of an eye. Behind her she heard a car door close. Crawford's light tread approached.

"Are you okay?"

Lies were easy. Dozens of worthless ones sprang to mind, but she dismissed them all. She shivered. Without thinking, she closed the distance between them. She wanted to step into the warm circle of his arms and hang on to him like he was the only thing that could stop her from drowning in a deep pool of fear and uncertainty.

His face was turned toward her. It wasn't the twisted mass of scars she saw when she looked at him, but the fine arch of his eyebrows, the sharp angles of his cheekbones, the full curve of his lips.

He took a quick step back, as if reading her intention, and she knew there wasn't going to be a replay of the scene in Kelly's room, where she had been able to draw on his comfort and support. An invisible wall formed between them.

"Marissa," he said, and gave a small shake of his head. "I should go."

She shivered and trudged down the cracked sidewalk to the empty house.

Drew propped an elbow on the bar and fingered the small velvet box in his pocket. Alicia was running late. On any other night this might have irked him, but tonight he was on a roll.

“What can I get you?” the bartender asked.

“Grey Goose martini. Dry and dirty.”

“You’ve got it.”

“Have I seen you before?” Drew asked, eyeing the bartender. There was something familiar about him.

“Could be. I work a bunch of places. Jesse Morgan.”

Drew shook the bartender’s outstretched hand. His phone beeped, and he pulled it out. The text was from Alicia. Drew frowned.

“Bad news?”

“Just my girlfriend. She’s stuck in traffic,” he said, and slid the phone back in his pocket. “You’d think the dumb shits in this town would learn how to drive in the rain.”

Jesse chuckled.

“My wife never made it anywhere in her life on time,” said a middle-aged man with a bulbous nose and gin blossoms staining his cheeks. “Except for divorce court. Goddamned right she made it there on time.”

Jesse shook his head. He strained the drink into a chilled martini glass. He skewered a couple of olives and plopped them into the briny drink.

“Big night?” he asked Drew, placing the glass on a cocktail napkin.

“You could say that.” He pulled out the velvet box and opened it. The diamond ring sparkled in the light.

Jesse pursed his lips and emitted a low, appreciative whistle. For good reason—the ring had cost a fucking fortune.

“Lucky girl.”

Gin Blossom snorted. He inhaled a sip of his drink and swiped a hand across his fleshy lips.

“You got something to say?” Drew asked, glaring down the length of the bar, fixing his cold gaze on Gin Blossom’s face.

“Listen, kid, if it were me, I’d just give the bitch half now and save yourself the trouble.”

Imagine, a catch like him, divorced. Drew sneered. No doubt the drunk asshole had gotten everything he deserved. No point in saying so. Guys like him, like his father, weren’t the introspective types. They were experts at foisting blame for their shit onto others. Nothing was ever their fault. It was always the booze or the drugs or the socks they’d left on the goddamned living room floor that started it.

Why can’t you ever do anything right? Why are you so fucking stupid? Go on, cry. Cry, you little pussy faggot.

Drew shook his head, banishing Rick’s voice from his mind. He gulped his martini. Alcohol burned down his throat. He grimaced and turned his attention to the television behind the bar, where Charles Sully was the big story of the day.

“Crazy bastard had a body stuffed in his trunk,” the drunk said, pointing his raised glass at the screen.

“I hear he hacked her up,” Jesse answered, pulling glasses off the revolving dishwasher behind the bar and drying them.

“I wonder how many more bodies they’re going to find,” Gin Blossom said, and slurped noisily from his drink. “Where there’s one, there’s more. And for once the cops did the right thing by killing him. Jail’s too good for the bastard.”

“Oh yeah, mob justice is totally the way to go,” Drew quipped.

“Well, if you can’t kill Gary Ridgway in this goddamned nanny state . . .” Gin Blossom’s voice rose. He lifted his glass and pointed it at Drew.

“You mean execute?” Drew said, cocking an eyebrow.

“Exactly. If you can’t execute the Green River Killer, then . . .” Gin Blossom trailed off, slurping from his glass.

Drew’s lips stretched into a condescending grin. He shook his head and turned back toward the television.

So far everything was going better than planned. The public believed Sully was a monster. And he was. The body Drew found in the Super Bee’s trunk confirmed Sully was no Boy Scout. Once the police identified the body and found the MedicAlert dog tags in the trunk along with the duffel bag . . . well, Charles Sully’s death tied a very nice bow on a very big mess.

At the far end of the bar, Gin Blossom’s head snapped around, and Drew glanced up.

Alicia walked through the doors wearing a form-fitting ivory dress that left her shoulders and arms bare. Her dark hair was swept away from her face, pinned at the back of her long, graceful neck. Earrings dangled from her earlobes like golden dewdrops. Drew stirred at the thought of what he’d like to do to her.

“Yours?” Jesse asked, inclining his head.

“Mine,” Drew confirmed, draining the last of the martini.

Jesse grinned and stuck out his hand. “You’re a lucky man.”

Drew shook Jesse’s hand and dropped a twenty-dollar bill on the bar.

Alicia’s full lips parted in a warm smile as she caught sight of him. She showed no signs of still being miffed from this morning’s argument. Leaning forward, he brushed a kiss across her cheek. Nuzzling her ear, he felt her shiver. The sweet floral scent of her perfume filled his head. He froze. Gretchen flashed into his mind. Had she been wearing the same perfume the night he drove her home? Impossible. Drew pulled back and brushed thoughts of Gretchen aside like he was dusting lint from the lapel of his jacket.

“Hello, beautiful. How was your day?”

Goosebumps dimpled the smooth flesh of Alicia’s bare arms.

“Sorry I’m late. Traffic’s a nightmare.”

“Our table is waiting.”

He extended his arm, and Alicia started off toward the dining room. Drew paused beside Gin Blossom’s stool, stooping low to whisper into the old man’s ear, “You don’t even dream this good.”

Gin Blossom grunted. Alicia turned with a questioning look and Drew smiled.

The mouthwatering smell of crispy duck and braised rabbit filled the dining room. Having skipped lunch, he was starving. He couldn’t wait to dive into the evening. This would be a night both he and Alicia would always remember. He would make sure of it.

The host led them through the dining room to a small table for two crammed into the corner. With a courtly, sweeping gesture, the host pulled out Alicia’s chair and held it, waiting for her to sit.

Irritation bristled at the back of Drew's neck like tiny needle pricks racing across his skin. There was no fucking way he was going to get stuffed in a dark corner. Not tonight of all nights. Not with Alicia looking so perfect and the dining room only half-full. Didn't he look like the type of guy who could afford a place like this? Didn't he fit Maximilien's clientele?

Drew forced a chilly smile. "I specifically asked for a window table."

"Sir, we're booked this evening, I . . ."

"Booked? The place is half-empty. I don't see 'reserved' signs on any of those tables."

Alicia looked up. A crease formed between her perfectly arched brows. "Really, Drew, this is fine."

"It most certainly is not. There's a table right by the window. That's where we're going to sit tonight."

"But, sir, it's reserved."

Drew forced a smile and stepped close to the host. Placing a hand on the back of the man's narrow shoulder, he leaned in. With his other hand, he grasped the man's balls with a firm grip. They felt like overripe plums in his hand. The host gasped.

"Listen close. If you're smart, you'll seat us over there. Got it?"

The man gave a terse nod. Drew released his grip and stepped back. Anger pinched the corners of the host's mouth, but Drew refused to back down. Finally the host cleared his throat.

"Of course," he said in a tight voice.

With a stiff, upright gait, he marched toward the window table. Head bowed, Alicia followed. She quietly thanked the host as he held her chair. The man gave a stiff nod. Satisfied, Drew took a seat and unfolded the crisp linen napkin on his lap. He turned to admire the view.

The rain had stopped at midmorning, and while thunderclouds gathered heavy and black to the north, the skies over Puget Sound were uncharacteristically clear. Moonlight rippled silver across the cobalt waves. Out on the pier, tourists rode the garish Ferris wheel. The spokes lit up, forming a spider web of blue and green.

Drew turned his gaze on Alicia. She sipped her water and studied the menu in a thinly veiled attempt to mask her ire. She was pissed at him for making a scene. While he wasn't the type to indulge her moods, Drew reached across the table, laying an open hand in the space between them. After a slight hesitation, she placed her hand in his. He squeezed her fingers and stared directly into her blue eyes.

A waiter approached. Before he could ask about drinks, Drew ordered a bottle of Dom Pérignon and waved him away. Alicia raised her eyebrows.

"Are we celebrating?"

"Of course."

"Anything in particular?"

"The day I met you."

"Really?" Her lips twisted into an impish grin. "Do tell."

"The day I met you, everything changed. I went from a guy who was drifting through life to a man who finally knew what he wanted. Everything I want, Alicia, is sitting right across the table from me. I know it's fast. I know it may seem crazy. I also know that there is no one else in the world more perfect for me than you. And so, Alicia Wright, will you do me the great honor of being my wife?"

Alicia's eyes popped wide as she spied the box he slid onto the table. One hand fluttered to her lips. Her eyes glistened with tears. Unable to speak, she nodded.

The waiter arrived on cue, champagne was poured, toasts were raised, and by the time they ordered dinner, Alicia's two-carat diamond sparkled around her slender finger. After a slight hiccup, everything was back on track. Drew sipped champagne, his mood soaring higher than the top of the Space Needle.

Dinner came and went. The food was as good as the reviews said. Local ingredients. Clean flavors, everything expertly prepared. He had the rack of lamb, with new potatoes and baby carrots. The meat was tender, succulent. Alicia looked pleased with the scallops. She all but licked the butter sauce from the plate before the waiter arrived to whisk the table clean. So far the night was living up to his expectations.

Alicia excused herself and strutted her way across the dining room toward the ladies' room. Drew was quite sure he wasn't the only man admiring the view as she exited the dining room.

The night was full of promise. Drew turned to gaze out at the pier. Puget Sound glittered like a sapphire in the moonlight. He was thinking about Alicia and all the ways he wanted to celebrate after they got home, when her cell phone whistled.

Curious, Drew reached across the table. He slid the phone along the smooth white tablecloth. The display sprang to life, and Drew thumbed the message icon.

The gentle buzz from the champagne evaporated. His eyes narrowed. Incredulous, he read the text twice.

I know you're still mad at me, but there's something you should know. Drew is not who you think he is. I'm serious. Call me.

A fast-burning anger ignited like a fuse inside Drew. Goddamn Liam. Stupid motherfucker didn't know how to leave well enough alone. Alicia had made it perfectly clear at Gretchen's funeral she never wanted to see him again, and still he refused to fuck off.

If the Crown Prince of the Dot-Com had hired a private investigator to dig into Drew's past, there were all kinds of secrets he might have discovered. None of them good. He should have dealt with Liam sooner. Naïvely, he'd hoped Liam would just go away. But like a pot left on a stove unattended, he had just boiled over.

Drew clenched the cell phone hard in his fist. He'd gone to great lengths to escape his past, and he wasn't about to let Liam ruin everything. There was no way he was going back to being Andy Bowman, high school dropout. Andy Bowman with the criminal record and the crazy father. Andy Bowman the loser. He'd risked everything to become Drew Matthews, and he wasn't about to lose it all now—his job, his money, his fiancée, maybe even his life—by letting that entitled little shit spill his guts to Alicia.

Drew considered pocketing the phone but decided against it. Alicia would notice its absence. Instead he deleted the text, flipped Alicia's phone into airplane mode, and slid it back into position beside her champagne flute.

Just in time, as it turned out. Alicia's high heels clicked on the floor behind him. Her fingers trailed along his neck as she passed. She stopped to press a gentle kiss on his lips. He tasted the champagne and caught a whiff of her sweet perfume.

Drew took a sip and forced a smile, as if he didn't have a single care in the world. There was nothing forced about Alicia as she smiled brighter than the diamond on her finger.

In life, perfect moments were rare, and he wasn't about to let Liam ruin this one. He'd deal with Liam soon enough.

"What's bothering you?"

"Nothing. Why?"

She nodded toward his hands. “You always play with your ring when there’s something on your mind.”

He released his grasp on the bloodstone ring. “I do?”

She nodded. He grasped her hand and raised it to his mouth. Drew ran the tip of his tongue along the ulnar nerve on the soft underside of her wrist. Alicia’s breath caught, and she shivered.

“You’re right. I do have something on my mind. What do you say we skip dessert?”

The search party called it in just after one o'clock in the afternoon. Another body. Another dead girl. Seth got the news moments later. The entire drive up the I-5 corridor, he prepared himself for the inevitable. Though the report was short on details, a few things struck him right away.

The body had been found close to one of the job sites where Charles Sully had worked. North of Redmond, the new housing developments were popping up like acne on a teenage boy's face. This one backed up onto a large greenbelt. The densely wooded area had all the makings of a great dump site. That's why Seth had pointed Elizabeth Holt's volunteers off in this direction.

According to the volunteers, the body had been left intact, out in the open, not sliced and diced like the one they'd found in Sully's trunk. Why would he take such pains in dismembering one girl and just dump the other? Had the girl they found in Sully's trunk done something to make him angry? The difference in the MO was interesting, and unusual. Maybe this girl had been killed first. Maybe he had been trying to throw them off the trail.

Seth hadn't missed the frightened look on Marissa's face when the news came in. Although she tried to present a brave front, he could see the terror in her eyes. Worried she might insist on coming with him, he was already formulating his response when she surprised him by making a feeble joke.

"We can't spend all of our dates identifying bodies, right?" she said.

He admired her pluck and was thankful she didn't want to come. Strong as she was, he wasn't sure she could make it through another scene like the one at the morgue. He didn't want to put her through it, not unless he had to.

Staring at his GPS, Seth gritted his teeth. Where was this damned place? Housing developments were popping up so fast in this area, the map applications couldn't keep up. Wending his way down the twisty hillside, he read the street signs. Finally, at the bottom of the valley, he spotted the neighborhood.

Dozens of cookie-cutter houses dotted the streets, all in various states of completion. The half dozen or so at the end of the cul-de-sac glistened with postcard-perfect coats of fresh paint. Each had been given its own unique touch—different trim color, different front door, some subliminal personalization preventing you from striding into the wrong egg crate and scaring the hell out of your neighbor's wife. Soon the landscapers would work their magic and "For Sale" signs would spring up like the golden heads of dandelions from freshly planted grass.

Mid-afternoon, the cul-de-sac was blessedly deserted. Seth was relieved. After Sully's very public suicide by cop, he didn't want any more publicity.

He parked behind a line of SUVs close to the trail where the search team leader waited. He followed two uniformed police officers up the trail. The terrain was rugged. Rocks slid underneath his feet, making it slow going. All around him he smelled the fresh pine forest.

Tall trees closed in overhead. The canopy of branches rustled in the wet wind. He remembered camping trips with his stepfather deep in the Cascade Range. Campfires and lakes brimming with fish. If he closed his eyes, he could almost imagine he was hunting game in the forest with his stepfather instead of searching for the body of another dead girl.

Ahead the dense stand of trees thinned. Seth could see a semicircle of people gathered around the small clearing, speaking in hushed tones. Some angled their faces toward the sky while others looked at him with sad expressions.

The circle dispersed as Seth approached, and he glimpsed a pair of black leather boots. Small. Women's size six or seven. Brooke Parker sprang to mind, but Brooke had been wearing high heels the night she'd disappeared.

With a sense of foreboding, he stepped closer.

Her face was hidden beneath the branches of a small tree. Squatting down, he smelled the rank sweetness of decaying flesh. Bracing himself, he angled the branches gently away.

Seth's shoulders slumped. He raked his hands through his hair. Equal parts anger and sorrow flooded him as he stared down at the girl laid out on a bed of brown pine needles. What a waste. What a goddamned fucking waste.

He wanted to turn away, but he couldn't. He needed to look. He needed to see. Seth felt the eyes of the volunteers on him. Reluctantly he gazed down at the dead girl. She looked like a wood sprite sleeping peacefully on the forest floor. Her sightless green eyes stared up blankly at the darkening sky. He knew from the bruising around her throat and the unnatural tilt of her head that her neck was broken.

His heart heaved in his chest.

Tess Turner. He would recognize her face anywhere.

Waiting for the techs to arrive, Seth eyed the scene with the clinical detachment he'd perfected analyzing dozens of crime scenes. Tess hadn't been killed here. There were no signs of a struggle, no blood on the ground. There were no drag marks. She had been dumped here. Like trash. The son of a bitch had carried her up the trail.

Whoever he was, he was strong, and Seth thought about Charles Sully's husky build—his broad chest and thick shoulders. He'd been used to heavy work and he'd known the neighborhood.

It was well past eight o'clock when Seth left the scene and returned to the office. His initial shock had faded, giving way to anger. He'd warned Tess to stay away from Sully, and with all the invincibility and swagger of a nineteen-year-old girl, she'd blithely ignored him. And now she was gone. She'd had such a bright and lively future ahead of her, and someone had snuffed it out in the blink of an eye.

If this had been Sully's handiwork, death had been too good for him. He'd deserved to live a long miserable life in jail as some asshole's bitch buddy for the lives he stole. Instead he'd taken the easy way out, and it was those left behind who would suffer. Good people, like Lara's family. Tess's family. Marissa. Kelly. So much blood. So much death.

Seth propped his elbows on the desk and ran his hands across his face. He stared down at the report he'd just completed. The techs would compare Tess's DNA to that of the blood samples lifted from the trunk of Sully's car. But what good would that do?

The case would be closed, and Tess would still be dead.

It all seemed so fucking pointless.

Seth sighed. Paper work complete, there was only one thing left to do. He opened his desk drawer and reached for his car keys. His hand stalled. Holly's photo lay facedown in his drawer. He wanted to slam the drawer closed and get the hell out of there, but he didn't. He pulled the picture frame out of the drawer and turned it over.

Holly's frozen smile stared up at him. Accusing him. He'd let Tess careen off into harm's way. He hadn't been able to save her. He hadn't been able to save his own wife. He couldn't save anyone.

Seth closed his eyes. All he could do was react to the shitty things that happened every goddamned day.

Find the killer.

Bury the dead.

Some fucking job.

He jammed the picture back into the drawer and slammed it shut.

• • • •

TESS TURNER'S PARENTS lived in a modest brick rambler in Everett. Lights were on in the living room. Seth passed the Ford F-150 in the driveway on his way to the door.

Luke Turner answered on the second knock, and Seth saw where Tess had gotten her dark hair and lively green eyes.

"Can I help you?" Turner asked. His thick eyebrows furrowed as he took in Seth's appearance.

"Luke Turner?"

"That's me. What can I do for you?"

"Detective Crawford, Seattle PD." Seth showed his badge. Concern flashed in Turner's bright eyes. "May I come in?"

Turner shifted in the doorway, and Seth caught sight of a woman coming down the hallway. She was middle-aged, petite, with bright-red hair and trendy glasses with electric-green frames. Her husband's wary expression stopped her in midstride.

Seth followed the Turners down a short hallway to a large, comfortably furnished family room. The Turners sat close together on a cream-colored sofa. Seth took the brown leather recliner across from them. Everywhere he looked, he could see family photos—Tess as a freckle-faced girl, Tess graduating from high school, a young man he could only assume was her brother in army fatigues, family pictures of smiling faces.

A flag case sat on the top of the entertainment center. The stars and stripes filled the triangular case, and Seth thought back to what Tess had said. Her brother was currently overseas, serving in Afghanistan. He wished the Turners' son were home with them now instead of thousands of miles away. They would need all the support they could get.

Seth glanced back at the Turners. Mrs. Turner leaned forward, her brown eyes filled with alarm.

"I have some news about your daughter."

"Tess?" Mrs. Turner asked, clasping her hands tight together, as if in prayer.

"Yes. I'm very sorry to have to tell you this, but something's happened to her."

The color drained from Luke Turner's face. Seth dropped his gaze and stared at his feet.

"Is she all right?"

"I'm afraid not, Mr. Turner."

Emotion thickened Seth's voice. Anger. Sadness. Regret. Most times he could shut things off. Compartmentalize. Delivering bad news was part of the job, but this case had become personal. He'd liked Tess, and the tragedy of the situation overwhelmed his default coping mechanisms.

"Goddammit. What are you saying? Is she hurt? Is she . . . ?"

Seth raised his eyes with a look that confirmed Turner's worst fears. The man's voice broke. Turner sagged back against the sofa cushions. His wife reached for his hand, her fingers knotting with his. Tears filled her eyes.

"How?" Mrs. Turner gasped. Shock rippled across her face.

Luke Turner's chin sagged, and he dropped his face into his hands. Her eyes blazing bright with tears, Mrs. Turner never took her gaze from Seth's.

"How? How could you have let this happen? Her roommate is missing. Didn't anyone think that our daughter was in danger? Why didn't you protect Tess?"

Each word pierced Seth's heart like a bullet. He should have done more to protect Tess. He should have driven her back to the dorm himself. He should have drilled home the danger she was in if she kept chasing Charles Sully. But he hadn't. He'd let her go. He'd failed her and her family in every possible way.

"I'm sorry."

"You're sorry? You're sorry? Our girl is dead, and that's all you have to say for yourself? Get out. Get out of my house."

"Teresa," Luke said softly, grasping his wife's hands.

"Get out."

Luke followed Seth to the door. In hushed tones, Seth imparted the logistical details he was obligated to pass along. He handed Luke his card, and the door closed.

With a leaden heart, Seth lumbered to his car. His cell phone rang. Pulling it from his pocket, he saw the number. It was Alvarez, no doubt looking for the chief's daily report.

Aw, fuck it. Not tonight. He'd had enough for one day.

• • • •

GREAT BIG SEA, A FOLK band out of Newfoundland, Canada, blasted through the speakers at the Dubliner Pub in Fremont. The familiar smell of cedar and beer embraced him like a lover. He didn't recognize many of the faces. Once a regular, Seth hadn't set foot in the place for over a year. Not since he'd gotten sober. But tonight he spied an empty stool at the bar.

Tonight he had every intention of falling off the wagon with a definitive thud and surrendering to the sweet haze of oblivion offered by as much scotch as he could stomach.

The bar was full. Saturday night was dart league night, and teams were scattered around the dart boards, drinking and laughing. Seth paid them no mind. He spied the green bottle of Glenlivet winking at him in the bar's amber light.

His cell phone rang. He pulled it out and checked the display. Marissa. Shit. He knew he should talk to her, put her mind at ease. But he couldn't. He didn't want to tell her about Tess. Alvarez had left a voice mail. Instead of checking it, though, he placed the cell phone on the bar and powered it down.

The bartender turned.

"What can I get you?"

They both stared.

Jesse Morgan was the first to speak.

"Don't tell me you're here on official business."

Seth set his keys on the bar and shook his head. "Not tonight."

Jesse's gaze turned thoughtful. He wiped the bar in front of Seth with a damp white cloth.

"In that case, Detective, what'll you have?"

"Glenlivet. Neat. Make it a double."

Jesse grabbed the bottle and set the glass on the bar in front of Seth. He poured a generous three fingers into the glass.

"Bad day?"

Seth didn't answer right away. He focused on the neon Guinness sign behind the bar and took a long swallow from the glass. He set it back down on the bar with a thud. The scotch burned a fiery path down his throat. He felt the welcome fire of it warm his belly, like a campfire on a cold night.

"You might say that."

He couldn't get Teresa Turner's voice out of his head. He didn't want to hear. He wanted the pain to go away.

"I've been watching the news," Jesse said. "No word on Brooke?"

Seth eyed Jesse with a sharp look. Suspicion was an occupational hazard, but Jesse looked genuinely concerned, nothing more, and Seth changed the subject.

"What are you doing here? Did you quit the Chapel?"

"I make too much money there to quit. No. I'm just filling in for a buddy of mine. He runs the place. Occasionally he books my band in here."

Seth nodded. He remembered. Acoustic Tuesday was a regular thing at the bar. Once or twice he'd found himself onstage with a guitar in his hand. But that had been before the fire. Before he'd lost Holly. That had been back when his life had actually made sense.

He drained the contents of his glass and ordered another. At this rate he'd pass out before midnight. It was the first cheerful thought he'd had all day.

Jesse poured another shot.

"I hear they found another body."

Seth looked up, wishing the kid would shut his mouth and go away. Let him drink in peace. He thought about moving to a table in the corner, but all the tables were taken. He sighed and cupped the glass in his hand.

"I can't talk about that yet."

Jesse nodded. He fisted his hands on the bar in front of Seth. The colorful tattoos wound their way up his muscular forearms, disappearing into the sleeves of his sweater.

"I've been asking the regulars at the bar if they saw anything the night Brooke disappeared. There was one girl, Daria, who was out celebrating her birthday."

Seth sighed. He hoped this was going somewhere. He'd come to the Dubliner to get away from work, not to rehash the case. Draining the contents of his glass, he waited for Jesse to get to the point.

"I showed her Brooke's picture, and she sent me a photo. In the background you can see Brooke talking to a tall dark-haired guy."

Seth straightened with sudden interest.

"Do you have it with you?"

Seth gestured toward the glass, and Jesse refilled it before he went off in search of his phone. The scotch tasted even better than he remembered. He took another swallow. It had been so long since he'd gone on a good bender, the effects were almost instantaneous.

Jesse returned with his phone. He flipped through his pictures until he found what he was looking for. Setting the phone down, he slid it across the bar. Seth squinted at the tiny screen. It was hard to see anything in this light. He inched the phone closer. A redheaded girl smiled in the foreground. Behind her, a few barstools down, he recognized Brooke's wavy blonde hair. She was talking to a young man.

The hairs prickled on Seth's arms, and he looked up. It was too small for identification purposes at this resolution, but maybe with some work, they could get something useful.

"Can you send me this? I'll have one of our guys look at it."

"Yeah."

Seth knew he should forward it to the computer forensics team, but given their backlog of cases, it might take days for them to get to it. Brooke Parker didn't have days. Henry Cahill, on the other hand, was at Holt's beck and call. He forwarded the photo to Cahill and asked him to look at it ASAP.

"Did she remember anything else?" Seth asked.

“Nothing useful.”

“Thanks.”

Jesse nodded and drifted down the bar to serve other customers, leaving Seth alone with his thoughts. He wasn't stupid. He saw the looks around the office, the careful way Alvarez eyed him ever since Sully's public suicide. They were all waiting for him to crack under the pressure. They had been ever since Holly died. Maybe he had already cracked, he mused, picking up his glass. He was, after all, off the wagon. So while he was here, why not have another?

Seth held up his finger. Jesse spotted him. He was still too sober by half. One more for the road, and then he had to head home. Tomorrow would come. In all likelihood the results of the DNA tests would be waiting for him.

With that cheery thought, he downed his next drink.

Marissa pulled alongside the curb. Coming here was crazy. Desperate. She'd tried calling him, but he wasn't answering his phone. So after leaving three messages, she'd sweet-talked Henry Cahill into giving her Seth's home address, making some lame excuse about paper work. They'd both known she was lying. She had to see him. She had to look him in the eye when he told her what the volunteers had found.

Marissa's fingers drummed the steering wheel. Fat drops of rain pounded relentlessly down on the roof of her car and streamed down the windows. A thin film of condensation coated the driver's-side window, and she swiped it away with the palm of her hand.

A few lights blazed inside the house. Seth's Nissan sat in the driveway. He was home. And she was stalling. Because she knew she shouldn't be here.

Surely if Seth had found Brooke's body, he would have told her by now. Intellectually she knew this was true, but she needed to see him. She needed . . . what, she asked herself again. Assurance? Comfort? Something more?

Marissa stopped the thought before it could fully form in her mind, knowing that the longer she sat there, the less likely she was to act. Without giving herself another second to reconsider, she stepped outside and pocketed the car keys.

The wet wind assaulted her as she sprinted for the porch. Marissa pounded on the green door of the small Tudor. And waited. How would Seth react to her showing up like this? Would he be angry?

She should go. No. She had to talk to him. There'd be no sleep until she did.

It took thirty excruciating seconds for him to answer, each second giving voice to her doubts.

Seth's bloodshot eyes widened at the sight of Marissa standing on his doorstep.

"I tried calling, but you didn't answer. What did you find?" she asked, skipping the usual pleasantries.

"You shouldn't be here."

"Dammit, Seth, I know the search party found something. Was it Brooke? Did you find my girl?"

Marissa's chest ached with the need to know. She couldn't spend another second agonizing, waiting for her cell phone to ring, waiting for him to show up at her door with horrific news. She couldn't spend another night wondering if it was Brooke they'd found. Wondering if her daughter was dead or alive. Not knowing was like having a gaping hole ripped through the center of her heart.

Seth shook his head. All afternoon she'd feared the worst. Now a wave of relief flooded through her, so strong Marissa's knees buckled. Seth reached out to steady her. She looked up into his face.

There was something he wasn't telling her. He looked haggard. Beaten down. She could smell the alcohol on his breath. She hadn't pegged him for a drinker, so whatever it was must have shaken him. Badly.

"What is it?" she demanded.

Seth released his grip and stared past her, out into the rainy night.

"What aren't you saying?"

"Go home, Marissa."

"I'm not leaving until you tell me."

He hissed out a sigh and glared at her. His gray eyes smoldered with frustration. Anger.

"Tess is dead."

Tears flooded Marissa's eyes. Her hands flew to her mouth.

“Oh my God,” she murmured. “No.”

Without thinking, Marissa wound her arms around Seth’s waist and held on tight. He tensed in her embrace, but she refused to let go. She thought about Tess, with her quick smile and her bright-green eyes, so full of life, and a deep sadness shrouded her heart. Tears spilled over onto her cheeks, dampening the front of Seth’s T-shirt.

Strong hands gripped her shoulders, and Seth gently eased her away. Though she loosened the tight band of her arms, she refused to relinquish her hold. She glimpsed the pain in his eyes as he looked away.

“You should go,” he said again, his voice gruff.

“No,” Marissa said.

She planted her hand on the scarred side of his face. Pushing up onto her toes, she pressed her lips to his. Everything she felt, all of her fear, all of her longing, she packed into that kiss. The salty taste of her tears blended with the sharp tang of scotch. Seth’s shoulders tensed. He pulled back, but Marissa refused to let go. She wound her fingers into his damp hair and pressed against him in another kiss.

Seth’s resistance fled. His strong arms closed around her, pulling her hard against his body. His lips opened, and she felt the raw hunger, the need in his kiss. A rush of heat surged through her at the brush of his tongue.

She was dimly aware of the door closing behind her as Seth pushed her back until her shoulder blades pressed against the wall. He kissed her hard and she pulled him close, reveling in the taste of him, taking pleasure from the sure strength of his body against hers.

The zipper of her jacket purred open, and Seth’s hands closed on her waist. She tugged on his T-shirt, pulling it free from his jeans, and slid her cold hands inside his shirt. A wave of desire overwhelmed her senses. She kissed his neck, his chin, every part of him she could reach. All rational thought fled. And there was only Seth, so warm and so real.

Her hand slid down to his waist, fingers skimming lightly beneath his belt. Seth’s breath caught, and she could feel him shudder. His hot breath fanned her cheek, and he stared down at her.

“Not here,” he said.

Marissa nodded. Seth took her hand, and he led her through the living room toward the back of the house. The bedroom was dark, the shades drawn. Seth turned to her, a question in his eyes. She answered with a kiss. She reached for his belt, but Seth caught her curious hands and locked them behind her back.

His lips blazed a trail down her neck to the swell of her breast. She felt a dizzying spiral of sensations flow through her. She swayed unsteadily and curved her body into him, wanting more, wanting to feel like there was something good still left in the world.

Seth released her hands. He gripped her hips and pulled her against the full length of his body. Marissa nuzzled his earlobe, drinking in the scent of his skin. Sandalwood and scotch. His hand slid inside her shirt, cupping the fullness of her breast. She groaned, wanting him, needing him. She whispered his name.

Marissa fumbled with the buttons of her shirt. Seth brushed her hands impatiently away. He grabbed the hem of her shirt, stripped it up over her shoulders, and tossed it to the floor. His hungry lips devoured every inch of her newly exposed skin. He lost himself in the feel of her, in his need.

Marissa shuddered. Her cheeks flushed, her breath coming fast, she gripped his shoulders as his fingers smoothed her bra away. Her hands knotted in his hair, and she pulled his mouth back up to hers, tasting him. Seth's hands unbuttoned her jeans and slid them down. She kicked them away and shed her panties.

As she fell back on the bed, Marissa's long hair tumbled loose behind her. Seth stood above her staring down. In the dark, his face engulfed in shadows, she could no longer read his expression. She raised her hand toward him, her fingers outstretched.

His fingers twined with hers, and she pulled him closer. Marissa pushed up onto her elbows, her kisses seductively soft, the thrust of her tongue slow. Teasing.

Seth eased away and she heard the jingle of his belt buckle. She reached out and felt his body respond to her touch. A surge of dizzying heat flashed through her, and she pulled him down. Her knees parted and he slid slowly inside her.

Marissa gasped at the exquisite rush of sensations filling her. She arched her hips, matching his rhythm stroke for stroke. Point and counterpoint, they moved to the beat of a song that had no words. Was it a minute? An hour? A year? Marissa had lost all sense of time as Seth's mouth found hers and she spiraled off the edge of insanity.

She cried out in the dark room, fingers digging into the taut muscles of his back. Seth's body shuddered in release. Spent, he leaned down and kissed her gently on the mouth. She reached up to touch his face, the stubble on his jaw scratchy against her hand, the puckered skin of his scars like thick ropes of satin beneath her fingertips.

Marissa pressed her lips to his scarred cheek, all the tenderness she felt expressed in her kiss. Seth rolled onto his back, and Marissa's heart began to slow. She settled into the warm curve of his shoulder. There, in the circle of his arms, hand resting over the steady beat of his heart, she felt safe. Finally, she slept.

• • • •

MARISSA OPENED HER eyes. Seth lay on his side, facing her in the morning light, the scars on his face hidden by the pillow. His gray eyes were open. Alert. And she wondered how long he'd lain awake studying her in the morning light. Snuggling closer into his chest, she planted a soft kiss on his neck, wanting desperately to feel safe.

"This is a great way to wake up," she said.

"We should talk about this."

His words chilled her like ice water running down her back. She closed her eyes and pressed herself against the warmth of his body, unwilling to let go of the moment.

"Let's not."

Seth's hand closed around her shoulder, and he gently edged her away. The look on his face was sober in the full light of morning. He rolled onto his back and she saw his scars. Marissa pulled the sheet close around her. The rush of air took on a sudden chill.

"This shouldn't have happened."

"I suppose you're going to tell me this was a mistake, that you didn't want this to happen."

"Marissa . . ."

"Because if you try to tell me that," she pressed on, "I'll know you're lying."

Seth closed his eyes and ran his hands over his scarred face. His sober gaze met hers.

"Not to overstate the obvious, but I'm the cop assigned to your daughter's case. There are lines that shouldn't be crossed . . ."

Marissa's eyes locked on his, refusing to budge an inch, and Seth gave his head a weary shake. Easing up from the mattress, she watched him pull on his boxer shorts and jeans.

“I’m going to make some coffee.”

Once she was alone in Seth’s room, self-doubt set in.

Yes, she was lonely. Yes, Seth was critical to solving Brooke’s case. Yes, getting involved now muddied whatever relationship they might have. But she couldn’t deny the way she felt about him. He was a good man. Strong. Caring. Despite all the complications, what she felt wasn’t wrong, and she wasn’t going to let misplaced guilt spoil whatever it was they had.

With so much chaos and uncertainty in her life, she didn’t want to lose the one good thing that had happened since this whole nightmare began. She wouldn’t let Seth push her away. She didn’t know if she could bear that on top of everything else.

Gathering her resolve, Marissa rose. Instead of donning her own clothes, she pulled his SPD-issue T-shirt over her head. She raised the fabric to her nose and breathed in his scent, sandalwood and cordite, then let it fall loose around her hips. The thick cotton hem brushed against her thighs as she exited the room.

She walked down the hall, getting the first real glimpse of the house. The living room was sparsely furnished, with modest leather furniture and a small flat-screen television. The dining room, or what she thought was the dining room, was absolutely bare. There wasn’t a table, a chair, a rug—nothing to show it was lived in.

Marissa stared at it. She looked around. There were no pictures, no artwork on the walls, no personal touches of any kind. The place had the empty, un-lived-in feel of a mausoleum. Seth was a ghost drifting silently through the purgatory that was his existence, not really living. Merely surviving.

The thought chilled Marissa. She turned and continued down the hall.

Seth stood in the kitchen. He stared out the window, his face a granite mask. She studied his profile, taking in the angry red scars on his cheek, the stubborn jut of his jaw, and the downward cast of this mouth. Behind him, on the tidy kitchen cupboard, the coffee maker growled and popped. Dark, rich coffee dripped into the clear glass pot.

He turned at the sound of her bare feet approaching. He looked at her, his expression grim. Resolute.

“I hope you don’t mind I borrowed your shirt.” She perched on a stool beside the kitchen counter.

“It looks better on you.”

She held her hand out, wishing he’d take it. He didn’t. Instead Seth held up one of his own, warding her off. Rejection hit her like a slap across the face. She knotted her fingers together on the countertop. She could leave and they could pretend this had never happened. Well, maybe he could pretend. But she couldn’t. Last night had meant something.

“So, do you want to talk?”

Seth crossed the small kitchen, maintaining a safe distance between them. Propping his hands on the countertop behind him, he met her eyes. Marissa steeled herself for the onslaught of regret and guilt.

“I don’t think you realize what a huge ethical boundary I’ve just crossed. I can’t be objective about Brooke’s case if we’re involved.”

Marissa arched an eyebrow. “So this is about your objectivity? I hate to break it to you, Detective Crawford, but we’re already involved.”

Seth’s hands splayed wide in an exasperated palms-up gesture. “It’s an emotional case. It’s natural to mistake your feelings with the case with your feelings for me. It’s called transference.”

“First, I’m not confused. Second, you’re not my therapist. I know what I feel. I care about you. Do you?”

Seth dropped his gaze to the floor. His voice was quiet, almost inaudible, when at last he spoke. "You know this is impossible."

Marissa climbed off the stool and approached him slowly.

"I know this is hard and you're pushing me away. I know that whatever it is between us, you've felt it too. I also know that you're looking for a way to deny it. You say it's because of your duty, and maybe it is, but looking around here, I think there's more to it."

"Like losing my job's not enough?"

Marissa felt the sting of his words swell. He was right. Just by being here she was putting him in an awkward position.

"Has there been anyone else since your wife died?"

Seth glanced up sharply. The fierce look on his face confirmed her suspicions.

"You need to go."

"Don't you think she'd want you to be happy?"

"Go."

"I'm not leaving."

Seth smashed his fist into the countertop. The coffee pot tilted, and the pot slid from its base. Glass shattered on the cold tile floor. Marissa jumped back. An instinctive stab of fear shot through her. She remembered Rick's hand lashing out, connecting with her jaw. She remembered the blood.

She froze.

"Fuck," he growled, raking his hands through his hair. He blew out a long breath. The struggle to control his frustration showed on his face. "Look, Marissa. Cops make lousy partners."

"What about ex-strippers?"

"Not everything is about you."

Coffee dripped. It hissed against the hot plate, filling the silence between them. Seth flipped off the switch. Reaching out, he gripped Marissa's shoulder gently, steering her clear of the shattered glass.

Once they reached the living room, he dropped his hand. Her skin chilled where his hand fell away. She looked at the empty shell of a house. Everything around her screamed of a man who had survived his wife's death but had not moved on.

"Look, I'm scared too. I'm a three-time loser at marriage, but I'm right here willing to deal with my issues, while you're hell-bent on pushing me away. Why?"

"I'm not who you think I am."

"What does that even mean?"

He turned toward the fireplace. Shaking his head, he pressed his palms against his eyes. Her fingers itched with the need to touch him, but she held back. Waited. When he spoke, his voice was so low she strained to hear him.

"My wife was depressed. She'd just had a miscarriage. Instead of staying home with her, I went to work."

She looked around the house—unfurnished—and at his scars, and she knew.

"The fire wasn't your fault, Seth."

Seth's face contorted. The pain in his voice was as red and raw as the scars on his cheek.

"She swallowed a handful of pills before she set the fire."

Seth's admission sucked the breath from Marissa's lungs as she thought about how close she'd come to ending her own life. His gray eyes raged like a winter storm, and she wondered how many nights he'd lain awake in bed playing the what-if game.

What if they hadn't lost the baby? What if he'd stayed home that night? What if he'd handled things differently? There were more unanswerable questions than there were burning embers in a fire. And it was so like Seth to keep all his grief tightly bottled up inside, to internalize his guilt and punish himself.

He was wrong though. It hadn't been his fault. What happened had been terrible and tragic and no more his fault than that of an all-powerful God in the sky.

Silent tears leaked out onto her cheeks.

"Oh, Seth."

The jarring sound of Seth's cell phone shattered the silence. Marissa jumped. Seth crossed the living room and picked it up as Marissa wiped her cheeks.

"Crawford," he said, his back turned toward her. "Yeah, I'm on my way."

He pressed the end button and set the phone down.

"You've got to go?"

His smile was bitter.

"I told you. Cops make lousy partners."

Seth knew he should be racing to the office, but with a pounding hangover and a bellyful of regrets, he wasn't ready to face the day. The morning's phone call had notified him that the medical examiner's findings for the girl in Charles Sully's trunk were sitting on his desk. In all likelihood, after reading the report, he'd have to deliver more horrifying news to a set of grieving parents.

Instead of heading into the office, Seth pulled into a Tully's Coffee parking lot. Gravel crunched beneath his tires as he chose a spot close to the rear entrance. The sweet smell of pastries, combined with the Glenlivet in his gut, sent his stomach plunging into a sickening barrel roll.

He knew better than to let his demons take hold. Once they gained purchase, they were nearly impossible to shake off. He'd worked the twelve steps and managed to crawl out of the bottom of the bottle he'd wallowed in after Holly's death. Starting over was unthinkable.

It was just after eight o'clock on Sunday morning, and patrons swarmed Tully's counter like flies. Food was out of the question. All Seth could manage was a black Americano. Hands shaking slightly, he placed the steaming cup on a small table and waited.

"You look like shit."

Maxwell Singer clapped Seth's shoulder, folding his six-foot-two frame into an empty chair across from him. The years hadn't changed Max. Iron-gray hair brushed the collar of his black leather jacket. Sharp brown eyes assessed Seth with a frown.

"At least I look better than I feel," Seth said, and took a sip of coffee. "Forgive me, Father, for I have sinned. It's been ten hours since my last drink."

Beneath a handlebar moustache, Max's lips slid into a wry grin.

"I'm your AA sponsor, not your father confessor. Trust me, you wouldn't like my penance."

Max was more than Seth's AA sponsor; he was first lieutenant on his force and a mentor.

"Have you eaten anything?" Max asked.

Seth shook his head. His stomach still heaved at the thought of food.

"Water? Tylenol?"

"No."

Max shook his head in mock disapproval. "You're out of practice, son. What's going on?"

"I'm on a shit case."

Max stroked his thick moustache and eyed Seth with a thoughtful look.

"You've managed tough cases before. What's different about this one?"

"I've got two dead girls, one missing, a dead suspect, and a boatload of unanswered questions."

"So?"

Max listened patiently while Seth rattled off the details of the case, about Charles Sully's record, Brooke Parker meeting Charles Sully at the Chapel, the body and the dog tags found in Sully's trunk, and the standoff that had left their prime suspect dead.

"Sounds like all of the pieces fit. So what's bothering you?"

"It's all too neat. Why would Charles Sully leave a body in his trunk overnight? Why not just dump her?"

"Maybe he wanted to get caught."

"Then why not leave her in the open? Why transport her body at all? Why change your method? The kind of guy who strangles a woman to death in a crime of passion seems like a very different perp than the psychopath who kills his victim and chops her up into pieces.”

“You think it’s two different killers?”

“I think it might be.”

“If you’ve got two killers, how do both deaths get pinned on Sully?”

“I think someone planted the duffel bag in Sully’s car.”

“A setup?” Max asked, his expression skeptical.

Seth nodded. “So on the one night Charles Sully has a body stashed in his trunk, there’s a dumpster fire in his neighborhood. Local cops respond. Then there’s a car prowler, and the only car that’s broken into is Charles Sully’s. What are the odds of that? What do you always say about coincidences?”

“There are no coincidences in police work.”

“Right.”

“Any facts to back up your theory?”

Staring down into his coffee, Seth shook his head. “Just my gut.”

“You mean the one still marinating in scotch?”

Seth glanced up sharply and Max raised a calming hand.

“Easy now. I’m just saying you need hard facts before you go to Alvarez or anyone else with this theory. The way it stands, you’ve got a solid case against Sully. You know as well as I do that in this kind of high-profile case there’s a ton of pressure to close it as quickly as possible. No one is going to be keen to have you picking away at it.”

Max was right. He could well imagine the backlash from Alvarez and Chief Abrams if he floated an unsubstantiated scenario. Still, in his gut he knew something wasn’t right. And Brooke Parker was still out there somewhere. He couldn’t stop looking.

Max’s speculative gaze locked on Seth’s face. “You know all of this already, son. What’s really bothering you?”

“Are you psychic?”

“All good cops are.”

Seth turned away from Max’s keen stare and looked at the faces all around him. The coffee shop was full of people, functioning members of society who were capable of having normal relationships, people whose lives weren’t irreparably fucked up. He sighed and swung his gaze back toward Max.

“I slept with one of the victims’ mothers.”

“Only one?” Max asked in a deadpan tone.

“Very funny. I’d just found another dead girl. I left her in harm’s way. I failed her.”

“You didn’t kill her, Seth.”

Knowing Max was right didn’t lift the thousand-pound weight of responsibility from his shoulders. He still had to find Brooke Parker. He still had to find the man or men who had murdered the girl they’d found in Sully’s trunk and Tess Turner. He owed it to them, to their families. And then what?

“When does it stop? No matter how well I do my job, there’s always going to be another monster out there. Always another victim. I’m tired of digging up dead bodies and telling parents their kids will never come home.”

Max reached across the table and patted Seth’s arm.

“You’ve let the job become your life, son. Have you ever thought that maybe it’s time to do something else?”

“Like what?” Seth asked, anger infusing his words.

As long as he could remember, he'd always wanted to be a cop. He didn't know how to be anything else. He didn't know where to start.

"Might be worth taking some time to figure that out." Max sipped his coffee. "What about the woman?"

"After I notified the parents, I had a couple of drinks, and then she showed up."

Max arched his eyebrows, waiting for more, while Seth sorted through his tangled knot of emotions. He'd wanted Marissa, and while the alcohol fogging his brain had been enough to lower his barriers, it wasn't the reason he'd done it. In truth he'd wanted her since that day in Kelly's room when he'd first held her. The touch of her body was electric and had awakened feelings in him he'd thought long dead.

"And," Max prompted.

"And I care about her. Okay? She's smart and tough and brave. And I know it's fucked up, but . . ."

Seth trailed off and pressed his fingers into his temples. A headache boomed inside his skull. Talking about this was hard. Max was still staring at him like he was expecting more.

"Your feelings for her have made this case personal," Max said. Seth couldn't deny the truth of his words. "So, you slept with her and now you feel guilty?"

"Wouldn't you?"

"We're not talking about me, son. We're talking about you."

The Americano in his cup was as cold and sobering as the truth spilling from Max's lips. He drained the last of the coffee from the mug.

"Right. We're talking about me. And yes, I feel guilty."

"Why? Because of the job, or because of Holly?"

The mention of her name sent a shock wave spiraling through Seth. He glanced up at Max with a tortured look.

"Both."

There was no judgment on Max's face. He gave a slow nod and leaned forward, elbows propped on the table, his gravelly voice uncharacteristically soft.

"How did you leave things?"

"Badly. I let my guilt take over and treated her like a total asshole."

"So what are you going to do?"

Seth raked a hand through his hair and blew out a breath. Everything was such a mess. He couldn't leave things that way. He had to deal with it piece by piece.

"I need to figure out if I'm right and Sully was set up before the case is officially closed."

"Okay, and what about the woman?"

There was no easy answer to Max's question. His actions from this point on would directly affect his career. In some ways that would make pushing her away easier, but was that what he wanted? His heart said something different. Either way he had to face the consequences of what he'd done last night.

"What will happen when they find out about Marissa?"

"If you're lucky you'll be taken off the case and suspended for a few days. If you're not . . ." Max finished his coffee. He set the mug back down on the table with a thump. "Look, you have to realize what a huge political shit-storm you stand to unleash. If you push back on closing the case while you explore an alternate theory, they could use your indiscretion as a lever to get rid of you. You're in a bad spot, son."

The reality of Max's words hit him hard.

"And if they don't find out?"

"It's possible they won't and everything will continue on the way it was. The case will close, and you'll move on to the next one. Is that something you can live with?"

Seth stared down into the empty coffee cup, weighing his options. Could he risk being thrown off the case? Could he live with the lie?

"You're right. They will close the case, and Marissa's daughter might never be found. I can't let that happen."

"Then you've got a tough decision to make, son. First I'm taking you to an AA meeting. You'll be no good to anyone if you don't get your own house in order."

• • • •

"ALVAREZ'S BEEN LOOKING for you," Linda Garcia said as Seth strode into the squad room.

Seth nodded. His head throbbed, and he pressed a palm to his temple.

"Was he pissed?"

"Well, he wasn't all sunshine and rainbows, if that's what you're asking."

Great. Max had insisted on AA, so now, instead of his being half an hour late, it was coming up on eleven o'clock. A thick folder sat in the middle of his desk. But before he could face it, he needed more coffee.

Five minutes later Seth thumbed through the medical examiner's report on the desk with a heavy heart. DNA evidence had confirmed his suspicions. The dead body in Charles Sully's trunk was Kim Covey. The extensive bruising on her back, and defensive wounds on her hands and arms all spoke to the gruesome beating Kim Covey had endured before her death.

If the killer had beaten the shit out of Kim before he killed and dismembered her, how much worse would Brooke endure?

The headache intensified, and he pressed his palms into his closed eyes, trying to relieve the pressure. In a fit of desperation, he wrenched the top drawer of his desk open and pawed through the layers of papers and other assorted crap in search of the bottle of Advil he kept stashed there for emergencies. Hand buried deep in the drawer, he froze as he caught sight of Holly's picture. Memories of last night with Marissa came rushing back.

What would Holly say if she knew what he'd done? Would she feel betrayed? Would she want him to move on? Seth shook his head at the unexpected anger welling up inside him as a new thought dawned.

She was the one who had abandoned him. She had swallowed a handful of pills to make her pain go away. How was he supposed to deal with that? How was he supposed to make the pain go away? He'd lived with the agony of losing her for two years now, always blaming himself. But maybe she deserved some of the blame too.

Seth yanked the picture out of the drawer and threw it into the trash bin under his desk. Glass and wood clattered noisily, and heads turned in his direction. He ignored everyone around him, still digging for the Advil.

He upended the bottle into his cupped hand, but nothing emerged. It was empty. Fucking perfect. Seth gritted his teeth and flung the vial in the garbage pail. It clattered noisily against the picture frame.

"Crawford," Alvarez barked from across the squad room.

Seth's chin snapped up. With a grimace he rose from his chair and threaded his way through the rows of desks. The lieutenant closed the office door. Seth frowned. A closed-door conversation was definitely not a good sign. Easing into the guest chair, Seth waited for the ass-chewing to begin. He didn't have to wait long.

"Nice of you to show up."

Seth stared across the desk without comment.

After a lengthy silence, the lieutenant continued. "What's the latest on the body?"

"According to the DNA evidence, it's Kim Covey."

Alvarez cringed. Seth knew it didn't come as a complete shock, but the brutal death of any girl came hard. Alvarez's gaze strayed to the framed photographs on his desk. From this angle Seth couldn't see them, but he knew they were pictures of the lieutenant's family—his pretty wife and their two young girls.

"Have her parents been informed?"

"Not yet," he said, dreading the inevitable task. Seth could still hear Teresa Turner's accusations in the back of his mind.

"Are they still in town?"

"The Coveys? Yes. I'll go see them this morning."

"Any new developments on the whereabouts of the Parker girl?"

"Not yet."

"The chief wants an update by noon."

Of course he does.

"Yes, sir."

"We need to find the Parker girl's body so we can close this case."

"She may be alive," Seth said.

"In her condition? You really believe that?"

Seth gritted his teeth, frustration building. Alvarez was probably right. But how could he tell Marissa he'd failed? How could he tell her Brooke was dead?

"I'm doing everything I can," he snapped.

"Then do it faster. Do your job. You can start by telling me where you were this morning."

"I was with Marissa Rooney," Seth blurted.

He hadn't meant to say it, but there it was.

Alvarez's mouth dropped open. He stared at Seth in slack-jawed amazement, and Seth knew he'd said too much. He was beyond caring though. And now that he'd said it, there was no taking it back.

"Tell me you're not serious."

Seth shrugged. "Look, I know what you want. You want a quick, clean ending to the case. I do too. But you know as well as I do it doesn't work that way. I don't give a flying fuck about the chief's report or any of the other political bullshit associated with this fucking case. I care about one thing—finding Brooke Parker. And my every instinct is telling me that Charles Sully may not be our guy."

"Based on what? Wishful thinking? The woody you have for her mother?"

Half a heartbeat of silence pulsed between them. Seth sprang to his feet, hands clenched. The chair clattered behind him. He desperately wanted to drill his fist into the lieutenant's perfect nose.

"Did you sleep with her, Crawford? I want the truth."

"Yes."

"Fuck." Alvarez's hands splayed wide in a frustrated arc. "Do you have any idea what a fucking mess this case is? The chief is riding my ass demanding results, and you're sleeping with the victim's mother. Now you're questioning Sully as a viable suspect. Have you lost your fucking mind? Do you know what a shitty position this puts me in?"

"Afraid of losing your promotion, Lieutenant?"

Alvarez's face flushed a deep shade of scarlet.

"You're off the case, Crawford. Hand the files over to Garcia."

A thick vein bulged in the lieutenant's forehead. Anger pulsed in every syllable.

"Don't you breathe a fucking word of what happened until I figure out what I'm going to do with you, do you understand me, Crawford? Not a single fucking word. Not about your relationship with Ms. Rooney or your half-assed theory about Sully not being the killer. Nothing."

Seth leaned an inch closer, staring his boss in the eyes.

"Tell me, Brad, when did closing the case become more important than finding the truth?"

"Get your ass out of here before I fire you."

"Don't bother."

The solution was so absurdly simple, it almost hadn't occurred to him. Seth removed the badge from his pocket. He stared at it for a few seconds, reflecting back over the many cases he'd worked in his career—some good, some bad. Max was right. He'd miss it, he knew. But it was time. With an air of finality, he tossed it on the lieutenant's desk. He pulled his gun from its holster and placed it beside the badge.

Alvarez's jaw dropped.

"Think about this, Crawford. If you leave now, there's no coming back."

An absurd bubble of laughter rose in Seth's throat. He closed the door quietly on his way out of the office, feeling lighter than he had in years.

Marissa sat in the waiting room. She was early for her Monday morning appointment with Dr. Anita Frank, rated one of the top family psychologists in the city. Marissa knew that when they found Brooke, her daughter would need the best therapist she could find.

Classical music played over the speakers. The colors were calming—sedate gray walls, lavender furniture, plush gray carpet. Silvery air bubbles drifted through the tank filled with colorful tropical fish.

Marissa thought about the pills she had almost taken, about the constant state of panic she'd lived in since Brooke had disappeared, and the guilt and fear and hope she felt whenever she thought about Seth. A lifetime of therapy might not be enough to sort out her shit. But that wasn't why she was here.

The door at the far end of the office opened, and she recognized Dr. Anita Frank's face from the profile piece she'd read in Seattle Magazine.

Dr. Frank smiled. "Ms. Rooney?"

"Yes." Marissa stood quickly, squelching an attack of nerves.

"I have five minutes before my next appointment."

"Thanks for fitting me in. I'll be brief."

Marissa perched on the edge of the love seat in Dr. Frank's office.

"I'm here on behalf of the Holt Foundation. Our mission is to help victims of violence and their families."

"I've read the materials you sent and will gladly donate to the cause. Unfortunately I have another commitment tomorrow night, so I won't be able to attend the benefit in person."

"Thank you, Dr. Frank. That's very generous of you, but I was hoping for something more than money."

Dr. Frank's brows rose, and she eyed Marissa with curiosity. "Oh?"

"I was hoping you'd consider donating some of your time to counsel the victims and their families."

Dr. Frank uncrossed her legs and leaned forward in her chair. Her kind brown eyes met Marissa's, and she shook her head.

"I wish I could. I have every confidence the Holt Foundation will do great things, but I'm afraid I can't participate. I already donate time to Child Sanctuary and the Cancer Foundation. I also sit on the board for the Seattle's Children's Home. Between that, my practice, and my family, my schedule is stretched pretty thin. I'd love to help you, Ms. Rooney, but I can't."

"Dr. Frank, there are families out there, victims like my daughter who could never afford the type of treatment you offer. Having someone with your reputation would help us attract a number of other prominent specialists to help provide critical services for families in need. Please, Dr. Frank, we need you."

Compassion and regret mingled on the doctor's kind face.

"I appreciate what you're doing. I really do, but I can't commit enough of my time to make it worth your while."

Marissa's hopes plummeted. She'd pinned her hopes on securing Dr. Frank as the linchpin of her services strategy. Now she'd have to reconsider. If Dr. Frank had so many other commitments, what about the list of other potential candidates? Would they be willing to donate their time?

“I was so sorry to hear about your daughter’s disappearance, Ms. Rooney. I can’t imagine anything more tragic.”

Marissa nodded in acknowledgement and forced a smile.

“Thank you for your time, Dr. Frank,” she said, rising to her feet.

Dr. Frank stood and shook her hand warmly.

“I wish I could do something more to help,” she said. “I will send along my donation.”

“Thank you.”

• • • •

DEFLATED, MARISSA TRUDGED back to the Smith Tower. Hunched behind her desk, she stared at her e-mail in-box and picked at her cuticles. She should be doing research and finding other mental health professionals to approach, but she didn’t have the heart. Short on sleep and still reeling from Seth’s tortured admission, Marissa didn’t have much fight left in her.

Henry Cahill breezed into the office. Marissa looked up.

“Is Ms. Holt in?”

“She had a meeting this morning, but she should be back soon. Is there something I can help you with?”

Cahill shrugged. “Well, I’ve been trying to get hold of Detective Crawford. He sent me an image file Saturday night, and I’ve been working on it. I have something to show him, but he’s not answering his phone.”

Anxiety knotted Marissa’s stomach. She hoped he was okay. There were a dozen legitimate potential reasons for his not answering his phone, but she knew from personal experience he almost always answered. Saturday night had been the first time she hadn’t been able to reach him. Panic had brought her to his door in the middle of a rainstorm.

“I’ll see if I can reach him,” she said feebly. Cahill thanked her and left the office.

Minutes later Elizabeth Holt swept in. She settled in her chair and asked Evan to bring her some tea. Marissa wanted to tell her about her efforts to enlist Dr. Frank but decided against it. Efforts meant little. Holt was the type of woman who expected results. Instead Marissa left a message on Seth’s voice mail.

Holt glanced over.

“How are we looking for tomorrow night’s benefit?”

“Good. I’ve finalized the seating plan. The caterer is ready to go.”

“Can I see it?”

“What?”

“The seating plan.”

“Sure,” she said, and e-mailed the list to Holt, praying she wouldn’t insist on changes at this late date.

Marissa checked her phone. Still no call from Seth. She texted him.

No sooner had she set down her phone than the door burst open and Henry Cahill marched in with Seth close on his heels. Marissa closed her eyes for a brief second as relief washed over her. He was safe—dressed in jeans and a T-shirt, his hair windblown and damp from the rain.

“Ms. Holt, we have something to show you,” Cahill said.

“Detective Crawford,” Holt said, arching her brow in a curious look. “I’m surprised to see you.”

“I hope you don’t mind I’m here,” Seth said.

Mind? Why would Holt mind? There was a subtext to their conversation Marissa wasn't following, and as usual, Holt's expression gave nothing away.

"Not at all. So tell me, Henry, what did you find?"

All eyes turned toward Cahill.

"Detective Crawford sent me something last night."

Cahill set his tablet computer on Holt's desk, and Holt leaned forward. Marissa sprang from her chair and hovered behind the group, straining to see the small screen. Her heart lurched as she caught a glimpse of Brooke.

Marissa remembered Brooke's first date. Wearing a pale-pink dress, she had looked as pretty as a rose petal as she waited for Jesse Morgan to arrive, while Marissa had been a bundle of nerves. She'd paced the house for hours waiting for Brooke to come home that night, telling herself that Brooke was smart, that Brooke was a smart girl. She wouldn't make the same mistakes Marissa had. When Brooke had arrived home on time, just before ten o'clock, Marissa had known she'd been stupid to worry. Brooke was a responsible kid.

Marissa stared at Brooke's image on the screen, smiling at the dark-haired young man. Half of her hoped this would be the lead that would help bring Brooke home, and half of her feared they would never find her daughter.

She felt Seth's gaze on her and looked over. His gray eyes locked on her face. Her heart lurched and she forced a small smile. She thought about how they'd left things Sunday morning and wondered how he was coping. He looked better than he had when he'd left the house. Less troubled. More sure.

"The photograph was taken with a cell phone the night Brooke disappeared." Cahill's voice interrupted her thoughts, and she tore her gaze away from Seth, refocusing on the screen.

"Where did you get it?" Holt asked.

"Jesse Morgan," Seth answered. The unexpected name caused her heart to skip. "He's been asking his regulars at the bar for anything that might help find Brooke. One of them sent him this picture."

Surprise turned to gratitude. She'd written Jesse off years ago as a carefree, irresponsible kid who cared about no one other than himself. But now, faced with this new revelation, she realized maybe she'd been too quick to judge.

"It's surprisingly good quality," Holt said.

Cahill grinned like a kid who'd just won the science fair. "Yeah, well, it was taken in low light, blurry as shit, so I ran it through a few enhancement filters, and voilà."

"Do we know who he is?"

"Not yet. I'm running it through a facial recognition program. See how he's looking away from the camera?" Cahill pointed at the screen. "The program works by measuring and matching generalities of the subject's facial structure. Because he's looking away, we're less likely to get a definitive match, but we will get a list of probable matches. From there I can set up a query eliminating potential suspects based on other criteria—age, where they live, you know."

"Excellent work, Henry. Let me know when you have more."

"Will do," Cahill said, and left the room with a satisfied smile.

"Marissa, could you give me a moment alone with Detective Crawford?"

Surprised, Marissa cast a curious glance between the two before she left the office. She hovered outside the doors. While it wasn't exactly eavesdropping, it was skirting the line. With all the noise out in the great room, she caught only a word or two of the conversation. Minutes later Seth emerged.

He stopped when he saw Marissa.

“Are you okay?” she asked.

“More or less.”

She wanted to touch him, to run her hand across his raspy cheek and see if the connection between them Saturday night was still there. He stepped back, as if reading her intent. An awkward pause stretched out between them. There was so much she wanted to say, but she was afraid of saying too much. He’d made it clear yesterday morning he felt last night had been a huge mistake.

She searched for some neutral ground.

“What did Ms. Holt want?”

“She offered me a job.”

“A job?” Marissa asked, confused.

“Yeah, it seems I’m in need of one.”

Oh God.

“This is my fault. You got fired because of me.”

“No, I quit.”

Marissa blinked, wondering if she’d heard right. “You what?”

“I think maybe it’s time to do something else.”

Seth’s lips cocked into a rare half grin. Marissa was too dumbfounded to respond. He glanced down and checked his watch.

“Sorry, I have a meeting to get to.”

He left before she could say another word.

Tonight was Elizabeth's night. Launching the Holt Foundation was the crowning achievement of her brilliant career, the fulfillment of a lifelong dream, and Marissa wanted everything perfect. Elizabeth deserved as much.

Pausing at the top of the stairs, Marissa swept her anxious gaze across the ballroom. Something was wrong. As she scanned each of the tables, it took a moment to sink in. The tablecloths were the wrong color. She had specifically ordered white. These were cream.

"Everything looks lovely, Marissa."

Marissa nodded, shooting a worried glance Evan Holt's way.

"Is everything all right?" he asked.

"They're the wrong tablecloths."

Evan glanced at a nearby table and shrugged his shoulders.

"Maybe so, but the tables look great. Stop worrying."

"Elizabeth will notice. I wonder if there's time to change them."

Marissa searched the room for the catering director. He was nowhere to be found. She started off toward the kitchen, but Evan's hand on her arm stalled her.

"Marissa, there's no time. The tables look lovely. Really. Let it go."

Evan was right. Guests would arrive at any minute. She'd been so careful to plan every detail. She'd wanted tonight to be perfect. Now this.

"You're still worrying. Can I get you a drink?"

"Me? Nothing. Thanks."

A drink might help calm her nerves, but she didn't dare. She was short on sleep and had an empty stomach—a glass of wine would hit her hard.

Elizabeth appeared at the far side of the room. Her black gown fluttered softly around her as she approached. Evan kissed his aunt's pale cheek. She smiled affectionately at him, patting his hand.

"Everything looks lovely, Marissa." Elizabeth smiled. "You've done well."

"But the tablecloths were supposed to be white."

"No matter. The cream ones work just fine."

Evan snatched two champagne flutes from the tray of a passing waiter. Handing one to Elizabeth, he raised the other in a toast.

"To the Holt Foundation. May we have an excellent night."

Elizabeth sipped champagne, her eyes drinking in every detail of Marissa's appearance, from the beaded bodice of the golden gown to the flowing gossamer skirt. She lowered her glass, looking pleased.

"You look like Cinderella dressed for the ball."

"Would that make you my fairy godmother?"

Elizabeth laughed. "I suppose so."

Marissa cast her gaze down the stairway toward the lobby, where guests pooled in the foyer. Her stomach gave a nervous flutter.

"Here we go," she said, heading for the stairway.

For the next half hour, Marissa greeted guests, directed traffic, and ensured everything went off without a hitch. The frantic pace kept her focused. And when the mayor and his wife arrived, she greeted them warmly and handed them off to Evan, who escorted them to the head table.

“I see you’ve landed on your feet, Ms. Rooney.”

Marissa silently groaned. The last thing she needed on top of the stress of making sure the benefit ran smoothly was Paige Benoit’s hateful remarks.

“Ms. Benoit, what a surprise. I don’t recall seeing your name on the guest list.”

“Mr. Regis encouraged the staff to attend. What a surprise to find you playing a central role in Ms. Holt’s benefit.”

“Thank you for coming,” Marissa said.

Benoit’s gaze slid slowly over her. Marissa knew that look. Benoit was trying to make her feel cheap. Unworthy. Like a whore dressed up in someone else’s clothes.

“That’s quite a dress, Ms. Rooney.”

Two weeks ago Benoit’s words might have made Marissa feel small, but now they glanced off her without leaving a scratch. Marissa almost felt sorry for the woman. She wondered where such bitterness stemmed from. Benoit looked like she was going to say more when Evan arrived at her side. He eyed her former boss with the same chilly professional air he’d shown Marissa the first time they’d met.

“Ah, Ms. Benoit. So glad you could make it. Allow me to show you to your table.”

With a broad sweep of his hand, Evan gestured toward the staircase. Tossing one last corrosive look Marissa’s way, she followed him into the ballroom.

“She’s right. That is quite a dress.”

Marissa spun on her heel at the sound of his voice. Her breath caught as she came face-to-face with Seth. He looked handsome dressed in a tuxedo, the black jacket emphasizing his broad shoulders and fit physique.

“Thank you. It’s Elizabeth Holt’s dress.”

“I’m sure it looks better on you.”

A twinkle of amusement flashed in his gray eyes, and she remembered he’d said something similar about the police T-shirt she’d worn the morning after. Did he remember it too? Looking up into his face, she thought maybe he did.

“You know what I mean. She sent it to me, along with the shoes.”

She lifted the hem of her skirt, revealing the delicate matching sandals for his inspection. Seth inclined his head toward her, his voice soft, his breath fanning her cheek.

“You really should get better at accepting compliments.”

Marissa blushed. A few blonde curls escaped the intricate knot at the back of her neck and tickled the side of her face. Seth’s hand reached toward her, like he might sweep the hairs away from her cheek, and her breath caught.

Marissa stared at the river of twisted scars running down the side of his face. All warriors have scars. When she looked at his, she saw something beautiful—the story of a husband willing to sacrifice himself to save his wife. How many men have loved so much, lost so much, and still survived? Pain could have destroyed him, but it hadn’t. No one had ever loved her that way.

His hand stalled inches from her face, and Marissa released her breath. He stepped back. All she had to do was reach out and take his hand. All she had to do was bridge the gap between them. Marissa looked into his gray eyes, as turbulent as a stormy sky, and knew he wasn’t ready yet. Maybe he never would be.

“I know we need to talk, but this isn’t the right time.”

“I know,” she said, more sad than bitter.

Tonight was about Elizabeth Holt and the foundation. So Marissa pushed back her need to resolve things between them. She would wait. Seth was worth that much. And more.

Marissa watched him dissolve into the crowd. Catching her breath, she turned as the next set of guests entered.

Loss was still an open wound for Mary and Kevin Covey. Every cell in Marissa's body felt their pain. She would never forget the horror of seeing their daughter's body laid out on a metal table. Tears welled in Marissa's eyes. She blinked them back, holding her hand out to Mary. Mary took it.

"Thank you for coming," Marissa said, her voice thick with sorrow.

Kevin took her other hand. She searched for something to say—some comfort she could offer—but there were no words for the hell the Coveys were going through.

"How are you holding up?"

The Coveys clung to each other, two victims adrift in a sea of agony and grief.

"It's been really hard," Kevin said, curving an arm around his wife's slumped shoulders. "Any news on Brooke?"

Marissa shook her head. Kevin studied her with sad, solemn eyes. He knew. He knew what she was going through, and for a moment, she felt less alone.

"We're praying for you," Mary said, sagging against her husband's frame.

Marissa said nothing. She'd stopped believing in God years ago. She hoped Mary found comfort in her faith, and the strength she needed to get through this nightmare.

Marissa squeezed Mary's damp hand and let go. Her heart ached with the weight of their loss. Her chest tight, she pulled in a shuddering breath. She needed a few minutes alone to regain her composure. She needed some fresh air. Turning, she crossed the lobby, heading for the entrance.

"Marissa," Elizabeth called. Her icy fingers wrapped around Marissa's elbow. "Come. There is someone I'd like to introduce you to."

Marissa gazed outside into the dark night. Two or three minutes alone were all she needed, but she had no choice. She followed Elizabeth across the crowded ballroom.

Elizabeth stopped next to a tall man in his midsixties. He had a thick gray head of hair and sharp, aristocratic features. Next to Elizabeth's gaunt frame, he looked the picture of health.

He reached for Elizabeth's hand and stepped toward her. His lips brushed her lined cheek.

"You look lovely tonight, Lizzie," he said in a voice so low Marissa almost missed it.

Lizzie. Marissa's ears pricked up at the casual use of the name. The only other person she knew who called Elizabeth that was Evan.

"Marissa, allow me to introduce Alistair Wright."

She knew the name. Alistair Wright. Lawyer. Philanthropist.

"Ah, Ms. Rooney, it's a pleasure to meet you in person."

"You too, sir."

His grip was firm and sure.

"You know each other?" Elizabeth asked, surprise evident in the arch of her brows.

"I had other plans this evening, but Ms. Rooney called me personally. I could hardly refuse. She can be quite persuasive."

"You mean persistent," Marissa said with a quick grin.

"Just so." He nodded.

"Alistair and I went to law school together. He was the editor of the law review. Graduated near the top of his class."

"Second only to Lizzie," he said.

Alistair's warm gaze lingered on Elizabeth's face, and Lizzie fingered the necklace around her throat. A look passed between them. Something private. Something she was not meant to see, and Marissa averted her gaze, catching Evan's eye.

Looking thoughtful, Evan sipped champagne from his glass.

"I was sorry to hear about your daughter," Alistair said, turning toward Marissa. "I hope for everyone's sake she is found soon."

"Thank you."

"As a parent, I can only imagine how you must feel." He stretched an arm around the shoulders of a pretty young woman at his side. "This is my daughter, Alicia."

"Hello," Marissa said, extending her hand.

"It's a pleasure to meet you, Ms. Rooney."

The ring on Alicia's finger turned, catching the light.

"Good lord, what a beautiful ring," Elizabeth said, grasping Alicia's outstretched hand.

"Alicia just announced her engagement." Alistair smiled wide.

"Well, aren't you the proud papa?"

"Indeed I am."

"Congratulations," Marissa said.

Watching Alistair with his beautiful daughter, Marissa thought about her own daughters. She didn't know if they would find Brooke. Each day stretched into the next like some form of torture. She didn't know if her family would ever be whole again. As if sensing her thoughts, Evan placed his hand lightly on Marissa's shoulder. She looked up into his concerned gaze. A wave of gratitude washed through her as the conversation flowed around them.

"Wonderful news, Alistair. Where is the lucky young man?"

Alistair shot Alicia a questioning look.

"Oh, Drew? He's outside making a call. Something about work. He should be back soon."

Alicia threaded her arm through her father's, and Marissa's heart weighed like an anchor inside her chest. Excusing herself from the group, she made for the door, knowing this might be her last chance for some air before the speeches started.

The doors parted and she breathed in the night air. It felt cold and fresh in her lungs. Stepping outside, she accidentally brushed the arm of another woman who was on her way in.

"Excuse me," Marissa said.

"Ms. Rooney."

Marissa stopped. She searched the woman's face. It couldn't be.

"Dr. Frank?"

"I've been thinking about you ever since you left my office, and well, here I am."

"I'm so happy you came. Come, let me introduce you to Ms. Holt."

The doors closed behind Marissa, and she led Dr. Frank into the ballroom. Once she'd found Elizabeth in the crowd, she made the introductions.

The two women shook hands, and Marissa could tell by the shift in Elizabeth's expression that she recognized the name. Elizabeth gave Marissa an approving smile, and she realized that now she had fully accomplished the mission Elizabeth had set for her. Three influential donors were here at the benefit because of her.

"Ms. Rooney said you were pulling together a set of professional services as part of your foundation. She convinced me to donate some of my time. I've taken the liberty of speaking with some colleagues who also expressed an interest in helping out."

“Thank you, Dr. Frank. You’re too kind.”

“I will have my office contact Ms. Rooney, and we’ll work out the arrangements.”

“Excellent.”

Marissa left the two women talking animatedly about Elizabeth’s vision for the foundation. Leaving the crowd behind, she pushed open the door and walked outside into the dark night. A thick blanket of charcoal clouds hung low over the city. Shadows and light fell in a checkerboard pattern across the cracked asphalt. Marissa shivered.

She slipped between the buildings, her high heels clicking down the alleyway. Despite the cold, it felt wonderful to be out of the crowd. With all those people around, she could hardly breathe. Everyone was looking at her, pitying her.

The sight of Kim Covey’s parents had driven her thoughts down a very dark path. All this time she’d imagined Brooke out there somewhere, waiting to be found, waiting to come home. That day in the morgue had forced her to consider the unthinkable. Brooke might never come home again—they might not even find her body.

A strangled cry escaped Marissa’s lips. She pressed her palm against her lips, stifling the sound. Pain pulsed through her chest, and she slumped, her shoulder pressed up against the building beside her.

She’d always believed that knowing would be better than not knowing, and while part of her knew that was true, another part of her couldn’t stand the idea of losing hope. Without hope she was lost. Without hope she’d be forced to face a life without Brooke, without her baby. A chilling cold seeped into her bones. Inky blackness pooled around Marissa.

In the dark she heard a sound, like footsteps approaching behind her. She swung away from the wall and peered down the alley. All she could see was darkness and shadows.

“Hello?” she called, her voice echoing down the alley.

No one answered. Cars buzzed in the distance. She strained her ears to hear something else. But there was nothing.

Goose bumps prickled her arms. Fear tingled along her nerve endings. Something wasn’t right. She shouldn’t be out here. She should probably get back. Elizabeth would be looking for her.

She took one last look down the alley. A dark figure swung around the corner of the building, coming toward her. His footsteps rang on the concrete.

“Hello?” she said again.

He didn’t respond. With each long stride, he drew closer. He was tall. Broad-shouldered. Dressed in black. His face was cloaked in shadow.

Marissa spun on her heel and hurried down the alley, away from the man. She heard him approaching, his pace faster now. Her heart raced. The sidewalk was still ten yards away. She slipped; her ankle twisted. She stumbled, then righted herself and kept going.

Five yards now. Four. She glanced behind her. He was still there. Closer. His chin was down; she couldn’t see his face.

“Marissa?”

Seth appeared on the sidewalk. She jumped. Craning her head around, she looked down the alley. It was empty.

After the chilly night air, the crowded ballroom felt like a sauna. Drew headed straight for the bar. He needed a drink if he was to have any prayer of making it through the speeches.

Marissa sat at the head table, surrounded by Seattle's elite. He was impressed by the transformation she'd undergone since leaving his father, her beauty refined over the years. It wasn't just the dress; she looked as if she belonged here. But then, that shouldn't surprise him.

When had Rick ever brought the best out in anyone? Sure as hell Drew wasn't the same boy who had lived in his father's house. And like Marissa's, his changes ran far deeper than the clothes on his back, the expensive car he drove, and the beautiful fiancée by his side.

The line moved and Drew glanced up at the ponytailed bartender.

"Glenlivet?" the bartender asked the suit in front of him.

"Tonic water."

"On duty tonight, Detective Crawford?"

Drew stiffened. Detective? He shifted his position to get a better look at the guy. And Christ, what a face. Not one you could easily forget, with those huge scars running from his eye down to his jawline.

"Jesse Morgan. You pop up more often than a character in a Stephen King Castle Rock novel. Surely you're not the only bartender in this city," the cop said.

"I get around," Jesse said, pouring tonic water over ice cubes and squeezing in a lime.

"I've heard that about you."

Jesse handed Crawford his drink and turned his gaze on Drew.

"Grey Goose martini, dry and dirty, right?"

Drew stared at the bartender. Sweat dampened his palms as he sized the guy up, trying to place him.

Shit. The Chapel. He remembered the bartender there flashing a photo of Brooke on his phone. The cop eyed Drew with a curious look.

"Damn, you're good," he said, making light of the moment.

"I never forget a drink. Did your girl say yes?"

"What?"

"Your girl. You were at Maximilien's the other night, right?"

"Yeah. Oh, yeah. She said yes."

"Congratulations. Drink's on the house."

"Aren't they all?" Drew joked feebly.

Heart pounding like a jackrabbit's, Drew saluted Jesse with his glass and beelined it to his table. It was time to leave. That last brush at the bar had unnerved him. Alicia would raise holy hell if he tried to leave before the speeches, though, so he had no choice. He'd sit through those and then he was out of here.

Shifting his chair, he positioned himself behind Alicia and gulped his martini.

Elizabeth Holt opened up the night by droning on about the foundation and its mission to help families whose lives had been torn apart by kidnapping, rape, blah, blah, blah.

The speech was as captivating as a calculus lecture, and Holt had all the sex appeal of one of the wizened tribal women with leathery tits on the cover of National Geographic. When was the last time she'd gotten laid? Eighteen seventy? Fucking her would be almost as much fun as dry-humping a fence post.

Feigning polite interest, he sipped his drink. In the middle of her closing remarks, Holt started coughing. Hunched over a cocktail napkin, she waved off some douche who hovered close by and pointed a bony finger toward Marissa.

Marissa rose like Aphrodite reborn and intoned, "Thank you for coming tonight and showing your support for the Holt Foundation. As many of you know, my daughter Brooke went missing . . ."

Riveted by the pain he saw in Marissa's eyes, he couldn't tear his gaze away. Each day Brooke was missing, she died a little more. Suddenly he was glad he hadn't left before the speeches. He would have missed this.

Marissa's voice faded from his mind and a memory surfaced. He was seventeen, and Rick was drunk again. Marissa was arguing with him, pleading with him to stop drinking and take his pills. Idiot. Tears wouldn't convince the old man to do anything. He was too cold. Too hard. Too far gone to care about anything.

Drew had hung back in the shadows of the living room, watching. Waiting. He knew what would happen next. God knew he'd been on the receiving end long enough to recognize the old man's tells. He'd never seen it from this perspective before though.

Marissa shouted something, and Rick's shoulders tensed. That was it. That was the moment when you stepped out of range. She missed it. Rick's hand shot out, quick as lightning. The bloodstone ring flashed in the light, and he drilled Marissa square in the face. Her head snapped back. Blood ran down her swollen lips. Scarlet drops stained her white T-shirt.

Anger flashed in her eyes. She fled down the hall to the bedroom. Rick didn't follow. He wiped his fist off on his jeans and slumped back into the chair. He grabbed the bottle and poured himself another drink, like nothing had happened.

Silent as a ghost, Drew crept down the hall.

The bedroom door was slightly ajar. Just an inch or two. A crack. Just enough to catch a glimpse of Marissa stripping off her T-shirt. Her full, round breasts filled the lacy cups of her bra. She swiped the blood from her mouth with the T-shirt and tossed it on the bed.

Drew moved closer to the door. Aroused. Wanting to taste the salty blood on her lips. Wanting to savor the warm smell of her skin. Her hair. Explore the smooth curves of her body beneath his hands. Lick the tears from her face. She had never looked more beautiful to him than she did in that moment.

Drew heard his father's drunken footsteps staggering from the kitchen. Marissa slammed the door. Drew slipped into the shadows out of view just as his father reached the hallway.

He'd fantasized about her, about that night more times than he could count, reenacted part of this scene down in the cabins with Kim Covey and the other girls. After all, Marissa was the reason he chose blue-eyed, blonde beauties for his nocturnal games.

The memory still made him hard. Beneath the table Drew reached for Alicia's thigh. His fingers snaked beneath the hemline of her skirt and slid up her smooth, bare skin. She tensed. Her fingers closed around his wrist and gently eased his hand down her leg toward her knee like a proper little daddy's girl.

He looked up and his heart jolted. The cop with the scars was staring straight at him. Drew forced a benign smile and downed the last of his drink. Marissa was still talking. He'd tuned out long ago, but Alicia dabbed her eyes with the linen napkin. He could see the impact of Marissa's speech on the faces all around him. He clapped along with the others, willing the night to be over.

At last Drew stood. He gripped Alicia's hand and pulled her close. Bending down, he whispered into her ear, "Let's get out of here."

