He swiped her hand across the front of his trousers, hard enough that she could feel his erection. Alicia laughed.

"You're so bad. I want you to meet her before we go."

"Who?"

Drew's heartbeat quickened. His gaze locked on Marissa. He hadn't seen her in years, but if Brooke had recognized him after all this time, she might too.

"Come on. Let's go."

"Easy, tiger. You'll get what you want, but first indulge me."

Fuck.

He'd made a huge mistake coming here. First the bartender from the Chapel had recognized him. Now Marissa loomed dead ahead. He needed to get the fuck out of here before everything came crashing down around him.

Alicia clutched his hand tight, dragging him through the crowd. They closed in on Marissa. Sweat dampened his palms and he yanked Alicia back.

"Let's go. Now."

Alicia shivered as his lips brushed her ear.

"Drew, it will only take a minute."

Her grip on his hand tightened and she marched ahead. Five yards. Four. They were close enough now to hear Marissa's voice.

Fuck.

He couldn't risk her seeing him. Alicia was going to force his hand, and he was going to make a scene. All because she wanted to show him off.

Marissa turned. Drew's breath caught. Their eyes met for a brief second before Drew averted his gaze. Alicia kept walking.

"Ms. Holt," she called.

Holt's curious gaze swung toward them. She spied Alicia, and her expression softened into a welcoming smile.

"This must be your young man," she said, extending her hand toward Drew.

He cleared his throat, his mouth bone-dry. "Drew Matthews. It's a pleasure to meet you, Ms. Holt."

Her grip was surprisingly firm, and he squeezed her swollen joints just hard enough to make her wince.

"I hear you'll be joining the Wright clan."

"That's right," he said, grinning at the pun.

Glancing over Holt's shoulder, he saw the cop moving through the crowd toward them. Drew tensed, knowing it was time to get out of here, with or without Alicia.

Holt coughed. After excusing herself, she continued. "Well, I've got a story or two about Alistair you might want to hear if . . ."

She held up her hand and coughed harder this time. The color drained from Holt's face. Alicia's smile faded, and she leaned forward, gripping the old woman's elbow.

"Are you all right, Ms. Holt?" she asked, her voice sharp with worry.

Holt's mouth opened. Her knees buckled, and she crumpled to the floor like a rag doll.

The crowd gasped and closed ranks, forming a tight circle around Holt's prone form.

“Lizzie,” a tall young man in a black suit shouted above the din, pushing his way to Holt’s side.

“Call 911,” Drew shouted to no one in particular as he jostled his way through the crowd, toward the exit.

Marissa paced the waiting room of Harborview Medical Center, her bare feet aching. The golden sandals she'd been wearing hours before were stuffed into her purse. Seth's tuxedo jacket was wrapped around her shoulders like a warm cloak.

The antiseptic smell of ammonia turned her stomach. She touched her fingers to her lips and ran her tongue across her scarred gums. Seth's right knee vibrated like that of a teenager on Red Bull, and she knew he didn't like hospitals any more than she did.

Marissa left the window and sank into the chair beside him.

"You don't have to stay, you know."

"I know," he said.

"Hospitals always remind me of the night I left Rick."

"He beat you."

It wasn't a question. She knew he'd read the police report. Marissa shivered and pulled the tuxedo jacket closer around her.

"I let him do it. I stayed. I thought if I could get him back on his meds, everything would work out. I was young and stupid."

Seth placed his hand on hers. She twined her fingers tight in his, not wanting to let go.

"I'm sorry."

"I wanted a family for the girls, and Rick seemed like a solid guy. I had no idea about his mental health issues and drinking until later. I dragged the girls through hell for nothing."

"You were young. You're not that woman anymore," Seth said. He squeezed her hand gently before pulling away. "I spent weeks in the hospital after the fire."

It was the first time he'd talked about his past without her dragging it out of him.

"It must have been painful."

"They had me on some pretty powerful pain-killers when I was hospitalized. After that I self-medicated. I'm an alcoholic, Marissa. Up until a few nights ago, I'd been sober for over a year."

"God, this is all my fault."

"You?"

"If I hadn't gone to your place . . ."

"I was already drunk by the time you showed up, and for the record, I don't regret what happened between us. I was confused, and I'm sorry. I handled things badly."

Their eyes locked.

"And now you're not?"

"I wouldn't go that far."

After all he'd been through, the last thing she wanted was to cause him more pain. He'd lost his job and his sobriety because of her. She was toxic. He'd be smart to get as far away from her as fast as he could before she completely destroyed him.

"I'm just another mistake waiting to happen, Seth."

He pressed a finger to her lips.

"Maybe it's time we both stop blaming ourselves for things we can't change."

It sounded easy when he said it like that, but she knew it was much harder to do. Still, he was right. There was no changing the past. Maybe all they could do was accept their mistakes and move on. Make better choices.

Marissa leaned her head against Seth's shoulder. She didn't remember drifting off, but she awoke to someone gently shaking her shoulder. She blinked. Seth's face hovered inches from hers.

"What time is it?" she asked, straightening in her chair. Her back was sore from sleeping in such an awkward position. She stretched her arms up high in the air and shifted, lengthening her spine.

"Late. I'm going to grab some coffee. Do you want some?"

She nodded and watched him leave the waiting room. His defenses were crumbling, but he wasn't defenseless. She would protect him.

Evan trudged into the waiting room and slumped into the chair beside her, looking wasted. His dark hair was mussed, and she noticed his bloodshot, red-rimmed eyes. He'd been crying, she realized. Dread pooled at the pit of her stomach.

"How's Elizabeth?"

"Not good."

He propped his elbows on his knees and dropped his face in his hands.

"Lizzie has lung cancer. It's spread to both of her lungs and her lymph nodes. There's not much they can do at this stage except make her comfortable."

Elizabeth was dying. The news was so shocking it was hard to absorb. It was unfair. The foundation Elizabeth had worked so hard to build would have to carry on without her. She wouldn't be around to see all the comfort and help it would bring to those who needed it most. And just when Marissa was starting to find her footing, she would lose her mentor.

"How long does she have?"

"Not long. She's been working too hard and not resting like she should. I've been nagging her, but . . ." His voice trailed off and he shook his head.

"And now she can rest," Marissa said.

Evan stared down at the dirty blue carpet. Marissa squeezed his arm.

"She means a lot to you."

"When everyone else in the family had written me off as a junkie loser, Lizzie refused to give up. God knows why. I went through rehab three times before kicking the habit. Lizzie helped me get straight."

"And now look at you."

He half smiled. "A lawyer who doesn't practice."

"You've been helping her launch the foundation."

"I owe her so much."

Marissa smiled gently. "We both do," she said.

"She wants to see you."

"I thought only family could visit."

He shrugged, flipping his hands palms-up. "So you're family."

Marissa rose. On bare feet she left the waiting room and padded along the deserted corridor until she found the right room.

Elizabeth looked fragile. Blue and purple veins were visible beneath her parchment-white skin. A monitor beeped like a metronome counting off time. Marissa checked the digital displays. Pulse rate, oxygen, and half a dozen more readouts she didn't understand. Elizabeth's heartbeat arced across the screen in a jagged green line.

Turning back to the bed, Marissa saw Elizabeth's cobalt eyes open. She inched closer to the bed, fingers curling around the plastic bed rail, and forced a weak smile.

"You gave us all quite a scare."

“I always did like to make a grand exit,” Elizabeth croaked.

Talking triggered a violent coughing spasm, and Marissa grasped the cup of ice water beside the bed. Elizabeth locked her thin lips around the straw and sipped. Once she was satisfied, Marissa set the glass down.

Elizabeth grimaced and shifted on the bed. Marissa reached to help but was quickly shooed away.

“It was a good night.”

“A very good night,” Marissa agreed.

“Getting Dr. Frank to sign on was quite a coup, Marissa. You surprised me.”

“Money’s good, but I figure the foundation needs more than just donations.”

“Very true. The foundation needs you.”

Marissa shook her head. “I’m just an admin. You need smart people to help you run the foundation.”

“I could have hired an army of smart lawyers and entrepreneurs to fill your position, but I chose you. You are a fighter, Marissa. You are a single mother who defied all of the odds to build a better life for you and your daughters. You did this without an education, without money or resources to help you. Imagine how much more you could do with the foundation behind you. No one else I could have hired would understand what a family goes through when something like this happens. You do. You know what they’re going to need. I can hire people with specific expertise. What I cannot find is someone else like you.”

Elizabeth’s admission overwhelmed her. It was an awesome responsibility, and while she wasn’t sure she could live up to it, she knew she would do everything in her power to ensure the right things got done. She wanted to help other families. She wanted to make Elizabeth proud.

“Evan told me about your condition. You’ve been pushing yourself too hard. You need to rest and let us do some of the work for you while you focus on getting better.”

Elizabeth’s smile faded, and her eyes grew dim. Marissa wondered if she felt time running out. Behind her the monitors beeped in the silent room, like the ticking of a clock.

“I want you to have something.”

“Elizabeth, please. Just rest. We can talk more later.”

She didn’t want to hear another word. This sounded too much like a goodbye, but as usual Elizabeth ignored her. She held out her fisted hand. Confused, Marissa frowned. Elizabeth gripped Marissa’s hand and tipped it over. A warm weight filled Marissa’s palm. Stretching her fingers wide, Marissa found Elizabeth’s golden necklace winking in the cold light above the hospital bed.

“That necklace has been my touchstone, my talisman. It gave me strength through some of the darkest moments of my life. I want you to have it. Maybe it will give you strength as you find Brooke and bring her home.”

Tears brimmed over Marissa’s eyelids, scalding her cheeks. Before she could say anything, Elizabeth waved a hand.

“Go home, Marissa. It has been a long night. I need to sleep.”

Marissa squeezed the old woman’s cold hand, feeling the brittle bones beneath her flesh, the necklace gripped tight in her other hand.

“Thank you,” she said.

Elizabeth nodded. Then her blue eyes closed.

SETH PARKED OUTSIDE Marissa's house. She fingered the amulet hanging from the long chain around her neck. The size of a silver dollar, it was thin and round, engraved with what looked to be Egyptian symbols. She wondered what they meant.

Clenching it tight, she glanced over at Seth, his scarred profile half illuminated in the dashboard lights. The air between them hummed like a live current.

"I don't suppose you want to come in?" she asked.

She expected a litany of excuses. I'm tired. It's late. We shouldn't. And while all of those things might be true, that didn't make her want him any less.

Instead he pulled the keys from the ignition. The tightness in Marissa's chest eased. Their eyes met, and she felt a jolt, like an electric shock, shiver through her.

Hands shaking, Marissa fumbled with the lock. Seth took the keys and unlocked the door.

Inside the darkened kitchen, she could hear the loud hum of the refrigerator. Now that he was here, she was suddenly a bundle of nerves.

"Would you like something to drink? Tea?"

Seth shook his head. He turned her slowly around to face him. Looking up, she saw the soft light burning in his eyes. Her hands gripped his waist. The heat of his skin radiated through the thin fabric of the tuxedo shirt. He ran his hands up her bare arms, and she shuddered. Finally his mouth lowered to hers. The kiss was soft, tender.

"Stay?" she asked, when he eased away.

"You sure?"

"Please."

Seth nodded. Marissa pressed up onto her toes, and she kissed him like it was the most natural thing in the world.

Seth woke with a start. This dream was different; he didn't feel the typical panic of trying to rescue Holly from a burning house. While the particulars submerged into the murky recesses of his mind, one indelible image remained—a young man's face.

Who was he, and where had Seth seen him? He struggled to remember. With everything that had happened—Elizabeth's collapse, rushing to the hospital, coming home with Marissa—his mind was a jumble.

As the fuzzy edges of sleep cleared, it came to him. The benefit. Last night. This guy had been staring at Marissa. What had made him stand out? Eyes closed, Seth pictured the man's face.

He'd seen the guy earlier in the night at the bar, where he'd traded banter with Jesse Morgan. But that wasn't it. There was something else. Seth remembered the expression that had been on the guy's face while he stared at Marissa. There had been something inappropriate about his look.

Compassion. Empathy. Sorrow. Even boredom. These were normal, predictable emotions congruent with the occasion, and Seth had seen them in spades when he looked out across the sea of assembled patrons. But the look on this man's face had been wholly different—so much so, it had lodged in Seth's subconscious.

Desire? Yes. And something else, something more insidious. Seth's eyes snapped wide as he locked on the answer.

Contempt. Yes.

Experience had taught Seth never to ignore contempt. When suspects lied and proclaimed their indifference to the bad things that happened to their estranged partners—beatings, robberies, deaths—he watched closely for the slightest telltale flash of contempt on their faces. Part anger, part disgust, contempt was often a precursor to violence.

It was the same expression he'd seen on the face of the young man watching Marissa. Seth was certain of it. But why?

A heavy rain pattered on the tin roof above. Rolling onto his side, he saw Marissa in the dim light. The curve of her bare shoulder jutted above the blankets.

In the dark he listened to the sound of her soft, even breathing. Guilt and hope warred within him. Part of him still felt married to Holly, melded to her by the horrible memory of how she'd died. Part of him wanted to stay right here in this moment. Not worry about what would come next. He didn't know what was right or wrong anymore.

Watching the rise and fall of Marissa's breath, Seth knew there was no way he was getting back to sleep. Rather than wake her, he eased out of bed. He'd get an early start, dig into the young man's identity, and figure out what grudge he held against Marissa, if any.

He dressed quietly in the dark and tiptoed out of the bedroom. Leaving before she woke felt wrong, like she was a one-night stand, but waiting was pointless. Sleep would do Marissa a world of good, and he needed to dig into his hunch.

Seth put a fresh pot of coffee on to brew. He scrawled a quick note on the back of an envelope and propped it against the coffee maker where she was sure to see it. Then, as quietly as he could, he closed the front door.

SETH ARRIVED AT THE Holt Foundation just after 5:00 a.m. Looking like he'd just rolled out of bed, Henry Cahill sat slumped behind his computer, bundled in a black North Face fleece. Cahill thrust his arms up over his head and stretched. Long fingers ruffled the disheveled mop of red hair before coming to rest back on the keyboard.

"Tell me, Detective, do you always get hunches in the middle of the night?"

"Not always, but when I do, I go to work. Sleep is for pussies."

"Is that what they teach you in the police academy?" Cahill smiled dryly. "To roust your colleagues in the middle of the night? We mere mortals cling to the notion of business hours."

"I need you to access the footage from last night's benefit."

"Okay," he said, his fingers flying over the keyboard. "What are we looking for?"

"Just get the video loaded. I'll know him when I see him."

"Him?" Cahill grunted. His eyebrows quirked as he stared at his screen.

Side by side they sifted through the footage. Seth found it hard to concentrate. He couldn't keep his eyes off Marissa, golden and beautiful in her borrowed gown. He watched her greet each guest, making sure everyone's needs were met.

What kind of a guy falls for a woman whose daughter has been kidnapped anyway?

He didn't know. He had no idea what would come next, and for a man used to avoiding the unknown, it was a terrifying place to be. But as Seth watched Marissa on-screen, he felt something shift inside him. Right or wrong, there was no way he could walk away from her now. He cared about her too much.

Deep in thought, Seth almost missed the face he was looking for in the crowd.

"There," he said, pointing at the screen. "That's him."

Cahill stopped the video and zoomed in on the young man's face. It was the same guy Seth had seen at the bar, the same guy Jesse Morgan had recognized from one of the other places he worked.

"That's him all right."

Seth eyed Cahill with a quizzical look and Cahill grinned.

"No, Crawford, you don't get it. It's him."

Cahill pulled up the enhanced photograph of Brooke with the mystery man at the bar and placed it beside the video feed. Crawford slapped the desk with his open palm. Dammit. How had he missed the connection?

"It's the same guy," Seth said.

"Exactly. Looks like your gut was right."

Jesse Morgan had seen the guy before too, at the Chapel the night Brooke disappeared.

"I'll run my facial recognition program to see if I can figure out who he is," Cahill said.

"What database are you using for comparison?"

"You sure you want to know?"

Seth mulled the question over. If Cahill was going to cross an ethical boundary, how much did he want to know? Now that he was no longer a cop, he didn't have to worry about the chain of evidence or fruit of the poisonous tree. All he cared about now was finding Brooke Parker. Still, old habits died hard.

"Tell me."

"I'm going to use the DMV database as my baseline."

"You don't have access."

Cahill's grin widened, and Seth waved a dismissive hand, regretting the question. It disturbed him how easily accessible so-called secure systems were to the clever and the motivated.

Seth clapped Cahill on the shoulder and plucked his coat off the back of the rolling desk chair. "I'm glad you're on our side."

"Where are you going?"

"I have my own low-tech ways of finding information."

• • • •

THE FLORESCENT LIGHTS buzzed above the nurse's station. The cold bluish light underscored the stern look on the nurse's face. Visitors' hours hadn't officially begun, and the ICU had strict visitation rules.

"I need five minutes of Ms. Holt's time. That's all."

"What did you say your name was?"

"Detective Crawford, SPD."

Her gaze narrowed, and she eyed him suspiciously. Impersonating a police officer was a felony. Seth knew if he got caught he'd find himself in a whole heap of shit. Still, he maintained eye contact. The nurse looked unimpressed.

"May I see your identification, Detective?"

She'd just called his bluff. A lame excuse wasn't going to convince her. He couldn't very well say he'd left his badge in his other pants without looking like a complete, utter asshole.

"I can't impress upon you enough how critical it is I see Ms. Holt. Two minutes. No more. I promise."

"Family only. I'm sorry. You need to go."

The phone rang and she picked it up. She kept her gaze pinned on him, dashing any hopes he might have had about drifting down the hall while she was distracted. If she had kids, Seth was sure none of them put anything over on her. She was sharp.

Frustrated by his lack of authority and disappointed his ruse hadn't worked, Seth stalked away from the nurse's station. With a simple wave of his badge, he'd be striding into Elizabeth's room right now, but without official status, he had to find another way to get what he wanted. He'd wait until shift change—maybe then he could slip past the nurse's station and find Elizabeth.

With time to kill, he ambled down the hallway toward the cafeteria. The squeak of rubber-soled shoes and the steady stream of hospital staff dressed in scrubs assured him he was heading in the right direction. Soon the antiseptic hospital scent gave way to familiar breakfast smells—sausage on the grill and fried potatoes.

He pulled a cell phone from his pocket and dialed a number by heart.

"Good morning," Marissa said coolly.

She was pissed. He couldn't blame her. No one liked waking up alone, especially when you didn't go to bed that way.

"How did you sleep?"

"Better than you, obviously."

"Sorry, I'm a restless sleeper. I hope I didn't wake you."

"Where are you?"

"At the hospital."

"What? Is everything okay?"

She sounded worried and Seth grinned into the phone.

"You kept me up pretty late. I'm not as young as I used to be . . ."

She laughed. The unfamiliar sound warmed his heart.

“Seriously, Seth.”

“Seriously, I had a hunch and wanted to run it by Elizabeth.”

“Elizabeth? Why?”

“Last night at the benefit there was a guy staring at you.”

“Jealous?”

The unexpected comment knocked him temporarily off stride. A beat of silence passed before he recovered.

“Funny. No. I saw Elizabeth talking to him. I figured she might know who he is.”

Seth was holding back. Withholding information from the victim’s family was a routine part of the job, but Marissa was more than the victim’s mother, and being intentionally vague didn’t sit well with him. His sense of guilt deepened and he wanted off the phone.

He searched for an excuse. Evan Holt saved him the trouble.

“Detective Crawford?”

“Look, Marissa, I’ve got to go. I’ll call you later.”

Seth hung up. Evan Holt still wore the black pants and creased tuxedo shirt from last night. Bloodshot eyes spoke of the sleepless night Evan had spent at his aunt’s bedside.

“You’re up awfully early, Detective. What brings you here?”

“How’s Elizabeth?”

“A little better this morning, thanks.”

“Good to hear. I was hoping to speak with her.”

Seth waited for a barrage of questions that didn’t come.

“Of course.”

The nurse glared at Seth as they approached the desk. Thick lips pursed, she raised her hand like a traffic cop halting their progress.

“You have a short memory,” she said. “Family only. Remember?”

“He is family. My cousin,” Evan said.

“Your cousin?”

Her eyebrows arched. Undeterred, Evan slung an arm around Seth’s shoulders.

“Second cousin, actually. You don’t see the resemblance?”

“No.”

“Well, you’ll just have to take my word for it.”

The scowl on the nurse’s face deepened, but she didn’t stop him.

Elizabeth dozed in the hospital bed. Asleep, she looked so frail. Seth gripped the footrail and glanced up at the chirping monitors. Her vital signs looked all right. Her blood pressure was a little high, but then, his probably was too. Hospitals had that effect on him.

Underneath the clinical smell of ammonia and medicine, he detected something else. Something sweeter. Darker. Sickness. Elizabeth Holt’s time was running out. The drops of medication slowly falling into the tube in her arm counted down like grains of sand in an hourglass. The thought depressed him.

Underneath the ball-busting demeanor, Elizabeth was a good woman. Strong. He hoped she had enough time left to see the foundation flourish. She deserved that much.

Elizabeth stirred. Her eyes slowly opened, and she squinted at him.

“Crawford,” she said in a voice as thick and grainy as sandpaper.

She didn’t look surprised to see him, and Seth smiled reassuringly.

“It’s good to see you, Ms. Holt.”

“Alive, you mean? Ha. Yes. They say only the good die young.”

Seth’s lips twitched in amusement. “Then I’ll live to a ripe old age,” he said.

A chuckle rattled at the back of her throat. “Up until recently, I would have said the same.”

Knowing that comforting platitudes would just piss Elizabeth off, he got right to the point.

“Last night, before you collapsed, you were talking to this young man. Do you remember?”

Seth showed Elizabeth the photo of Brooke at the bar with the man he’d seen at the benefit.

Elizabeth blinked and squinted as she tried to recall. Finally she shook her head.

“I was talking to him?” she asked, her expression confused. “No. I was talking to Alistair’s daughter. Maybe he was with her.”

It wasn’t what he’d hoped for, but it was a lead. Seth pocketed the phone.

“Thank you, Ms. Holt. I’ll let you get some rest.”

When he was halfway to the door, Elizabeth’s voice stopped him.

“I doubt idle curiosity brought you here this early, Detective. What is it about this young man that piques your interest?”

Always the lawyer, Seth thought, admiring her quick mind. He turned.

“It’s just a hunch.”

“You think he might be involved in Brooke’s case?”

“I’ll give you an update as soon as I have more. Thanks for your help.”

“One more thing, Crawford,” she said. “Did Marissa make it home safely last night?”

Seth’s cheeks warmed at the question. Did she know, or had she guessed? Either way, his poker face failed him, and he felt like a teenage boy caught out after curfew.

“Yes, ma’am.”

Elizabeth smiled.

“Good. Off you go then.”

Dismissed by Elizabeth, Seth strode toward the exit, pulling the cell phone from his pocket.

“Any luck?” he asked Henry Cahill.

“Not yet. The search is still running. You?”

“Elizabeth Holt doesn’t remember talking to our guy before she collapsed. Do you have an address for Alistair Wright?”

“Give me a sec,” Cahill said.

The cold rain pelted Seth’s head as he crossed the street. He unlocked the car door and climbed inside.

“He owns a corporate law firm in Bellevue.”

“Text me the address.”

“Sure thing.”

• • • •

THE RECEPTIONIST, AN older woman in her midfifties, raised her head and smiled in greeting. Her smile faltered as she caught sight of Seth’s scars. Used to this type of reaction, he barely noticed the shift in her expression. She recovered her composure quickly.

“Good morning. May I help you?”

“Seth Crawford here to see Alistair Wright.”

The woman glanced at her screen through the thick lenses of her square-rimmed glasses. A deep, vertical frown line appeared between her eyebrows.

“Do you have an appointment, Mr. Crawford?”

“No, but it’s critical I speak with him.”

“I’m sorry, sir, I’m afraid it’s not possible.”

“I’m investigating an abduction case and I need Mr. Wright’s help.”

“Oh, are you a police officer?”

Seth scowled and shook his head. Not anymore.

“I’m an investigator for the Holt Foundation. It really is important I speak with him right away.”

“The Holt Foundation?”

Recognition registered in her eyes. Her gaze softened.

“He’s in court today,” she said. “I suppose you could try and catch up with him there.”

Seth knew he could wait hours before a recess. Even then, Wright’s first priority would be his client. Trying to get his attention might well be futile.

The cell phone rang, interrupting his thoughts. Glancing at the display, he saw it was Cahill.

“Got something?” he asked, skipping the preamble.

“I got a match. Dude we’re looking for is Andrew Matthews. He lives two blocks away from the coffee shop where someone uploaded the picture of Charles Sully on Brooke’s phone.”

A rush of adrenaline shot through Seth, sweeping away all remnants of fatigue. It was the best news he’d had all day.

“Andrew Matthews,” he repeated, committing the name to memory. “I’ll head back to the office. Pull up anything you can find on him.”

“Already on it.”

Seth ended the call and swung back to the receptionist, a sudden thought occurring to him. She glanced up through the thick lenses of her glasses.

“Is Andrew Matthews one of Mr. Wright’s clients?”

“Andrew Matthews? No. He’s engaged to Mr. Wright’s daughter.”

Alicia Wright strode into the lobby of Elliot Jones Investments, the heels of her Gucci shoes clicking on the marble floor. She was tired. Drew had kept her up way too late. Now it was 8:00 a.m., and with a triple-shot venti mocaccino in hand, she was ready to face another day.

She loved the way the lobby smelled of leather and chrome and wealth—all the trappings of old money disguised by a modern facade.

The mousy little receptionist drenched in Chanel No. 5 glanced up and offered a timid smile.

“Uh, Ms. Wright. There’s someone here to see you.”

What? Alicia tossed her long hair over her shoulders and glanced around the lobby. She never took meetings before nine. Besides, it was Wednesday. She wasn’t scheduled to see any clients this morning. Clearly there was some kind of screw-up.

The sight of the man sitting hunched on the sleek leather couch stopped her cold. Anger flared hot in her cheeks.

“Liam.”

Damn him for showing up here. At Gretchen’s memorial service, she’d told him she never wanted to lay eyes on him again, and she’d meant it.

Liam stood. He looked tired. Disheveled. Like he’d barely slept. Alicia fixed her furious gaze on him, death rays shooting from her eyes. He thrust his hands out toward her, pleading for her to go slowly.

“Wait. Just wait,” he said, sheepishly. “At least hear me out.”

“What gives you the right to show up here of all places?” she hissed in a muted tone, pitched low so only Liam would hear.

“This.”

Liam thrust the envelope into her hands with such force she stumbled back a step to steady herself. She had no choice but to take the damned thing—either that or let it fall to the floor.

“What the hell is this? Your psych evaluation? Your apology for ruining Gretchen’s life? Let me save you some time . . .”

Her control slipping, her voice rose, capturing the notice of the two other clients who were waiting patiently in their seats, thumbing through copies of Architectural Digest and Seattle Magazine. She stopped herself. Pursing her lips, she glowered at him.

“Get out.”

“Think what you want about me, Alicia, but I’m begging you, just read it.”

Alicia glared at the envelope in her hand with a look of disgust, like she was holding a dead rat.

“Why would I do anything you ask?”

Clasping his hands together in front of him, he leaned toward her. “Please. I’m doing this for you.”
The fucking nerve of the guy.

“Since when have you ever done anything for anyone other than yourself?”

Liam hung his head. Lank blond hair fell into his eyes.

“Look, you hate me.”

“Hate you?” she yelled, fury bursting from a place deep in her chest. “You’re goddamned right I hate you.”

With all eyes on her now, she whirled on the receptionist.

“Claire,” she snapped. “Call security and get this man escorted from the building.”

“Right away,” Claire squeaked, picking up the phone.

“Fine. I’ll go. But I’m telling you, your boyfriend isn’t who he says he is . . .”

“Are you high?” she interrupted him. “What makes you think I’d believe a single word that comes out of your lying mouth? Especially about the man I’m going to marry.”

“Marry? You’re engaged?”

Alicia flashed the ring in his face and Liam blanched. With the look of a beaten man, he ran a hand across his eyes.

“I hired a private investigator. His card is in there. If you don’t believe me, call him. Please, Alicia. He’ll tell you everything.”

The door opened behind her and a security guard entered the lobby. Well over six feet tall, he was 220 pounds of pure muscle with a don’t-fuck-with-me expression that left little room for doubt.

“Sir, you’ll have to come with me.”

His hard voice matched his steely expression. Liam nodded.

“I’ll go. Just promise me you’ll read it.”

Alicia rolled her eyes.

“Whatever.”

After badging through security, Alicia strode through the maze of cubicles until she reached her desk. Irritation buzzed like bees inside her head. She pitched the envelope so hard into the recycling bin under her desk that it rattled against the cubicle wall.

Heaving out a frustrated sigh, Alicia stripped off her coat and dropped down into her chair.

Wait until she told Drew about this. He’d be even more pissed than she was.

She picked up her mocaccino and took a sip. It tasted cold. Bitter.

Damn Liam for ruining her day. Showing up here with these wild accusations! As if she’d believe a single word he said ever again.

Alicia slammed her cup down on the desk. Coffee spurted out and splattered her keyboard. Dammit. Rolling her chair back, she plucked a tissue from a box and swabbed up the mess.

She pitched the wadded tissue into the trash and glanced at the recycling bin. A corner of the envelope crested above the lip of the box.

She could only imagine the kind of dirt Liam’s investigator had dug up on Drew. Unpaid parking tickets, stealing a doughnut from a grocery, a DUI? How low would Liam sink to discredit her fiancé? Had Drew lied on his résumé? Cheated on his SATs? God knew Liam was no choirboy. If not for his über-rich father, Liam would have ended up in hot water more than once.

Alicia shook her head and turned back. She stared blankly at her monitor. A few seconds passed. Then she looked back down into the recycling bin.

A horn blasted. Drew craned his neck around, hoping to glimpse the impatient bastard in the car behind him. Light reflected off the windshield, obscuring the driver from view. Good thing too. Otherwise he might have hunted the fucker down and beat the shit out of him, just for fun.

Parked beside the card reader, Drew rummaged through the pockets of his messenger bag for the third time before pitching it onto the seat beside him. Fuck. He'd forgotten his access key. Now he'd have to waste half an hour heading back to his condo to get the fucking thing.

Gritting his teeth, he jammed the gearshift into reverse and stomped on the gas pedal. The horn blared again—not angry this time, panicked, as Drew drilled back toward the bumper of the BMW. At the last second, he cut the wheel, narrowly avoiding slamming into the asshole behind him. Screeching out of the parking lot, he got a small measure of satisfaction in knowing the Beamer boy's ass was still puckered tight after the near miss.

After inserting the key into the condo's dead bolt, he found it unlocked. Drew frowned and stepped back, eyeing the doorframe. He never forgot to lock his door. Although nothing looked damaged, something didn't feel right.

Drew eased silently into the apartment.

Nothing looked out of place, nothing that he could see anyway. He removed his shoes and moved quietly across the floor.

A clanging noise came from the bedroom. Drew reached for the first thing he could use as a weapon. He plucked a bronze statue of the Space Needle off a nearby shelf and kept moving. It weighed heavy in his hand.

Alicia had bought the gaudy thing for him on their first date, dinner at the Space Needle. He remembered coming home that night, still buzzing from the date, and running into the old lady down the hall. She'd yammered his ear off for half an hour—something about the garbage disposal. All the while he'd pictured beating her senseless with the statue just to shut her up.

Since then he'd threatened to throw it out half a dozen times, used it as a hammer to drive nails into the wall, grouted tile with the pointy end, used it as a measuring stick, and flattened chicken with it, much to Alicia's chagrin. But somewhere along the line, it had grown on him, and the cold, hefty weight of it felt good in his hand as he pushed open the bedroom door.

Yellow light spilled from the closet onto the hardwood floors. Drew heard a hiss, like the sound of shuffling paper. Someone was definitely in there. Looking for what? Raising the statue above his head, he stepped through the doorway.

Alicia knelt on the closet floor. She looked up. In the harsh overhead lights, her eyes looked puffy and red, as if she'd been crying. Drew lowered the statue, still gripping it tight in his hand. His heart raced like a deer caught in the crosshairs.

"Christ, Alicia. You scared me half to death. What are you doing here?" Scanning the scene, he took in the mass of papers around her in a single glance. Tax returns, utility bills, pay stubs. What in God's name was she looking for?

Alicia set the papers fisted tight in her grip down on the floor. She glared up at him, her stony expression, defiant.

"Who is Andrew Bowman?"

The breath rushed from Drew's lungs in a huff. A live current of fear convulsed through his chest, and he stared at her in shock and amazement.

Where did she hear that name?

“Who?”

Alicia studied him, her cold eyes a frosty blue. This was no random question, and the bloody specter of his secret past rose between them like a ghost. His gaze dropped to the nest of papers strewn around her on the closet floor, and he realized that Alicia, desperate for answers, was searching for evidence, some piece of documentation that tied Drew to his past life.

Fear coiled tight around his gut. He wasn't stupid. She wouldn't find anything here, but that might not stop her. All she had to do was pull on the Andrew Bowman thread hard enough and she would unravel the whole deadly truth.

He wasn't ever going back to that life.

“You heard me, Drew,” Alicia said, springing to her feet.

The contempt in her voice unleashed a cyclone of rage inside Drew. He fought against the rising pillar of anger building inside him.

“Look, I have no idea what you're talking about. You're going to have to spell it out for me.”

Alicia's face flushed. She jabbed an accusing finger into his chest. The large diamond ring flashed in the light.

“Tell me the truth! Are you Andrew Bowman?”

“Are you crazy?”

Angry tears glittered in her hard blue eyes, and she shook her head. She drilled her fist into his chest.

“You're lying.”

His hand gripped the statue tight. Tears spilled down her cheeks. She wrenched the engagement ring off her finger and hurled it at him. It ricocheted off his shoulder and skittered across the hardwood floor.

“I trusted you. I believed you, and you've been lying to me all along. Gretchen said there was something off about you and I ignored her. I thought she was crazy. Jealous. But she was right. I was too stupid to listen to her.”

“Stop. Stop,” he said, gripping her shoulder with his free hand. There had to be some way to reach her, some way to convince her that there was no Andrew Bowman, that this was all one huge mistake. “Calm down. You're not making any sense.”

Alicia shook him off and rushed past him, out the bedroom door.

He grabbed her wrist and spun her around. She yanked her arm back, but he was too strong. His fingers burrowed deep into the flesh of her arm. She winced. Anger blazed in her eyes.

“Take your fucking hands off of me.”

“What did you hear, Alicia?”

“Let go.”

He pulled her closer. She jerked back.

“Who filled your head with these lies?”

“Lies?” she bellowed. “You're the liar. You. Drew, or Andrew, or whatever the fuck your name is.”

She was so sure, so goddamned sure. But how?

Then he knew.

“Liam,” he said, spitting the word out between clenched teeth like acid.

“Where I heard it doesn't matter. You're still a liar.”

Drew gripped the statue.

“That fucking prick couldn’t leave well enough alone. Gretchen told me he’d keep digging.”

Her eyes flicked away from him, and he could see her replaying his words. One by one he saw the pieces click together in her addled little brain. A terrible truth dawned in her eyes.

“Gretchen.” She pressed a hand against her trembling lips. “Gretchen. Oh God. What did you do?”

Drew smiled. It was a mean smile. Terror filled Alicia’s eyes. He yanked on her wrist. She jerked to a stop, their faces inches apart.

“I did what I had to do,” he said.

“Let go of me, you fucking freak.”

Freak? The word sent another shock wave of rage blasting through him. Freak. Bastard. Pussy. He heard his father’s voice screaming inside his head. He felt the blow of hard knuckles crushing into his face, the bloodstone ring gashing his skin. Are you going to cry now, you little pussy? Faggot. Get up. On your feet. Be a man. Be a man.

Drew’s eyes burned hot as coals.

He swung the statue. It cracked against Alicia’s forehead and she lurched back. A cut opened up above her brow. Blood sluiced down the side of her face. Thrown off balance, Drew loosened his grip and Alicia broke free.

Like a spooked deer, she sprinted toward the door. He lunged after her. His hand snaked out and seized a fistful of hair. He yanked back. She shrieked. Her arms flailed wide and she crashed to the floor.

Drew pounced. He pinned her in place, knees burrowing into her heaving chest. His father’s hateful face glared up at him. His father’s lips speckled with dried spit and blood. A river of hate coursed through Drew’s veins.

Be a man.

He raised the statue above his head.

“This is your fault,” he spit between clenched teeth.

Drew brought the blunt end of the bronze statue crashing down.

Blood spurted from the wound in her head, spraying his face in a fine red mist. Alicia’s body jerked. She convulsed on the floor beneath him. Drew kept hammering until she stopped squirming, until her body went slack.

His breath came in ragged gasps. Warm drops of blood dripped down his face like thick red tears.

Minutes ticked by and his breathing finally slowed. As he released his grip, the Space Needle statue clattered to the floor. Drew opened his eyes and saw Alicia pinned under his knees.

Even now, with her fixed stare, her dark hair matted with blood and studded with gray matter, she was beautiful. He remembered the first time they’d met, how her smile had stopped his heart. He’d known in that instant they belonged together. Always.

But no matter how hard he tried, the clawing past kept dragging him back. Andrew Bowman refused to die.

This was Liam’s fault. Liam had killed her. Not him. Never him.

He knew that as long as Andrew Bowman’s family still lived, he would never be free.

Drew stretched out long trembling fingers and brushed the matted hair away from Alicia’s forehead. His blood-soaked fingertips left thick snail trails across her alabaster skin.

On shaky legs Drew rose to his feet. He turned toward the bathroom. Two feet away from Alicia’s prone body, he froze.

Someone was knocking at the door.

Seth knocked a second time. Leaning in, he listened, straining to hear any sound from the condo.
Nothing.

He thought about knocking again but figured it was pointless. Matthews was likely at work. He'd give Cahill a call and get the address.

Just then the elevator doors slid open and a man shuffled out. Lugging a grocery bag in one arm, he limped slowly down the hall. He cast Seth a curious look before turning away. Unlocking the door to the condo across the hall, he glanced back over his shoulder.

"You looking for Drew?"

"Have you seen him?"

He shifted his weight onto his good leg and propped the paper grocery bag against the doorframe.

"He left about an hour ago with a suitcase. Said he was heading out on a business trip."

A chill raced down Seth's spine. Was he running?

"Do you know where he was going?"

The neighbor scratched the scruffy brown beard covering his fleshy chin and shook his head.

"He didn't say, but I'm not surprised he's leaving town."

"Why?"

"Dude had a hell of a fight with his girl this morning."

Seth's stomach dropped.

"You heard them?"

"Hell, yeah. Impossible not to. I work from home. Drew's usually all right, sometimes plays his music too loud, but today, Christ."

"What were they fighting about?"

The neighbor hitched his thick shoulders.

"Dunno. I put my headphones on, cranked the tunes to drown them out. They were really going at it though."

"Do they fight a lot?"

The neighbor shook his head. "Naw."

"You said he left about an hour ago?"

"Something like that. I was on my way to Whole Foods."

"How did he seem?"

"Pissed. Who wouldn't be? I told him he was loud enough to wake the dead and he apologized for the noise. Said the old lady down the hall had already knocked on the door, giving him shit. Said his girlfriend found another girl's number on his phone and went bat-shit."

"Did you believe him?"

A crooked smile stretched the man's lips and his thick shoulders shrugged.

"Why not? It didn't take that much to set off my ex."

"Thanks. If he comes back, give me a call, Mr. . . ."

"Mortimer. Ross."

Seth pulled a business card from his jacket pocket. He saw the SPD logo and frowned. The cell number was still the same, so he handed it over. It wasn't like he was trying to pass himself off as a police officer. Besides, what were the chances Mortimer would call?

Mortimer tucked the card into his coat pocket, turned, and pushed the door to his apartment open. The door clanged shut, the noise echoing down the empty hallway. Seth stood alone, his mind racing. He thought about the duffel bag in Charles Sully's trunk, about the argument, about the look on Luke Turner's face. He turned back toward Drew's door.

Exigent circumstances. Every cop knew exigent circumstances provided the only legal justification for entering a private residence without a warrant. Was Alicia Wright in the condo? Was she in trouble? Could the argument provide enough justification for exigent circumstances to apply?

No way. If they were still yelling or she was calling for help, maybe. Maybe.

Aw, fuck it.

He wasn't a cop anymore. Worst case, he'd get nailed with breaking and entering. Seth pulled his key chain from his pocket. He glanced down the hall. He was alone. That was good.

He pinched a square-headed key between his fingers and thumb. It was a bump key, the type he'd used before to get into locked places. Never without a warrant though. Never illegally. He frowned. He was off the grid now, wading into uncharted territory. But he'd already gone this far.

The thief who'd taught him to use a bump key had used a plastic hairbrush to prime the lock. Seth didn't have anything like that on him. He needed something solid. Heavy. Pulling his gun from its holster, he checked the safety. It was on.

He tapped the butt of the gun against the key, praying it wouldn't accidentally go off. The sound reverberated down the narrow hallway and Seth cringed. The key shifted in the lock. He glanced over his shoulder before smacking the key again, harder this time. Wiggling the key, he grunted.

"Come on. Come on."

A hollow thump echoed down the empty corridor as he hit the key a third time. A door opened. Not Mortimer's, the one next to Matthews's. An old woman's lined face poked out. She glared at him through narrowed eyes.

"What do you think you're doing?"

Seth stiffened. He shifted his stance to shield the gun from her view.

"Knocking. Do you know if Mr. Matthews is home?"

She pursed her thin lips.

"He's at work."

"Thanks."

Mortimer was right. She was a busybody. Instead of disappearing inside her door, she stepped farther out into the hallway. Seth stifled a curse.

"Are you supposed to be here?" she asked, planting a gnarled hand on her lumpy hip.

Seth forced a smile and said, "He's heading out of town on a business trip and asked me to house-sit."

Seth jiggled the key in the lock and heard a click.

"Bullshit," the old woman said.

Seth turned the key. The lock popped open. He slid the gun behind his back.

"He needs someone to water his plants."

Loose skin pouched around her suspicious eyes. She crossed her arms.

"What do you have behind your back? Is that a gun?"

"Look, Ms. . . ."

She leveled a bony finger at him. "I don't know who you are or how you got in here, but I'm calling the cops. If I were you, I'd get out of here. Now."

The door opened behind him, and Mortimer stuck his head out.

“What the fuck is going on?”

They both stared at Seth.

Shit. Seth’s heart slammed against his rib cage. He had two choices. He could leave now, or he could do what he’d come here to do. Goddamn it. He set his jaw. He swung back toward the condo. Ignoring the old woman’s protests, he pushed the door open and looked inside.

Red.

The smell inside the condo was a dark, coppery red. The breath caught in Seth’s throat. Broad streaks of dark blood smeared across the hardwood floor.

He ran his hands through his hair. Christ. He was too late.

“I’m calling the cops,” the old woman crowed.

Seth scowled. He pulled a cell phone from his pocket and dialed 911.

“Don’t bother, lady. I’m already on it.”

• • • •

LINDA GARCIA ARRIVED on scene, a forensics crew close on her heels. Seth had been careful not to do anything to contaminate the crime scene. Word traveled fast around the precinct, and while she didn’t look surprised to see him, she wasn’t pleased either.

“Do you want to explain exactly what you’re doing here, Crawford?” she asked, snapping on a pair of latex gloves.

Seth burrowed his hands in his pants pockets and met Linda’s glare directly.

“I’m working as an investigator for the Holt Foundation. I was following up on a lead.”

“And you broke into an apartment? Really? Care to explain yourself?”

“Exigent circumstances.”

Garcia’s eyebrows pinched together low on her forehead, and she shot him a cynical look.

“You expect me to buy that? Did you hear yelling? Did you hear anything or see anything that made you think someone’s life was in imminent danger? Make it good, Crawford, otherwise I’ll have to bust you for breaking and entering.”

“You mean other than the blood on the floor?”

Garcia glared at Seth and listened while he relayed the chain of events that had led him to this point. Her face remained a stern mask. She waited until he was finished before she spoke.

“Are you still on the job, Crawford?”

“I’m still trying to find Brooke Parker, if that’s what you’re asking.”

“And did you think she was in here?”

Seth shrugged. “I think Andrew Matthews knows something about Brooke’s disappearance.”

“We found Parker’s MedicAlert dog tags in the trunk of Sully’s car. You got some reason to believe Sully and Matthews were working together?”

“I think Matthews set Sully up.”

Garcia shook her head slowly, looking grave. “Alvarez isn’t going to like this.”

“Probably not, but the way I see it, I’ve done you a huge favor.”

“A favor?”

“How long would it have taken you to find this if I hadn’t called you?” Seth gestured toward the blood on the floor and Garcia grunted. “You can charge me if you want, but right now I think you’ve got bigger problems. You have no body. You need to figure out whose blood is on the floor.”

Garcia frowned. “You think it belongs to the girlfriend?”

“That would be my guess.”

“Fucking great.”

“Well, I’ll leave you to it.”

Pulling his hands from his pockets, Seth strolled to the door.

“Wait. Where do you think you’re going?” Garcia asked.

“You don’t want me mucking up your crime scene, do you?”

She swore under her breath.

“Don’t screw with my case, Crawford.”

“I wouldn’t dream of it,” Seth said.

Fucking morons. Drew clenched the steering wheel hard and glared at the sluggish line of red taillights heading south on I-5. He didn't have time for this shit. Alicia finding out about Andrew Bowman had forced his hand, and now he was scrambling to tie up any more loose ends before his whole life fell apart.

How long before someone came looking for her? Days? Hours? Fuck.

With no time to waste, he crawled along in traffic, wishing he had a Hummer or a tank or some other means of rolling over the cars blocking his way.

Gnawing on his thumbnail, Drew flicked his restless gaze toward the Tacoma Dome. The bulbous structure reminded him of a bleached WWI German Army helmet, complete with a spike. Ugly. All the towns sprawling south of Seattle were dirty, ugly places. The only redeeming part of making this trip was knowing it would be the very last time he would ever come this way. Soon he'd leave this shithole behind and never look back. He would bury Andrew Bowman and his checkered past so deep, no one would ever find him.

Like every other shitty driver in the Pacific Northwest, the asshole in front of him slammed on his brakes for no reason at all. Drew swore and cranked on the wheel, narrowly avoiding plowing into the truck. He scowled at the pickup driver as he sped past.

Shaggy hair, worn ball cap, flannel shirt, and canvas jacket. A construction worker or truck driver or whatever. No doubt he worked some shitty blue-collar job, lived in an even shittier bungalow down in Lakewood. He probably spent his nights beating his wife and drinking beer. Just like his dear old dad, Drew thought. Just like he might have turned out too, if he hadn't clawed his way out of this hellhole and built himself a better life.

A good job, a nice car, a downtown condo, and a beautiful fiancée—all a testament to his hard work. But now, thanks to Liam fucking Burke, that life was gone. After all he'd done to get where he was. After all the work, the planning, the sacrifice—he'd lost everything because Liam wanted Alicia back.

The coppery smell of blood wafted from the suitcase in the back of the jeep. Drew's lips twisted into an ugly sneer. He should pitch the suitcase into the Green River and be rid of Alicia for good. But that would be sloppy. That could get him caught.

No, this time he had to do everything right. No more mistakes. No more crazy father or snot-nosed stepsisters. No more Marissa. He would eliminate everyone close to Andrew Bowman. This time he'd emerge from the ashes clean. New. Stronger than ever. This time no one would touch him.

Drew pulled off the Interstate south of Tacoma. Fat raindrops pattered against the windshield. Alicia's cell phone rang. He picked it up and checked the call display.

The great and powerful Alistair Wright was calling, and if Alistair was already looking for Alicia, it was only a matter of hours until the cops started breathing down his neck.

He needed a plan. Fast.

Up ahead he saw a Starbucks sign and pulled into the parking lot. Cupping Alicia's phone in his sweaty palm, he sent a text.

Battery's low. Powering down. Call you later, Daddy. XO

ACRES OF MANICURED lawns and tall evergreen trees surrounded the sprawling gold-brick structure on top of the hill. The aging, dirty facade was a stark contrast to the perfectly manicured grounds. He supposed the green hills offered some solace to the troubled minds residing within the walls of Valley Mental Health Institution.

Drew pushed through the doors, fingering the loose pills in his pocket. He knew the drill. He set a Starbucks coffee cup on the desk and signed in for the last time. The nurse manning the desk had thick chestnut hair and a smattering of freckles across her cheeks.

“Mind if I take it through?” he asked with a friendly smile. “I know it’s against the rules, so if you need me to dump it, I’ll totally understand.”

She tucked a stray strand of hair back behind her ear and returned his smile. “Need your coffee fix?”

Drew propped his elbows on the countertop. He rolled his eyes theatrically and made a face. “Big project. I was up all night working. Seriously, if I could mainline this stuff . . .”

She laughed. She had a pretty laugh. Folding her hand under her chin, she looked up at him with wide brown eyes.

“Strictly speaking, it is against policy, but I guess I could bend the rules just this once. I’d feel responsible if you passed out, or worse.”

Drew winked at her.

“You’re an angel,” he said.

“Don’t make me regret it. He’s in the solarium,” she called after him.

Drew saluted her with the raised Starbucks cup and kept going.

A vase of long-stemmed red roses caught his eye. The lush crimson petals reminded him of the fat drops of blood on Alicia’s alabaster skin. Drew veered away from the roses, hating what he’d done—hating what he’d had to do. But what other choice did he have? Together Alicia and Liam had ruined his life.

Anger gnawed at the pit of his stomach like a hungry rat. He should have killed Liam when he’d had the chance. He’d ignored Gretchen’s warnings, and now Alicia was dead and his lethal three-act play was coming to a close, faster and more bloodily than he had planned. He wouldn’t make the same mistake twice.

Drew turned down a long hallway. Beneath the sharp hospital smells of ammonia and bleach lay a darker stench of dirt and grime, gore and sweat. Desperation. All the chemicals in the world couldn’t mask the rank odor of the rotting bodies and rotting minds housed within the institution’s crumbling walls.

The solarium was painted a sunny yellow. Large banks of windows faced south, admitting vast quantities of gray light. Heavy couches and chairs were placed in intimate groupings around the room. His father sat propped in a wheelchair near the windows.

This time of day, there were at least a dozen patients watching television or playing games. There were others drooling on their chins and dreaming the pink-cloud dreams of the violently medicated. Drew made his way through the room, fingering the pills in his pocket, anticipation building.

“Hey, is that coffee? You’re not supposed to bring that in here.”

Drew looked up, catching sight of a skeletal young man blocking his path. With green-marble eyes, a cap of greasy black hair, and rapid-fire talk, he reminded Drew of a junkie in need of a fix.

“I cleared it with the desk,” Drew said, and stepped around the patient.

“They don’t let me drink coffee because of the medication, you know.” He smacked his lips. “They say it makes me fidgety. But come on, man, that’s total bullshit.”

Drew flashed a benign smile and tried to move past the patient, but the man grabbed his coat.

“Do you know what makes me fidgety? You know what makes me really crazy? Caffeine withdrawal. You know what I’m saying?”

Drew’s fingers curled into fists. A rising tide of anger filled his chest. He craved the release he’d always gotten from laying a violent beating on another human being. Laying a hand on the kid would be stupid. The last thing he needed was an orderly taking notice of the situation and tossing out Drew’s coffee. Or worse—escorting Drew from the building for violating protocol. So, as much as he wanted to snap the kid’s fingers like dry twigs, he forced a smile.

“Look, I know what you mean. There are days I’d kill for coffee too. But I brought this for my old man. It’s decaf, brother. It would be like going to a hooker for a hug.”

The skinny dude shot Drew a horrified look and Drew strode past him toward the windows.

His father did not look up as he approached. He pulled up a chair and straddled it, taking stock of the old man’s ruined face.

At least six months had passed since his last visit. Pink patches of scalp showed through Rick’s thinning brown hair. The stubble on his father’s cheeks was flecked with a prickly gray. His once hard build had gone soft around the middle, and he looked puffy and bloated, like Jabba the Hutt. Pathetic.

Drew set the coffee cup down on the floor between his feet, hiding it from view. Rick never looked up. His vacant stare stretched past Drew out the bank of windows and toward the distant green hills. If Drew’s father had ever had a soul, it had clearly vacated the shell of his body years ago.

“Hi, Dad.”

Drew searched for some sign, some flicker of recognition from his father, but Rick’s expression never changed. While part of him was pleased that his father had all the mental acuity of a turnip, another part, a deeper part, wished Rick were still there. He wanted the bastard to suffer the way he’d suffered through all those beatings.

“You’ll never guess who I saw the other day,” Drew said, speaking so quietly only Rick could hear. “Marissa.”

A fat fly landed on Rick’s face and slowly crawled across his red, blotchy cheek. Drew didn’t move a muscle to shoo the thing away; he just watched as it marched toward his father’s ear. Finally Rick flinched and the fly took flight.

Drew eased back in his chair and smiled.

“Marissa looks great, Dad. You remember how hot she looked before you smashed her mouth in, don’t you? She wasn’t so pretty then. Spitting out teeth. Blood all over the place. No doubt about it, you were one suave motherfucker. Now look at you.”

A chair squealed behind Drew. Irritated, he glanced over his shoulder. The junkie was back. Flopping into the chair beside Drew, he scratched his arm. Rick’s eyes flicked to the patient. Just a second. Just long enough to make Drew wonder if there were lights still on behind his father’s dead eyes.

“Come on, man. Just a sip. Your old man won’t mind. Just look at him.”

Drew leaned close to the dude, his voice barely more than a whisper.

“If you don’t fuck off, I’ll call an orderly and they’ll shoot you so full of Thorazine, by the time you wake up we’ll have a new president. Got it?”

The young man flung himself from the chair and Drew turned his gaze back to his father. Rick blinked.

“Where were we?” Drew snapped his fingers. “That’s right. Marissa. I ran into her daughter a few weeks back. Sweet little piece of ass, that one. Great rack, tight little ass, blonde curls just like her mommy. I've got her locked up in the cabin. Did you know she's diabetic? Anyway, she's low on insulin. I'm afraid she won't last much longer. I think it's time I reunite the family."

Drew stared deep into his father's eyes.

"It's too bad you won't be able to join us."

Seconds later a fist slammed into Drew's shoulder. He leaped to his feet. The chair clattered behind him.

"Get out of here, bitch," Drew growled.

"Or what? What are you gonna do? What are you gonna do, man? Hit me? You want to hit me?"

The patient slapped an open palm against his chest. Heads turned at the hollow sound. He jittered on his toes like a boxer. Drew shook his head and balled his fingers into a tight fist.

He didn't hear the orderly approach. The heavyset man shot Drew an apologetic smile.

"Come on, Billy, let's get you out of here."

The patient squealed and winced away from the thick hand gripping his skinny arm.

"No. He's got coffee . . ."

"Now, Billy."

The orderly half dragged the patient from the solarium, and Drew resumed his seat. He picked the Starbucks cup up off the floor.

"Never too early in the day for one of these, I trust," he said, and placed the coffee cup on the table next to Rick. It was coffee with a shot of cheap whiskey, just the way dear old Dad liked it. Drew removed the lid and crushed the two tablets into dust, then sprinkled it in a fine layer across the black brew. It sank, dissolving quickly.

For most people Tylenol was an easy way to wipe away pain.

For Rick it was death—instant anaphylaxis.

Drew waved the cup underneath the old man's nose. Rick licked his lips like a salivating hound.

"You are in there. Or at least part of you is."

Drew set the cup down on the table beside Rick and watched. The old man's hand trembled and inched toward the cup. Rick's hands, which had once lashed out with blinding speed and meted out pain with the curl of a fist, moved at a snail's pace now. Drew fixed his stare on the old man's greedy eyes.

After all this time, his father still wanted, still needed, to drink.

Prick. Pathetic, old, hateful prick, Drew thought, eyeing his father with all the compassion of a boy frying ants with a magnifying glass.

"You know, I never did understand whether it was the booze that made you crazy or you were just born that way."

Rick's hand inched toward the cup.

"I used to wonder what it was that made you destroy everyone you touched."

Rick's fingers shook and stretched, reaching. Drew smirked and moved the cup beyond his father's grasp. The old man's lips trembled.

"Then I realized it didn't matter. You ruined everything, you malignant old fuck."

Rick's tongue flicked out between bloodless lips like a rain-fat worm. Contempt flared Drew's nostrils wide, and he bent forward, leaning close enough to catch of whiff of his father's stinking breath.

"I was looking forward to watching you slowly rot away in this damnable place, but sadly, I'm out of time."

Stealing a glance over his shoulder, Drew lifted the coffee cup to his father's greedy lips. Rick sucked the coffee down. Drew smacked a hand over the old man's mouth and watched Rick's Adam's apple bob once. Twice. Satisfied, Drew downed the rest of the coffee. He crushed the empty cup and tossed it in a trash can.

Thirty seconds later, choking, gurgling sounds erupted from his father's swelling lips. Rick's fat fingers scratched desperately at his throat, trembling, shaking, clawing as he struggled to draw in a breath. Drew stared into his panicked, desperate eyes. The old man was pleading, begging for help.

Drew stood transfixed. A slow grin spread across his face. His whole childhood, Rick had been the source of pain and punishment—the monster in his nightmares. Now here he was, helpless. Desperate. Dying.

How many times had he lain in bed, bleeding, fantasizing about this moment—about how he would kill his father? He'd thought about stabbing him, shooting him, strangling the life out of the old man with his bare hands. But he'd never imagined this. Never dreamed the sight of his father's slow decay would be so wholly and deeply satisfying.

Finally Drew turned his back on his father's writhing form.

"Help," he called, stepping away from the wheelchair. "Help."

Orderlies converged in a rush. Rick's face was swelling, turning blue. He thrashed violently in the wheelchair. One of the orderlies turned back toward Drew.

"What happened?"

Drew shook his head, eyes wide. "I don't know. He just started choking."

The orderly's badge dangled inches from Drew's hand. He snatched it. In all the chaos, no one noticed him slip from the room.

An alarm sounded, and more staff scurried down the hall, ran for the solarium, where Rick was in full anaphylactic shock.

Drew turned away from the desk and hurried toward the medication closet. Every second fat fuck in this sorry place had to be a diabetic. How hard would it be to find some insulin?

Drew swiped the card across the smooth surface of the access reader. The reader beeped, but the light remained yellow. Drew frowned. He rattled the door. It refused to open. He tried again. Same result. He yanked harder.

Cursing under his breath, Drew swiped the card again. Denied. It wasn't working.

"Can I help you?" a woman called.

He swiveled. The nurse from the desk was looking his way. Confusion wiped the half smile from her face.

"You can't go in there."

Drew wondered if her card would grant him access to the medication closet. All he wanted was some insulin. If he could get her card, maybe he could get inside.

"Did you hear me?" she called again, louder this time.

A security guard rounded the corner. Eyeing him, the guard tilted his head toward the walkie-talkie perched on his shoulder.

Drew made a split-second decision. He sprinted down the hall at full speed. His feet pounded the hard tile floor. The shouting voices behind him closed in.

The exit was a few feet away. He raised the access badge and swiped it across the reader. His heart stuttered. The green light flashed and he bolted out of the building, through the trees, to where he'd parked the Jeep only half an hour before.

“Tell me everything you’ve got on Andrew Matthews,” Seth said as he burst through the office door.

Henry Cahill’s fingers flew over the keyboard. He swung the monitor toward Seth. The Seattle Times news site showed a photograph of a Drew Matthews and Alicia Wright smiling into the camera. They looked like any young couple in love. Seth’s gut twisted as he recalled the dark blood smeared across Matthews’s floor.

Was it Alicia’s blood? Was he already too late?

“Henry, I need you to pull out all the stops to try and find Alicia Wright. Credit cards, cell phone—whatever kind of hacker black magic you have, use it. We need to locate her. Now.”

Cahill’s brow wrinkled. Confused, he stared back at Seth.

“Her? Why her? Why not Matthews?”

“We need to find him too. Right now, though, I’m more worried about what he might have done to Alicia.”

“You mean Alistair Wright’s daughter?” Marissa asked, entering the room with a coffee cup in her hand.

She looked tired. They all did.

“You know her?” Seth asked.

“I met her at the benefit. She was there with her father.”

“Was she with anyone else?”

“Well, I think her fiancé was there too, but I didn’t actually see him. He was outside when I . . .”

Marissa stopped in midsentence. Seth looked up. The coffee cup slipped from her fingers and smashed on the floor, raining shards of glass and hot coffee everywhere. Cahill jumped back, avoiding the spray. The color drained from her cheeks.

Seth shifted his gaze from Marissa back to Cahill’s monitor, trying to figure out what he was missing.

“That’s . . .”

“Andrew Matthews, we know . . .”

Marissa shook her head.

“No, that’s Andrew Bowman.”

Andrew Bowman? Why did that name sound so familiar?

“Your stepson?”

“Rick’s son. Yes.”

“You’re sure?”

“He looks older, of course, but that’s him.”

Seth reached for her. Trembling, Marissa tipped her forehead against his shoulder, and he tightened his hold.

“What does this mean?” she whispered.

Nothing good, he didn’t say.

Marissa pulled back, her wide eyes brimming with fear. “Why would he do this? Why Brooke?”

“I don’t know, Marissa. I need you to write down everything you can remember about him. Can you do that?”

She nodded.

“Just find him,” she said.

“Henry . . .”

“I’m on it.”

Seth pulled a cell phone from his pocket and dialed Garcia’s number.

“Jesus, Crawford. What now?”

“Andrew Matthews may not actually be Andrew Matthews.”

Garcia sighed. “If this is some kind of riddle, I don’t have time. Out with it.”

“Andrew Matthews may not be his real name. He might actually be Andrew Bowman.”

Garcia fell silent. Seth pictured her standing with the cell phone pressed against her ear, pinching the bridge of her nose. Finally she spoke.

“How do you know this?”

“Marissa Rooney. Andrew Bowman was her ex-husband’s son. Brooke is his stepsister.”

“Oh, man.”

“I thought you should know.”

The irritation disappeared from her voice. “Call me if you get anything else.”

“You’ve got it.”

Seth hung up the phone.

Marissa sat beside Cahill, furiously scribbling in her notebook. Cahill stared intensely at his computer screen.

“Wait . . .” Cahill muttered.

“What is it?”

“The last ping from Alicia’s cell phone was earlier this morning near Tacoma.”

“Tacoma?” Seth circled the desk, trying to piece together the story in his head. “What would she be doing there? Where does she work?”

Cahill frowned. “At a financial firm downtown.”

“So midmorning on a work day she takes off to Tacoma?”

“Do you suppose she has a client there?”

Seth clicked on the investment firm’s web page.

“Does this look like the kind of place that has clients in Tacoma?”

“Now you’re profiling,” Cahill said with a wry grin.

“Keep looking.”

Seth paced the floor. According to his neighbor, Andy had had a fight with his girlfriend. Not long afterward he’d left town on a business trip. Was he heading out of state? Was Alicia with him? He assumed it was Alicia’s blood on the floor. But what if he was wrong?

He should call Garcia back and get state patrol looking for Andy’s car. Traffic cameras. Whatever. They needed to find him now.

“Hang on,” Cahill said.

“You’ve got something?”

“It may be nothing, but it appears that Bowman’s father lives in a mental institution south of Tacoma.”

Why would Andy go to see his father today of all days? Seth stopped pacing and turned toward Marissa.

“Do you think Rick beat his son?”

“I know he did.”

“Henry, call the mental institution. See if Rick Bowman has had any visitors today.”

“You’re heading down there?” Marissa asked.

“I hope I’m not too late.”

Kelly stood in the middle of Logan's spacious living room playing her flute. Trying to play her flute, she amended. The familiar piece was one of her favorites, and usually playing it was as easy as singing the alphabet song, but today she stumbled over the keys like she was wearing oven mitts.

Kelly's gaze strayed away from the music and locked onto the stormy sky outside. All she could think about was her missing sister and the fear lodged deep inside her heart that Brooke might never come home.

She missed the next few notes and cursed. It had been weeks since she'd really practiced and she was rusty. Logan said she had to keep doing everyday things, and while she knew he was right, it was actually much harder than it sounded. Everything about living with Logan was comfortable and familiar, but she couldn't stop thinking about her mother, alone in the Renton house.

She couldn't stop thinking about her sister either. Every day she watched the news. Every day she called her mother, hoping there would be some break in the case. Day after day, though, it was more of the same, and Kelly wondered if Brooke would ever come home, if life would ever go back to normal.

Normal. She'd almost forgotten what that felt like. Normal was playing second fiddle to Brooke, the family star. Though Marissa would deny it, Kelly knew Brooke was her mother's favorite. When Brooke had skipped school to hang out with her boyfriend, she was grounded for a few days. When Kelly had skipped school to hang out with her friends, she was grounded for a month and had to do all the household chores. It was hard not to resent the inequality.

It wasn't Brooke's fault. Her sister had always looked out for her—tucked her into bed when Mom worked late, comforted her when Rick went off on one of his binges. Brooke was always there. So when her sister decided to live on campus, she'd been angry. It felt like another person in her life was abandoning her.

Now, Kelly missed Brooke with an ache that seemed bottomless.

She missed another note. Crap. Frustrated, Kelly lowered the flute from her lips. Outside, the rain beat against the window like fingernails pounding a bongo drum. The dark sky reflected her crap mood. She rearranged the sheets of music in front of her and huffed out a deep breath. Positioning the flute, she started again, slower this time.

Music filled the room, drowning out the rain. She forced herself to focus on the notes in front of her and not the fear she felt spiraling around in her brain. Halfway through the phrase, the doorbell rang.

Kelly frowned and lowered the flute. Placing it on the coffee table, she stole a quick glance at the clock. It was one thirty in the afternoon. Who would come looking for Logan at this time of day?

Maybe it was a delivery, she thought, though Logan hadn't mentioned anything when he'd left the house after lunch. He had a two o'clock meeting with the principal of Redmond High. Afterward they were planning to go to the dojo. The upside of getting kicked out of school for fighting was that Logan had started teaching her some self-defense techniques. They spent time every afternoon practicing at the dojo.

The doorbell chimed again, and Kelly crossed into the front hall. The dead bolt was locked, and she pressed her eye to the peephole in the center of the cold steel door. The guy on the doorstep was beautiful. His dark hair was perfectly groomed. Almond-shaped eyes glinted with a smile. In his hands he held a huge bouquet of flowers. Roses, lilies, and greens—eucalyptus maybe.

Kelly grinned and unlocked the door. Parked beside the curb was an old black Jeep. There was no delivery truck in sight. Not surprising though. The guy standing on the doorstep didn't look like any delivery guy she'd ever seen. He was scorching hot in an Abercrombie & Fitch kind of way.

"Hi," he said.

His killer smile revealed a straight line of perfect white teeth. A flurry of butterflies took flight in her stomach, and she could feel her cheeks burn red. She was suddenly embarrassed by her appearance.

Her hair was tied back in pigtails. She was wearing tight black jeggings and a Sid and Nancy T-shirt. She felt awkward and gawky compared to the Adonis standing in front of her, but he didn't seem to notice. He smiled at her just the same.

"You must be here for Logan," she said.

"And you must be Kelly."

"I am," she said, pleased Logan had mentioned her.

"Logan said to meet him here. I'm a little early. Mind if I come in? It's pretty nasty out here."

A gust of wind drove another sheet of rain against the windows, and her face flushed a deeper shade of red. He handed her the bouquet of flowers, and she hesitated, wondering why Logan hadn't mentioned this guy was stopping by. Maybe he'd forgotten. Kelly bit her lower lip, trying to decide what to do. Her paranoia made her feel like a foolish little kid. He was probably Logan's boyfriend.

"Do you want me to give him a quick call?" Adonis asked.

Feeling stupid, Kelly shook her head and stepped back, allowing him to enter, and buried her nose in the gorgeous petals. The sweet smell of roses filled her head.

Though Kelly was tall, he was a head taller, and she looked up into his chocolate-brown eyes. Oh wow. This was the kind of guy who would come to their house to pick up Brooke, not the kind of guy who would ever notice her.

Painfully aware of the new rash of pimples on her chin, she shied away, switching her focus back to the flowers.

And she remembered a scene from her mother's favorite eighties movie, Sixteen Candles. The scene takes place at the church, after the ceremony, where Samantha looks for her family and realizes she's been forgotten. Again. Then the crowd parts, and Samantha catches sight of the gorgeous guy she's been chasing the whole movie, Jake, standing by a fire-engine-red Porsche 944 with flowers in his hand. Cheesy. But romantic too.

Finding her voice, she said, "Logan's not here. He won't be back for a while."

He smiled then, that flawless beautiful smile, and looked deep into her eyes.

"That's okay, Kelly. I'm here for you."

She didn't see the Taser until it was too late.

Drew cut his gaze to the rearview mirror, half expecting a sea of red and blue lights speeding toward him. Instead silver headlights reflected off the rain-slick surface of Interstate 90, and he drew in a breath. East, toward the towering foothills of the Cascade Range, his exit lay dead ahead. Five minutes and he'd leave the interstate behind, burying himself in the anonymity of the winding back roads between him and the cabin.

He couldn't feel safe until he dumped the Jeep and his cargo. He wouldn't feel safe until he left Drew Matthews and Andy Bowman behind for good.

Safe.

Drew's hands clutched the steering wheel as he remembered the last time he'd really felt safe. Long ago. Before his mother was sick.

The sweet smell of chocolate chip cookies had wafted from the kitchen, drawing him up the creaky back porch of the white clapboard house. The screen door squealed open. Flinging his backpack to the floor, he bolted down the hall toward the kitchen.

Country music boomed through the tinny radio speakers. His mother's back was turned, and she shuffled across the floor in her bare feet, dancing to Shania Twain's throaty voice singing, "Man, I feel like a woman." The horns blasted and she spun. Laughter spilled from her lips as she caught sight of him. Cheeks pink, dark eyes sparkling, she smiled.

She dialed the volume down and reached into the fridge. Cold milk filled a glass on the countertop.

"One cookie or two?" she'd asked.

"Two."

He'd clambered onto a stool at the counter. She lifted two cookies off the cooling rack and set them on a plate beside a glass of milk. He bit into the first. The sweet taste of brown sugar and gooey chocolate chips filled his mouth.

Drew's hands relaxed on the wheel. How old was he back then? Nine? Ten? Rick was on his medication and life was normal. School came easy. He had friends. A family. The cancer changed everything. Flesh melted off his mother's bones and the sparkle disappeared from her eyes. A season in hell, then she died. Rick went off his meds, and his life turned to shit. His mother died and he was robbed of the life he should have had.

The asshole in the Chevrolet up ahead slammed on his brakes. It was too late to slow down, so Drew cranked the wheel and changed lanes. He flipped the driver off. The old guy behind the wheel glared as he sailed by. Catching sight of the Chevrolet growing smaller in the rearview mirror triggered his memory.

He was in middle school when he and his best friend, Drew Matthews, decided to burn down the neighbor's garage, but once they started talking about it, it seemed like nothing else mattered. Old Man Rutherford was a real pain in the ass, always yelling at the neighborhood kids. If anyone deserved trouble, it was him.

Rutherford spent every Saturday afternoon listening to oldies rock and roll and working on the piece of shit Chevrolet in his garage. They figured that without the car, the old man would spend more time inside his house and less time harassing them.

The garage lit up like a Roman candle, sending sparks shooting high into the night sky. Watching the flames undulate up into the heavens, he felt elated, like all the anger smoldering deep inside him was being released in the white-hot fury of the blaze.

He thought they'd gotten away with it too. Winter came, and each gray day blended into the next, until one afternoon he heard a knock at the door. A police officer arrived on his doorstep with a notebook full of questions. They parked him in an empty interrogation room for hours. Waiting. Bands of fear ratcheted tight around his chest, squeezing until he could barely breathe. With each passing minute the walls closed in. He felt small. Alone. Despite his fear he refused to talk, refused to say a word about his buddy Drew. He kept his mouth shut when they came back waving fingerprint evidence and shoe impressions in his face.

In the end, though, the cops pinned everything on him. Drew Matthews's father hired a fancy lawyer to protect his son while his own father sat in court, watching the proceedings through bloodshot eyes, and did nothing. He was convicted. Sent away.

And his life was fucked.

Rick never came to visit. Not once. No one came. When he was released eighteen months later, his juvenile record was sealed. But there was no going back to his life before. High school. College. All gone. He got a job working construction and moved back in with Marissa and the old man.

Then, one summer night at a downtown bar, the door swung open and opportunity strolled in. His old buddy, Drew Matthews, a newly minted university graduate. He looked as shiny and bright as a brand-new car. They caught up, shooting the shit like nothing had happened, like they were old friends. After last call they took off in Andy's pickup truck and drove to Discovery Park. It was deserted this time of night. Jumping the fence, they disappeared into the woods with a six-pack, headed toward the bluff overlooking Puget Sound.

Andy drank while Drew bragged about his life abroad. His degree. His brand-new condo. His triumphant return to Seattle.

And Andy Bowman seized his chance. With the blow of a rock, everything changed. He shed his former self and started over again. Fresh. New.

The whine of a siren snapped Drew back into the moment. Flashing lights filled his rearview mirror. Cold fingers of fear clamped around his throat. He swallowed. The siren wailed. The cop signaled him to pull over.

Son of a fucking bitch.

A split-second urge to hammer down on the gas shot through him.

Running would be pointless though. No way he'd win a car chase in the Jeep. He was screwed.

Wait a minute. There was only one cop. One cop. If they knew about Rick, about Alicia, there would be more. There would be a blockade. Police helicopters. The whole goddamned freak show of Charles Sully's untimely end would play out right here on I-90.

Ignoring the frantic hammering of his heart, Drew slowed the vehicle and pulled over onto the shoulder. Never taking his eyes off the mirror, he caught sight of the burly cop emerging from the cruiser. He thought about the gun stuffed under the seat.

He could do this.

"Kelly," he called, his tone tentative. Testing.

No answer. She was still out, or at least she was pretending. Sweat beaded at his hairline like drops of dew. Seconds ticked by. The cop skirted the edge of the vehicle, glancing through the windows as he approached. Drew held his breath. No way the cop could see through the dark tint, but still . . .

Gray rain poured off the wide brim of the state trooper's hat. Drew stiffened. His pulse rate spiked, and he lowered the window. The rain smelled like melted crayons through the open window.

“License and registration.”

“What’s the problem, Officer?” Drew asked, tacking a friendly smile to his face.

“Is this your vehicle?”

A knot of dread coiled at the pit of Drew’s stomach.

“Yes, sir.” He fumbled in his coat for his wallet. Fingers freezing, he realized what he was about to do. He’d almost handed Andy Bowman’s license to the cop. Fucking stupid. Get a grip.

“Do you know how fast you were going?” the cop barked.

“No, sir.”

Drew opened the console between the seats and fished around for his other wallet. He pulled the license from its sheath and handed it through the open window. The cop stared at him, then his eyes flicked back to the driver’s license in his hand. Without another word, he retreated.

Drew brushed the sweaty hair off his forehead. He heard a grunt from the Jeep’s cargo hold and froze. He had to get out of here before she woke up. What was taking so goddamned long?

He stared into the side mirror. His heart thundered like a jackhammer. The cop slouched behind the cruiser’s wheel, head down, so Drew couldn’t read his expression. Cars blasted past on the interstate, rocking the Jeep, and he swiped his damp palms down the length of his jeans.

How far could he get if he lit out of here now? To the next exit? If he could make it that far, he could lose the cop on the back roads. But then what? Another cover blown. And they’d be looking for him. For the Jeep. He’d have to ditch it and . . .

More flashing red lights approached in the distance, and Drew’s heart thundered.

He was going to get caught with Kelly tied up in the back next to a suitcase containing Alicia’s body—or what was left of it.

The cop lumbered toward the Jeep. Jittery, barely able to breathe, Drew watched. Was he reaching for his gun?

A second set of flashing lights sped past.

“Eighty-five in a seventy zone’s a pretty hefty fine.”

The cop handed the ticket through the open window, and Drew dropped it on the seat. He tucked the license back into his wallet.

“Yes, sir.”

A soft moan came from the back.

Fuck.

Drew’s pulse rate spiked.

“What’s that?” the cop asked, craning his head toward the cargo hold.

Drew thought about the gun. He pictured a bullet hole between the cop’s eyes. His gaze flicked to the back of the Jeep.

“It’s my sister’s dog.”

“Dog?”

“Yeah. She just moved to Pullman. Somehow I got roped into bringing the dog.”

The cop’s eyes narrowed. His gaze hardened.

“Didn’t sound like a dog.”

Drew snorted.

“Yeah, if you can call it that. Some kind of pug mix. Hates the car. Shits like a baby on ex-lax, so I drugged it. Antianxiety meds from the vet.”

At least the drugging part was true. The cop grunted.

“Well, thanks, Officer,” Drew said, and pressed the button, hoping to Christ Kelly stayed quiet a few more seconds.

The window hummed as the glass rose. Suddenly the cop’s meaty hand reached out, clamping down hard on the edge of the window. Sweat trickled down the back of Drew’s neck.

“Mind if I take a look?” the cop asked, nodding toward the cargo hold.

Drew’s hand dropped from view, fingers groping underneath the seat until they grazed the butt of the gun.

The radio on the cop’s shoulder squawked. A disembodied voice said, “We have an eleven-eighty near Exit 31. Ambulances dispatched. All available units respond.”

The state trooper grimaced.

“Slow down, Mr. Pearson,” he said, stealing one last glance toward the back of the Jeep before turning away.

Drew watched the cop climb back into his cruiser. His heart pounded in his chest. Drew pulled back out into traffic, driving just below the speed limit until the police cruiser disappeared from view.

Marissa searched her memory for what little she recalled about Andy. Rick had described him as a troubled kid who'd had some kind of run-in with the law.

Robbery? Arson? God, it had been so long, she couldn't remember the details. She'd purged as much of those years from her mind as she could. Possible record, she noted for Cahill before moving on.

At first Rick had sounded like a concerned father and she'd fallen for it. As a struggling single parent herself, he'd totally played on her sympathies. In fact, he was such a convincing liar, she'd had no idea what she had been getting herself into until it was too late.

Andy had been a surprise from the first day she met him. She'd greeted him at the door fully expecting a smart-mouthed kid with a bad attitude and a huge chip on his shoulder. But he was nothing like that. He was polite. Charming, even, and Marissa frowned as the irony hit her with full force. Rick had been charming too. She hadn't seen the monster that lay beneath his handsome face until after they were married. Maybe Andy was just like his father after all. A sociopath?

Mental illness, she jotted down on the sheet of paper, and racked her brain for anything else.

Andy had volunteered at a youth camp for troubled kids out in Snoqualmie Valley, some kind of scared-straight program. It was probably nothing, just another dead end, but she wrote it down anyway.

Cahill had one of those voices. Loud. Penetrating. Marissa pressed a finger to her ear, trying to focus in on her own thoughts, but it was no use. She couldn't hear herself think.

"Yes, I'm calling about Rick Bowman," Cahill said, doodling on the notepad beside his keyboard. "No, I'm not family. I'm with the Holt Foundation. Is there a problem?"

The change in Cahill's tone instantly registered with Marissa. She glanced up. Cahill was on his feet now, spinning toward her. His large hand clamped down over the receiver.

"Call Seth," he said.

"What?"

"Call Seth. Now."

Confused, Marissa reached under her desk and grabbed her purse. She rummaged through the jumbled contents until she found her cell phone and dialed. The phone rang. Cahill held out his hand. She slapped the phone into his palm.

The purse yawned open on the desk, and Marissa caught sight of Brooke's insulin pen. How could something this small hold the power of life and death? Here she sat scribbling down notes while somewhere out there Brooke's body was seizing up like a car's engine without oil. If she wasn't already in a coma. If she was still alive.

Cahill slammed down the receiver to the landline and pressed the cell phone to his ear.

"Come on, answer," he growled.

"What now?" Marissa asked.

Cahill held up a finger and she fell silent.

"Seth? I called the mental institution. There's something going on there." He paused, listening. "I don't know what, but as soon as I asked about Bowman, things got tense."

Cahill's landline rang. He wrapped up his conversation with Seth and handed the phone back to Marissa. She set it on the desk beside her purse and turned back to her list.

There had to be something else.

Her cell phone rang and she picked it up. With Cahill barking on the other line, she walked out into the hallway.

“Hello.”

“Marissa?”

Her heart plummeted. It wasn't Seth. It was Logan.

“How did it go with the principal today?” she asked.

With any luck Logan's silver tongue had charmed the school's administration into welcoming Kelly back with open arms.

“Uh, fine,” he said.

But it wasn't fine. The electric edge in his voice sent fear rippling through Marissa.

“What's wrong, Logan?”

He hesitated. In that silent second, a host of horrific thoughts filled Marissa's mind until, finally, he spoke.

“Have you seen Kelly?”

Dread lodged like a tumor in her throat, making it hard to speak, hard to breathe.

“What do you mean? She's with you.”

“I just got home from the high school, and Kelly's not here.”

“You've called her?”

“Her cell phone is going directly to voice mail.”

“Oh God.”

“Did you send flowers?” Logan asked.

“Flowers? What flowers?”

“There are flowers on the floor,” he said, sounding every bit as shaky as she felt.

“No.”

Panic set Marissa in motion. This couldn't be happening. She burst through the office door. Cahill was still on the phone. She blurted out Kelly's name, but before she could say more, he raised his palm. Marissa didn't wait. She shoved the insulin pen in her pocket and bolted out the door.

“Is there a card, a logo, anything that tells you where the flowers came from?”

“Nothing. They're wrapped in plain brown butcher's wrap tied with a white ribbon.”

“She can't be gone.”

The elevator doors slid shut. Marissa sagged against the back wall with the phone pressed against her ear, praying to God she didn't lose signal.

“Logan. Are you still there?”

“Yes.”

“What time did you leave?”

“Just after lunch.”

“Dammit, that was two hours ago.”

Logan fell silent. Marissa drew a tremulous breath. She shouldn't have snapped at him. This wasn't his fault.

“Look, I'm sorry.”

“I'm worried too, Marissa.”

“Call the police. I'm on my way.”

Wind blasted through the high-rise buildings and howled through the downtown core. Sheets of rain slashed against her windshield. Squealing out into traffic, she could barely see a block ahead.

Marissa punched down on the accelerator and slalomed her way through a pack of slow-moving vehicles.

She merged onto the interstate heading north. The road was slick as she shot past cars at a blistering pace. If just one person pulled out in front of her, she was done. There would be no time to stop. Still, she didn't slow her pace as she swerved onto the exit for the 520 Bridge.

Marissa's cell phone rang. Hoping it was Seth, she picked up the call.

"Marissa?"

"Yes," she snapped, not recognizing the voice on the other end.

"Where are you?" the man asked.

"Who is this? Evan?"

The floating bridge lay dead ahead. Eastbound lanes were choked with traffic as nervous drivers crawled along the narrow span across Lake Washington. Gray waters churned on either side of the bridge as the fierce winds pounded an endless series of white-capped waves into the barrier.

"Are you on your way to Logan's place?"

Besides Logan, no one knew where she was going. She hadn't even told Cahill. Who on earth could this be?

A wave jumped the barrier and smashed against her car. She jerked the wheel, veering out of her lane. A car horn blared behind her, and she corrected her course, narrowly missing the car beside her.

"Who are you?"

His laugh sent chills racing through her.

"Check the caller ID."

Tearing her gaze away from the slick bridge deck, Marissa glanced at the call display. Fear sucked the air from her lungs.

"Kelly," she gasped. The line went dead.

The phone rang again. This time she checked the call display. Brooke. Marissa's eyes swam with tears. She blinked them away. She knew who this was.

"Andy."

"Well done, Mommy Dearest. Just under the bell."

"What have you done with my girls?"

"They're waiting for you," he said.

Waiting? Waiting where? What was he doing to her girls?

"I thought I'd host a family reunion. Would love it if you could join us."

He was crazy, a monster—ten times worse than his father.

"If you hurt them . . ."

"You'll what? Ground me?" he laughed. "Come on, Mom. Surely you can do better than that."

"We never did anything to hurt you, Andy. I'm not like your father . . ."

"Dad? Don't worry. I've already taken care of him. He won't be joining us."

"What did you do?"

"Nothing I'm sure you didn't consider a hundred times yourself. No thanks necessary," he said. "Where are you?"

"On Highway 520, heading toward Redmond."

"Go east on Route 202. I'll call you with more directions."

Andy hung up. Marissa screamed. She pounded the horn with her fist, willing the line of cars to move aside and let her pass, but they didn't. The phone slipped from her grasp and fell to the floor. She swore. She needed to call Seth.

Crouching low in her seat, she brushed her fingers along the floor of the car, searching for the cell. Shoving her hand into the deep crevice between the seat and the armrest, she felt a slick corner of plastic.

Her fingers scrabbled for the phone. She felt it. The car shifted and the phone slid away. Gritting her teeth, she pushed deeper, managing to pin it in place with her finger. She held her breath, easing it toward the armrest one centimeter at a time. Finally she curled her fingers around the phone and pulled it out.

She hit redial.

Chahill had been right. There was trouble ahead. Police cruisers formed a barrier around the entrance to Valley Mental Health Institution. Seth's every instinct told him they had something to do with Rick Bowman and his son's secret life. Although he was curious to learn the specifics, he knew there was no point asking the cops. He was no longer part of the inner circle. Finding Alicia Wright would be a better use of his time.

Seth headed back toward his car. He heard someone call his name. Stopping under the glass covering of the walkway, he turned to face his former boss.

Alvarez shot him a thunderous glare. "What are you doing here?"

Seth forced a crooked smile and scratched the back of his neck. "I thought I'd check myself in."

"Not the worst idea you've ever had." A small smile tugged at the corners of Alvarez's lips. "Now, why don't you tell me why you're really here?"

Seth paused. The sound of the rain striking the glass and the rustling of the thick pines overhead filled the silence as he considered his answer. Knowing Alvarez wouldn't be easily brushed off, he opted for the truth.

"I'm here to see Rick Bowman."

"Why?"

"Because Drew Matthews is Andrew Bowman, Marissa's stepson."

"You're telling me he's Rick Bowman's son? You're sure?"

"Marissa identified him."

"Son of a bitch," Alvarez said, kneading his lined forehead like a headache raged inside his brain.

"Is Rick dead?"

Alvarez didn't answer. He didn't have to. The grim expression on the lieutenant's face was confirmation enough.

"First Alicia Wright. Now his father. Andrew Bowman is escalating."

"You don't know for sure Wright is dead," Alvarez said.

"If you mean we haven't found her body yet, you're right." Seth shoved his hands in his pockets and hunched his shoulders against the bitter wind.

"How is it you're two steps ahead of us?"

"It's a whole hell of a lot easier to go with your gut when you don't need evidence to build your case." He shrugged. "For what it's worth, I'd have every state patrol from here to the Oregon border looking for his car. If Andy killed his girlfriend and his father, he's not coming back."

Seth waited for Alvarez to reprimand him, to warn him to stay away from the case, but the speech never came.

"Listen, Seth. The way things ended . . ."

Seth raised a hand, forestalling the lieutenant's words. Replaying the past was pointless. They had both said things they wished they hadn't. Funny thing was, now that it was all over, Seth wasn't sorry he'd quit.

"I made a decision. It's all for the best."

Alvarez's phone chirped. He read the text message and sighed.

"That's my cue." Alvarez stuck out his hand and Seth shook it. "Call me if you have any more breakthroughs."

"Sure," Seth said, surprised to find he meant it.

Seth paced back down the covered walkway. His thoughts were filled with Andrew Bowman and where he might flee. Maybe Cahill had some ideas. Reaching into his coat pocket, he grasped his phone. It vibrated in his hand.

“Marissa,” he said.

He knew he should tell her about Rick. Better she hear it from him than from someone else, or worse, the news. Before he could say another thing, Marissa barreled ahead.

“It’s Kelly. He has her too.”

Marissa’s voice shook. Fear was transmitted in her every syllable. Bowman? It had to be Bowman. Seth started jogging toward his car.

“How do you know?”

“He called me from Kelly’s phone.”

“Fuck.” Here he was down in Tacoma, hours away from where he needed to be, when Marissa needed him most. “Where are you?”

“I’m on 520 just past 405. He told me to take 202 East.”

The words poured out of her in a panicked rush.

Seth knew the Snoqualmie Valley. Farmland, trees, dozens of little twisty roads winding up into the foothills of the Cascade Range, tiny lakes, the river—millions of hiding places. Abandoned barns, mountain cabins, bunkers built by end-of-days nut bags. Unnamed roads that went nowhere.

Bowman could be anywhere. Anywhere. And Marissa was heading straight for him.

“Pull over. Wait for me,” Seth commanded, praying she would listen.

“He said he’d call with more directions.”

“For fuck’s sake, Marissa, pull over. You’re walking into a trap.”

“He’s got my girls, Seth.”

The raw burst of pain in her voice drove splinters of dread deep into his heart.

“Marissa,” he roared, but the phone beeped. “Marissa.”

But she was gone. The call dropped, and he lost her.

Seth sprinted down the slick walkway, grappling in his pocket for the keys. He grasped them in his fist. Skidding to a halt in the parking lot, he dropped the phone. It splashed into a deep puddle at his feet.

He swooped down and scooped it up. The screen was shattered and the display black. He thumbed the power button. Nothing. It was dead.

“Fuck. Goddamn it to fucking hell!”

Seth pounded his fist against the roof of the car.

Marissa was headed east, directly into Andrew Bowman’s trap, and he had no way of getting in touch with her.

Seth pitched the phone onto the passenger’s seat and jumped behind the wheel. Laying on his horn, he pulled a highly illegal, highly dangerous U-turn and raced back toward the interstate.

Cold settled over Kelly like a blanket of dew. She drew in a quick breath and expelled it from her lungs in a steamy cloud of vapor. Her nose dripped. She sniffed. It smelled like rotting wood and dank earth and something else. Water. Her eyes snapped open.

Where the hell was she?

Stretched out flat on her stomach, Kelly was pressed face-first against a damp wooden floor. It was pitch-black. She blinked. At least she thought she blinked. Eyes wide, she couldn't see a thing. No shapes. No light. Nothing.

She shifted. Her shoulders ached. Her hands were tightly bound behind her back. She tugged. Rough, fibrous ropes bit into her bare wrists. She yanked on her bonds until a burst of pain blasted through her head, ten times worse than the worst headache she'd ever had.

"Hello," she said, her creaky voice fading into the hollow darkness.

Nothing. No response. Kelly closed her eyes and listened.

At first all she could hear was the frantic beat of her own heart. Then she heard other sounds. Water. Water coming from everywhere. Rain on a tin roof. And something else, something bigger. A nearby river moving fast.

And breathing.

Breathing? She wasn't alone in here. Fear blew through her at gale force.

Kelly curled her knees toward her chest. Twisting her shoulders, she shifted her weight. Pain burst through her brain. She gritted her teeth and ignored it, rocking harder until she rolled onto her knees.

"Hello."

No one answered. She heard something though. Head cocked, she closed her eyes, straining to hear. It was a soft sound, barely discernible over her pounding pulse. It sounded like someone coughing. Coming from where?

Kelly lurched upright, staggering to her feet. Her head swam. She stood stock-still, waiting for the wave of dizziness to pass.

"Who's there?"

She heard a grunt. Human. Definitely human.

"I can hear you."

Kelly's voice trembled. She staggered ahead, one step at a time. God, she hated stumbling blind. The suffocating dark made her feel more vulnerable, more freaked out than she already was.

"Kel . . ."

The frail voice cracked and faded. Kelly froze. A half sob escaped her lips.

"Brooke?"

"Yes," the response came, half a sigh, half a whisper.

Kelly lurched ahead, feet scraping the floor. She tripped on something hard. Sparks of pain lit up her ankle. Without her hands to steady her, she almost went down, but at the last second she shifted her weight and regained her balance.

Tears flooded her eyes.

"Brooke, where are you?"

"Here." Another raspy whisper.

Her knee smashed into a rail. She pitched forward. Sharp metal ripped through her jeans, tearing her skin. She landed face-first on the wall. White-hot bolts of pain shot through Kelly's forehead and cheekbone. Her neck snapped back. The coppery tang of blood filled her mouth.

"You . . . okay?" Each word came slowly, haltingly for Brooke, like each syllable caused her pain.

Kelly grunted. Ignoring the pain, she rolled onto her knees again, wishing she could wipe the blood from her face. She jerked to her feet, moving more slowly this time toward the voice.

"Yeah." She slid a foot along the floor, testing, back in the direction from which she'd come. She felt something press into her leg and stopped.

Brooke lay stretched out on the bed. Kelly hunkered down over her sister's body and struggled against the ropes that bound her hands. She wanted to throw her arms around Brooke, feel her sister's beating heart beneath her palms. After so much worry, so much fear that she would never lay eyes on Brooke again, it seemed unreal that they were both here at this moment. She bowed her head onto Brooke's chest and felt the thin breathing, the rapid rise and fall of her sister's rib cage.

"God, Brooke, I thought you were . . ."

"Dead?" A sound escaped Brooke—half laugh, half sob. Kelly's heart sank. "Not yet."

There was something wrong with the rhythm of her sister's breath. She could feel it. It was too shallow, too frantic.

"Are you okay?" she asked, knowing it was a stupid question.

Of course Brooke wasn't okay. Neither of them was. They were trapped God knew where by some crazy fuck. She couldn't see shit, and Brooke . . .

"Need . . . insulin," Brooke croaked.

Tears clogged Kelly's throat and she swallowed them back. Insulin.

"Where is it? Where's your insulin?"

Maybe she could find it. If she could give Brooke a shot, then maybe, between the two of them, they could find a way out of here. Wherever here was.

"I'm out."

Kelly didn't know the medical term for what would happen to a diabetic without insulin, but she knew it was bad.

It seemed hopeless. What little hope survived in this evil place was weighted down by her overwhelming fear that they would die here. Then she thought about Brooke. Her sister needed her. A spark of anger ignited in her chest, fear evaporating in its bright glow, giving her purpose.

There was no way she was going to let her sister die. She wouldn't let that happen. Kelly raised her head.

"Who is he?"

"You . . . don't . . . remember?"

Remember? Why would I remember? Why . . .

She closed her eyes and recalled his face. Dark hair, dark eyes, high cheekbones. There was something familiar about it. Something. But what?

"Bowman."

Kelly gasped. The boy's face came rushing back in a flash. The last time she'd seen him had been the night her mother left Rick.

"Andy?" It made no sense. She waited for Brooke to correct her, but when she didn't, she knew she was right. "Why? Why would he do this to you?"

"Not the only . . . girl . . ."

Kelly's stomach heaved. She understood what Brooke was saying. She knew the police had found another missing blonde girl chopped into pieces.

"Kim Covey."

"Dead," Brooke said.

The finality of the word struck Kelly like a slap across the face. She staggered to her feet and struggled against the ropes chewing at her skin until she felt warm blood trickle down her wrists.

"We have to get out of here, Brooke, before the crazy fuck comes back."

"Can't."

Kelly's gaze ricocheted uselessly around the cabin. She couldn't see a damn thing in here.

"Tell me everything you know about this place, Brooke."

"Cabin . . . river . . . can't scream . . ." Brooke swallowed. "No one . . . hears."

The fierce wind buffeted the cabin, like a frantic, wild thing clawing to get inside. Kelly's heart jumped.

"There has to be something. Think."

Kelly sounded frantic. Desperate.

"Can't."

She heard Brooke's labored breath. Suddenly she regretted any mean thought she'd ever had about her sister and the special treatment granted Brooke because of her diabetes.

"Sorry . . . he found . . . you. Would die . . ."

Kelly swallowed the knot in her throat. She knew what Brooke was trying to say, and every fiber of her being rejected the thought.

"Enough talk about dying. We need to get out of here."

She closed her eyes and listened to the rain. There was a tapping. Like rain on glass. A window.

"Is there a window?"

"End of the cabin. Up . . . seven feet . . . more . . . too high . . ."

Maybe for Brooke, Kelly thought. But she was taller. She could jump. Maybe, if her hands were free, she could climb. Logan had taken her rock climbing two summers ago. She'd liked it. What's more, she'd been good at it. All she needed were a few footholds, a few handholds, and she could make it.

First she needed to get out of these ropes. She paused. Thinking. The knife. She'd carried the knife with her since the day she was attacked at the school. It made her feel safe. But it wasn't there now. Had he taken it? Or had it fallen out?

"I had a knife with me. It must have fallen out of my pocket. Are your hands free?"

Another breath.

"Yes."

"If I can find it, you can cut the ropes."

"No."

"What do you mean, no? I'm not going to let you die here."

Kelly pivoted in the dark, trying to figure out where she'd woken up. She closed her eyes. Tried to retrace the steps in her head.

"Kel . . ."

She heard the denial in Brooke's voice, and anger flared hot inside Kelly.

"Maybe you're ready to give up, Brooke, but I'm not. I'm going to find that knife. We're going to get out of here."

"Can't." Brooke's voice caught. "Can't . . . feel . . . my legs."

Black water pooled on the main road leading into the small town of Carnation. The wind rippled across the oily surface. There was no telling how deep it was—a few inches or a few feet. Or worse. It could be a sinkhole. There was no driving around it. Drew frowned.

Fucking great. The farmland stretched across the valley floor was no stranger to floods, but if the rain kept up at this rate, the road would close. Marissa would be unable to pass, and that would ruin everything.

Time was running out. After his stunt at the mental hospital, every cop north of Tacoma would be searching for Andrew Bowman. Maybe Alistair believed the text he'd sent from Alicia's phone, and maybe he didn't. Sometime soon her father would try to contact her again, and when he couldn't find her, everyone, everyone would come looking for Drew.

All he needed was a few more hours. Enough time to finish what he'd come here to do—eliminate the last of Andrew Bowman's pathetic family ties. Then he could just leave. He had a fake ID and enough money to start over again somewhere else.

But how could he ever feel safe? How could he live without looking over his shoulder, without thinking that another chance encounter like the one at the Chapel could bring his whole life crashing down around him?

That was no life. All the loose threads tying him to his former self had to be severed. Liam had tugged on one of those threads and his secret life had unraveled faster than a cheating wife's lie.

Gritting his teeth, Drew punched down on the gas, and the Jeep plunged into the rising tide. Water hissed over his wheels. The exhaust system coughed. Drew held his breath, foot pressed down harder on the gas. The Jeep chugged and sputtered but kept moving. Finally he emerged from the water onto the bridge deck, and Drew drove into town.

Neon beer lights burned brightly in the windows of Sliders Café. He parked half a block down on the other side of the street, a safe distance away. Pulling a Seahawks cap down low on his brow, Drew stepped out into a cold shower of rain and stuffed the gun into the waistband of his jeans.

Wet wind blew down the empty street. Sweat soaked through his T-shirt. In an hour it would all be finished and he'd be free to disappear again. Start over.

He glanced at the café. There were no cars out front. He didn't expect a crowd. With a storm blowing in and the road flooding out, anybody with half a brain would stay the fuck home. With any luck he'd be in, out, and on his way.

The café smelled like fried food and meatballs. The locals loved this place. Live music. Good food. From where Drew was standing, though, it sure looked like a shithole to him.

Over in the corner of the dining room, a teenage girl wiped down tabletops with a grimy rag. Drew set the metal gas tank down at his feet. It clanged on the tile floor. The girl looked up. For a split second his heart jolted and he thought he saw Alicia's face. He blinked and the moment passed. It wasn't Alicia. It was just some stupid girl, dressed in a short skirt and combat boots. She sauntered in slow motion toward the cash register, taking her sweet-ass fucking time.

That's right, bitch. Slow down, we've got all night.

"The restaurant is closing down for the night. I can't seat you, but if you wanted something for takeout . . ." Red lipstick. White teeth. She flashed a flirty smile.

He knew her type. She thought she was every teenage boy's wet dream, right down to the God-awful perfume wafting off her—Red Bull and cum.

“Just some gas,” he said, antsy to be on his way before anyone else came along.

Lights flashed in the plate glass window. Seconds later the door chimed. Drew groaned. Frustration bloomed like a mushroom cloud inside his chest. The grin faded from the girl’s face.

A skinny kid in ripped jeans and a black motorcycle jacket walked in. Light glinted off the barbell stud stabbed through the kid’s thick eyebrow. He swaggered up to the counter. Ignoring Drew, he stared straight at the girl.

“What time you off?” he asked.

She tossed her ponytail, staring down her nose at the kid like he was white trash.

“My shift ends in an hour. I don’t need a ride home.”

“Tell Cecil to close down early. The cops are blocking off the road. No way you’re going to make it through in that piece of shit you drive.”

The girl batted her eyelashes in an exaggerated, damsel-in-distress sort of way.

“And you’re here to, what, save me? How sweet.”

Drew didn’t have time for teenage drama right now. The road had barely been passable when he’d driven through ten minutes ago, and if the cops closed it, he was screwed. He just needed some gas. For a split second he thought about the gun, and then he changed his mind.

It wasn’t time yet.

Drew let out a low whistle.

“Listen, Romeo, let me clue you in to a few things about your little Juliet here. Any girl who dresses like that only wants one thing—you tied up in knots and desperate to get into her pants. She has no intention letting you anywhere near her. Have you asked her out?”

The kid didn’t answer. His gaze dropped to the floor and Drew grinned.

“She shot you down, didn’t she?”

The kid’s head bobbed in a grudging nod.

“So you stopped in to offer her a ride home and what does she do? She shits all over you. You can keep up the good-guy routine, fully transform into the doormat she thinks you are, and hope she’ll change her mind. It’s your choice. I don’t want to tell you how to live or anything, but if I were in your shoes, I’d let her drown. She’s not worth the trouble.”

The kid looked at the girl as if seeing her for the first time for the manipulative bitch she was. He spun and left the café without another word. Drew smiled.

“Give me ten on pump two,” he said, slapping a bill down on the countertop.

She took it with a smile.

“Wow, you sure got rid of him in a hurry.”

He hated everything about this girl. He’d be doing the world a favor by shooting her right now, but he still didn’t have the one thing he’d come here for.

“I really don’t give a shit about your love life, sweetheart. I just need some gas. Now, can you do that, or do I need to call Cecil out of the back to do it for you?”

The smile dissolved from her face. Well, hallelujah. She finally got it.

“You’re set on pump two.”

Drew grunted and picked up the gas can. He marched out the door into the rainy night and filled the gas can first. Placing the cap on the can, he dropped the nozzle to the ground. The slack hose dangled beside the pump like the empty sleeve of an amputee’s jacket.

Part one of his plan complete, he jogged back to the Jeep and stowed the gas can safely in the cargo hold. Then Drew marched back to the gas pumps.

The door chime rang and he saw the girl framed in the doorway. He stopped beside the pumps and snatched the nozzle off the ground. Squeezing it tight in his fist, he pumped the last few dollars' worth of gasoline onto the concrete pad.

"What the hell are you doing?" she yelled, stepping out of the café and into the wet night.

Dropping the nozzle, Drew yanked the gun from his waistband. Her eyes swelled in their sockets. A slow, dawning horror replaced the confusion on her face. Drew raised the barrel.

One eye closed, he took aim at the girl.

"This isn't about you," he said.

Her mouth yawned open, and he pulled the trigger. The bullet slammed into her shoulder. She reeled back. A wide swath of blood smeared down the glass door as she slid to the ground.

Drew pulled his father's Zippo from his pocket, along with a book of matches. Shielding the Zippo's flame from the wind, he lit the matches and flung them into the pool of gasoline.

Gasoline fumes ignited in a whoosh. Drew sprinted toward the Jeep. A wave of heat slammed against his back. He jumped inside the cab and pulled the door shut.

Orange flames soared into the night sky. By the time Drew heard the sirens, he'd reached the outskirts of town. Still vibrating from the rush, he picked up the phone. Marissa answered on the first ring.

"Where are you?" Drew asked.

"Coming up on Ames Lake Road."

"The next turn is Tolt Hill. Take it."

"Brooke and Kelly, are they okay? Have you hurt them?"

The exquisite note of fear in her voice aroused him. He laughed.

"Ticktock, Mama Bear. Your girls are waiting."

Drew tossed the phone out the window on his way to the bridge. He glanced in the rearview mirror. Flames soared above the roofs of the surrounding houses. Between the fire and the girl, the first responders in all these shit-assed little towns would be too busy to take a leak, let alone come looking for him.

Satisfied with his handiwork, Drew blew past the town limits. Police lights flashed on the road leading south. Drew pulled his Jeep to a stop. The kid had been right. White barricades blocked the road and cops diverted traffic away from the bridge.

Drew slammed his fist into the dash.

A uniformed cop started toward him. Drew waved him off, throwing the Jeep into reverse and backing away. His clothes smelled like gasoline. He had a full gas tank in his truck. He didn't need another cop on his ass.

He'd have to find another way to the cabin.

Seth raced along Route 202, following the same path Marissa had taken. He was an hour behind her, and without a phone, he had no way of knowing where to go next. He was driving blind, like the days before cell phones and GPS.

Dark-gray clouds spit torrents of rain onto the highway. The black foothills of the Cascade Range hulked like giants in the distance. Miles below lay the small towns of Fall City, Carnation, and Duvall. Off the main routes, back roads splintered off into a web of forestry roads and dead ends.

He saw the turnoff for Tolt Hill Road. Desperate, he took it. Searching the foothills for Bowman without some guidance would be like trying to find a needle in a haystack. Considering his options, he had no choice but to stop in Carnation. He needed to call Marissa and Cahill.

Flashing lights throbbed in the darkness, and his chest tightened. Trouble up ahead.

Was he too late?

Traffic slowed to a stop. Seth eased down the hill toward the bridge spanning the river. Two squad cars blocked the road. Uniformed officers in rain gear turned cars around at the base of the bridge, and Seth groaned. What the hell was going on? Why were they stopped?

Angling out of his lane onto the shoulder, he saw the problem. The road was flooded out. Shit. Shit. Shit. There were no connector roads, no easy way to bypass the flooding and head into Carnation. Turning around would cost him half an hour, maybe longer, and he still didn't know where Marissa was, if she was safe, if she was . . .

The car in front of him pulled ahead. The driver executed a sloppy three-point turn and headed west, back up Tolt Hill Road. Seth stared out the window, gaze stretched out beyond the yellow beam of the police officer's flashlight. He was next.

"Hey . . .," he heard the officer yell through the closed window.

Ignoring the call, he plunged headlong into the water. All around him the river gushed. The car gurgled and chugged, slowly wading through. The water level steadily climbed past the wheels, halfway up the doors.

Breathing shallowly through a mouth as dry as cotton, Seth steered toward the other side, two hundred yards away. Maybe less. He reached the halfway point.

The floodwaters roiled up over the hood like a living, breathing thing intent on swallowing him whole. His headlights flickered. Water seeped in through the bottom of the door. He was going to make it. He was going to . . .

The engine coughed. Died.

Seth's fingers scrabbled for the controls. He lowered the window while the car still had power. The smell of pine trees and the muddy river blew through the open window. The car stalled.

Icy water filled his shoes and flowed over his ankles. The fast-moving current surrounded the car, shifting it sideways, and Seth unlatched his seat belt. Water gushed through the open window. He shifted in his seat, getting ready to climb out.

Blinding lights filled his rearview mirror. He squinted, lifted a hand. A truck engine roared behind him. Glancing back, he saw the enormous wheels of a monster truck cut through the water. The bumper nudged against the trunk of his car and shifted him forward. Another bump. Seth's car moved a foot. Two. The frigid water inched up Seth's legs, but he ignored it. At least he was moving in the right direction. He'd reach the other side soon.

He heard a crunch through the open window. The car trunk collapsed. It was pinned under the weight of the monster truck's bumper, and all forward movement ceased. Now he was really screwed.

With his bumper pinned underneath the truck, there was no way to push him out of the river. He was stuck. And with the water level rising higher with each passing second, his choices had just gotten harder.

Seth stuck his head out the window and looked behind him. The truck driver waved an arm, beckoning him back.

Short on options, Seth figured he could either swim for it or climb back to the truck. In these conditions there were no good options.

Deciding he'd rather climb than swim, Seth crawled out the window.

Exhaust fumes belched from the truck's exhaust pipe. Spotlights rippled across the water, directing all eyes to him.

Seth crawled out onto the rain-slick roof. Rising to his feet, he edged back toward the truck. Suddenly the sinking car shifted underneath his feet, and Seth lost his footing. Stumbling sideways, he felt the roof of the car slide out from beneath him, and he landed in the water.

Seth gasped. Cold. It was so cold it felt like daggers of ice stabbing into his flesh. The current clawed at him like a hungry beast, pulling him downstream. He kicked, fingers grasping, reaching for the car like it was his only lifeline. Closer. And closer. Finally he grasped the window ledge. Underwater now, he used it to pull himself back to the car.

He scrambled onto the roof as fast as he could. He shook, the cold wind tearing through him. Slowly he rose to his feet. Extending his hands wide for balance, Seth inched toward the truck.

The car was almost fully submerged in the rising flood. Standing thigh-deep, he felt the heat radiating off the truck's grille and knew scaling it would be easy. There were lots of places to grab on to, lots of places to push off from. But there was no way to grip the metal without burning his hands.

Gritting his teeth, Seth plunged his fists into the water, holding them there until the cold numbed them. He'd still burn himself, but with any luck, he'd be able to ignore the pain long enough.

Seth grabbed hold of the grille, scaling it as fast as he could. The heat seared his palms. He clenched his teeth and scrabbled onto the hood of the truck. The rumbling engine shuddered beneath him. On hands and knees, he crawled toward the passenger's window.

Seth collapsed in a wet heap into the deep bucket seat. Heat blasted through the open vents. Shuddering, he leaned into it.

The truck driver had a thick, compact build and a garden gnome's pointy beard.

"Dude, you must have balls the size of coconuts to try driving through that shit," he said.

Seth shrugged. "More balls than brains."

The driver chuckled. He shifted the truck into reverse. Easing back, he turned the wheel and drove around the car, angling for the far shore. The monster truck sliced through the floodwaters with the ease of a Coast Guard Cutter through calm seas.

"I'm Seth Crawford."

"Darryl Saintil."

"Good to meet you, Darryl. Sorry to drag you out in the middle of this shit-storm to rescue me."

"Hey, no worries. I was looking for a way to get across. The cop had me stopped, but when you got in over your head, he sent me out. Works better for me this way."

Outside, Seth spied a spotlight reflecting off the thick blanket of cloud cover. He leaned forward, craning his neck toward the light.

“Medical chopper,” Darryl said. “They land over by the middle school.”

Seth’s stomach sank.

“Accident?”

The guy made a smacking sound with his lips and shrugged his shoulders. “Likely. On a night like this, there’s bound to be trouble.”

The truck lurched up the steep embankment, out of the water. Something slid across the seat and bumped against his thigh.

Darryl’s cell phone glimmered in the lights from the dash. Stealing went against everything he believed in, but he needed a phone. He’d give it back, he reasoned, and would even give Darryl a few extra bucks for his trouble. Right now he had to find Marissa.

“I’m going to toss your cell phone in the glove compartment,” Seth said.

“Thanks, man.”

Seth opened the glove compartment and closed it again. Instead of placing the phone inside, he slid it into his coat pocket.

Darryl steered around the barricade on the far side of the water.

“Where do you want me to drop you?”

“Here’s fine.”

Seth stuck out his hand and Darryl shook it.

“Thanks for the ride.”

“Anytime. Stay out of the water, you lunatic.”

Seth grinned. He propped the door open and hopped out of the truck. His feet thumped against the pavement. The door slammed and Darryl took off down the main drag.

A lone police officer diverted traffic away from the barrier. Overhead he heard the whump whump whump of the chopper blades as they sliced through rain-choked sky, and Seth looked back at the cop.

“What’s with the medevac?”

“Haven’t you caused enough trouble for one night?”

Raising his hands, Seth kept walking. He pulled Darryl’s phone from his pocket and dialed Henry Cahill’s number.

“Hello,” Cahill barked into the phone.

“It’s me. Have you heard from Marissa?”

“Marissa? No. Where have you been? I’ve left you a dozen messages.”

“My phone’s dead.”

“Where are you?”

“Carnation,” Seth said. “Kelly’s gone. Bowman has her. Last I heard from Marissa, she was heading out Route 202. She’s walking right into a trap. We’ve got to find her, Henry, before Bowman does.”

Rounding the next corner, he smelled something, like cedar burning in a hearth. He frowned. On a night like this, the air heavy with rain, he shouldn’t be able to smell someone’s fireplace. He looked up.

Two blocks away a bright column of flames shot up past the rooftops into the inky sky. Thick, noxious plumes of gray smoke collided with the low ceiling of clouds. Seth’s stomach constricted. He quickened his pace.

“You heard what happened there? In Carnation?” Cahill asked.

Seth stopped, his gaze riveted on the blaze. “Uh, yeah. Something about a fire.”

He started at the hurtling flames, horrified. Transfixed. His hands shook and he remembered the green door, the flames, and the agony of his burning flesh. How nothing had dulled the pain. He remembered how the fire had devoured everything in his life that mattered and left him a burned-out shell of a man.

He stared at the blaze. His scars itched.

The only thing that mattered now was Marissa, and short of a miracle, he was going to lose her too.

“Crawford!”

Seth heard Cahill shouting on the other end of the phone.

“I’m here,” he said, unable to tear his gaze away from the flames. “Have you tried pinging their phones?”

“Yeah. Nothing.”

“You’ve tried them all?”

“Marissa, Kelly, Brooke, and Alicia—he’s probably dumped them all.”

“Shit. Shit.”

“I started looking out Route 202 for something that might mean something to Bowman. Marissa wrote a lot of things down, and, well . . .” Cahill’s voice trailed off.

Seth covered an ear, trying to blunt the noise.

“Louder, Henry.”

“There’s a youth camp located two miles downriver from where you’re standing. Andrew Bowman spent a summer there.”

“I need the location. Text it to me.”

“Yeah.” Cahill hesitated. “It may be a dead end.”

Finally Seth turned away from the fire.

“It’s the only lead we’ve got.”

“Can’t . . . feel . . . my legs.”

Brooke’s words hit Kelly like a shock wave. She rocked back on her heels. Kelly squinted into the darkness as she tried to see something. Anything. But the dark closed around her like a thick black hood. She swallowed.

“You can’t feel your legs? You mean like they’ve fallen asleep?”

“Worse.”

“Can you move at all?”

“Some,” Brooke croaked.

“Then you have to do it. We have to find the knife.”

“How?”

Kelly turned toward her sister’s small, scared voice.

“Are you tied up?”

“Foot . . . chained . . .”

A chain? Panic flailed like a trapped bird inside Kelly’s chest.

“Are your hands free?”

“Yes.”

“Then you need to move.”

“Can’t.” Anger sparked in her sister’s voice.

“You have to,” Kelly yelled back. “My hands are tied. I can’t see anything. You have to climb off the bed.”

“I can’t.”

“You can. If you don’t, we’re both going to die here. Is that what you want?”

“I . . . hurt.”

Finding the knife was their only hope. With her hands tied behind her back, she was useless. Kelly needed Brooke to move. It was the only way.

“Stop telling me what you can’t do.”

“Bitch,” Brooke spit.

Kelly heard soft hiccupping sobs. Tears stung her eyes, and she blinked them back.

“Look, I know it hurts. I know you don’t want to move, but if we stay here, we’re going to die. Please, Brooke, do it for me.”

For a long time Brooke said nothing. Then Kelly heard a thump. Loud. Sharp.

“Are you okay?” she asked.

A grunt. Yes.

Kelly swept her foot in a wide arc, feeling for the knife, praying she didn’t accidentally kick it farther away. She heard Brooke crawling along the floor.

The stale stench of sweat and urine wafted off her sister’s body. Sorrow and revulsion clogged Kelly’s throat. What had Bowman done to her sister? What was he planning to do to her? She had no idea how long ago he’d been here, but she knew he’d be back.

“Got . . . it,” Brooke said.

Kelly’s breath rushed out in a dewy cloud of steam. She turned toward the sound of Brooke’s voice.

“Okay, I’m coming to you.”

Kelly heard Brooke's breathing—shallow and rapid. Sorrow squeezed her heart. She eased forward until she saw Brooke—a dark shape hunched on the floor. Blinking back tears, Kelly knelt beside her.

“It's a switchblade. You'll have to open it.”

“Don't . . . want . . . to cut . . . you.”

“Don't worry about that. If you do, I'll deal with it.”

Kelly bowed her head and waited. Seconds passed like hours. The sound of the howling wind and pounding rain filled the cabin. Finally Brooke's spidery hands found hers. Slowly, haltingly, Brooke placed the blade and began to saw with slow, jerky movements.

“It's . . . hard.”

“I know. I'm sorry. You know I didn't mean those things I said. I just . . . I just had to get you moving.”

Brooke said nothing. She continued sawing the ropes.

“I'm scared, Brooke.”

It wasn't the first time she'd been scared. She remembered Rick's violent outbursts and how she'd huddled on the narrow twin bed, waiting for the screaming to stop. Brooke had sat beside her, holding her hand and telling her everything would be all right. They'd both known it was a lie.

“Me . . . too,” Brooke said.

Kelly wanted to comfort her sister, but no words came. They were stuck in this awful place, together.

In the distance Kelly heard a crash and a rumble, like falling trees. Or something worse. The ground shook. The cabin's floor heaved beneath her knees. Wood cracked and splintered as if the floor had given way. She heard breaking glass. Then it stopped.

“What the hell was that?” she said. No answer. “Brooke?”

A terrible silence filled the cabin. Kelly swung around, searching the dark for her sister.

“Brooke,” Kelly screamed.

In the headlights' narrow beam, the muddy road looked like a goat path, little more than a narrow gravel track leading into the woods. A thick black wall of evergreen trees rose up from the earth like an unbroken line of sentinels. Gravel growled and popped beneath her wheels. Tension pounded into the base of her brain with the force of a sledgehammer.

It was nearly impossible to see out here. Even with the wipers slashing at a blistering pace, sheets of rain swept across the windshield, obscuring her view.

The phone rang, splitting the silence like a shrieking child. She picked up the call, fully expecting to hear Andy's hateful voice.

"Marissa?"

"Oh, Seth. Thank God."

"Where are you?"

"On a forestry road, east of Carnation."

"Pull over and wait for me."

As much as she wanted Seth beside her, she couldn't stop. Thirty minutes had passed since the last time Andy had called. She couldn't afford to waste another second.

"I can't. My girls need me."

"Don't be so fucking stupid. You're doing exactly what he wants."

She heard the panic, the desperation in his voice. She hated herself for hurting him, but what choice did she have? She had to find her girls.

"I have to go, Seth. You know I do."

"He's going to kill you."

His words rocked her to the core. She knew he was right. But it didn't matter.

"I can't leave them."

"Goddammit, Marissa." The phone beeped. Seth's voice cut out. After a second of static, he was back. "I'm not going to lose you. I can't lose you."

His words tore Marissa's heart. Finally she had found a man worth loving—someone strong and kind and good—and she had no choice but leave him behind by doing the one thing sure to tear them apart. He had already lost so much. A wife. A baby. All he wanted was to save her, but Andy Bowman had left her no choice. Kelly and Brooke came first.

"Even if you're right and the worst happens, I have to be with my girls. Even if all we get is three more seconds together . . ." Her voice broke. Tears slid down her cheeks, and she kept her eyes trained on the narrow road ahead.

"Whatever happens . . ." Static on the phone line. "You have to know this isn't your fault. You couldn't have done more than you already have. Remember that."

The phone beeped.

"Seth?" No response. "Seth?"

The call dropped and she lost him. Dammit.

She wished she could see him one last time and tell him everything that was in her heart. Say goodbye. But it was too late for that. Hands trembling, she swiped the tears from her face and kept going.

The car rumbled along the single-lane road hugging the hillside. To her right she spied a pile of jagged boulders at the base of the rise. To her left the road fell away into darkness. Silently she recited the directions Andy had given her, replaying them like a tape over and over again inside her head. Somewhere far below lay the valley floor, the camp, and the swollen Tolt River.

Marissa heard a noise. Deafening. Like a rumbling freight train roaring down the hillside, a deluge of water rushed down the hill.

What the hell was happening?

Something hard and heavy crashed into the passenger's door, knocking the car sideways. Metal groaned. The car careened off the road and lurched down the hill.

Marissa screamed.

The car pitched and rolled. Then nothing. Her stomach plummeted in a sickening drop, like the violent plunge of a roller coaster. Only there was no track below to save her.

The car tumbled down the hillside before jerking to an abrupt halt. Marissa's head smashed into the side window.

Several minutes of nothingness passed. Marissa awoke to a roar, like white water racing through a jagged canyon. Her head throbbed. The sharp edge of the seat belt dug into her neck. She opened her eyes.

It was dark. The air smelled of mud and dirt and . . .

Water, freezing cold, poured into the car from the cracked windshield. With a start she realized where she was. A wave of panic crashed over her.

The river.

All around her the river raged. The current surged swift and strong around the edges of the car, shifting it like prey in its grasp, nudging it deeper, toward the center. Black waves struck the windshield halfway up and rising.

Ice-cold water sluiced through the cracked glass, washing over her knees, filling the car. Panic seized her.

Everything hurt. Sharp pain sizzled down her neck into her lower back. Her breath hissed through clenched teeth. She jammed her thumb against the seat belt button. Nothing happened.

It was hopeless. She was trapped.

The car shifted sideways, nose pointing downriver. The water climbed up the windshield, past the midway mark, a few inches from the top. Fear spiked through her. She tried not to think about the growing pressure and how the cracked windshield might give way altogether and flood the car's interior in one final rush, but she couldn't tear her eyes off the glass and the clawing water pouring in.

She had to get out. She was Brooke and Kelly's last hope.

Desperately she worked the button. She heard a crack. The windshield splintered out into a spider web before her eyes.

She jammed her thumb against the button. She heard a click, and the seatbelt released.

Marissa drove her shoulder into the door, pushing as hard as she could. Pain lit up the left side of her body. It was no use. The pressure of the water outside the car made opening the door impossible.

Think. She had to think. Water rose up past her chest. A fresh wave of panic shivered through her. Marissa forced it back and focused on a single thought.

The window.

Marissa swiveled in her seat. Pain shrieked through her head. She braced herself against the console. Clenching her teeth, she pulled her legs back and drove her heels into the glass. A muffled scream escaped her lips. She kicked two, three more times, and the window gave way.

Water gushed into the car. It ran over her shoulders and up her neck, shocking her skin like a thousand stinging bees. She gasped.

Dirty water filled her mouth. She coughed and spit it out. Drawing in a last desperate breath, she ducked beneath the water. The shoes slid from her feet as she launched herself through the broken window.

Marissa scrambled to the surface. The cold night air filled her burning lungs while all around her the river roared like an angry monster. Catching her up in the clawing current, it dragged her downriver. She kicked her feet, fighting to stay above the surface. The shore seemed impossibly far. Her limbs felt like lead weights.

Marissa flung her arms wide, searching, grasping for anything to hold on to. Up ahead she saw it. Thick. Dark. A fallen tree.

“Please . . . ,” she sputtered.

Marissa thrashed against the current, but it was no use. The river was too strong. It took everything she had just to keep from drowning.

The shoreline rocketed past. She was going to miss the tree. She was going to . . .

Pain lit up her leg. A black boulder jutted above the surface, tossing her sidelong toward the tree. Marissa reached for the nearest branch. Her hands were too stiff to grab on. Instead she hooked an arm around the branch, clinging to it like a lifeline.

Water raged all around her, flowed over her head. She coughed and sputtered, pulling herself along the branch, gasping for air. Branches tore at her sweater, gouging her hands and arms. Shivering violently, she inched herself along the tree until finally her feet touched the rocky bottom.

Marissa anchored her toes among the smooth stones and fought her way toward shore. She stumbled from the water and collapsed on the sodden earth.

The rain pounded relentlessly down. Safe from the river’s grasp, Marissa threw her arms across her face and let the tears come. All the pain, the fear, the exhaustion poured out of her in huge, racking sobs.

A bone-chilling blast of wind swept off the water, and Marissa shuddered. Wiping her face, she sat up. The girls were here at the bottom of the valley. But where?

Struggling to her feet, she wrung the water from her clothes as best she could and looked around. The camp couldn’t be far. Before the mudslide hit, she’d been close. She had to keep going. But which way?

A perilous mound of trees and debris from the mudslide hulked behind her, like half of the mountain had come down. There was no way she could climb it. It was too high and too dangerous. Marissa turned the other way and started walking.

Crossing her arms over her chest, she trudged toward a dense line of trees. Shivering, she stumbled across the rocks and branches strewn across the forest floor. Sharp edges bit into her bare feet. She ignored the pain and pushed on.

Lost among the trees, she felt doubt swirl around her like the howling wind. She didn’t know where she was going. She should have waited for Seth. What if she didn’t find the camp? What if she died out here, alone in the cold? Who would find her girls?

Teeth chattering, she hunched her shoulders and kept walking through the woods. Rain pattered against the rustling tree branches. The smell of the dank earth closed in like a freshly dug grave.

Too tired to go on, Marissa fell to her knees. Through the thinning line of trees, she saw it. A cabin.

Hope flared in her chest, bright and fleeting. Even if this wasn’t the camp, maybe she could find help. Marissa climbed to her feet and limped across the sodden earth.

The cabin was small, a single-story A-frame, the kind of place Brooke's Girl Scout troop might have stayed.

Marissa stumbled into the clearing. Bare feet sinking into the muddy valley floor, she loped into a run.

The cabin was completely dark. She scaled the stairs, pounding on the door with her closed fist.

"Hello. Is there anyone in there? Hello."

No answer. She twisted the knob. It was locked. If she could find a way in, maybe she could find a phone. The window was too high, beyond reach.

Marissa turned and trudged down the stairs. She rounded the other side of the cabin and stopped. A second cabin. Her heart quickened. A fallen tree had caved in half the roof.

She started toward it. Shuffling along in the wet grass, she stubbed her toes on something hard. She yelped. The long handle looked black in the wet grass. It lay a few feet from a haphazardly stacked pile of wood. An ax. An old, rusty ax, dull as shit.

Wrapping both hands around the handle, she heaved it off the ground, swaying under its weight. Steadying herself, she approached the second cabin.

The door flapped open. It cracked against the wall. Marissa gripped the ax handle tight. Senses fully tuned to her surroundings, she crept inside. The smell hit her hard. Bad. Urine. Mold. Death.

A small cry escaped her lips. She thought about Kim Covey and Brooke. This was the place. She could feel it.

"Hello. Hello," she called.

Nothing.

She took another step into the inky darkness. Listening. Praying.

"Hello?"

"Help."

The shrill, thin cry carried on the wind. Marissa's heart jolted. She turned and sprinted through the door.

"Kelly. Brooke," she screamed.

"Help."

Marissa spun toward the sound. On the edge of the clearing, she saw it. A third cabin loomed ahead, dipping into the water's edge.

She ran.

“Marissa,” Seth yelled. “Marissa.”
Static on the phone line. She was gone.

Fuck. Fuck.

Damned thing. Seth wanted to smash the phone against the ground, shatter it into a million pieces. He hit redial, but the call refused to connect. The camp. He had to find the camp before Marissa walked straight into Bowman’s trap.

Seth launched the map application on the phone. He stared at the tiny screen, waiting for it to load. Slow. The signal was weak. Useless piece of fucking shit. He shoved the phone back in his pocket.

A blast of wind tore off the river, driving the yellow-and-orange flames high into the night sky like an angry serpent. Seth headed toward the fire.

Twenty yards away he spied a fireman hunkered down, crouched over a map. Seth jogged toward him. The raw wind cut straight through his wet clothes and he shivered. Cahill had said the youth camp was only a few miles from here, downriver. Remote, it was just the kind of place where Bowman could do his dirty work.

“I need your map.”

The fireman glanced up. Surprise registered in his bright-blue eyes. Seth’s greedy gaze found the bridge, not far from where he was standing. He traced the blue line east, following the winding path of the Tolt River.

All around him emergency personnel were shouting orders. Acrid-smelling smoke carried on the wind.

“You’re wet,” the fireman said.

“Yeah, I had a little car trouble. The map?”

Standing, the fireman reached behind him. He grabbed a thin blanket out of the fire engine.

“Here,” he said, handing it to Seth. “Now get back behind the perimeter.”

He hooked a thumb to where a ragged line of onlookers gathered.

“I’m a cop. SPD.”

The fireman arched an eyebrow.

“I’m impressed,” he said, looking anything but. “You still need to get back. With this wind, I can’t predict which way the fire will turn.”

Seth wrapped the blanket around his shoulders. The fire roared. Bright columns of flames devoured the building. Seth heard a groan . . . deep, inhuman. The structure heaved.

He heard a shout. “Get back. Get back.”

The line of firemen broke. A crack, louder than a shotgun blast, rang out. Fear coiled inside Seth. Another groan. The roof collapsed. Cinders, ashes, and sparks billowed out into the night sky.

Freeze-frame images flashed through his mind. The green door. The flames. And Holly. How he couldn’t save her. How he would never save her.

“Did everyone get out of the building before it went up?” Seth asked.

“According to the cook, yes. We won’t know for sure until we investigate.” The fireman stared up at Seth. His eyes narrowed. “What did you say your name was?”

“Look, I just need to get across the river.”

The fireman snorted. “Tonight? Good luck.”

“You must have police boats.”

The man cocked an eyebrow and shrugged a burly shoulder. “That’s more your department than mine. You can try to track down the police chief, but on a night like this, with the storm, the flood, and the shooting, all available vessels will be used for search and rescue, not a pleasure cruise down the Tolt.”

“A shooting?”

Oh shit.

“If you’re a cop, you would have heard it on your scanner.”

“I’m off duty.” It was a clumsy lie, and from the look on the man’s face, Seth knew he wasn’t fooling anyone.

“Uh-huh.”

“Have you identified the victim?”

The fireman stood up and folded the map. “You’re asking a lot of questions . . .”

And he wasn’t going to get answers here. Seth snatched the map and took off at a run.

The roads were choked with traffic—people trying to leave town, cut off by the flood. He ran his finger along the blue line of the river and searched for a symbol, a triangle, a green patch, any indication of where the camp might be. Nothing.

If Cahill was right, he had to head east.

Seth raced across the street, heading toward the river. Neighborhoods flew past. Densely packed rows of houses thinned out as he neared the water.

Seth pulled out the phone and dialed a number he knew as well as his own.

“Alvarez,” the lieutenant growled into the phone.

“Brad, I know where they are. I need backup . . .”

Seth relayed the facts as quickly as he could. Alvarez had questions, but there was no time.

He slipped behind a beat-up old bungalow. The soupy grass squelched beneath his feet as he headed toward the water’s edge. A few feet away from an outbuilding, he spied a bulky shape.

A boat. Covered with a tarp.

Light spilled from the windows of the bungalow. He heard music. Laughter. A party in full swing. With his luck the fucking boat would be riddled with holes or rusted through. He crouched down beside the hull and removed the tarp. It flapped and rattled in the wind.

It wasn’t much, just a small aluminum boat. Light. With an outboard motor. He ran his hand along the bottom. No holes. It would do.

He started toward the water. The hull clanged hollowly against a boulder like a gong. Seth cringed. He glanced back at the house.

Over the roaring river, he heard it. A dog . . . barking. Not a high-pitched yip or whine, but the deep, throaty barks of a big dog.

The bungalow’s door sprang open. Seth caught a whiff of skunky smoke on the wind. Pot. As quick as a shot, a dark shape burst from the house and raced toward him, barking and snarling.

Christ.

He grabbed hold of the boat’s bow and broke for the river. The blanket billowed around his shoulders and sailed off, flailing up into the night sky like the wings of a crow. The hull of the boat clanged and thumped in his wake.

He was still fifteen yards from the water’s edge, and the dog—some kind of tank with legs—was closing fast.

“Kage,” a man shouted. The dog slowed. His ears pricked back at the sound of his master’s voice. “Shut the hell up. It’s just a squirrel. Stupid fucking dog.”

Ignoring his master now, Kage surged forward. Powerful shoulders rippled beneath a slick black coat. He sniffed the air. Snorted. Seth kept running.

“Hey, bro,” a voice in the distance called. “Dude’s jacking yer boat.”

“What the fuck?”

Three skinny men stepped out of the bungalow. The dog lunged at Seth. White fangs snapped the air, so close he could smell the dog’s fishy breath. He tripped. Fell back. His hands flailed wide and he landed in the river. The dog charged in, snarling and barking, drool dripping from his powerful jaws.

The fast-moving current grabbed hold of the boat, pulling it downriver.

Seth lunged deeper into the frigid water, grabbing hold of the aluminum side. The boat dipped. Kage barked. Chest-deep in the river, the dog gave up the chase.

Water surged around Seth, clawing at his legs, threatening to throw him off balance. Then a shotgun blast filled the air with a deafening crack. Seth crouched behind the hull. Another shotgun blast sounded, carrying across the river. Praying he didn’t overturn the boat, Seth climbed over the side and collapsed on the bottom, chest heaving.

The roaring water drowned out everything as the bungalow receded in the distance.

Seth started the motor.

“Kelly? Brooke?”

It was her mother’s voice. Kelly was sure of it. Hope surged through her. She jumped to her feet. Stumbling through the dark, she tripped twice before reaching the door.

“We’re in here. Hurry.”

The ropes bit into her wrists. Winding up, she drove her boot into the door as hard as she could. Pain flared in her toes, but she kept on kicking it, wishing it were Andy’s head, trying to make as much noise as she possibly could.

“Stand back,” her mother called.

Kelly did as she was told. Thwack. The wooden door split. Thwack. Thwack. The axhead hurtled through, snagging on the splintered wood. Kelly bounced on the balls of her feet, wanting to rush forward and help. But with her hands tied behind her back, she was useless.

Marissa wrenched the axhead free. She heaved it into the door with all the force she could muster. Kelly heard her mother panting from the effort. Each blow came slower. Harder. Finally she broke through.

“Oh God, Kelly,” she called, her voice quaking with fear. “Where are you?”

“Over here,” Kelly called, moving closer.

Marissa let out a cry—half sigh, half sob—and dropped the ax. Rushing forward, she threw her arms around Kelly’s shoulders.

Her mother smelled like sweat and mud and rain. Surrendering to the awkward hug, Kelly dropped her head to her mother’s shoulder, wishing she were small again. Wanting to crawl into the safe circle of her mother’s arms, like she had when she was little.

“Are you okay?”

“I’m all right. You?”

“A little banged up, but I’m fine. Brooke’s not.”

Marissa swung her gaze wildly around the cabin, but Kelly knew it was hard to see much in here. The darkness was like a heavy black veil, blanketing their surroundings. She could barely see her mother, and Marissa was less than two feet away.

“Where is she?”

“Over here.”

Kelly crossed the cabin floor. She stopped a foot away from her sister’s prone form. Marissa dropped to her knees. Kelly heard the uneven rhythm of her mother’s shuddering breaths, and she knew Marissa was either crying or trying not to.

“Oh God. Brooke.”

Her mother knelt over Brooke, her hands running over the narrow length of her sister’s body, as if trying to convince herself that Brooke was real. Kelly knew exactly how she felt. A choked sob escaped Marissa’s lips, and Kelly’s heart constricted.

“She’s so . . .” Marissa’s voice broke off. “What did he do to her?”

“She says she’s out of insulin,” Kelly blurted. “Mom, she can’t feel her feet.”

“How long?”

“I don’t know. Is she going to be all right?”

Marissa didn’t answer. Kelly heard a slow clicking like the second hand of a clock ticking and she knew what it was.

“You’ve got insulin. You think it will help?” Kelly asked, afraid to hope.

Marissa didn’t answer right away. When she did, sadness thickened her words.

“It will do some good. I don’t know how much though. We need to get her out of here.”

The wind caught the ragged remnants of the door. It slammed hard against the wall. Kelly spun, expecting to see him there. Watching them. All she saw was the charcoal sky.

“Where is he?” Marissa asked.

“When I woke up, he wasn’t here. I don’t know where he is.”

“He’ll be back.”

A chill raced through Kelly, and she knew her mother was right. He would be back, and by then they’d better be long gone.

“I had a knife. Brooke dropped it when she passed out. If we can find it . . .”

“Okay.”

Marissa crouched on the floor. Everything was slower, clumsier, scarier in the dark.

“Any luck?”

“Not yet.”

“Shit, Mom. Hurry.”

“I’m trying, Kelly.”

Kelly bounced her weight from one foot to another in a nervous dance, like a boxer waiting for the next round. She thought about the dojo and all the things Logan had taught her, hoping she’d remember them if Andy came back.

Kelly’s eyes flicked to the doorway. Nothing.

“Got it,” Marissa said, clutching the knife.

Kelly turned. The ropes dug painfully into Kelly’s raw wrists. She bit the inside of her cheek and forced herself to stand as still as a statue while her mother continued to saw.

“Come on, come on,” Kelly muttered under her breath.

“I’ve almost got it.”

The pressure on the ropes increased and Kelly hissed. She heard a noise out on the porch, like boots scraping against raw wood. A narrow beam of light pierced the dark, and Kelly shrank back.

“Mom.”

Panicked, Marissa lost her grip and dropped the knife.

Andy lumbered through the door. The flashlight caught Kelly full in the eyes, blinding her. Kelly squinted and looked away. He crossed the room with long, slow strides, like he had all the time in the world.

This was it.

Each slow step drove shock waves of fear rippling through her gut. She wanted to shrink away. She wanted to run, but she didn’t because she knew that was what he wanted. He wanted her scared. She refused to give the bastard the satisfaction.

Kelly stood strong, with her body angled sideways and her weight on her back foot, just the way Logan had taught her. Hands still tied behind her back, she stood like a shield between him and her family.

“Looks like the band’s back together,” Andy said with an unhinged grin.

He was bigger than she. Stronger. All she had was her quickness and the element of surprise.

Kelly lashed out with her foot, aiming for his groin. He jerked back, dropping the flashlight, easily deflecting the blow. He grabbed her heel and shoved, knocking her off balance. Kelly careened to the side and crashed to the floor. Andy’s laugh, low and chilling, rumbled through the cabin.

The flashlight rolled along the floor. Shadows danced across the walls. Brooke's crumpled form was caught in its beam.

"Oh, princess, you'll have to do better than that."

"Kelly," her mother shouted.

Marissa charged. She rammed her body squarely into his chest. Andy reeled back a few inches and nearly fell. Quick as lightning, his fist flashed out, connecting hard with Marissa's temple. Kelly heard the crack of the blow. Marissa tottered. Her knees buckled and she crumpled to the ground like a sack of flour.

"Looks like it's just you and me, princess."

He smiled, just a flash of teeth in the shadows, and for one brief second, it wasn't Andy looming over her mother, but Rick. He glared down with his drunken stare and his eyes full of hate. Then Andy drilled his fist into her mother's face. A fierce and terrible hatred welled up inside Kelly.

She wasn't a little kid anymore. And Rick wasn't here. It was his fucked-up son standing over her mother, and there was no way she was going to let him hit her again.

Chest heaving, Kelly lurched to her feet. She sank back into the shadows, circling around him. He spun and she heaved her boot into the side of his knee. She heard the crunch of bone beneath her heel. Andy grunted.

Before he could reach her, she skittered away.

Andy lunged. His hand snaked out. His fist grazed the side of her face; the bloodstone ring gashed her cheek. A bolt of pain as Kelly pivoted away.

"Get back here, bitch," he grunted.

Kelly kicked again, aiming for his groin for the second time, and missed. Her boot connected with his quad.

"Fuck," he cursed.

She stepped back. Too slow. His hand shot out, connecting with her side. Pain exploded in her ribs, robbing her of breath. She fell to one knee.

He was coming. She needed to move, but her strength had fled. She knew speed was her only ally, and she fought to catch her breath.

Andy reached out. Kelly ducked her head, and his fist rushed past. Missed. Kelly launched up, driving her shoulder into his solar plexus with all her might. More effective than a punch—Andy stumbled back. Off-balance, he fell.

Kelly regained her footing. Andy rolled onto his side as she stepped closer. Quick as lightning, his arm shot out and clamped around her waist. Jerked off her feet, Kelly slammed into the ground. Her head cracked against the floor. A black veil of unconsciousness enveloped her. For a fraction of an instant, everything stopped.

Kelly opened her eyes.

Andy straddled her chest. His hands snaked around her throat. Hot, coppery blood flooded her mouth. She spit into his face. Surprised, Andy reared back. Kelly shoved him off and scrambled away. Bolting to her feet, she took a half step back. Her legs were still wobbly, and the room dipped and swayed around her.

She shook her head, regaining her bearings.

"What's your damage anyway?" she said, trying to get a bead on where he was.

"You don't know what he was like."

"Who? Rick? You're blaming your father for what you've done? What did we ever do to you?"

A heartbeat of silence passed between them. He was close. Too close. He was right in front of her.

“Andy Bowman is dead.”

His fist cocked back. Kelly steeled herself for the blow.

Marissa opened one eye. The other was on fire, swollen to a slit. She could hear Kelly's voice, shouting, goading Andy. Pain crackled like sheet lightning through her. Her breath hissed like venting steam from between clenched teeth.

Her vision cleared and she saw Andy's shadow. His fist was cocked back, ready to smash into Kelly's face.

In the flashlight's glare, Marissa caught sight of the insulin pen. She grabbed it, spun the dial, and jabbed it deep into Andy's thigh. Her thumb pressed down on the plunger, and she counted the clicks—far more than a normal shot.

She prayed the needle hit its mark. It was so tiny it could have broken off on Andy's jeans. Distracted for an instant, Andy swatted the needle away.

Kelly seized the moment. She dove forward and drilled her shoulder into Andy's side. Knocked off-balance, he fell to the ground.

"Mom, the knife," Kelly said.

She drove her boot into Andy's ribs, his hip, anywhere he was exposed.

"The police are on their way," Marissa called. It was a stupid, desperate thing to say.

Andy grabbed hold of Kelly's boot and twisted. Kelly slammed to the ground.

"You're such a bad liar, Mom," he scoffed.

Marissa grabbed the flashlight and searched for the knife, desperate to protect her daughters from this wreck of a human being.

She heard his footsteps closing in behind her. The heavy tread of his boots vibrated on the floor. She turned and shone the light directly into his eyes. He raised his hand, shielding himself from the glare.

Kelly ducked into the shadows.

"Let us go, Andy. We're nothing to you," Marissa said.

He just kept coming.

"Let you go?" he mocked. "So one of you can show up out of the blue and fuck up my life again? My fiancée is dead. I lost everything because I ran into your goddamned daughter at a bar. No way I let that happen again."

His voice echoed through the cabin. A deep, visceral fear raced through Marissa. She kept the light aimed in his face and backed away.

"Is that why you killed your father? To bury your past?"

"I should have killed him years ago. He deserved to die. So do you. You left me there, you bitch. You packed up your shit and took the easy way out."

"We didn't . . ."

"Don't you fucking lie to me. I saved you and you left me there. You left me."

His enraged cry cut through the darkness, slicing through Marissa. She had left him. Back then he was seventeen years old. Bigger than Rick. Stronger than Rick. Almost a man. She never thought he needed her. She had left him in that house without a second thought. What kind of mother was she?

"Oh God, Andy. I'm so sorry," Marissa said.

"Fuck you."

Andy bolted forward and knocked the flashlight from her hands. Marissa cried out.

"Mom!" Kelly shouted.

A flash of metal glinted in the light, and the knife hissed across the floor. Marissa dove for it. Andy's fist lashed out. The blow swung overhead, and she scrabbled toward the knife. She grasped the handle.

Andy hauled Marissa off the floor by her hair. White-hot pain flashed through her head.

"Bitch," he bellowed. "You goddamned bitch."

Spit flew from his lips, spraying her cheeks. She gripped the knife and lashed out in a wild arc. The blade sliced through his neck. He screamed and released his grip, and Marissa dropped to the floor.

Andy's broad hand clapped over the wound. Blood welled between his fingers.

"Fuck," he screamed. "Fuck. What did you do?"

Marissa scrambled to her feet, poised for another attack. Instead of rushing toward her, Andy pitched wildly out the door and into the night.

"Kelly."

"Over here."

Marissa rushed toward the sound of Kelly's voice. Fear writhed like a living thing inside her. Her hands shook violently as she sawed through the last of the ropes.

"Brooke," Kelly called.

"Yeah." Her voice sounded like broken glass.

"He'll be back. Let's get out of here," Marissa said.

They crouched over Brooke's crumpled form. Hands cupped gently around her, Marissa and Kelly eased her off the floor. Brooke groaned like each movement caused her pain. Her bones jutted up through the thin layer of muscle and skin. She weighed no more than a twelve-year-old girl, and Marissa's heart broke.

They balanced Brooke's weight carefully between them and shuffled toward the door.

The door burst open. Andy swayed unsteadily in the frame. He dropped a gasoline can down on the floor. It clanged against the wood with a hollow thud, gasoline spurting out of the nozzle. Like a rabid pit bull's, his lips peeled away from his teeth in a hateful grin.

Blood blossomed in a dark-red stain soaking the collar of his jacket.

"Oh shit," Kelly said.

Andy's grin widened. He kicked the can over. Gas spewed onto the floor. The overpowering stench of the acrid fumes filled the cabin. Andy stood on the edge of the pool. The pure loathing in his eyes left her breathless.

A deranged grin stretched impossibly wide across his ashen face. Then his legs buckled, and Andy fell to his knees in the gasoline.

For a split second everything stopped. Hope fluttered in Marissa's chest.

"Is he drunk?" Kelly whispered.

"His blood sugar is dropping."

"Like with Brooke?"

"Faster because he's not diabetic."

Andy looked dazed. Disoriented.

"Now," Marissa said, tightening her arm around Brooke.

They shuffled toward the door. Fissures of pain shivered down Marissa's back. Brooke cried out, but Marissa ignored her and kept moving.

Andy reached into his pocket and clumsily pulled out a lighter. A Zippo. A flash of recognition jolted through Marissa. It was Rick's lighter, the same one she had given him as an anniversary gift years before.

His eyes met Marissa's.

In a low, slurred growl, he said, "I may die here, bitch. But so will you."

Andy's thumb grazed the dial. She heard a hiss and flick. Nothing happened. He tried again. This time the flame flickered to life.

Marissa stared horror-struck as he dropped the lighter into the pool of gasoline.

Whoosh.

Flames burst up from the cabin floor. A blast of heat drove them back. The doorway disappeared behind a column of smoke and fire, cutting off their only escape route.

Flames raced up Andy's arms.

His shrill, inhuman screams filled the air. Marissa turned her horrified gaze away from the specter of Andy writhing, thrashing, stumbling out into the rainy night, knowing that as long as she lived, she would never purge that memory from her mind.

Flames snaked up the walls and raced along the cedar beams like a living thing. The flickering light illuminated the cabin, and for the first time she could see around her. It was bigger than it looked. There was a wide rectangular window at the far end. Six, maybe seven feet off the floor. If they could get to it, maybe they could climb out.

"Over there. The window."

Marissa clamped an arm around Brooke's waist, and they ran toward the back of the cabin. Brooke screamed. She jerked to a halt. Kelly lost her grip and Brooke fell to the floor. Stretched taut, the chain glimmered in the firelight, binding Brooke's leg to the iron bed frame. Marissa heaved on the chain. It was looped around the leg of the bed, which was bolted to the floor. Her shoulders sagged. There was no time.

She spun, desperately searching for the ax. It lay on the floor, inches from the flames.

"Take Brooke," Marissa said.

The hiss and crackle of burning wood filled Marissa's ears. Fire lapped at the floorboards, and she leaped over the flames. Gasping for air, she lunged for the ax.

Marissa gripped the handle. Her back shrieking, she raised the ax overhead. Kelly used her body to shield Brooke while Marissa took aim. Ignoring the pain, she heaved the blade at the chain. The impact of the blow shook the cabin. The ax blade glanced off the thick chain and stuck in the floor.

Marissa wrestled the blade free. There was no way she was going to cut through the chain. Instead she heaved the ax into a floorboard beneath the bed. If she could free the bed frame from the floor, she could pull the chain loose.

Each blow of the ax drove sparks of pain through her body. Smoke, sweat, and tears stung Marissa's eyes. She didn't quit.

"Go," Brooke croaked.

"I won't leave you," Kelly yelled over the roaring flames.

With one last blow the floorboard splintered. Marissa fell to her knees and heaved on the chain. It slid out from beneath the bed frame. Brooke was free.

Marissa sprang to her feet and scooped an arm around Brooke's back. Burning chunks of wood rained down from the walls. All around them the fire hissed and popped and cracked. The furnace blast of heat was unbearable, and sweat ran down Marissa's back. They stumbled toward the window.

Kelly stood staring seven feet up, a desperate look on her face.

"Mom, we can't reach."

Marissa eased Brooke to the floor.

“I’m going to boost you up. You have to pull Brooke through.”

Kelly’s mouth went slack. Horror-struck, she stared at Marissa.

“What about you? How will you . . . ?”

“I’ll climb out after you.”

Kelly’s wild eyes brimmed with anger and fear.

“Bullshit, Mom. I can’t reach and I’m taller than you.”

Marissa coughed the smoke from her lungs. She was asking Kelly to do the unthinkable. But they were out of options.

She gripped Kelly’s shoulders in both hands.

“I love you, Kelly. I always have. I need you to be strong now, to do this for me.”

“Mom, no.”

Kelly’s shoulders shook. Sobs choked out her words and opened up a huge, yawning ache in Marissa’s chest. She pulled Kelly roughly into her arms.

“You’re the only one who can do it.”

“I can’t leave you.”

Marissa eased Kelly back and stared directly into her daughter’s eyes for the last time. So many memories filled Marissa’s head. Baby fingers, pigtails, dandelion bouquets, skinned knees, and good-night kisses. So many sweet memories.

“Please,” she said.

The cabin floor shuddered as a piece of the ceiling came crashing down. A billowing cloud of heat and smoke hurtled toward them.

Marissa hunkered down beside the wall, bracing her weight against it.

Sobbing, Kelly planted her foot on Marissa’s back. Marissa groaned under her daughter’s weight. Her legs shook, threatening to give way, but she closed her eyes and focused on a place deep inside her, drawing on her last store of strength. The pain didn’t matter. There was no tomorrow. All that mattered was getting Brooke and Kelly somewhere safe.

Up above she heard the breaking glass. Refreshed with oxygen, the fire reared up.

Finally Kelly’s weight lifted.

Wind and rain blasted in through the open window. Marissa heaved Brooke onto her shoulders. Shaking under the extra weight, Marissa stood. Pain howled through her back, but she clenched her teeth, fighting through it. She staggered to the window.

Kelly reached down. Behind Marissa the fire raged. The walls of the cabin popped and snapped. Smoke stung Marissa’s eyes and burned her lungs.

Kelly grabbed Brooke’s arms. Marissa planted her feet wide and pushed Brooke as high as she could manage. Her legs shook and sweat poured down her face.

With one leg inside the cabin and the other outside, Kelly straddled the window frame and hauled Brooke up. Cradling her sister’s weight against her own body, she shifted, leaning out the window into the driving rain.

Marissa watched on helplessly as Kelly swung Brooke out the window. Lowering Brooke as close to the ground as she could, Kelly released her grip.

A fierce stab of love and sadness pierced Marissa’s heart. She nodded at Kelly, urging her to go. Mute, her face streaked with tears, Kelly reached down, urging Marissa to grab on to her outstretched hand.

Marissa jumped as high as she could. Her fingertips grazed Kelly's. She fell to the floor, her ankle twisted beneath her. Kelly screamed.

It was no use.

“Go,” Marissa yelled.

Kelly sat frozen in the window frame, shoulders slumped. With one final look, Kelly swung her leg over the window ledge and dropped from view forever.

A shuddering wail burst from Marissa's lips. Exhausted, she pressed her back to the wall. The flames closed in. A fierce coughing spasm racked her body, sending sparks of pain searing through her. Bowing her head to her knees, she gripped Elizabeth's amulet tight in her sweaty hand, shielding her face from the blistering heat.

Elizabeth. She'd promised Elizabeth she would find Brooke. And she had. She had. They were out. They were safe.

She'd made so many mistakes, as a mother, as a woman. She'd lived with so much guilt, so many regrets about things that she had done or hadn't done or should have done. But none of it mattered now. In the end she had done the one thing that meant the most. She had saved her daughters.

It was enough.

Eyes squeezed tight, Marissa shut out the world around her. Now, in the few moments she had left, she searched for the happiest moment she could recall. A second later she had it—her two beautiful girls on the Oregon Coast.

She focused all her energy on remembering every detail of the day they'd spent at Cannon Beach, freezing it in time—cool waves racing up the beach, thick, the heat of the summer sun in her face, warm sand in between her toes, Kelly's smiles, and Brooke's laughter trailing in the wind.

She thought about Seth.

Seth was a gift.

A powerful wave of love washed over Marissa. Panic receded like the waves racing away from shore. And she forgot all about the cabin, the fire, the unbearable heat, the pain she felt. Marissa forgot everything except her family. Outside. Safe.

All around her the cabin groaned and spit and died. But in her mind, on the Oregon Coast, on that beautiful summer day, Marissa felt no fear.

The boat's motor whined like a sulky teenager in the powerful current. Seth's teeth chattered. Hunkered down in the back of the boat, he stared into the soupy night. He couldn't see shit out here. Between the rain, the wind, and the dark, he was driving blind down the river.

Bang. The boat shuddered and veered right. Seth pitched forward. He grasped the aluminum sides with both hands, regaining his balance.

The grinding of metal against rock scraped down the side of the hull, and Seth tightened his grip on the tiller.

Shit, that was close. Whatever it was could have easily punched through the hull and sent him sailing into the river again, sucked under by the current. This time there would be no monster truck to save him, no firemen or police to fish him out of the river. He was on his own.

Cahill had said the camp was a few miles downriver, but he had no idea how far he'd already gone. He could have easily shot past it. Without any lights or any markers, finding it would be nearly impossible. Seth searched the shoreline for a clearing in the trees, rooftops, anything that indicated the edge of the camp, but there was nothing. Just the river and the miles of darkness stretching out ahead.

Terrified he'd missed it, Seth looked back, but it was useless. Even if he wanted to, there was no way he could turn the boat around. With the boat firmly in the river's grasp, the outboard motor was no match for the swift current. Seth rounded the bend and he saw it.

A thick column of flames and smoke twisted and writhed above the trees, stretching up into the inky sky. It was like a beacon in the night, and he saw it and knew.

Seth dropped his scarred face into his hands. The boat swerved.

Oh God. Oh God.

Closing his eyes, he saw the green door. The flames. He heard the sirens, too far away. His scars itched and he knew. He knew what came next.

Marissa.

Dead.

Seth raised his head from his trembling hands and watched the bright flames arc into the stormy sky, a terrible grief clawing inside him. Fire raced across the roof of the small cabin, and he knew with an awful, painful certainty what lay at the end of this journey.

Pain. And loss.

Seth stared into the flames and saw his life combust around him, the fire devouring everything he'd ever loved until there was nothing left.

The boat hurtled downriver, unheeded, pushed along on the powerful current. There on the shore he saw a slender figure jumping, arms scissoring wide overhead.

Kelly.

He recognized her narrow face, the wet blonde hair plastered to her scalp.

Only Kelly.

She was pointing at the cabin. Screaming. He couldn't hear her over the roaring river, the whining motor, his pulse throbbing in his ears.

He saw the single word on her lips and knew.

Mom.

She was in there. Alive? Dead? He didn't know. But one thing was for sure. He couldn't leave her there. Not alone. Not this time.

"Ah, fuck it," Seth growled.

Waving Kelly out of the way, he grabbed the tiller and jacked the throttle wide.

The fear of what lay beneath the water's surface was dissolved by the desperate need to get there. He stopped fighting the current and used it to propel him faster. The motor whined. The boat surged forward.

Cranking on the tiller, he angled toward shore, picking up speed, slicing through the black river. Up ahead he saw something metal reflect in the firelight.

What was it? Jutting up above the surface, it was the jagged edge of a windshield. A car? Marissa's car? Seth sped toward it, adjusting his angle, lining up like it was a ramp. Dead center.

He prayed it would work.

Metal groaned underneath the boat's weight. The bow pitched up. The boat launched out of the water and sailed through the cold night air.

Crouching low, Seth held on for dear life as the boat speared through the wall of flame. Wood crashed and splintered. Debris flew, and the hull shuddered. Seth was thrown clear.

He crashed on the floor near the back of the cabin. Flames danced and writhed all around him. The cabin groaned as if angered by his presence.

Fear drove Seth to his feet. He leaped back; a huge chunk of ceiling narrowly missed him.

"Marissa," he screamed, desperate, searching everywhere for her.

The blistering heat from the fire scalded his skin, igniting his scars like they were burning. Again.

Smoke rushed along the ceiling toward the broken window at the back wall, and he knew it was his only hope. Stumbling toward it, he saw her sprawled facedown on the floor near the back wall.

A loud crack, a hundred times louder than thunder, shook the cabin. Seth surged toward her. The cabin's floor heaved and groaned.

Marissa lay sprawled sideways on the floor like a broken doll.

Oh God. Oh God, no.

She was dead. Just like in his nightmares. She was dead. He couldn't save her. He couldn't . . .

A scream wrenched free from deep in his chest.

He pitched forward, landing beside her.

The floor shook. Wood tore. Another crack and the front half of the cabin was torn away by the raging black river. Heat seared across Seth's back. He gathered Marissa's limp form in his arms. He buried his face in her smoky hair.

"I'm sorry," he whispered. "I'm so sorry."

Clutching her tight, he broke for the hole in the wall made by the boat. Flames shot up from the burning floor, singeing his hair, his hands, every inch of his exposed skin. Ignoring the pain, he ran for the opening, shielding Marissa from the flames as best he could.

The cabin heaved and the roof gave way. Seth launched out into the rainy night. He landed hard on his knees. Marissa tumbled from his arms onto the wet grass. Behind him flames shot high into the inky sky.

Seth buried his face in his hands—black and burned and shaking. He should have found a way to stop her, called the cops, had her pulled over. Something. Anything. He knew this was what Bowman wanted. He'd known in his gut as soon as he saw the fire in Carnation that this was how things would end.

He'd failed her. Just like he'd failed Holly. Just like he'd failed everyone.

Fingertips grazed his arm. Seth raised his head. Marissa's face was caked in soot and blood. One eye was swollen shut. The other opened. Her gaze locked with his.

Her lips moved.

Seth.

He pulled in a deep, ragged breath, barely daring to hope. He grasped her small hand in both of his, shaking.

“Oh God, Marissa. I thought I'd lost you.”

Kelly rushed toward them, screaming, “Mom! Mom!”

Marissa rolled onto her side, coughing. Kelly fell to her knees and threw her arms around her mother. Great wrenching sobs racked her body. Seth placed a soothing hand on Kelly's back.

Glancing up, he spied a form five feet away, closer to the river.

Legs still shaky, he rose, limping toward Brooke. Another body lay facedown in the grass, burned. Bowman? It had to be. Seth rolled the body over. Dead. Bowman was dead. He kept moving toward Brooke.

Brushing the matted mane of hair aside, he crouched down and pressed his fingers into the side of her neck and searched for a pulse.

Nothing.

“Brooke,” Marissa croaked.

Just speaking triggered another coughing spasm. Kelly's arm circled her mother's shoulders and she stared at Seth—looking every bit the scared teenager she was.

Seth rolled Brooke onto her back and crossed his palms. He drove them into her chest. Pain from his burns seared through him, but he kept going—knowing he was too late . . . knowing he had to try.

The church was filled to capacity. Bagpipes wailed out a slow, mournful rendition of “Amazing Grace.” The notes hung heavy, like the sweet scent of incense in the air. Each phrase brimmed with sorrow and loss.

Marissa pulled a fresh tissue from her purse. Hands shaking, she swabbed the tears from her cheeks. Seth’s arm tightened around her shoulders.

“You okay?” he whispered, gray eyes filled with concern.

Not trusting herself to speak, she nodded.

She looked beyond the mahogany coffin to the stained glass window behind the altar. Pale November sunlight illuminated the image of a blue-robed Mary nuzzling her swaddled baby boy.

Marissa didn’t understand the heart of God, but she did understand the fierce power of a mother’s love.

Evan Holt stood tall and straight behind the podium. A poster-size photograph rested on an easel beside the coffin. It was a rare shot of Elizabeth Holt laughing. Her cobalt eyes sparkled with mischief and light.

Evan’s chin dipped. His lips flattened into a thin line as he struggled against tears. Marissa’s heart swelled with empathy, feeling his loss as keenly as her own. She thought about what Evan had said in the hospital, about how Elizabeth had stood by him when everyone else had given up, and she knew Elizabeth had been more of a mother to him than an aunt.

After a few seconds of silence, Evan cleared his throat. His voice, shaky at first, grew stronger and clearer as the words poured out of him.

“As many of you know, my aunt Lizzie . . . Elizabeth Holt,” he amended, “was an extraordinary woman . . .”

Marissa’s gaze strayed away from Evan and back to the photograph of Elizabeth. She reached for the amulet hanging from the chain around her neck and thought about the last time she’d seen Elizabeth. She’d made a promise that night, and she’d kept it. She’d found Brooke and brought her home.

Without Elizabeth no one would have argued with the cops and gotten Brooke’s case moved to the front burner. Without Elizabeth there would have been no foundation, no Henry Cahill. And no Seth.

Beautiful words flowed from Evan’s lips, filling the church like the sad, resonant strains of a violin sonata. By the time he finished his eulogy, there wasn’t a dry eye in the house. Marissa wished she’d had a chance to say thank you—to say goodbye. She bowed her head, tears falling like sweet rain down her cheeks.

Seth’s hand squeezed her shoulder. She dabbed her eyes and looked at him, no longer seeing the scars on his face. Instead she saw courage and sacrifice and love.

Seth’s lips parted in a rare smile, and Marissa pulled in a deep, steadying breath.

The memorial service drew to a close. The aisles flooded with mourners and well-wishers filtering out of the church. Marissa shifted uncomfortably on the hard wooden pew. The Percocet was wearing off. Her back ached from sitting too long and her burns hurt. She needed to move.

Marissa coughed. She stood grasping Kelly’s thin hand, reluctant to let go.

Kelly wore a simple black dress and low-heeled pumps. She looked disturbingly grown-up.

“Are you okay, Mom?” Kelly asked, releasing her mother’s hand.

“I’m fine, honey. Just a little sore.”

Marissa brushed her fingers across the red gash in Kelly's cheek left by Andy's ring. The bruises were fading to yellow. Although the cut was healing, Marissa knew it would probably scar.

Kelly hugged Marissa gently, careful not to squeeze too hard. A lump formed in Marissa's throat, and she felt a wave of gratitude wash over her—thankful to have Kelly at her side and Brooke safe.

Over Kelly's shoulder, Marissa caught Logan's gaze. He smiled at the two of them. Kelly pulled back, and Marissa stretched her hand out toward Logan, who clasped it in his warm grip.

"Thanks for coming," she said. "You're planning to stop by the house, aren't you?"

"Of course. We'll meet you over there."

"We?"

Marissa arched her eyebrows and glanced at Kelly, who was grinning like a kid.

"If it's okay with you, I'm going to ride with Logan in his new Tesla."

"Tesla?"

"It's a car, Mom." Kelly rolled her eyes. "Jeez."

"I know it's a car," Marissa said, winking at Logan. "Have fun."

Kelly followed Logan out of the pew. The two exited the church hand in hand. Marissa watched until they disappeared from view. Seth slipped his arm around her waist and spoke into her ear.

"Are you ready to go?"

"Soon. I want to say goodbye to Evan first."

He nodded and planted a soft kiss on her hair.

"I'll get the car and meet you outside."

Marissa wiped the last smudges of mascara from her face and craned her head around, searching the crowd for Evan. But he'd already found her. Their eyes met and he broke away from the crowd. They met halfway down the aisle.

Marissa held out her hand, but Evan engulfed her in a hug. She stood still in his arms, momentarily surprised by the unexpected display of emotion. Then she pressed her cheek to his chest and hugged him back.

"I can't tell you how sorry I am," she said as he released her. "Elizabeth was an amazing woman. I'll miss her."

"Me too," Evan said.

Grief hid in the hollows of his cheeks and the dark smudges beneath his eyes, leaving little doubt of the toll Elizabeth's passing had taken on him.

"She was lucky to have you."

Evan's eyes moistened. He nodded and averted his gaze.

"How is Brooke?"

"They moved her out of intensive care today. We're meeting with her doctor in the morning."

Evan's large hand squeezed her shoulder. "I hope everything goes well."

Marissa nodded. The gravity of Brooke's condition weighed heavily on her.

"Brooke had her first session with Dr. Frank today."

"The psychologist? That's good."

A beat of silence passed between them. They both knew Brooke's road to recovery would be a long one, and in the end, this experience would change her in ways Marissa couldn't begin to understand. It had changed them all.

"I'll be busy settling Elizabeth's estate for the next while—fighting off the vultures, as they say. Call me when you're ready to come back to work."

“You’re sure you still want me? Now that we’ve found Brooke . . .” Marissa’s voice trailed off. She’d never thought about what would happen after Brooke came home. She and Elizabeth had never discussed long-term plans. With Elizabeth gone and Brooke found, she didn’t know what came next. “The foundation’s yours now. You may want to move it in your own direction. Hire your own staff.”

Evan nodded. His smile deepened.

“You’re right. I am hiring my own staff.” He reached into his pocket and handed her a black business card. “Starting with you. Lizzie chose you because you’re smart and tough and caring, and I think she was right. After all you’ve been through, Marissa, I can’t think of anyone better equipped to help families in crisis. This is for you, when you’re ready.”

Marissa took the card from his hand, humbled by his confidence in her. Dropping her gaze, she turned the card over and read the silver ink.

The Holt Foundation. Marissa Rooney. Assistant Director.

Marissa’s mouth dropped open. She stared up at Evan, dumbfounded.

“Really, Evan, I . . .”

He silenced her with a raised hand.

“Lizzie’s orders. And as you may recall, no one argued with my aunt. At least not successfully.”

He winked, and Marissa’s hand closed around the card. A knot formed in her throat. Unable to speak, she nodded her thanks. Evan squeezed her arm and smiled. It was a sad smile, but Marissa was gratified to see it all the same. He turned and Marissa watched him go.

With a heart much lighter than the one she’d entered the church with, Marissa stepped out into the pale November sunlight. No clouds marred the cornflower-blue sky. She scanned the crowded street and saw Seth waiting just where he’d said he would be. He leaned against the door of his new car, patiently waiting.

Their eyes met, and for the first time in what felt like forever, Marissa smiled.

The sweet smell of flowers filled the hospital room. The windowsill and side table were covered with colorful bouquets and get-well cards from people all across the country, strangers whose lives had been touched by Brooke's story. Marissa perched on the bed beside Brooke, while Dr. Joseph studied the chart. His narrow face sober, he flipped the pages, his quick brown eyes taking in the latest test results.

Finally he closed the chart and met Marissa's anxious gaze. She wrapped her hand around Brooke's cold fingers, holding on tight like she had when Brooke was a little girl with a face full of wonder and fairies in her hair.

"Well," Dr. Joseph said, "I'm afraid Brooke has suffered a cardiac event. Ventricular fibrillation."

"A racing heartbeat?"

"Yes, that's one of the symptoms, no doubt brought on by prolonged hyperglycemia. There is evidence of mild damage to the heart muscle. If she had not received CPR right away, she quite likely wouldn't be with us."

A chill shivered up Marissa's spine at the thought of how close they had come to losing her precious girl. Thank God for Seth. Somehow he had saved them both.

Swallowing the lump in her throat, she asked, "What about the memory loss?"

Dr. Joseph hesitated. He smoothed his hand down the front of his white pinstripe shirt and blue silk tie before he spoke. Marissa knew from the look on his face the news wasn't good.

"It's too soon to say for certain, but there is a possibility that the memory loss Brooke suffered could be permanent."

Brooke pulled her hand from Marissa's grasp. Anguish rippled across Brooke's face, and she looked away from both of them, staring sullenly out the window.

Dr. Joseph's compassionate gaze met Marissa's. She placed her palm on Brooke's back.

"First things first. We're going to stabilize Brooke's blood sugars and get her potassium levels back to normal. We'll continue to monitor her heart activity, and we'll run more tests to gauge the extent of the memory loss."

Dr. Joseph continued to speak, but Marissa felt far away, devastated by the knowledge that Brooke would carry the scars of this horrific event for the rest of her life. Her own scars from the fire were small by comparison.

It was so unfair. Brooke was such a good kid. She wrapped her arm around Brooke's shoulders. Drawing her daughter close, Marissa rested her cheek on Brooke's sweet-smelling hair.

The doctor asked if she had any questions, and Marissa shook her head. There were tons of questions she wanted to ask, but first she needed time to process everything.

It felt like too much.

Minutes passed in companionable silence as tears flowed down Brooke's face. Finally, she wiped her eyes and offered her mother a tremulous smile.

"I'm a mess," she said.

Marissa ran a hand down the mane of blonde curls and smiled through her own tears.

"I've never seen anything more beautiful. I'm so grateful to have you home. Safe. Whatever else comes, we'll face it together. Okay?"

Brooke nodded. Marissa settled Brooke into the curve of her shoulder and stroked the blonde curls, like she had when Brooke was just a little girl.

“What happens if I can’t go back to school?” Brooke said, breaking the silence.

“My mother used to say there’s no point in borrowing trouble. When I was a kid, I didn’t know what she meant and figured it was her way of brushing me off. Now I know different. Worrying won’t stop bad things from happening. All you can do is stand strong in the face of fear and meet each challenge head on. You can do this, Brooke. You’re stronger than you know.”

Brooke nodded.

Marissa’s cell phone rang. Reaching into her purse, she thumbed the mute button and the ringer fell silent.

“Who was that?” Brooke asked.

“Work.”

“Shouldn’t you answer it?”

“It can wait. I thought I’d stay here with you.”

Brooke squeezed Marissa’s hand. “I’m okay, Mom. Go to work.”

Marissa dropped her gaze to where their fingers lay intertwined.

“I don’t want to leave you alone,” she said.

“I could stay,” a voice called from the doorway.

They both turned. A bouquet of daisies clasped in one hand, Jesse Morgan stood in the door, looking uncertain.

Few traces of the boy were left in the man’s face, but Marissa would have recognized him anywhere. Brooke pulled away from her mother’s side and ran her hands self-consciously through her hair, tucking the errant strands behind her ears. Marissa caught the look in her daughter’s eyes and knew in an instant that Brooke’s feelings for Jesse had never fully faded. Love was like that sometimes.

Slinging her purse across her shoulder, Marissa crossed the room. Jesse barely looked at her.

“I’m so sorry,” he said. “If I hadn’t . . .”

Marissa shook her head, and he fell silent. He stood rigid, braced for an attack, like she might curse him or blame him for ruining her daughter’s life or slap him across the face.

It was too late for regrets. Brooke needed to heal, and she needed to forgive. Marissa wrapped her arms around Jesse’s strong shoulders. He hesitated a brief second before returning her hug.

“Thank you for coming.”

Looking up into his startled blue eyes, she figured he might just be the best medicine of all. Marissa released him and made for the door.

“I’ll be back later,” she said.

Brooke didn’t answer. She had eyes only for Jesse. Marissa stopped in the doorway and glanced back.

Jesse set the flowers down and pulled a chair up next to the bed. He drew a book from his coat pocket and held it up for Brooke’s inspection.

“I brought you something to read.”

“What is it? It looks too thick to be a graphic novel. I didn’t know you read actual books.”

Jesse snorted, an amused grin on his face.

“It’s Fifty Shades of Grey.”

“What?” Brooke cried. Even from the doorway, Marissa saw her blush to the roots of her hair.

“Just kidding. It’s Pride and Prejudice. I remembered you liked it back in high school.”

Brooke paused. A flurry of emotions crossed her face—happiness and sorrow and everything in between.

“That’s very sweet. You can leave it over there. My eyesight isn’t back to normal yet, and I’m having a little trouble focusing.”

The crooked smile faded from Jesse’s face. He cleared his throat.

“I thought I’d read to you. If that’s all right.”

Two heartbeats of silence passed.

“You read?” Brooke asked, her voice thick with tears and laughter. “When did that happen?”

“Shut up,” Jesse said.

Grinning, he opened the book.

Marissa Rooney crossed the Smith Tower's lobby and stepped into the crowded elevator. Shuffling over to make more room for the other loading passengers, she jostled an older man standing near the back of the car.

"Sorry," she said, nudging over a step.

"Quite all right, Marissa. It's good to see you back."

Marissa turned and looked up into the smiling face of Mr. Regis, managing partner of the law firm. Happy to see a friendly face, she returned his smile.

"It's good to be back."

"Heading up to the foundation this morning?"

"Yes."

Regis nodded. "Very good. Elizabeth was right about you, you know. You're going to do great things. If I can be of assistance in any way, please don't hesitate to call."

"Thank you, Mr. Regis, for everything. Really."

"Maybe you can start by calling me John."

"Of course, John."

The elevator stopped at the sixth floor, and Mr. Regis stepped through the crowd to the front. He stopped just outside the doors.

"Oh, Marissa, one more thing. I thought you might like to know, it's Ms. Benoit's last day with the firm."

"Where is she going?"

Regis angled his head to the side. A slow smile spread across his face. "She's off to pursue other endeavors."

Marissa knew what that meant. She grinned.

"We're having cake at three. She'll be gone by two if you'd like to stop down."

Benoit's leaving the firm certainly was cause for celebration.

"I'll see what I can do."

The elevator doors closed behind John. The car lurched and continued up.

Evan had been busy, Marissa mused as she stopped to admire the newly installed doors. "The Holt Foundation" was etched into the frosted glass. Gripping the handle, she pushed through. On her way down the hall, she exchanged greetings with the familiar faces she passed.

"Ms. Rooney," a young woman called. Dressed in high heels and a slim navy suit, she looked every inch a professional.

"Yes?"

"I'm your new assistant, Jessica Perkins."

Surprise stalled Marissa in midstride. Jessica offered her hand, and after a second's hesitation, she shook it. Evan hadn't mentioned an assistant. What other surprises did he have up his sleeve?

"Welcome aboard, Ms. Perkins."

"Jessica, please. Mr. Holt has arranged a few meetings for you today. You'll find a copy of your itinerary on your desk."

"Thank you."

Marissa followed Jessica down the hallway to Elizabeth Holt's office. Affixed to the mahogany door was a silver nameplate. "Marissa Rooney. Assistant Director." She shook her head in wonder. A few months ago she'd been little more than a legal secretary. Now, alongside Evan, she was managing Elizabeth's foundation. It was a lot to take in.

Jessica's voice interrupted her thoughts, pulling her back into the moment.

"A Mr. Wright is waiting for you."

"Oh?"

Jessica swung the wide mahogany door open. Looking tall and pale in his gray suit, Alistair Wright rose from the guest chair and extended his hand toward Marissa. She shook his hand warmly. Wright looked like he had aged ten years over the past few weeks. With all he'd been through, it was no wonder.

Alicia's memorial service had been a heart-wrenching affair. Marissa hadn't been able to stop thinking about how close she had come to losing her own daughters.

"Alistair," she said, greeting him with a soft voice filled with compassion. "I'm so sorry for your loss. How can I help?"

Marissa gestured to the guest chair, and Wright resumed his seat. Marissa gripped Elizabeth's amulet.

"I wanted to make a donation to the foundation in Alicia's memory."

Sorrow swelled in Marissa's heart. After so much tragedy, his generosity was extraordinary. Alistair reached into his suit pocket and handed Marissa a check. It was the largest single donation the foundation had received so far, and Marissa smiled, thinking of all the good this money would do for the people who needed it most.

"Thank you."

Alistair's eyes fixed on the amulet for a second. His gaze grew distant.

"Alicia meant the world to me, and now I'm left wondering what more I should have done to keep her safe." He ran a hand across his moist eyes. Marissa saw the lines of pain carved deep into his face. "If there is some small way I can help prevent a tragedy like this from happening to some other family, it's my responsibility to do so. I imagine that you feel similarly, Marissa."

"I do. I know your support would mean the world to Elizabeth."

He cleared his throat. "My law firm is at your disposal, should you have need of it."

He rose from his chair and picked up a silver-framed picture of Elizabeth—a young Elizabeth Holt standing outside the King County courthouse. Wright stared at it for a long time. His brows furrowed deep, he sighed and set it back down. "Well, I've taken enough of your time today."

"Not at all."

Marissa shook his hand and thanked him again for his generous donation. She stood behind the desk and watched his retreating frame and thought again how unfair life was. He was a good man who'd lost his beautiful daughter to a madman. She shuddered and thought again about how close she'd come to losing Brooke and Kelly.

Lost in thought, Marissa didn't hear Evan enter the office until he spoke.

"Was that Alistair Wright?"

Marissa nodded. She plucked the check off the desk and handed it to Evan.

"He made a donation in his daughter's memory."

Evan studied the check and Marissa went on.

"He also said his law firm would be willing to donate their services."

"Did you know Alistair was engaged to Lizzie?"

"Really?"

Marissa remembered the way Elizabeth had looked at Alistair the night of the benefit and his obvious reluctance to release her hand. She'd sensed then that there was something more between them than friendship. Turned out she was right.

"Back when they were in college. Lizzie broke off their engagement after the attack. She never really got over it. Afterward, she was obsessed with going to law school. Seeking justice," Evan said, angling his head to the side, a bemused expression on his face. "Or, knowing Lizzie, vengeance. Eventually Alistair got on with his life, got married, had children, but I'm not sure he ever really stopped loving her."

"Or her him," Marissa finished, fingering the gold amulet around her throat.

"Alistair gave that necklace to Lizzie. I never saw her without it."

Marissa's heart ached for them both. Love was such a precious, tenuous thing. She thought about her girls. And Seth. And the way their lives had changed, all because of Andrew Bowman. She was grateful they still had each other.

"Take a look at this."

Evan handed Marissa a thick manila file folder. She cocked an eyebrow and opened it. The first page was an eight-by-ten photograph of a young woman. She didn't look much older than Brooke. Her small hand rested on the swell of the baby growing inside her. Hope sparkled in her large brown eyes.

A chill raced down Marissa's back. She looked up, meeting Evan's gaze.

"Who is this?"

"Rebecca Kincaid disappeared from a mall parking lot two nights ago."

Marissa cringed, her eyes drawn to the life growing beneath Rebecca's hand.

"When's she due?"

"In two weeks. We need to find Rebecca and her baby."

Marissa's mouth set in a resolute line.

"Absolutely," she said. "Let's get to work."

THE END

• • • •

Ready for more?

Dark Harvest is another pulse-pounding thrill ride.

Click Here To Get Dark Harvest!

• • • •

KEEP READING FOR THE next book in Fractured

• • • •

JUMP TO THE TABLE OF Contents

• • • •

CHRIS PATCHELL IS THE award-winning, USA Today Bestselling author of six novels. A former tech worker turned author Chris Patchell pens suspense novels set in the Pacific Northwest. Her novels have been praised by New York Times Bestselling author, Kevin O'Brien and #1 Amazon Bestselling author, Robert Dugoni. Her rich complex plot lines and well-drawn characters will keep you turning pages well into the night.

Visit www.ChrisPatchell.com to learn more about Chris and her writing. Don't forget to sign up for her newsletter.

RESONANCE
BY AJ SCUDIÈRE
Author's Rating:

• • • •

Language: *** Sexuality: * Violence: ***

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE, each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

Resonance Copyright © 2007 by Griffyn Ink. All rights reserved. No part of this document may be used or reproduced in an manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews.

FIRST EDITION

When new CDC investigators Jordan and Jillian discover a new disease, they wind up forging a few signatures to track it down. But as they pull on the thread, they unravel a case that bumps into geologist David Carter and bioscientist Becky Sorenson. It turns out they are all looking at the same thing: the leading edge of a full magnetic polar reversal. When all of humanity is at risk, who will they save?

Twelve years ago, airline pilots had to recalibrate their compasses. This was because the exact location of the magnetic poles had drifted, and it was a first in aviation history. Six years ago the poles had drifted even further, causing the need to again reset the compasses. They recalibrated again three years ago, then two, then one, and are currently realigning every three months.

Approximately 200 million years ago map north was magnetic south. But ten million years later, the poles switched places. They've traded again approximately every sixty million years, the last of which was sixty-five million years ago.

It is theorized that the dinosaurs achieved such great size due to the slightly larger magnetic field of their time. Today some living things - like homing pigeons and honeybees - are highly dependent on the earth's field. Even those creatures that don't seem to notice it are in jeopardy if it changes, since we don't know how they use their internal magnetics, only that they have them.

Like us.

And the earth we are sitting on is five million years overdue . . .

S stupid paleontologists, he thought to himself. Didn't know how to grid a dig properly. Morons. What had he been thinking? Sharing a site with the dino boys? And now he had chunks of strata strapped to his waist, each meticulously labeled in the dino boys' lazy scrawl. Each clearly mislabeled for direction or depth of find. They had acted like they understood the dip and the horizontal. But the markings were clearly honked up. Yet, some of the rocks looked right. Which was the ultimate insult. David couldn't even count on them to be wrong.

Maybe they were fucking with him, he sighed into the deep night, that was a sincere possibility. There was nothing like envy laced with continual disagreement to drive a wedge of dislike between two people. Those two people being him and anyone else on the dig. Your choice, as it was pretty much unanimous.

The paleo guys were all out for drinks and a discussion of the day's successes. There was that one big heap of bones, and oh yeah, that other big heap of bones, then there were the bone chips.

Using the winch and harness system they had set up, David lowered himself down the incline, tiptoeing and letting out line as he went. Not because he couldn't have scrambled his way down - he could have, the slope was a just walkable 45 degrees - but, in order to go on foot, he would have to dig in with his toes to get purchase and the dig would have been forfeit. Couldn't have that. At least he and the dino boys agreed on this one thing.

The other thing they had agreed to was not to hang out in the dig alone. That, of course, made sense. No one wanted to be the one left at the base of the site with a broken leg while everyone else ate lunch, or worse yet stayed out all night drinking. And no one wanted to be the one who mucked up the site, with no one around to say what went where.

But just because he had agreed to it didn't mean that he agreed with it. And, well, if David was being honest, they had already ruined the site, what with all the mislabeling and everything. Therefore the only thing he was risking was his own night out under the big black sky with a few broken bones. So he slowly kept letting out the line, getting a little further down the slope each minute. He didn't go too fast, for God's sake he wasn't stupid, and the pitch here was a bit on the sharp side.

His foot hit the first grid line. A thin white string wound round a short post hammered into the ground denoting the edge of the official dig area. David swore a few times under his breath, sure that he had scuffed a few loose pieces of rock into the dig. And that would earn him nothing but verbal and social hell come tomorrow morning. He decided to take it all a little more carefully. Besides now he was far enough down the backside of the slope that he wouldn't be spotted. The camp was on the other side of the crest where it wouldn't interfere with the dig, and no party-poopers making their way back early would see his beam as long as it was a small one. And that meant no bright headlamps. So he pulled the flashlight free, slipping it from the carabineer on his belt with a flick of his wrist.

Crap, he had shoved some pieces under the grid edge. Softly he stepped down and began flinging the loose gravel away. After five minutes at it he figured that he had covered his tracks well enough for a man who was probably going to get caught anyway and he decided to get down to brass tacks.

Pulling one zipper bag from its carabineer at his waist he tacked his line and used both hands to pull the rock from its baggie. Tilting his head, with the small Maglight firmly between his teeth, he read off the coordinates, then picked up the line. David let himself down a few more feet and high-stepped to the right about fifteen yards, watching carefully for the meter lines that ran the grid. They had originally been only a few inches off the surface, but as this dig had progressed they had altered the smooth plane to extremely uneven, leaving the ground anywhere from just a few inches to just over a foot below the grid lines. The perfect heights for getting an ankle tangled and then bashing into the slope of the dig. And, oh yeah, breaking said ankle and mucking up said dig while you did it.

He moved slowly and carefully, each footstep set methodically into the loose ground, so as not to grind or scour any of the precious soil or bone chips out of place. And lifted high with the same care. Right foot right, find footing, left foot follow, set down carefully.

It seemed to take an eternity to get to the other side of the fifteen yard grid to the labeled home of his rock. As he landed, finally, in his square, he tacked the guide line again, allowing his weight to sit back against the taut rope. With the light in one hand he held up the baby rock and turned it over.

It was sedimentary, full of fossilized organic matter and exactly what anyone would expect of a layer from this location. His eyes perused all of this, reading it the way you would read a newspaper, for the whole story and never one letter at a time.

This piece had clearly belonged to an ancient streambed. From what the dino boys were finding, the water had nourished a whole bunch of critters up until the very last moment. What caused that last moment was David's job.

He liked the rocks, and it was natural to assume that he had gotten into this profession because of his father. The layers reminded him of his Dad a lot: cold, hard, and unreadable to all but the most trained of observers. David was an expert reader of both. Although, in his estimate, the rock was always easier to get a bead on at first and easier to get along with. Also, the rock always gave up the whole story eventually.

The streambed and the sediment was ABCs. What David was reading as he rotated his chunk of old earth and his flashlight was the tiny shiny chips in his piece. Now they were talking. And they said that the Paleo boys were retarded.

Shaking his head, he used the letter and number code on the tape to line the rock up with the direction and pitch it was supposed to have come from. Letting a little more slack into the line, he leaned down and placed the rock into the spot it supposedly called home for eons, until yesterday.

David's head tilted. His Maglight circled, and he studied the lay of the strata in the bed and the rock. It looked a little too damn good. Not to mention the remaining side of the bed from which the piece he held had been chipped. The two sides fit together like a puzzle piece.

Shrugging, David slipped the rock back into its baggie and pulled the permanent marker from his back pocket. He checked the upper right side of the label and clipped it back to his pants just as his stomach let a loud growl. His head perked, just as it had when he was a boy afraid of getting caught. But no one appeared to have heard. Hell, no one appeared to be within fifty miles of the site.

Cursing silently to himself, he wondered why it would have been so hard to slip a piece of jerky into a pocket, or for god's sakes, make a sandwich. It wasn't like he didn't have a belt full of zipper baggies already. But he didn't have time to go back. He needed to check his pieces and not make more enemies on the dig than he already had.

So he pulled the next rock from its zipper pouch and carefully began making his way to another grid square. Lift foot, set foot, lift other foot, set foot.

Four hours later he hadn't tripped at all, which was a miracle since he was silently swearing a blue streak. The dino boys hadn't mislabeled a single rock, which only made him more furious. Hell, you couldn't count on them for anything.

And if the rocks were all aligned right, then the rest was all aligned wrong. An eddy in the stream could explain one spot, maybe even a few, but not the consistency of the whole dig.

A bright light shone into his eyes, blinding him more easily than the dark of night ever had.

“Hey, pretty boy!” It was Greer. David had always figured that ‘pretty boy’ was the best Greer could come up with since he wasn’t one much inclined to the use of the more apt asshole. “You done checking out our grid markings? You didn’t break any bones did you?!”

“No, Fuckwad, I didn’t.” David held his hand up in front of his face. He was going to catch hell for this. He knew it now.

“That’s too bad.” Greer directed his five-billion megawatt stadium light at the ground and slowly David’s sight came back. He started climbing the slope cautiously and methodically, as Greer taunted him all the way. “Well, seems we disappointed you didn’t we? You thought we had mislabeled all your stones.”

“They’re not stones.” David growled as he climbed.

“Too bad. Now you’re going to have to do some real geology work. Not just come out and wave your hand like you always do and spout off what’s just so obvious that the rest of us must be blind.”

“Congratulations, Greer. You are right on so many counts. My rocks were in fact labeled correctly-”

“How many of them?” Greer taunted.

“All of them.”

“Uh huh.”

“And I do in fact have little bit of work to do when I get back to the tent-” He stopped climbing.

Greer spotlighted him again. It would have blinded him, but he wasn’t looking in front of him, just staring into the space ahead. If it meant what he thought it meant. . . well, . . .

“What is it David?”

“I want everyone off the site tomorrow. Just you and me. I need to check all other possibilities.”

“Everyone off the dig tomorrow!?! Jesus, David, do you know what you’re asking? Is your Daddy gonna pay our salaries?”

“No, but the royalties off my paper will. Dammit, Greer, clear the site tomorrow.”

If it was what he thought it was . . . well, he might just prove that the David Carter II geology center had been worth its money.

• • • •

GOD, WHAT WAS IT THAT made her feel like such a fool? All that school, all that ‘prestige’, and yet she stood there like a moron. Eyes wide, ‘yes’ ‘yes’ monosyllabic answers to each question. The horrible, lost feeling of being in an unfamiliar institution.

“So you two are the new peons.”

Jillian nodded. “Yes.” There it was again. The idiocy.

The guy beside her - Jared? Jeff? Jacob? - was cool and only raised his eyebrows to the question.

Dr. Landerly was hunched over his desk and had whitish hair that stuck out in about fifty different directions and looked as though it hadn’t made friends with a brush in a lifetime or so. He had male pattern balding and probably arthritis, judging by the way he held his pen. Whether he didn’t look at them because of pain or out of sheer rudeness was anybody’s guess. “You two turned in all your documentation and fingerprinting crap down in HR?”

Jake ? flicked the new badges hanging from their pristine white jackets, “Yup, hence the ten a.m. arrival.”

“Ready for the tour?”

At the sound of yet another one word answer, he finally looked up at them. For a moment he simply looked them both up and down, taking their measure. Jillian did the first proactive deed of her day and sized him up too. Landerly’s face reminded her of a grandfather, not her own, but that old man look, crossed with a little mad scientist. With his focus turned on them, she felt the same intensity that the papers he was marking on must have felt just minutes before. She was surprised the pages hadn’t burst into flame before she and what’s-his-name walked in and pulled a little of the good doctor’s attention from them.

“Well, you must be Jillian Brookwood, and you must be Jordan Abellard.”

Jordan! That was it.

Landerly tapped his forehead, “Deductive reasoning.” And despite the insanely poor joke, she began to like him.

He simply turned and began walking down the hallway, talking as he went and expecting them to keep pace behind them. He never checked. “This is your office.” He pointed to his left into an open door and what could only be called a large cubby. He was already walking away. Jillian had to nearly run to catch up with him, already midsentence.

“- that whole half of the building is I.D. That part you’ll only go in on an ‘as needed’ basis. Which basically means never. Unless you get promoted, or we decide we don’t need you or don’t like you but can’t think of a better way to get rid of you.”

For the first time Jordan turned to her, his eyebrows raised until she shrugged in return. Dr. Landerly’s voice trailed off as her focus slipped to the signs on the wall. Every etched plate had the tiny inscription on the top Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. But Landerly was old-school and still referred to it as the CDC.

Not ten minutes later Jillian realized that they had walked a short circle, and Jordan wasn’t missing that fact either. “That’s it?”

“Sure.” Landerly fixed them with another stare. “If you want to see the Infectious Disease side, you can go get your own tour. I told you, you’re peons.”

“I’m a-” Jordan stopped himself. “We’re physicians.”

“Yes, and you’re underlings. And you’re at the CDC. On my team you’ll be spending a lot of time drawing blood and writing reports.”

Which, Jillian admitted, had been exactly the job description. So she wasn’t sure where Jordan got off being upset. In truth, it had been just that part of the work that had made her apply. She had spent all that time and money on medical school, only to find out that she hated the endless churn of minor complaints that flowed through a doctor’s office. This job had been her proof that she hadn’t chosen the wrong profession.

Landerly had disappeared back into his office, and by craning her neck she could see him scrubbing through the most disorganized desk ever. But he held out two identical key chains and spoke again. “Keys to your office and your lab next door. Go check it out then get cracking, you’ve already got three cases sitting on your desk.”

There was no other dismissal, no wish of good luck or welcome, just the turn of his shoulder and the intensity of his focus directed elsewhere. The two of them no longer existed to him.

Turning, they silently followed Landerly’s instruction walking two doors down to the plaque that read G-1763 Lab 13, Landerly.

“Hi.” Jordan’s voice filled the empty space around a young man with inky hair who stood at the basic black lab island dialing the micropipette to a new measure.

“Oh, Hi. You two must be the new docs. I’m your tech.” For a brief moment he held out a gloved hand before realizing what he was doing and withdrawing the offer. “I’m Mark. I’m prepping slides for Landerly right now, but let me know what you need. My desk is in the back.” He pointed to the corner, to a table piled with skewed stacks of loose papers and file folders of various colors.

“Nice to meet you.” Jordan pulled back out of the doorway and wound up leading her back to their office, where they spent four minutes choosing which side of the large desk they each wanted, then another hour exploring the file cabinet they shared, and finding out what the previous occupants had left for them. Which turned out to be an odd mix of pens, pencils, microtest tubes and pipette tips, and one stick of mint chewing gum.

After a half-hour of hardly speaking she finished up organizing her drawers and labeling her hanging files, only to look up and find Jordan watching her from across the desk. “It’s two-thirty, are you hungry?”

She nodded. But he spoke again before she could get in a word edgewise. “You find the cafeteria and I’ll treat.”

She would have rather paid, but she held her tongue. She could do this, right? On the ‘tour’ Landerly had pointed down one corridor and mentioned food and vending machines. With a deep breath she marched off in the general direction they had started, and faked it to the best of her ability.

Two corridors later she could smell that she had found the right one. Then, after they ordered, she completely disoriented them on the way back. After they got situated and endured a few minutes of silent chewing, Jordan leaned forward. “Since we get to stare at each other until one of us goes insane or gets promoted, why don’t we get started with the usual stupid questions?”

She almost smiled. Almost. “The usual ones?”

“Like ‘Where are you from?’” He leaned back and Jillian barely covered her gasp at realizing the vast majority of his lunch had already been reduced to empty wrappers. “I’m from Lake James, North Dakota. Where it’s colder than a w-. . . well just about anything, and there’s really a lot more bible thumping and militia than you might guess. College and med school at UCLA. Your turn.”

“Emory Med, but I grew up in Chattanooga. Same town through undergrad.” She smiled from behind her limp cheeseburger. “Favorite fast food? Mine is Chick-Fil-A nuggets.”

“What’s Chick Fillay?”

“Ahhh, I’ll take you tomorrow.”

Jordan shrugged. “Favorite burger is Jack in the Box Bacon Ultimate Cheeseburger.”

“Jack in the Box?” She supposed that’s what happened when you met someone from the opposite end of the country.

“Ahhh, good, cheap food. College student fare. Too bad I can’t return the Chick Fillay favor. Jack-in-the-Box is only out west.”

Satisfied that she had the basics, Jillian figured it was time to start earning her keep. “We should get to work on these cases.”

“Can I just guess now? Botulism, gas leak, and Salmonella.”

“Really?” She put her hand to her hip. “I would have had you pegged for a ‘secret government weapons being tested on our own people’ type.”

“Nah, I’m a realist.” He picked up the folder and started through it, while she made a thinking noise. He laughed. “Do you realize that you even ‘hmmm’ with a southern accent?”

She nodded. “Can’t be helped.”

JORDAN WAS PISSED. The cases in their box this morning had turned out to be botulism, botulism and botulism. One, he was mad that his guess was wrong. Two, he had skipped the invite to UCLA's PhD program to come here and do research as a physician, even though he would only occasionally be putting the vast majority of his med school skills to work. He had thought that this would be more exciting than telling mothers that their kiddies had ear infections or strep throat. Three, they hadn't even had to leave their desks to figure the damn thing out. Four, Miss Jillian had turned out to be anal retentive. Although 'turned out' was being generous. She had looked the part from moment one.

Aaaaaaaack. Where was the next AIDS when your life needed a spark? Miss Jillian was sitting across from him diligently making notes in the two files that she held while he scanned the new one that had turned up in their inbox this morning. Jillian gave him a dirty look that he wasn't helping her write reports, and it occurred to him that Landerly had done this on purpose. Jordan was to be the forward thinker, the one who would make those reasoning leaps, and Jillian was the workhorse.

Her nose wrinkled and she brushed her hair back again. Not that it accomplished anything other than her getting to move her arm. The hank of hair fell right back over her shoulder. The phone buzzed, startling him about three feet into the air, and he was already trying to cover that fact before he was even back down. "Landerly wants us."

Jillian stared a brief moment through not entirely open eyes. "That was so not smooth." But she followed him next door and graciously didn't mention it again.

Landerly stood as they entered the office, his attention a physical sensation as it turned from the phone to the two of them. "This is why I created you guys."

"Like God?" Jillian's voice was dry and Jordan wasn't sure if she was kidding or what. But Landerly was, and he laughed a good guffaw and responded with "Maybe a demigod," before continuing.

So Jillian was already his favorite. How could two people on this earth have that same sense of humor?

The older man held up a file before speaking. "I've got a little girl in Deltona, Florida with a spider bite reaction that the local docs say doesn't look like your basic anaphylactic shock. They think the spider has some new venom or maybe is a vector carrying something else. She's all yours." He handed the file to Jillian just as Jordan decided that there wasn't anything he could do about it. And maybe he hadn't been hired to be the brilliant theorist. Which of course meant he would have to get his butt in gear and do some work.

"Anne in reception will have your schedule. You need to leave this evening to see the reaction and do anything before it gets worse." And like turning off the light, his focus was off them and they were expected to find their own way out.

By now Jordan knew his way around and he certainly knew Anne. She was the adorable blonde in reception, and he had made those thoughts clear to her this morning. Anne handed each of them an itinerary, but it was Jordan her eyes remained on. Not that he was going to dip his pen in the company ink, but there was a certain warmth in knowing the ink was receptive to being dipped. Jillian was walking away before he realized it and he smiled good-bye to Anne before turning to follow his cubby-mate down the hall.

At their desk, Jillian turned and stared at him, leaving him ready for some scathing remark about his behavior, but instead, with no preamble, she asked about Landerly. "Do you think he's just too old to go off gallivanting around the country? Why do you think he set up his team of two here? Why us?"

Jordan had no good answers and he told her so. But he did offer to make up for getting lost on the way to lunch yesterday and asked where he could find this Chick Fillay. “We have time to do fast food, right?”

“And the fast part is the part you seem to be having trouble with.” She didn’t look up and he couldn’t decipher the dryness in her tone. He had heard it several times now and he truly wasn’t sure what to make of it. That scared the crap out of him. And given that they were on their way out the door for a company road trip, and since she was a co-worker, he figured he’d better find his footing right away.

“Are you mad at me because I got us lost yesterday? Or for something else?” Her face was unreadable. Well, he thought it was. She just looked a little confused and maybe perturbed.

“No, I’m not angry.” After tilting her head to the side for a moment, she nodded. “You’re worried that I’m one of those ‘my feelings are hurt’ girls. Well, I’m not.”

“Then why no fast food?” She was still looking at him and Jordan figured that was the best way to read the book, when it was open. But Miss Jillian seemed to be written in a foreign language, one he only understood random phrases of.

Her words were slow and methodical. “Because I want to have time to pack. And because you got lost the last time the directions were ‘three miles then turn right.’ I just don’t have time.” Before she even finished the sentence, her purse was over her shoulder and she was heading out the door, “See you at the airport.”

He was still looking confused when he heard her footsteps change directions and saw her head reappear in the open doorway. “Should I pick you up?”

Again she read his expression before he got his words together. “We’ll both get there, and only one parking charge.”

“I can drive.”

She nodded. “So can I. And I know my way around. If you want to contribute you can pay the parking fees.”

“They’re reimbursed.” So that wasn’t much of a contribution at all.

“I know. I just hate expense reports.” She disappeared beyond the opening and this time didn’t come back even as he muttered to himself.

“And here I thought you loved paperwork.”

In a few minutes he had cleared his thoughts and headed home. It took him a while to locate things from the boxes. Jordan had lived here all of one-half a day longer than he had been working at the CDCP, and it showed. He found his only two suits - one still in the dry-cleaning bag. Scrounged up socks, without holes. Underwear, also without holes. Then went in search of his hanging bag. This, of course, was pristine. It had been used once, for his interview here.

He pushed that thought aside and turned back to his packing. There was no way of knowing how long they would be there. He had to plan for the possibility of a full week, so he stuffed all the spare pockets and pouches with extra clothes and, in a glimpse of reason, all seven of the ties he owned. After staring at the bag and waiting for it to tell him what else to pack, he finally realized that it would say no such thing, and so he threw in a few pairs of khakis for good measure.

The last step was to change himself. Jeans, tee, a sweatshirt, and an old pair of sneakers seemed the best bet for flying. They’d go see the little girl after they got settled in a bit, right? He decided to believe what he wanted and pulled the sweatshirt over his head, just as his stomach grumbled and the doorbell made the horrid high-pitched noise that the manager had called a chime.

“Coming!” Jordan crossed the short distance from the very back to the very front of the apartment and pulled the door open. “Hi.”

“Hey!” Jillian walked through the open doorway and past his open mouth. “I think you actually have a bigger place than me. You ready?”

“Yes.” Getting his bags took less than half a minute; his thoughts would take a little longer to gather. What was up with Jillian? She looked all of nineteen in her jeans and small white t-shirt, what with her dark hair pulled back in that ponytail. If she was in the airplane seat next to him, people would think he was a dirty older man.

But none of it even registered in her expression as he grabbed his luggage and trailed her down the stairs and out to the eerily quiet street. She simply popped the trunk of her little white car open and let him throw his bag on top of the two she had stacked back there.

“What is this?”

“Rav-Four.” She slid in behind the wheel, no longer Miss Jillian of the CDCP, but a complete stranger. “It has its quirks, but it’s reliable and, one day, when I get a dog, she’ll go in the back.”

She laughed most of the way to airport, navigating into long-term parking with ease. Her matching carryon was slung over her shoulder and she wheeled her hanger bag behind her, never fussing at the long wait at security. And when the plane took off from the runway at Atlanta International she was already asleep in the seat beside him.

• • • •

BECKY SAT KNEE DEEP in shallow, muddy stream water, her long bangs falling into her eyes. Melanie wasn’t listening to her, Brandon had wandered off somewhere, and her mother was going to be mad. She was wet, a little on the cold side, and she was the only one who hadn’t caught anything yet. She raised a hand to push her hair out of her face, not remembering until she felt the cold that her hand had just been in stream water that was not clear. Oh well, the muck would help plaster her hair out of her eyes.

For a moment she gathered her breath, then she yelled, “Brandon! Mom’s gonna be angry if you don’t stay with me. Get back here!” But Becky didn’t wait for him to show up. He would, and so she turned back to searching the running water for the small frogs she wanted. One jumped in front of her container and with a quick movement she completely missed it.

With a deep sigh she lifted her head up, and let out another long yell. “Brandon!”

“I’m right here, Becky.” He shook his head as he looked down on her, holding the bottom of his shirt in front of him making a scoop in which he piled all the containers he had filled with one frog each. Just like she had asked.

And to think biology had seemed like such a great field to go into. She had her doctorate, and yet her little brother and sister put her to shame at ‘obtaining specimens’. The only consolation she had was that Brandon and Melanie had also seriously shown up every other biologist and assistant she had brought out for the job.

“Becky, look.”

“Yeah, you did great.”

“No,” He scooted closer. She knew that he would have grabbed her arm. He had tried, but his lightning reflexes had him straightening the tumbling containers before they got too far. “Pick up that top one, he’s the biggest.”

With a smile of pride on her face, she held the clear Tupper up over her head and let the light shine through on a good size rana. One of the larger ones caught here, but certainly not the largest.

“He is pretty big. You holding out for more money?”

“Becky! I thought you were smart. Look at him! He’s got four legs, you retard!”

Melanie also looked up at the underside of the container, although what she could see from about three feet away was anyone’s guess. “Frogs all have four legs, retard.”

Becky shifted to give both of them dirty looks about the name calling, but left it at that, knowing full well she couldn’t win.

Brandon rolled his eyes with all the meaning a ten year old could muster. “Four back legs.”

“Huh?” Becky held the Tupper aloft again, this time higher to catch rays from a break in the tree cover. Frowning, she looked him over, and she didn’t see it until he jumped: four hind legs, two per side, coming out of the hip flexor joint. Holy crap! She shook the plastic container a bit. Yup, all functional. “Okay, I’ll give you two bucks for him.”

Brandon still clutched the edge of his shirt holding the ten containers stacked precariously in there, but his expression said that he wasn’t moved by the two dollar offer. “They’re all that way.”

“What?” She reached down and pulled another container from his clutch. Holding it high she gave it a slight wiggle and watched the small frog try to rebalance itself. Four hind legs. All functional.

She quickly set it down and grabbed for two more. Both had a second pair of jumper legs. In under a minute her breathing had sped up and she had ascertained that Brandon was correct.

But that would be wrong. Very wrong. With her brows pulled together, she went over to check the row of tupperware that the kids had caught here. It had been hard to see those spare legs at first. Maybe they just hadn’t noticed. But her little sister was a sharp one, and she’d already checked the locals out. “They’re all normal.”

“So, Brandon, there were . . .” she counted, “eight six-legged frogs where you were? And you caught them all?” He was a good catcher. Once he spotted it the frog didn’t stand a chance.

“No, they were all like that. At least I think they all were. Almost. There are more. I just ran out of lexans.”

“Where!?”

Brandon took off with Becky right behind him, Melanie would catch up, she knew. The trail was well-worn and well-known from her own childhood days, and they bounded down it, anticipating every fallen tree and protruding rock. She just kept running after Brandon, never having heard of anyone finding a full clutch of six-legged frogs before. A tree branch, that Brandon had held out for himself, came slapping back at her, but even without her conscious thought, her hand was there to catch it.

Six legs occurred in nature, and didn’t kill the frog most of the time. Usually they were slow and so predators got them. But it was a growth mutation, not a genetic one. It also usually resulted in just one spare leg, a five-legged frog. These all had six. So how would you get a whole clutch of them? Unless something was wrong with the site . . .

There was a nuclear reactor program a little west of here: Oak Ridge, where they had built the A-bomb. There were always stories of Melton Lake Dam being shut down for mercury levels being too high. But this?

They had run a long way before Brandon finally stopped. He pointed to a section of the stream. There was absolutely nothing out of the ordinary to the human eye. Even the trained human eye. “I caught them all here.”

Becky slowly walked to the stream edge then kept going right in, her shoes were already caked in mud and silt and of absolutely no concern to her. “So would you say about a third of them were that way? Maybe a tenth?"

Brandon shook his head, "No, I'm telling you they all are."

Slowly she squatted down, getting a good focus through the running water. There were frogs here, lots of them, but with the movement and the refraction, those back legs were hard to distinguish. Hell, they'd been hard to spot at first in the lexans. Shit! She had run to the site with no tupper!

Becky swore at herself a little more, then went back to peering through the water. But it wasn't helping. She needed to see these guys up close. Looking back at Brandon she asked the sixty-four-thousand-dollar-question, "Do you think you could catch one bare handed?"

Small deep breaths came from just behind her, Melanie had caught up to them. "You . . . don't . . . . . have . . . . . to."

Becky turned to find her baby sister, leaned over, huffing for oxygen, but in Melanie's outstretched hand was a tall stack of tupper, with all the lids shoved down in the top one.

Becky shrieked. "You are a genius!"

"I . . . know." Job done, Melanie sat back to watch Brandon get frogs and Becky try.

Becky held each new catch aloft, the fifth came up with normal legs, prompting a question. "Brandon, how many normal frogs did you throw back?"

"Two."

"Just two?"

He nodded.

The sun was setting by the time Melanie arrived from her return trip to get the wheel barrow. As Becky had ordered, each of the frogs from the other site bore a scrap of masking tape across the lid. And all the lids bore a single digit - the number of legs on the contained frog. There were so many 6's that Becky had to look again. Each time she thought the numbers must be off. But they weren't. She stacked the five four-legged frogs from this site in one spot, thinking they would be as useful as all the sixes. Why hadn't they changed, too? And how did their numbers get to be only one out of ten?

Becky was frantically writing on the scratch pad she had brought along in case any question popped into her mind. She was beginning to think that today the fifty sheets the pad claimed to have weren't going to be enough.

She just couldn't detect anything out of the ordinary. It was your standard East Tennessee summer day by all measurable counts. So what was up with the frogs?

Eventually she had to give up. She had no barometer, no litmus paper, and no Geiger counter, so there wasn't much more she could measure, even if she wanted to. The Geiger counter gave her pause. What if there was some sort of radiation leak? If the government had buried some sort of waste here? Wasn't it possible? There were always news stories about plutonium being flown in and out of the labs. Could it have gotten here? And had she exposed her brother and sister to it, for . . . she checked her watch . . . four hours? God, her lack of protocol had been horrible.

Jillian closed the door behind her. No longer ‘Miss Jillian’ in his mind. My God, she was a little chameleon. In the airport she had looked like a kid, ponytail and all. And less than fifteen minutes after they had arrived she knocked on his hotel door, business professional from head to toe. In a deep teal suit that looked like it had been cut just for her and brought out her eyes. He hadn’t realized there was so much green in them.

She had, of course, immediately told him to quit staring, that yes, she did in fact own several suits and he needed to get it together. Jordan had never had a woman beat him at getting ready before. And certainly not look so good doing it.

She had thrown her lab coat over her arm then peeled off her jacket just like he had in the stifling Florida humidity. He had sweated buckets just on the drive over. She had looked cool, “I’m from the south, remember?” All he could do was swear to slap anyone from LA who ever bitched about the ‘humidity’ again. And ask God’s forgiveness for all the times he had done it himself.

He pulled his jacket back on to cover his sweat stains as they entered the hospital flashing their CDCP credentials. Jillian clearly actually owned some of the adult faculties he was pretending to. Everyone spoke to Jillian, wanted her opinion first. She was smart, confident, and on top of it. A million miles from the woman who would pour over paperwork, pulled her hair back in a barrette, and had that weird flat sense of humor. It almost pissed him off.

It also lent a lot of credence to his new hypothesis that he wasn’t the brilliant theorist. And if that were the case, why was he here? He’d made his own diagnosis. But Jillian had given the same one, and they had all asked her first.

She followed him out of the little girl’s room to confer in the hallway. “What did you think?”

He shrugged out of his lab coat. “Same as you.”

“It makes sense, doesn’t it? West Nile with anaphylactic shock caused by the spider bite.”

“So we’re here for another two days at least.”

“Why?” She looked perplexed and he had the feeling he was about to be shown up again. It didn’t sit well.

“Because you can’t tell West Nile from Yellow Fever or Dengue Fever without a viral analysis or waiting out the symptoms.” By his count, two days was the least amount of time they might need to see the distinction. He waited for her to tell him all about the new reasons he was wrong.

But she didn’t. “What’s the difference?”

“You don’t know?” He was shocked.

She shook her head, her expression suddenly clearly belonging to the girl who had inhabited the other side of the desk from him. It just pissed him off. “I hate you, you know. You walk in there, all confidence and knowing all the answers then only confess out here that you don’t.”

Her head tilted, and she smiled, “No one wants to believe that it isn’t an exact science. And that family has had doctors telling them that they have no idea what it was and that they called in the experts. That’s us, Starsky.”

He sunk into one of the doctor’s lounge chairs. It was unfamiliar, but so much like every other hospital’s lounges. “The way I’m feeling I think we should go by Bonnie and Clyde.”

She laughed, lightening the load on his shoulders. “Nah, Bonnie and Clyde actually knew what they were doing.”

“YES, MOM I’M HOME.” Jillian had the phone wedged between her shoulder and ear while she folded her clothes.

“How are you feeling?”

“Like crap, Mom. I just walked in the door twenty minutes ago.” And, well trained girl that she was, she was already putting her clothing away. And calling her Mother.

“So now you’ve been with this job, like, a week? And you haven’t had a day off, what are these people doing to you?” Jillian heard the slight intake of breath and she knew what was coming. “I just don’t see why you couldn’t have gone into private practice. . . why you didn’t-”

“Mom.” The sigh behind her own voice was deeper and well worn. “I never deluded you about wanting a private practice. I never intended to come back to Signal Mountain and check ears and throats for a living. I don’t have the touch for that. Nor the desire.”

Nor was her mother getting the everyday prestige from having her little girl go off to Emory for medicine and come back to help serve the community. But her mother’s high hopes had been just that. And they belonged entirely to her mother. So, as far as Jillian was concerned, her mother could figure out what to do with them.

“So you enjoy traveling all over the place with no days off?”

“Mom, I have days off.” Then, just to be a little facetious she added, “You know, saving the world doesn’t happen on a nine to five schedule.”

That managed to shut her up for all of the three seconds it took her to shift gears. “So are you meeting any nice doctors?”

Her shoulders ached. Slowly rolling the one that wasn’t cramped up under the phone, she gave the same answer she had been giving for two years, since the end of her last major relationship. “No, mom, they’re all assholes.”

There it was, the expected intake of breath, but she spoke again before her mother could criticize her language. “But I did meet a really nice janitor, and he wants to take me out on Thursday- Oh Mom! That’s the other line! Maybe it’s him. I’ll call you next week! I love you!”

She barely waited for the resulting “I love you, too.” Before hanging up the phone and tossing it on the dresser. God hang her for using her mother’s prejudices against her, but . . . she just couldn’t put up with it any more.

The bed beckoned. She was tired of being good, tired of putting her clothes away, tired of explaining her life choices to her family. In Chattanooga, smart girls married men with money. Even in this day and age. She knew three girls who attended one semester of freshmen year, just to say they did it, before they went off and married their much older boyfriends. Jillian had wanted her own career, and her own life, and apparently you couldn’t have both.

She flopped back onto the comforter - tomorrow she had to go into the office and they had to write a report on the spider bite, and then there were four glorious days off until Monday again.

She had been in the apartment for all of two and a half weeks, and since starting her job she estimated that she had been here maybe twenty-four hours total, including sleep time. Shaking her head, Jillian decided to pass out.

After half an hour of staring at the ceiling while her thoughts ran rampant with her, she finally accomplished her goal.

• • • •

“THIS IS SILLY, REBECCA.”

Ooooh, Dr. Warden had downshifted to ‘patronizing’. As her boss, his only real function seemed to be the monitoring of anything he deemed to be under his control - which included employees, discoveries, and even paperclips. Becky just knew she wouldn’t last three minutes without actually hitting him.

Taking one deep solid breath, she nodded. “All right. I understand. My resignation will be on your desk in fifteen minutes.”

“Rebecca, where would you go? You can’t just resign.”

She faked a startled look. “My parents live down the street. And I’m sitting on a huge discovery that will pay off in a little while. I’ll be fine, but thank you for worrying about me.”

Turning, she began to walk out of the office. His voice caught up to her quickly. “That’s my paper. Those frogs are university property.”

But she was done. She squared up to face him, as he towered over her tall frame, making her feel small, but she knew she was in the right. “No, it’s not your paper.”

He started to talk but she held up her hand. “Just because three of those frogs are sitting in my office, doesn’t make them university property. I would point out that my purse also sits in my office. Most of those frogs are still at my home. Sitting under a lamp I bought. They were caught in Tupperware that I purchased with my own money, I have a receipt.” She grinned, then continued, even as she talked this was getting better. “They were caught by my siblings, on land owned by my parents, and since you haven’t anted up a penny for them yet, I’d say you would be pretty hard pressed to prove that I don’t own-”

He interrupted, as she knew he would. “In your contract with the university it says that all related discoveries-”

She laughed; God, her day was getting better. She had come for a reward for her brother and sister, and when he’d childishly refused, she’d upped the stakes. And now she was going to walk out with a paper. “Doctor Warden, your contract might stipulate that, but mine doesn’t. I crossed those lines out, on the advice of my brother. Harvard Law, ninety-eight.”

Warden paled, and it was all she could do not to dance a little jig right there in the second floor J hall of the Reynolds building. She forced a smile and continued. “You can sign reward checks for my brother and sister, and my paper will have your name on it. Or I’ll go draft my resignation, effective immediately, and you can explain to the higher-ups why this doesn’t say ‘University of Tennessee’ all over it.”

He didn’t say anything. Just turned and went back to his office.

Becky tried to keep her voice light. “I’ll be back for those checks in an hour.”

“But-” He didn’t finish and she just smiled.

It was down the corridor, around a corner and through another lab that her office sat. Definitely out of the way. She went in and started writing up the findings, but after starting with the date, time, and location she realized that she couldn’t do anything. Not anything. Not until Warden put it in writing that the paper belonged to her and anyone else who she chose to have on it.

If she used university equipment or wrote up anything, the frogs and the paper could legally become property of the UT Biodiversity office. And, since finding new and unusual species and behavior was what the Biodiversity team did, she would be hard pressed to prove it was a personal project. So, for the moment at least, her hands were tied.

The ranas stared at her from their Tupperware lined up on her shelf. Three of them. All in a row, all looking right at her, their little throats bobbing as though with their breathing. One big, one little, one medium. There was nothing extraordinary about any of the three, other than the obvious extra legs.

Becky was suddenly extremely grateful to Aaron. That he had chosen law school and in his own arrogant way had decided that no man was complete without some knowledge of the law. He said she'd be grateful when she was in her first car accident or bought her first house. Neither of those things had happened yet. But she sent up a silent thank you as she sat there.

She was also grateful for her own error, remembering how frustrated she had been, making an extra trip to the restaurant supply store for the lexans she had forgotten to bring home with her. It was all lining up. If she jumped ship she wouldn't regret it. And if she got fired. . . well, she really still wouldn't.

She filled her time reading emails, and doodling, and finally gathered the lexans into her arms. The water sloshed as she walked, the frogs trying to stay motionless out of fear, but constantly having to squirm to correct their balance.

Warden looked up as she entered. "You're leaving?"

"Yes."

"I have your checks." But he didn't hand them over.

If she was fired, it would be worth it just to spend this minute watching the prick squirm.

"Do you have your resignation?" He eyed her, and leaned forward but didn't ask again.

"No. Not if I get my checks now and tomorrow morning I have it in writing that the paper is mine and mine alone." She took the checks and balanced the frogs in one arm while reaching into her pocket to pull out a sticky note. "Here's my home phone number so you can call me and tell me when it's ready." Already knowing he wouldn't take it, she stuck it on the nearest bookshelf.

Against the ropes, he nodded, swallowed a bit, then reached out. "Mind if I take a look?"

Just before his mealy hand closed on one of the Tupperware she turned away. "Yes, I do. These are still my frogs."

It was two city blocks to the parking garage then up two floors, and all the way to the back. And this was privileged parking. She was only allowed here as an employee. Students had to park even further away. Her jacket was cloying and constricting, but she wouldn't set down the frogs. They were her future right now. And something was very wrong with them.

Her folks' home was a ways out in the county, it was the only way they could have all that land. It just wasn't as far out as it had been when she was small. Several of the neighbors had parceled large properties and housing developments now stood where nearby farms and fields had been.

She followed the local school bus the last few turns to her home and met Melanie and Brandon as they leapt down to the gravel roadside. "No one believes we caught six-legged frogs!" The wail was that of a plaintive seven-year-old who was about an inch from a seriously good pout.

But that telling everyone part made her nervous. Becky scooped up her little sister and asked Brandon to grab the Tupperware out of the front seat. "Let's not tell people just yet. They'll believe you when they see your picture in the paper, even if it doesn't happen for a while."

Melanie consented, and after a slow evening her father showed up and her mother took advantage of adult company, pouring them three glasses of wine from the box in the fridge, if it could be called 'pouring'. But it wasn't bad, and partway through nursing her drink and contemplating how she had destroyed her future and was now the proud owner of forty-three frogs she couldn't investigate any further than a good once-over, Brandon called up from the basement.

"Becky, your frogs are all staring at me! They're weird!"

Her mother yelled back, but didn't move an iota. "Of course they are, they've got six legs for chrissakes!"

“Becky, can we rotate them?!” Melanie wanted to torment the frogs, and Becky wished she hadn’t started those early biology lessons with her little sister. The girl was too bright - it would be great if she forgot something just once in a while.

“No!”

“But it’s fun!”

In a low voice she spoke only to the table. “Can’t argue that.” The frogs had a lot of built in responses. When put on their back they would flip upright and get ready to jump. If you rotated the ground beneath them, they would turn to stay oriented to the original direction. And it was all reflex. The frogs would do this in the lab even if they were decapitated. Of course that response only lasted a few seconds before the dead frogs would jello-out and lose all muscle tone.

But it was enough to make the squeamish lab students jump and scream, and the more sturdy-hearted spend good lab time just rotating the dissection trays watching the beheaded frogs reorient one way then the other. In a few live frogs the responses could entertain a couple of elementary school kids for hours. For the frogs’ sakes, Becky regretted showing it to her little siblings.

It was quiet for a few minutes. Well, maybe more than a few minutes, her wine glass was empty. They all turned at the sound of footsteps on the stairs. Brandon and Melanie emerged on the landing, arms full of little clear lexans.

“Becky, they keep orienting themselves.” Melanie put one Tupper on the table with a small thunk. “Look.” She turned the Tupper and sure enough the little rana moved his front legs hand over hand and shuffled his back feet as the container moved, constantly keeping his nose pointed in the original direction.

“Melanie, I told you not to rotate them.” Looking to her parents for backing, Becky sighed.

Before her folks could put in their two cents, Melanie continued with her mini-lecture on the orienting process of frogs. She picked up the lexan and softly but quickly shifted it onto its side, leaving the inhabitant on his back. She put it on the table again, and up the little guy went, onto all six legs, squat and ready.

“That’s exactly what they’re supposed to do. So stop tormenting my frogs.” And to think she had spent this morning arguing for bonuses for the little Dr. Moreaus.

Melanie ignored her. “Now the four-legger.” She scooted over the container marked with the normal masking tape from its spot at the end of the table. Now center stage, the little rana performed, hand over hand, back legs shuffling, while Melanie rotated the container. Then she flipped him onto his back and set the Tupper upright in line with the three six-leggers.

And Becky saw it.

What Melanie and Brandon had seen. She barely paid attention to the little guy as he flipped himself up off his back and into ‘ready’ stance. It wasn’t what he did. It was what he didn’t do.

The difference was obvious. This time Becky grabbed one of the downstream frogs, flipping her softly onto her back, and as the little rana struggled briefly then expertly flipped herself upright, even Mr. and Mrs. Sorenson were getting onto their feet.

Her Dad spoke first. “Are they supposed to do that?”

“No, Dad, this is definitely new.”

When the four-legger hopped up, he faced whichever direction was easiest. No matter what she did, each time the six-leggers came to a stop, they faced the same way they had previously. All three of them, always the same direction, all the time.

Without speaking, each family member grabbed one lexan, and separated them to different rooms, hollering out. “Same way!” “Toward the bed!” “Facing the sink.” It didn’t matter though. All the phrases meant the same thing.

She left the Tupperware on the floor while scrambling down the stairs, her family close on her heels. With breath held tight, Becky flipped the light switch. All the little six-leggers were staring straight at her. Oriented the same direction as the ones upstairs. Her voice was weaker than she meant it to be. “What direction are they facing, Daddy?”

“Northwest, looks like.”

• • • •

GREER WALKED INTO THE lab like he owned the place. Which was silly, David thought, because he did. “Hey, pretty boy, what’s up with your stones? Tell me something interesting, because I’m footing a helluva bill for that shut-down day.”

“It’s good.” It was better than good, but David went back to perusing his pieces. He didn’t even bother to correct Greer about the ‘stones’. It was just said to annoy him anyway.

“Dude, you’ve got to give me more than that.”

David didn’t even look up. And that was the wonder of Greer. He always meant what he said just as he said it. You never needed to see his face. “All right, you are on par with Hell Creek.”

“Excellent.”

Yup, he didn’t need to see Greer’s eyes to know that the sarcasm flowed in rivers.

“Now how about something I can use?” His friend prodded. “I want information that I’ll find worthy of shutting down my dig for a full day, and I want it in complete sentences.”

He looked up, gauging what to give away and what to keep. “Well, you’ve got the iridium layer at the KT boundary, just like you were hoping. Only here, it’s better than Hell Creek because you’ve got a rapid lay down. Which gives you as close to full-on proof as you’ll ever get that the dust cover directly coincides with the dino die-out. It’s real thick at the KT, tapering off over the next several hundred years. No glass or ash content that the lab can discern—”

“You just said ‘the lab’, that means you didn’t do my analysis yourself.”

Shit. Explain, explain. David took a steadying breath. “Well, I couldn’t get it done in the time frame you wanted. The lab here did it and I oversaw it. It’s good work.”

Greer nodded slowly. “Our agreement was that you do the testing, but you farmed it out. So tell me what was so hellfire important that you shut down my dig and then blew me off for it?”

This time David looked up. “You don’t tell anyone.”

“Fine, but you tell me.”

Making his way into his office, he closed the doors behind Greer.

“Your dig is a hotspot. A magnetic jump point.”

Greer raised his eyebrows, “Do go on.”

“Every so often, a long time, even by geological standards, the earth’s poles shift . . . swap places. It happens that certain spots shift first, then the theory is that when a critical mass of hotspots, or altered areas, is hit, the poles snap. Bam! And it’s all over. North is south, south is north and all that, magnetically speaking. But no one’s seen a magnetic hotspot on the KT before. It might explain the slight discrepancies in die-out times better than the asteroid theory alone.”

“And you weren’t going to share your dinosaur theory with me?” Greer leaned forward on the desk, eyes blazing, and David wasn’t quite sure how to fill in the empty logic hole he had left. He was going to share, just not now.

“Listen, Greer, I’m still not positive. These rocks are good for it, but I need to get more. You know, most geologists never see a hotspot like this. My Dad was one of the few who did. I always look for it-”

“Jeez, Carter, that chip on your shoulder must’ve been what stunted your growth.”

“Thanks, fuckhole.”

Greer smiled, “You’re welcome.” It would have sounded very genuine if not taken in the context of following the word fuckhole. “What are you going to do when the old man kicks off?”

He shrugged; it had been a question that plagued him for many years. “Same as I’ve been doing. Sit around, live off my Dad’s money and his name.”

“Dude, I’m going to let you in on something, because I think I’m the only person who likes you enough to tell you.” Greer shook his head, but David knew that last part was true. “You are the only one who thinks you’re getting by on your Dad’s name.”

“Yes, but you don’t have all the facts. My Dad bought my way into Princeton when my grades weren’t good enough.”

“Oh, so sad, and boo hoo, and suck me. You’ve proven your worth on your own since then.” Greer sighed, and that meant that the conversation was finished. “So when are you going to get positive about this theory and let me in on it?”

“I have to go to the Appalachians next.”

“Pray tell, why?”

“Because, I was scrounging old files, looking, and three years ago there was a KT dig there. Wharton took his top dogs and then got furious when they got back because the specimens were all mislabeled. He even dismissed three of his graduate students over it. But, I’m guessing now that it might have been another hotspot. And that, my friend would make a great paper.”

“Who are you taking on this secret dig?” Greer’s arms were crossed over his chest.

“I don’t know. I only just started thinking about going back to check it out this morning. Those are the specimens I was looking over out there. By the way, they have the same iridium strata as your Warren Fault pieces. – Hey, do you want to go to Tennessee with me?”

There were three slow blinks of his eyes. “I’m a black man. Why in the hell would I want to go to Tennessee?”

“Greer, this is the new millennium. No one’s going to make you jump down, turn around and pick a bale of cotton. I’m pretty sure they’ve gotten rid of that ‘separate but equal’ stuff, too.”

This time the eyes blinked once.

David smiled, “What you really have to be afraid of are the cabbages.”

“I need to fear leafy greens now?”

David shook his head. “It’s the name for the inbred, backwoods folks. They were called cabbages because the inbreeding led to large heads and equivalent mental capabilities.” The more he tried to convince Greer to come the more he realized that Greer was ideal for the spot. “Come on. They found bones. . .” He trailed off, using something Greer would enjoy as bait.

But Greer sighed. He was a smart fish, and he recognized that the worm had a hook jabbed in its back. “Haven’t your paleo guys checked it out yet?”

“Nope, there are just bits and pieces, and because they thought all the specimens were mislabeled, when they got back Wharton was furious and just threw everything into storage, calling the dig a complete waste.”

“What kind of bones are they?”

That question began to make David hopeful. “I don’t know, I’m not a paleontologist. But you’re welcome to look them over, they’re sitting right out there on the lab table.” He stood and opened the door letting Greer out into the main lab again.

They didn't speak. Working side by side, shuffling around the lab, getting a book or a test kit here or there. After a deep intake of breath Greer uttered the first words in two hours. "Damn, this could be crap or it could be a goldmine."

Carter just nodded. He'd had the exact same thought.

"All right, answer me honestly." Greer squared up to David, a good nine inches taller and with all the dignity David felt lacking in his own moral fiber. "Is there a chance that these are just mislabeled specimens? That the students didn't know what they were doing and none of this info is correct?"

David nodded. "I wasn't on the dig. I didn't know any of the students other than a few faces I saw in class as undergrads. I'd have to say that there's a possibility it's not even KT. But it appears that all the specimens are mislabeled. I have to go check it out."

Greer nodded slowly then pulled out his palm pilot. "How long do we need?"

"Two to four weeks. No telling 'til we get there." Carter went back into the lab for his own schedule, cool as a cucumber, but inside wildly excited that it was Greer going with him. No one knew his shit like Greer. "The major work is already done. But the site's three years old. It'll take some reworking and we won't have any students."

David looked for a reasonable chunk of time when he could go. Most of these digs were planned months in advance. "If we just need to confirm what we have, it'll be short, but if we find new pieces, we'll be longer, you know how it is."

"When?"

"A.S.A.P."

"Then I have to head home now. Explain all this to my ever-so-understanding wife. Find a way to make it up to her. Then I can leave two Mondays from now." His head was bent low over the palm pilot and he tapped at it rapidly with the little stylus. "But I have to be back at my place one month later."

David picked up his red marker and drew a line through the dates Greer mentioned, noting that he had drawn through two staff meetings and a dinner with the head of the department, and all sorts of other stuff that would have to be moved. "Looks great."

"Are you expecting U Wisconsin to kick in funding?"

David shook his head. "This is a private venture. It's the only way I know to not have to write a paper explaining my suspicions and then wait an eon while they decide to give it back to Wharton who fucked it up in the first place."

"Daddy?" It didn't sound as snotty as it could have. It was from Greer and there was no malice behind it.

But David shook his head again. "Nope." He took a deep breath. "I'm touching my trust fund for this one."

"Really?" Greer's eyebrows rose. "Then I'll fly in baggage and try not to eat."

"Nah, we're going nice all the way. Once I touch it, it's touched. It's about the principle, not the amount. But this will be worth it."

• • • •

JORDAN LET THE WATER sluice down over him. He had been right, which usually made him pretty happy. Except when his prediction had been a solid ass-whopping. When he had gotten to town, even before he had unpacked, he had driven in ever-widening circles from his new place, looking for a gym.

The first evening after joining, he'd met Martin. So they had signed up for racquetball together, and every Wednesday, except when he'd been in Florida, they had played. Jordan had come close quite a few times, but he had beaten Martin only once. The workout was good and the challenge and standing date was better.

If he was ever going to be in good shape and have a healthy sex life it would be now. He had avoided relationships through med school, focusing on his studies and what few one-night-stands he could manage. It worked well and didn't distract much, but didn't keep the johnson as happy as he'd have liked.

He cranked the water hotter, something he hadn't done before receiving his gas bill just yesterday. He could afford it. And today he had earned it. God, he ached. So he stood there, hands flat on the slick tile, one leg straight, the other bent in calf stretches. After a few seconds he switched legs.

His mind wandered to Jillian in her tub, surrounded by white bubbles. He'd seen her place. Her tub probably had the same yellowing tiles with cracked caulking that his did. But in his imagination it was a pristine white claw foot.

It got bigger. Room for two. He added Marla from UCLA. One of the other med students. Two years older than him and hotter than hell. She hadn't had time for any of them, as she was hell-bent on a surgeon out of residency and with his loans already paid off. But she was in his tub right now in his head. With Jillian nonetheless.

By the time the shower water turned colder, the tub was a hot tub. And included his high school crush, but with bigger boobs, Angelina Jolie, and Marcy the tech from earlier today. All kissing each other. And . . .

Shit.

He had to face two of these women tomorrow. The water was cold and he thought that the phone was ringing anyway. So he cranked the faucet off and grabbed for one of the two towels he owned. Wrapping it around him as he ran, he dove to catch the phone before the machine picked up. He didn't get to look at the caller ID even, "Hello?"

"Jordan."

It was his Dad. And that in itself was odd. They weren't estranged, just not close. If it wasn't a holiday, they didn't talk. So instantly he was alert for problems. "Hey, Dad, is something going on?"

"Yeah," It was a sigh, low and long, like when his dad talked about Mom. "Eddie died."

"Oh, no." The weight in his chest took him by surprise. He and Eddie had rarely seen each other since they were children, and Eddie had always seemed ill at ease after Jordan had gone off to pursue medicine and Eddie had left high school early to go into construction. In the ten years since he'd been out, Eddie had made a name in Lake James, built himself a nice house, married a cute girl and had a daughter. Then got leukemia. "I thought he was in remission."

"Well, they thought he was better, that he was going to make it. He put the weight back on. Grew some hair, was fine. . . we thought."

Jordan wracked his brains. He couldn't talk medicine with his Dad, but he had with Eddie. They had finally seemed to be on more even footing, and Eddie now spoke some med-lingo from his time in the 'slammer,' as he referred to the hospital. He had seemed fine at the family Fourth of July picnic, only a few months ago. "So, do you know what happened?"

"Don't think anyone really does. He got some stomach flu. Next thing you know he's in a coma and then this morning he died."

That didn't sound like anything Jordan had ever heard of. He wanted to drill his Dad. Get answers. Because that sure didn't make a shitlick of sense.

"Funeral's Friday. You should be here."

"I will, I'll be there sometime tomorrow. I'll call and let you know when I get in."

And that was the end of the conversation. He stood with the cordless phone loose in his hand, shoulders slumped, one hand running down his wet face.

In a few moments he was on the line with Jillian, briefly wondering if she was also wrapped in a towel, bothered mid-bubble bath by his call. But the thought was momentary at most. Her sympathies were heartfelt and he was told in no uncertain terms to leave for the funeral right away, she'd be fine inspecting the latest staph infection by herself. She even offered to drive him to the airport. He almost told her 'no', then thought better of it. Between low level pay, student loans, and now a last minute plane ticket, he could use the savings from not parking.

Next he called Landerly and left a message. Then hopped online, and even called the airline, getting all the requirements for the grievance discount. Thank god for credit cards. Lord knew, none of it was in his account right now.

• • • •

BECKY PROTESTED. "YOU'RE trying to distract me from my frogs." She sounded like a petulant teenager and she knew it. But that was the politics of the professional academic world. Gain your footing and hold on for all you're worth.

"Rebecca, what, really, have you found out about those frogs?"

"Nothing unusual-"

"Exactly. So I don't understand why you are so determined to miss out on this great opportunity." Warden sat back in his chair. If he was the villain in a film, he would look just like this. Only creepy music would be playing in full digital surround sound.

She hadn't told any of them about the directionality of the frogs. Probably because she couldn't explain it. And she didn't want anyone else explaining it before she found a suitable solution. Not that she had found even an unsuitable solution in the last week. Her mouth opened, but there wasn't anything to come out. She closed it again. Biodiversity was her job. She traveled all the time to collect and study animals. She would pack all her frogs home first. They would be in better hands with Brandon and Melanie, even if they would be slightly tormented.

"All right. Where are these birds, and why do I need to see them?"

"I knew you would realize that this is the right thing, Rebecca."

That's Doctor Sorenson to you was the first thought that entered her head. He called her by her birth name, Rebecca. Which she thought sounded far too mature for herself, yet he treated her like a child. An idiot child at that. The second thought that went through her head was, Bite my ass.

"It seems there's a flock of warblers in Dalton, Georgia."

She waited the briefest of moments. "This is an odd time of year for them. Did they just never leave? They should be in Canada."

"They did leave. But the local birdwatchers say they're back, and they're nesting."

"Nesting?" This was maybe as interesting as the frogs. "All right. I'm hooked. What do I do?"

"When can you go?" His fingers still steepled in front of him. His hair was still on the greasy side and she still trusted him about as far as she could throw him.

"Tomorrow."

“You’ll drive down, make a preliminary assessment and let us know if we need to assemble an ornithology team, or if there’s a fluke or an obvious issue.” He handed her a three by five lined card. The cheapest paper for making small notes on, by his own statements. “Call this man at this number when you get in; he’ll be more than happy to show you the birds and their newly chosen habitat.” Warden dismissed her with a disdainful wave of his hand, and gave her his back even before she could have possibly started out the door. But that was okay, his front wasn’t his best side.

Jordan looked around the living room. It was cozy and warm, and the deep-toned plaid couch screamed everything but ‘Eddie’ to him. Kelly must have done all the decorating.

The room was a definite step up from his own place. One, that it was in a house, on a lot with a yard and a swing set even. Two, the carpet was lacking in the stains his had come with. Three, the kitchen was fully functional.

He’d never been here before. After all the time he and Eddie had spent blowing things up together as kids, somehow he had never seen the house his cousin had built with his own hands and his own construction crew. It seemed a shame to see it only now that Eddie was getting buried.

Kelly sat on the couch, taking all of it much better than Jordan had expected. So when Aunt Agnes left her alone, he tried to casually saunter over with his soda in hand and position himself next to Kelly.

“How are you holding up?” It was her voice asking him that question before he could ask it of her.

“I’m all in one piece.” And before he could ask anything, she started in.

“Eddie was always telling me stories about the two of you and the M-eighties, or the illegal fireworks. Were they true? Could he have really walked into your medical school and convinced them that you had a sordid past and shouldn’t have been admitted?”

Jordan laughed. He hadn’t expected laughter and not from Eddie’s widow. “Yes, it’s all true.” And Jordan tried to use his opening. He had to know. “What happened? I thought he was in remission.”

“He just caught this stomach flu. It got worse and worse. The E.R. and his regular doctor told us that it would pass. Then he passed out, and by the time they admitted him he was in a coma.” She took a sip of the gin and tonic that she was holding in both hands, unaware that it had sweated a ring onto her linen skirt. Jordan waited, seeing that she was just steeling herself for something important. “Before . . . with the leukemia . . . he had made me promise to pull the plug. But I couldn’t. I couldn’t do it. I just knew he’d come back around. But three days later he flatlined and there wasn’t anything they could do. He was gone.”

For a moment, her hand shook, rattling the small cubes of ice exposed above the level of liquid in her glass. But then it stilled.

“Kelly, I don’t get it. That doesn’t sound like Leukemia at all. And I never heard of a stomach flu that put anyone in a coma. How was his white count?” He had leaned forward, elbows on knees, soda clenched in both hands.

This time when she looked at him her eyes saw his face, but no further. “Jordan, what are you doing?”

“I just want to find out what happened.” He reached for her arm, but she was already jerking it back out of his way, standing in one fluid motion, her hands raising.

“Why!?” Her voice was as loud as it was high pitched. “Why! What can you do? He’s gone. Just when I was getting comfortable with the thought that I might get the forever I signed on for. In five days he went from healthy to dead.”

Jordan opened his mouth to apologize, but she didn’t let him.

“Can you bring him back? I know that he’s dead. But stop asking me these goddamn questions. I don’t know what his blood count was. I just want him back.” She dropped the glass then. It fell in almost slow motion, and even as he was aware of everyone in the room staring at him like the leper he was, he reached for Kelly and set her back on the couch to keep her from falling. "I'm sorry. I'm sorry." She was in tears now, full streaming tears, the fallen glass unnoticed.

Even if everyone else hated him, Kelly didn't seem to. Although he would have understood. He shouldn't have pushed her like that. With a great sigh Aunt Agnes picked up the glass, luckily still in one piece, and sent her husband, Bill, running for paper towels. Kelly stayed there, crying into his shoulder, while slowly, everyone around him went back to their business.

He had forgotten the cardinal rule. That these were people. He could always remember that when it was strangers. But with his own family he pushed. And he shouldn't.

And he had ruined it. As much as he regretted hurting Kelly, and pushing her past whatever safety barrier she had found, he more regretted that he wasn't going to get his information that he wanted.

They were all still looking at him. Why had he done it? He could answer but they wouldn't like it. They were all blue collar by choice, and he had gone out and paid through the nose to educate himself, to do what he wanted. But he had learned a whole new language, and they didn't speak it. Jordan didn't fit. And he'd upset one of the people who did. One at the center of the circle.

He rode home with his Dad in silence. Anyone else would think his father carefully schooled and stoic in his lack of expression these past few days. But Jordan knew better. Dad simply hadn't had it in him since his Mom had died.

He was in his old easy chair within moments, tonight. There was no reproach for Jordan's behavior, as he might have gotten when his mother was alive. Even though he knew his Dad didn't approve, he didn't hear about it. "Night, Dad."

His father didn't answer. Just a quick look in his direction and a nod let him know he had even been heard.

Jordan lay on the bed, his hands laced behind his head as he stared at the ceiling. His thoughts turned to Jillian briefly, wondering if her day at Grady Hospital had been horrifyingly long. But he realized that she had probably done just fine without him. A small smile played across his lips before it was erased by his medical mind.

Eddie had died of the stomach flu and a coma. And none of it added up. If anyone here would know that something was off with Eddie's death it was Jordan. But no one was listening.

Kelly's words haunted him.

Why! What can you do?

In five days he went from healthy to dead.

He couldn't bring Eddie back. He just wanted to understand. But there wasn't even an autopsy. Not for a man who had leukemia for five years.

His lids slowly gained the weight of sleep, and within moments the glare of bright light. He blinked against the harsh sun through the windows he hadn't bothered to close, because he hadn't believed that sleep was coming. He was still in his slacks, his shirt, and his tie. All of it formerly pressed and Sunday best.

He had the whole day to contemplate his horrible behavior from the evening before. The idea that God was punishing him for it began with the taste of old gym towels in his mouth.

With only a few blinks in a lazy attempt to clear his head, he pushed his way off the bed and into the bathroom. Relief surged at the flavor of mint replacing the gumminess of sleep. Jordan reached into the stall and flicked the shower on, the sense memory of where exactly to turn the dial remained even in this blurry state. Within a minute the water was a decent temperature, and he had yanked his tie loose and proceeded to strip. He almost fell back asleep standing there naked under the ancient showerhead.

By the time Jordan was downstairs, his Dad stood at the stove, his one concession to real-life cooking was the electric griddle that was perpetually on the counter top. The smell of Bisquick pancakes brought Jordan back to every other weekend he and his Dad had spent since his mother had died. He sat down with no conversation and ate until he was near bursting. Wondering all the while, as he always did, if his father made the pancakes even on weekends when he wasn't home. He'd never had the heart to ask.

Just as Jordan set down his fork, the phone rang. His father motioned with the spatula that Jordan was to answer it. In China, children cared for their parents unto old age. In Lake James, Jordan saved his Dad the social effort involved in answering the phone. "Hello?"

"Jordan?" The voice was soft and sweet and he couldn't quite place it. "It's me, Kelly."

"Oh, hi-"

"I wanted to apologize for my behavior yesterday. We all need to make sense of it in our own way." He could hear her breath across the line in the sharp inhale she needed before she continued. "You need to know. I don't want to. I don't care what you find out. But I signed a release to the hospital, and told them you were with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and that you needed them to cooperate."

"Kelly . . ."

"No, It's okay. If it had been you, Eddie would have found the answers leveling a field with a caterpillar and a backhoe. This is how you find yours. I'm just sorry I wasn't more understanding yesterday."

"Kelly." He took a deep breath. "Thank you, and I'm sorry I upset you. I just . . ."

"It's okay. Don't worry."

"Listen Kelly, I wanted to tell you that Eddie once told me that he was the luckiest guy alive to have you."

"Liar."

"No he did. He then told me what a pansyass I was with my nose in books all the time."

He heard her sniff even as she laughed. "Thank you. . . have a good flight home tonight Jordan."

Great, he had made her cry. Yet, she had given him access to Eddie's medical records. He wanted to jump up and down and cheer. He hated himself for it. But he had nine hours at the hospital until he had to leave for his flight.

• • • •

BECKY WASTED LITTLE time unpacking her duffle bag and simply splashed some water on her face. The hotel was covered by the Amateur Birdwatchers; it was far nicer than anything Warden would have approved of her staying in.

She pocketed her room card and slipped her purse over her shoulder. Making certain that her door locked behind her, she found her way back to the elevators and wondered what she was getting herself into. She spotted Marshall Harfield easily, mainly because he was the only person actually sitting and waiting in the lobby. He had told her that he had dark hair and dark eyes, and that he would be wearing a blue ABA jacket. What he had neglected to tell her was that the dark hair was thinning and the ABA jacket was bright enough to scare away all kinds of wildlife and that it was struggling to stay closed around the wide girth of his belly.

He neglected to tell her that he was nervous and that he would startle when she approached him. Wiping his hand on his pants he held it out while he greeted her. But she couldn't very well refuse to shake his hand. He led her out to his car, plastered with ABA and various other bird bumper stickers. Some even thought they were funny.

As they left the parking lot, he began a stream of nervous chatter. Becky, of course, listened with half her thoughts to Marshall, and the other half wondering what she'd gotten herself into. Her heart leapt when he reached into the backseat, but all he produced was a series of marked volumes on the Georgia Spotted Warbler.

Within moments, he had her flipping pages, finding out details and seeing that everyone who had ever printed anything about the Georgia Spotted Warbler agreed that they were only Georgian during the winter months. If it was true, then these birds were way out of sync. And Marshall Harfield had found his groove and a warm smile that he shared with anyone who could get excited over an unremarkable brown bird.

Her whole attention was turned to him as he continued, and she didn't even notice the drive. They were pulling up to a farmhouse outside Dalton and four people were standing in the middle of the front lawn, their bright blue ABA jackets giving them away. They all but pulled Becky from the car and smiled and shook her hand in turn as Marshall introduced Dr. Rebecca Sorenson around to the lot of them. They were polite enough to make it through introductions, then they were all speaking on top of each other.

She posed the question to the group in general as she was getting the hang of understanding them. "So last year the birds flew in the proper pattern, and they left last spring at the appropriate time . . . but now they're here way too early."

"Yes."

"No."

"Not exactly."

Becky decided to go with the kid, Weston, who had said 'not exactly'. "Explain please."

"This is the nesting ground for this flock, every year they're here in Mrs. Chesterfield's orchard. Well, last year they didn't arrive on time. And two weeks later we found them while we were out looking for spotted woodpeckers over at the Dalton Arboretum. They were there, the warblers, and they were nesting. So we thought that was weird--"

Becky's brows knit with questions. "How do you know it's the same flock?"

Anne, the older woman, spoke up this time. "I've been watching this flock for years. The birds come and go, but there's a consistency. You'll see the same birds for quite a few years. We named the ones we can positively I.D. There's Marsha, Jan, Cindy, Greg, Bobby, and Alice. Sam, Peter, and Tiger didn't come back this year."

Clearly no one else in the group thought anything of the names that Anne was rattling off.

Marshall smiled again, his big beaming smile. "That's why we called the Biodiversity lab. Last year our birds were a bit off. But this is way out of our league." He grabbed her by the arm, but by now she took it as a good sign, "Do you want to go see them?"

She nodded, and Weston rummaged through his backpack to come up with a bright blue ABA hat, which he held out to her. "I thought you might like a hat. We have Lyme ticks."

"Thank you, Weston." Before she knew it, she was in the back woods of Georgia, in eighty-five degree heat, and eighty-five percent humidity, trailing a team of birdwatchers. They laughed, and she didn't even ask as they pointed out Boss Hog and Roscoe, two woodpeckers who were squabbling over a nearby tree.

IT WAS TWO A.M. WHEN Jillian spotted Jordan at the airport curb. He stood with one bag over his shoulder and a carry-on just clinging to the tips of his fingers, looking much worse for the wear than she was.

Pulling up, she spilled out of the car, her arms offering up a hug, and immediately she saw the awkwardness of the move, but it was too late to stop herself. He was a co-worker, and not family. Even if she was here in the middle of the night.

Jordan was startled by the move, but he hugged her back, maybe even just a moment too long, clearly out of it, and she wouldn't have been surprised if he passed out right there in the pick-up lane. But he simply threw his bag into the backseat, and slid, bone weary, into the passenger side. "Thank you . . ."

If he was going to say something else, it was lost in the moments between starting the car, and her intense scrutiny of the few other vehicles in the pick-up lane while she tried to find her way back to the freeway. From the expression on his face and the way he hid it behind spread fingers, his cousin's death had been hard on him.

When he finally looked up, she handed him the extra soft drink she had gotten for him. "I don't know if you want this, maybe you just need to go home and pass out, but I was getting one anyway."

"No. I'm starving, actually. Thank you." He sighed, sucked down a good portion of the soda, and two seconds later started talking again. "I can order a pizza right now, right? Will you come up and share it with me? I need your help."

That pulled her brows together. He was tired and not in there. And he wanted her to come up for pizza in the middle of the night? But again she didn't get to say anything.

"Eddie had leukemia. But he died of a stomach flu that put him in a coma." Frustration carried bell-clear in the soft deep timbre of his voice.

"What? I don't know of any stomach flu that does that." She pulled up to the curb in front of his building.

"Exactly." He popped open the car door and retrieved his bag. "I alienated my family asking questions. All they know is that he's gone. His wife is right, I can't bring him back. But I can't answer any of the questions either. . . . And you probably really want to go home and get some sleep."

"Actually, I'm wide awake now. Buy me a pizza and tell me all about it." She closed her car door and turned the key, managing only a small wince in the still city night air as the horn beeped that the alarm was engaged.

In the elevator he rummaged through his carry-on bag, producing a heavy folder that looked at once brand-new and well-worn. Jillian took it from him, while he entered his unit and went around the small living/dining area, opening windows, and turning on lights and the fan. The first slight breeze hit her face and it occurred to her that it was stuffy in here, even for the middle of the night. She turned the file over. "This says the file was released to Dr. Jordan Abellard of the CDCP. . . . Did you use the CDC to get this?"

He shook his head. "I went in with Kelly's release form, she had put CDCP on it. I had my badge and they never questioned it."

"That's not really-"

"I know," He put his hands up in the air. "What do you want me to do? I never said anything, they assumed. And I had the complete file in my hands in under twenty minutes."

Jillian couldn't smother her smile. "I'm fine with that; I was just curious if you knew that it was against policy."

His stance relaxed. "So what do you like on your pizza?"

"Canadian bacon and pineapple--"

His face immediately told her that he didn't feel the same way about toppings.

So she continued. "But I'll eat pepperoni, or sausage or olives, or peppers."

He paced while he was on hold and she thumbed through the huge file; it would take hours just to see what was in there, but it wasn't like she had a busy social life demanding her time. After a few minutes she had found nothing unusual and Jordan was ordering. A few phrases broke through while she was reading. "... two-liter coke . . . large pizza . . . half Canadian-bacon and pineapple the other half . . ."

She smiled. By the time he was sitting next to her at the old coffee table she had made a once over. "It looks normal - for a leukemia patient - up until that last stomach flu. So fill me in on the rest."

"You got the basics from the file. There were a few scares, but he kept pulling through. He was in remission since this time last year." Jordan shoved his fingers through his hair. "It was the longest remission he had maintained over the five year course of the disease. His white count was normal up until the end. It was fine when he was brought in. It sounded like flu, but everything sounds like flu."

Her heart ached for him. It wasn't just a medical mystery he was trying to solve. Jillian couldn't remember him ever mentioning his cousin, but clearly Eddie's death had shaken him up. "You know, there may not be an answer."

"I know. It's just so odd. If it's a disease that took advantage of his weak immune system . . . I work for a company that has the foremost technology to prevent these kinds of things from happening." He shrugged.

Jillian began dismantling the large folder into sections by visit and series. She handed one chunk back to Jordan. "Tell me about him."

He shook his head. "Twenty-nine year old, Caucasian male, mild smoker, mild drinker--"

She cut him off. "No, really tell me. Where did he live? What is his place like? His family?"

Two hours later, she was exhausted.

Jordan probably would have been asleep except that he was pacing tracks into the carpet. "What do I do, Jilly?"

"Let's sleep now, and at noon, when we get in, we take it to Landerly."

• • • •

DAVID PUSHED HIS HAIR back off his face. In the wet wool of the thick air it clung like spiderwebs, giving him willies as he imagined the one thing he was really afraid of.

Greer laughed at him, his usual low chuckle when David's harsh personality amused him.

"What are you laughing at? You're okay because your people are from here, you darkie!"

"Dude, you are way messed up. My people are from Africa. Trust me, we aren't built for this kind of humidity." Greer never stopped his careful chipping at the rock beneath him.

"At least your hair sticks up and out of the way."

"Yup. Which is the reason my race is superior and yours felt the need to better yourselves by enslaving us."

David also never took his eyes off the ground layer beneath them. There was no good comeback, and so he avoided one all together, the conversation trickling off to nothing while they worked.

There was water making constant background static nearby, and a damned obnoxious bird that had a call that just never quit. God had been laughing when he put the lungs on that thing. Just as soon as it shut up another one would answer it.

Evidence of deer had been all over the first few days, and it had taken nearly a week to push back what time and the East Tennessee climate had done to the abandoned site.

It was slow going in the back woods, with the rustles of forest and the slope of the Appalachians beneath them. The only sound that broke the peace was the two men calling each other names and the high 'ching' of the tiny picks striking rock. Neither of them had the easy swing of a student, so the calls of the birds were periodically interrupted by the sharp screech of metal glancing off rock followed by a colorful string of swear words. Then, after a brief pause, nature would resume its noise, hiding the fact that they were there from the cities and homes not that far away.

"Greer, this one's for you." Carter brushed off his knees, and stood, not cursing out loud this time. The pain in his joints that told of age was not anything he wished to acknowledge to the world.

"What is it?"

"Fuck if I know. It's a bone, maybe it's a damn trilobite. If you're lucky it's one of your lizards."

He heard the edge in David's voice. "Dinosaurs aren't lizards. You know it, I've told you that."

"Ah." David stood and stretched his hands over his head, taking in the thick mass of tall trees and virtually untouched wilderness that enclosed them. "That would imply that I listen to you."

He tried not to let his legs give him away as he moved to a new spot that had looked interesting. But, even from where he was bent over his dig, Greer saw it. "Well listen to this, my honky friend: I'm bigger than you, and stronger than you, and -" he pointed his pick at David's knees, "not nearly as arthritic as you. So don't call my dinos lizards. It's insulting."

"Hey Greer, you do know that all your dinos died, right? That means that you're studying an animal that is gone, gone, gone, and won't ever come back. You have a totally useless profession."

Greer snorted. "Dude, you think the limestone you hold is going to reveal anything other than what happened a zillion years ago?"

David held up one chunk that he had extracted, and smiled. "This baby can tell the future."

"Well, you just tell me what your Magic Eight Ball there says."

"We're headed for another polarity shift." David smiled. There he'd said it, out loud, even if it was only to Greer.

But Greer snorted again. "Yeah, in another million years." He pushed himself to his feet and dusted off. "Be sure to let me know how that pans out for you."

David started carefully picking his way through the grid lines. "Just go play with your petrified lizard."

But Greer was already standing over it looking down, trying to figure what the piece that David's pick had revealed might be. He turned his head one way then another, before sliding the instrument into the hammer-loop of his carpenter jeans and pulling out a smaller, lighter one from a deep pocket somewhere. His voice was no longer the one that insulted David, but a little more thoughtful. "There's a good chance this dig will help us solidify the dinosaur-therapsid link."

"Us? I don't need a link."

"Us paleontologists." Greer knelt down and spoke to the small whitish smooth piece buried within the packed limestone, "Come to Papa." He took a few small swings at the peripheries before speaking to David. "Actually, you do need a dino-therapsid link. The therapsids were dinosaur-like pre-mammals and warm-blooded to boot. Which means they are absolutely pertinent to you, Mr. Mammal."

“Like I care about the distinction between dinos and lizards and theradons-”

“Therapsids.”

“Exactly, I don't care. My kind survived. Me and my mammal friends.”

David could see the edges of Greer's smile even though he was bent over, softly chipping at the rock. “Come to think, I'm not so sure that you are a mammal. Mammals are warm-blooded.”

“Ohhhhhh.” David drolled out the monotone. “That was low, Greer.” Then he smiled. “Congratulations, I didn't think you had it in you. I thought maybe ‘honky’ was the best you could do.”

“At least I don't have to carry limestone in my pockets. Seems to me that's the only rocks swinging in your pants.”

David turned to look at his friend, but Greer was on his hands and knees, and all he could see was an eyeful of upturned ass. So he looked away. “You're sooo funny.”

But Greer didn't seem to hear him. At least, he didn't respond. So, bending over, David went back to reading the tags hanging off the intersecting lines in the grid he and Greer had painstakingly mapped. They had tried to match it to the original site that Wharton had laid out, and they'd gotten damned close as best as they could tell.

He turned to find the specimens that matched this location and came back with a few zipper baggies heavy in his hands. Wharton would kill if he knew that Carter was at this site. More specifically he would kill David. And bring shame upon his father. Ah, well. Wharton could go to hell. He was the one who had missed the geologic hotspot here. More the fool he.

Turning the baggies over in his hands, David read the markings through the clear plastic. The KT boundary here was much closer to the surface, much of geological evidence of the past washed away by wind and time. The Appalachians were much older than the Rockies, the fault lines here all but inactive, and so they had been worn smooth and low, exposing things to the surface, or hiding them just barely underneath. For him and Greer to come and pick at.

“Sweet!” The exclamation came from the spot he had abandoned to Greer moments before. “This was worth leaving my pregnant wife at home.”

“That ain't saying much.” Carter could hear the drawl developing in his voice, not that they spoke to much of anyone around here. But like the humidity, the accents were so thick in this part of the state that you couldn't help but absorb it. Like some communicable disease. “What'd you find? Petrified turd?”

“Dude, you have no sense at all. It's an egg, maybe a whole nest, so back off.” The steady sound of the light pick striking stone picked up again as Greer tried to unearth his find.

For the briefest of moments David wished for a team, where he and Greer could lead like they usually did, and have other people do the labor, the intensive and time-consuming picking and brushing and getting things out. But then he remembered why they were here alone; they had to be.

Another baggie with another set of markings was telling the same story. The polarity here was reversed. This specimen from just at the KT boundary had a clear magnetic direction. But when it was lined up with the site, north was south and south was north. Wharton had fucked up. And David was more than certain that he had dug up another hotspot. He tried to keep his breathing regular even as he felt his stomach roll over.

Greer let up a cheer as he unearthed something that would interest only him, so David just pressed his hand to his middle hoping to quell the churning there and did his best to ignore all of it. Damned birds started up again, and to add insult to injury a woodpecker started in on a nearby tree. He was only familiar with the Woody Woodpecker variety, so with a great sigh of misery, David lifted his head to see if he could see the thing. Sure enough it was racking its head at jackhammer speed against a trunk, but luckily no obnoxious laughter emerged.

At this point the Deep South was so disturbing to him that he wouldn't have been surprised if Injuns had popped out from behind the tall oaks with feathers in their hair, and looking for scalps. Or maybe the deer could just come out and do a tap dance.

He had his hotspot, he knew it. Soon he'd be able to leave the land that time forgot. He just needed to unearth enough evidence so that there could be no argument. If Greer found a tie between the hotspots and the dieout times, well . . . there was no telling where it might go. Except that they would get themselves immortalized in every high school science textbook.

Carter needed more evidence. The rest of the world might not know what he knew in his gut. It was here and he was standing on top of it.

So he lowered himself to his knees and hunched-over again, and began wounding the earth beneath him, just a little more.

• • • •

“BOTULISM, BOTULISM, and botulism” had been Jordan's guess on the caseload that morning. Yesterday they had arrived at two in the afternoon, squinting in the bright sun, and trying to look like they hadn't slept sideways on his couch, Eddie's file dangling from their sleep slackened fingertips.

So the guess hadn't been very exuberant. It hadn't been creative. And it sure as hell hadn't been right. Jordan figured one of these days he had to hit. But then he began the worrying: Would he die of boredom writing reports about food poisoning while he never figured out what happened to Eddie?

And why the hell did old man Landerly have to pick this week of all weeks to leave town? He was barely able to get around the office some days, so what was he doing climbing on a 747 and hitting the beach? Just when he was needed, too.

He hadn't said anything, but Jillian's voice cut into his thoughts, so accurate that for a moment he wasn't sure that she was actually speaking, “He'll be back in a few days. Eddie's file won't change in that time.”

He did look up to nod and force a small half-smile as thanks for her concern. Today she was well put together, her dark hair drawn back away from her face in a tight clip. Her usual look for the office. Her clothing was getting more casual, and she was questioning him less and less as she worked. She churned out files like she was writing emails to friends. And she didn't question why his pace had ground to a near halt.

A few blinks and he tried to clear his head. A quick scan down to the bottom of the front page showed that it was not, in fact, anything like botulism. He had a clear cut case of Legionnaire's Disease in his hot little hands and he had stared at it blankly for half an hour.

Something pestered him while he began to slowly type, tabbing across the open fields on the computer screen, inputting bits of information here and there. And . . .

Jilly was watching him. Her keys didn't click, they had stopped some time ago, and that's what was bothering him. Just as his eyes lifted to meet her gaze, she spoke up. “Let's go get lunch. My treat.”

He shook his head. “I'm not keeping up, I'm just going to eat out of the vending machines. I just need to get back into the groove of things.” Why he wasn't already in the groove of it, after a full day back, was beyond him though.

“No you won't-”

“Thanks for the vote of confidence, doll.” But even though he had refused verbally, Jillian was walking around the large desk, shedding her labcoat and dropping it onto a hook on the old curly coatstand shoved into the corner of the room. But the cubby of an office was so small it was all in arms reach.

“You need chicken nuggets.” Her smile got wider. “You’re frustrated because you lost someone you’ve been trained to save, and not only weren’t you there, you still can’t figure out what went wrong. And I can’t figure it out for you. And to make matters worse, Landerly is suddenly out of town, so you can’t get answers from the one person who might be able to provide them. But I can buy you chicken nuggets and I can help take up the slack a little so you can figure things out.” With a small shrug she dismissed her own generosity for nothing.

She had his hand in hers, although he was unsure when it had gotten there. And suddenly it seemed like a rather intimate gesture. When added in to the fact that she had just put to words what was eating at him, he couldn’t stop the curl of his fingers around the heat she offered with just her hand. He couldn’t stop the first smile he had formed all day, and he let her lean her full weight back as she made the motions of pulling him up from his seat.

They didn’t speak on the way over, and he let her order for him, not surprised that she knew exactly what he wanted; they’d been here at least six times in the past month and he hadn’t varied his order at all. So he tried not to dwell on Eddie. And three empty sauce containers later, he asked her, “So what did you find in the reports today? Botulism?”

She shook her head, knowing that she had blasted his predictions all to hell. “Salmonella-” Her voice kept his mind from wandering too far astray, “Then there were the three old people in the nursing home. Some sort of vague guess at a staph infection. It killed them but there was no real conclusive evidence-”

He looked up because her voice had just trailed off. Jilly’s mouth hung in a small open ‘o’, her blue eyes focused somewhere beyond his shoulder. The gears working in her brain were visible and he waited her out. The tension he hadn’t realized he was carrying tightening in his muscles every second. But he didn’t push her to voice her reasoning.

Briefly it flashed across his thoughts again that he hadn’t been hired to be the brilliant theorist. And if she was both the workhorse and the genius then perhaps he was just window dressing. Her lip turned in, and just as he had leaned all the way forward, waiting on edge for whatever she was going to announce, she looked at him and spoke. “Jordan, we have to go back and double check that file.”

Becky sank into her wooden swivel chair, with her head cradled in her hands. Warden hadn't let up on her regular load because of the frogs. Never mind that investigating animal oddities was what the Biodiversity lab was set up to do. Never mind that she had stayed and kept the paper with the university. Warden seemed to begrudge her the find because it had been hers. Angry birds here, creepy frogs there, it was all too much.

But-

Her head snapped up. Maybe . . .

Maybe there was a connection between the screwed up frogs and the screwed up birds. She worked on it for the rest of the day, trying to come up with some sort of link. Then drove most of the way home until her little Jetta sputtered and died on her. She trudged the last mile, and arrived weary in her soul, brain, and body. From where she threw open the front door, Becky could see that her mother was in the kitchen and Brandon and Melanie were playing with two frogs loose on the living room carpet. "Those better not be my frogs." It was meant to be a threat but she didn't really have the energy to back it.

"They are, but I'm supervising." The voice sounded so much like her Dad's that her head snapped up.

"Aaron!" She felt the smile spread across her face as she launched herself into his arms. Only two years older, Aaron had been her god since the day she was born. In her early teens, she had suffered through the indignities of having to share him with her friends. And later with having to share him with the town. Knoxville was like every other southern town. There were three religions: 'Baptist,' 'Football,' and 'Other,' in order of their likelihood of gaining you a spot in heaven. And Aaron had led the town to a state championship.

"Hey, Becky." His hair was blonde and short but his eyes were green moss just like hers. "Long time, no see."

"What are you doing here?"

"Just drove up for the weekend. And come to find out you've got yourself some weird little frogs." He looked over her shoulder, his eyes snapping wide. "Hey! Melanie! I told you two hands!"

That made Becky jerk her head around. Only to see Melanie roll her eyes and hold the frog out at arm's length wrapped in the short fingers of her right hand. She shook the frog slightly for emphasis as she spoke. "This is how you're supposed to hold them - with only one hand. Back fingers hold their legs down. Top finger and thumb hold their arms out, and they can't get away!" She rotated the frog to upside-down and back upright. It waved its hands but didn't accomplish much else. "Tell him, Becky."

Forced to display a small smile to Aaron, she conceded. "She's right." But then she turned back to her sister and with two hands slipped the frog from Melanie's grip into her own identical hold. "But you aren't supposed to flip them around like that."

"Whatever, they're so creepy anyway. I was just getting a lexan." With that the reprimand was dismissed and the little girl wandered off to get the plastic container. In a moment she held it up for Becky to slide the frog down in, head first, then snapped the container back closed.

Becky started when her mother spoke suddenly from directly behind them, and turned to find the woman using the same emphasizing hand gestures her younger daughter had just moments before, only with a spatula not a frog. “We’re really looking into sending her to that gifted school out in Cedar Bluff. They just opened that new Magnet Program out there.”

“NO!” It was earshattering and they all turned to stare at Melanie who had gone red in the face in the space of a breath. “I won’t go! I don’t want to ride the short bus!”

Becky shook her head, far more used to their little sister’s antics than Aaron ever would be. He had moved away to college the first chance he had gotten, his status of ‘Golden Boy’ eating at him in a way even Becky had never understood. He had been out of the house before Melanie came along and had never really gotten to see her full-fledged personality.

Letting herself sink down into one of the dining room chairs, Becky toed off her thick sneakers and let the feeling of relief soak into her feet. She leaned back and almost closed her eyes before she realized that Brandon was standing right beside her, clear tupper in hand, the frog inside pointed toward the window. Becky raised her eyebrows; too worn out to voice her question, she let it show on her face.

“Melanie got too mad to tell you what we discovered. Watch.” Brandon walked over to the refrigerator. Becky tilted her head to see, but expected nothing other than the appearance of a moldy ham sandwich. He placed the lexan flush against the fridge and waited.

Slowly, the frog turned to face the old white unit. When he pulled the container away, the little fellow re-oriented to his original direction. He put it back and the frog turned again to face the fridge. Waving his hands like some demented magician, Brandon declared it “Cool, huh?” Then gave his theory. “I think he’s hungry see. . . Melanie says that’s not it, but she’ll see. Can I give him pizza?”

“No!” But her brows were pulled together and she was out of her chair in her bare feet, traipsing over to where he stood, her fatigue dismissed in the wake of her growing curiosity.

Trying it herself, Becky kneeled in front of the fridge and moved the container slowly towards and away from the white door. Her frown deepened as the frog made the same subtle adjustments every time.

“For god’s sakes Becky, I need to get the margarine.” Her mother tapped her foot impatiently behind her, not at all moved by the new level of oddity displayed by her catch.

Obligingly, she stood up and went in search of other objects the frog might turn to. She started toward the TV, which Brandon pertly informed her wouldn’t work. He grinned like a praised puppy when it didn’t. “It’s just the fridge.”

But Becky didn’t believe that. There had to be something else. But she just wasn’t sure what. She traipsed through the house, testing every large object she could think of. Aaron dogged her heels, for once following her to see what she would come up with next.

They were all three piled behind the front door watching the frog shuffle uncomfortably, waiting to see if it would change direction or settle into its familiar line. None of them heard the door click and all three fell into a startled heap when Mr. Sorenson opened the door onto them.

Melanie came bouncing over the pile of bodies struggling to right themselves, “Daddy, Daddy, you’re home!”

“Yes, I am.” He grabbed up his youngest and stepped gingerly over his other children, trying to gracefully right themselves. “Were you all so anxious to see me?”

Aaron shrugged, and Becky was amazed to watch the transformation from grown man to child that was so rapid across his features. “We were just checking out Becky’s weird frogs.”

Her father’s eyes caught her gaze. “Is it something new?”

“Yes! Daddy, Yes!” Melanie bounced in his arms. “They turn toward the fridge!”

Becky decided to be grateful her sister was no longer sulking in her room, withholding what might be valuable information, and she held the frog next to the oven. It stayed in its normal direction. Becky swore under her breath, dropping her behavior marks another few notches. But at the top of the oven, the little guy turned. He turned toward the washer and dryer, too.

“I know what it is!” She yelled out as she turned and smacked square into Aaron’s chest.

• • • •

“WHERE’S LANDERLY’S signature?” Anne shook her pretty little blonde head as she poured over the forms in front of her.

Jordan smiled and pointed. He was afraid his expression screamed ‘It’s a forgery’. He had vetoed Jillian standing beside him at this point, so she didn’t have to be here for this display of fraud. Also because she was a really terrible liar.

Anne giggled. “The way you’re grinning at me, and the number of times this thing’s been through a fax . . . you could have forged this.”

“I didn’t forge it.” The irritation that the difficult-to-read signature was his work was genuine. He hadn’t forged it. Jillian had.

But Anne just giggled again and entered the data. “It’ll be about half an hour.”

He raised his eyebrows, not giving voice to all the questions he desperately wanted to ask, but couldn’t because they’d give him away like a neon sign. Was she going to call to corroborate with Landerly? She had already made a comment about forgeries. Was she going to run it by the higher ups?

“Yeah, I can’t whip up a plane ticket out of thin air.” She giggled again, and as much as it reassured Jordan that she was dumb enough that he just might pull this off, it also was beginning to annoy the hell out of him.

“Thanks, babe.” He turned and walked away, not getting to see her response. Babe? He winced inwardly and went back to his desk. He already knew what would happen if they were found out. Landerly had told them that first day that the CDC would just send them into the Ebola lab without suits. His breathing picked up.

Just as he entered his cubby hole of an office and leaned wearily back against the inside wall, his leg vibrated, scaring the shit out of him. But it was just his cell phone, and as he held up the display panel he realized that it was Jillian. “Hi.”

Her panic radiated through the phone even before she spoke, poor thing. “Jordan, are you okay? They didn’t find out did they?”

“No. Our flights will be ready in about half an hour.”

“Where are you going?” The voice was masculine, and coming from behind him. In that first split second Jordan schooled himself to a calm response.

“You startled me.” Turning, he saw it was Mark from the lab. “We’re going to Florida.”

Mark nodded in understanding, although just what he understood was beyond Jordan’s capabilities. “Spiderbite-girl having a relapse?”

“Nope, something new. . .” He stopped himself before launching into an explanation; it would just be more to get tangled in later. Offering a smile, he turned his attention back to the conversation with Jillian, and ended it as quickly as possible in hopes of avoiding other such scares.

Mark simply wished him good luck, and turned to go. Or so he thought. Again the voice startled him. “Is Dr. Brookwood going with you?”

“Hm?” It came out before he put the pieces together. Jillian. “Yes, she is.” As he went back to his sorting, it occurred to him to add up Mark’s actions over the last few weeks: it equaled a crush on Jillian. But Jillian would never put up with that shuffling walk. No authority.

The desk phone yelled at him, an angry electronic buzz that was supposed to resemble a bell ringing. He answered it gruffly just to stop the noise. Realizing only as he got the phone to his ear, that there was every possibility that it was Landerly, calling to check up on them. Perhaps having noticed the, oh say, thirty fax pages he had received from them before they went about forging his signature.

“Dr. Abellard.” The wispy quality and lilt of the voice dispelled any of those fears in less than the time it had taken them to form. “This is Anne, at reception. Travel has confirmed your flights. You leave in three hours.”

“Thank you, Anne.” He pinched the bridge of his nose, glad that the one thing keeping him here was finished. He wanted to get away and hide from the people he was cheating. Maybe he could be on the plane before anyone figured out what was going on. “I’ll be by within the next ten minutes.”

No, they wouldn’t get caught. Landerly wasn’t going to be back for another week and they would be back before then; no one would be the wiser. And even Jillian thought she could justify the trip after the fact. Landerly listened to her.

He grabbed his briefcase, and hefted it to the desk, stuffing in the extra files. It brimmed already with all the paperwork he could find on Eddie and Lake James’ medical history. He gave only the barest of smiles to Anne as he breezed by the front desk. Her voice trailed him down the hall like so much cheap perfume, “Have a good trip Dr. Abellard!” Jeez, could she yell it next time? Hope that forgery pans out for you!

But he stuck his badge on the reader at the front door without unclipping it and waited the short eternity for the computer to decide that he deserved to leave and then actually slide the glass doors open. It was all he could do not to squeeze through sideways the instant a crack appeared.

The afternoon sun hit him full force, blinding him almost as thoroughly as it would after a matinee movie. He blinked rapidly to clear his vision, knowing full well that his sight adjusting was a matter of time and not moisture. He was basically tear free by the time he popped open the door of his overly blue Cavalier. He should get a better car. But that would happen a lot easier once his student loans were paid off. And that was a minimum of a few years away. He shoved the car into drive and left the building that was threatening to reveal his secrets to his bosses.

He dug his cell phone out of his pants pocket and depressed his #2 speed dial while he was waiting to merge onto the freeway. “Hi, Jillian. . . I’m out. Our flight is at seven-fifteen. . . . we get into Sarasota-Bradenton Airport at midnightish, . . . yeah, I’ll come by your place. . . . All right, Bye.” Traffic was getting heavier and he was glad to hang up.

But a conversation would have been preferable to the thoughts running through his head. Landerly would call from Hawaii. Or he would see his pager had gone off and all the numbers were the same. And when he did finally call in Jordan and Jilly would be gone. Bad move.

He pulled out the cell and held it at arm’s length in front of him, carefully feeling his way around the number pad. “Hi, Anne, can I ask you a favor? Can you forward all the calls to my office to my cell phone?”

“What about the calls for Dr. Brookwood?” He could hear her eyelashes beating a steady rhythm just from her voice.

“She’ll be with me, so they can all come to my cell.”

And he gave her the number and hung up feeling much better, until he realized that he'd given Anne his personal number. He just prayed that he hadn't given her any ideas.

His apartment seemed to be about ten miles further away than he remembered it. Crime sure did find a way of turning you upside down. And once he was there he wasn't really sure what to pack. So he threw in all the same things he had packed for his earlier trip to Florida and headed out to Jillian's.

He parked on the curb and buzzed her apartment, leaving his bag in the back seat. She didn't even answer the ring. Instantly the door began to buzz, and he followed the sound inside. Jordan jogged up the stairs hoping to burn off some extra energy. It didn't work, and coming face to face with Jillian, her hall door flung wide, didn't help him calm down either.

She was taking deep breaths and talking. Almost to him, . . . maybe not. "Landerly told us that when we found an answer we would know it. And that he would back us when that time came. He wasn't available. No one else would help, we knew that. We can ask each of them in turn if they would have signed off on it. They'll say 'no'."

So he took her by her upper arms and guided her back into the small apartment, "Jillian, calm down. We're going to be fine. We aren't going to get fired, for all the reasons you just listed." He breathed in. "Take a deep breath." And he waited until she did, "Now, we have to leave. Are you ready?"

She just nodded and started to reach for her bag, then fumbled with the lock to her front door.

"Jillian, if you don't calm down, they're going to detain us at the airport for being suspicious."

"Huh?" Her whole body stilled. "I was a cheerleader and a girl scout. I couldn't possibly be a terrorist."

He laughed. "Actually that would make you the ideal terrorist. So pull it together."

She laughed with him, the first easy, relaxed sound he had heard from her since they had hatched this horrible plan over lunch. And she managed to keep herself steady and calm, even when security did an open check on her bags. For the briefest of moments Jordan wondered if they would pull out anything good, like a vibrator or a chain of foil condom packets. But no, there was a novel and a bunch of photocopied files that he was pretty certain represented cases that she had searched and pulled together.

They made it to the terminal just as loading was beginning and joined all the other fliers funneling themselves down to the gate like so many cows to the slaughter. Once they were at their row, he made Jillian give up the window seat, arguing that she had slept through every single flight the last time. He didn't add that he had never gotten to fly until he was an adult paying his own way. The window still held a kind of magic for him that had worn off most middle-class kids by the age where they could read the take-off time on cartoon watches. And sure enough, even as he watched the houses and freeways below getting smaller and smaller, he felt the soft weight of her head settling on his shoulder, and the swish of her hair, unbound, falling across her face.

• • • •

BECKY'S EYES ADJUSTED to where Aaron swung the highbeam, lighting the whole area in front of them to ghastly shades of bright and black. All the shadows of midnight remained, just thoroughly delineated by the overpowering light. It became even creepier when they entered the woods at the back side of the field.

She started talking just to quell the feeling that she was walking where she didn't belong and where she was unwanted. "So how has--"

So did Aaron. "How do these frogs do?"

They laughed together, then she let him finish asking about her catch. "These are rana. A genus that really includes all your garden variety frogs, no bullfrogs though. They're indicator species - really sensitive to the environment. They'll mutate, like my little guys, really quick, if anything is off. You know, radiation, pollution, that kind of thing. Or magnetics."

"So, what is this then? We're visiting a polluted frog spot in the middle of the night, that might be loaded with radiation from the power plant?"

"I thought of Oak Ridge, too. They actually do grow some creepy frogs out that way sometimes. But they're on the other side of the town from us, and they tend to hop down towards Chattanooga."

"How comforting." He muttered.

She maneuvered around behind him, disliking how her own shadow gave her such a case of the creeps. "I checked them all out at school with a Geiger-counter and got nothing. Like almost zilch. I mean you would register on these meters, they're that sensitive."

"All right." He raised the light, letting her decide which path to take, and even though it didn't look anything like it did during the day, she instinctively knew which way to go.

"So, anyway, other than the fact that they have spare legs, and are all from this one spot, I've got nothing." She took another long pull on the coke she carried with her. "That is, until tonight I had nothing."

"But what is it? Are all frogs magnetic and yours are just backward?"

"Nope, I've never heard of it in frogs." They were getting close, the tiny creek making burbling noises even at this late hour, and the local frogs raising their voices in a hellish chorus.

"So why would these frogs be magnetic?"

"Other animals are." She raised the compass in her palm, angling it to catch the light, and read it. Still in the right direction. No worries there. Yet. She kept up her chatter with Aaron, they were getting close and she was nervous about what she might find out. "Bees are, and so are homing pigeons."

"Not enough to stick to the refrigerator."

"You're sooo funny - Aaron, look!" She held up the compass. The needle had flopped to the opposite direction. She stepped backwards retracing her steps out of the area where she had first found the freaky little frogs. The needle swung back to the correct orientation.

"Sweet Jesus." As she walked back and forth, it changed. To exactly the opposite direction. Sure she wasn't seeing it right, she lifted her head to ask her brother to shine the light over her way and was met with a blinding glare. For a moment she had visions that the sheriff had found them and was going to haul them in, cuffs and cruiser and all. Although they were on their own property and all they could be cited for was leaving the car by the side of the road.

In a second Aaron was at her side and the blinding glare was gone, directed down at the face of the compass, leaving her completely unable to distinguish anything beyond the borders of the light. Back and forth they walked for a minute or two, mesmerized by the swing of the needle. Then Becky pulled him forward to the edge of the stream and the spot where she and Brandon had caught all the frogs.

The needle stayed re-oriented. North was south and south was north. "This is where we caught them." She shoved up her sleeve and slowly bent over, sinking her hand into the cold water. The forest around them was now quiet, except for the wild trickle of the creek. It had no instincts and didn't know that something was amiss with all this bright light in the middle of the dark. But the frogs knew, and Becky could spot their shapes under the edges of the bumps and eddies. Their little noses and eyes stuck up above the surface, trying to catch a breath, and yet be still enough to thwart the predator.

But Becky got lucky, and in a moment she had reached down and slowly wrapped her hand around one of the little guys thinking he had it made by being motionless. She held up her catch, even as the nearby frogs scattered away from the site of the latest loss of their brethren. “Look Aaron, four back legs.”

When she finished pulling up several six-legged frogs, she wandered the area using the compass as a guide, certain that some large object was buried here. Sighing, she was grateful again that Aaron was a lawyer. “What if whatever’s here is government? Can they keep me from publishing my findings?”

“Huh?”

“If this is a dump site, you know, for some magnetic ore, or there’s a secret lab under the ground,” Okay, now she was getting really far-fetched, “well, would they be able to stop me from writing this up and letting the world know?”

He thought for a moment. “No, we’re on our own land. I don’t think they have any legal recourse. But if you have skeletons in your closet that they might blackmail you with, who knows?”

She laughed with him. “I don’t have a boyfriend. I don’t even steal paperclips from the school, and I’ve never made one of those freaky sex tapes.”

“Don’t let Mom and Dad even know that you know what those are.”

“No joke.” She crossed the stream on large stones that she had put there years ago and wandered through the woods, crashing through underbrush and sounding much like the Jolly Green Giant. She was half trying to convince herself that it was just the unearthly silence that made it sound that way. If Satan himself rose up before her, she couldn’t say that she would be too shocked. But just then the compass needle jumped.

Becky startled, then walked back and forth a few times, using the sway of the thin red magnet to get a feel for the edge of the spot. “Aaron.”

“Hm?” He looked up from his musings. “What?”

“We need to go get stakes and a . . . that yellow police tape stuff. There’s a clear boundary here. We can mark it.”

“But not now.” He refused, and once he shined the light back the way they had come, she had no choice but to follow or be abandoned to the noise and the blackness.

• • • •

“OH WE WEREN’T EXPECTING you.” It was Maddie, according to her nametag.

Jillian just smiled. She wasn’t half bad at this lying. “Really? I’m sorry. Our secretary was supposed to let you know that we’re following up the interviews done by Drs. Smith and Webber.” Maddie was Maddie Levinson. She and her husband owned and ran the Levinson Home for the Aged.

The round-faced woman just smiled and stepped back, holding the door open for them. “Well, you’re here now.” She seemed perfectly content to let them come in and reassess the place. Which clicked in Jillian’s mind as a good thing. If they were trying to cover up elder-abuse or something, the case for a new disease would never hold.

Jordan trailed her in and she introduced both herself and him to the woman’s husband, who was just as round and polyestered as she was. They had the same pie-faced smiles that ultimately seemed kind and gentle. A visual sweep of the area made it clear that this was a home that had been converted to a care facility. She’d read beforehand that these two lived here, twenty-four seven. “We would love to comb through your patient records, if we could. Maybe we could just stay out of your way.”

But she had barely gotten the last word out when Jordan started speaking over her. “We just think that there might be something new here, and we want to be certain that it gets identified and stopped. I know the last CDC team suggested a staph infection-”

And for the first time the sweet moon face looked disgruntled. “I just don’t know how that could have happened. We’re so. . . . it sure hasn’t happened again, if that’s what you’re afraid of.”

Jordan stepped close and put his arm on the woman’s shoulder, leading her to sit at her own breakfast table where he pulled a seat a little closer. “When Dr. Brookwood and I reviewed the file, we didn’t feel it was a staph infection at all. There wasn’t any evidence of it; they just couldn’t find anything else.” His hand covered the older woman’s, calming her immeasurably by that simple, unforward touch. Jillian watched the changes in her with awe. “Jillian is right.”

She couldn’t believe he had used her first name. Not that she was angry, but she didn’t understand. It was all about being professional, right? And having no clue where he was going, she decided to step back and let Jordan ride the wave he had created.

“We’ll want to go through all the old records like the other team. But beyond that, we’ll need some time to talk to you. Maybe you can tell us something that isn’t in the records.”

Maddie balked a little, “We keep very thorough records.”

Jordan didn’t even try to argue that one. “I’ve seen them, they’re some of the best in the business, but there are other things that you’d never think were medical, things that only a close caretaker, like yourselves, might notice. Any information you can give us would only help.”

Arthur Levinson, ‘Art’ by his nametag, finally spoke up, but only to talk to his wife. “Honey, why don’t you help them get the files and I’ll serve breakfast.”

And with that Maddie led them down the hall and unlocked a large, very neat office with mauve frills above the windows and ducks walking around the border at the top of the room. Walls of cheap, black file cabinets surrounded them, each carefully labeled and clearly locked. Mrs. Levinson let them know they were welcome to anything they wanted to peruse and, smiling at Jordan, handed over the small key ring labeled ‘office’ and asked what she could bring them to drink, or if they wanted a danish?

God, that was Jordan for you. Five minutes and any woman would be eating out of his hand. Look at the way he had worked over Anne at the front desk. Jillian was glad she wasn’t that kind of girl. But here they were - in the office, with all the files at their disposal. And coffee on the way. Sweet deal.

She took a deep breath. “Let’s get to work.”

“Roommates?” Jordan asked, not looking up from the labels on the file drawers.

It was Maddie’s voice that answered. “The roommates of our members who got sick? Well, there’s Mildred Hartford. She’s still here in the green room.” She paused while Jillian started scribbling furiously on her notepad, “third down the hall on the right. She was Joseph Finklestein’s roommate.”

Maddie continued - the second roommate was in the hospital in Sarasota with a broken hip. And the third roommate had moved to another home after developing a more severe case of emphysema. But Mrs. Levinson said she had numbers to reach all the current caretakers. Then she named names and rattled the numbers off from memory, impressing the hell out of Jillian.

Three hours later Jillian had about thirty folders pulled and open in various states of disarray around her. Jordan had about twenty more. They were getting somewhere. But God, if she had to look at these cream-colored walls for five more minutes she was going to spontaneously combust. “Jordan?”

“Hmm?”

He didn’t look up from where he hunched over the files on the floor. He had graciously insisted that she take the only desk space. But in the hours in between he had sprawled, his jacket getting hung up over the inside doorknob, his tie loosening then disappearing. Now his sleeves were rolled up and he was in some unnatural position, chewing on the end of his red pen.

“I don’t know about you, but I need lunch.” She stood and stretched, ignoring the fact that her suit was wrinkled. That was okay, it wasn’t designed for stretching either.

When they finally pulled out of the driveway, they both began talking at once. “I think it’s a-”

“I’m positive it wasn’t staph.”

“Me, too.” She sighed, running her hand over her hair, smartly pulled back into a ponytail that looked as professional as a ponytail could.

“There’s no positive culture and nothing to link the three patients. No chain of infection.” Jordan looked out the window at the passing communities of cookie-cutter bungalows, all labeled as “Sunset” this or “Retirement” that. “And I don’t know if you’ve watched these guys . . .” he trailed off and waited for her to shake her head. Of course Jordan had observed them in action. She wasn’t sure why the thought hadn’t even occurred to her. “They are fastidious. Every injection clean. Every surface wiped down. Hugs and touching all the time, but I have never seen two people wash their hands so much.” He sighed, slumping a little lower into his seat.

“Do you think it was all just for show?”

“No way.” He turned to look at her, not doing his part to help find food anymore. “We walked in here, unannounced, just as we planned. There were already hand sanitizer bottles everywhere, sharps containers in every room, and if you noticed, both the Levinsons have very chapped hands, indicating this handwashing was going on long before we got there.”

Of course she hadn’t noticed.

What she did notice was a small sub stand with a name she didn’t recognize, and she pulled into the lot and climbed out. “None of the roommates has anything even resembling this. I called the nursing home and the hospital for the two that are gone. The hospital is ready to send the broken hip back to the Levinsons for the remainder of care.” She didn’t stop talking while she read the menu up and down. “So there’s nothing there to indicate it being airborne.”

Jordan sighed and pushed both his hands through his hair, adding his order right on the tail end of hers. Only his was twice as big. “They have all the same symptoms that Eddie did. I don’t get it.”

Jillian waited until they were seated and Jordan had his head turned sideways, taking a huge sharklike bite from the sub. “They were the three most immuno-compromised patients in the home at the time.”

That made Jordan look up. But she still didn’t pick up her sandwich. “And get this: Bertha Martin was a leukemia survivor.”

• • • •

BECKY THOUGHT THEY probably looked odd, marching across the field, dressed for camping, snapping photos while they went. Melanie had suggested the disposable camera from the checkout at Home Depot this morning. And Becky had gotten two. You just never knew.

The real work was in getting all the equipment out there. Aaron had taken that upon himself; he looked like a hiker gone mad - or a serial killer - with the lumpy bags, the pack and the shovel. She,

Brandon and Melanie followed like ducks, holding clear lexans of frogs that were finally returning to their home. But just to visit.

Once they arrived at the site, the frogs were set down and they all went to work with the compasses they had picked up. Melanie swung her little hammer, pounding a stake meant to hold garden edging into the soft ground near the stream. With the small mallet she hit at it until it was low, or until she mistakenly whacked some part of her body and swore a word that Becky wasn't aware her sister knew.

Brandon was a more efficient force; he and Aaron both having seen the need for method early on. Baggy army pants oozing garden stakes, both guys walked a line designated by the compass in their left hand, periodically pulling a stake from some previously unused spot on their person and pounding it into the ground with one swift stroke. Of course, Brandon pulling stakes out of his pockets resembled a gunslinger, with a swagger and a little preening where Aaron was all efficiency of movement.

Aaron looked up at her right then. "Hey, Doctor Smartypants, get in here and help."

"Aye, aye!" She crossed the creek on the old stones and set about mapping the other side. Within half an hour, all the loose ends had met up and they had an oddly shaped circle. Becky set Melanie to winding the tape from spike to spike clearly delineating the magnetic boundary, while the rest of them wandered the site, eyes glued to compass needles, looking for any smaller spots of greater activity.

That was an exercise in futility. There was nothing. Well, it was all or nothing. No one spot that gave a greater reading, or even caused the compass needles to jump or shimmy. No such luck.

"Okay, guys." They lifted their heads from whatever they were meddling around with at the sound of her voice. "It's hokey pokey time. Put all the frogs in the circle."

Even Aaron got into it. Each of the four eagerly grabbed a lexan and walked inside the orange boundary. They each set down the tupper with a flourish and waited for . . . nothing.

"Anyone?" Becky whispered.

"Nothing." Aaron told her. His voice strong with certainty.

"Nothing." Brandon repeated, bell clear.

Becky felt her heart sink. She had thought surely bringing the frogs back here would accomplish something. Melanie's voice called out next. "Nothing! Nothing!"

That was a little too chipper. Wasn't it true that the really smart ones always cracked?

"They aren't doing anything Becky!"

"Duh, Dorko." Brandon sneered, standing guard over his frog, legs spread, fists on his hips, sneer worthy of the schoolyard. "They're just acting like normal frogs."

"And they aren't normal frogs!" Melanie was at a near fever pitch.

"Holy shit." Becky whispered. "She's right." The frogs were no longer orienting. Reaching down, she turned the container. Aside from the usual the-world-is-rotating-under-me shuffle that all frogs did, this one didn't do anything. It didn't re-orient northwest. "Turn your frogs!"

This time even Aaron and Brandon caught on. "Okay, this is just too freaky." Aaron looked up at her. "I like things neat and understandable. This is beyond my boundaries. Can I have these little green guys arrested for disorderly conduct?"

Becky laughed to herself. The disorderly conduct was what they were supposed to do. It was the lining-up-in-one-direction that was creepy.

She took a moment to write notes. Then had everyone take their frog out of the circle.

Alignment.

That got noted too.

Into the circle, in new spots, this time.

Disorder.

Out of the circle.

Alignment.

But this time there was more.

“Everyone, back in the circle.” At least they didn’t look at her like she was crazy. Something was drastically wrong in the spot where they were standing. Her breathing hitched.

“Okay, we’re going to take our frogs and walk out a bit.” Three nods. “Every one has compasses?” Three nods. “Good, now start walking, carefully, away from the site.”

She had lined each of them up in a different direction, so they backed out like four corners on a compass until Becky couldn’t see any of her siblings anymore. But, loud bunch that they were, vocal contact wasn’t an issue. She yelled out, “My frog is facing southwest. Aaron?”

“North-north-east.”

“Brandon?”

“South-east.”

“Melanie?”

“West!”

She hollered out to her sister, whose little voice was coming through the thick trees from somewhere on the left. “Melanie! Have you figured it out?”

“Yes! They’re all facing the site!”

Jordan scribbled furiously on the pages of loose leaf paper spread out on the floor of the office with the awful mauve accents. He and Jillian had been here for two days, and he was never happier to not have a laptop. He had survived med school, ridiculed for his handwritten notes, but remembered everything far better than if he had typed it. And now this spreadsheet was taking over its eighth page, and he never would have accomplished this with the best notebook program.

Jillian watched while he organized and wrote and drew arrows in multiple colors. He started thinking out loud, “Okay, recap: Joseph Finklestein had lupus, Bertha Martin was a leukemia survivor, and Beatrice Weitzman had a kidney transplant and was on immunosuppressive drugs.”

Jilly picked up. “No other transplant patients here, according to files, the Levinsons, and patient report. No HIV positive patients. No one even close in immuno-status. So that gives us a set-up but what is it?” She chewed on the end of the marker she was holding. Normally that would have driven him nuts to watch, but he was too keyed up. He couldn’t sleep last night. And now he was running on pure caffeine.

“Go over Eddie’s case with me.”

Jillian nodded and started rattling stats again. She was better at that than any doctor he had ever met. “Stomach ache, reported by wife, at seven days prior to death, vomiting at six days.”

Desperately, Jordan tried to push it out of his mind that this was Eddie she was so carefully reducing to a series of numbers and isolated incidents. But that was what would solve the case. “Admitted for dehydration, in E.R., at day five. Given IV fluids and Raglan for nausea. Seemed to be doing better but was mildly disoriented and complaining of sleepiness. Nurses report that he was very sleepy and slept a good portion of his time in the ward. Nothing unusual there.

“Files indicated normal white counts, CBC and full Chem Panel show nothing out of the ordinary, in fact all numbers are very normal. Day three, patient goes to sleep and wife reports that he’s difficult to rouse. After medical intervention, a CT scan is performed and it is determined that the patient slipped into coma during sleep. On day one patient is put on ventilation due to oxygen sats being under eighty-four percent, and on day zero, all brain activity stops, and staff performs heroic measures to no avail. Patient dies at 2p.m.”

Jordan sighed.

There wasn’t much he could do at this point except sigh. He had arrows drawn to and from what he knew. Joseph Finklestein hadn’t had vomiting. His decline had taken nine days from first complaint to death. He had died at the home, with a very short delay between slipping into a coma and simply passing away while waiting for transport to a full medical facility.

Jillian opened the reports again. “Aaagh.”

He looked up, hoping that it was a good ‘aaaagh’, but apparently it wasn’t. “These guys were on so much medication that you can’t tell what changed and what didn’t. Just tracking their medication would take a whole flow chart like that!”

“Then we do it.”

Her eyes widened, and she almost looked scared, which was about the funniest thing he had thought in days. Jillian scared of paperwork.

She begged, “Only if you do it. I can’t do that . . . whatever you’re drawing. I need a spreadsheet.”

“Can you do this on a spreadsheet?”

She shook her head, her mouth moving to the straw of the supersize coke she was drinking, while she rubbed the sides to remove the sweat. Her scrubs bore the stains from the water drips where she had rested the drink on her leg earlier, and in this heat he didn't blame her that she didn't care.

He sat up to be close and spoke low; he didn't want the Levinsons getting tipped off that this wasn't an official investigation. "We still have to get Landerly's signature on this. The only way I feel relatively assured that that will happen is with a solid diagnosis."

She nodded.

Her voice pitched lower as well, but for an entirely different reason. "Do you think we're seeing SuperAIDS?" She didn't want to scare the Levinsons.

"Shit." He barely breathed it. "I hadn't even thought of that." His pushed his fingers through his hair and looked again at the gaily colored chart. Immuno-compromised patients.

She shook her head. "The set-up is right. But the play-out isn't."

Jordan waited for her to continue, he agreed, but wondered if she was following the same angle as him. "Flu-like symptoms at onset match, but not the lack of time lag, although that's always been hypothesized as the new trick up the virus' sleeve. Then coma and death. The issue is, those cultures should have shown not just something but everything."

"Right, HIV doesn't kill you. It's what AIDS allows to get a foothold that kills. So, no superAIDS." He was on the floor again, spread out with his paper. He'd been here for their whole stay, getting more and more ragged looking. Jillian had stayed up at the desk, but her posture had gone to hell in a handbasket. She was slumped in the chair, bringing her head to the coke instead of vice versa. Her knees pressed together, and her sneakered feet turned at odd angles resting on the shaggy caramel carpet. Her right hand played incessantly with her ponytail and if her mouth wasn't speaking it was gnawing something, the straw, the poor pen. He'd never seen her like this.

Then again, they hadn't yet had anything they couldn't solve with a report and a spreadsheet before. The only real trip they had taken had involved a case with clear answers once they looked at it from a few angles. This they'd tipped over, looked underneath, and shaken down, and only the barest of glimpses of ideas were falling into place.

"Okay." It was just a small statement, made on a tiny breath, but it was the beginning of a change. He sat patiently while Jilly straightened herself, and pulled a well worn folder off the desk. "Clear out some papers, flow-chart-boy, here goes."

And she rattled off a list of about thirty medications, making him mark in a different color any that had been prescribed within the last month prior to death. Joseph Finklestein had two. Increased dose of Lipitor, and Prescription Naprosyn for pain, because Ibuprofen was upsetting his stomach. Bertha Martin had one, Cephalexin for an imagined ear infection. And Beatrice Weitzman had no new scrips in that time. Between the three of them they were on forty different medications, and the number was only that low because so many overlapped.

Jillian set down her soda with a clunk and opened Eddie's file, her fingers expertly shuffling through reams of loose paper, never letting any fall or even slip out of place. "Ready?"

She rattled off a short list. When she closed the file, Jilly joined him on the carpet, scanning the flow chart. She watched and pointed a few times while Jordan cross-referenced and drew marks and asterisks between any duplicated medications that showed up. But they didn't seem to yield any new information. So the nursing home victims had been old? They knew that already. Not a single medication or even medication category cross referenced to Eddie. Eddie was close to med free. They checked lifestyle markers then. But as expected, the three Levinson Home victims all cross categorized nearly perfectly. Leaving Eddie the outsider, and thus the key to the whole thing.

Jillian ran her fingers down the list again. “Cephalexin.” She pointed to Bertha’s quadrant of the chart. “Why was she on it?” She fingered open the chart and looked puzzled. “Ear infection. That’s probably what tipped them off to staph.” She thumbed through the tome, coming up with the prescription date. “No good indication of an ear infection though. ‘Mild redness’ that’s all.”

Jordan frowned. That bothered him for some reason he couldn’t put his finger on, and he followed a hunch out to the courtyard where Maddie Levinson was hosing down the plastic furniture. She smiled when he approached, which he had to admit was a very magnanimous gesture at this point. He and Jilly had taken over her office for three days now. But she just offered him lemonade and asked, “What can I help you with?”

“Do you have a minute? I’m looking for some of that personal information that I thought might not be found in a medical file.”

Her eyebrows raised, but she quickly set aside the hose and wiped down two chairs offering him the first before settling her large frame into the second. She still seemed wary until he asked the first question. “Bertha Martin was prescribed Cephalexin for an ear infection she didn’t seem to have, just five days before she died. Do you know why that was?”

Maddie laughed. A clear vibrant sound accompanied by her slapping her thigh. “Yes, I know why.” She wiped at her eye where a small tear had formed, although he wasn’t sure if she missed her houseguest or had just laughed too hard. “Bertha was ornery, at times. And she insisted she had an ear infection. Wouldn’t quit her caterwauling until the doc gave it to her. He finally relented. She’d had enough ear infections that she probably knew.”

“And Joseph Finklestein. He was changed from Ibuprofen to Naprosyn also within the last few days before his death. Why was that?”

Her expression sobered right up, and Jordan didn’t doubt that her answers were as accurate as any could be. She knew each of these patients, and he’d lay odds that the woman couldn’t do simple algebra but could rattle off every dose of every medication every patient here was on, and put even money that she still knew the old doses, too. “Joseph started getting headaches right then. We didn’t think anything of it at the time.”

“So he said the Motrin wasn’t really helping?”

She sighed, her shoulders doing a soft heave before she went on. “He didn’t really say it. He didn’t communicate well for the last several months. But he kept grabbing his head, rubbing his temples, and . . .” She couldn’t find the words so she showed Jordan. She shoved her shoulders up under her chin, and put her hands behind her ears, shoving them forward rubbing the bone where her skull met her neck.

He watched.

Headache, maybe. Ear pain. Maybe.

“Thank you, Maddie.” He stood and offered his hand, which she shook politely.

When he entered the office, Jillian looked up at him, and Jordan launched into a shortened version of his discussion with Maddie, ending it punctuated by Jillian’s “Wow.”

“Will you call my cousin Kelly and ask her if Eddie had ear pain?” He continued. “I think we can safely say that we have something new, that isn’t airborne, and we’ve been sitting in it for three days.”

• • • •

DAVID HUNG UP THE PHONE. He had to. His ears were ringing. If Greer so much as got one iota more excited the earth was going to shift on its axis. The eggs were a true find. A full clutch, almost all intact. Yada yada yada.

And McCann, Tennessee was a hotspot.

He turned over a specimen, eyeing it carefully. His old man would love to get his hands on this piece of history. But that was too damn bad.

The testing was showing up just like the Warren Fault pieces. Heavy iridium layer at the KT boundary. Reversed magnetics in all the pieces. What was killing him was the size of the spot. It seemed so small.

From his father's work he had believed, as his father always had, that the hotspots had to have a certain size, a critical mass, in order to carry a reversed magnetic field. Something there had to support it. Had to keep it out of alignment with the field of the earth as a whole. That implied some level of size.

But this didn't come anywhere near close.

He and Greer had practically gone door to door asking if anyone had an oil rig in their backyard, which had sounded retarded as all hell the first three times he asked. But sure enough, folks were friendly, and by the end of day three, they had awful stomach aches and forty-two core samples, giving David a nice view of the strata around his dig.

And here he sat. Wishing he had stayed longer. That he had known the horrible nausea and vomiting would disappear the next day. Because every oil well sample had come up negative. No magnetic reversals in any layer.

Add in that the lab staff had done the experiment blind. None of them knew what he was looking for. Just the series of tests, and that was it. So he sighed at the core samples. They had given up all their secrets like cheap whores. And he was done with it. Depressed almost to the point of tossing it at the trash.

While he had his hotspot, none of this was going to accomplish much more than remind everyone that his father had seen it first. Damn it.

• • • •

JORDAN PULLED HIS DECREPIT Chevy into the CDCP lot right behind Jilly's pert Rav4. They had stayed at her apartment last night, still going over the paperwork. Landerly would be back in a day. They had to get prepared to explain. To make their case and make it stick well enough to not get fired.

Together they had hovered over Jillian's computer, filling in the codes for the visit and symptoms. They labeled and sorted and listed evidence. They spent hours searching for linked cases and only came up with three in addition to the four they started with. And even those only looked similar. There wasn't any evidence that was close to conclusive. Then they wrote a paper for Landerly explaining why they had forged the signature. Documenting how many times and when they had tried to get it legitimately.

And here Jordan was: pulling into the parking lot, papers printed and sitting on the passenger seat beside him. Whether or not they would save his ass was still up in the air.

He and Jillian met again in between the cars where they parked. Took deep breaths together and then walked down the hall. Reaching the office felt like they crossed a finish line. Jordan wanted to hunch over and gulp air. He wasn't cut out for lying. Within a minute they silently took their seats and turned on the monitors on the desk, pulling up their files. Jillian looked up at him and smiled, her nod indicating that they were going to be okay.

The movement in his peripheral vision caught his attention just seconds before the loud clap of their door slamming open caused all his muscles to instantly clench. His heart plummeted when he saw that Landerly was standing inside their office. Well, those were his feet anyway. It took Jordan to the full count of ten to force himself to look up to Landerly's face.

The voice was old and soft, and anything but calm. "You two have some serious explaining to do about a signature of mine that I don't remember being on the continent to sign for."

The world was going to hell.

There was a long lull, then they both began speaking. "Dr. Landerly, we had so much evidence-"

"We tried so hard to get in touch with you-"

His leathery hand, palm out, put an end to the words frothing from their mouths. "I'll talk to you separately." He pointed to Jillian. "In my office, now."

As Jordan watched, she stood as though pulled by strings. Her expression that of sheer horror. And then she walked out the door followed by Landerly, who didn't so much as glance Jordan's way.

For long minutes, he sat there, unmoving, still digesting what had happened. Landerly shouldn't have gotten in until tomorrow. Had someone tipped him off? Had he come back early to corral his renegade peons?

Jordan knew he was going to get fired. That was all there was to it. He considered himself too much of a man to get up and start packing his belongings, not until he was actually told that he was fired. But it wasn't beneath him to let his gaze wander around the office, falling on various objects and cataloguing what was his.

The phone buzzer shocked him to life, his heart missing several beats before picking up a steady rhythm again. Gingerly he lifted the receiver from the cradle, "Hello?"

"Abellard. Get in here."

He winced, "Okay," but it was too late. Landerly had already hung up and Jordan was holding a phone that was softly buzzing a dial tone at him. He hadn't been this afraid of getting spanked since elementary school. At least then he had put smoke bombs behind the toilets in the girls' room and the whole thing had been fun.

The hall felt long, and Landerly's office was closed, forcing Jordan to grip the knob and open the door on the scene of his own demise. Jillian sat in the visitor chair across from where Landerly lorded behind his desk. She was ashen and looked like she had early stage Parkinson's, fine tremors snaked their way down her arms and out her fingers. Anger broke in a tidal wave as Jordan looked her up and down. Landerly had tormented her. He turned to let the old man have it, but was brought up short by the bark that Landerly leveled at him. "Is it true, what she tells me?"

He had to force himself to take a deep breath. "I've never heard Jillian lie."

That put the old man's eyebrows up. "So you orchestrated all this? By yourself?"

"I realize that I am not the genius here, and that this ploy may seem a bit above me. And, no, I didn't 'orchestrate' the whole thing. But Jillian didn't speak any lies to anyone. Jillian has many talents. Lying isn't one of them."

Landerly snorted. "Forgery apparently is."

"Apparently." Jordan knew he was shoveling the hole he was standing in. But he couldn't stop himself. "Tell me if that paper was three years old you would have recognized that it wasn't your signature."

Jillian gasped, but at least it earned him a respectable nod from Landerly, who then began talking right over Jordan's thoughts. "If you'd like to not get fired effective immediately, you had damn well better explain this and why you couldn't wait until I got back, and it had better match Dr. Brookwood's story exactly."

Jordan thanked God Jilly couldn't lie worth shit. He knew their stories would match word for word. So he took a moment to gather himself, watching her visibly relax as he did. They would be here a while.

Eventually Landerly interrupted. "Same thing she said. The two of you using company policy to support your illegal trip . . ."

Jillian paled a bit at that, and Jordan put his hand over hers where it gripped the spindle arm of the chair. They'd at least be fired together. "Are you going to hear us out or not?"

Landerly nodded and managed to not interrupt again for the remainder of the story. He was silent for several minutes after Jordan finished. Finally he placed his soft leather hands on the desk and leaned forward, somehow managing to invade Jordan's personal space from over three feet away. "One: we never had this conversation. I don't know about that signature. I assume someone else okay'd your trip. Two: one slip from either of you and I will suddenly find that paper, and recognize the forged signature and you'll be out so fast your head will spin."

Jordan digested that. It actually sounded like they weren't getting fired.

"Three: you drive out tonight. There's another case that sounds like the same thing in the Appalachians. You're going to an area just south of Knoxville, McCann County."

"Another case?" It was Jillian's voice, though hard to recognize, it was shaky and soft and lacked all her normal confidence.

"Yup." Finally Landerly leaned back, "We'll name the disease after you two as punishment for this escapade. Now get out of my office. Go home. Pack and get your asses back here by five so I can hand you the paperwork."

"Yes, sir." His voice was strong, even if his belief wasn't. And Jilly was falling all over herself to thank the man whose name she had so expertly forged less than a week ago. She was gesturing wildly and Jordan reached up to pluck one of her hands out of its flightpath and used it to drag her out of the office.

She trailed him down the hall, hand still tucked in his, getting tugged along. When they got to the office she released herself from his grip and sank like pudding into her wooden swivel chair, leaning it back and bringing her hands to her head as though she could hold all the thoughts in. "I can't believe he didn't fire us."

"Yes, and we're not waiting around to let it happen either." Jordan grabbed her purse and handed it to her, before yanking her up out of the chair. "I'll drive, you're in no shape."

In seconds he had pulled her down the hallway, waving the ID card miraculously still in his possession at each coded entry and finally emerging into the bright sun. Jilly raised her hand to shield her face, then pawed inside her purse for a moment before producing sunglasses and keys.

He pulled the keys from her hand and dropped them back into the leather bag. "You shouldn't drive. I'll drop you off then swing by and get you on the way back."

"No, really, I'm-" She cut herself off when she saw how badly she was shaking. "All right, thank you."

He settled her into the passenger seat of the crappy little Cavalier, then closed her in and jogged around to the driver's side.

"Do you think-"

"Landerly said-"

“You go first.” He braced his arm on the back of her seat and looked out the rear window while he backed out of the spot doing all he could not to lay some serious rubber on the pavement in his hurry to be away.

“Do you think we’re really onto something? That there really are more cases?”

Jordan sighed. “It has to be. The only alternative I can figure is that Landerly is sending us into the mountains and a hitman will follow us. You know, so no one will ever find the bodies.”

“So, we’re going up into the Appalachians.”

“I have to say I’m freaking out about that.”

Jilly looked sideways at him again. “Why?”

“I’ve seen Deliverance.”

• • • •

JILLIAN LISTENED TO the deep sigh Jordan heaved into the door of the car. In sleep, he had wedged himself between the seat and the window, stuck at an awkward angle that seemed to bother only her.

His remark about being sent to McCann County to meet up with Landerly’s hitman ricocheted in her brain. But it morphed as it went. Landerly wouldn’t need a hitman; McCann was itself Purgatory, or so it would seem.

The Rav-4 bounced along the horrid road, and Jillian had thoughts about not getting reimbursed for the damage to her car. She tempered them with thoughts about not getting fired. Darkness had come to cover them like smog while she drove, along roads that needed little instruction. Blinking to keep her eyes open, she was assaulted by the bright glare of a green interstate sign bouncing her brights back at her. McCann, 1 mile, population 232. That was telling. That they included the population on the sign. And that the population included a significant digit in the ones spot. Ouch. Jordan had been right about Deliverance.

Jillian looked at the glowing digital numbers on the dash, they were going to arrive early, and she wondered how that could be possible. The drive had seemed interminable; she couldn’t even sing to the radio to stay awake, not with Jordan sleeping in the passenger seat.

Their turn was highlighted by a small brown sign atop a metal post, with one word “McCANN” and an arrow pointing the only direction there was to go down the dirt trail. She had the distinct feeling she was entering a land where a sixth grade education would be considered intelligent.

Jordan bounced around in his seat, his shoulders and head periodically knocking about. Surely he would wake right up, keep her company. But he didn’t. When she felt the frown cross her face she realized that she had been anticipating his presence. Landerly had done a good job putting the two of them together. They communicated well about what needed to be done, and they worked well together to be certain that it was achieved. She hadn’t ever felt that Jordan wasn’t pulling his own weight, nor had she felt she’d been carried. And he was good company. Which was more than she had expected. Most people had found her cold and distant, and she understood that. Pretty much she was cold and distant; she lived in her own world where the need to achieve drove her every waking moment.

Funny how Jordan had become her personal life now. He had other commitments and friends in the outside world of Atlanta. In the few weeks he had been here, he had made more connections than she had in all her five years at Grady and in Atlanta combined. On the way out he had taken time to call his friend Martin and cancel his Wednesday night racquetball game. For a brief moment she had regretted that she didn’t have anyone to call.

The road went on forever, made worse by the fact that it was little more than ruts in the hard-packed earth and any sort of speed was an unattainable goal. At least it had been used recently. Small bushes and grasses had been flattened in the middle of the parallel ditches that had yet to pop back up and look alive. Beside her, Jordan finally stirred, his eyes opened, his jaw worked and his voice uttered a soft, What? Before he shook himself fully awake and realized that he knew exactly where he was. In that moment he began apologizing for sleeping through such a long portion of the ride.

“So make it up to me by checking out the map to James Hann’s place so we can get the key to the house where we’re staying.”

Jordan complied, looking over the hand-drawn lines that Hann had faxed to Landerly earlier today. Google had come up with nothing. Not surprising since McCann itself didn’t register on most maps.

According to the shakily scrawled fax there were five roads in McCann. Parson, Main, Lintle, Shields, and Squirrel. Jillian had to admit that ‘Squirrel’ bothered her. And that, of course, was the road where the rented house was marked with a wavery X on the map.

Jordan turned the map one way then the other, “I take it we’re on Main.”

“To the best of my knowledge.” Her casual shrug was lost in the movement of the jostling car.

Trees had closed in over the road, overgrown and hanging low, scraping the top of the small car. It was either romantic or horrifying and Jillian squashed the urge to look into the backseat for stowaways. She was searching desperately for road signs, and when she was ready to sigh with weariness and frustration, Jordan pointed low. A hand-lettered wood two-by-four was nailed to the base of an old tree. Parson Rd.

That was good enough for her. And she cranked the wheel of the Rav4 hand over hand, wishing that she was already at the house on Squirrel.

The road was even worse than Main, if that was possible. Branches whipped the windshield at a ferocious pace, slowing them even more. Just when she was ready to comment, Jordan broke the nearly rhythmic thwapping sound, “Landerly hates us. He does not expect us to return.”

Jillian had to laugh.

It was that or cry. She’d had no more sleep than Jordan, and while she was glad they weren’t fired, never had she imagined this kind of sick punishment.

Just then the trees broke, and a small house stood probably a half mile back off the road. No front lawn or porch lights illuminated the outside, but lights were on in the windows, and given that it was approaching eleven, Jillian was willing to turn the car down the gravel driveway and take her chances that this was the Hann residence. A porch light flashed on in welcome even as she pulled up next to the garage.

In the dying residuals of her headlights Jillian noted the dilapidated horse barn and matching shed tilting precariously in the background, but her attention was diverted by the older man walking down the stairs. He looked nicer than what she had expected in these parts. His jeans were clean and unpatched, like his red plaid flannel shirt. And his face was just enough weathered to appear kind.

She plastered on a smile and threw open the car door. But he spoke first. “You must be Dr. Brookwood. Miss Greene didn’t tell me you were so pretty.” His smile reached his eyes and he held his hand out to her, somehow managing to convey comfort and friendliness with his remarks.

He held out his hand again as Jordan approached. “I’m James Hann. And I have a set of keys to our rental house. Just come inside and Melissa will get you a drink.”

Jillian started to protest, “Oh, thank you, but-”

Jordan's elbow in her lower back cut her off and his voice overpowered her own, "That would be great. It's been a bit of a drive."

So she bit off her retort and followed the two men up the short stairs. The inside of the place reminded her of her Aunt Lenora's house. There was a whipstitched cover for the Kleenex box in the shape of a church, complete with a steeple and open doors. Sampler pillows dotted the old brown couch in shades of pastel, broken only by the hideously yellow crocheted throw.

James introduced his wife Melissa, a woman who appeared to be in her fifties like him, who brooked no protest about popping out of her seat to get drinks even as he settled in. Jillian let Jordan handle all the talking, since he was the one who had accepted this invitation anyway.

She felt herself drifting asleep with her eyes open until James Hann's voice cut through the filters she had thought were turned off. "Y'all are married, right?"

While she tried to hide the startled look she was sure had materialized on her face, all thoughts vaporized at Jordan's immediate smile and knowing nod. "Of course we are."

Snapping her jaw shut, she turned to stare at him. Then worked furiously to cover the expression that she knew had clouded her eyes. If there was one thing she had learned at the CDCP, it was that Jordan said some wild stuff, but he could be trusted. So she forced a grin, praying it looked less demonic than it felt.

His smile was far more genuine, and he reached across to lightly brush her fingers. "Jilly decided to keep her last name. Dr. and Dr. Abellard . . . well you'd never know who was who."

Hann accepted the iced tea his wife was holding out to him without even acknowledging her presence, which of course prompted another negative reaction that Jillian fought hard to tamp down. Then she was discretely passed a bumpy glass full of tea and garnished with a lemon and a mint sprig. Garnish! At eleven thirty at night! And Jordan smiling and talking about them being married. It was the damn twilight zone.

"I noticed you don't wear any rings."

Jordan held out his hand for Hann to inspect. Could the night get any weirder? She just couldn't wait to hear this. "I've got a bit of a mark from it."

Jillian couldn't see anything but a pristine ring finger, but she kept her mouth shut.

"We can't wear our rings when we work. They get caught on the gloves." He smiled at her again, and she saw genuine humor in his eyes. He knew that she had no idea where he was going with this and he wasn't going to explain. "And Jilly here won't let us bring them on trips. They might get lost."

So she turned back to Mr. Hann and nodded as if she agreed. "You know. They're too important."

James nodded to her conspiratorially. "Melissa would have my hide if I lost mine."

In a few minutes she had guzzled her tea, far thirstier than she had known she was. Then Jordan was taking her hand and pulling her up off the couch. He had the keys to the house on Squirrel firmly in his other hand and the Hanns' blessings.

Mr. Hann watched from the doorway, while Jordan folded her into the passenger seat of her own car, then smiled as he held his hand out discretely for the keys. She slipped them to him, wondering even as she did it why she was going along with it all. A smile and a wave later Jordan had them turned around and bouncing back up the driveway, and Jillian could keep her mouth shut no longer.

"We're married?"

He laughed. "This is not like Atlanta. They just rented us a house and they'd probably rescind the offer if they had known we weren't married. Sin is sin."

“What?”

“Did you see all the God stuff in there?” He looked both ways for the non-existent traffic at the end of the drive, “They would have insisted that you stay with them. Is that what you wanted?”

“You’re serious.”

He just raised his eyebrows and held up the keys to the house. The keychain read With Jesus all things are possible.

“Well, holy Mary, mother and Joseph.” She hated when he was right and she didn’t have the wherewithal to even catch on.

It was fifteen minutes of relative silence later that they parked the Rav4 in front of the rental. Jillian fought the urge to cry. It was straight out of the Apple Dumpling Gang. Weathered wood siding, hanging loose in several places, the porch had a slight tilt to it, and in the windows she could see curtains with red roosters prancing back and forth.

She prayed that the beds didn’t sag too much.

Jordan hopped out and reached into the backseat to grab both duffle bags and headed to unlock the front door. Following right behind him, she was assaulted by the stale smell and stagnant air in the place. Jordan made a face that must have mirrored her own and immediately dropped their luggage and went around opening the windows. The night air was a welcome addition into the house.

Jillian wandered the place, snapping on lights. The kitchen was a countrified hell - roosters covered every surface. Wire mesh lined some of the cabinets in a way that could have been charming were it not part of the whole overdone theme. The hallway boasted a linen closet that was stacked with chenille throws and a variety of outdated floral print sheets. The one bathroom was cramped and pink, but Jillian thought the sink looked about as good as any could right now.

The faucet handle didn’t give when she turned it. And so, with a much harder crank, she sent the thing spinning and started a horrifying series of moans and gurgles that culminated in a brown thick liquid spewing from the faucet.

“Now that’s what I call hard water.” Jordan laughed from behind her.

Jillian spun around, furious not at him, but that things could be this bad at midnight when she hadn’t slept in four days and hadn’t even begun to unpack. She started to turn off the offending spigot, but Jordan’s hand on her shoulder stilled her, “Let it run, it’ll clear up.”

With that she turned and left the faucet to its own devices and started opening the doors at the end of the hallway. One was a master bedroom, if the term was applied loosely. The bed was queen-sized and looked like it had been furnished from a barn somewhere. The other bedroom sported a single pressed into the far corner with only a lone pillow and no headboard.

“I’ll take this one.” Jillian went back for her bag, but Jordan beat her to it and argued chivalrously that he would take the smaller room. In a few minutes she got him to concede and he lowered her bag to the floor, then called from a little further down the hallway “The water’s good now, bathroom’s all yours.”

She’d have to see that clean water to believe it, but sure enough, when she re-entered the water ran clear and pristine. Except for a smudge in the bottom of the basin there was no evidence of the sludge it had been turning out a few minutes ago.

Rapidly she brushed her teeth and scrubbed her face before heading back to her room and changing into her flannel pajamas. The bed both called to her and repulsed her. But exhaustion won out over unfamiliarity and she lifted the layers of sheets and blankets to slide beneath. She was rolling over to punch the pillow when the world dropped out from under her.

Eyes wide, she sat up and promptly slid off the end of the bed where the foot of it had fallen out from under her. She just gave up. Mumbling swear words, she yanked the covers off, and tromped down the short hall dragging them after her. Jordan's door was ajar and he was centered on the large bed in a draping sprawl, t-shirt and sweatpants bunched in a way that would be uncomfortable to all but the truly tired.

Jillian sighed. "Scoot over."

David reached into his pocket and felt like a fool. But he smiled at the stewardess and ordered a scotch even as he corrected his mental error to ‘flight attendant’. His fingers tightened around the three inch wide cylinder he had shoved there earlier. There were four more in his carryon, each with one end covered in plastic and tied down with a rubber band. He figured if he made so much as a false move he’d be shot by those plainclothes police officers that were supposed to be flying around as protection for regular US citizens these days.

The core sample he had taken from the McCann hotspot was hardly a weapon, unless someone used it to publish his data before he did. But he had watched the guy in front of him in the security line get a travel shampoo bottle confiscated and get rebuked for trying to get ‘these things’ on the airplane. How was shampoo even dangerous? Yet here he was with a solid, eight inch long piece of hard rock in his pocket. That could do real damage upside someone’s head-

“Thank you.” He accepted the scotch from the smiling blonde in the navy suit with the tie neck cloth that reminded him of his cousin Ester’s Girl Scout uniform. He shouldn’t even be thinking about the damage he could do with the rock-club. He just prayed they didn’t arrest him when he hit the ground.

Removing his fingers from the core sample he aligned his napkin with the edge of the tray, then the glass into the corner created by the scalloped edges pressed into the paper of the napkin. It was a habit he had inherited from his father - that and the habit of picking up rocks and trying to hear them speak. This one was begging him not to let it get confiscated. This one, compared with the four nearly identical pieces in his bag, was the whole reason he was on this stupid flight. Why he was headed back into McCann County again.

He brought the glass of scotch to his lips, glad that it had been a smooth ride, and that no one had caught his error in bringing the rocks on board. At least, not yet. The top layer of each was made of looser dirt, not packed in by eons of hard rain and pressure and walking animals. Yet it still had the tiniest amount of scrap iron in it. Not as reliable as the riverbed sediments. River silt would line up as the poles dictated. In water, the magnetic shards were free-floating and excellent indicators even hundreds of thousands of years later. But these loose pieces should have had just an overall trend that was statistically significant.

These had far more than that. No one had to crank the numbers to see it. Students had pointed it out as they analyzed layers for him. “Wow, Dr. Carter. Where’d this come from? Near an MRI machine?” The cores were from Wharton’s dig site; they showed hotspot activity from sixty-five million years ago. And today. The mystery kept growing the more he looked at it.

After he got off the plane, it was only thirty minutes before he was on interstate 75 headed north. It was all getting too familiar, and he found himself at the little run-down motel on the outskirts of Farragut, which was on the outskirts of Knoxville. The Whippoorwill Inn sported a sign that clearly revealed it had once been a Best Western. David was certain that the Best Western Corporation had disowned this bastard stepchild a long time ago.

The man behind the counter remembered him though as he walked up to the front desk and inquired about a room. For a brief moment he panicked that maybe they were full, and then what would he do? But he almost laughed out loud as the thought slipped away. Farragut was hardly a convention center. The only thing that might fill this place up was a wedding. And he had serious concerns that most of the weddings around here involved shotguns and noticeably pregnant brides, so he pushed that idea out of his head.

His watch said it was barely 5pm home time, and he was already exhausted. He shook his thoughts out as he turned the key and let himself into the room. It was as stale and washed out as he remembered it, and he decided that he should take his luck escaping the airports with his specimens intact as a sign from the Gods. He would only do what the Gods told him to do for the rest of the day, and right now they were telling him to get some sleep.

He had just stepped out of his shoes when his cell phone rang, the clear digital tones strangely discordant in the time capsule room. When he didn't see a name on the panel he almost refused the call, only his close co-workers and a few friends knew this number, and the phone should have recognized them. But he let the phone go through another whole cycle of ring and wait before he remembered that 865 was the local area code, meaning someone here was calling him and that was just too freaky to not answer.

"Hello?"

"Yes, I'm looking for a Dr. David Carter the second."

"This is he." This is weird. The combination of his personal line and formal name. The tight, upper-classy sound of the female voice speaking to him.

There was a soft sigh on the other end of the line before the voice resumed the formal words that weren't telling him much. "My name is Dr. Jillian Brookwood. I work with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and we're running a survey regarding McCann, Tennessee. There are credit card receipts and several residents that state that you visited recently."

She paused and David realized that he was supposed to fill the space with an affirmation or rejection. He cleared his throat. "Yes, I was there."

"I'm going to record this call if that's all right with you?"

The CDC was on the phone with him and wanted to record the call? And weren't they in Atlanta, not Tennessee? So why was the call from a local number? He felt stupid saying it, but rather than badger her with his misgivings he just said "sure." If it was a prank he would have detected that thick southern accent in the air, right?

There was a small click and she resumed speaking. "One moment. Dr. Jillian Brookwood, of CDCP Lab G12067 . . ." Her voice faded away from him as he realized that she was recording all the information for the call. It was about as interesting as the legal disclaimers after commercials, but he snapped to when he heard his name. "Dr. Carter, you were recently in the town of McCann, Tennessee, correct?"

"Yes."

"What was the purpose of your visit?"

That made him pause. This was likely someone trying to get information out of him regarding his dig. "It was personal."

"About how long ago were you here?"

Here. She was in McCann.

"About three weeks."

"And how long was your stay?" Her voice came over the line cool, professional, detached.

"About three weeks." He barely paused before speaking again and making a point to interrupt her. "May I ask what this call is about?"

"Certainly. Have you had any nausea in the past few weeks?"

"Wait. What is this about?"

“We’re doing a survey-”

He cut her off again. “Why don’t we do this face to face?”

“I’m sorry, sir, I won’t be able to get to Chicago in the near future.”

“I’m in Farragut.”

“Now?!”

He almost laughed at the surprise in her voice. With just her tone she seemed to agree with his feelings, Who the hell would want to be in Farragut? “Yes. I’ll be in McCann tomorrow.”

“I can come to you, tonight even. Where shall we meet?”

He only knew of one place and it was a hole in the wall right next to his cheap motel, so he gave her an apology before he gave her the address. She told him she’d be there at eight and she hoped he was staying close to his hotel. Then he hung up and lay back on the old creaking bed. That was just too weird.

What the hell did the CDC want in McCann?

Probably a brain scan of anyone idiotic enough to visit. Probably they had classified living there as a disease and wanted to isolate the gene. See if he was maybe a carrier or something.

He closed his eyes and the alarm immediately malfunctioned and went off, causing him to swear. He smacked it and got up, going into the tiny bathroom to retrieve an alarm that actually worked. He pulled it from his bag and stared at it for a moment, 6:50. That was . . . 7:50 local time. Shit, he’d actually been asleep. A lot of good it had done him, too.

He had all of ten minutes to get himself together and go convince the CDC lady with the tight-assed voice that he was not diseased. At least she had sounded offended about being in McCann. That was a definite bonus in his book.

David set the clock back down and looked into the mirror. That was all it took to convince him that he needed to wash his face. If for no reason other than to wake himself up. If this CDC chick was the real deal, then maybe there was something interesting going on and he should pay attention, and he headed next door to the greasy spoon.

When he entered, an older woman said hello to him. Clearly as friendly as she could be, but she didn’t offer him a seat, or ask what he needed. He was expected to seat himself. Each seat looked about as appealing as the next, and that wasn’t a compliment. David crossed the small room and pulled out a vinyl covered chair that allowed him to see the door. And by the time the lady had walked up to him and asked, “Unsweetened tea, right?” and he had been shocked that he was remembered, a woman was walking in the door who looked as out of place as he did.

The waitress smiled her toothy grin and said, “Hi, honey,” to the woman, then walked off to get his tea. David stood, surprised by what he saw. As she came closer, clearly unsure who he was but guessing correctly, she tilted her head and examined him. She was much younger than he had expected, and while her voice had been all authority and questions, now on sight she was unsure, clutching the notepad and pen she held to her chest just a little too tight. “Are you Dr. Carter?”

“Yes, I am.” He stood up and stuck out his hand in a gesture that was way too formal for the setting. “And you must be Dr. Brookwood.”

“It’s nice to meet you.” She shook his hand, a firmer grip than he had expected from someone so young. They settled into a formal position, looking ridiculous, trying to keep an air of business decorum over a plastic tablecloth that looked like it had lived a past life as an abused picnic blanket.

He was going to say something, but the waitress lady, who still had yet to introduce herself, turned up at his side, and asked Dr. Brookwood “What can I bring you, honey?”

The doctor’s black eyebrows went up. “Do you have any bottled water?”

“Sorry, honey. But we got bottled coke.” The waitress didn’t even have the wherewithal to be offended by the unspoken suggestion that the water should be imported.

“That would be great, thank you.”

He glanced at his own glass of tea, a tall old yellow glass that had the lemon pre-squeezed into it. The CDC chick wasn’t drinking anything handled here. And suddenly he wasn’t quite so thirsty.

David swished at the tea, wondering what came next. But he didn’t wonder for long. Dr. Brookwood opened her pad and spread out a few sheets of a questionnaire. He was having trouble reading it upside down, and was interrupted by her voice, softly clearing her throat. “Shall we get down to brass tacks?”

And that was it. The good doctor was in her element and was off and running. She started up a tape recorder, a small silver thing that looked like a missing part from an alien space ship in this out-of-date setting. She re-questioned him about his whereabouts and the reasons for his visit. He re-lied about it being personal.

Then she asked him all kinds of questions about his feelings. Fever? Nausea? Dizziness? Disorientation? Gastrointestinal upset?

Within three minutes the woman who looked and acted as though she was anywhere but Podunk, Tennessee, knew more about him than his mother ever had. Then she started asking him more and stupider questions. “Has your stomach felt queasy in the past several weeks, since you returned?”

David felt the frown move into place on his face. “Didn’t you already ask me that?”

The professional mask broke form and the side of her lip curled just the slightest amount. “You wouldn’t believe how many people can answer the same question five or six times, but on the seventh try they suddenly remember that yes they do have a life threatening allergy or yes, they did have exactly those symptoms. My favorite thing to hear when I’m interviewing someone is: ‘come to think of it . . .’”

He almost laughed. Then he heard the words coming out of his mouth and was powerless to stop them. “Come to think of it, my friend and I did feel a little sick to our stomachs just before we left.”

“This would be . . .” She flipped back through her paperwork, scanning for the answers she had jotted down earlier. “Dr. Greer Larson?”

“Yes.”

“Was it mild or severe? How would you rank it?”

Dear God, she was insane. All this writing and she wouldn’t tell him what was going on.

He sat at the table, studying her intently and answering all her questions as best as he could. While she looked up at him only to ask another stupid question and another, and furiously recording his answers. Finally she thanked him as she stood up. “Please stay in touch. And please call daily with an update on your condition if you do go into McCann city. Thank you.”

He glanced down at her card making sure he had enough information, and looked back up to ask her if McCann actually qualified as a city, but she was gone. There were a few bills on the table, and the bell that had been hung over the door was letting the world know that someone had left this little hole.

• • • •

BECKY KNEW IN HER HEART that the birds were the next in line to be magnetically freaky, and that the project was no longer hers. She could only hope that they would recognize her efforts and give her a good billing on the paper that likely she would write every word of.

She drove herself to work in the old Jetta, hearing the wheezes from the engine that was never quite fully repaired. Her office smelled just a little stale, and she wondered for a brief moment if any of her colleagues had been in. But she pushed herself down into the wooden rolling chair and leaned over the desk. U.T. had sent her to Georgia, and several birds had been brought back to the school labs, using school equipment. She would call the birdwatchers from her U.T. phone providing a record of the conversation. It was officially out of her hands. Marshall Harfield answered on the first ring. And he recognized her name right away.

“We were wondering when we would hear any news about our Bradys.”

She tried to keep her voice light, even though she already knew what he would find. “I actually have a task for you if you can help us out, then I’ll be able to give you more information.”

The man was overly eager to help in any way he could, and it brought back memories of being in the woods surrounded by the ABA group, all talking at once. “I need you to gather your birdwatchers and to give everybody a compass and check out the areas where the birds first migrated and where they’re settled now. Do you think that you can get everybody together for that?”

“I can do it today.” She could almost see him puffing with pride. The manners her mama had drilled into her told her to let him know that it wasn’t necessary no matter how much she was anxious for the results. But he stepped in before she could have gotten a word in edgewise anyway. “We’re having a meeting at three and we can just change our agenda a little bit.”

“Is that okay? I don’t want to bother-”

“Just tell us what you want us to do.”

Becky was glad that he was so happy to help. She felt a little less like she had put a chore on him. And she spent a good while explaining how they should map and record the electromagnetics of the area and what they were looking for.

Mr. Harfield concluded with a sniff and a “we’ll know it when we see it, right?”

“Yes, if there is any activity you won’t be able to miss it.”

“I don’t suppose you can tell me why it is that we’re looking for this?”

She smiled. The man was a goon and always overeager, but he was a sharp tack. “I can. I hope it will be within the next several days. And the information you get this afternoon will help me gain the authority to share what I know.”

Becky hung up with a sigh, dragged herself to her feet and gathered a few supplies. The walk to visit the Warblers wound down a long hallway and around behind several labs. An undergrad was hunched over, muttering to himself when she entered. It took only the briefest of explanations to get him to agree to a break from mucking the crates. “I’m trying to figure out why they’re so creepy.”

“Well,” He laughed, “that’s a noble endeavor. But one I doubt you’ll be able to solve.”

“Why is that?”

“Because Dr. Jenkinson has been at these guys since you brought them in. We’ve been testing them with everything we know and can’t come up with squat.”

“Ahhh,” Becky sighed. “But I have the inside track.” She went back outside the doorway and gathered up the magnets she had set down just before entering, in a few moments he had one of the warblers out and Becky had the magnet in front of it. It turned when the magnet was moved.

“Ho-lee shit. You win. You do have the inside track.”

They tried bird after bird and then finally entered the room with their pockets loaded with as many of the magnets as they could find. The birds followed their movements, becoming obviously agitated when they separated, taking the magnetic pull in two different directions.

“So that’s why they were all staring at me when I entered.”

Becky nodded. “Actually they stare at the door all the time. What direction is that? Do you know?”

He looked around a little, orienting himself inside the building as the thought clearly formed for the first time. After a few motions that Becky couldn't decipher, his brows knit together and he said “West northwest.”

Becky was ready to smack herself in the forehead. Why hadn't she brought the compass? There was something about the way she had come down the hall. The undergrad followed patiently while she mentally retraced her steps backward from the birdroom, winding up in her office. Sitting in her chair with the empty shelves behind her.

The shelves are empty. Becky sighed. And only as he responded did she realize that she had spoken.

“Why are they empty?”

“Because I took the frogs home.” The breath rushed out of her. “The frogs were facing the same way.”

• • • •

“JILLY.”

Jordan's voice broke her reverie and she snapped to with a feeble excuse. “I was just thinking . . .”

Jordan waited, looking at her, watching, as though he might see her thought process. She knew she was a mystery to him, how her mind functioned, what she saw, and how she lived with such a singular drive. But at times like these, he sat, waiting for whatever she would come up with. And she felt the pressure of him expecting more of her than she was probably capable of producing. McCann was turning out to be more than she could handle.

She shrugged at him, giving up. “I don't have any idea what to tell Landerly, but we have to phone this in. We hit criteria.”

Jordan nodded. “Do you want to make the call or me?”

“Are you serious?” She would have laughed if she hadn't spent the day fielding the six new patients down with this illness - two already at a coma state before she and Jordan got to them. All their families had said was that they were ‘under the weather’ or ‘feelin' a little down’. Good God, one family seemed to think the father would just come out of it.

Jordan had sent her back to re-dress the first morning when she had declared herself ready in her suit and labcoat. He had said the good people of McCann wouldn't tell her anything if she dressed like that. He had made her dig through her bag until she produced jeans and the oldest looking top she had brought. What Jillian understood was that people would open up to Jordan no matter what he was wearing. Dirty little children just asked if they could hug him.

She looked around the makeshift lab in the bedroom with the broken bed. Her bag was stashed in the corner; the slanted bed wasn't even good as storage space, everything just rolled off. James Hann had offered to come over and fix it. So she had waited until he declared that he needed a ‘part’ and that he would come back with it in a few days.

Jillian wondered what ‘part’ one needed to fix an old wooden slat bed. A nail? A screw? And she stared around the obnoxious room feeling desperate. She couldn't come up with a solution or any idea of what they had. She wasn't even sure if it was viral, bacterial, or chemical. All she knew was that the weaker your immune system was the more likely you were to get it. And that they'd been living in ‘it’ for days. Bathing in it? Eating it? Breathing it?

And that wasn't anything more than they had known in Florida. Except that here they could trace a link. In Jordan's bold print it graced the wall - the connections from patient zero to the other locals who had come down with 'it'. Not that there was a standard incubation period or anything. Jillian couldn't wrap her mind around it. No matter how patiently Jordan waited on her. And she didn't want to have to tell Landerly that.

So Jillian forced herself to trail behind him to the kitchen where the old yellow phone was mounted on the wall. The push buttons were its only bow before modern technology. If it had been dial-up . . . well, she didn't think the CDCP even accepted dial-up calls anymore.

Jordan smiled at her, the large ugly receiver held against his head, the short coil holding him captive against the far wall of the be-roostered kitchen. "Hey Dr. Landerly."

Breath pushed into her lungs. She would never have addressed him with 'Hey, Dr. Landerly.' But then again, she wasn't Jordan. She listened, waiting for the screech that was sure to come. The questions as to why their assays hadn't showed anything. The makeshift desk top in the 'lab' was covered with test plates. But nothing had turned up.

Jordan nodded, knowing full well that Landerly couldn't see him. "Yessir. Problem is - we hit criteria for quarantine. . . . about fifteen minutes ago. . . . 19 . . . down or deceased. . . well, yes, but here that's the necessary 8 percent of the population. . . . do it ourselves? . . . ." His eyes looked up finally meeting Jillian's. He looked bewildered.

She was certain his expression mirrored her own as she imagined the two of them rolling yards of yellow tape around the outskirts of town.

"I thought we would call in a team. How do we hold quarantine with just two people? . . . ." The pause seemed interminable. "The law enforcement? This place isn't a city, so there's no police. . . sheriff? . . ." He looked at Jillian, eyebrows up waiting for her to provide the answer.

So she did. In a situation like this at least she was useful as a storage and retrieval center for seemingly useless trivia. "Just one man and his son. Jerome Beard."

"How many exits to the town?" Jordan beseeched her again, and while she got the original faxed map that James Hann had sent them she heard Jordan becoming irked with the old man. "No, I do not think better when I repeat your questions like an idiot. Jillian thinks better when I repeat your questions like an idiot."

She tried not to laugh as she held up the map. His look shut her up. Jordan's face clearly displayed that she would be the one making the next of these phone calls.

His shoulders slumped and his free hand went to his eyes. "Yessir. It looks like four exits. But that's -"

Jillian waited while Jordan's teeth clenched, her own lower lip folding in to be chewed on, a habit she had thought she had broken years ago.

It sounded a bit like Charlie Brown's schoolteacher was on the other end of the line, she could only make out that Landerly was speaking. And since she hadn't heard anything before, she gave serious thought to the possibility that he was yelling at Jordan. If she was braver she would have grabbed the phone out of his hand and told Landerly where to stuff it. If she hadn't landed her dream job with the CDCP right out of her residency . . . well, she had to admit to herself that there were enough ifs to leave the phone right in Jordan's hands where it already was.

Finally, Jordan spoke again. "It's a hand drawn map sir. It looks reasonably accurate but to be truthful checking out Mr. Hann's cartography skills wasn't on our list of things to do. So there may well be undrawn roads or paths - . . . well, we're in backwoods Tennessee. And these people walk or even ride horses a lot of places so there's no way we can cover all the exits. . . ."

Jillian stood there for forever while Jordan talked about the fact that they had checked every criterion they could think of. They were almost out of needles and reagents. All they had achieved was that they could reasonably predict who would come down with it next. Jillian's money was on Mr. Parson. He was married to a victim – exposure was strike one, was old - strike two, and his Chem panel showed that he had a very low TSH - strike three

But that was morbid.

And probably correct.

Jordan looked ready to explode. And Jillian stood nearby to offer support, but made a desperate effort to drown out what was actually being said.

How long she stood there like that, watching Jordan move his hand from his hip to his temples, switch the phone from one side to the other, talk about McCann and how little information they had, she had no idea. The first thing that registered was “Jillian and I thank you, sir.” As he hung up the phone.

His stance slugged even a little further down. His eyes all but closed. His back found the wall and he looked up at the ceiling, though Jillian had to wonder what he was looking at. She stepped forward to give him a hug, to thank him for handling that . . . monstrosity of a phone call.

For a brief moment she thought he didn't see her, and she saw her arms extend to him and she saw an awkward moment in the immediate future. But he was Jordan. He saw her coming and alleviated any tension by reacting. Just loosely draped his arm around her waist in a limp return-hug and mumbled ‘thank-you’ into her shoulder.

Her own voice was stronger, having not just been through the wringer with Landerly. “So, what? We just go to BigLots and buy about thirty rolls of ‘quarantine’ tape and make some makeshift roadblocks?”

Jordan chuckled a little. “Something like that. We try to keep the people contained as best we can. More recording than anything else. The backup ‘rural’ team will be here in two days.”

“Two days!” She stood up straight, planting her hands on her hips as she removed herself from his embrace.

“Yup.”

“Well - . . . how- . . . oh, fuck it. I'm not even going to try to figure that one out.”

Jordan's eyebrows raised again, and his blue-green eyes rolled her way.

She pressed her lips together. “Yes, I know the F-word.” Then she shrugged. Perhaps the best plan was avoidance. “Thank you for fielding that call. Landerly is going to kill us one of these days.”

Jordan shook his head. “No he won't. He's just going to name this disease after us. So whenever anyone feels nauseated they'll think ‘Brookwood-Abellard’. It's how I always imagined my life.” His tone changed to a little more wistful. “People will say, ‘oh, Abellard, like that horrid disease that makes you vomit and die?’”

Jillian was trying to get the picture. “Why isn't it ‘Abellard-Brookwood’?”

“Doesn't sound as good.”

“Oh, and there's a law about discordant names for vicious fatal diseases.”

He finally looked up and smiled at her, a real, full-on Jordan smile. And she was grateful that Landerly hadn't been too much of an ass.

“We should call and see if we can interview David Carter again.”

“We do need to see him. We need to get him quarantined. He's been in McCann, right?”

Jillian stilled. “In and out. Repeatedly.” Then more quietly “Oh, God.”

Jordan took her hand, pulling her behind him and out the door. “Not ‘Oh, God’. Everyone’s been in and out of McCann. And there’s no way to track it or to have prevented it.”

Jillian nodded, guessing that he was right. Her imagination that they were responsible was only partly true, and it was impossible, not to mention improper, to impose quarantine without the proper criteria. Still, Oh God.

There was a knock at the hotel room door. David opened his mouth to yell that he didn't need room service, before realizing that room service didn't exist here.

And that meant someone was really knocking on his door. He was hardly awake, and barely moving, given that he had spent the day climbing trails in the mountains. He'd been taking topsoil samples and testing them as best he could out in the middle of nowhere. But now he was sore, and slow, and he pushed his hands against the cheap paint job of the door and stuck his face flush against it before realizing that there wasn't even a peephole.

Well, there was a chain lock, not that that offered him any real protection . . . So he turned the knob, while muttering something about 'coming' and looked out the crack that the chain afforded. Not anyone he knew. Just some guy with a sweatshirt on.

"Are you Dr. David Carter?"

David nodded, still trying to clear his head, and a slightly familiar voice gave her name before he could place the melody and cadence in his memory.

"I'm Dr. Jillian Brookwood, we spoke a few days ago -"

He nodded and closed the door on the young man, jerking the chain out of its slot and letting the door swing freely this time. "Come in." He smiled and pretended he was awake. "What can I do for you?"

For a brief moment he considered apologizing for the state of the motel room. But it wasn't messy, just . . . awful. And he remembered that the good Dr. Brookwood had mentioned that she was staying in McCann, so his accommodations were probably better than either of theirs. He finally realized that the thing nagging the edges of his conscious thought was her voice, offering pleasantries and introducing her partner, who was scowling at David who was eyeing Dr. Brookwood. "-Dr. Jordan Abellard."

So David stuck his hand out and pretended he'd heard the whole thing. "Nice to meet you Dr. Abellard. Are you staying in McCann as well?" See, he could fake it with the best of them. He'd had whole conversations with his father where he hadn't paid attention to one piece of the shit his father was trying to feed him.

"Yes, Dr. Brookwood and I have rented a house there."

A house? "Oh, are you married?"

"No." Her voice.

"Yes." His.

But then Dr. Abellard looked sideways at his partner and laughed. Raising his eyebrows and putting his hands up like he'd been caught, he confessed. "No, we're not married, but the people who own the house are very religious. So we told them we were."

"Ahhh." So the Doc was off limits. That was a damn shame. But David just smiled and waited.

It was Abellard who caught on first. "May I sit down?" He motioned to the end of the unused queen bed near the door. "Jillian's report stated that you were doing research in the area and that you had come back for a personal visit."

David nodded. Yeah, get to the point.

"I have to tell you that this doesn't look like a personal visit. We haven't seen you in town at all."

David started to protest, but Abellard raised his hand. “Hear me out. . . people are getting sick.”

David raised his eyebrows in surprise, before cursing himself for giving away his hand. Dr. Abellard nodded at him, acknowledging his slip. “Yeah, I didn’t think you knew.”

Jillian looked as surprised as David felt about Abellard’s accusations. But she had the grace to sink down beside him on the green and gold-ish comforter and look up at David questioningly.

With a sigh, he fessed up. “You’re right. What do you want?”

“People are dying in McCann.”

This was just getting too weird. The CDC was sitting on his crappy motel bed telling him that people were dying in the town he was researching. “What is it that they have?”

Abellard’s lips were tight. “That’s just it. We don’t know.” He opened his mouth but no sound came and he closed it just as fast. Making David wonder what the doctor wasn’t telling him.

But he wasn’t about to find out.

“We do know it starts with a stomach upset. And you had that, but you have no other symptoms.”

“So, I don’t have it, right?” David felt the worry festering in him.

Jillian nodded. “We’d like your permission to run a series of assays on your blood, testing for the profile we’ve seen in the victims.” She pulled a rubber tourniquet, blood vials, gloves and a huge needle from her jacket pocket. Unlike her partner, she went straight for the punch, her eyes looking into his waiting for his yes/no response.

His chest moved. It was a gesture of resignation. They hadn’t mentioned the odd piles of stones stacked in the corner or asked him anything about his research. They only wanted his blood. “Sure. Just leave me enough to get a good night’s sleep.”

Dr. Jillian popped up off the bed with a surprising amount of energy, and she was shoving up his sleeve and had the rubber strap around him before he even had his arm fully extended to her. Her fingers were quite gentle given the amount of enthusiasm she had for getting his blood sample. Her gloves slid into place with seemingly no effort on her part, and she pushed the vein with her finger before sliding in the needle that he hadn’t even seen her attach to the vacuum tube. He felt the pinch then watched as his blood pumped into the vial.

After a moment she jerked open the tourniquet allowing him feeling in his lower arm again. Then held a cotton ball over the needle while she quickly slid it out of his vein without him feeling a thing. Only after inspecting the blood in the vial and turning it one way then another, did she look him in the eyes. “Thank you.”

Yea, she could poke him in the veins anytime she liked.

David pushed back a happy thought that she was over eighteen, and he couldn’t suppress a smile, “Is that all you guys came for?”

“No.” David followed the sound of the voice and stopped his musings about the raven-haired Jillian, remembering that the two were probably involved.

Abellard spoke again. “If your business here isn’t personal then what is it?”

Damn. “Well, actually that’s personal.” He saw Jillian’s lips press together, like she’d been hoping he’d just tell them everything. Too bad, honey.

“All right.” Dr. Abellard stayed in his seat on the bed, his head two feet lower than David’s standing height, but not showing any sign of weakness. “Let me take a stab at it then: you and your colleague came here to do some clandestine research. And you found something.”

Shit.

He turned to see if Jillian had that I'm close, aren't I? look on her face, too, but she didn't. She looked surprised, her attention finally pulled away from looking at the blood vial as though she didn't need the tests but could just read the red ooze itself.

Abellard continued. "You came back here to do more research—"

"Listen, I don't know what the two of you are doing here, but I don't need people prying into my life like this." Whatever blood that bewitching little vampire had left him raced faster, flooding his face with his anger.

Abellard held up a hand, palm out. "If I'm right, then you've stumbled onto something you aren't sharing with your university." His expression stayed David from kicking them both out the door right then. Barely. "And you know something very unusual and significant about an area where people are dying of a disease we know nothing about. . . we don't want to interfere with your research. We just need to know if the two are linked. We need to save lives."

Bastard. Abellard had him by the short and curlies.

• • • •

BECKY SIGHED WATCHING miles of interstate roll by and gallons of gas get guzzled on her MasterCard. She had gone around the area west of home yesterday. With her compass and her frogs along for measurement. But nothing had happened. The frogs always faced the same way. Just like they had when she had traveled the area south of home the day before. Today was east, and she could see that she wasn't going to open up any new discoveries to take back to the team and impress Warden.

She had been paying attention to where she was headed, but somehow she was out on highway 144, heading past the old route to the airport. She drove five more minutes with no real movement from the frogs before she gave up. And she didn't know how in hell she was going to explain this in an expense report to Warden. Hell, he wanted her five-dollar dinners pre-approved before he'd reimburse them.

"Aaaaagggghhhhh." The sound of her frustrated voice startled the frogs in the seat next to her. She had meant to just think it. The little harbingers of the apocalypse looked at her. All three of them, so sweet and froggy and innocent looking. But wasn't there a bible passage about that? So beware evil. The wolf that comes as sheep in wool . . . Then, of course, there was that whole rain of frogs stuff.

"Stop staring at me!"

Yeah, that was mature. Yell at frogs. So she growled at them. And the far one diverted his eyes. Then his head. Then he began a slow shuffle to facing away from her.

Becky almost stood on the brakes. She did slap on the blinker and pull off on the shoulder. One of the other frogs shuffled, too. Just a mild reorienting, but way more than these froggies were supposed to do.

"Holy . . ."

She slammed the old pile of parts in gear and pushed back out into traffic, cutting someone off. He flipped her the bird, but she quickly asked God's forgiveness; she knew she'd never get the other driver's.

The frogs' noses were all pointing off to the south by now. They faced an area that looked about as well traveled as the moon, and she had been on some of those back roads. She'd be stranded and eaten by cougars, or bears, or worse. She knew one man up there who swore the scientists in Oak Ridge had coordinated the whole thing with the aliens.

With force, she shoved her brain in gear. Her frogs should be re-orienting at the magnetic halfway point. That meant they were either very close to a smaller site, far from a big site, or exactly as far away from a site of the same size. Becky turned the wheel and followed the frogs' noses.

• • • •

JORDAN LOOKED AT THE page from the cheap printer they had brought along to spit out test results. It seemed a shame to get the scoop on whether you would likely live or die from a $79 printer that wheezed and beeped like an abused photocopier when it ran out of paper.

Dr. Carter's results rested in his fingertips at the moment. The only person that they weren't sure of until just now. His white count was textbook, and he didn't test positive for anything else interfering with normal immune function. Meaning it was highly unlikely that he'd be in the next batch to come down with Brookwood-Abellard, as Jordan was already calling it to himself. It also meant the geologist was likely to come around trying to read the slopes on Jilly again. Maybe he just shouldn't start 'David' on the supplements yet, give him a little time to weaken up.

While it was supremely tempting, it did violate that whole Hippocratic Oath thing. Jordan scowled to himself.

Instantaneously, Jilly's voice reacted to his expression. "Does David have something?"

"No, David doesn't." He forced a smile, and forced down the thoughts that were bubbling up about Jillian. He set the printout aside, stacking it on top of the pages of blood tests from every person in McCann. His and Jilly's were at the bottom of the pile, along with a flood of nerves. "What we need to do is go out and get the good sheriff and his boy to help us set up the road blocks."

Jillian's giggles mingled sweetly with the harsh ring of the old yellow phone and, covering her mouth, she ran off to the kitchen to answer it.

Jordan knew what she was laughing about, too. In an earlier attempt to find the appropriate methods of shutting down the town, they had set up your basic D.O.T. barricades. Only McCann wasn't a town. So they set up James Hann's two sawhorses at the east entrance of Main, and Sheriff Beard produced a real barricade from the trunk of his cruiser, only it said "City of Kingsport" in black, sprayed-on letters. Neither Jordan nor Jillian had questioned the sheriff on that.

Sheriff Beard was McCann born and bred, and he'd informed them in a deeply twisted drawl that 'them bear'cades ain't gone keep anyone in or out, folks'll just pick'em up and go on by.' So they had hopped into the Rav4, desperate for a trip out of town anyway, and searched every store they could find, finally stumbling across some old Halloween barricade tape reading "Beware. Beyond this point lies certain death". Jordan had wound up being the voice of reason on that one. Jilly had begged him to get it and laughed herself into tears. And Jordan knew then that it was true: when the serious ones go, everybody better watch out.

She came back into the room now, all trace of laughter gone from her face. She took in a deep breath to help expel the nasty thought she was about to speak. "Jeb Parson's daughter just found him on his living room floor."

He bit his tongue to keep from making the inappropriate response that Jillian should claim that ten dollars she had wanted to bet. She had the first piece of her Trifecta. Jordan pulled up to the conversation on a medical level instead. "He's in a coma?"

Her head shook slightly. "He was dead when she found him."

It was only then that he noticed she was fingering the rolls of yellow 'do not cross' tape that had arrived via one very perturbed FedEx driver this morning. His truck was splattered in mud unbecoming a professional. But he had delivered thousand-foot rolls of bright red biohazard and yellow quarantine tape, warning signs and corrugated waxed paper road barricades that assembled like cardboard dinosaurs. None of it would keep out a scooter, but it looked pretty official.

“We need to go to the Parson’s house then and-”

“We need to seal up the town.” Jillian’s firm voice pushed his concern down deeper. “Mr. Parson went down fast. We need to keep everyone who’s in in and everyone who’s out out. Until the men in suits get here tomorrow. Then we need to visit Sandy Parson and . . .” She turned around to walk out, but he heard her voice from the hallway. “-pray.”

They didn’t bother to unpack the remaining two boxes of barricade supplies, just shoved back what they had already inspected and threw the boxes into the trunk of the Rav4. They would have what they needed when they got there. Jillian tossed Jordan the keys, and was already flipping open her cell phone and dialing up some number she knew by heart. She paid little attention as she climbed into the passenger side of her own car. “Yes, David please.”

David please. He tamped down the urge to tell her that the polite form of address was ‘Doctor Carter’. Then he spent another round of thought on the fact that she had known the number by heart, and even if he was beginning to think something, he was too late. Too bad, so sad. And he’d better shove it down quick. If Jillian wanted to monkey around with someone it would have to be David Carter the second. Jordan had critical work to attend.

The conversation was brief and since the cell reception was so horrible, Jillian had to repeat everything she said at least three times. And Jordan had the whole conversation by the time she hung up. David Carter was not to leave his hotel room unless he spoke to her first. Not them, her.

It took fifteen minutes to drive the less-than-mile to the edge of town where Parson became Main. Hann’s sawhorses were still there, but true to Sheriff Beard’s prediction, they had been moved. Whoever drove through must have stopped to put them back, the gap wasn’t wide enough for a car.

Jordan parked the Rav4 right in the middle of the street after abandoning the idea of pulling over, and was greeted by a series of fresh hoofprints, dead center of the slightly widened gap. And he didn’t have a guess as to who the hell they belonged to. At this point in the game he wouldn’t have been shocked if a Conestoga wagon full of settlers showed up.

Jillian joined him and silently they each grabbed both red biohazard and yellow ‘Do Not Cross’ tape rolls and handfuls of wire. They separated and went about a hundred yards out from the road, winding tape around trees and wiring it to branches, sealing off the place at waist level. Jordan added tape and wire to hold the sawhorses into place. Someone would basically have to rip his work down in order to cross. Or jump it on their horse. He put his hands on his hips, and went about adding another level of tape at eye height. The yellow and red barricade looked flimsy but the tape was strong and wouldn’t rip. A good pair of shears would make short work of it though.

He wished that just for a moment he could tip his head back and be blissfully unaware, and enjoy the weather and the coming season. But he had worked hard and was still paying good money for the privilege of having his ignorance stripped away. So he simply opened the driver side door and she followed suit. They drove along, neither of them saying a word until they hit the west entrance of Main. The Kingsport D.O.T. roadblock still stood where they had left it, and Jordan looked specifically for horse tracks this time but saw none.

Meticulously laying out yards of the tape, Jordan hoped that being this far backwoods they wouldn’t wind up with a bad case of media crawling all over them. He and Jillian were both trained in what to say and how to refuse interviews should the news vans appear like vultures circling the town edges. He also knew how to keep things quiet and pray.

He was winding the last piece of red tape around the orange and white barricade, when he heard the gasp.

Knowing it didn't sound right, but having no other explanation, he looked up at Jilly, who was looking straight at him. They both turned to find a redheaded girl wearing jeans and low pigtails with a smattering of freckles just across the bridge of her nose. Jillian's expression gave away that she was rapidly searching her brain for a hint of recognition. Jordan knew instantly that he had never seen this girl before.

"Um?" Even with just that sound, it was clear that she wasn't the girl he had first thought her to be. After her next sentence it was clear from her accent that she wasn't a local and she was well educated. "I think you just taped my car in. . . . I . . . I have lab specimens in the front seat." She looked back and forth. "Oh dear God, what's biohazardous in there?"

Jordan's eyes narrowed, she didn't sound scared. But excited. Intrigued. And she was carefully trying to cover it. Jillian didn't catch that. She offered her most soothing tone, a mother to her child after a bad round of nightmares. "Oh, that's just to keep people out."

As the girl wiped her hand off on her jeans, he watched her stance shift. She knew what she was about and she held the cleaned hand out to him. "Dr. Rebecca Sorenson, UT Biodiversity Laboratories. And you are?" She said it with a lilt - that upward turn at the end of all sentences that females used to play inferior to their male counterparts. And she used it very well. Jordan heard the confidence behind it. She had known she didn't look the part. And he glanced down at his own sweatshirt and now dirty sneakers just briefly before sticking his own hand out to take hers.

He spoke quickly enough to divert the doctor's eyes from Jilly's surprised expression. "Dr. Jordan Abellard. CDCP Atlanta." He motioned to Jillian, who thankfully now had it together. "This is Dr. Jillian Brookwood, my colleague."

"Becky." Dr. Sorenson corrected as she slipped her grip out of his and transferred the handshake to Jillian. And just as quickly as she gave a good hard quick stare, indicating that she knew the score and she'd play fairly, she spoke again. "I won't go to the media."

"Thank you." Jillian's voice held unknown volumes of relief.

"Are people sick?" Becky looked them both in the eyes again. If he didn't answer her straight he would have to simply say he wouldn't tell her.

So he gave her one word. "Dying." And ignored Jillian's combined look of surprise and disapproval, but he saw that disappear even as he looked away and ignored her.

Becky turned the conversation toward him. Like Jordan, she knew an ally. "Why aren't you in full suits?" Then she answered her own question. "We've already been exposed."

She didn't show the emotion he expected.

But he nodded, confirming her answer.

"It's contagious." Her eyes wandered, focusing far away. And in a moment he realized that she was listening. And she frowned. Becky mumbled a word that sounded like 'warblers' but he didn't know what that meant. She looked him in the eyes again. "Wanna share?"

"Yes."

Jillian hid her shock better this time.

Becky sighed. "I have a series of mutated frogs and other species. You're standing in a spot that I just realized today when I came in has a reversed magnetic field."

Jillian's voice finally cut into the conversation. "We know."

JILLIAN PACED THE ROOM, finally keyed up enough to ignore her hideous surroundings. The bed still had not been fixed. And she desperately wanted to sit on it, lay back and maybe even cry. But she knew from experience that that would lead to rolling off. Which led to humiliation and frustration. And she couldn't sit in that horrible little ladder-backed chair for another moment. So she forced her feet to keep going. At least she would sleep at the end of this interminable day.

The motion served another purpose, siphoning off energy that she would gladly use to fillet Jordan alive. He had simply opened his fat mouth and spouted off to some girl with no ID a good portion of what the CDC knew, and what they didn't. And Jillian had no idea what reasoning he had. If any.

Not that they had been able to talk. Jordan had brought the girl back with them, and even called James Hann to see if they had a spare room for Miss Becky. Dr. Rebecca Sorenson and her mutated frogs had just left, finally, headed out to the Whippoorwill Inn. And Jordan sat in the wooden chair, re-reading printouts like the case was closed.

Jillian bit her tongue. She swallowed repeatedly. She pressed her lips together, as though that might keep it all down. But she knew better and of course it all came out anyway, with all the harsh air she had been holding back. "How the hell did you reason out telling her all that?"

Jordan looked up at her, not at all startled by her outburst. "She's not going to the media. She's with UT, and Biodiversity could be a big help."

Jillian's mouth hung slack for a moment before she put it in gear again. "She had no ID on her. You didn't even call UT to see if someone by that name works there!"

"She's trustworthy." Jordan remained calm.

Which just served to send Jillian rocketing to the other end of the spectrum. "Trustworthy!? How would you know? You just met her!"

He clenched his teeth then slung it right back at her. "Would you accept an argument from a blind man about the color of the sky?"

"Uh!" She knew she looked and sounded stupid standing there with her mouth open again. And she couldn't shut it off. The offended part of her brain stepped in to fill the void. "Blind! Well, I'm so sorry I wasn't born with your handy trust-o-vision, but you don't just blurt out classified material like that."

She had done it. She knew it. Jordan snapped, and came up out of the chair at lightning speed. He towered over her, his face close enough to fill her field of vision with the anger and hurt in his eyes, with his chestnut brows drawn tight together, with the clench of his jaw. "If we don't solve this, it's going to be named after us. And other people will die. What would you have me do, Jillian? Refuse help?"

Her teeth clicked, she brought them together so hard. She turned away out of his space in order to breathe in. And slowly out. It wasn't enough, and she forced herself to do it a second, then a third time. When she had pulled the pieces of herself together enough she spoke again. But she didn't look at him. "I may not have that intuition you do, but you should still consult me before you decide to spill secrets."

She felt his sigh even though her back was turned. "There wasn't enough time."

This time Jillian squared up and looked him directly in the eyes. "Yes, there was. And if you believe there isn't then you need to find the time."

He took a small concessionary step back as his hand came up to comb his fingers through his already rumpled hair. "You're right." His voice washed over her again a heartbeat later. "I'm sorry."

Jillian blinked in surprise as she felt all the support leave her, and she sank back onto the tilted mattress, knowing even as she did it that it was a mistake. She spread her knees, planting her feet firmly to brace herself against near-certain humiliation, and sunk her head into her hands. “What if she screws up the investigation?”

She heard the chair scrape up beside her before she felt the heat of his arm around her shoulders. “She won’t.”

She sniffed, and even as she did it became mortified.

“Hey, don’t cry. We’ll figure this out.”

With his acknowledgment it became impossible to hide the tears. “How am I going to figure this out when I can’t even remember not to sit on this stupid bed?”

She felt the deep rumble in Jordan’s touch long before she heard the sound of him laughing, and slowly she joined him. Even though her left leg ached from bracing herself upright.

Jillian finally gathered herself, the one concession to her tears a brief wipe with her sleeve. And she pushed herself off the bed and away from him before she faced him unable to hold back a final sniff. “I need ice cream.”

She rambled into the kitchen with Jordan following and pulled the carton out of the fridge, ignoring the roosters staring at her while she did it. She fixed two bowls and sat down, “We know that it isn’t airborne. The chain of infection just doesn’t make sense.”

“If it’s viral or bacterial it doesn’t match with anything known. So it isn’t contagious. And that leaves environmental as the best guess.”

She sighed, trying to enjoy the food, and grateful it was created outside the town boundaries. “But . . . we’ve checked everything. We have no standard radioactivity. No toxic chemicals. We’ve tested the water, the meat Parson’s has been getting, the air, the soil. What the hell else do we test?”

“We do have a magnetic anomaly in part of the town.” His spoon scraped the bottom of the bowl.

“Yeah, that magnetic reversal. It’s weird, but . . . let’s face it, an MRI is about a thousand times stronger than the earth’s field. And that’s an entirely enclosed magnetic field. And we put people in those every day, some people repeatedly, and aside from it yanking off your jewelry, there are no harmful effects. Certainly not vomiting and coma.”

She let a few bites melt on her tongue, before she started thinking aloud again. “It makes more sense that it’s immunological. Like AIDS was when they first saw it. It attacks people with weak systems.”

Jordan stood and politely rinsed out the bowl, which she was relatively certain had a pig staring up from the bottom. “But those people tested positive for everything. Ours test for nothing. Is it the weakened immune system combined with the magnetic field?”

Jillian shook her head and waited while she swallowed down the pat of ice cream she had just fed herself. “Immuno-compromised patients go into MRIs at five times the rate of non-immuno-compromised patients, without these effects.”

“How the hell do you know that?” He put his hands up. “Those cancer patients are often nauseated anyway, maybe the MRI compounds it and we just don’t see it.”

She shook her head in time to the thoughts churning inside. “It’s chemo that makes the patients nauseated, and there’re tons of immuno-compromised patients that don’t have chemo. But even then those patients still don’t exhibit ear pain, or coma and death. And if that is our culprit, those people ought to be going down fast and furious because they have far weaker systems than Mr. Parson did. . . What’s actually more than likely is that the magnetic reversal mucked up the machinery or assays and we have something standard but our results aren’t printing out.”

Jordan's grin crossed his face like a wash of brightness. "That's my girl."

• • • •

"HAVE YOU MEASURED THE strength of the field?" Becky rubbed her palms across the knees of her new jeans. Her bank account was now over two hundred dollars lighter due to four days of new underwear, two new pairs of jeans, t shirts and a sweatshirt. All from that fashion bastion WalMart. Never mind that she was on lockdown with men in her age range. Men that she'd never met before. Men with PhDs and MDs. And here she was dressed head to toe in cheap.

"Yup." David shook his head at her. "And I got nothing interesting. It's the same as the field anywhere. No Bermuda Triangle-like force to explain any of this."

She laughed, for a moment forgetting the roach that had scuttled out from under her bathroom linoleum and prompted her to knock on David's door suggesting a professional discussion. One that involved her being part of numbers greater than the roach. "So you're saying Atlantis isn't beneath the Appalachians?"

His eyebrows raised at her, blond and skeptical.

She had already topped the money she'd lost at WalMart with a very expensive phone call home, and she would have to call Marshall Harfield and tell him there were out-of-season warblers here, too. She changed the subject with little tact or concern. "So how long have the doctors had you holed up here?"

"Only since yesterday." He turned away, then back. "Are we all sharing here? And no one will be stealing or leaking anything until we all go public with it?"

She shrugged. "As long as the government doesn't declare it all classified and shut us down." David nodded. Looking every inch the son of the Senior Dr. Carter she had met three years ago. And every inch unconcerned about a penny of this trip. He sat on the edge of the gold polyester bedspread that reminded her so much of the one on her parents bed back home and ran both hands through his hair, showing her for the first time that the gold strands were thinning just a bit at his crown. "Okay, just outside of town, there's a geological hotspot we found on a dig. When the last polar shift occurred the polarity reversed there first. Maybe as little as a thousand years before the poles swapped on earth. There's another hotspot in Montana. And they're at the KT boundary."

"The dinosaur extinction." Becky supplied. When David gave her the slightest nod she kept going. "Do you think the pole reversal is tied to the die out?"

He put his hands palm up as though asking for divine inspiration. "My partner, Greer Larson is a paleontologist, and he thinks it may be, but we're still not sure."

"So, do you think we're on our way to another pole reversal right now?" She spoke in that slow southern fashion she knew belied her education and, at times like this, her concern.

"I don't know." He was upright again, unable to contain his nervous energy, his docksiders wearing a circular pattern on the already threadbare carpet.

"But you have a gut feeling . . .? You look like that's your professional opinion but not your personal one."

David faced her, his eyebrows up again, his mouth quirking, but only on the one side. "You and Abellard ought to get along great with your little insights." David sank next to her on the saggy bed, and him ceasing to move lowered the tension she didn't even realize she'd been building.

"So?"

"The short answer is 'yes'. I do think we're sitting on the next pole reversal. But according to our past data it may take a few thousand years. As best we can tell, we're due in any day now. Of course, even our best estimates are give-or-take fifty thousand years. But within the past years the poles have begun shifting. We don't have any historical evidence--"

"Excuse me?" Becky leaned toward him. "The poles are shifting now? Our north and south?"

"Yup. About twelve years ago it was discovered that magnetic north had moved. Just a little, but enough. Four years later it was even further off. It's sliding fast these days. Geologically speaking, of course."

"Wow." She breathed in, aware of her own functioning just for a second, absorbing what he was telling her and shuffling it cleanly in with her own information. "They just slide right around?"

"No. As best we can tell, they do start sliding slowly, but individual hotspots reverse first. Weird little pockets of backward magnetics. Like here. Then as the hotspots become more numerous, they meld and, eventually, in a bang, the poles snap. Instantly magnetic north is south and south is north."

Her own backyard would then be a 'hotspot' as David put it. There really might be the rain of frogs the scientist in her was so skeptical of.

"You don't have to look so disturbed. It's all just a theory."

"Of course." Her whole life was based on 'just theories'. "And the competing ideas are?"

He ticked off the possibilities on his fingers as he rolled his eyes. "Our data sucks. All the samples were actually from riverbeds. Meaning a meteor could create that pull. Or an Atlantis-like anomaly. Or we're all retarded and we're just so anxious to see something that we're fucking up our samples."

"Yeah, I'm sure that one went over well with your Dad."

David made a hard choking sound. And Becky continued. "I met him once. He was a nice man. But he didn't seem the type to take that kind of disparagement from anyone."

David went back to talking rocks, brushing aside her reference to his father. "Then the last alternate theory is that we're right. That's exactly how it happens, except we've got our dates off by, oh say, twenty million years."

"I see."

He scrubbed his face with his palms, blinking a few times with the rush of red he had worked into his features. "I was going to go the Montana site, where the KT hotspot was and see if there's a hotspot there now. But I'm quarantined. And United Airlines doesn't give a 'detained in quarantine by the CDC' refund." He turned and looked her in the eye for only the second time since she came here tonight, and she sensed it coming. Her turn. "So what's your story?"

“Shove over!” It was tired and drawn out, and Jillian pushed against his back with all the strength in her arms. It wouldn’t have been enough even if she had been fully awake, completely stress-free, and stronger. Jordan asleep was a rock not worth her effort. “Jorrrdaaannn.”

It was the wail of the insomniac. She had heard it on her rounds as an intern and now regretted that she hadn’t found more sympathy for the sufferers. And now her mind wouldn’t shut off. They had called FedEx at midnight after frantically separating portions of the blood samples to send a full set of all they had collected to the Atlanta Office for re-testing. Just in case the machinery was warped by the almost non-existent magnetic field. Mike should be faxing them the results this morning and then Landerly and the quarantine crew would arrive later this afternoon.

Becky wanted to spend the day catching frogs. Jillian desperately wanted to inspect these biological specimens Becky was going to get. Check out the habitat. See if there would be any clues to the mysterious Abellard-Brookwood disease.

But in order to traipse through the woods she would have to get a good night’s sleep. And in order to get that, Jordan would have to shove his lead butt over a few damn inches! She gave another heave against his back and accomplished only the barest of deep sleep acknowledgments from him.

She’d stopped asking James Hann to fix the other bed. How could she push him to repair it? Tell him that she didn’t want to have to share a bed with her husband? She punched at her pillow and tried to find comfort and sleep on her small wedge of mattress. Forcing her thoughts to her puppy George from childhood, she willed sleep to come and found herself thinking of her mother instead. What would Mrs. Brookwood say if she knew her daughter was in bed with a man she wasn’t married to? Hell, her Daddy might just jam the business end of his twelve gauge into Jordan’s back and walk him to the altar. She was too exhausted to decide if that thought should make her laugh or cry.

At last, as the light brightened, sneaking around the shades and further into the room, Jillian felt the heavy weights of rest pulling her eyes closed.

“Jilly.” The soft whisper was accompanied by a warm hand that fit on her shoulder and rocked her gently. She felt the low tetany of a ‘hmmmmmm’ tremor through her chest but didn’t care enough if she actually made the noise.

“Jilly, baby, I need you to wake up just a little.”

This time the shake was firmer, and this time she made sure she was heard. “No thank you.” She rolled away. The hands rolled her back over. Her eyes popped opened and her features scrunched against the piercing light.

“Baby, Mr. Hann is checking the pipes in the bath.” Jordan’s face was only inches from her, and she felt the wash of jealousy over his chipper alertness. Until she remembered that she was the one who had paid for his heavy refreshing slumber. And then she hated him for it.

“Baby,” She forced her voice, now that she knew why he was being so oddly affectionate. “You almost shoved me out of our bed last night.”

“I know. I’m sorry.” He sat on the edge of the queen-sized mattress, taking up the space she had occupied just a few minutes ago. “That’s why I let you sleep in so late.” He pointed to the clock and the blurry red digits proclaiming it was already well past eleven. “Why don’t you go back to sleep? I just didn’t want you to wake up and be startled, or walk into the bathroom and find Mr. Hann in there.”

“Huh?” She shoved up, leaning back on her hands, unconcerned that she could hear James Hann in the other room futzing with the broken bed. Or that she was in a sleepshirt and the covers were rolling away. Her face felt pushed and shoved in wrong directions and her eyes still didn’t open all the way.

Jordan’s hand cupped her shoulder again. “Why don’t you just go back to sleep? I just didn’t want you to wake up and be startled, or walk into the bathroom and find Mr. Hann in there.”

“I’m awake.” But the thick slurring of her words said otherwise. Her movements were slow and awkward. Jordan was able to push her back down without much resistance.

He pulled the covers up, tucking them around her shoulders in a gesture that almost made up for the bed being taken over last night. When she felt his hand brush her hair back off her forehead, she understood with certainty why the spider-bite girl in Florida had loved him so much.

Her eyes rolled open and shut a few times over the next several hours, and only on the surface of her mind was she aware that Mr. Hann had left, and Jordan’s footsteps were carrying to her more as vibrations than sounds while she tried to find the will to get up.

“Jilly? You do need to get up now.” In dim light she saw him check his watch, though she hadn’t been aware that she had opened her eyes. “Landerly will be here in about an hour.”

Cold water could not have been more effective. And the insulting remark to ask why he had not woken her sooner was barely stopped in its tracks by her brain. By force of will she pushed out the words she really meant. “Thank you for letting me sleep in this morning.”

“It’s the least I could do after playing hostile takeover in my sleep last night.” She glanced back at him and held her tongue again, but only because he had the decency to look sheepish.

She was in the bathroom before she called back to him, “Did Hann get the pipes all fixed?”

“No. They still squeal but they work.”

“Well, it’ll wake me all the way up at least.” She started to close the door but his voice stayed her hand.

“I got a call about fifteen minutes ago. Gemma McKnight went down this morning.”

She stepped back out of the bathroom, concern on her face as her arms folded across her chest. “Dead?”

“Only comatose.” He looked away, sadness painted on his features. They both only knew of one way out of this coma.

She breathed in deep of air that felt fresher than almost anything she’d inhaled in her life but was probably deadly. “Gemma was only borderline on her labs.” She turned to go back into the bathroom, stopping just short and turning back to Jordan, excitement bringing her back to the living. “Unless, of course they were wrong.”

He just shook his head. And didn’t look like he was going to say much more, just planned to stand there with the borrowed coffee mug complete with roostertail handle. She waited him out while he sipped at it, until he finally conceded to her stare and explained. “Mike faxed the results in this morning. Number for number they are dead on to ours.”

“Nice choice of words.”

The shower was less than refreshing, and she found herself on the edge of being flat out angry. There was nothing in this godforsaken house that was comfortable. And every time she encountered another person in this town of the damned, things went awry. They got sick. They delivered the news that someone else was ‘down’. Seven people had died and fourteen more were comatose.

Wrapping herself in a towel, Jillian peeked out to find the room vacant and closed the door tightly before dressing. She hadn’t worn jeans this often since she was an undergrad. Leaving her hair hanging wet down her back, she padded out into the kitchen to find Jordan at the small round table eating a bowl of frosted flakes. Giving in to the urge to make only the most minimal effort, she grabbed a bowl and spoon. Then she lined up a row of eight pills of varying sizes and shapes, and one by one washed each one back trying to ignore what they meant.

They ate quietly and she was sure that his thoughts mirrored her own. Landerly was coming. And they had nothing good to tell him. No leads. Every road a dead end. And townspeople dying. One by one. Her thoughts strayed to the CDC vans that might even now be turning off the interstate and she prayed they had the wherewithal to arrive in differing unmarked cars. And at different times. Even just that many normal cars headed into McCann could raise someone's suspicions, but a white CDC caravan would have the press on them like flies on dead meat.

She started at the sound of a car pulling into the driveway then bouncing the long distance to the house. Jordan's gaze caught hers but they still didn't speak.

Landerly was here.

Jillian abandoned her half finished cereal and hit the front door, coming to a dead stop when she spotted the yellow space suit climbing out of the van and approaching her.

What had she been thinking? Of course they were in full suits. They had no idea what this was. She might have been showering in it. Or sleeping in it. Or inhaling it. If not simply getting it from touching, and being near those who had it or had already died from it.

She stood in the open doorway, feeling Jordan just behind her, only he didn't give off the waves of shock she was sure she emanated. "Landerly." His voice was strong and she could feel the heat from the coffee mug he again cradled.

"Abellard. Brookwood." Landerly's voice from inside the bubble hood was distorted. As though it had been yelled through a pair of paper cups and a string. "We have a full DeCon tent set up at the perimeter."

"Are we clearing the town sir?" Jillian upped her volume, even though she knew he had a microphone to collect sounds from outside the muffled interior.

"Not yet." His head shook even though the bubble-faced suit did not. "We talked with Drs. Carter and Sorenson on the way in today and we have them running a full magnetic check of the town. Then we'll clear anyone we can out of the reversal area."

Jordan's voice carried from over her shoulder. "Do you think it will do any good?"

Landerly held back a sad smile. "No. But we need to do it anyway."

Jillian fought the urge to defend their work. But she wished suddenly that she hadn't found the excitement that she had come to the CDC searching for. "Do we need to go through DeCon? Get suits?"

"No suits."

She should have known it. They'd already been exposed to the point where Landerly didn't see the need to waste money on them.

But he kept talking, interrupting the morbid river of her thoughts. He was looking at the house. "Damn, this thing is ugly."

"You should see the inside." Jordan's grin was evident in his tone, and Jillian wondered if he really thought it was funny or if it was a set-up on a cruel practical joke.

"All right, you two need to pack everything that's personal. Leave the CDC set-up and gather all the paperwork. Do that first." He turned and walked slowly and painfully to the van.

When it became clear that Landerly had explained everything he was going to, they simply headed back inside to begin their first assignment of packing up the files.

“What the hell is this-” Jordan pulled up short at the door to the ‘lab’ bedroom. A suit stood in the center and pretended not to hear them or actually didn’t. His back remained turned and he snapped photo after photo, inspecting each one on the small screen on his digital camera before turning his focus to the next thing.

Jillian pressed up on tiptoe to spy on the rendering of the most recent photo and was startled to see that it was of the wall charts, and clear enough to read every word. She grabbed a set of papers and when she turned she smacked into Jordan again.

“Hey.”

“Sorry.” But she didn’t look up, focused only on the pain in her nose and holding the tears at bay. Although if they were from the sting to her face or her pride she was unsure.

She felt her arm jerk in the socket before she realized Jordan had a death grip on her elbow. “It’s not that.” He stayed still and silent until she acknowledged him with a clear gaze. “Don’t be sorry. People are dying here. Just don’t go tripping and breaking a leg or getting an open wound. Now’s not the time to stress your immune system in the slightest.”

“Oh yeah. Landerly sending in the suits and giving us crazy orders that we don’t understand doesn’t stress my system at all.” Only to herself did she admit that her sarcasm masked a very real fear.

Jordan still didn’t loosen his hold on her arm. “I’ll get the rest of the papers and you start packing. You have more to pack than I do anyway.”

She resented the underlying sexism in the remark, until she admitted that it might not be biased but simply truthful. Her arm was free and so she didn’t look up but concentrated on the ground in front of her as she headed off.

Her hands and feet worked independently of her head, folding and rolling her clothing and stuffing it back into the duffle bag and she remained silent. Jordan appeared at her side with his own bag and together they went to the front door, encountering Landerly coming up the walk. His gait in the suit gave away his age, and Jillian wondered what it was about this case that got him out and about. Wasn’t that what she and Jordan had been hired to prevent?

“I was just getting ready to see what was holding you two up.”

Jillian opened her mouth to protest that it had been barely fifteen minutes since they had been ordered to clear out, but Jordan’s hand grasped at her wrist. Not that it mattered anyway, Landerly was talking again without paying the slightest bit of attention.

“We’ve got teams checking out the three cases you pulled as evidence - two of them appear to be the real deal. And there’re another two cases in Florida in that nursing home that I authorized you two to visit while I was in Hawaii. You’re going back.”

Jillian’s mouth hung slack, but she managed to keep it from gaping. Her eyes went wide with real fear. None of the ideas she had had about Landerly’s packing them up had to do with the possibility of further outbreaks. She had almost forgotten the Florida cluster. The entire nursing home had been exposed. She shook her hand, loosing it of Jordan’s now tighter grip that had threatened her circulation.

Landerly kept talking as though neither of them could possibly need a second or two to assimilate the damage and possibilities he was laying at their feet. “You’ll pick up Dr. Carter en route. He’s already back at his hotel packing, as he’ll be going with you to check out the area. Dr. Sorenson is staying here and will be working for the CDC obtaining wildlife specimens. We need everything you can gather on the Deltona cluster. See if we can crack this thing. It’s getting ugly.”

He turned away, finished.

Two suits emerged then from the back of the van, and from the looks of the gesturing all of the files had been duplicated. Jordan took her duffle bag from her nearly slack wrist and went to throw it in the back of the Rav4, only to be stopped by a suit. Jillian's brain was working too fast to think about where she was going. So she set herself behind Jordan and followed like a little duck wherever he went.

The cluster in Florida was growing. That indicated either contagion or . . . continued toxin exposure or . . . or a bizarre vector or . . . or . . . long incubation period. And that was the worst, that would mean far-reaching spread. The way AIDS was all over before anyone knew it even existed. Lentiviruses, or those that remained inactive long after infection, could be serious to society simply because the spread was undetected for so long that tracing the path from victim to victim was nigh unto impossible.

With a start from her morbid thoughts she realized the afternoon sky was a shade of blue you couldn't see in the city, and the autumn trees were alive in reds and golds she hadn't seen in a long long while.

• • • •

"I'M SORRY, YOU'RE GOING to have to fill me in on what the fuck you two are babbling about." David leaned forward, saying what he wished he'd said an hour ago.

The two of them had sat with their heads tucked together speaking English with enough Latin thrown in to be damned obnoxious. It was giving him a headache, and stress in his shoulders. And worse, it made him feel under-educated.

They looked up at his comment as though only just then realizing that he was on this plush flying den with them. And he almost stood up and walked to the back of the room again. He could just help himself to another scotch. Or he could stand his ground.

"What can we tell him?"

Jordan spoke as though he wasn't there. That cretin had the hots for Dr. Brookwood, too. But the more David watched the more certain he was that there wasn't anything actually going on. What he was uncertain of was whether the hot doc returned the feelings.

She shrugged and frowned and pursed her lips, and if they weren't flying straight into the pits of hell - retirement haven, Florida - he would have been turned on. "I don't know." She looked away from Abellard and up at him, causing him to realize that he had in fact stood up.

The CDC had appointed their private Lear jet quite nicely. The seats were pale leather, and cushy as hell. And in the back was a full bar that he had been the only one to avail himself of. For a brief moment he entertained the thought that Jillian wasn't yet old enough to drink.

"David, what level of security clearance do you have?" Jillian's voice was sweet but off, a perplexed honey bringing him back to the bizarre reality he was in.

He smiled a smile that spoke of the scotch he'd already had and the one he'd like to have next. "I have no idea. Let me know when you can speak to me."

It was Jordan who proposed an answer to the dilemma. "He must have some sort of emergency clearance. Landerly sent him with us." He looked up, not having moved from where he had swiveled his own seat to sit all cozy with Jillian. "Landerly is nothing if not logical. I'll take the heat for whatever we share with you. He can't mean for us to keep you in the dark."

David took the seat next to Dr. Brookwood, willing to give up the scotch in favor of a little maneuvering. He was upset to find that he liked Dr. Abellard, but that didn't mean he wouldn't steal sweet little Jillian right out from under him. Well, from the looks of things, she hadn't been under him yet. With effort, he redirected his thoughts and focused on Jordan. "What is it that I need to know?"

"We have a spot of reversed polarity, which is weird as hell, and people in that spot are dying of something we can't classify. All our tests are coming up negative. If it's a virus it's got a protein coat unlike any we've ever seen before. All the assays are missing it."

Jillian's voice broke in beside him. "We can't find anything with microscopic analysis either."

"But you couldn't have had the best equipment there in McCann, right?"

Jordan nodded, "True, but we've been sending samples back and forth. The Atlanta office can't find anything either and they've got the best machinery anywhere."

David soaked in that for a second. "It sounds like you've got your hands full, and I have to say that I have no idea why I'm even here."

Jillian had stood and was stretching, the only one of the three of them to be able to reach full extension in the plush but midget height fuselage. "You're convenient?"

"You wound me."

"Yes, but I'll bring you another scotch to soften the blow."

So he asked it. "Are you even old enough to serve scotch?"

Her eyebrows quirked, but Jordan's voice carried to him, over his shoulder now because David had twisted as Jillian climbed over him and made her way back to the bar. "She's a physician, you know."

He twisted back around, "Yeah, but maybe she's really accelerated. It happens."

Jillian interrupted them to ask David again if he was going to take her up on that scotch. Right as her hand appeared over his shoulder handing Jordan what looked like a gin and tonic that he hadn't even asked for. Jordan smiled and said thank you, before meeting David in an eye lock that said he had some idea what the geologist was about.

Whatever.

In a minute he had his scotch and Jillian settled in beside him with a margarita.

"So? Upset stomach? Then coma, then death." David thought that was way too simple a way for a person to die. No bells, no whistles, no grand symptoms. "Are you serious?"

"As a heart attack."

"And it's contagious?"

Jordan shrugged and lifted his drink in a long swallow that revealed more about his tension than his words or manner. It was Jillian who stepped up, filling in the holes.

"We can trace transmission from person to person. But with a small town like McCann that really doesn't mean much. At this point quarantine is mostly to keep tabs on everyone who's been exposed. We can't begin to hope to control spread at this point. Jordan and I are headed to Florida to pool the new data with what we have."

"Are they evacuating McCann?"

"As we speak." She said it like it was somehow her fault. So he changed the subject.

"What if the Florida site is a hotspot?"

"Then we've got some serious problems." Jillian set the unfinished drink aside and pulled a blanket out from under the seat, as though she had known all along that it was there. Covering herself, she turned away, tucking her feet up under her.

Jordan swiveled sideways and pulled out a sheaf of papers to leaf through, leaving David with his own thoughts. And he didn't like them very much.

He'd had an upset stomach when he had visited McCann the first time. So had Greer. And it had passed. Did that mean he'd been exposed? Was he now immune? The CDC didn't seem to be worrying too much about these two docs, although they all had been put on a regimen of medications. Then again, maybe it was just too late to do much more than medicate them and pray. And David didn't put much stock in prayer. It hadn't yielded anything of value for him before.

He tapped Jordan's shoulder, impatient for the millisecond it took the doctor to acknowledge him. "Are there carriers for this disease?"

"We have no idea. We can't figure out anything except that we've never seen it. The symptoms aren't like anything we know so we can't even assume it will act like other things of the same family." He looked back down at his papers, then up again, "Why?"

He almost couldn't say it. "My friend Greer had an upset stomach. Worse than me, when we were here the first time. He's gone home to his wife, who's pregnant. Could he pass it to her?"

"I have no idea. I'm sorry." Somehow Dr. Abellard managed to look like he actually was sympathetic. Yet within a second he was back to thumbing through his papers and jotting down numbers on a miniature legal pad.

David sank back in his seat, inadvertently swiveling it he let it rock gently back and forth, sustained in an almost harmonic motion by the flight of the plane. His scotch turned wet and slippery in his hands, leaving him no choice but to polish it off before the ice melted and it became even more of a soggy mess. He reclined the chair and, in minutes, sleep rolled over him, taking him to a foggy place with gravitational forces from all sides, and fossils that contained writing instead of bones.

• • • •

"MOM, I'M GOOD." BECKY shoved a hand through her hair, realizing that she was overdue for a shower. Her mother had started with 'I'm afraid that you're going to get sick.' And like a well written essay, all you needed was the topic sentence. The rest was just the jabberings of a mother well practiced in the art of worry.

Becky listened with only half an ear, waiting for a break in the tone or speed, hoping to get a word in. "I'm eating, Mom. In fact, the CDC is monitoring my diet. Even you aren't as strict as these guys." Becky left out the part about the medications they were feeding her and the men in the yellow space suits. "I need to know about the frogs. Are Brandon and Mel taking good care of them?"

"Yes. They went out and caught a few more just yesterday-"

"No! Mom, don't let them out there!"

"Why is that?"

Becky felt the gloved, yellow hand on her shoulder. They were monitoring the conversation, as Becky was still waiting for an emergency clearance status. The agent listening in was one of the conditions of phone privileges, lest she spill the scary beans.

"Mom, that area mutated the frogs." She didn't lie, she just didn't tell the whole truth. "I don't want the kids out there without me. And I need Aaron's new cell number. I tried his place a few times and got no answer."

She pressed her mother to go just a little faster, without revealing that an agent was standing over her shoulder, or any other little tidbit that would scare the woman even more. Becky spoke about three more words before artfully extricating herself from the conversation, a skill perfected out of necessity.

The space-suited alien didn't comment, he simply took the portable phone out of her hands and walked out of her tent, locking the 'door' behind him. Her bizarre forced vacation was turning into the equivalent of Siberian work detail. She had actually been digging in the hard earth with a pick earlier today. If she had worn metal ankle cuffs with links leading to the next digger she couldn't have felt more imprisoned.

At least the CDC had even seen fit to send her three little rana along with her. The poor frogs were even more incarcerated than she. Each in its own little terrarium, always facing the heart of McCann. Becky hadn't learned much from her digging. The underground species seemed unharmed. But the local amphibians were whacked out, the newts and salamanders suffering the same kinds of fates as the local frogs.

The frogs she had pulled here were, in general, four-legged, but not any luckier than her first batch. The majority of these guys were blind, and many were pale in color, making it a wonder that so many existed. Pale wasn't a good camouflage color, so animals like that were often picked off by predators first thing. And the sheer numbers of these guys that were bordering on white made her wonder if they tasted bad or something.

Good, another thing to do tomorrow. And here she'd been afraid she'd get bored.

Tamping her internal sarcasm back down Becky made the mental effort to realign her thoughts. First she had to call Aaron while it was still early enough that he would answer his cell. She stuck her head out the door and asked for the phone again. The guy looked at her like she was a bother, and Becky had no doubt that she was.

Aaron answered on the first ring. And she explained more than she had to her mother. "Don't let Mel and Brandon back there. I know they want to play . . . but . . ."

"But what?" Aaron had never settled for the 'I'm the authority, do as I say' answer. And he had rubbed one person in town the wrong way with that over and over - their father. But now, Becky wished he'd give her a bye just this once.

But she gave him a little more information instead. "Frogs develop after they're born. So the environment affects that. Clearly something is wrong there. And Brandon and Melanie are still developing themselves. So please, just keep them out."

"Sure, sis." There was a pause, and even over the phone she could hear his brain gearing up to ask a harder question. "Does this have anything to do with the other area you found and your little 'extended research trip'?"

Becky sucked in a breath. The yellow suit sitting and listening in this time wasn't the same as a few hours ago. So she risked that they would cut off her phone privileges and just said, "Yes." And before he could ask anything more, she jumped in again. "I need you to do me a favor."

"Is this one of those 'no questions asked' favors? And when the bodies start piling up, I'm going to get disbarred kinds of things?"

Becky wondered why he'd had to use that reference to bodies. As if he knew more, or could read more from her tone, than he was letting on. So again she just said "Yes." She tried to put a little laugh in it, but she wasn't that good of an actress.

The yellow suit man gave her a stare, but she shrugged at him, like what was I supposed to say? And she asked Aaron to go out and recheck the boundaries of the site.

"Becky, are you in trouble? Am I going to regret this?" His voice was a hiss and the irritation and tired humor that had spun through his words even just a few exchanges ago was gone.

"Aaron, I'm okay." It was the best she could tell him, not knowing if she was sitting around waiting to die. "And you might help a lot of important research with this. Thank you."

He said a quick good-bye and hung up.

Looking up with a conjured smile, Becky handed the disconnected phone back to the suit, knowing they'd return with it when Aaron called her back. And she waited.

An hour later the suit came back in with the phone. "Hello?"

"Becky? Why the hell did I have to go through some sort of security check to get to you?" Aaron was clearly worried. And there was nothing she could really do about it.

"Because you did. How's the site?"

"Nothing." She could hear the chirping of cicadas in the back ground and the usual woods noises. He was there now.

"So it's all the same." She let out a breath, startled by its release.

"No, there's nothing here. The compass needle doesn't move at all. I walked the whole boundary twice."

Her brows pulled down, and her fingernail tried to compete with her words for space between her teeth. "So north is north and the whole site is just a staked out boundary?"

"Looks like it to me . . . wait. No, north is still south according to the compass." He sounded as perplexed as his words were making her. "But it's not changing at the boundary line. Not like before. It was real clear, now . . . nothing."

Her heart raced, throwing a lump up into her throat. She couldn't even think of the implications of what Aaron was telling her. So she asked the obvious. "Can you find the edge?"

Through the cell phone connection she could hear his boots crunching through the undergrowth. "Already looking for it. . . wait. Got it!"

"Where are you? Where is it?"

"About ten feet out."

"God. Aaron, just get out of there. Go home."

Jordan woke to the sound of sledgehammers keeping cadence inside his head. It was their third day here, and nothing was new. Oh, except the mysterious Brookwood-Abellard had struck Florida again. One of the coma victims had slunk off into quiet death yesterday morning. And fate was claiming another. Maxie Londers had only had ear pain prior to this. But quickly the vomiting that had begun at four a.m. had changed and Maxie was now on a ventilator, awaiting her turn into the kingdom of whatever god she chose.

He ached for the Levinsons. Art was less obvious in his grief than Maddie, but maybe more touching for that exact reason. Rolling his face into his pillow, Jordan made a half-assed attempt at self-suffocation. He should get up and brush his teeth and get dressed like every other day of his life. But unlike every other he would breathe a little harder down David's neck, begging and praying for a resolution to this thing.

On the one hand he wanted the problem to be the magnetic reversal. Problem solved. The bug they couldn't find didn't exist. Not their fault. But that would leave holes of uninhabitable space on earth. Surely all the hotspots couldn't be in North America, right? There had to be others elsewhere, right? And at that point the problem went way out of his scope. Hell, it had been out of his scope a week ago.

David was trying. Becky was trying. Jilly's fingers were about bare to the bone and his own back was about to break. He could simply cry foul and give up. He and Jillian had kept sharing a room, leaving the second free as workspace. So he could just not go into the workroom again. Simply ignore all of it.

"It's like there's nothing here to find." Her voice was soft in the false darkness created by the blackout curtains. It came from over his shoulder and the rhythm and timbre told him she'd been awake for at least a while. "I've kicked myself a dozen times this past week for not being a pediatrician."

He couldn't suppress the small laugh, and he finally rolled to face her. Somehow she was bundled under the covers with the look of a child huddled against the cold of winter. "What do you say we just leave and go set up a practice together? We'd be good."

"No, we're just missing something. I know it."

He sat up, letting the sheet slide down him, fully awake. If Jillian thought there was a connection they were missing, if it was niggling at the corner of her brain, then he trusted that it was there.

She sat up too, holding her head as though to keep the information from sloshing out. "There's a numbers issue that we're missing here."

Jordan's feet hit the less than plush carpet and he started pacing, energy renewed at even this slight prospect. "We aren't at quarantine, and we're way too populated here. It's too high profile to swarm down in yellow suits."

"No, it's not about quarantine. It's about numbers I saw somewhere."

They needed to be up and dressed and in the other room where all the numbers were lined up in neat rows and gathered on charts waiting for them. He forced a deep breath into his lungs. "I'm going to get dressed and go down and grab some food, then I'll bring it back-"

"No." It was positively frantic. "You can't leave me alone. Just keep talking to me. It's like a word on the tip of my tongue." She was throwing off the covers and stepping out in her shorts pajamas that sported a squinty-faced red-head and the words bad hair day. At another time it would have made him laugh.

“Okay.” And even as he extracted himself from her grasp she re-clung to him. “What’s wrong, Jilly? Are you all right?”

She waved her hands in front of her face. “It’s here. And if I don’t solve it people will die!”

The starch left him. Perhaps Jillian didn’t have any answers. She just had fear and guilt the same as him. “Let me go into the bathroom and get dressed. Then we’ll go down and get breakfast.” He didn’t mention numbers again or solving anything. He didn’t really think they would.

“I’ll change out here while you’re in there.”

He nodded. Even in a panic, and buried under a brickload of guilt, Jillian was efficient. Closing the door behind him, Jordan allowed himself a brief measure of time where he could ignore the fact that Jilly was close to tears just beyond the wall. And that the hallway door would only open to a host of other responsibilities and problems.

They wandered down for the continental breakfast, and were heading back, food balanced in their hands when she stopped, almost causing him to put steaming coffee down her back.

“Room numbers.” She pointed at the numbers they were passing with each door down the hallway. “But not numbers.” With no warning she went from off to on and started back down the hall. “Not numbers.” Again she muttered, and Jordan knew that he would be the one to set down his carefully balanced breakfast and fish out the magnetic room key.

She was passing him into their room when her head snapped up. “Room colors!”

He nodded, his brain catching on to her excitement. As though he, too, could now see light at the end of the tunnel. He just didn’t know what was producing that light. “The Levinsons color-coordinate the bedrooms so the guests don’t have to remember anything but their color.”

She ungraciously unloaded her food onto the side table. “All the patients were in color coordinated rooms. And if we go back and check I’ll bet they’re all at one end of the house.”

He mentally tabbed through what he remembered of each of the patients, calling up a face, and a mental picture of the room. One blue, one pink, one purple, all at one end of the long house. “They were all in the north end. Even the new ones.”

They nodded at each other with Jordan supplying the words. “Another physical anomaly. But then why hasn’t David found anything?”

Heavy breathing sounded in the open doorway over his shoulder and Jordan leaped around to find David hanging in the gaping space, sucking in air even as he spoke. “David has.”

“What?” Jordan took in the wrinkled and filthy khakis and the bags under his eyes. Whatever David had been up to he hadn’t been dressed for it.

“There is just now a start of a reversal at the north end of the house. It’s a small spot. With a small field.”

“Why didn’t we see it before?” Jillian walked toward David, but it was Jordan who handed over his coffee with an “I didn’t drink any of it” to a grateful David.

“I’m used to seeing this stuff in deep layers. There’s a history of reversal here, but no one ever recorded it before. All the strata tell the story. But, right now the top layer is showing the shift, too. Not my forte, but I found it.” He took a sip of the steaming silt water and had the wherewithal to thank Jordan.

“So why are you just telling us now?” Jillian shook her head, still looking inside, not focused on either of the men in front of her, Jordan knew the signs.

“Because, sweetcheeks, I was up all night playing in the dirt.”

Yup, Jordan thought to himself, that matches the appearance.

“And I only just now found it.” He tipped up the cup, draining the last of Jordan’s coffee. “So you two can call the old doc and tell him it’s high time to move these people out! And I am now going to sleep.”

With that, he practically rolled out of view and Jordan heard the metallic click of his door closing just a second later.

Jillian stood stock still, thinking. “We’re missing somebody.”

Not able to help her think, Jordan called Atlanta, but not Landerly. “Mike, it’s Jordan.”

“All our numbers exactly match yours.” Something about the tones in his voice made Jordan sure that Mike was in the lab.

“Yeah, I figured they’d match.” His hand went automatically through his hair, a gesture of frustration. “But I’ve got another set of info for you to run.”

“Lay it on me, I’m going to be sitting on my assays here in a few minutes.”

Jordan laughed. “That’s funny.”

“What?”

“Sitting on my assays.”

“Oh.” He could hear the shrug in Mike’s voice, as though the thought had never occurred to him. “What do you need?”

“I need you to do a statistical comparison of the numbers we’re getting for our people and the general population.”

But Mike was Mike, and in a minute he got it. “What are my controls?”

Jordan rattled off the stats, then Mike was gone, his hands no doubt resuming their usual speed as he plated samples and provided numbers for them.

Turning, he found Jillian watching him. “Was that Landerly?”

That showed how long she had been paying attention. “No, Mike. He’s going to run a standard deviation for us. See if the reversal is lowering people’s immune systems so they get sick, or if it’s making already weak people sick.”

He could see her absorb that in a lightning flash, and as she made eye contact with him he realized her eyes were bright. He was opening his mouth to ask, but she beat him to it. “I know what we missed.”

“Yeah?” From the look on her face he was certain he didn’t want to hear it.

“Eddie.”

• • • •

BECKY SAT ON THE EDGE of her cot. With her legs apart and her elbows balanced on her jeans-covered knees. No one was dying anymore. In fact, everyone who’d been in quarantine had stayed healthy for five whole days. And according to Jillian and Jordan things hadn’t been going anything like that before they were all moved out of town. So good news was coming. Certainly.

And with the little blind amphibians she was picking up here, along with some seriously disturbed insects, she was certain that the environment was to blame. Amen to that, and here were the men, no longer in their yellow suits, approaching her. She just knew that they were ending the quarantine. Becky stifled a ‘Halleluiah!’

Two of them walked up in jeans and t-shirts looking very unlike the CDC scientists they were. But then again they were in backwoods Tennessee, and not their offices in Atlanta. She hazarded a glance down at herself and thought she didn’t look very scientific herself. One of them nodded at her like he knew her, which was only confusing, until he opened his mouth. From his voice she could tell he was the one who had brought her the phone, consistently listening in on her conversations for the past three days. Briddle.

“Quarantine’s over?” She looked up expectantly, praying for an okay to return home, and check out her own backyard.

“Yes.”

She didn’t wait to see his reaction. Just jumped up and started packing her things. Becky had forced herself to hold off ‘til now, because she just knew she would have entered clinical depression if she had to unpack.

“We wanted to let you know that we’ve removed the project from Dr. Warden and University of Tennessee’s jurisdiction.”

Her busy hands stilled. “What?” They were taking her frogs?

“We would like to offer you the opportunity to stay with it, with the CDC. Of course, you’ll be compensated if we all survive.”

“If we all survive?” Her mouth hung open. “Is that supposed to be a joke?”

Briddle looked perplexed. “Was it funny?”

The man behind him shook his head and rolled his eyes. “No, it wasn’t.”

Becky’s gaze snapped to him, recognizing the sound if not the face of the biologist who’d been working with her in the makeshift lab occasionally. “John!”

He stepped forward taking over the conversation for the un-funny Briddle. “There’s a lot of work still to be done. You know the animal species are going to help us suss this thing out. Plus there’s enough material for about, say, a billion papers.” His lips pressed together in what was almost a smile.

“Papers?” A job? With the CDC? Chasing frogs?

In a few minutes Becky had voiced all those concerns. Her packing remained forgotten as she sat back on her cot, suffering a mild case of shock. She had to go with the CDC or hand over her frogs. They were government property now.

She heard other voices outside. A sound she hadn’t heard before. The people of McCann being set free. Almost. “They can’t go home, can they?”

“No.” John shook his head, his face unshaved for what must have been a good four days. “The government will have to relocate them.”

“What do we do next? Do we set up a lab in Atlanta?”

“Eventually. But right now we need to go do tests on a new location in Florida.”

“Florida?” She said the word as though she’d never heard of the state before. Her brain really was on overload and she’d ruined her routine and hadn’t eaten any breakfast this morning because she’d been too excited.

“Can I go home first?” That was what was making her a mess. Her mom and dad were worried, Aaron thought she was on the run from the law, and no matter what the CDC was offering her, she wouldn’t take it if it meant she didn’t get to show her family she was okay.

“We need to head right out. They want us on site by tonight. Brookwood and Abellard are already there. And they have the same kind of magnetic anomaly.”

“You can’t tell her that!” Briddle stood over them, looking like he was going to wire John’s mouth shut. “She hasn’t signed her paperwork; she isn’t cleared yet!”

“She has emergency status.” John just looked up to where Briddle had planted himself in the corner of her tent. Again his face showed his dissatisfaction with the teetotaler. “Besides, she’s going to sign.”

“You’re right, I’m in.” She stood and stretched. “But on one condition. I’m going home first. I’ll call my Mom and tell her to have everyone there so I can see them.”

John looked up at Briddle, still not standing, not giving the man any of the respect or formality he seemed to want.

“Oh, all right. But no talking to them about any of this, and you’re still on emergency status until we get the paperwork through.” He handed her a clipboard and she quickly read and signed everything. Basically accepting a probational position, and agreeing to defer to her superiors’ judgment of what she could and couldn’t share. But she knew what Aaron had said about government contracts. Your signature meant everything and then some. Theirs meant nothing.

Briddle left with his precious paperwork tucked under his arm and she looked back at John. “You’ll want to come home with me. When’s our flight?”

“They’ll put us on something this evening.” He, too, finally stood. “I need to go with you? I’m not much for carrying luggage.”

“I have forty of the frogs from my site at my house.”

She almost laughed as she saw his jaw drop, and re-phrased her thought. “I guess I should say ‘we’ do.”

• • • •

JORDAN STILLED. STANDING in the doorway, his question was answered. He hadn’t told his Dad that he was coming to Lake James. But here he was on a Sunday morning and the smell of pancakes was weaving through the house he still had a key to. “Dad?”

“Jordan!?” His father came through the opening from the kitchen, brandishing his spatula like a weapon, hope and fear both written plainly on his round face. “What are you doing here?”

“I needed pancakes?” He shook off the burdens of the flight, and the sound still in his head of Jillian giggling and the sheen in her eyes. David was with her and they would handle the stress they were all under together. Jordan had his Dad. Not that his father spoke much.

Case in point, his father simply grunted and pointed with the spatula to a vinyl seat at the old scarred table and brought Jordan a plate and fork while the griddle sizzled. It seemed not only did his father make pancakes on his own every Sunday morning, he made enough for Jordan who wasn’t there, and maybe even his mother, too.

He caught his Dad up on things while the pancakes cooked, his own voice the only thing easing the sounds of his father’s rhythmic work. “We’re here to examine Eddie’s case. A team of us. But I can’t tell you much more than that.”

He saw the nod from the back of his father’s head.

“I just wanted to come visit.”

Again the small nod.

So he ate. Better than he had eaten in weeks. Fresh, hot pancakes. With syrup from the plastic bottle with the grocery store brand label across the front. Nothing fancy at all. But the kitchen and the food and the smells - it took him back.

And something must have showed. Because when his father finally sat down he took one look at Jordan and asked, “Who’s the girl? Jillian?”

“What?” His face lifted from his plate and his heart kicked up a notch. How had his Dad seen what he was only just admitting to himself? And just a few days too late, too. Late enough to begin with the serious self-ass-kicking.

“That doctor you work with. You mentioned her last time you were here.” It was more words than his Dad had strung together in years, to him at least.

“How did you know?” He spent time cutting the pancakes and shoving another bite into his mouth to hide the expressions he was sure were giving him away.

“I’ve seen that look. Almost identical. On my own face, when I thought your mother was going out with someone else.”

Jordan almost laughed. If his mouth hadn’t been full, he might have. “That bad, huh?”

“What’s this other guy like?” Mr. Abellard held the fork as though it was a laser pointer and he was giving the latest PowerPoint presentation.

“Dad, you haven’t said this much to me in forever.”

The older man shrugged and ate another bite of the pancakes. For a full minute Jordan was certain that he had effectively shut down the one open communication he’d had with the man in years. And it hadn’t been worth it. So he followed suit and shoveled in more food.

But his father surprised him. “Didn’t know what to say to you.” There was a shrug, buried in the beefy shoulders and in his voice. “You went off to college. I’d never been, didn’t know what any of it was like. Didn’t have any friends who did. And ashamed because I couldn’t pay for it for you.”

“Dad-”

“But I know this.” He jabbed his empty fork at his son again. “I’ve heard about this Jillian. But what about the guy?”

Jordan’s brain churned, doing the thing that probably separated him the most from his father. The constant reassessment, the continual striving for more information. “How do you know there’s another guy?”

“No good excuse for you not to have her if there isn’t.” His Dad didn’t look up from his plate, not enough expression or anything other than the words for Jordan to realize that his father held him in higher regard than he had ever known. “So what’s he got on you?”

“Blond hair, good build, smart, little bit older, stable.”

“He a doctor like you?”

Jordan sucked in a snort. “Try: world renowned geologist. . . . And he’s rich.”

“Hm.” He sounded like the same old Dad. “Well, what do you have on him?”

Again Jordan snorted. “Obviously not enough.”

But his father waited. Eating his pancakes, and occasionally looking up, until it was clear that his father would think less of him if he didn’t at least give it a shot. So he did. “I’m taller . . . and I still have all my hair.”

His father laughed. A serious belly full of laughter, and it was worth the flirt in Jillian’s eyes when she looked at David just to hear his father laugh like that.

He waited, eating more than he should have, until he hit his threshold of pain. Thinking that if he ate enough his father would spill the secrets of the universe. Or at least how to undo the innuendo and whispers that he had heard from their heads tucked together when he woke up on the plane.

They had flown in first-class this trip. Time was less of the essence. Jillian having seen the connection at the same time Landerly had Mike plowing through back cases to discover Eddie and one other death in Lake James from five years ago. The fact that Eddie’s last name was Abellard and the date of death hadn’t escaped Landerly in the slightest. The phone had rung just moments after Jilly had spoken his cousin’s name. Those two scared him more and more. Another good reason to skip out and come visit his Dad.

David had insinuated himself next to Jillian, and should have passed right out given his night in the dirt. But no, he swore it must have been the coffee Jordan had given him. Perked him right up like he'd slept all night. Damned coffee. And the next thing you know Jordan found himself dozing across the aisle while Jillian and David talked about all the things they could. Anything but the purpose of the trip. Anything but the fact that three scientists were on the next flight to Minnesota for the CDC.

Despite the pancakes and the ugly turn of his thoughts, his father shared no more wisdom with him. Just a bear of a hug and hardly a word as Jordan said thank you for the breakfast and headed back to his hotel room. The one between Jillian's and David's.

When he finally slid the key through the lock to his room and flipped on the lights he found Jillian curled up on his bed still asleep, but starting to blink at the light, so he slapped it off. The flutter in his chest betrayed him, happy at seeing her in his room again. "I'm sorry, I didn't expect you in here." He almost kicked himself for saying it.

Her voice came out of the depths of sleep, "I just thought we'd set up the same. I can move if—" "No, stay put. It's fine."

She sighed, and he recognized the sound as that of her falling back deeper asleep. The last thing he heard from her was a mumble about a 'wake-up call' and 'another hour'.

• • • •

BECKY HAD HUGGED HER whole family and thanked them, and said she didn't know when she'd be back, and folded herself into John Overton's car.

"So your sister freaked me out with her Oak-Ridge-radioactive-waste theories."

"Yeah, well . . ." Becky didn't know what to say to that.

"That bit about the other spots with the frogs and were people sick? And was that why you couldn't talk? . . ." He trailed off only to come back full force, this time looking at her instead of the road. Both of which she wished he wouldn't do. "Did you tell her?"

"No. She's just that good." Becky sighed and spoke to her hands twined together in her lap. "She's really gifted, and she makes the rest of us look like idiots a lot of the time."

He nodded, and with a quick bite to her lip, she purposefully changed the subject. "So when your guy comes to get the frogs tomorrow, he needs to get other specimens from the UT lab. The American Birdwatcher's Association has a North Georgia branch that contacted us. They have warblers migrating out of season and away from their usual nesting sites."

He didn't ask, but she knew he didn't see the connection yet, so she fed it to him. "I tested them with magnets. They rotate to them just like the frogs do."

She grabbed the door and the edge of her seat with white knuckles as he yanked the steering wheel to one side and peeled into a car dealership before slapping the gearshift into park. His stare was leaden. "You have other species from sites in Georgia?"

She nodded.

He might as well have had the word incredulous typed across his face. "And you're only just now telling me?"

She felt the starch sneak up her spine. She was giving him gifts and he was mad? But she didn't fight back, just held some quiet dignity. "I've only known that I was your employee for about four hours. And my parents were around for most of it, so I didn't think I should say anything in front of them."

His hands covered his face for a moment. “First, you aren’t my employee. We both work for the CDC and we both push our papers for Briddle.” He dragged in a breath as though it would help, but clearly it didn’t. “Second, . . . people were dying and you kept this kind of information to yourself?”

She felt like she’d been slapped. “I . . . I . . .” Calm yourself Becky. And she took a slow, sobering breath. “You guys have had me doing tech work - out catching amphibs. No one asked me about any of it. No one wanted my theories and no one came to tell me when it was confirmed that the magnetics were causing the illness. I’ve been so stressed out that it didn’t even occur to me. And no one lives on these sites. It’s like the one in my backyard! . . .”

She stopped because she simply ran out of things to say, and so she said the only thing she could think of next. Nothing. But she reached for the door handle, figuring the CDCP had already released her from her UT contract and they were about to release her from this one too.

Overton’s hand on her arm stopped her, “You’re right. I’m sorry.”

She remained suspicious of him for a minute.

He opened his mouth once and closed it before opening it again and actually having sound come out of it, “We still haven’t confirmed the magnetics theory, no one thinks it makes any sense. Just correlation, not causation.”

When he saw that she wasn’t planning on fleeing the vehicle anymore, he started back up and pushed the gas pedal, waving at the car salesman who was just now walking up to the car and grinning at them, smelling a sale. “So some of these warblers are at UT?”

“Yup, all of them. And they really should be part of this study. Warden doesn’t know about the magnetics.” Her chest constricted as she was telling him about her subterfuge. “I just found out before I left and was trying to gather more evidence. I figured he would have laughed me out of the building if I told him.”

“Thank God you didn’t tell him.”

Well, that wasn’t what she’d expected to hear. Since she couldn’t think of anything else to say, she changed tacks. “There are also some bees in LA. UCLA has a cluster there, too. And a definitive reversal spot. Where State Road 134 crosses I-5.”

“L.A.?” He slapped the wheel. “Holy shit.”

Becky didn’t think shit had ever been holy, but if there was ever a time for that expression it was probably now. “It’s the Biodiversity lab, I travel a lot to study unusual animal behavior. UT got a call from UCLA about three weeks ago. They have bees swarming in columns. Weirdest thing I ever saw. Their bee dance is messed up too. No turn and circle moves.” She paused waiting for him to ask her questions, but he didn’t.

John watched the road and Becky watched John, then continued. “So we wound up going out to the site to collect. And we took some amphibs, too. Blind ones like in McCann. And the bees have some sort of magnetic issues too. But UCLA is doing that testing.”

“Crap.” He slapped the steering wheel again, and she wondered if it was a tic, if he might start yelling out swear words randomly at any minute in a rush of spontaneous Tourette’s.

John pulled into the airport, taking the route labeled “rental returns” and shifting back to Becky. “You! You keep talking! You are a fountain of knowledge.”

“But I just ran dry.” She turned to the window. Disappointed that she didn’t have anything else to give. “I’ve been on this case for almost two months now and I don’t have any other information. All I’ve gleaned can be summed up in the half hour trip to the airport.”

DAVID STOOD AWKWARDLY in the front entrance of the yellow ranch house. This house was warm. And even in the front entryway he could see that a little girl lived here. His mind swept briefly back to the house where he grew up, where it wasn't apparent that any humans lived there. But here a toy barn and a handful of odd plastic horses gave testament to this child and her life.

He shoved it down in a way only the truly practiced could.

The wife of the dead cousin was emerging from the kitchen, wiping her hands on a small towel and calling back over her shoulder to a child "Wash your hands honey, we have company." Then she saw the three of them, people that she had hollered out to, to come into her house even though she didn't know who they were, and had never seen two of them before. "Jordan!"

She walked right up and, ignoring her flour stained apron, threw her arms around him in the kind of hug David had read about in books. "What are you doing-" But she cut herself off, noticing the flour she had left on her cousin's front and immediately began apologizing and dusting him off in a way that almost made David uncomfortable to be standing there watching.

"Kelly." It was Jordan, grabbing her arm, ignoring the last traces of flour on the front of him. "I don't know how to say this . . ." His hand came up and went through his hair.

And while he wasn't paying attention, Jillian stepped into the gap, filling in the story. "I'm Jillian Brookwood. I work with Jordan." She shook hands with the blond woman who was growing warier by the moment, but she kept talking right through the woman's expression, not missing a beat. "We've found other cases like Eddie's. We think there may be an environmental link."

Kelly stepped back, her hand clutching at her heart, although she seemed unaware of the action herself. Her eyes darted from one to the other of them, her other hand waved behind her until she stumbled back far enough for the couch to materialize behind her and she sank onto the arm, dark circles appearing under her eyes as she started to frown.

But Jillian kept talking, leaving no time for the widow to form a sentence let alone a full thought. "We have a good idea what it's linked to, but we need to run some tests." Turning slightly she motioned to him, bringing him into the fold of the conversation for the first time, "This is Dr. David Carter. We want him to look around the house, to see if what affected Eddie was here."

With a wave of her hand she dismissed him, to start wandering around and see what he could find. So he did just that, not wanting to stand there like a moron any longer and see the blonde's eyes cloud over, or her hand clutching for things that weren't there.

Pulling a tiny meter out of his back pocket he began pacing his way around the perimeters. They had started this crap with compasses and such, but had refined their choice of equipment as they better knew what they were looking for. The meter read normal. The field lay in the right direction, with the appropriate strength. And he felt like an idiot walking around this tiny middle-American house, with the little black box in his palm, getting nothing.

He had done this as a kid. Took one of his mother's jewelry boxes and cut a rectangle out of the top with a paring knife from the kitchen, and taped in a white piece of paper with red block letters and numbers written on it. He had walked his whole house reading the 'meter' that was so much like the ones his father used. Much bigger and less useful than the one he held today, but he had been so excited to do what his father did. Back then he had been a fool, but in his childhood hadn't felt like one. Today he sure as hell did.

He called back, "Mrs. Abellard?"

The house wasn't big, and she was all of fifteen feet away. Jordan's arm was around her and the hug was almost too familiar, as though those jokes about small town families being too close were true. The blonde looked up at him expectantly, a sheen of tears covering her eyes.

It was all he could do to keep from telling her that those tears wouldn't work on him, and this problem wouldn't be solved unless she could get it together. "There are two closed doors at the end of the hall. Can I go in?"

She nodded, and he realized how much he hated getting permission. What if she had said 'no' then died? Well, at least it would be her own fault. The first room he went into was the little girl's. More of the creepy, plastic horses covered the available surfaces of the bedspread and the white, standard issue, matching dresser and canopy bed, complete with pink ruffles. For a moment all he could do was stare at the girl-ness all around him, too frozen to do his job. Sure this house was warm, but tasteless. He'd be damned if he didn't vomit from all the ruffles around him before he left. Or was it the magnetic field? Either way he was bound to puke.

As he ran the meter next to the wall he began picking up a level change as he approached the corner.

"Sonofabitch."

It wasn't much. Not even a reversal. But at this point he'd seen enough to know it was coming. This was either the top edge of a coming bubble or the side edge of an already existing bubble. The normal field gave way, over a distance of about five inches. First weakening, then, if you could locate the exact spot and hold steady, you could find it – where the field went to zero. A phenomenon that should not occur on this earth.

He had zero.

Far in the back corner, right at the floor.

And he had a wall in his way.

The mother's room was at least more tasteful. Though it looked like the Dad was still here, too. David didn't analyze that any further, just headed for the corner that abutted the other room, where he had to move furniture and get down on his hands and knees.

It was here, too - the edge of an already existing bubble - and the thing was decent in size. A good part of the bedroom was affected.

"Sonofabitch."

"What is it?" The voice belonged to Jordan.

"Got one."

Even in the space of the two words, Jordan was at his side, kneeling, reading the meter over his shoulder. "Bet this is what got Eddie." His voice had trailed off at the end of the sentence.

David knew he should be sympathetic. But he wasn't. He was having the time of his life. His old man had never seen shit like this. And there were going to be papers until pigs flew out his ass. And Greer was going to ride that dino theory all the way to the bank. "Yeah, it's great."

"Thank you."

The sarcasm wasn't unnoticed, but David left it to sit, un-responded to. It's why he wasn't a preschool teacher. He heard the widow in the doorway, but didn't look up, didn't care to see that he had offended her. Let Jordan soothe the woman and explain to her that she needed to pack for herself and her daughter and that the CDC would be putting them into a hotel and starting them on medications.

"Lindsay was sick yesterday morning." There was a sound to the voice such that David wouldn't have been surprised if he turned around to find the woman actually wringing her hands.

"Vomiting?" Jillian's voice broke in, and he closed his mind to all of them. They voluntarily cleared themselves from the room, leaving him with his bubble anomaly.

He smiled. The swap was coming. Like nothing any of them had ever seen before. And he was sitting right on top of it.

For a brief moment he pictured his father's face when he heard.

Jillian stared at the wall, suffering the strange sense of Déjà vu she had. She had stared at a wall just like this. In three cities that looked just like this. Well, from the inside of a hotel room they all did. The only difference was the handful of medications she swallowed. The carpet was the same, a bizarre floral pattern that was created just for this hotel. They were all in reds and browns and creams, though, and all just as ugly.

Designed by the humans that she was trying to save. Looking around herself, she shook her head. Maybe she should be trying to save Becky's amphibians. It might be a more noble cause.

Landerly had called again.

The four bubbles here were to be abandoned. Again there was another team coming up behind them, and Jillian had to wonder where and why they were being moved. It seemed all they could do was show up and say "there it is." And steep in it a little more.

Becky had found another spot on the side of a freeway in LA. Jordan should have been happy about that. But Jillian knew that he was worried about his family. He was sworn not to say anything. They couldn't start a panic.

Well, no, they could start a panic. A damned good one too, if she put her mind to it. David had already popped up with an excited grin and told them he was trying to calculate when the shift would occur. He was looking at the number and growth rate of the reversal spots. He was calculating in the historical data from the KT boundary, the evidence that he and his paleontologist friend had been on the phone for hours discussing. And had left Jillian for the first time realizing what it felt like to be her family listening to her talk. God, it was boring.

And he had told her Greer's reversal/dinosaur die-out theory.

Jillian still got cold inside when she thought about that conversation. "David, all the dinosaurs died. There was mass extinction. There were volcanoes, which you are now telling me might have been triggered by magnetic reversal? The kind that we are looking at seeing here in the next what? Year? Month? Are we talking of going the way of the dinosaurs?"

"Well," Rather proud of himself, he had looked her in the eyes and almost smiled. "Most of the mammals lived through it."

She wanted to scream until her throat hurt too much to ever talk again.

But she didn't want Jordan to come running. Or admit her to an asylum.

Then again, there was comfort in just sitting in a corner, rocking on her heels and mumbling about human extinction and magnetic poles, while nurses soothed her and gave her medication to make her happy and calm. But the phone rang.

"Brookwood." She held the receiver to her ear. It was a CDC phone, and the damned thing was a secure line. What the hell was she doing with a secure line? She was supposed to be writing reports on other doctors' evaluations of things as simple as E. coli and botulism.

"Landerly."

She snapped to and didn't say anything. Landerly would just start talking when he was ready and there was a certain charming efficiency to it.

"You're not going to LA."

Yea! Follow-through. Finally they could stay in one spot and-

"There's a prison at the Nevada-California line and they have a bubble, too."

He paused. Jillian absorbed. And waited.

“We can’t move them. There aren’t enough facilities, and these are maximum security prisoners.” He sighed and Jillian knew what was coming, but she let him say it. “Our deadline for solving this thing just bumped way up. After the AIDS debacle the CDC can’t afford to let prisoners die. Start packing. Your tickets are waiting for you at the airport.”

And with a sharp click in her ear he was gone.

Jillian stood, the phone still clutched uselessly in her hand, her brain churning. The CDC had suffered from the AIDS issue. No one had cared enough, no one had done enough, because those suffering were gay men. It wasn’t all the CDC’s fault. They had actually done a lot. Private funding had failed to foot the necessary bill until grandmas started getting AIDS from blood transfusions and Ryan White became a tiny mirror with a big reflection of America’s ugly underbelly of prejudice.

And the CDC wasn’t about to be on the short end of that stick again.

So just in case Jillian didn’t feel enough pressure, there were now politics involved. Suddenly she understood physicians who medicated themselves. Demerol, Statol, Percocet all sounded fantastic about now. She allowed herself the dream of a good drug addiction for a brief moment before she hollered out to Jordan. “We’re not going to LA.”

She didn’t move from her spot, couldn’t bear to see his face. Not when she knew that he looked happy, and she was about to open her mouth and dash it. “There’s a maximum security prison in Nevada that has a reversal and we can’t move the prisoners.”

“What!?”

She could hear his feet hitting the floor. That meant he had been leaning back in the chair, thinking. For a moment she was glad that he hadn’t fallen backwards. Although she could have used a good laugh right now. Jillian started to yell out her response, but Jordan was capable of movement and his footfalls were pounding her way from just beyond the open door.

So she sighed. “We’re on a plane out tonight. We have to solve this thing and quick.”

“Why us?” His feet caught up to his head and he stood upright, shoving overworked fingers into undertended hair. Pieces of it stood straight up. And his blue eyes blinked slowly, like a man told that he’d just been sentenced to the electric chair.

Her voice was softer than she had intended. “It’s punishment.”

“For what?”

“Forging Landerly’s signature? I don’t know. We must have been very bad in our past lives. Do you remember torturing puppies or something?”

Jordan shook his head. “Very funny, Jilly.”

“Hey don’t mock me! I ran out of ‘very funny’ about two weeks ago.” She finally found the source of energy needed to move herself to the nearby desk and she plopped down into it unceremoniously while Jordan melted onto the bed. He rolled all the way through, onto his back, as though there was something to be learned from the ceiling.

After a minute Jillian interrupted the hum of the air conditioning. “It’s because of Eddie.”

“How is this because of Eddie?”

“That’s why we went to Florida, forged signature and all. That’s how we found those cases and linked it all together. Eddie was the start of it. If he hadn’t been your cousin I don’t know if we would have been this far along.”

“Fat lot of good it’s done us.”

“I know.” She resisted the urge to go to him and offer a hug. Although that wasn’t hard given that the phone call from Landerly had drained her of all her energy. With an effort far greater than should have been necessary, she pushed herself up out of the chair and plucked the hotel phone from the cradle punching the four digit code to David's room.

Only David didn't answer.

She mumbled into the black handset, "Sorry, wrong number." Then stared at it like it had bitten her. How was that not David? She thought back through the code –

"You're probably dialing his number from the last hotel we were in." Jordan's voice came over her shoulder, indicating that he hadn't taken his cue from her, and hadn't moved an inch. "I bet you remember them all. All the room numbers and the layout of each place. . ."

Jillian was just happy that he couldn't see her blush. The poor boy had been subjected to Jillian-24-7. She could be her own sad reality-TV series. She punched in the code for David's current room and he answered on the third ring. "Carter." She curled her lip at the phone. She had to get a new 'hello'. They were all such techies.

"David, it's me, Jillian." Well, that was a hell of a lot more human than 'Brookwood' barked out like an army order. "We're on the move again. To the Nevada-California border."

"And what's there?" She could hear him rustling in the background. He was probably already starting to pack.

"Maximum Security Prison. With a bubble." Stopping herself, Jillian realized she was starting to sound like Landerly. Subject-Verb, minimal clauses and don't bother with articles or adverbs. And she seriously doubted it sounded charming on her. So, with a sigh, she started again. "They can't move the prisoners. We've got a tight deadline."

• • • •

JORDAN'S WHOLE BODY was leaden; the bubbles had grown black and faster moving. One was going to overtake him, but he couldn't force any more speed from his legs. Jillian and David had been running with him, but they had both disappeared along the way. David into thin air, and Jilly, smiling and waving, had been happily engulfed by one.

Although Jillian had gone willingly, Jordan knew there was no good in the reversals. It was certain death. In testament to that fact, there were lifeless, rotting bodies strewn around him on the street. The smell was overwhelming. And the rumbling of the bubble was freight train loud as it got closer. The ear pain and nausea overtook him, as he knew they would.

"Jordan."

He looked, still running, for the source of the sound. The second time the voice said his name, he recognized it as Jillian's, but he couldn't find her in the black.

With a jolt he slammed into the cushioned seat of the airplane as though he had been dropped from a high place, his eyes opening as the vicious dream faded into the back of his head. But the ear pain and nausea were real, surely byproducts of the rapid descent they were pulling.

He felt himself sinking through the seat, giving up and giving in, when Jillian grabbed his arm again. "You have to wake up. David's up. We're landing in two minutes."

They would call Landerly when they got in the car and got the secure line set up. They would tell him all they knew, and all they had seen, and wait for his mind to churn. Not that Landerly had been a banner help lately. That he was as stumped as they were had been a small comfort.

Jordan blocked all else from his mind and thought of the hot tub and the pool that would await them where they would stay near the state line. It was cheaper on the Nevada side, and that would mean gambling and lights and noise. But that would be all right he supposed; it might keep his mind off what he had left behind. And how Lake James was doing.

Kelly and Lindsey had been evacuated right away, in a bald and scary attempt to save them from the reversal that was growing in the corner between the two bedrooms, creeping a little wider each day like an infestation of mold in the walls. Lindsey had already been sick, stomach ache and ear pain that same morning they had arrived.

And that had scared the crap out of Jordan. Lindsey was the only living proof of Eddie's existence. Everything else would fade with time. He soothed himself with the thought that it seemed if they were able to pull a person out of the reversal in time, before they got too sick, they wouldn't have any effects.

On the flip side, if they didn't get the person out in time, there was only one course - the victim always ended up dead. And no one had any idea what the cut-off point was.

In his head he counted out the death tolls. Florida was at seven. Lake James at five, and maybe more. Twenty total in McCann, although no more since they had figured out to get people out of the area.

Both McCann and Florida had traceable paths. A patient zero. The look of contagion. Lake James didn't. The bubbles were cropping up all over the place and taking out random people. Or at least it seemed that way now . . . Jordan desperately wanted Jillian to have an epiphany. He wanted to interview someone, anyone, who would give him that last shred of information that would allow his mind to grasp the picture in the puzzle even though they were nowhere near complete.

And if Lindsey had truly had it . . . Well that was another story. He had seen her labs himself. And she was a perfectly healthy kid by all known measures. It would have almost been easier to take if she had been sick and nobody had known it. But if this thing was taking out healthy people now . . . there really wasn't an answer.

And why wouldn't it take out healthy people? Diseases killed without prejudice or forethought. They could wipe out entire populations without conscience. And even if this was simply an environmental hazard then what would they do when David's predictions came true and the poles swapped? When the whole earth was a reversal field?

He knew he was possibly looking at the end of 'life as we know it'. If it wasn't disease that did them in, then they would have to stand on their Darwinian principles and die the brave death of the non-fittest.

• • • •

BECKY TRUDGED THROUGH the high grass in the far back of her parents' property, hiking boots laced tight, stomach full from the family breakfast her mother had insisted was necessary because her oldest daughter had returned home the night before. And Becky had let her do it. Since she was heading back to Atlanta and the bio lab right after she packed her things. Which was right after she assured her parents that she wasn't going out to the frog site.

Which was a bald-faced lie.

She was heading crosswise through the property. Toward the back corner fence, carrying a walking stick with a mounted compass. Her backpack full to the brim of lightweight CDC equipment and empty lexans. By necessity she was out here alone. Was that a stupid thing? Probably. Who knew what this site would do to her? She might go into a coma and die right there on the spot. But something told her she wouldn't.

Jordan and Jillian and their infectious disease cronies hadn't told the biodiversity team any more. They hadn't found out if the illness was caused by one-time long-term exposure or if all the little exposures added up to get you sick. If that was the case then she had been plenty exposed and just walking into a site like this was asking for trouble.

And the docs had no real theories. No one could tell if the older sites were stronger, or if the newer ones were. Or if size mattered. No, the one thing they had told her about that was they were counting on her to sort that thing out. No one felt the need to evacuate the animals from the sites. And it was Becky and John Overton who were supposed to be exploring those possibilities.

The boundary tape was dirty now. Little leaves clung to it. The bright color faded away. Maybe they shouldn't have put it so low to the ground. Maybe tent stakes hadn't really been the best idea. What if an animal tripped and injured themselves? What if a person did?

Closer up she saw pink tape. It wasn't staked but wound around tree trunks and draped across low lying branches. It was brighter, newer. The CDC had tagged it but not marked it 'keep out' or 'biohazard'. God only knew if the neighbor kids crept over the fence to play.

About ten feet from the tape she saw the compass jump. Dammit. She knew this site was growing and she hadn't been paying attention.

Fingers of sun came through the tall trees now, and winds found their way around the trunks. Becky pulled up her turtleneck, glad now that she had dressed a little warmer. Starting back again toward the site, this time she kept a clear eye on the compass. Strands of her hair slipped across her face and into her mouth right as the needle jumped.

This time she set down the backpack and pulled out a rubber-banded bunch of weighted flags. CDCP DO NOT TOUCH emblazoned in repeating letters across the orange streamers. She dropped one where the compass started to bounce.

The red needle danced in every direction, unsure which way was true north, confused by the one thing that was supposed to keep it constant. She dropped another flag where it became steady again. Of course this time it was pointed south.

Standing several feet inside the site now, Becky looked over the two dropped flags. The fuzzy edges were getting larger as the bubble grew. Her brows pulled together against the thoughts in her head, even as her shoulder blades pulled together against the wind that had picked up again and was biting at her exposed skin.

Becky breathed deeply, concerned about just what it was that she was breathing in. Unsure if the reversal caused the problem or brought the problem or fed the problem. God, they didn't know anything.

She thought she should feel something different. That her body should instinctively know she was somehow being exposed to something deadly. Her heart did beat faster, but Becky had no doubt that was due to her own adrenaline surging rather than any external force altering her heart rate.

In that instant the sun disappeared, causing her heart to speed up as her head snapped back. She saw the cloud dusting its way across the sky even as her brain reminded her there was, of course, a logical explanation.

But chasing the cloud was a jet. Probably taken off from McGhee-Tyson and headed into Nashville.

Her breath sucked in, and she stood, trapped, mesmerized, petrified, as the jet blazed a trail toward where she stood. In the clear sky it took almost two full minutes for the plane to reach a point directly overhead, and for the entire time she simply stood there, tense as a piano wire. Adrenaline keeping her whole body on high alert. Her brain flipping and discarding thought after thought about where to run and how to escape if the plane came tumbling down out of the sky.

Somehow, no one had thought to check the height of the bubbles. She knew it now. A possibly fatal error - if the plane flew low, and if the bubble reached up that far. The bee columns from LA indicated that these things could and did achieve some altitude. What would the pilot do if all the dash readings went suddenly out of whack? If the compass started jumping? If they looked down and saw they were headed east when they should be headed west? Would they change altitude, to avoid a crash, only to lead them head first into another plane actually traveling east?

But the jet passed over without any events, leaving Becky sucking lungfuls of the air inside the site. This job was going to kill her. Well, that was if it didn't kill the whole planet first.

She shoved her thoughts to the back of her brain - the disturbing ones anyway - and focused on the frogs. They would be harder to find this time. It was later in the season. There might still be a few straggling tadpoles. And that, she suddenly realized, was why she was here. Those stragglers would grow in the site as it was today, this week. And they would tell its story now. Probably the same one. But they would give her and John a better idea about long term exposure to the site.

Her stomach rolled alarmingly, and she refused to even begin to calculate how long it would take the reversal to reach the edges of her parents' fenced yard or, god forbid, the house.

Again she forced a tight rein on her thoughts to keep them from running away. Counting backwards would indicate that the bubble had been 'born' about two months before the first time Becky had encountered their own little 'Apocolypse Now'.

Becky faced the task at hand - spotting the tiny ranas darting among the refractions in the creek and peeking out from under crunched leaves. Within an hour she had populated fifteen lexans. And she lined them up for a good-looking over; which was about as scientific as she could get out here in the woods. Her fingers ached from plunging them in and out of the now cold water, from bumping and grating her fingertips and knuckles across the smooth looking rocks. Her brain ached, too. And she feverishly prayed it was from effort and stress and not the environment.

But all her frogs were normal legged. Just two hind jumpers. They were pale, not whitish, but not the healthy greens and browns of the earlier batches. Six were blind.

Dear God. They looked more like the batch she had hauled from McCann than the batch from here.

• • • •

INFORMATION WAS POURING in. David had been shocked that it had started so fast; Jillian had barely plugged in the fax machine when it started beeping and spitting out ink strewn papers. All three of them had forgotten to unpack and had sat, silent, in the supremely uncomfortable chairs around the nice cherrywood table in the corner of the hotel room. They had simply read and passed the pages, each of their faces knitting deeper into concern the further along they got.

About an hour into it Jordan had stood and stretched. Throwing a handful of worn and smudged papers on the table top, he declared he needed a break, and David had almost hopped up and agreed. Until he saw that Jordan's idea of a 'break' was to stop reading the fax pages and to start reviewing and hanging the hand drawn charts. Personally, he'd been thinking more along the lines of a steak and a hot tub himself. But as he watched the butcher paper go up, revealing its colorful circles with links and lines and notes, he kept his mouth shut.

The fax pages were coming in from all over. Suits were crawling the country, and worse yet, the World Health Organization was starting to collaborate their findings of a 'new disease' in India and Africa. David shook his head to himself, things were in the crapper when even the geologist could see what was happening.

The fax beeped, and gurgled, and whirred, and then started spitting out another black and white missive. David grabbed it even before the machine was fully done with it. Which was his plan, as this little portable shitbox had a tendency to hang on to the page once it was finished printing, and then, at a random interval later, release it, sending the paper flying out away from the table and sending three very stellar scientists scrambling like fucking idiots to fetch it.

He turned to Jordan who was standing back, fists perched on his hips, and way over-admiring his thumb-tacking job. "Listen to this."

Both the docs stopped what they were doing and gave him their attention while he went over the major, if blurry, points on the page. "They have an animal link between the Knoxville site and the McCann site. They think the McCann site may be a few months older. . . ." That was as far as he'd gotten but while he scanned it again, he let his mouth follow his mind. "They checked out the Georgia site. They still don't know why the birds came early, but the growth rate on that site leads them to believe it might be a full year old -"

Jillian's sigh interrupted him. "Thank God no one lives out there."

This time he read word for word, "The animals in McCann are showing unusual, new activity, actually phasing back to- Dammit."

Jillian looked at Jordan, who was looking back at her. Neither of them spoke, and David did his level best to ignore them. The page had simply run out, and wouldn't you know it, just as he looked up, the fax machine spit out the next sheet, sending it floating right past his open hands.

"Son of a bitch."

"Is the 'dammit' another metamorphosis phase, like larva or pupa?"

David didn't even waste an eye roll on Jordan for that one. Straightening the new page, he started in again, "-phasing back to normal. Most recent amphib catches in McCann indicate normal development as best as can be determined by present tests."

Jillian practically climbed into his lap with excitement. And he sure as hell did nothing to stop her. "Did the site reverse? . . . I mean back to normal polarity?"

He looked the paper up and down. "Doesn't look like it."

She looked disappointed, which David took to mean she wasn't going to crawl into his lap. And letch that he was, he could admit that that fact disappointed him more than the site not returning to normal. He hadn't expected it to anyway. "We've never seen anything indicating that they reverse back. Well, not for about sixty million years anyway."

Jillian wandered over to admire Abelard's thumb-tacking job, and the next thing he knew the two of them were spouting off crap about white counts and B-U-Ns, which he figured had nothing to do with burgers, and David made the executive decision that this would be a good time to ignore them. He plucked up the super-teched CDC phone and called Greer.

"David!"

"Buddy."

He opened his mouth to speak again but Greer beat him to it, already rambling about the McCann egg clutch. "-full fetus in one of them. Unbelievable. I need to tell someone, I have muscle attachment sites that no one has seen before."

A deep pit formed in David's heart. He was starting to see himself as Chicken Little. Only he wasn't an idiot. He was just the only one who saw that the sky actually was falling. He wasn't sure how much he cared. But there was the distinct possibility that everyone was going to get sick from this. And with the fatality rate at a hundred percent, Greer might wind up having to limit sharing his joyous minutia to his wife.

David was certain that he should be having a crisis right now. Only he wasn't having it. "Listen Greer. I need to know something, and you can tell that snappy wife of yours, as she is the smarter half. . ." David pinched the bridge of his nose wishing he was elsewhere. Wishing he was siphoning off that trust fund he had broken into to start this whole crapload of a mess. He was ready for some straight-out baking on a beach somewhere, with girls in bikinis and beer and a sedate heart rate. If one of them in the hotel room suddenly spontaneously combusted he wouldn't be surprised. "Greer, straighten me out on this: did your dinos die from lack of food or what?"

"No real telling. Just a good solid theory. Plants would have wilted in a matter of days given the dust cover--"

David interrupted. He'd been on the receiving end of Greer's theories before and he could qualify for a Ph.D. in paleontology long before they ended. "Yes, but that depends on the asteroid theory or the volcano theory. Go with this one for a minute and tell me if the evidence matches up: The dinosaurs got sick--"

"Wait, can I put you on speaker phone?" Greer was already doing it, if the clicking and the soft static were any indication.

"Hey," David turned to Jillian, "Does this thing do speaker phone?"

"Sure." She didn't stop her conversation with Jordan, just kept jabbering about qualifying diseases and healthy specimens, but her fingers flew over the secondary numeric keypad. The one she had punched codes into to link up once they had arrived. When she handed it back it was squawking at him at full volume. He told Greer and Leena to hang on a minute and looked over his shoulder. "You two might want to pay attention to this."

They jerked their heads apart.

"Who are we talking to?" Jordan frowned at him, which was fine, since David was certain that he was breaking several federal laws. But he didn't let that deter him. "Okay, Greer we're all here."

"Who's we?" Leena's voice was overeager, clearly way too stifled by her bed-rest.

David introduced everybody then set about swearing the Larsons to secrecy, which he thought was hysterical, but did it anyway. "All right. Here's the question: is it possible all the dinosaurs got sick at the same time?"

"Yeah right. They all just came down with a deadly virus." Leena's voice was sweet, even shooting him down. "It was too global, too quick."

"You think what's going around now is what killed my dinos?" Greer hopped in.

Jordan shot David a death glare, but Jillian was already too wrapped up in the science to be concerned about treason, "I think what David's asking is if it's possible. Is there any evidence that they could have gotten sick?"

Greer and Leena talked over each other. "No." "I think it's more like there's no evidence against it." "We just have a sudden lack of fossils and we know they died." "Why? What does this have to do with that magnetic reversal we found?"

David sighed. Too damn many scientists in the kitchen. "The reversal is making people sick." There. He said it. Let Jordan call in the CDC police. "But only those in the hotspots. The die-outs seem to correlate to the last reversal. Is it possible that the volcanoes were an aftereffect?"

"Of course it is." Greer's voice amplified as though he were talking directly into the speaker box.

Jillian's face took on a look of horror that David had only seen once on a really bad actress in a schlock film featuring killer clowns. "Does that mean that we could face volcanoes along with the polarity reversal?!"

Leena ignored her. “I think the real question is whether or not the dinosaurs were warm blooded. If they were, then they are more pertinent to your question, and if not then they aren’t. They relate less to humans and we might all react very differently.” She sniffled at the end of the sentence and David felt his heart drop. There was nothing he feared more than a woman and tears. But Jordan voiced the question, and Leena answered. “Of course I’m crying. I’m pregnant. I cry at country music.”

David steered the conversation back where he wanted it. “I know Greer thinks they were cold-blooded, do you agree?”

“Hell, no.” And she launched into an explanation he had heard Greer shoot down a number of times, but it sounded a lot more plausible coming from her mouth. “There are too many channels in the bone, indicating a network of vessels. It’s common to warm-blooded creatures. Some of them had necks so long that their heads would have frozen overnight if they didn’t self-heat their blood. Greer’s an idiot on that one.”

Jordan smiled. “Well, I guess every marriage needs its spark.”

“I don’t think it’s a warm-blooded/cold-blooded issue at all.” Jillian had turned her focus from a distant spot on the wall to the speaker phone, as though it was the thing actually carrying on a conversation with her. “We have amphibian species showing effects of the reversals. And they aren’t warm-blooded. We’re all getting affected.”

David heard pillows shuffle and Greer say something to Leena. He wasn’t sure what he said, but by the tone and cadence of Leena’s voice he got shot down. “Then, yes it is possible. No one’s really looked at it, because it doesn’t make sense for a virus to sweep like that. So no one has tried to find evidence for or against it.”

There was a pause, no one wanting to fill in.

But apparently the gears had been turning in Leena’s brain. “It does go with another problem I’ve been sorting thru-”

Greer’s voice walked on top of hers, “She’s on bed-rest, all she does is lay around and think. It’s dangerous, I’m telling you. She’s decided all the dinosaur die-out theories are wrong.”

“Really?” Jordan’s voice jumped in, overlapped by Jillian’s “Why?”

Leena picked her thread back up. “The issue is this: all the major extinction theories rely on the dust cover. There’s argument as to what caused it, but no real argument as to the fact that it happened. And there’s this problematic assumption that the debris cloud stopped photosynthesis in the plants, thus killing the dinosaurs . . . but somehow not the mammals.”

Jordan shrugged. “The mammals were smaller.”

Greer’s voice answered. “No, not really, there were a huge number of dinosaur species that were a lot smaller than what we normally think of. Many of them were as small or much smaller than the average mammal. So it wasn’t a size issue.”

“The mammals were warm-blooded.” Jordan threw out the next piece of evidence.

“No, so were the dinosaurs.” Again Leena’s voice was sweet, even in refusing him his basic beliefs. “And that actually is what gives the theory real trouble-”

It was Jillian who jumped in now, looking excited. The kind of excited David would be if she peeled off her clothes and straddled him. “Warm-blooded means faster metabolic rates. Which means that the mammals, the smallest mammals, should have been the first ones killed by the loss of plant life, not the survivors.”

“Excuse me?” David cut in. Fuckin’ biologists.

“Warm-blooded animals eat a lot more per ounce of bodyweight than their cold-blooded counterparts. They have to: it takes a lot of energy to make that body heat. So the cold-blooded species would have lasted longer without food or even oxygen, and been far more likely than any mammal to survive a month-or-more dust cover.”

“So anyway,” Leena’s soft voice filtered through to them, “the dust cover doesn’t work if the dinos were warm- or cold-blooded and I’ve decided we don’t even have the real killer on our hands. The problem is that the killing factor is sorting who it takes and who it doesn’t by some unknown mechanism. What we understand, or at least what we’ve put together, doesn’t answer that question yet.”

David finally stepped up. “What about the previous extinctions?”

That made Jordan’s head pop up. “There were others?”

Greer answered, “Well, there was one about one hundred and thirty five million years ago. That wiped out a darn lot. And another about sixty million years before that. . . why?”

David sighed. “Just wanted to see if they matched up with the pole reversals.” He sighed again.

“Guess they do.” Jillian was staring at him.

“Son of a bitch.” That was Jordan, followed closely by Greer, having chosen the exact same words.

“I’m sorry.” Leena’s ultrafeminine voice could have been the words of a woman at a cocktail party. “Are you all insinuating that we’re headed for a mass extinction?”

David answered her in kind. “Yes, I believe that is what it sounds like.”

“Do you have any guesses as to when?” She was one of the few women he knew who was capable of holding this conversation, and not screaming, swearing, or breaking down.

“Any time between tomorrow and the next two thousand years.”

Head to toe in scrubs, Jillian walked through the prison as starched as she possibly could. For all her training, she had never provided care to inmates, and the way the men were looking at her was going to haunt her for more than a night or two. She would have felt more at home and less exposed walking through the middle of Atlanta in only a thong and red heels, in the dead of winter.

But the gauntlet turned out to only be the first half. Doors clanged. Metal scraped and moaned. Cinderblock only reflected the sounds; it didn't absorb or diminish them in any way. But when the doors slid closed behind them, Jillian's apprehension slid away as a deeper unease slipped in. Something was very wrong.

She had the feeling of being in the woods when the animals don't make noise. When you don't know what's coming, but you know that it is.

"He's down!" The cry was laced with a liberal dose of terror. And Jillian knew then that these inmates knew something was taking them out.

Shoving through the nearly impenetrable wall Jordan and David had provided, she ran flat out until she reached the cell where the wail was coming from.

When he reached a hand through the bars at her, Jillian stepped back. She had compassion for the fear in his voice, "Help me doc!", but not enough to reach out and touch him.

An officer in shades of khaki green came up beside her and asked what she wanted to do.

"Get this man out of here. But put him on his own. Away from here."

The voice wailed again. This time the man with the straggling beard pressed himself to the cage bars directly in front of her.

As the warden approached and unlocked the gate, she stepped back, hoping to get out of reach of the prisoner, and smacked into a wall of muscle. She jumped, spinning, only to find that David had come up behind her. He was dressed in a spare pair of green scrubs from the prison infirmary, in hopes that he would blend in with the other doctors. It looked bad enough without having to answer why a geologist needed to be along.

Jillian turned to find Jordan further down the line, his arms laced through the bars, taking vitals from the prisoners who lined up. She saw the sense in what he did. If this cell had a bubble, they should check and see if it stretched down the row.

Looking back into the stall as the man was led away in cuffs, she took in the placement and order. This cell had two stacked beds attached to the wall, one higher, unoccupied, and the lower with the comatose body of the other inmate strewn across it facedown. She stepped over to kneel down and assess the man, but another officer put his hand in front of her, and without touching her, held her back, while he handcuffed each of the man's hands to the bedframe before letting Jillian near him.

Checking him over, she took his blood pressure and respiratory count, wondering even then why she was doing it. They all knew what he had, and they all knew what would happen.

The men down this row were quiet. They knew they were being stalked, only not in any rational way that any of these men of aggression could deal with. Sanity was slipping here. And Jillian could read it on the faces of the officers, too. How much longer before they realized they weren't getting paid enough? Before they jumped ship?

The CDC's ass would be in a sling then. There would be no stopping the news cameras. No way to hold back the wave of panic it would surely generate. So Jillian set about solving the problem the only way she knew how.

She stepped up to the warden and explained. “This man needs an ICU. He’s comatose, and his ability to breathe on his own may be compromised soon.” Then she turned away and went to the next patient. Taking the charts handed to her by the prison physician and his assistant. Both the doctor and his young apprentice had the sense to not ask questions.

But Jillian asked questions. She asked every one in the book, and a few that weren’t. Inside fifteen minutes time she knew that Landerly had been right to pull them out of Lake James and send them here. It’s where he would have been if his arthritis hadn’t effectively shut him down. The trip to McCann had been more than he could handle. She could tell in the way he walked, in his dry humor that waxed and waned with the amount of medication and rest he got. He would wish he was here, in the thick of it.

And while she was wishing that she wasn’t here, she decided to make the best of it. What would Landerly do? She almost chuckled to herself. Then she decided that Landerly would get a history on every single one of them and start sorting the furthest gone. He would plot the locations, including the sleeping arrangements of the sickest patients.

And in another two hours, when she and Jordan pooled their data, she realized that Landerly would call the CDC mobile team, already stretched to its limit, and have them set up a temporary camp here. She called for quarantine.

• • • •

JORDAN LED THE THREE of them out of the head warden’s office about fifteen minutes after they entered it. The man wanted a few minutes alone to call his wife and explain to her that there had been a ‘serious situation’ at work and that he may not be home for a week or more. Joshua Frank had taken some reassurance that they weren’t all simply lining up and waiting to die.

David seemed to know where he was headed, and he strode down the hall in front of both of them, this time with a purpose. The inmates were supposed to have been moved from all the cells where anyone had gotten sick, and David was already rummaging through his briefcase looking for his fancy compasses. He was ready to weigh and measure, and Jordan could see now that he had been from the moment they had set foot in this place.

So he followed behind and took the opportunity to sneak a look at Jilly - she practically glowed. That was just damned annoying. She should be haggard; she hadn’t slept enough; she was in the middle of a high pressure situation. And she glowed.

Calling the CDC in front of the inmates and the cops had been a truly stupid move, and even now Jordan couldn’t figure out why Jillian hadn’t thought just a little further ahead on that one. But he had glared at her, twice, mouthed the words to her to either shut-up or leave the room, and she either hadn’t seen him at all or was putting in an Oscar-worthy performance of ignoring him. Since he was certain she wasn’t that caliber of an actress he truly believed she hadn’t seen him. And here he was dealing with the flak, while she glowed. Bitch.

David was inside one of the cells, crawling around on his hands and knees and no longer looking anything like the physician he was dressed up as. His scrubs were blackened in long smears down the top, one knee was actually sporting a small tear, and both were ground deep with . . . well, Jordan couldn’t identify the source of the dark stains and he wasn’t sure he wanted to. He decided to catch up with Jillian and see if she had seen anything worthwhile yet.

She smiled a brilliant smile, out of proportion to her surroundings, as he walked up. “What have you got?”

“Nothing.” His files were tucked under his arm, as inactive as they were useless. “You?”

She shook her head, her ponytail moving from side to side as if to second what she was saying. "It's all here, but there's nothing new."

Jordan stretched his neck one way then the other, and left Jillian behind, not that she even noticed, as he went off to wind his way back to the warden's office. He found the warden with the framed photograph from his desk propped across his knees. "Sir, it's not that bad."

Frank smiled. "I know it's not. You've done a good job of putting all our minds at ease. But I can't help think about them. You know . . . when something like this comes up . . ."

"Yeah, I do know." For just a moment he paused. Then, decision made, he plowed ahead. "My father is in the same situation. I do understand."

The warden simply smiled, and asked what he could do to help. Jordan got to make his day by asking to use the phone, then booking the entire staff in the wing at the hotel they were staying in. The CDC could ride his ass for expenditures, if and when he survived this thing.

He left the office and wound through the long hallway yet again to find Jillian standing still in one of the cell rows watching David's backside as he crawled from corner to corner, measuring, mapping, and muttering the whole time. The arrogant bastard might have been happy to know Jillian was staring at his butt, but Jordan wasn't about to give him the pleasure. He touched her sleeve and she slowly pulled her gaze away from the ass molded in green cotton. "What?"

"Anything left to do?" Besides stare at David?

She shook her head. "I've got vitals on all of them, and blood draws. That's already boxed and waiting."

"Call for pickup?" He kept his voice low, but David wasn't listening anyway. He was lost in the world of his rocks. Jordan wondered if concrete and cinderblock qualified igneous or sedimentary, but he didn't dare ask.

"No pickup. The mobile lab will run it when they get here in 12 hours. Our one live patient is already at the hospital on a ventilator."

"Robert Willins?" The man she had rushed to as he was passed out on his bunk. Jordan already knew that was the man's name, and maybe he felt just a little facetious because he knew Jillian wouldn't.

Jillian simply ignored the question. It passed like light through glass, and left no feeling of satisfaction for having asked it. As though he had never spoken she changed the subject, "Shall we head back to the hotel and sleep? We're going to be neck deep when the crew arrives."

He felt the yawn coming only well after it was too late to stop it, and even before he managed to close his mouth Jillian was biting off her own yawn.

"David said not to wait for him. He'll catch a ride later."

"Sweet." He turned away from her face at her last glance back to David. Allowing her to make their goodbyes to Carter, he simply headed down the long hallway toward the exit, only barely cataloguing a muttered response and wondering if the blond geologist might look up later and wonder where they were. Well, he'd figure it out fast enough.

The adrenaline that had been fueling him barely held while he drove back to the hotel. When they arrived she shuffled along behind him, until he slid the magnetic key card into his door and was surprised when she followed him in.

There was only the one king-sized bed, and Jilly bee-lined for it.

The foolish words were out of his mouth before he could stop them. "This is my room."

"Haven't you noticed? I always sleep in with you."

“All right.” He didn’t want to change things, but his mouth again got ahead of his brain. Why? When she was ogling David’s ass? Whispering with him on the flights? “Why?”

“Can’t you tell?”

He was almost afraid of the answer. A small part of him sprung with hope, but the rest of him tamped that part down, and Jordan just shook his head.

“Ever since McCann, I’ve been afraid to sleep alone.”

He nodded. It was the best he was going to get. Although that had to have been the last answer he would have expected. “Climb in.”

• • • •

THE PRISON WAS SWARMING with them. The bubbles were here, they were all growing, and they were all over. David almost grinned. This was a hot spot among hot spots. And, in a new phenomena that hadn’t let him get any sleep, they were growing fast enough that he could come back to one end of the hall and start all over getting new reads on almost every one. Previous growth rates had been on the order of a few feet a week. These guys were showing growth in a matter of hours.

And, as he came back down the hall, he couldn’t suppress a grin. Some of the reversals were fusing. And damn if that wasn’t the hot news of the millennium. His Dad would sit back in his chair and have a heart attack. In fact he just might call the old man and personally deliver a little comeuppance to Mister Superiority.

Just then a person, man or woman he couldn’t tell, fully decked in the yellow hazmat suit, walked in at the far end of the hall. It waved, but whether or not it smiled was lost in the slight reflection off the surface of the protective face shield it wore. David made what he estimated was a friendly face and waved back before turning and rolling his eyes. Those suits wouldn’t protect against magnetic fields. Anyone who wore them was just kidding themselves.

So here he was in his torn green scrubs crawling the dirty floors and ignoring the human smell that was here, and about to be overrun by the highly trained idiots in the yellow suits.

The suit approached him and the face shield’s technology finally made itself useful, the glare disappearing as the man got closer. “You Dr. Carter the second?”

“Yup.” The second, of course, as always. He was certain that his getting out of their way was exactly what the suits wanted, since this one even pointed to where one of the guys had volunteered to drive him back to the hotel.

David nodded and began the arduous task of gathering all his equipment together. Another suit, this one female, and beautiful - a shame he was too exhausted to care - offered to help him. He didn’t want anyone touching his things, even without the clumsy thick gloves.

Almost thirty minutes later, he had gathered all the stuff he needed and left the meters that would continue to record in his absence. But they had been roped off with the CDC's own stand back tape, and signs, hand printed Touch Me and Die on sheets of yellow legal paper. They swung just a little in air currents that they could feel even though he couldn’t.

He pushed a weary and very dirty hand through his hair, noticing again that there was just a little less of it than last month.

Flipping open his cell phone he saw the hour for the first time that morning. Already nine thirty. Damn. He dialed his father. His personal cell, the number that only David and every important scientist in the world had. His father had told him point blank once that David didn’t have the number because he was a good scientist, but because he was the senior Carter’s nearest blood relation. With a sour smile he decided that this call could only feel better if he had actually roused the bastard from sleep. And while he waited for the ringing to stop, he suffered the brief moment of weight in his chest like he always did before his father's voice said, "Hello, David." He never said the words, but the tone clearly begged the question of why he was being bothered.

"Dad." He didn't say anything more, knowing that the term was bothersome in itself and knowing that his father knew he couldn't escape it. Of course, the great irony being that no one had ever been farther from being a 'dad' than this world-renowned scientist.

"What do you want, David?"

And he just started speaking, letting all the events of the past few days spill out. He broke about fifteen federal and contract laws that the CDC had specifically reviewed with him, but he didn't care. He came awake to the sound of surprise in his old man's voice. Though even the fact that he was surprised by his son's success was irksome.

David held the conversation as he rode back to the hotel and wandered through the lobby. The elevator dinged but David walked in and just kept talking. Let the line get cut off. He arrived at his room and tried the key, but it didn't open. He tried again. Then, wrapped up in the conversation with his father, he tried a third time. This time the door opened, although not from his key. The door handle practically flew from his fingers, startling him just long enough to realize that Jordan had opened it from the other side. He looked like death warmed over and David said so.

"Thanks." Jordan ran a hand through his hair, although he only proceeded in making it stick up more than before. His face was as ruffled as his t-shirt and boxers, and he didn't seem to come fully awake.

"Guess I got the wrong room." David said, turning his key card over, already knowing that the answer wasn't there. His attention, at last, turned back to the phone conversation with his father. "No, I'm trying to get into my hotel room. Anyway, the reversals are melding. What do you think of that?" Not like he gave a crap in hell what the old man thought of it. He should have just said, How do you like them apples?

"What!" This time it was Jordan, looking more awake in his eyes if not the rest of his appearance. "Who are you talking to?"

"My father." He said, and then into the phone. "No, I'm talking to one of the doctors here."

"You can't talk to anyone about this!" Jordan shook his head, although he made no motion to grab the phone away from David.

He just covered the mouthpiece. "Trust me, my old man will be too livid that I found it first to tell anyone what he knows. He'll take it to the grave, and that ain't that far away."

The look on Jordan's face was the look of good little boys and girls who were not only taught to respect their elders, but actually did.

A soft voice came from back in the room. "Jordan?" It was feminine and groggy with sleep and David smiled, making a fist for a mock punch on the arm. The good doc had gotten himself some Nevada ass. The only question was, did he have to pay for it?

His father was speaking into the cell phone, the age in his voice telling of the distance the sound traveled, even though the phone itself told no such truths. "Yeah, Dad. I've got to go." And with that he hung up on his father, the sole purpose for the call already achieved.

With a smile, he turned to congratulate Jordan, but as he opened his mouth the voice came again. "Who is it?" And this time, as she came more awake, he recognized the cadence.

Jillian.

Oh well, she'd tire of Abellard soon enough, right? "By the way, your team showed up in their yellow suits about an hour ago. 'Night." He went down the hall enjoying the brief sounds of "oh shit!” and “the pager!”, before the door clicked closed on the cozy scene gone awry.

• • • •

JORDAN WAS VERY AFRAID of the gnawing in his gut. His father had mentioned that Lindsey and Kelly were ill, but changed the topic as soon as he knew that Jordan had already been notified. It was Sunday again, and Jordan had heard the hiss of the waffle iron in the background of the call, making the Nevada heat all that much more unbearable.

There were eight more prisoners sick this morning, even though they had removed everyone from the bubbles. Maybe they had just been in for too long. Maybe David’s numbers, which Jordan had leaned his head across the tapes to read, were indicating that this was another phase.

A voice shouted from off to his right and Jordan began to jog to the zippered tent where the metallic voice was coming from. When he arrived, a yellow suit was standing over a prisoner, the man’s arm cuffed to the gurney he was on.

The voice came again, filtered through a microphone inside the head piece and a polarizing layer of fear. “He’s down!”

“Back off!” Jordan shoved the nurse aside, wishing he could claw the suit off of her and make her be human, make her participate in this. But he couldn’t and he knew he had no right. Even through the refraction of the plexi-paned face plate he could see her perturbed expression. But he didn’t care.

His left hand grabbed for the wrist not cuffed to the bed, already feeling for a pulse, even as his right hand grabbed the stethoscope from around his neck and with nimble fingers spread the earpieces, popping them into his ears. By the time he had the bell of the scope on the prisoner’s slow moving chest, he had found the pulse, and was counting it. Although far too slowly. In another second he had ascertained that the man’s breath sounds were as weak as his pulse and he was slipping.

Another practiced action put the stethoscope back where it had begun, draped around his neck, and brought the flashlight from his right pocket. A quick move had the light snapped on and shining into dull green eyes held open only by his own fingers.

He sighed, knowing that it was too late. But he practiced his Jillian maneuver and shoved it to the furthest corner of his mind swearing it wouldn’t bother him, and dove back into the task at hand.

He turned to check the other two sleeping patients in this tent, realizing that they, too, were barely responsive. They weren’t categorized as comatose yet, but their pupils were slow to respond to his flashlight, their respirations depressed, their pulses slower, indicating a heart that was overburdened and giving up. Son of a bitch.

Ducking through the zippered entrance, opposite the one the nurse had left through, Jordan walked out away from the soft burr of the fans and into the light, feeling the heat start to suck at him again. But he gathered his voice and called for portable ventilators and oxygen tubing.

In just a few minutes mechanics showed, his voice having carried easily in the still desert air, unencumbered by the electronics of a microphone. But they carried none of the equipment that was their job. “We got almost nothing.”

“You’re kidding.” Jordan snapped, biting back the words that in a few weeks it might be their families that would need the ventilators and tubing. “I don’t care what you have to do. There has to be a hospital or a company with the machinery. Find it. Appropriate it if you have to.”

The two men managed to produce one ventilator, and within five minutes their big truck rolled out of the prison yard and cleared the gates without much in the way of a security check, kicking up desert dust on the way into town.

The nurse was called back to help hook up the slowly sinking patient to the last ventilator. All three of the men in the tent got oxygen tubing and prongs delivering the last tanks of O<sub>2</sub> to their lungs. They worked quickly and efficiently, without speaking. You didn't get to be on a CDCP field team without knowing your stuff. And you certainly didn't get snapped at by the doctor and not get pissed at him.

Jordan wanted to conjure up some regret. But he was flat out.

• • • •

JILLIAN HELD THE PAGE out to Jordan. Her back ached and her shoulders couldn't bear the weight of the world any more. Jordan didn't reach out to take it, just gave a little shake of his head as he carelessly peeled first his green cotton scrubs top, then the t-shirt underneath. For a moment her mother's voice popped into her head, warning her about casualness and sex. Somewhere inside Jillian laughed. She was a physician, and a naked male form was nothing other than a body, especially when she could see the bone deep weariness from the outside. Jordan tossed the shirts aside and met her eyes, a motion without words to read the fax page to him.

But Jillian shook her head. She was ready to cry, and losing ground every day. Only David seemed to still be enjoying plowing headlong into whatever hell awaited them. In the half hour she had napped while Jordan added to the charts in the room next door, she had been plagued and finally jolted awake in a cold sweat by the nightmares that found her whenever she slept alone.

Yet right now she wasn't asleep. And this nightmare in print wouldn't give up. But Jordan would have to read this with his own two eyes, and those eyes peered at her from above dark smudges, read her face, and saw her refusal with the stiffening of her arm again motioning the paper to him before finally he took it.

Jillian followed where his vision tracked on the page, saw his features contract on the first few smeared words from the archaic fax machine. Then she saw him twist, and she knew. His gaze didn't trace the rest of the paper, he just looked up, piercing her with his eyes.

"I'm sorry."

The words took the remaining starch from him, and he collapsed, doll-like, laid out on the bed. For a moment she sat and watched the even movements of his chest, listening as the air passed through his mouth, in a far too perfect rhythm to be anything but forced.

The minutes stretched, and the room was quiet enough to reveal the creaks and ticks of an older building as it shifted. All the sounds normally masked by human conversation and motion, none of which existed in this room. Finally, knowing it was the right thing to do, she stood and walked the five steps to the edge of the bed. His eyes stared at the ceiling and leaked tears from the corners. Though she looked him up and down, he never made eye contact with her, effectively shutting her out.

The aching bones turned to ice. Jordan was in a space she couldn't get into. Her own family was safe. She slid and crawled onto the bed next to him, sitting against the headboard, waiting. It was all of a second before he rotated to her, her arms automatically opening in a maternal gesture she didn't realize she knew.

Still without making any eye contact he curled into her embrace like a hurt child. Her arms closed on smooth skin as his head sank to her shoulder. She felt his hair against her cheek, not realizing that she had cocooned around him until she found herself there. "I'm so sorry." The raw whispering sound of her voice started her own eyes watering. But she couldn't distinguish if she was crying for him or for herself or simply from the abrasions her eyes had taken from seven days of desert air.

It started in soft confessional tones with his unmistakable timbre, “I left them all behind for school.”

She wanted to say that she understood, that she too had left her family, had left their ideals to pursue her dreams. But she didn't think she really did understand. And in a moment he explained. “No one else there went off to college. My Dad worked in the factory. My mother ran a daycare when she was alive. Eddie was the most successful, starting his own construction business. But I was educated and no one knew what to make of me. No one knew what to say or how to speak to me, so no one really did.”

His breath sucked in, and as he shifted she felt the wetness that soaked so easily through the shoulder of her scrubs. It dawned that the awkwardness she felt was due to the fact that she herself had cried to no one since she was small and no one had come crying to her.

“Eddie was my best friend growing up. . . and we got so far apart. I feel like I'm trained to be the hero here and I'm failing.” A soft intake of air was all that revealed the depth of his regret, the pain as he saw his family falling away from him. “I left so I could save people, and I can't save them.”

As he turned his face back into her shoulder, she could feel the muscles of his cheeks and mouth, biting his lip or such, and her hands slowly moved down the hot expanse of his back. Wrapping themselves around her waist, his arms stood out in muscled, bronze relief against the green of her scrubs, but the fabric blended from fold to fold making their legs virtually indistinguishable where they were tangled on the covers.

She felt and heard the two deep breaths at the same time, the only harbinger before he stood and turned quickly away, hiding the streaks that marked his face. But he didn't bring his hands up to wipe them away. Jillian saw one more deep breath before he announced that he would be on the next flight to Minneapolis.

Her legs curled under her of their own will, perhaps her body unconsciously seeking a more protected position before she told him what she knew. “You didn't read the whole thing.”

Jordan slowly turned to face her, no longer ashamed of the tracks on his face, his hands on his hips and his eyes steady.

“Landerly forbade you to go back. He wants you to stay here.” She felt the cringe before she realized she was doing it.

But he didn't flinch at the news at all. And she knew before she heard it what his decision was. “Then I quit. I'm going back.” He calmly walked into the bathroom where she heard the water running for a few moments before it shut off and was replaced by the sounds of zippers and the small clunks of things thrown into bags.

That galvanized her and she sprang from the bed, to find him in the bathroom doing exactly what she had expected. “Wait!”

That stopped him. Cold as stone he turned to her, “Do you want me to not go?”

“No. That's not what I'm saying.” Jillian felt the desperation rising inside her in a tidal panic she hadn't felt before this. “You should go. Let me make the arrangements through the CDC-”

“Maybe you didn't hear me. I'm quitting.”

With a ferocity she hadn't applied in way too long, she stood up to both Jordan and the encroaching hysteria. “No you're not. I'm getting on the phone and talking Landerly into this. He'll pay for it out of his own pocket by the time I'm through. Keep packing.”

She didn't wait for an answer because she didn't want to hear it. Too afraid he would disagree, she fled to the phone and began pushing buttons, unsure what she was going to say to change

Landerly's mind and send them to Lake James. Her fingers dialed of their own accord, her brain having long ago memorized all five of Landerly's numbers, and while she got her thoughts together Landerly answered. "Hello, Dr. Brookwood."

It would have been nice, to have such a distinguished colleague address her so formally, if he hadn't followed the first phrase with "I figured it would be you to call. So did you talk Abellard out of quitting or are you talking me into sending you both to Lake James?"

Surprised, she choked on the words, "The latter, sir."

"Well, this had better be a good argument." He sounded a trifle annoyed, and she would have shot something rude back, except that she was about to launch into an argument that had 'better be good' and she had no idea what that argument was.

"It is, sir."

Ten minutes later she hung up, and finally turned to face Jordan who had moved from the bathroom into the main room and was gathering his shoes, stuffing them into the bottom of the barely serviceable duffle he always carried. "Anne will call in less than fifteen minutes with your arrangements."

"My arrangements?"

"Yeah, just you." She smiled the turned-in grin that confessed she was at the end of her rope, too.

He crossed the six feet of space between them, relief showing on every plane of his face, and embraced her, breathing out in one long sigh, that let her know he was glad he didn't have to quit. Her face was inextricably buried in the white t-shirt he had thrown on, and the fake-fresh smell of laundry detergent assailed her, as did the fear of going it alone.

Lake James wasn't what she expected. In the coffee shop the waitress had answered her question with a 'ya' then laughed hysterically at 'y'all'. Becky was used to feeling backwoods, but this made her feel like a big city girl. And that was just uncomfortable.

The people looked like they stepped from a book she had read. And it reminded her too much of McCann: small stores, no chains, and everyone knew everyone else's business. And just like in McCann, they greeted her and John with a "you guys aren't from round here." In their weird clipped, partially swallowed accent. It was never a question, just a statement of fact.

Unable to speak in public about their work, she and John quietly sipped coffee that came only in regular and decaf, at a table with blue vinyl seats ripped in a handful of places, stuffing slowly escaping where it could. They both refused the breakfast menus, and drank in a noisy silence as the diner swirled around them.

John got a call halfway through the awkward breakfast, and the entire diner turned as one to see who was answering a cell phone in the middle of their pastiche. He ignored the looks, and snapped the phone shut. "Dr. Abellard is on his way, he's already in the air."

Becky only nodded and drained the last slightly darker bits from the bottom of her cup. She already knew that Jordan's cousin Lindsay had slipped into a coma yesterday. From the fax John had pulled from the machine before they left this morning, they knew that her mother Kelly had slipped under just hours ago - a fact even Dr. Abellard was unaware of as he flew in from Vegas.

"Are you two ready? We are." Leon Peppersmith approached them from the booth behind where she and John sat in clear distinction between the animal handlers and the PhDs.

Becky and John both nodded and got up together, in tandem reaching for their wallets and dropping a few bills on the table. Silently Becky tucked herself at the end of the line behind the four animal wranglers. Leon had his team: his brother as large and lean as himself; his sister, midsized but everything about her said she was determined to keep up with the big boys, including her brown ponytail; and a good friend of theirs who had worked for the first Peppersmith, when he had started in the animal wrangling business.

They were after medium-to-big sized game, and while the Peppersmith operation did a lot of for-hire work, they were contracted with the CDCP as needed. And John wanted good sized mammals. He wanted to see what was happening in other populations they hadn't happened to stumble across yet.

Though the coffee was warming her from the inside out, Becky turned up the neck on her jacket against the chill in the air. There were rumors that blizzards sometimes happened this early in the season up here. With a small shiver, Becky became a believer. She reached up to grab the handle at the back of the truck bed, but Leon stretched down to clasp her wrist and lift her in as though she was no more than a housecat.

He didn't speak, but motioned her to sit next to John, and moving his index finger in a circle in the air signaled Linda in the driver's seat to start up. Two smaller pickups with wide, tricked-out flatbeds followed close behind, and Becky wondered if it was legal to be sitting in the back of a truck like this. They were strapped into small seats that had been bolted in, her and John. But Leon was free within the confines of the bouncing bed of the quadcab, and he moved like the panthers he was known to catch. He ran a brief lesson, showing them modern lassoes and tranquilizer guns and cages while they rumbled along. When he asked if they knew how to shoot a rifle, he barely suppressed his surprise that it was Becky who said yes. It was the only emotion that had flitted across his face in the whole five hours she had known him.

His dark blond hair was pulled back in a low ponytail that looked to be held by a classic red office rubberband, and his ball cap, emblazoned with the letters "P.A.W.", was well worn and molded to him, as did the PAW coveralls he wore. He quickly went through his efficient explanations and demonstrations, and before Becky realized it they had pulled off the back road they had wandered onto.

They passed a road block that looked like anything the city might erect, even with the city name painted across the scrapboard barricades. It was a trick Becky had learned recently that the CDC did when they really didn't want anyone to know of their presence. They made it look like they weren't even there, not until you were well within the borders, and by then you'd have had to pass some sort of security check. It all seemed very 'Area 51' to her, but she was becoming accustomed to it, a fact that scared her more than just a little.

They stopped in a small clearing next to a wide expanse of trees, and like back home, the trees seemed to go on forever. Mountains loomed up beyond the vast forest, and who knew what lived back there where homes and people hadn't encroached and destroyed?

Fish and fowl. Amphibs by the thousands. Insects she was sure she had never seen before. But John had set them here for bigger catches. Cougar. Wolves. Bears.

And Peppersmith Animal Wrangling had a cage for anything they caught, trucks whose beds unfolded to act as trailers to carry it all back. With disturbing efficiency and a disconcerting lack of language, each of them was outfitted with a food pack and water bottle, a thinsulate blanket, and flare gun, and Becky was handed a rifle on a plain brown strap and several boxes of ammo - tranquilizers of many shapes and sizes. Becky slung the rifle over her shoulder in the lithe motion of someone who had done this a hundred times before, but unease gripped her that they expected her to size up and mentally weigh her prey before loading and taking it out. She was certain that if things went down she would shoot first, and second, and third, before stopping to check dosages and weights.

The yellow suits had been here before, leaving droppings of little Day-Glo flags, indicating areas where they had found reversals. These animals had been exposed, and they would all be, too. But they wouldn't be able to stalk game in hazmat suits. Becky didn't even know if the Peppersmith operation had been informed of what they were walking into.

Their quiet became infinitely reasonable as she was engulfed by the deep stillness of the forest broken only by the obnoxiously human sounds of her and John's boots crunching through the undergrowth. The Peppersmiths moved like the animals they hunted: quietly, stealthily, in a pack.

They kept their rifles firmly in hand, and so Becky decided that she would follow their lead and, as silently as she could, unslung the firearm from her shoulder. They had walked for half an hour, John and her bringing up the rear, when the line abruptly stopped. Leon's left hand was held up in a fist and he turned to look at John. With his two fingers in a V, he motioned for John to look beyond his left shoulder.

Looking back at all of them was a female cougar, showing her grace and stability across a fallen tree.

With hushed tones that didn't seem to disturb the cat anywhere near as much as John staring at her, the wranglers divvied themselves up. Lincoln and Linda taking John off to try to follow the cougar hopefully to her cubs. Becky was motioned to trail behind Leon and his friend, whose embroidery read 'Jess'.

They hooked wide around the cat and hiked further, leaving Becky to spend her time gazing around her, and making feeble attempts to categorize the birdcalls she heard. What a crazy place to think of the overzealous Marshall Harfield, but what a help he would be right now.

They asked her about three white-tailed deer, all of whom she refused to have captured. Even though it made the Peppersmiths shake their heads like kids told to clean their rooms. But the deer were juveniles. And Becky wasn't going to take them, not while she was making the decisions.

Her eyes spotted several species of frogs and lizards. And why were all the deer juveniles? Had something happened to the adults?

The frogs looked fairly normal. But she stopped and went to get a closer look, twice plunging her hand into water that made the icy creek back home feel like a hot spring. The cold was enough that it altered her physiology, keeping her fingers from grasping at their normal speed, letting these ice-adapted frogs get away from her. Knowing what was happening to the neural connections and muscular responses in her hands only bothered her, it sure didn't stop her from trying again and again until she finally came up with a salamander.

She counted all its toes and checked its eyes, before popping it into a plastic container she pulled from her backpack. She was pulling the pack back on when she spotted the two men staring at her.

It was Leon who opened his mouth and demanded a response. "What was that?"

"Salamander." She looked at them through narrowed eyes. She was the doctor, she was supposed to be making the decisions about what to catch and they were looking at her like she had a cracked head.

"Well, I hope you learn a damn lot from that guy." Jess had a southern drawl as long as the day, and a scowl to match.

Leon had his pack off and was pulling random things out of it, a spare pair of socks, a roll of thick blue tape. A wicked looking pair of scissors came from their own sheath on his leg.

He pointed them at her, scaring the wits out of her for a brief moment. Her mind flooded with horror movie scenes and she momentarily considered fleeing, back through the woods she didn't know, chased by a madman with his scissors and an uncanny awareness of the wilderness.

"Your sleeve's wet."

She jerked her arm back. "You going to cut it off?"

"I should, but I suspect you like that jacket." He pulled one long tube sock, emblazoned with the letter P, and snipped the toe end off. He unceremoniously yanked her sleeve up, allowing her to feel for the first time the frigid water that had seeped in even though she had been certain she had pushed it far enough back. Yanking the dry sleeve of her turtleneck down, he pulled his glove off in one smooth motion with his teeth, and ran his hand over her arm in a reverent and nearly sexual way. She wanted her skin back. She wanted the crazy guy with the scissors and tranq gun to step back. But she didn't quite have it in her to look him in the eyes and say so.

He pulled the sock over her arm, over her sleeve, and began wrapping the tape around and around. Allowing only the letter P to peek out near her elbow. "What is this? Some kind of scarlet letter?" As soon as the words were out she regretted the reference, wondering if two men who'd spent their lives 'rassling 'gators' would have heard of Hester Prynne.

"No," He cocked a look that was almost a smile. "This is a P, not an A. Your arm is now waterproof and will not freeze from where you dipped your sleeve in the pond. And maybe your jacket will dry out." He pulled the sleeve down over the tape, where it could no longer chill her wrist, nor soak into any of her other clothing. She turned her hand over, thinking it looked a bit odd, but was fairly ingenious.

“Thank you.” It was the least she could say to a man she had considered a possible serial killer just a few moments before.

Without a word, he slipped the items back into their various sheaths and pockets, and pulled his pack on even as he started walking away. Becky followed, flexing her hand to re-warm the muscles, grateful that the sleeve wasn't wet against her wrist. Cataloging everything she saw, she wished that she had Melanie's memory, and wished Mel could be here now to see these things.

It was then that she noticed Leon and Jess looking at each other and making faces even as she felt the odd odor trickle past her senses. She knew it was familiar, but not like this. Consciously keeping her voice low she asked without slowing her pace, “What is that?”

“Blood.” Both men replied simultaneously.

Wanting to ask more, but knowing that they were headed straight for the smell, Becky held her tongue. It took fifteen more minutes to get there. In that time she felt the smell change from weak to pungent with a mild overlay of rotting flesh, a smell she hadn't detected ten minutes further back on the trail.

They made their way off the paths, finally coming to a clearing, silent as mice, until Becky gasped. A whole herd of moose lay dead, the river rushing by them as though nothing were wrong, even though a member of the herd had fallen in and gotten tangled in a fallen tree. Water rushed around it on all sides, the animal bobbing like a swollen cork. The bulk of the herd lay along the shores, feet curled under them like they were asleep.

But they weren't asleep. Wolves and cougars, even some Canada Lynx chewed greedily on the haunches of the fallen animals. The closest ones looked up and growled in response to the gasp that had escaped Becky's mouth. Cubs and pups were there as well, there was no infighting over pieces. There was enough moose for all.

The stench assailed her now that she had a visual to go with it. Bloody muzzles came up and chewed before burying themselves deep in the torn open sides of the larger hooved animals. Juveniles tugged at loose flesh, trying to rip pieces free, unconcerned about their human visitors.

It was Jess who spoke first. “Damnedest thing. Usually they won't eat something that dies of its own accord.”

Becky nodded. “What do they know that we don't?”

• • • •

THE WATER BUBBLED AROUND her, the chlorine churning into a smell that was certainly unpleasant, but her brain ignored it in order to appreciate the joys of the foaming water and heat. She had a coke with a big red straw sitting on the edge of the tub.

The season being what it was, they were the only ones out here. A few of the prison officers had been in the casino, gambling at blackjack or playing nickel slots. Something pretty much all of them had sworn at one time or another they never did.

“You look sad.”

David's voice broke through the shell she had locked herself in since Jordan's call. His cousin had joined her daughter in a coma, and his father had complained of a stomach ache. Jordan was staying with his Dad at the house, as his father's exposure to the reversals had come at the factory where he worked, which had since been shut down by the CDC. And that had prompted the news crews to come out. Jordan had explained how they'd held a small press conference and stalled, stating that they didn't know what it was yet. Which was true.

“I am sad.” She just took a sip of the coke, enjoying it, even though she knew it was full of caffeine and would act in conjunction with the hot tub to dehydrate her even faster than the desert air could. But she figured dehydration was the least of her worries.

David pulled his arms out of the water, stretching them across the tiles and leaning his head back like she did. Her own arms felt cool from the contact with the tile, in the dark it had finally lost much of the heat it had retained from the day. The night sky was big and black and disappointingly empty. There were no stars visible above her; they were all blocked out by the pinprick of blinding light that was the state line.

“Do you miss him? Abellard?”

“Yeah.” She said it with a force she didn’t know she felt, the words falling out of her mouth. “None of these people will talk to me like they talk to him. They’re getting worse by the day, and there’s nothing medical to do. I may have something, but it isn’t statistically significant yet.”

“What do you think you have?” David was leaning forward, carefully holding his brown longneck bottle out of the water.

“The glycosylated hemoglobin spikes ever so slightly before a person goes under. And I wouldn’t have found it if I didn’t have a whole pond of sitting ducks and nothing better to do than run blood draws on everyone all day long.”

David nodded and so the words kept falling out of her mouth in useless rivers. “I swear I had a patient take a step back when I came to him. He looked like he had a heroin problem, we’d taken his blood so many times.” She sighed, more to herself than to him, more out of exasperation than weariness.

Her bones were rubber, and her coke was gone, and suddenly she was tired. Dead tired.

Jillian bent her elbows and, flattening her hands against the tiles, lifted herself out of the tub, dripping water across the ceramic squares, and she made a brief note to watch where she stepped. She could see the headlines: CDC doctor kills herself in deadly cola/hot tub/water-slick incident. She’d already warned David about the alcohol he was drinking, but he was a big boy and he could call his own shots.

He followed her up, sitting for a moment on the edge of the rim, rubbing his hand up and down his face. “Wow. That beer does affect you more in the hot tub.”

David didn’t say much more, just followed her silent bare feet down the hall with his less than silent large ones. He waited while she got her door open, standing back and not crowding her, but being gentlemanly. “Need any help getting ready for bed?”

She mentally rescinded the gentlemanly idea. “No thanks.” With a small smile meant to say goodnight and nothing more, she stepped past and into the frigid room.

She had hoped it would be warm, or at least not sub-arctic. Given the time she had been here and her high IQ she had thought she would have figured out what to leave the AC set at so that the room would be the right temperature when she returned. But, no.

Inside of five minutes she was ready for bed, having swallowed eight giant pills for the third time today. She dreaded the short walk to the king sized bed; it had gotten just a little larger since Jordan had left. And with a deep breath she walked over and pushed herself beneath the covers, flicking off the last bedside lamp letting darkness infest the room.

Feeling her eyelids pull closed, Jillian waited for sleep to overtake her, but her fear held it at bay. She’d been hopeful that she would climb into the bed and smell him on the sheets. But the maids had changed the sheets and it had all been destroyed with one easy stroke of efficiency.

Eventually she got bored with lying in bed and not sleeping, so she threw back the covers and began turning on lights. The room was boring in its simplicity, too neat, too dull, and she decided to make use of her time by checking out the charts in the other room; she could at least update the hemoglobin numbers she was getting.

As she pulled the conjoining door open to total darkness, her brows knit together. The light behind her didn't penetrate, and a deep unease walked through her. She tucked her hand around the wall feeling for the switch, to no avail. She tested with her foot, sneaking it across as it was almost swallowed by the darkness, but no floor rose up to meet her toes. Flailing wildly, her hands grasped at the door frame, stopping her just in time from plunging into the abyss beyond the door.

The darkness breathed.

The deep space at the door pulsed in a slow even rhythm. Jillian considered reaching out to catch the doorknob so she could close off the menace, but even as she leaned out over the yawning gap beneath her, into the darkness, hanging only by her left hand firmly grasped on the frame, she heard something.

Something familiar.

So she pulled back, clung to the door frame, and waited.

She wasn't sure how long it was before the sound came again.

"Jilly?" This time it came from behind her. Whirling into the sound of him, she knew everything would be all right.

"Jordan!"

But he didn't hug her. She didn't even see his face, just his strong hands coming up to plant across her collarbone and shove her backwards until she fell into the endless space beyond the doorway.

With a deep gasp, Jillian jerked herself from the clutches of the black, coming awake and gulping air in the hotel room. She lay alone, twisted in the covers, in the middle of her own bed.

• • • •

YESTERDAY JILLIAN HAD finally given him the keys to the car. He had needed it and she hadn't. And David simply hadn't handed them back over. He figured the car practically went from the hotel to the prison and back by itself at this point.

This morning Jillian didn't even make a motion for the driver side door, just slipped limply into the passenger seat and buckled up without a word.

"Is everything all right?" He wasn't normally one to pry but the girl looked like someone had showed up last night and decked her, blacking both eyes. He knew that wasn't the case, since he'd seen the color forming for several days now. "You miss your boyfriend?"

That, at least, startled her. "He's not my boyfriend."

"Friend with benefits?" If you dug with a little trowel you could get pretty deep before anyone noticed what you were doing. Or decided they didn't want to answer your question.

She laughed. "Yeah, benefits. Like I can sleep."

"Huh?" Digging with his little trowel only worked when he was prepared.

"Since McCann, I have nightmares when I sleep alone."

"Jesus, Jillian, all you had to do was knock. You know you can stay with me."

Her eyebrows went up, making the fatigue look almost delicate across her fine features. All of it was clear across her face, left unhindered by the deep mahogany hair pulled up into her ponytail. He could easily read the distrust and the laughter.

"I don't think I would get any more sleep with you than I do by myself."

“Hey. I’d let you sleep.” What the hell? Was he defending his own honor? Even he knew he didn’t have any.

“Right.”

Twenty minutes of silence later they arrived at the penitentiary. He pulled the tires onto the soft sand lot where they parked with a slew of other cars, but Jillian was out of the car before he flipped the key. She almost closed the door, but then was across the lot like a streak of green, her hair flying behind her.

David looked beyond her fleeing form to see what she was running to. The only thing his brain processed at first was that something was wrong. He wanted to yell, to tell her to come back. But she was gone before he could call out. And all he knew was that something was dreadfully not right.

Canvas fluttered in the air. Fans and machinery could be heard. But nothing human moved.

Except for Jillian, who disappeared between the tents, running toward whatever was so wrong.

Grabbing his briefcase, David took off after her. Even as he ran, he tucked one hand down in the side pocket to pull out a small electronic compass. He clicked the power button and was rewarded with a screen full of dashes followed by a blinking error light.

The reversal. That was the only explanation. He pulled out an old needle compass his father had given him back in his days as a boy scout. Even now, the feel of his hand around the metal case brought back the warning that he had better not lose it. But he slipped it out to watch the classic red arrow sway like a drunken sailor.

“Jillian!”

His heart was ready to pound its way out of his chest, and his breathing seared his lungs it was so deep and ragged. Jesus, had he just been talking about sex? And now . . .

“Past the computer tent!”

Or, at least, that’s what he thought he heard, the wind ate portions of her words like a staticky broadcast. So he ran to his best guess, stopping short when he did finally see her.

Jillian was on her knees, working the hood off of a fallen suit. Another lay behind her, his head lolled to the side, mouth open, his helmet lying a foot away in the sand.

He heard the precious compass hit the dirt, and instantly his knees bent, his body’s immediate reaction to protect its treasure. Her face turned up to his, her stethoscope hung from her ears, her penlight clung to her fingertips. “They’re all under.” Her eyes tracked wildly to either side of him.

“Jillian—” He grabbed her arm to pull her to her feet. Thinking to embrace her in a hug, and comfort her. But she jerked her arm out of his reach.

Before he snapped out of it, Jillian was on her feet, racing away. Her standard uniform of running shoes carrying her well from one tent to another. He raked his fingers through the sandy earth, sifting out the round silver compass and he followed, watching as she lifted flaps and peered inside each one. He checked the needle periodically, noting where it went from the wild swinging to pointing due south.

This whole shanty town the CDC had erected was now in the reversal.

Jillian dove into one tent and David ran the distance to join her. Not knowing what he could do, but that he would do whatever was needed. They were in a maximum security prison made of loose canvas. There was no telling when or how the prisoners would get loose. Or what they would do to the cute little doctor if they did.

The tent was darker than he expected and his eyes took several seconds more than he felt was reasonable to adjust. When he finally was able to focus on Jillian, she was kneeling on the floor where a CDC employee, not in a hazmat suit, had curled up between the patient gurneys.

Jillian put her stethoscope on the woman's chest, rolling her from her side onto her back even as she checked the prone woman. The badge hanging around her neck flashed as the woman rolled over, revealing that she was an RN.

He didn't really want to know, but he asked anyway. "The others?"

She made eye contact finally, but he almost wished she hadn't, her vivid blue eyes were bright with a gloss of unshed tears. "All the same."

He reached down for her with his right hand, having shifted the compass to his pocket and the briefcase into his left. "Jillian, we're standing in a reversal. We have to get out."

"What?" She focused on him. In him, somewhere inside his soul.

"We're deep in the reversal right now. Everywhere you ran is backwards." He tugged her to her feet, whether she wanted it or not. All of it made him uncomfortable: her gaze, the polarity. "And judging by what's happened, it's pretty powerful. We have to get out."

He simply turned and yanked her along, brooking no protests. He kept going until they had arrived at an untouched cluster of cactus, well beyond the tents, opposite the parking lot where they had come in. It had been the fastest way out. Finally, when it seemed she wouldn't protest, or just dash back in to save some chart or blood sample, he dropped her hand and plucked the compass from his shirt pocket.

North.

True north.

He breathed out.

But while he gathered himself together, Jillian fell apart. Her legs gave way and she sank onto the sand beneath her, gathering her knees in her arms and burying her face in the space between.

It took a few moments with him standing there, looking out over the desert while she cried at his feet before she spoke. "Why didn't they call?"

He shook his head, but mentally he flipped through image after image of what he'd just emerged from. "You know, it looked like people just fell wherever they stood."

She started to uncurl. And David knew he'd handed her something for that brain of hers to chew on. She'd come back around for that.

"No." She looked up into the sky and he waited for what she'd reveal. "They didn't fall. There were no broken bones, or bumps to the head. It was like they curled up or lay down where they were. They had at least a few moments."

He nodded for her to continue.

"That would mean they got sick very quickly. . . even the RN didn't get out of the tent to tell anyone. But she didn't fall. Not the way she was lying." He thought he saw a ghost of a smile pass her lips. "That nurse was smart. She even thought it through and lay down on her side. In case she vomited. So she wouldn't choke on it."

Pleasant, he thought to himself. But he'd have to remember that, in case he came to needing it.

"Help!"

It cut through the air. A human voice that wasn't theirs, calling from the other side of the camp.

Jillian was on her feet in an instant, dashing back in towards the tents, until David caught her arm and hauled her off her feet, nearly yanking her shoulder from its socket. "You can't go back through there. We have to go around."

So she pulled him at a breakneck speed. He wouldn't let go and she wouldn't slow down. David wouldn't abandon his briefcase, so it slapped against his leg a few times until he learned to hold it out of the way. He ran with the compass in front of him, watching for the shift and pulling Jillian off to the side more than once as the needle jerked too much for his taste.

It wasn't reliable, this running and reading. The compass was meant to be used by a camper who had a moment to stop and let the needle settle, not running at high speeds around fatal pole reversals.

Just then Jillian stopped short and, without any warning, he crashed into her back, eliciting a grunt from her and a quick save as she managed to keep them both on their feet.

Five county cars were sitting in the lot where they hadn't been before.

"Shift change."

Her voice caused a swell of nausea to rise in him. Twenty officers had just arrived to relieve their friends, only to find them comatose, scattered across the ground like forgotten toys.

The sound came again, from off to their right. But this time it wasn't a cry for help. It was a muffled noise, a grunt, a groan, or somewhere in between.

And she was just too fast for him to catch. Jillian jumped into the fray, dashing between two tents and disappearing from his view. What the hell, he was going to die anyway. He might as well go out chasing a hot doctor.

When he arrived, she was leaning over an officer who was curled on the ground with his arms wrapped tight around his stomach. "Ahhhhh." It was soft. Not so much in pain as it was a release. And even as David stood there dumbfounded, the arms slackened. The officer's face lost its tension and his head eased to the ground.

The officer looked like he had suddenly gone to sleep.

Jillian looked over her shoulders at another man who was standing over a fallen colleague. A quick sweep revealed that almost all of the officers were already down. Only a few remained, clutching their stomachs, and one had his hands clasped over his ears, as though the eerie desert silence was the loudest feedback.

As David watched Jillian rushed, helpless, from one man to another. Not able to help any of them without sacrificing the others. Not able to help any of them anyway. And one by one they dropped. Creating a pattern of fallen bodies in grey-green uniforms, aligned in small clusters, attesting to how they had tried to help each other.

The whole shift down.

"Jillian!" He paced up to her in several hard steps, again grabbing her behind the elbow and dragging her along. "We have to get out of here. Look at what it's doing to people."

He thought of nothing else but reaching the edge of this freak of nature and walking beyond it. He hauled her with him, completely unconcerned for her well-being. Mostly he figured he should take the only other standing person out of the reversal with him.

When he felt he was far enough beyond, probably way further than necessary, he pulled out the old boy scout compass again. This time he was able to use it in its intended style, standing still. Although his hand shook like Richter seven.

North.

Again the needle direction freed his lungs of their breath.

Jillian just stood next to him, a statue in kelly green, her eyes blinking on and off azure blue. He wanted to lean over and put his hands on his knees and breathe like he had just finished wind sprints. Feeling his lungs contract so rapidly and painfully was almost a relief.

"Why are we still standing? Why did they collapse and we didn't?"

He looked up to see her eyes connect with his. He felt it like a hit, square in the chest, as the words absorbed.

Those officers hadn't been inside anywhere near as long as they had, and yet the wardens had all fallen, most even before they could ask for help. They were rapidly affected by the reversal, the symptoms showing instantaneous onset to a man.

As his own eyes focused on Jillian he saw the thought pattern in her head change. Her eyes averted and she grabbed for her stomach. Tumbling to her knees, Jillian lost the contents of her breakfast in the hot sand.

His father's hand was slack and lifeless. Not warm, not cold. Not dead, but not the house of a living soul. Mr. Abellard's eyes didn't open, didn't show the telltale movements of tracking a dream. Nor would they. Jordan knew that, and felt the sharp stab somewhere untouched.

Eddie's death had been tough. Hearing about Lindsay and Kelly slipping away had hurt. Opened old wounds. Rubbed areas already raw. But when his father took one last look at him, before his eyes pulled closed and his breathing pattern changed, Jordan felt the world undergo some subtle shift.

In that moment Lake James had ceased to be his home. It was simply a cluster of people he knew, or knew of, and a house that he had grown up in. The promise of waffles on Sunday was forever rescinded. The smile his father would get when thinking of his mother. The last person who remembered her as Jordan did. All of it was gone.

Now he waited. Until his father took his last breath and died. Or until Landerly called his number and drafted him into service again. But now he would only fight for others. So they wouldn't lose like he had.

Another man lay comatose in the second bed against the window. Jordan didn't know him, but his Dad had once referred to him as Albert, and Jordan got the feeling that the two men had worked together.

As he often did, he squeezed his father's hand. Just enough to send pressure signals to the dormant brain, in hopes that Jackson Abellard was only sleeping, that his son's hand would get even the slightest squeeze back. But it didn't. Not any of the tries before, and not this time either.

The smell blanketed the room, not just with the odor of 'hospital' but of death. The whole room was waiting - the chairs, the window, the light that didn't quite filter in. Why should it bother? It was all just a matter of time.

Jordan stood and stretched, needing to get out where things lived and breathed, even if they didn't really connect with him. The cafeteria seemed like a logical choice - the eating of food being the road to sustaining a body. He put his feet in a rhythmic pattern on the floor, moving himself out the door and down the hallway, even though it required far too much thought. He was halfway there when his cell phone went off. Tugging it from the waistband of his blue scrubs, he checked the caller ID.

Landerly.

Well, that didn't take long. He flipped the phone open. "Yes?"

"We have two new cities near McCann that are losing people, and very rapidly. I want you there."

Jordan blinked twice. Thinking through . . . nothing. He would leave his father here, because there was nothing more he could do. And did he need to sit here for the two more days it would take, and simply wait? No. He could be helpful.

"Abellard? Anne will call you back with your arrangements." With a few more short sentences, Landerly conveyed the seriousness of the issue. These were cities, they were on the maps and had populations in the tens of thousands. Huge compared to what they had seen in McCann or even Lake James. Jillian and David had seen everyone at the prison go under, and they would meet him in Nashville and fly into Knoxville together on a small charter.

With only a click and no real closing words, Jordan was left holding the cell phone. Staring at it like an alien in his grasp as the staff in the hall flowed around him in a sea of blues and greens.

He turned and headed back to his father's room, he hadn't really been hungry anyway. And in a minute he had re-perched himself at the side of the mechanical gurney. Again he held his father's hand, but this time he spoke. With gentle words he explained that he'd be back after he packed, but only briefly, before he was off again to East Tennessee, to pursue his place as a physician. Something he had only in the past few days understood that his father admired him for.

"I'll be back in a bit, Dad." Taking a deep breath he forced himself to stand and let go of the shell that had housed his father.

On lead feet he made the turns down the corridor, waited at the elevator, and walked through the chill air to the physician's parking lot. His father's beat-up Ford Falcon took the turns like a steamer, slow and wide, heavy and solid feeling. Like his father, the car was from a different era, and with a slight smile he decided he would come back to claim the antique as his own.

Within minutes he was pulling up to the house where his father had spent his whole adult life. The house was emptier than it had ever been. The souls had vacated it a while ago it seemed. With quick leaps Jordan took the stairs two at a time and raided his drawers for what he had brought - so much for settling in and staying a while.

The duffle was packed and slung over his shoulder without a second thought. He was, by now, too used to picking up and fleeing with only his bag to let sentimentality rule him. Key in hand, he bolted the front door behind him, and sank into the driver's seat of the car.

He pulled out, driving in the exact reverse order to get back to the clinic where his Dad lay. He managed to get another fifteen minutes of time with his father. Not that that time made any difference to either of them. Jordan didn't speak, didn't think, didn't cast silent wishes. When the cell finally rang again, he took the call where he sat, Anne's dulcet tones telling him that his flight was leaving in just barely enough time to get himself to the airport, and maybe not even that. She mentioned the charter terminal in Nashville and how to get to it.

He hung up, and waved the phone at his Dad, thinking to make a little joke. "Stop me now Dad, or I'm off to Tennessee."

His father made no response. No shift or hitch in his breathing, no twitch of a finger. Jordan watched for all of it and saw none of it. So he stood, stretched, and after a brief hesitation he leaned over and gently pressed a kiss to his father's forehead. "I love you, Dad. I'll see you on the other side."

• • • •

"WHAT!?" BECKY SHOUTED into the cell phone. John had called her three times while she was out trekking with Leon and Jess. Not that her super CDC phone had picked up anything in the back wilds of Minnesota.

"Clinton, Oak Ridge-" static. She wanted to throw the phone, but upon recognizing towns just beyond her parents' land she knew she couldn't lose it over a cell phone. There were far better things to lose it for these days.

Like Leon and Jess making angry faces at her. Here she was yelling on a cell phone in the middle of their pristine wilderness. Well they could stuff it.

"Come . . . back . . . in . . . w- . . . -eed . . . talk."

"I'm coming." She practically shouted it, again knowing it was useless. Louder only worked when you were yelling to a person far away, but Becky was beginning to wonder if maybe that wouldn't be a better method of communication. John said something else, even more indistinguishable than the previous sentences, so she yelled “Good-bye!” and hung up. Only to turn and face the Peppersmith guys and their angry glares.

With a sigh, she ignored their expressions, just as she had learned to ignore the menacing way they held their tranq guns. That was for her protection, she had found out the other day when a wolf had come too close. “We have to go in, guys. John called me back. Something about other towns.”

“Other towns?” That from Leon, his deep voice and blue eyes not hiding his surprise or concern.

Crap. She had no idea what kind of clearance these guys held. But she also knew her place. And her place was not to give information out. So she weaseled. Another great skill she had learned since hiring on at the CDC. Telling the truth to lie. “I don’t know what it is. I really couldn’t hear much of anything except that I had to come back in.”

But she had heard a whole lot more. John sounded not scared exactly, but disturbed. Oak Ridge and Clinton were just beyond the boundaries of the little acreage her folks held. And she knew what the reversals were doing. More than she wanted to know.

She was under contract to not tell her family anything, even though death might be at their doorstep. Literally.

That thought set an ulcer to forming. She could feel the hydrochloric acid in her stomach pinching and wearing away at the delicate tissue even as she hiked back toward their base. The trucks stood ready, cages open and waiting for animals stupid or unlucky enough to get in their way, or to catch John’s eye. It seemed that John, who had never held a gun in his life, who had always excelled at science and never sports, enjoyed having the raw power of the Peppersmiths at his command. Becky on the other hand felt guilty every time she gave the word to bring a creature down, to haul it in. She kept telling herself it was a necessary evil.

The hike seemed much longer this way, even though she knew for certain that they were taking a more direct route and walking at a faster pace. Pines passed by with a speed that was likely to have her wind up with a twisted ankle. But she was fueled by adrenaline, her brain not acknowledging the sounds of birds. Even though it categorized that the aviary itself was changing here, day by day.

The Nevada prison scared the living daylights out of her. According to what she read, it was very lucky that Jillian and David were alive. They had actually run into the reversal, several times. Dr. Abellard was supposed to be monitoring them for signs of turning to the worse. That was enough to give her the willies.

From what she and John had gleaned that morning, it sounded like the suits were standing at the edge of the reversal and jumping back as it got bigger. They were using ultrasound and heat sensors to detect who was still alive. It seemed most of them were. They were looking to see who was moving. At last count that was no one.

Becky chewed her lip. The sharp retort of the rifle just behind her made her jump and nearly bite through it. She turned to glare at Leon who was holding his gun still aimed and practically smoking. But it was Jess who pointed just a few feet to her left where a lynx was teetering on its feet and falling with a soft thud to the forest floor. Becky closed her eyes, wondering whether she should thank Leon or yell at John for this crazy adventure.

As casually as if it was a discarded towel on his living room floor, Leon picked up the lynx and slung it over his shoulder. He motioned for Becky to keep trudging forward. Her ankles were sore from three days of this. Her nerves were stretched. And the ground was giving way beneath her feet. But she slid down the small incline, touching her hand to various branches to stay upright, sending small rocks skittering in front of her. Leon and Jesse brought up a tight watch behind her as she picked her way back with very little grace. At least compared to the two men whose big booted feet were no more than cat's paws in the thick pine wilderness. But she tried to breathe clean air and pretend it was all okay.

Becky knew it wouldn't last long. If she ran, the clean smell would give way to the bloody scene they had twice visited at the riverside. The deer would be only juveniles, and unless she could turn her brain off, she would worry that thought in her head forever. Then there was also the promise of the maniacal gleam that would light John's eyes when he sent the Peppersmiths off after her to bring her down with their tranq guns. She, too, could come back to camp unconscious and slung across Leon's wide shoulder, arms hanging limp, flapping with the rhythm of his gait.

Her two low ponytails stirred in the wind that reached them as they neared the edge of the clearing. John approached, carelessly picking his way through the brush, branches snapping back behind him. "Oak Ridge is losing people and so is Clinton."

He held up a map in front of her asking what she knew. All Becky could think was that the whole of Anderson County was going under and the two Peppersmiths behind her were getting a serious education in what was happening. She could feel Leon approach even though she couldn't see or hear him. Her instincts were the best detection for him, probably the only one.

John circled the map area, pointing with his pen. "People are going down fast! One hundred since our update this morning."

She watched as the tip of his capped red pen passed right through her parents' property as he made generous circles around the affected area.

She simply nodded, and waited.

"I want you on the next plane back down there." He turned at last to acknowledge Leon. "Can you drive her?"

Becky's mouth almost hung slack. Like a dog with a bone, John's manners had gotten just as canine. She was turning to apologize for her boss when John spoke again. "I'd like you to fly down there with her. See what you can check out. Catch what you can. I just have to stay here. It's way too interesting."

He half handed, half shoved a page at Becky. She recognized it as a species list, just as John spoke. "It's a list of all the species we're losing." His eyes were almost bright with anticipation. As though it were just a game, that the paper she held in her hand listed imaginary armies from a too serious game of 'Risk', not Bengal Tigers and Canada Moose and Elk and, of course, Georgia Warblers.

• • • •

JORDAN TOOK IN THE scene before him. They had come in on the promised charter. Only this was no Lear jet, it was a wobbly Cessna, that had wound its way down to a field in the open space between Clinton and Oak Ridge. After a touchdown that had felt as though the earth had risen up to them and the plane had stayed stationary, they cranked open the doors and tumbled out.

He let Jillian go first, being gentlemanly, and instantly regretted it. She stumbled a little as her feet hit ground. Her soft blue scrubs showing the buckling of her knees, her hands tucking into her stomach as she folded over. He felt the raw stab of fear that knifed him in the gut every time she wavered. Again he came up with an excuse, it was just the plane ride. He was nauseous, too.

She didn't have 'it'.

With an ungraceful thump, he landed beside her and took her elbow, seeing David come out the other side, compasses already in hand, briefcase and leather bag hanging from his arms. He looked ready to walk into the hotel and spend his workweek. Jordan's gaze naturally pulled back to Jillian, his hands encircling her upper arms, his eyes finding hers. "Are you all right?"

Even as he asked it, he told himself the pain was just because he had already lost everyone. Not because anything was so special about her.

She pushed at his chest. "I'm okay. Just need to get my feet under me." With that, she straightened. Shoved her hair out of her face. The dark strands, for once loose, had bothered her on the whole flight over. Wet and hanging limp when they entered the plane, they had a gentle wave to them now that rubbed beneath his fingers as he let her stand on her own.

He felt and heard her take a deep breath, and he grabbed both their bags as had become his custom. David had already planted himself behind the wheel of the midsized, mid-aged gold sedan. Why they didn't have grey or even a black hearse was beyond him. For the thousandth time Jordan felt like they were walking blind. Only this time they were walking into a serious tragedy.

Holding the passenger door for Jillian he waited while she situated herself, most of the green color having faded from her features. Then he let himself into the backseat while David gunned the engine, testing the feel of the car and his own level of testosterone.

With the map Anne had provided they wound an uncertain way through the countryside. It looked much like the area outside McCann. The Appalachian Mountains cradled the sides of the small road, only this time they nestled ATV shops, car dealerships, and the occasional small windowless strip joint up along the sides of the two lane highway.

The shops gave way to churches, hillsides dotted with houses, and at last a storage unit of long gray buildings fronted by rows of garage doors. The chain link fence was a good fifteen feet high, winding its way around the property and then across the road in front of them. That made Jordan frown.

A uniformed security guard stood sentry at the gate that spanned the street, on the outside of the town, and David pulled up even as the guard approached them. But David was already whipping out his compass, and making Jordan wish someone else had driven.

The rent-a-cop tipped his hat and spoke to all of them through David's open window. "Sorry folks. City's closed."

The City is CLOSED? How does one even close a city? But Jordan could see the answer to his question looming fifteen feet in front of him. The chain link was old and looked unused, but the razor wire gleamed in the afternoon light, obviously a fresh addition to the precautions.

David pulled out his temporary badge, flashing it as though he were the president's guard. "We're with the CDCP." He didn't add that they needed to get inside. Or that they had clearance. He didn't need to. His confidence, that may have already passed well into arrogance, spoke all that for him.

The guard stepped back slowly, nodded again, and spoke into the police style walkie-talkie tacked to his shoulder. His movements all yielded to the slow drawl of the south. And Jordan could see where it was often perceived as laziness, but could also see that it clearly wasn't. It was bred into these people who hadn't seen a Minnesota blizzard, or had to do more to keep the cold at bay than turn up the collar on their coats.

But they also were possessed of a certainty that speeding up wasn't critical - a belief that clearly didn't run in Jillian's blood, southern cheerleader that she may be. She fidgeted in the seat, squirming this way and that, trying to look calm but not quite pulling it off. Jordan would have bet his life savings her right foot was crossed over the other, keeping to a silent rhythm.

The guard sauntered back to them, gave a brief nod and told them it'd be just a minute.

It was more like four, Jordan realized as Jillian fidgeted away the time and David sat calmly beside her, pulling instrument after instrument from the briefcase, recalibrating it or something, and then quietly putting it back. Jordan leaned back, trying to stay relaxed. He thought he was achieving it well. He kept the hyperventilation and the terror at bay, tucking his hands behind his head, and leaning back as though he were on the beach and not sitting in the back of a government car about to gain security clearance through the gates of hell.

The guard stood stationary at the side of the fence, looking exactly as he had long before they were parked there, engine idling. Jordan wondered what the guard would do to get the gates open, or if he was waiting for a code or such.

It turned out the guard would do nothing.

A black sedan, filled with men in identical suits and haircuts, pulled up on the inside of the gate, looking like something out of an FBI movie. But then again this was The Town That Built The Bomb, Jordan thought as the four men undid a thick padlock and wheeled the gate back by hand. They threw their weight at the task, creaking it back foot by foot, before waving the car through. David pulled in and kept on driving, but Jordan turned around to see that they men in suits never acknowledged the guard outside and that they secured the gate with the large padlock set with something that looked like a magnetic key. Jordan fought off thoughts of having to climb the gate and throw himself over the razor wire with thousands of citizens when the lock failed.

David pushed the small map at Jillian and set her to navigating. She instantaneously spouted off directions.

“My god,” Jillian shook her head and she spoke again before Jordan could finish the thought of wondering what pattern her brain had found within two minutes of entering the city. “The streets are alphabetized.” She looked from side to side, and while David seemed to have his eyes on both the road and his compasses, Jordan followed her gaze to see that it certainly appeared that she was right.

“Good lord, who are these people?” He heard it from his mouth before he realized he had let it slip. This was Jillian’s South and he didn’t want to offend.

But she supplied an answer with a quirk of her mouth. “The government.”

“That’s right . . .” The town had only become public after world war two when the government had opened the city to the families of the scientists who were working on the top-secret Hiroshima project. The place was fuckin’ nuts. As best as he could see the gates encircled the entire city. Whether that was to keep people out or secrets in, he was unsure. The streets were not only alphabetized, they stacked the road signs. So you would turn down a side street that bore four perfectly ambiguous street names.

There were a few people on the streets. Of course all the activity was on the outside of the sawhorse barricades. The people who had lived inside the reversal’s radius had already been moved to temporary housing. But the people who were out looked fairly normal in spite of the presence of the men in big dark suits, with small sharp haircuts.

The townspeople put gas in their cars and drove through the McDonalds. The Home Depot lot was empty, and Jordan hazarded a guess that food and gas ranked higher than repairs. Maybe this town full of scientists was smart enough to realize that barricading their doors would only trap them inside and keep nothing out.

“Shit!” David’s voice cut through the air.

“What?” Jillian turned to him, and from her color, just that quick motion was enough to make her green. Or maybe it was the same thought that Jordan was having. David swore all the time, but not in a surprised way, and if something here had surprised him it would have to be bad. Really bad.

“We’re either on the fuzzy edge of a very large reversal and we’re going to hit it any second, or we’ve been riding the edge since three lights back.”

“But the road is straight. It’s not following an arc at all.” Jordan didn’t understand any of the magnetics of it, he knew just enough to pass the physics section of the MCAT years ago when he went into med school. Beyond that he was a slave to what David chose to share with him. But he knew that what they had been finding was that the bubbles were circular. Probably how they had gotten dubbed that way in the first place.

“Exactly, Sherlock.”

Jordan almost popped him upside the head, which would have been really easy to from the back seat. Instead, he fought the urge while David began explaining, “Which makes me think it’s a really big bubble. . . . shiiiiiiiit.”

Jordan didn’t put voice to it. David would tell him or not and there wasn’t much he could do about it. Jillian however seemed to believe she could hold some sort of sway over David. Jordan’s first thought was that she was lying to herself. Then he realized there was every good chance it was him lying to himself. She might very well hold sway with David. Who knew what had been going on between them while he was in Lake James watching his family slip away one by one?

He tamped down the images, thinking that the news David had preceded with shiiiiiiiit was going to be happier thoughts than the ones he was having.

“We’re in.”

Jordan’s back snapped straight. “Well then, get out!”

But David kept driving, not noticing Jillian turning green with fear or illness on the seat next to him. Neither option was acceptable to Jordan.

“Jillian,” At the sound of his voice she turned to face him and Jordan was unable to read all the emotions running stampede across her features. “Find another path on the map. Take us far left or right . . . or . . .”

David set down the black palm-pilot-looking-thing, that was a serious navigational compass as best as Jordan could tell, and picked up the old boy scout version, complete with red needle and N E S W markings. “David, which way is out?”

“We’ll just drive straight through.” The blond head never really glanced up from the small hammered silver fob in front of him. He would have caused a serious pile-up if anyone had been on the road. But these people were organized.

“Get out of the bubble.” Jordan didn’t realize that he was unbuckled and hanging over the front seat. “You and Jillian have already been exposed to these for too long.” He didn’t add that he was giving less and less of a crap if David fell into a serious coma right this instant. Except that he’d prefer the asshole put the car in ‘park’ first.

David said nothing, just kept driving, occasionally glancing up to check the flow of traffic against the whispered directions Jillian was giving him. It seemed he was taking them into the heart of the reversal. The man had no concern for his own safety. Jordan couldn’t care less. David had no concern for Jordan’s safety. That was because he was a son of a bitch. But having no concern for Jillian’s was beyond Jordan’s limits. If he’d had a gun, he would have pulled it and tucked it right at the base of David’s head, right up the foramen magnum. The hole there would make certain that a bullet couldn’t glance off that thick head. Guaranteed death.

“We’re fuzzy.” The words came after long minutes waiting for a response. Long minutes of almost leisurely driving down a small town turnpike with the sun overhead and greenery that made both the Nevada desert and Lake James look like they were constructed from brown bags.

Jillian started to take deeper breaths and with shaky motions pointed out the cross street they were looking for, then the white tents gently breathing with the breeze. It was a high school soccer field from the looks of the sign posted just under the snarling wildcat. In running red light letters it read 'no school until further notice'.

David made a hard right into the lot and stopped the car at the edge. With a quick look at his compass he shoved it into his pocket and pulled the black high-tech contraption from his briefcase and started to unfold himself from the car.

Jordan threw himself out of the backseat and hustled up to one of the suits who was approaching with a manila envelope. With the way the past three days had been going, if he was lucky, it would be full of anthrax and he could inhale deeply and die a slow and painful death. Which would, of course, be far more humane than what he was suffering now.

What he was suffering was only compounded by David walking around the front of the car and offering Jillian his arm, "Baby, are you okay?"

Thoughts warred in Jordan's brain. Now he asks how she's doing? And Baby?

But the man was saying the envelope was from Landerly. And Jordan saw his own hands in front of him, only now aware that he was shaking far worse than he could detect through his own senses, even now that he knew he was doing it.

The pages came out neat and crisp, far better looking than anything they had pulled off the little traveling fax machine. He scanned the notes taking in the news. The churning of Landerly's brain, gathered into understandable English by some tech or junior MD now that he and Jillian weren't there to do the job.

"David!" He yelled but didn't look up. Didn't want to see what was going on, didn't care. "Landerly says the magnetics of the reversals are getting stronger in the centers. There's a graph here, almost like regular concentric rings."

David approached and snapped the pages from his hands. It wasn't even an asshole move, just the unthoughtfulness of a man who had always gotten what he wanted. But Jordan continued. "The Nevada site maps like a target. But it's even stronger than here or McCann. Landerly thinks that's why it took everyone out. McCann's getting stronger, too."

Jillian peeked over David's shoulder. "That doesn't make sense. The wildlife is returning to normal. Becky Sorenson said the frogs were looking more normal as were the insects and the other animals she tagged." Her brows knit together in frustration and there was almost a chugging sound as her brain ratcheted up a notch.

Jordan shrugged, simply grateful that the churning of her mental gears was a good indicator that she hadn't suffered permanently from David driving them straight through the last reversal. He felt his temper abate, even if the anger didn't.

Still David frowned, flipping one page and then the next. He rotated the papers and Jordan almost chuckled at the sight. As though this whole stinking pile of crap would look better upside down. But he didn't laugh. He couldn't fault the geologist for trying.

It wasn't like he had any better ideas.

Jillian sat on the edge of the cold cot. It was green army issue fabric slung and stitched to a metal frame, and it had either seen better days or had recently been the recipient of a very large occupant. It hadn't held her heat, and she hadn't been smart enough to line the bed with the blanket before she lay down, so she had lost temperature while she slept.

And slept fitfully at that. There was no way to get Jordan onto that thing with her without it looking like something more and she wasn't anywhere near brave enough to climb into a bed with David, not that either man would really fit on a cot with her. And she certainly wasn't stupid enough to climb into any bed with David when what she wanted was sleep.

Jordan was still out cold, his arm hanging peacefully out from under the covers he had partially kicked off. His fingers were mere inches from the ground but they didn't seem to notice. His face was soft in sleep; clearly he wasn't having her problems. The only thing that betrayed his state was the dark circles under his eyes and the two day growth of beard that aged him considerably, making him look more like the man he was and not just the friend she considered him.

With a sigh, she just gave up, sinking bare toes into the rough dark carpet of the classroom they were staying in. Desks had been pushed back and stacked against the walls. The whiteboard left clean for the scientists to use. They hadn't. She felt like all the churning in her stomach had prevented all the churning in her skull from producing a single useful thought for quite a while now.

Her head felt like it was swaying at the top of a tall post, and so she nixed her original idea of wandering down to find the cafeteria. The CDC was supposed to have set up their own food supply there, but she was too shaky to go it alone.

Jillian turned back to the bed; if she was already out of it then at least she was going to do this right this time. She deluded herself into thinking that maybe if she could retain her body heat she could sleep. With her mind focused on that singular thought, she rearranged the blanket and crawled back in. Pulling the free half of the blanket tightly across her, she squeezed her eyes shut and tried to fight the bright gray light streaming through the fairly useless blinds.

She relaxed her entire body, muscle by muscle. When she was a resident, she'd been able to pass out at the drop of a hat, anywhere, anytime. But now sleep eluded her in the most painful of ways.

After a while she gave up, thankful that she was at least starting to get warm, and opened her eyes.

Jordan was watching her. "Morning."

"It's not morning." Her voice creaked like old hinges. "Morning implies that there was a night. I don't recall one."

"Still not sleeping?"

"What do you think?" She regretted it as soon as the words left her mouth.

But she sank into a solid portion of shame when Jordan asked her if she wanted to join him. Completely spoken with sympathy and none of the venom she had thrown at him.

"That can't be comfortable."

"What will you care? You'll be asleep."

Jillian almost laughed, and almost wondered how she could in the middle of all this. "But you won't be."

His mouth quirked behind the chestnut stubble that was a full shade darker than the sun-lightened length on his head. "Trust me, I'll fall back asleep quickly enough."

She couldn't very well say yes - there was no way they'd both fit unless she just climbed right on top of him, so she changed the subject. "Do you think the reversal has gotten this far since yesterday? They grow pretty fast now, and it was really close when we drove in. We could be in it right now."

"Don't change the subject on me." He lifted the blanket and made every attempt to scoot back to one side of the cot. But he was thwarted at every motion, sliding back into the center of the sling. Jillian raised one eyebrow at him, never making even the first motion to leave the confines of her finally warm cocoon.

"Fine."

But he didn't say anything more than just the one word. He simply stood to full length, stretching his tall form and revealing sun-brown skin where his t-shirt lifted from the edge of his boxers for just a moment. His eyes scanned the room and settled in the corner on a pile of two spare blankets. He turned his cot on its side and motioned for Jillian to do the same.

With great reluctance she stood up, her bare feet draining their heat into the cold carpet again. She pushed the cot out of the way as she saw that he was layering the blankets on the floor. He put his own blanket as the top layer then kneeled down on it. "Come on."

It was only slightly softer than a rock slab, but she sank onto it willingly, letting Jordan pull the blanket from her shoulders, and trusting that she'd be heated again within moments.

Stretching out along the rough blankets, Jillian had only long enough to shove her hair back out of her face, before Jordan was there and the covers were pulled over them. Lord, the man was better than a space heater. Suddenly she understood why women married men they didn't even love. God, the sleep!

"Jordan?"

"Shh."

Her stomach rolled and her jaw clamped to stop the sensation, but she didn't even get that far. She was falling backward into the black abyss.

• • • •

DAVID WALKED THE HALLWAY, lined with ugly green lockers, looking like the fresh paint hid layers of abuse. The worn linoleum on the floor had not yet been replaced, the black scuffs still not erasable. His own high school had been so much more pristine than this. The lockers and carpeting replaced if they had worn even slightly. Even the children had been removed if they were too frayed, not quite up to snuff. He wondered what other differences his father's money had bought him.

Jordan and Jillian were sleeping in a classroom further down this hall. He didn't know which one, but relied on the handwritten pages taped beside each door, designating the CDC's purpose for each.

He almost walked past the one that read: Abellard, Brookwood, Carter. For a moment he smirked at the irony, that even in print Jillian was caught between the two of them, but then he turned the knob, pushing open the heavy door, the wired glass lined with a shade so he couldn't see in.

As the dim room slowly came into focus he was caught up in the cozy scene - Jillian snuggled into the grasp of Abellard's arms. Both of them sleeping like babies.

Son of a bitch.

The thought took him by surprise in its vehemence. He'd been telling himself that it didn't matter. But maybe it did.

He knelt on her side of the makeshift lover's nest and reached out, taking just a moment to be sure that he only touched her. "Jillian. Baby. Time to wake up." He nudged her shoulder a little, thinking that this was a first even for him. He'd slept with married women. He'd broken up more than one couple along the way. But he'd never, until just now, called a woman 'baby' while she was literally in another man's arms.

His thoughts stopped as she stirred, rolling away from Abellard to face him. "Whhaaat?" The word was soft and low.

"We're wanted out front."

He could see her chest move with a long sigh as she blinked and carelessly shoved the hair from her face. She rolled back into the space she had vacated, and for a moment David was certain he'd been given the ultimate brush off. But she grabbed Jordan's shoulder and gave a gently shake. "Jordan. Wake up. We have to go."

David cut her off. "No. Let him sleep. They want you and me."

"Huh?" She rolled again to look at him, but her job had already been accomplished. And Jordan was looking at him, too, through clear eyes.

"They want you two? Why?"

"We're going to go in."

Abellard shot upright, revealing a t-shirt, and letting David's brain breathe a sigh of relief that it wasn't even cozier than it had looked. "No."

David rocked back on his heels. Why was Jordan fighting back? He slung what he had. "Not your decision."

Abellard's eyes turned to ice. "Then whose?"

David wanted to smile. Jordan and Jillian were Landerly's babies, lackeys, peons, whatever. But the word had wound up in his hands. And that felt good. "Landerly's."

David watched while Jordan put a hand on Jillian's shoulder, gently holding her back. "Don't go. We'll talk to Landerly first. I'm not sure I believe this." He rolled up and off the floor on the other side, diving into his pants pocket for the cell phone.

Surprisingly it was Jillian who came to David's rescue. She sat with a slight shake to remove the last of the sleep from her head. "Jordan, Landerly ordered it."

David wanted to grin, but schooled his features the way he always did. Better to give away nothing. It hadn't been any great importance to him. But David knew himself well enough to know that he was a Carter through and through. And if the challenge was issued it was always answered. And as his father had said, it had damned well better be won, too.

Abellard had thrown down the gauntlet. And in David's mind that meant it was just a matter of time before Jillian was his.

He watched while Jillian did his work for him and he bottled the pleasure at it.

"What do you mean Landerly ordered it?"

She sighed, leaning out to Jordan. But bless him, Abellard wasn't having it. "When we were in Nevada, all the wardens and officers walked right into the reversal and fell under. But not us. We had been in for longer than any of them and had no effects. We're fairly certain that we're immune."

"You're what?"

Jillian shook her head again, but continued, while David sat back and enjoyed watching the distance between them grow. "Immune."

Abellard's eyes narrowed and Jillian warily slid back at the menace. "You're willing to risk your lives because you did it once before and were okay?!?"

She was on her heels by now, too, and fighting back.

That's it Jillian, give him hell.

“No, I’m not. But we have to stop this or we’ll all die from it. Landerly ordered it. And I have to admit that I don’t know what else to do.”

Jordan raked a hand through his hair, thinking hard and fast for a few seconds. “Then I’m going, too. Whatever immunity you got, it’s likely I got it, too. It’s probably because of the way we’ve been exposed to the reversals.”

David thought that was a reasonable argument, and was cursing himself for not foreseeing it, when Jillian again solved his problems.

“No, you have to stay out here. David and I were together the whole time. We know we got the same exposure. We don’t know that for certain about you.”

Abellard’s jaw clenched. David wasn’t even sure if the good Dr. Brookwood noticed. But he sure did. She just kept talking. “We need you out here, in case . . . in case anything happens.”

“What!?” He was on his feet, furious at her and adding distance. Bless the powers that be. “I’m supposed to sit out here and wait by the sidelines in case you slip into a coma and die? While I watch?”

“Jordan-”

But he cut her off before she could begin. “Do you know what I did in Minnesota? . . .” He didn’t wait long enough, just barreled ahead, “I watched every last member of my family go under. And I’m supposed to sit here and watch you purposefully throw yourself into it? No way in hell!”

With an angry snap of his arms he whipped the pants off the floor, stepping into them and buttoning the fly as he stalked out the door.

Jillian’s mouth hung open, but that was okay. David stepped up to fill in the void. “He’ll get over it. He’ll have to. We don’t even know if he can survive going in.”

She turned slowly to him. “We don’t know if we can.”

“But who else can go?”

God, he had never been one to play the hero. But hey, there was always a first time, right? The way he figured it they were all radiated toast anyway. He might as well get the girl before he bit the big one. It wouldn’t matter. If there was a hell it likely already had a parking spot with an engraved nameplate for him.

She didn’t answer. So he smiled. “Well, then let’s get ready to go.”

Two hours later, they had swallowed a complement of horse pills. And Abellard was still nowhere to be seen. Good.

David was in full gear, compasses and magnetic field readers strapped to and stuffed in a toolbelt around his waist. He’d never felt so working-class before. Jillian had cell phones, and paper and pencils, a stethoscope hung around her neck. David wasn’t sure if that was because she thought she might need it, or if it was just as much a part of her as the scrubs. He peeled his eyes away from her and looked out at the town in front of him. It looked enough like any other. But he knew it wasn’t.

They stood at the new edge of the reversal, twenty feet closer than it had been last evening. The fuzzy edges were wide and getting wider. They shouldn’t encounter any people in here. Everyone should have been evacuated. And if they did find anyone, well, then, that would be Jillian’s problem.

Jillian took deep breaths, as though she were preparing to walk underwater. It was all he could do not to do the same. But his job here was to be a calming rock for her, let her think he was unaffected.

“Ready?” He asked it nonchalantly. Or he tried to, not that Jillian even left her mental space to notice.

“As I’ll ever be.” She sucked in a lungful of air. “But I’m warning you, I’m not that ready.”

He stepped in, waiting, as he always did, for the feeling of getting kicked in the gut. Of having all the air sucked out of him. Or maybe tingling in his fingers. But his stomach didn’t even roll.

But he was past the yellow flags, delineating the new boundaries. He was in the wide edge. Without looking back for Jillian he took another few tentative steps, then started walking. Jillian skipped to catch up, like a swimmer who knows that the water is cold and it’s better to just dive right in.

She slipped a small street map from the back of her notebook, showing him the highlighted line. He took the page from her and frowned at it. “How far is this?”

“About three miles.” He could see her throat work, but resisted the urge to ask if she was okay. “They recalculated the center this morning. The edges keep shifting.”

“Hm.” Not really in the mood for conversation, he felt around the things at his waist. The weights hanging from his belt took him back to his digs, back to fist-sized rock chips in tough Ziploc baggies and midnight runs down the grid to see if the idiots had fucked up another orientation. That’s what had started this whole mess, too.

He picked out the old school compass, shaking off fantasies of the days when he could swear at everyone around him. When they were all associate faculty, not physicians. Or better yet, students - students whose degrees depended on his good graces. David looked at the houses they were wandering past, just a few blocks beyond the high school. Some with pretty flowers in pots and window boxes. Some with peeling paint. And some with both. It was eerie with the absence of people.

He feared seeing the faces of the dead peering at him, as transparent as the windowpanes of the empty houses. He pulled his gaze to the needle which had stopped jumping although he wasn’t sure when. With a snort at himself for forgetting, he tossed a flag back a handful of yards. Close enough.

“You know, the paperwork this morning showed another bubble.” Jillian didn’t look at him, so he simply grunted, staying focused on his compass.

“It’s up toward the north side of town. And it’s growing pretty quickly.”

He grunted again, then decided that if he was going to shut her up interrupting was really the way to go. He didn’t need chitchat. “What street are we on?”

She looked up, not pointing out that he could easily have tilted his own head and read the sign his damn self. “Pomona.”

He made her write it down, pulled out another meter and read the strength of the field off to her. But it didn’t shut her up.

“The bubble at the edge of town is really near the fence.” Her mouth moved as fast as the pencil recording everything he spouted at her. “They’re afraid it won’t respect the city’s boundaries. That it will cross the gate. We’re not sure what to do then.”

“Hm.” He tried to leave it at that.

“There were fifty people reported down this morning. New since last night. And another hundred with stomach upset.” She paused to inhale and let it out, and it still didn’t sound like natural breathing to his ears, but he decided not to mention that. The compass needle in front of him jumped a little. He checked the field strength. Stepped into a front yard and popped a meter that looked remarkably like a meat thermometer into the ground.

He didn’t even get to read it before Jillian started babbling again. “You know, our numbers have shown that of those hundred down, ninety to ninety-five percent of them will actually have it. The other five plus percent are just your standard G I trouble with a dose of panic.”

David flattened the sigh before it escaped him. His eyes narrowed on the meter, but Jillian's voice cut through again.

"David?"

• • • •

BECKY DIDN'T EVEN LOOK at the greenery around her, just jumped ship off the tiny Cessna and ignored the pilot as he pointed the way to Oak Ridge. The blue sedan waited, parked casually just off to the left of the three mid-sized hangars that made up the Clinton Airport. If it could be called that. Trees scraped the bottoms of the planes at each end of the runway. Grass grew up through cracks in the barely paved 'landing strip'. And nothing bigger than a tour plane had ever come through to the best of her knowledge.

But Becky just smiled and waved a thank-you to the pilot and waited barely long enough for Leon to close the sedan's passenger door behind himself. From the looks of him he had been hoping to drive, but she ignored that and hit the gas before he even had the seat adjusted. With a grunt he pulled his seatbelt across him and slapped it into the buckle. Becky wasn't sure if that was meant as an insult, but she didn't care.

Since they were driving to her house, she didn't see where she needed to sit in the passenger seat and give directions and be polite about missed turn-offs and that squinting and head-shaking thing people always did when driving in an unfamiliar area. She was through with being polite and worrying about other people's feelings.

She ran two stop signs, ignoring Leon's outstretched finger both times. There weren't even police out this way, just the County Sheriff Office. And the deputies would just smile at her and nod if they wound up pulling her over. She knew them all.

Finally she came to a complete stop at a red light that was collecting cars waiting on the empty crosslane. Her fingers tapped impatiently on the wheel. Her foot hovered, barely holding the brake down, itching to ride the non-existent clutch. Her right hand grabbed for the gearshift hoping to slam it into second. But she consciously pulled her fingers away, knowing that throwing an automatic into low gear wouldn't help her one bit.

Her lip took some abuse from her teeth, and just as she squealed the tires out into the crossing she heard the distinctive synthetic music of her cell phone. Grabbing for it at the clip on her belt she tossed it to Leon. "Check the ID, would you?"

With one hand making a graceful pass, he swiped the phone from the air before it arced in the careless direction it had been sent and saved it from colliding with the dash. Nimble fingers he oriented the slick silver thing and he read off the name, "Dr. Overton."

"Don't answer." She took a hard left at the next light and out of the corner of her eye, Becky saw Leon's fingers reach for purchase then tuck themselves away out of sight. She didn't say anything and he didn't either. He simply sat, huge and silent, and looking very uncomfortable, never mentioning that he was surely aware that they were going the opposite direction from where they were supposed to be. Or that they were going the wrong way like a bat out of hell.

She was grateful when, at last, she hit the old road that led to her parent's house. But it was too narrow and full of cracks from winter and grass from summer. She was forced to slow down too many times. But Becky couldn't really get mad. She knew all the people going by. They waved and she waved and drove on before they could get the windows down and tell her how nice it was to see her back from school.

The barbed wire fences gave way at last to the old sagging split rail that lined her yard. Melanie was out front with a spoon digging under the old tire swing, the first thing that had brought a smile to Becky's face this whole day. She was probably digging up worms or such to dissect. The little geek.

"That your-" Leon started the question then cut himself off.

"What?" Becky finally looked him in the face, taking in his long blond hair, again pulled back away from his sharp jaw, somehow always bearing about two days worth of stubble. His blue eyes matched the early winter sky in understanding and bleakness.

"Nothing." He looked the house up and down. "I'm sure this is a required stop on our way to Oak Ridge." He finished his sentence and sealed his lips not once making eye contact.

Becky nodded. "I'll just be a few minutes."

Melanie was already running toward the car, having recognized her sister only after raising her hand to her red bangs to see who was driving the strange car that had pulled so boldly onto the gravel driveway. Becky caught the imp in her arms and swung her around a few times. She sucked in the air, knowing full well that it might already be in the reversal. Even though, by her own calculations it shouldn't have come this far. Not yet anyway. But she knew she had to stop and take deep breaths. To smell her yard and the air, and really look at it, because it may very well be the last time.

In a practiced move, she swung Mel with a quick change of grasp that both sisters were familiar with. Melanie was riding piggyback by the time they passed through the front door, spoon and worms forgotten momentarily. She yelled right next to Becky's ear. "Mom! Look who I found!"

Her mother rounded the corner from the laundry room. "Hey, Baby." Her face lit up at seeing her oldest daughter so unexpectedly.

She slid Mel down her back until her sister's small sneakered feet hit the hard wood floor and Becky rushed to hug her mother.

Her mother hugged back just as fiercely before pulling away and looking Becky in the eyes. "What's wrong?"

With a deep breath that took in the pine cleaner and open country, and a quick look at the old furniture, covered with throws and battered pillows, she turned to deliver the news. "I can't tell you what's happening. Just that it's bigger than me."

Her mother's brows knit together. "Are you in some sort of trouble?"

Becky shook her head. "But I am with the CDC now, so you figure it out." Another frown from her mother and another deep breath of the smell that was her home. "I can tell you this: you need to pack up the kids and Dad and go visit Aaron for at least a week. Call me before you return."

Her mother leaned back, a hand absently reaching for the washer to steady herself. "Is Aaron in trouble?"

"No. But you need to go visit him." Becky stared at her mother, hoping she would take the message and quit.

"Is something happening here?" Her mother's voice shook, just a little, but she straightened up, standing firm on her own two feet.

Becky did the only thing she could do: she nodded her head while speaking. "I can't tell you that. All I can say is that this would be a great time to go visit Aaron. Maybe get out of the house by tomorrow morning at the latest."

Her mother leaned forward looking for one last out. "Are you sure?"

"Absolutely." She reached forward giving her mother a hug. "I'm not supposed to be here. I have to go."

Turning, she spied Melanie wide-eyed behind her, having heard the whole conversation. She scooped her sister up even as the words began flowing out of that little mouth. “This is about those frogs isn’t it?”

So Becky did it again. She nodded, contradicting her voice. “I don’t know.”

“Something is wrong there.” Melanie paused, leaning back, “and it’s coming here.”

“I always knew you were a very smart girl. And Mom’s going to listen to whatever ideas you have. Because you’re probably right!” She yelled for Brandon, hoping he would make his way out to see her. She could hear the time ticking away in heartbeats.

With a last thought she turned back. “You don’t tell anyone about this. Do you both understand me? If you start a panic there’s no telling what will happen.”

Both the Sorenson women nodded back at her and she turned to go. “I love you.”

Brandon showed his face in the hall right as she reached the front door. She tried to scoop him up but he was too heavy, and from the looks of it, three inches taller than the last time she had seen him. Blinking back tears, she kissed his cheek and went out the front door.

The wood planks of the porch showed wear at the front door and down the steps. The grass had disappeared in a trail to the end of the drive, where the CDC sedan sat - with one very nonchalant Leon squeezed into the passenger side seat, looking anywhere but at her.

Becky walked up to his side and tapped on the window, startling him from his glazed over look. He opened the door to her and she smiled, holding out the keys. “Do you want to drive?”

“Hell, yes.” He didn’t look at her mother or her sister in the front doorway. He didn’t acknowledge her brother’s whoops that they were going to go visit Aaron. Just calmly walked around and situated himself in the driver’s side, lifting the lever and sliding the seat back as far as it would go, which to Becky still looked a little shy of comfortable. He threw the car in gear and backed out of the driveway as though he had never been there.

Without needing directions he took them back the way they had come, leaving Becky to her thoughts in the passenger seat, until he startled her by asking what she wanted.

Only then did she look up to realize that it wasn’t a philosophical query, but they were about three feet from the Burger King drive thru. She rattled off an order, cringing as she realized that she was way too familiar with Burger King’s menu, and listened while Leon ordered himself two large-sized value meals.

As they pulled away Leon pointedly looked at his watch. “Gee,” even to her ears it sounded odd coming from him, “That sure did take a long time. And I’m sorry I got us lost back there.”

Becky smiled, letting out the breath she had kept in. “Thank you.”

Leon smiled, still looking straight at the long, bare, two lane road ahead of them. “Don’t know what you’re talking about. Now, am I headed toward Oak Ridge this time?”

“Yes, you are.”

• • • •

JORDAN PACED THE EDGE of the bubble.

Three hours since they had left. And nothing.

He had heard phone contact, crackles of the walkie-talkies Jillian and David had carried in, spurts of conversation between them and the suits in the tent behind him. He stuffed down the wry thought that they would have to move the tent another twenty feet further before tomorrow morning.

The air bit at his legs through the blue scrub pants that didn’t keep out the chill. He zipped his jacket a little higher up under his chin, not wanting to take the time to go back to the room to put on heavier pants. And not wanting to lose the instant recognition the blue cotton afforded him. The others all knew exactly what to look for when they needed him. Right now that was very important.

He shoved his hands deep in his pockets, looking up at tall pines and oaks. Hills crowded up on either side of him. The city had purposefully been laid out in a hard-to-reach area. The roads had been contoured to the Appalachians, making it hard to predict where and when to turn. One of the local scientists had said something about making the city difficult to invade, as he had pointed on the map to crossing roads, circles off of circles, and even avenues that continued but changed names, the original name taking off at a ninety degree angle on a different street.

Jordan breathed in, the cold air chilling his lungs. In front of him the place was a ghost town. Everyone evacuated from neat homes. The landscape looked like a handful of miniature houses had been tossed across the hills and rooted wherever they landed. Behind him the city went on as normal. The library and town Civic Center had plenty of traffic. The gymnasium housed some of the displaced families. They held activities for the out-of-school kids while their parents continued to go to work, many at the nuclear labs further down the turnpike. Jordan shuddered to himself at the thought of the magnetics reaching the power plants.

“Dr. Abellard!”

He turned to see a young tech, complete with acne, old jeans, and Converse sneakers under the labcoat, come running up to him. “Dr. Sorenson is here. She wants to see you.”

With a nod, he turned and followed the kid back into the tents, the grass growing strong beneath his feet and the smell of trees and green the only real distinguishing factors between here and Nevada. They wound their way through tent after tent, gathering papers as they went. Jordan was handed lab results on the people who had gone down this morning. He had read each individual report earlier, but now held compiled statistics on the group, on how many were down, who had died from the alpha group and who still clung to life and maybe even hope.

Lucy Whitman, one of the techs, approached with another handful of papers and a broad smile, her blond curls bouncing and looking overdone for a scientific endeavor of this magnitude and tragedy. Jordan couldn't abide the twinkle in her eyes or the makeup that was always perfect, even as the pieces of the world fell down around her. He faked a smile back at her, only earning her shoulder pressed to his as she held out the pages to him. “I know I'm not supposed to read these, but there was no cover sheet, and look!”

He did, but saw only black type on white pages. Until her perfectly polished red nail skimmed across some of the words. “Fifteen of the Nevada patients have woken up!”

His head slammed hard to the right to look at her.

“What!?”

But she was serious. The grin was genuine, and the sparkle contagious.

He jumped at the simultaneous digital ring and buzz of his phone going off. He simply opened the phone and answered it without thinking. “Hello?”

“Abellard!” Landerly's voice had a smile in it. “We've caught a break, boy! I trust you're holding the pages I just faxed?”

“Yes, sir. But I haven't read them all yet.” He shoved the pages back at Lucy and turned away from her, putting his fingers over his left ear to block any noises. But perhaps the pounding of his heartbeat in his fingertips was louder than what was around him.

“Fifteen Nevada patients are out of the coma. There are a few stats in there, but not enough. The docs there are helping them and taking vital signs. I want you sitting near the fax machine. I've got a tech there assigned to record and fax everything they get to you and me simultaneously. This is the break and we have to be on it.”

“Yessir.” His heart pounded and he spit out the thing that sprang immediately to his mind. “What about Lake James?”

Landerly paused for just a moment, and Jordan knew what was coming. “I haven’t heard anything, but I already put in an inquiry.”

“Of course.” His breathing had sped up there for a moment and now his shoulders and chest sank, heavy as granite. The murderers and rapists would wake up, but not the good people of a small Minnesota town.

Landerly’s voice sliced through his self pity, bringing back the five senses of reality with it: the phone pressed against his ear, the taste of metal in his mouth where he had bit down, the throbbing in his tongue further evidence. “Remember, the Nevada site fell first. So on this time scale we should know something within two days about Lake James.”

“Of course.” And just like that his heart rate accelerated again. His breathing went shallow and he would become hypoxic and pass out if he didn’t get a grip.

“I hear Dr. Sorenson and one of the animal wranglers arrived. They’re going after some local wildlife. You need to read their Minnesota data and report in to me what you can make of it.”

“Of course sir, but Jillian’s in the reversal now. We’ll get back to you when -”

“Here’s an idea: try thinking for yourself, Abellard. Or I will name this shit after you.”

Jordan would have laughed if not for the three successive digital notes signaling that Landerly had already hung up on him. He stared at the phone for a moment before he realized that Lucy was watching his every move, and the tech in the converse sneakers was watching hers, even though he was way too young for Lucy to be anything but a farfetched fantasy. Jordan sympathized. We all need our pipe dreams.

He took the papers out of Lucy’s outstretched and manicured hand as Becky Sorenson approached and clasped his hand in a warm grip. “Good to see you again, Jordan.” She motioned to the blond giant behind her, “This is Leon Peppersmith. He’s a CDC wrangler.”

“Pleased to meet you.” Peppersmith’s voice was modulated if not cultured. And contrary to fears, he didn’t grind Jordan’s bones to meal with his handshake, even though the man would easily make Jillian look like she belonged in Oz.

Becky pulled the haversack she was wearing a little higher on her shoulders. “We’re heading to the edges to capture what we can.”

Jordan took a step back. “Don’t go in. Not until we know what we’re dealing with.” He shook his head, waiting for a piece of the sky to break free and crash in flames inches from his feet. But it didn’t happen.

“How will we know what we’re dealing with if we don’t go in?” Becky, too, shook her head, shrugging, at a loss for the words to express what was happening around them. Like Jillian, she saw no alternative. “It’s the right thing to do.”

But Jordan plowed on ahead, giving his best effort at stopping them. “Some of them are waking up at the Nevada site.”

“Really?!” Becky’s face lit up. “That’s great! How many?”

“Fifteen. So far.” It was so hopeful and yet such a small number. He clung to the belief that he could get Becky and Peppersmith to change their minds before he cracked from it all. “And you have data from Minnesota, so why—“

Becky shrugged him off again. “Just more questions. We need to find the links.”

Jordan motioned them into a tent that was being used as one of the lab stations. There was only one tech in there, and both Jordan and Peppersmith gave him a look that did more than just request privacy. The tech shrugged as he pocketed his wrench and a small meter. Hew spoke over his shoulder as he exited, “Damned UV-vis is down. All of them are. Don’t use it.”

Then they were alone, except for the centrifuges, whirring and stopping, settling the contents in the blood samples everyone had been collecting. Lowering himself into a chair, Jordan motioned for Becky and Leon to do the same, and set about stalling them. “What did you find?”

“Moose.” It was Peppersmith. “Canada Moose. A whole herd - looks like they all just laid down and died. Wolves and Lynx side by side, tearing at the carcasses.”

Laid down and died?

Becky chimed in as Jordan felt his face pull further and further into a knot. “The white tailed deer there were only juveniles. There wasn’t an adult to be found. Nothing over three point.”

He felt the back of the chair support him before he realized he had slid back. He had started to open his mouth again, but Becky pulled a list from her pocket. “Photocopy this.” She held it up to Lucy, who Jordan only then realized was hovering at the open tent flap. But Becky pulled it back, away from Lucy’s reaching grasp, shoving it at Jordan, “Here, look at it first.”

Species were listed to halfway down the page. And Becky’s voice derailed his train of thought. “They’re all missing or dead.”

“Whole species?” He handed the page up to Lucy who fled from sight, hopefully for the nearest copier.

Becky and Peppersmith both nodded.

“Holy shit.” Jordan blinked, wondering if the day could get any more surreal.

Peppersmith shrugged. “We have to go in. The animals’ survival depends on it.”

Before Jordan could argue, Lucy had returned with Becky’s weathered original and a crisp copy for him, and the biologists were out of the tent, following a new tech who was showing them the way to the west side of the reversal.

With deep, even breaths that he had to count out, he stumbled his way to the fax machine, already piling high with printed pages. His butt smacked the chair and he began scanning the documents, quickly realizing there was an individual chart on each of the men who had woken from coma.

Men. Every last one of them, because it was a men’s facility with male guards.

“Paper!” He shouted it to whomever would listen, grateful when two different techs showed, one with blank white pages and the other holding out a legal pad and retractable pen. “Thank you.” He took the yellow-lined paper but didn’t look up.

In seconds the pad was spread across his knees and his hand went automatically to the pen in his breast pocket, carefully engraved with the words Jordan Abellard, M.D. It had been a graduation gift, unaccompanied by a tag or even words, from his father. He began writing furiously.

Men.

All prisoners. No guards.

White counts. Prior: normal. In coma: Low. Awake: high

All wing 3

Down date: 12, 14, 12, 11, 12, 12, 13, 14, 13, 12, 12, 12, 12, 14, 14.

All 12s down in pm, all 14s down in am.

He grabbed at his cell phone and hit Landerly on speed dial.

“What do you have boy?”

“There’s a 53 hour window from when the first of these men fell to the last one. The down times correlate loosely to the waking times.”

“What else?”

Landerly was seeing the same things he was, he knew. “There are no guards. Just prisoners. All from the same wing. These are the guys who went down before the reversal swept the CDC set-up. So it makes sense that there aren’t any guards awake. . . Yet.” He rattled off what he saw about the white counts, probably still not giving Landerly anything new.

“Abellard!” It came from far off. And in that instant Jordan recognized the voice. David.

“Gotta go.” He closed the phone, left the pages where they were and took off at a run, not realizing that it was the first time he had hung up on Landerly.

He arrived at the flag line marking the edge of the reversal as David pulled into view. The figure sagging at his side was Jillian. Her left arm was slung over David’s shoulder which was far too high to be comfortable, and her right arm wrapped ominously across her stomach.

Once he recognized what he was seeing, he moved without thinking, crossing the unseen boundary into the reversal. He ran toward the two figures, who came into sharper focus as he approached. “Jillian!”

“I’m fine!” Her voice snapped, but lacked true conviction. David’s face appeared grim, although if he was suffering any nausea it didn’t show. Jordan didn’t care.

With one hand he lifted Jillian’s arm from where it clung fiercely to David’s jacket, and in the same motion pulled her feet from the ground, lifting her to settle in his arms. His only thought was getting her the hell out of the reversal, even as she curled both arms around her stomach and rolled even tighter into a ball within his grip.

It was David’s voice that cut through to him. “Don’t run with her. I tried it, it just makes her worse.”

Jordan clenched his jaw with the effort it took to maintain a reasonable pace. The whole time he wondered if it was better to let her get more nauseated and get her out faster, or keep her feeling better, even though the yellow flag line didn’t approach as quickly as he’d like.

He bit down on his tongue to keep from flinging out insults, to not yell at David. This is what you get for taking her into the heart of darkness.

Her brows pulled tighter, and he could see the pain even though half her face was obscured by the neck of her jacket zipped all the way up and over her mouth. “Come on, Jilly, hang in there.”

At last he made it, and even though he couldn’t detect it with any of his usual senses, he felt his whole body react the moment he crossed the boundary. He got her to the nearest triage tent and laid her out on a gurney. But that only lasted a second. She was sitting up before he had his stethoscope in his ears, her palm out to him.

“My heart rate is eighty-eight. My resps are twenty-two, and I need a GI cocktail, now.”

It would have made him smile at any other time. But the stethoscope was folded back around his neck in one fluid movement as he pulled a plastic cup from a makeshift shelf next to him. All the ingredients were there, and he felt like a bartender, measuring out Donnatal, then peeling back the foil lid on the dose of viscous lidocaine, revealing the eerily green goo. He poured it into the cup, not watching it sink under the Donnatal, his hands already grabbing for the Mylanta bottle. He added the antacid, almost topping off the cup and ignoring a century of medical procedure as he stirred quickly with his finger. He handed her the concoction licking his finger clean as he watched her toss her head and shoot it back.

It would numb her stomach and settle what she was feeling. At least at this stage in the game she didn't have to play guinea pig, suffering through all of it because they didn't know how to treat it, or if what they did would make her worse. He could at least offer a little relief.

His hand found her hair; she'd worn it down to give warmth from the wind, and his chest eased a little feeling her solid within his grasp. He prayed out loud, "It's just something you ate."

But she denied him. "I have ear pain."

Son of a bitch.

Jordan heard David walk into the tent behind him, a little out of breath. That fact revealing that he must have carried, or helped haul Jillian, a good long way. “We didn’t make it to the center.”

Jordan almost exploded with who gives a flying fuck?! But he held it in check by the barest of glimmers.

Jillian started speaking. “No one was in there. We found a few bodies, though. The smell was enough to explain the nausea.” She almost smiled. “The field is stronger as we got closer in.”

Leave it to Jillian to be in mortal danger and worry about rattling off statistics.

Ignoring David, he put his forehead against hers, easy enough to do since she was still sitting on the gurney, hunched over, guarded against the pain that pulled her down. “They’re waking from the comas in Nevada.”

“What!” She sat upright, almost forgetting her own discomfort.

He nodded. Not mentioning that they were all men. All prisoners. That there were only fifteen of them. Less than a percent.

Lucy Whitman appeared at the doorway just then, nudging David further inside in the process. “I just got off the phone with Dr. Landerly at the CDC. He said to give you these.” She held out a sheaf of papers, still slightly warm from the fax machine.

It was Jillian who reached out for them, taking the folder from the perfect hand, “Are these the stats on the prisoners who woke up?”

Lucy shrugged. “Oh, I don’t know. I just gather the papers.”

Jordan almost called her on her lie, but Jillian was already reading. Sitting straighter, looking like the lidocaine had numbed her from the inside out. “They’re all men. All prisoners. The white counts are high when they wake.” She thumbed through a little further. Noting how long they’d been under, when they’d fallen, asking how many had fallen in that time, and what percentage of those men did these represent. She asked all the same questions, noticed all the same things in minutes that he and Landerly had spent the morning working through.

Her fingers shuffled quickly through the papers. “Murder, murder, . . . murder, . . . arson and murder. . .”

“What?”

“They’re all murderers.” She looked up finally. “Is that because they’re all from the same wing?”

Jordan pulled out the cell and called Landerly even as she was talking.

“No, the wing that fell first wasn’t this one. It wasn’t maximum security.” She paused and looked blankly at the canvas top of the tent, seeing something far beyond it. “But none of these are maximum security prisoners.” She read again. “Single murders. Wife’s boyfriend. Boss. Father . . .”

“Landerly, listen to this. . .” Jordan held the phone up to catch her thinking out loud, even though she didn’t realize he was doing it.

“All one time murders. . . . Other prisoners fell at the same time. But they aren’t awake.” She paused long enough for Jordan to hear Landerly swear in the space she left.

“Oh, shit.”

Holding the phone to his ear, Jordan initiated the conversation again. “Sir?”

“We have three more awake, since two hours ago.” He heard the shuffling of paper through the line as Landerly looked to connect Jilly’s ideas. “All murderers. No first degree. No longer considered a threat to society.”

Jillian tilted her head. “Who’s dead?”

Another question he and Landerly hadn’t posed, so hung up on their break that they hadn’t stopped to look. He passed the question on to his boss, even as he heard his name hollered out from somewhere out in the tents.

“Bye.” Again, he hung up on Landerly. Not even telling him that the brilliant idea of sending Jillian and David into the reversal had backfired. David had emerged unscathed with Jillian at death’s door. Landerly could call Jillian directly if he wanted. And surely she would fill him in on all the stats she had collected, along with her own vitals.

Jordan figured she had a few more hours at the least. And maybe a day at most, before she slipped away. If he was going to help her he had to gather what information he could. So, without a word, he turned and ran from the tent, leaving her to her musings and the paperwork on the prisoners in Nevada. He followed the voice that was calling out to him.

He didn’t recognize it, although whoever it was knew him enough to boom his name at decibels high enough to shake the tents. He paused a few times, at last emerging on the north side of the field.

No one was there. Just the school stood silent in front of him, the long staircase off to his right was busy with scientists climbing up and down the four story flight that hugged the hillside. The classrooms had been put to use for containment and as dormitories. The chem lab was probably seeing the best action it had since its inception.

The voice called again, this time coming from his right, as his head turned he realized the windows were open down the enclosed stairs. He recognized the figures before the voice.

Peppersmith and Becky Sorenson traipsed down the stairs, arms linked, neither of them looking up at him. Until Leon opened his mouth to shout out Jordan’s name again.

“Here!” He yelled back.

His pace picked up as he realized the two were not in a friendly embrace after all, but that Becky was supported on Leon’s arm. Her right hand snaked up to rub her ear.

Shit!

He raced back and slammed through the doors just as Peppersmith hit the bottom of the stairs, bellowing as he came. “What’s wrong with her?”

Jordan ignored the man, whipping off his stethoscope he unsnapped the front of Becky’s heavy jacket and placed the bell at the top right side of her sternum. Her heart raced. “Becky, what’s wrong?” But he already knew.

“My ears hurt. It started after we found this dead cat. . . . I-” But she didn’t finish. She just rolled a little, curling into a ball while Leon fought to keep her upright.

He didn’t ask - didn’t bother to look in her throat or her ears. The answers were in her eyes. She had it, and she knew it.

Lacking the will to lift her himself, Jordan looked to Leon, “Just pick her up, would you? I have a spare gurney in the triage tent if you can carry her that far.”

Becky protested, and it looked like it wasn’t for the first time. But this time Leon quoted doctor’s orders and hauled her up. She didn’t appear to have it in her to fight her way down. And Peppersmith looked like he could carry a sleeping hippo through the jungle without breaking a sweat. Becky wouldn’t be any trouble for him.

Inside three minutes they were back at the tent where he’d left Jillian and David.

Even before he saw her, Jordan knew she was on the phone with Landerly. He could hear her side of the conversation, the short spurts when she rattled off whatever her brain was clicking together. She sounded more alert, and as he rounded the tent flap she came into view proving him entirely right. “Feeling better?”

Even as she answered, “Yup,” he set about making the next GI cocktail. Leon laid Becky out on the bed, and Jillian interrupted her own conversation to say nothing other than, “you’ll feel better in about five minutes,” then launched back into it with Landerly.

Handing Becky the mix, Jordan waited while she eyed it. He didn’t blame the biologist. He wouldn’t drink it either if he hadn’t known what was in it. It was a milky, lime colored substance with a faint sharp odor, and the lidocaine lent it some sort of almost-glow, even after it was mixed in. But she tipped it back, her face contorting at the texture if not the taste, and her mouth working even after she had finished swallowing it.

They stood there, the five of them, looking at each other, and wondering. The two women sitting on the gurneys, Becky starting to perk back up. None of them deluded themselves, and none of them talked. Except Jillian, who chattered to Landerly, making little sense to anyone around her.

Jordan wasn’t sure how long it lasted, the wild silence in the tent, punctuated by people passing by outside, Jillian updating Landerly on what was happening.

He heard someone’s name being shouted, and didn’t think much of it, until he heard another name, then in rapid succession a third and a fourth. He was poking his head out of the flap when Lucy appeared there in front of him.

The last person he really wanted to see, but she was there in his face. Her own expression was less than chipper for the first time he had ever seen. And he was about to comment on it when she spoke.

“Jordan, I feel weird.” Her hands went to the sides of her face, tracing the flush as it spread up her skin. Her mouth worked like she had a bad taste in it, and her shoulders hunched forward as her eyes squeezed shut.

Oh, crap.

He touched her hands, pulling them away from her face, just as her eyes went wide. Only because he was looking at her so intently did he realize that she had focused over his shoulder.

With a snap he turned to see Becky, as she swayed from her sitting position, her eyes rolling back into her head, eyelids fluttering. She sank forward, a victim of gravity, and missed hitting the ground only because Leon had exhibited some lightning reflexes.

The giant man laid her back down on the gurney, lifting her eyelids, but finding nothing. Jordan was about to help, all else aside, except that Lucy pulled at his arm, turning him away from the shocked expression on Jillian’s face. The intern looked markedly worse than she had just a few seconds ago, her color changing rapidly from the pink flush to a creeping gray tone. Her eyes lost focus and she grabbed her stomach.

With a quick step Jordan moved closer to keep her from collapsing into the ground just feet in front of him. But as he grabbed her he realized that he had cleared the entrance of the tent and he could see in several directions down the evenly placed rows. Doctors, techs, and suits were stumbling out of the tents, reaching to others. Covering their ears. Opening mouths. Holding stomachs.

And his brain clicked.

They were all women.

Still holding Lucy partially upright with one arm, he turned to face Jillian as his adrenaline kicked in and the world began to slow on its axis. But Jillian just looked at him, having figured out some portion of what he had seen from the expression on his face.

But before he could tell her what was happening a voice cleared its way through the pandemonium. Jordan couldn't see him, but heard his words as the man ran past. "It moved! The edge moved! We're in it!"

But Jordan and Jillian had both guessed that for themselves already. He turned to see that David and Leon had, too.

The voice was joined by others, or maybe his brain just cleared to hear them all. Urging everyone who was upright to run. To get out, to clear the edge.

Within their tent it was Leon who took action. He grabbed the limp Becky, lifting her into his arms. Jordan's brain cranked overtime, realizing even as he watched it, that Leon had chosen Becky because she was limp and he had the most experience hauling dead weight. Peppersmith motioned to Jordan and David to grab the other two women, and even as Jordan yelled at him not to, Leon was out the door with Becky hanging from his arms.

Jordan watched as he followed the exodus, some of the men stopping to attempt to scoop up their fallen colleagues, none of them as agile as Leon with the spare weight. As Jordan watched, some of them gave up trying and simply stepped over whomever they crossed.

It was David who yelled out the open doorway. "Don't run! You can't outrun it. The whole world's going to snap any day now!" His fatalistic cries falling on deaf or disbelieving ears.

As Jordan watched, Lucy slipped from his grasp, her eyes going blank as she gave up her last hold on consciousness. Jordan bent to lift her, thinking to put her on the gurney that Leon had vacated when he left with Becky, when a second set of hands slid under her from the other side to help him lift.

He looked up into the face of a local physician whom he had seen a few times, drawing blood and helping out with the people whose homes had been in the early parts of the reversals. With a slight tip of his head he gestured to David, "Is that true what he said, about the whole world 'snapping'?"

Jordan didn't know what to make of it. The pace was slowing, but the adrenaline was still ringing in his ears, still bringing the false endorphin high. He shrugged. "Probably."

The other doctor bore Lucy's weight and Jordan let him. In silence, the doctor wandered off with the limp woman, her feet dangling, one red leather shoe missing, her nails sparkling at the ends of loose hands.

"Jordan?" Jillian's voice broke through to him.

He'd have known if she'd fallen. But he hadn't quite catalogued that she'd stayed upright.

But why?

She thought it, too, and her thoughts came in fragments. "I thought I was immune. . . . then I didn't. . . now? . . ."

But he shook his head, unable to answer.

It was David who said, "I guess maybe it is something you ate." His face contorted in a weird, what-about-that kind of way. But as he finished the sentence Jillian squinted her eyes, and rocked her head from side to side, as though fighting off a bad memory.

Jordan saw the flush creeping up her neck even as she felt it, her facial expression changing. He could see her stomach roll. "Jordan?"

It was her last word, and as she looked at him, her eyes went heavenward, and in slow motion she slumped backward and started to slide off the gurney.

WHILE DAVID WATCHED, Abellard sprung forward barely catching Jillian's weight. Well, he didn't so much catch her as take the fall for her, cushioning her limp limbs from the hard ground she sped toward. He struggled to right her, and somewhere in the back of his brain David heard Jordan's voice asking for help. But he ignored it.

In a moment, the doctor had her spread out on the gurney, looking like she had simply had too rough of a day and decided that now was as good a time as any for a balls-to-the-wall nap.

David knew his brain wasn't processing correctly. That she might be dead. That she looked like a doll, reposed on the bed, because he couldn't handle the truth. But that was okay, because Abellard was here to handle both Jillian and the truth.

Creeping to the back corner of the tent, and molding himself to the canvas wall, didn't allow him to escape the serious gaze Jordan pinned him with. "You stay here with her. Don't move. I'll be right back."

David's brain inserted a sleek "I'm Batman" as the tent flap shifted in the wake of Jordan's path. But he didn't laugh. He bit his cheek to keep the sound from overflowing. Because he knew if he did that the laugh would evolve into hysterics, and when Jordan returned he would haul back and deliver a stinging slap. David did not want to be on the receiving end of Jordan's wrath. Certainly not when it was disguised as medical care.

Sliding into a chair he waited the long minutes for Abellard to return. His eyes wandering to Jillian, one leg dangling precariously off the edge of the gurney. His thoughts turning to his father, and wondering when the old man's place would experience the 'snap'. It was all David had been able to think while Jillian had been explaining to him what indicated who would fall and who wouldn't. If his father would bite it right away, as his vital signs indicated he would. Or maybe it would turn out he was just a son of a bitch, and instead of slipping neatly into a coma, he'd hang out and fuck up all of Jillian's numbers. Put a cog in that gear head she had.

Abellard interrupted his morbidly fun thoughts, returning with his hands overflowing. A clear jellyfish thing dangled from his fingertips, until David realized it was a fluid bag for an IV and the remaining hermetically sealed pouches were all the fixings to run it. Jordan didn't say hello, or anything, just let his gatherings roll across the countertop, and he searched them through, peeling back layers and lining them up.

In fluid movements he pulled off one of Jillian's jacket sleeves, then rocked her from side to side, passing the jacket behind her before tossing it on the ground. Deft fingers raised a metal pigtail on a pole, tied Jillian's arm in a white rubber band, and began pressing at the back of her hand. In the doctor's actions David could see the practiced swing of a chipping pick, the glance to assess for layer and slope. Abellard was in his element, and out of a grudging respect David didn't want to disturb him.

Before he could have said anything, the IV bag was hanging from the pigtail, dripping faithfully into Jillian's veins.

Another doctor came by, and waited patiently for a moment before finding a break in the rhythm and asking Jordan what to do with the big box of IV jellyfish in front of him. "How do we triage them?"

Jordan just grabbed three extra bags, speaking only when the other doctor raised his eyebrows. "She discovered this - we make sure she has enough saline. You can triage the rest of the patients as you see fit." He turned away, essentially ending the conversation.

David, too, turned to check out Jillian, and was startled by Peppersmith's voice coming from behind them. "Is it true what you said? That we can't outrun the edge?"

The man looked weary, like Paul Bunyon about to fall, but David nodded. “All the previous data shows that the whole earth will reverse, and if this is what happens when it does, then no, there’s no outrunning it.”

The thought passed briefly before it cleared enough for David to ask it. “Where’s Sorenson?”

Jordan snapped around at that, but before he could put in his pissed-off two cents, Peppersmith spoke up. “All the women were dropping. I tried to help, and I just finally laid her down on a gurney in one of the tents. . . . she’s alive.”

Abellard nodded, pulling one of the clear IV bags from the pile he had carefully hoarded for Jillian. He slapped it into Leon’s palm, surprising the giant, but following it with a sleek plastic sealed kit. “Take these back to her and find somebody to run a line.”

“I can.” Leon looked at the items now dwarfed in his thick hands, and disappeared from the tent on little cat’s feet. Far too quiet for the size he was forced to wield.

Abellard went back to doctoring his patient. As though he could help Jillian by taking her pulse and blood pressure. Like sticking her with a needle and sucking a vial of her blood would help her live through this shit.

David wanted to ignore the whole problem. Walking from the tent he felt the ground beneath his feet. Below the grass and dark soil were layers of limestone and shale with stories to tell. There were oil pockets here. Not the size of the ones in Texas or Alaska, but enough to put a pump in your back yard and food on your family’s table for all your years to come. David wanted to be under his own feet, down with the rocks and the strata.

So why was he here? Stuck with the CDC and sick people falling around him everywhere? Oh, and not just sick people, sick women. Just as a final insult, it was Abellard’s pretty mug he was stuck looking at.

He shook his head, trying to look beyond the tent city. The mountains pushed up around him on every side. Caves were back there. Exposed surfaces, waiting for a man with a pick, a plan, and something to prove. Strip mining had ruined the beauty of the hills. But beauty was for crap, and the exposed layers and angles were far more interesting than any damn trees could be.

His fingers itched to pick at something, to clip himself to a rope and slide down a rock face stealing little pieces of it as he went. All this compass and magnetic field stuff was interesting, but he wanted to break something. Instead people were pushing by him, talking to him.

He didn’t answer. They looked sick, and he had had just about enough of this vomit-and-fall-down-half-dead crap. Their faces looked uncomfortable, so he turned away. Only to be confronted by men, everywhere, coming out of tents, walking the straight lines between, all rubbing at their bellies, the sides of their faces, their ears.

Son of a bitch.

For the briefest of moments David wondered if he was getting it too, and just wasn’t medical enough to know it was happening. But when he checked his stomach the only thing he felt was hungry. Suddenly ravenous. He hadn’t eaten since before he and Jillian had tried that hike to the center of God’s green beyond. And he’d had to haul her sick ass out of there, too.

He grabbed the arm of a passing physician, “Hey, where can I get food down here? Or do I have to go back into the school?”

The man’s facial expression questioned David’s intelligence even as his finger was pointing at the double doors at the bottom of the staircase. The doctor greened up another shade before turning away. But David ambled off toward the low building. Better get some before all the damn cafeteria staff fell ill.

“David!”

Shit.

It was Abellard. “I need you!”

With a sigh as heavy as granite, he turned to help out the doctor. There was a knot of people at the front of the tent. At least David was pretty sure it was the right tent - they were all identical: four poles, white canvas, the only differences being where the flaps were open and how.

Pushing through the men clustered at the door, he found Abellard inside, tending bar, and making the Day-Glo shots he had fed to Jillian and Sorenson. Peppersmith stood by his side, looking green around the gills, but his hands were full of whatever Jordan was handing him. Leon handed them out, one by one, then turned back to the makeshift counter, “My turn.” And he sucked down the next lime green mixer.

Men walked away from the tent flaps, slamming back the shots even as they pushed beyond the crowd.

Jordan turned around and pinned him with a glare. “So show me this immunity that got Jillian in trouble.”

David shook his head. “I’m fine.”

“Good.”

Some of the others looked at him in surprise, or awe. A few even glared, but it only took one, grabbing his arm and asking “Immunity?” to start the ripple of murmurs through the crowd. David shrugged him off.

Jordan, too, ignored it and sent David with a list and a box, bare except for empty bottles so David would know when he found the right stuff. He hit the supply tent and pillaged it, haphazardly piling in what looked like individual lunchbox applesauce containers. He added industrial sized bottles of Mylanta, and carefully read the vial labels searching for Donnatal.

With his box full, and his brain in pissed-off mode, he made his way back to the tent, still crowded with sick men. Hadn’t he gone to college and even grad school to avoid being a manual labor peon? With less than no ceremony he plopped the box on the counter beside Abellard who looked relieved at the quantities David had discovered.

He looked even more haggard than most of the men outside, and Peppersmith held one of the cups out to him, but Abellard waved it away. He motioned for it to be handed to one of those who were waiting, always the hero.

David hung back, then eventually began pulling cups off the end of the assembly line and passing them out to the crowd. He wasn’t human and he knew it. His helping was just a matter of not having all the doctors glare at him.

The clusterfuck at the door thinned and David looked beyond the canvas walls to see that they were falling where they stood. A lot of good the medicine was doing if you asked him.

“I have no idea, but the bastard does seem to be immune.” Jordan spoke to the wall, having finally lost his mind completely.

Or so David thought until he saw the cell phone propped open on the countertop, the name “Landerly” in bold letters across the face.

When the last hand had snaked in for a dose of GI cocktail, Jordan downed one himself. His color had turned gray as steel and he worked his mouth without speaking. Finally, he produced sound. But it wasn’t for David, or even Leon Peppersmith, it was to the cell phone. “Bye Landerly. Thanks for the -.”

His eyes rolled and with his last shred of consciousness he made sure he fell forward, cradling his head even as all his limbs went perfectly slack.

“Oh, shit!” It was the only real surprise David had ever heard from the wrangler.

But Peppersmith acted. And from the looks of it, Jordan was just a big catch to him. He unceremoniously draped the doctor over his shoulder, turning until he spotted the empty gurney. He slapped Jordan down on it hard enough to make David think it was a good thing the doc wasn't awake to experience the humiliation of being hauled around by another man like a sack of flour.

“Abellard!” It was just a sound through some static.

David looked around for the source. But since it wasn't Leon, and it was inside the tent-

“Dr. Landerly?” Picking up the cell phone he got a good look at the face plate. The time read 20:24. That was a long call. “It's Dr. David Carter.”

“I know. Abellard's down?”

“Yup.” He held the phone at a distance, eyeing it as though it might bite him.

“Is Peppersmith still standing?”

“Yup. He's fine, too.”

Leon Peppersmith nodded and gave David the thumbs up, just before his eyes rolled into his head and he dropped like a stone. He went over straight backward, cracking his head on the gurney railing and jostling Jillian, loosening one of her arms so it slipped over the edge of the bed and hung like dead weight.

“Let me take that back, we just lost him.”

Landerly's voice growled through the line at him. “Just like that? No warning?”

“Yup.”

With a quick glance down at Leon he turned back to the phone to concentrate on something Landerly was saying. But even as he turned away from the downed giant his brain processed what he had seen.

A crimson pool was spreading in the grass beneath Leon's head.

“Shit!”

“What?” Landerly's voice crackled from the ground where David had automatically tossed the phone.

“He cracked his head!” He knelt beside the big man, thinking that he should touch the wound to know what to do. His hand pressed through the blond hair, and as he did he could feel the tiny fluctuations in pressure signaling that something important had been hit. Using his fingers to follow the flow backward, David was shocked to find the cut wide and gaping.

Jerking his hand back and not even noting the blood, he leaned into the shove, rolling the big man over. As he did it he suffered a thought about spinal cord injuries and paralysis. Leaving bloody handprints as he went, he checked the hair, and felt the inward dent in the skull.

With an unconscious jerk, David sprang back, landing on his butt, watching in fear as the wound fountained and fell, fountained and fell. Peppersmith lay unconscious, still as a rock, while both the timing and size of the rhythm slid off to nothing.

With dry blinking eyes, David stood, leaving the fallen giant facedown on the ground inside the tent. Unaware of where he was stepping, he crushed the phone beneath the heel of his shoe as he left, silencing Landerly's voice while it hissed through the bad connection.

He needed a sink to wash his hands. It was just beyond the cafeteria. He was still hungry. David didn't worry about the stains on his shirt. Just washed up and headed up the long flight of stairs to change into something clean.

He found his doorway in the eerie stillness; the lack of noise breaking through his protective denial. He looked around, and nothing moved.

A laugh almost bubbled out of him. Of course nothing moved. He was in a hallway in an empty high school. But there was something else. A lack of any human sound that was far more powerful than any lie his brain could concoct. And for the first time, his stomach rolled over in fear.

He unbuttoned his shirt, avoiding the bloody smears and prints, and threw it in the trash. He climbed into fresh everything. Boxers, socks, pants, t-shirt.

But his stomach rolled again.

And he was tired. With a hand in his hair he decided that the cot was the way to go. The food would still be there when he woke up. Then he'd pack up and get the hell out of town.

He stretched out, not comfortable even though the cot was long enough.

All the energy left his limbs.

Only at the last minute did he understand what was happening.

He tried to open his eyes, and wasn't sure if he accomplished it.

The black was bringing the sparkles with it at the borders of his vision. It crept in, closer and closer. Taking over his brain.

Oh shit.

Jillian blinked. White showed above her and all around.
Clouds.

Heaven.

The pounding in her head drove out thoughts of any such luck. She blinked with eyelids made of sandpaper. Her brain knew she was awake, but she didn't know where.

And why couldn't she move?

Another grainy blink revealed shadows in the endless white, lines coming to a crosspoint just up and to her right.

The metal structure draped in the white canvas that formed the gazebo top came into focus.

As she lifted her arm she felt a tug at the skin covering her hand, and figured it out just before she waved her arm into her line of sight.

An IV meant someone was here.

The memories swept quickly through her mind. Jordan putting her up on the gurney, after David hauled her out of the reversal. Becky being laid on the gurney next to hers.

With a shove and a groan, Jillian brought herself to her elbows. Only now beginning to catalog and question the eerie silence.

Extreme effort brought her to sitting, only to slump down quickly as she realized that she would pass right back out again. If not from lack of blood to her brain, then from the hideous pounding inside her skull. She recognized it as the cadence of her heart and for a few moments she counted, stopping only when she was confident she was at a nice stable seventy-two beats per minute.

She yanked her arm, forgetting why she had moved the moment the IV tugged at the back of her left hand, painfully taking tape and a little bit of precious skin. But the needle stayed put. Whoever had done it had done a good job.

While she took deep breaths and waited for her equilibrium to be restored, Jillian held the taped-up hand into her visual field.

Jordan had done it.

It was the first smile that cracked her face. She could feel the unused muscles as she stretched them, grinning as she recognized the careful pattern he always made securing IVs. Wide white paper tape. With three pieces neatly laid in rows holding the whole thing down. So you couldn't rip it out. So it wouldn't hurt so much.

She had to find Jordan.

Turning onto her stomach, Jillian paid careful attention to the tubing that fed her normal saline from the looks of it. But it wasn't Becky Sorenson on the gurney that shared the corner with hers.

It was Jordan. Flat on his back. For a few heart-stopping moments she waited, seeing if his chest would rise of its own accord. And when it did, her unfettered right hand snaked out to rest on his sternum, to buy reassurance that the one breath wasn't a fluke. After riding several swells and troughs of his breathing, Jillian tried to jostle him awake.

"Jordan?"

It was nothing but a movement of her mouth; no sound escaped her vocal cords. Not even the whisper of a voice. It took three tries before she produced something akin to the hiss of a steampipe. And several more before she could recognize her own voice.

"Jordan?"

But he still didn't respond. His chest kept rising and falling, but nothing else about him showed life. Her hand went to her front scrubs pocket out of habit, without her brain even being aware that it was there, until it grasped her penlight.

Jillian turned herself to the single-minded task of lifting his lids and watching the pupils focus automatically before she allowed herself the sigh of relief that let out the tension and allowed a flood of thoughts of so many things that were not comforting.

Like the throb in her leg.

Like, where had Becky Sorenson gone? Was she awake?

How long had she been out?

Four days, like the guys in Nevada?

Her lips pressed a thin line. She had no idea.

But she was smart enough to put together the facts. Jordan was out cold beside her. There were no human sounds beyond the tent that she could distinguish. She had a slow dripping IV but Jordan didn't even have a line. Surely he would have run one on himself if he could have. There were two plastic IV drip bags, lying like dead urchins on the counter. So he had enough saline, but maybe not enough time. But he was on the gurney. So he had enough time to get there, or someone had put him up there. But why hadn't they run a line? Unless they couldn't.

David!

"David!"

It was meant to be a yell, but it sounded like steam being released from a pan. With a deep breath she tried again, her eyes still square on Jordan's face, waiting for any flicker of movement.

Her voice was loud enough the second time.

But David wasn't around.

And apparently neither was anyone else. Someone should have answered that call. As inhuman as it might have sounded.

She tried a third and even fourth time before deciding that she was just wasting her throat. And that she needed a drink and clearly no one was going to show up and hand her one.

Long slow moments passed before she positioned herself to sitting, feeling her muscles stretch and react from their silent time on the gurney. She was guessing she'd been out well more than a day.

Her sneakered feet dangled over the side, swishing in time to the rhythmic pounding of her heart. The desire to find something positive was enough incentive. With eyes staring ahead she took deep breaths, getting her blood flowing again, her heart working a little harder to feed fluid to all the corners of a body that was no longer stationary but becoming fully mobilized.

Jillian inhaled deeply and thanked God that she had survived this . . . whatever it was. She knew already that many hadn't, and many more wouldn't.

She also gathered strength for the jump to the ground. Her legs would need to hold her when she hit bottom, and it wasn't standard operating procedure at all to try this completely alone first time out of a coma. But she had no options. No one had come when she called.

Which meant they were all under.

Or dead.

Or incapacitated to the point where they couldn't answer back.

It was a shame that the last thought was about the most cheerful.

Jillian gathered the IV tubing, draping it to let out enough line in case her legs failed and she slipped all the way to the ground. Without looking down she moved her butt off the edge, feeling for the ground with her toe, but she didn't find it. When her arms got too tired, she fell, her legs taking the brunt of the impact, and not well because she hadn't been sure when it was coming. She crumpled, her feet slipping easily through the grass to splay out in front of her. Leaving her sitting with a sore butt, growing wet from the dew on the cold ground.

But she smelled something. Her eyes registered it before her brain matched the smell, her hand flying to her mouth.

Leon Peppersmith lay beside her, facedown and unmoving, with flies swarming in small patches. Her hand automatically made a brushing motion through the air, scattering them from their prey. And her fingers settled at his neck just under his jaw.

He was cold. He didn't move, didn't breathe. And the flies.

All of it told her he was dead, but her brain wouldn't believe until she checked for herself.

But after a full minute of not finding a pulse she resigned to defeat, if not tears.

And her brain turned over.

The flies weren't hatching on him. But there were plenty there, settling on him again from the moment she had abandoned her task of shooing them. She registered the handprints on him, marked in blood, the splay of long thick fingers.

Not Jordan's.

Jordan had artist's hands. He also would never have handled a man that way. The pattern suggested Leon was rolled and checked by a complete amateur; the handprints violated even the basics of any Red Cross first aid training.

The size, shape, and carelessness were David's. Which meant he'd survived beyond Leon's fall, long enough to roll him and check him. If David was truly immune, then where was he?

Jillian realized that she couldn't just wait here gleaning tiny fragments of data from Peppersmith, that she had sat long enough to gather her legs and push herself to the standing position she had aimed for in the first place.

She rolled to her knees, using her hands splayed out on the grass to stabilize herself, and only as she grabbed the railing did she realize that it wasn't just dew on the ground. The moisture had combined with Leon's blood and congealed to a thick red mess that she was leaving all over the side of the gurney as she hauled herself up. A task made much more difficult by the fact that her hands were covered in the slimy sludge that had once fed Leon's heart.

She wiped long red smears on her scrub pants, knowing without looking that the wetness on her butt wasn't clear dew, but more of the same. With steady hands she lowered the IV pole and unwound the flattened bag from its holder at the top. Briefly she noted the masking tape and markings indicating the dose of Raglan that had been added for nausea. Jordan had thought ahead to when she would wake up. Carrying it with her, she went in search of a clean pair of scrubs.

As she cleared the front flap of the tent, she left its man-made heat and was smacked by the chill of the air, and the smears of white across the ground. Upon closer inspection they were what she had known all along, fallen doctors, techs, lab assistants.

Harder to see, but visible when her eyes cleared, were the black slashes – the suits.

There was no rank or privilege here. No one was spared. Unless maybe you counted the absent David.

Her feet began to work, her heart racing. There was no telling how many of them were alive, but they had been left out in the cold overnight. Probably over two nights. Maybe even three. In their comatose state, they might survive. Especially with IVs.

With the clarity afforded by a fresh rush of adrenaline, Jillian headed back into the tent. Her eyes scanning, taking in the IV bags and her jacket tossed over the back of a chair.

She slipped into the jacket, knowing every second she was on her feet would be helpful to those outside. Unfortunately the IV tubing traced neatly up her sleeve and out the back of the jacket, at the base. At the neck it would receive the gravitational tug necessary to keep it dripping.

After a rapid search she found a safety pin and stared at it a second before shedding her jacket and pulling the tubing apart, shoving in the connection to a new, fuller, heavier bag. She pushed the pin through the wide hole at the top and attached it to the base of her jacket collar. Shrugging back into it, she felt the IV bag tugging slightly at the neckline, but it wasn't much of a bother, knowing what it would help her accomplish. She loaded her pockets with supplies and went to work, Leon's blood already crusting on her pants, forgotten.

Expanding her ribcage, she sucked in as much air as she could. Certain that the same place that had been so toxic to everyone no longer was to her.

Jordan was her first order of business. In short work, she propped him on his side, using the pillows from her bed and his. She used the same rubber tourniquet that he had used on her, and popped open a sterile needle and tubing. It had been months since she had run a line, she'd been so busy taking notes and trying to figure out botulism cases. But she had a motor memory, and once she got started her hands remembered even if her brain didn't.

The pattern worked its whole way through. So Jordan's IV bag was hung before she realized that he deserved the same dose of Raglan she'd been fed. And she carefully drew up the dose, injected it into the bag, and quickly slapped on a piece of tape jotted with the medication, time, and her initials.

Jillian shook her head even as she did it. Who the hell was she writing it for? It wasn't like there was another soul around here. And she wouldn't forget when she gave Jordan the dose.

But it was procedure, and hopefully someone would turn up.

She was halfway out the door before realizing there was another problem in the tent. Leon.

With a grim set to her mouth, and knowing full well that she didn't have the strength required to do it, she did it anyway. Slowly and surely. Grabbing at his ankles, she pulled him through the opening. Leaving a smear of his blood behind, his hands trailing, she wished that she had the means and supplies to treat his body in accordance with the laws of God and civilized man. But she had to clear the tent. She and Jordan had already been in there for several days with a rotting corpse.

She wondered why he didn't smell more, before coming to the conclusion that he must not have died right away. But he didn't have an IV either, so that would mean that Jordan couldn't get to him before he fell.

When she cleared the tent, she stopped. Breathing too heavily, Jillian leaned over, her hands pressed to her bent knees. She couldn't walk, didn't have the energy to start IVs for those who needed them. But she could survey.

There were two techs nearby who appeared to have run IVs on each other. They got just inside a tent but didn't get the flap closed. They were losing heat, but they were easy to fix.

Plastic cups adorned the ground, looking like there had been a party. Some crumpled, some just tossed - the GI cocktails. It would seem Jordan had been handing them out like Halloween candy. The fallen men and women were scattered like the cups. They looked tossed and forgotten. The only pattern was that they seemed to have collapsed on the west side of the campus, indicating that perhaps they had deluded themselves into thinking they could outrun the symptoms.

A few deep breaths tugged at the muscles in her ribs, stopping her and forcing her to do nothing more than look around for a few more moments. This time she saw brown dots beyond the tent lines and turned to look more closely. Chipmunks. Unlike the people, they had flies. She blinked as she realized one of the slashes of white was much smaller than the others.

Her brain was caught in the question, and her feet moved slowly until she stood over what was clearly a fluffy white housecat. Its mouth hung open and all four legs stretched straight out in front of him. Her breath caught, jerking at her ribs again. Unused for quite a while, the extended movement hurt them. But Jillian tamped down the thought and the vision of the cat. She couldn't help it. She had to get these people into the tents. And although Leon was by far the biggest of any of them, she didn't possess the strength to drag them all, even just the few feet required in most cases.

She glanced up at the clear sky for the first time. It was morning. So she had a good portion of the day to work. And the people she left out would be getting warmer, at least for a while.

She needed a rolling gurney system.

There was a dolly and some rope in the supply tent.

A wheelchair would be nice but was too high – she'd spend too much time lifting people, if she even could.

She picked her way around, making promises to do something as quickly as possible as she stepped over the fallen. In the tent entry, she contemplated the scene in front of her. Then began loading the pieces she needed. Rope, several roll boards, Velcro straps, IVs, needles, tape . . . a box to haul the little pieces in.

She wound her way to the next patient tent, stealing the first empty gurney she could find and leaving the mattress propped against the support pole. She wheeled the frame back to the supply tent and went after her first . . . victim, she thought to herself.

She encountered him not twelve feet beyond the opening, lying on the ground, head back. She systematically checked his pulse, felt for broken bones, and shined her penlight in his eyes. She wasn't moving him if he wasn't worth moving, she thought grimly. And more time had passed gathering stuff than she had planned. But she would save as many as she could, and that meant staying upright, not wasting effort.

After a few moments she decided he was worth it. She rolled him, before realizing she'd never been taught how to do this procedure by herself. And with good cause, Who could have predicted this? She stared at the bodies all around her.

This time she put the board in place first, then rocked her patient, quickly shoving it behind him. She propped the two spare roll boards like ramps up the eight inches to the collapsed, mattressless gurney. With rope, she leaned back and dragged him up the slope, by far the most exerting of the activities.

But he was there, unaware of the abuse she had caused him and herself in the process. She popped him up and wheeled him to the nearest free patient space. Trying so hard to be careful, but having neither the time nor the strength to do much more than plop him onto the bed, she got her breath while she ran a line on him.

She injected a dose of Raglan for him, too. Then took a moment to gather her thoughts and her energy. Trying to be useful while she waited for her oxygen to catch up to her, she wrote the dosing repeatedly across the tape and stuck the tabs methodically up her jacket sleeve. Ready to grab when she needed them. The only question was, would her strength find her or would she just get weaker?

Only one way to find out.

• • • •

DAVID WOKE FROM A SOLID sleep to the cadence of army boots on a wooden bridge. Or a woodpecker in slow motion, each peck echoing forever.

“Ehhhh.” It was a sound carried on a breath that rang in the hollowness around him. And he remembered. Climbing up here. Going to sleep. Being certain that it had found him.

He blinked by force of will, the light blinding as he pried open his eyeballs. At last they focused on the floor near him, on the thing least painful to his vision. Wouldn't you know it? The things he saw first were the army blankets made into the love nest where Jillian had curled into Abellard that morning.

Or maybe it had been longer.

He had been hungry when he came, but now it seemed his stomach had turned almost inside out. He knew he needed to eat, but it didn't hurt, wasn't even a bother. He imagined this was the way that people starved to death, knowing they needed food, but knowing there wasn't much they could do about it.

He flexed his toes, his knees, his ankles, worked his stiff fingers, and elbows - all of it painful, but necessary.

Last, he remembered not a soul had been awake. And from the sound of it, or lack thereof, it remained the same.

He slowly pitched himself to sitting. The pounding lessened now, he pushed to his feet, swaying like the tall trees, a state he despised. Only then did he realize how much of his pride was embedded in his nature - that he was solid, unchanging, predictable - readable if you knew the signs. A David Carter the Second who wavered on his feet was none of those things and he fought for balance.

But he didn't really find all of it. He lurched toward the door, throwing it open, not admitting to himself how much weight the doorknob bore while he turned it and swung it back.

He walked the few steps forward, unaided, until his shoulder banged into a locker he hadn't realized he was so close to. With a grunt, he massaged his muscles, and walked again, this time trailing his fingers along the cool paint, the texture changing as lockers passed by under his fingerpads. The wall told him which way was up, and he stayed vertical this time.

His brain didn't know what to do about it. Balance came naturally, it was like farting, you just did it. Conscious thought about walking was virtually impossible to a man who had left that up to his brainstem for decades.

The hallway down to the field was in front of him. There were windows lining each side, and from this height he would be able to see the white tops of the tents looking like Arlington Cemetery as they made neat rows across the soccer field. If he could get to the other side of the damn hall.

A deep breath.

Another.

And he started putting one foot in front of the other, stunned by knowledge that this was what it felt like to be an astronaut in space - no bearings, just sightlines. How did it work so well most of the time? David knew then that he had caught a glimpse into Jillian's brain, her fascination with the human form and function.

At last his fingers caught the smooth surface of the windows. Cold to the touch, he realized that the school had kept functioning even without its people, the heater making a huge difference.

Under the guise of making a visual sweep of the tent town, he rested his forehead against the window, enjoying the temperature difference that felt almost like wetness. While he breathed, he scanned.

Nothing.

He sighed, realizing he wasn't quite ready to move yet. And told himself that he should look a little longer. But the people were down there, and the food was down there. He would only get weaker while he waited.

Why the hell had he come back up here in the first place?

The cot didn't seem like such a bargain now.

His feet followed a line, one arm stayed out from his side, at ninety degrees, trailing fingertips across the cool windows as he walked, leaving fingerprints he didn't care about. The stairs got closer and closer, and David admitted to himself that he needed the railing. Son of a bitch. He wished this on his old man as he aged - this feeling of helplessness. And he wasn't sure if it was worse that there was no one around to help, or better.

With slow even steps he took on the first flight. It seemed, as he looked down, that it had gotten steeper. Every time his foot hit flat against the concrete step, the impact rang through his leg bones. His going was slow and he had to stop at the landing, his hand pressed flat against the cool window, supporting his weight. And for the first time he began to wonder what it would be like when he hit the bottom.

Would anyone be alive?

Clearly no one was awake yet.

His stomach pinched, the tiny reminder that he should be on a mission for food. It wasn't like the people were going to go anywhere while he ate.

He walked the level part between flights, one hand pressing against the small stitch in his side, a dogged reminder of his weakness. Then he faced the next set of stairs.

Again, he slapped his way down, lacking the control necessary for a smooth gait. Thinking that food would help, but knowing there wasn't likely to be a fruit basket waiting for him at the next landing, he just kept going.

Breathing heavier, he paused again at the level section, his ribs heaving, his harsh intakes and expulsions the only sound in the hollow stairwell. This time both hands rested on the window. His leg stretched out behind him in a mock calf stretch, as though a good warm-up would cure him.

When he got halfway down, the tent town came into clearer view. He could see down a few of the paths, not just skim across the tops. Now he could see the fallen doctors and nurses, in their white jackets and blue scrubs. Suits were down too, their black making them look sinister compared the angelic coloring of the medical staff.

"Holy shit!"

He heard his own voice before he absorbed the movement he had seen. A team of people had grabbed one of the doctors in the aisleway and was rolling him onto a board and a gurney.

He could only see one active person because the tents blocked his view but there appeared to be more than one. He could see better if he went down a few steps, all the way to the end of the row . . .

Taking it sideways and never peeling his eyes from the scene, he spent excruciating minutes gaining a few steps. And his view got clearer if not his brain.

There was only one doctor, and it was Jillian. Out there hauling some hapless med onto a metal bed. She popped it up and pushed it into the nearest tent disappearing from view.

David took a few more steps. Feeling his way, hands plastered to the windows that trailed the staircase. He was about to lose the sightline, the tents on the left would obscure the view. And he had to get Jillian's attention.

He waited where he stood, contemplating the fact that it was possibly just the two of them awake. Maybe there really had been something to that immunity theory.

She reemerged, oblivious to him standing there in the staircase.

"Jillian!" His lungs burned from the effort and she didn't glance up.

“Jillian!”

Again nothing.

He took two more steps down, to where a window was pushed an inch open to ventilate the place, keeping her in his sights the whole time. She was out there, rocking and strapping up another fallen doc, looking like one of the seven dwarves had gotten lost and decided to go it alone. He wouldn't have been surprised to find her whistling.

But he put his mouth to the space and yelled her name again.

She started, as though she had heard something, but shook off the sound. No doubt having no idea what the Herculean effort was costing him.

But he yelled again.

This time she looked up before turning back.

And he yelled yet again.

His ribs ached. His throat burned. His legs were weak.

But she was looking around for the source of the noise she had heard. With no more voice to spare, he did the only thing he could think of. He made a fist and banged on the window.

He would have cursed out loud if he'd had the voice to do it. The damned plexiglass absorbed his tender fist and released only a gentle thud. The noise nowhere near worthy of the pain it had inflicted.

But he had nothing else to hit it with.

He was wearing borrowed scrubs or he would have had a belt buckle. He was soft, and he was weak, and it was a bad combination. But he banged again and screamed her name one last time.

“Jillian!”

This time he moved to the left, plopping down a step, and waved frantically, feeling like a lost child watching the search party go by.

Finally she saw him and waved.

From here it was hard to tell, but he thought she smiled.

Then she went back to her patient, finished hauling him onto the gurney, popped the bed up, and disappeared into the tent.

That bitch!

David took a few more steps. Still traveling sideways, watching the tent town for other signs of life. But there were none. None at all now that Jillian was out of view.

He hit the next landing, his line of sight down the tents gone, obscured by the first row, he was barely above them, and this last flight would bring his feet even with the ground outside.

His heart hitched, his breath released, when he saw her coming out at a near jog. Hell, she was in much better shape than he was. But he'd never been so happy to see her, to see anyone.

He faced the last steps. His energy renewed in a surge of hope, and he squared up to the flight, thinking to take it head on.

His eyes lifted as he saw the door swing open and heard her voice, breathless, “David!”

He felt the concrete corner of the first step bite into his arch, barely grabbing the treads on his expensive sneakers. The tenuous balance he registered in his fingers fled, and he tilted to the right, taking the hard metal rail in his lower ribs. His hands flailed, but the rapid bloom of adrenaline only made him think faster, not act faster, and in horrifying slow motion he watched his hands miss their grip, and the cold gray stairs come straight for his face.

Jillian had no time to react, she had no more called his name and registered the rare smile that lit up his whole face, than he was at her feet in an inhuman crumple.

Stifling a scream, she compartmentalized that this was her friend, and let her brain go into ER mode. He was unconscious, so without moving him or speaking, she checked for a pulse, and found it, going strong if erratic. She pulled her stethoscope free of her neck and listened to his breath sounds. Again, no fluid, no hissing, just normal sounds sped up a little by the fall and the adrenaline.

Carefully she felt along several of his limbs. His right leg she didn't touch, it was already swelling and bent at such an angle that she didn't have to feel it to know that it was broken, a tib-fib for sure. His hip also wasn't placed right, and his pelvic girdle was wrong, although what the problem was she couldn't tell just by looking. His right arm flayed out to his side where it had been thrown by the fall. But it was facing the wrong way. Dislocated. A few touches and palpations confirmed her suspicion.

He was starting to come around, and she debated what to do. No one else had woken up in the time she had been awake. And it would figure that the one person who did would pitch down the steps to her feet the moment she discovered him. There was nothing she wanted to do less than spend her time setting a broken bone, by herself mind you, and taking care of the person who should have been helping her.

With a self-deriding shake of her head, Jillian put that thought away. She opened the compartment doors; this was David. And he was seriously hurt. But he was coming to.

"Jillian?" It was a harsh whisper, and he tried to turn his head from where she held it firm in her hands. She couldn't risk him moving his neck, not until she knew he checked out.

"David, don't move."

He did just that, trying to lift his dislocated arm and letting out a hoarse scream in the process. He seemed to hear himself, and she could almost see the testosterone working its way through his system. David bucked up and, blinking at her, finally made contact "Good to see you."

She ignored his attempt at humor and told him to stay still, she was going to get the gurney.

Her IV bag flopped inside the back of her jacket as she ran, although she could already tell it weighed less than before, a good half of it had dripped into her veins in the time she had worked today. But for all she had accomplished, there were plenty of people left to move and she could feel the temperature dropping in the late afternoon.

Her energy had improved as she worked, although she could find no scientific explanation for it. Now she wrapped her hands around the gurney bar and, with all the speed she could afford, she raced back into the hallway. Grateful when she could stop fighting the cart for a path over the grass and enjoy the slick feel and easy glide of the wheels moving on the polished floor they were intended for.

She was beside David in a moment, although in the short time she had been gone his eyes had changed from bewildered to wary. He knew he was in bad shape. But Jillian just started to work. She ran the IV with a newfound efficiency, leaving off the Raglan dose, but adding in some morphine sulfate to dull the pain.

She put a neck collar on him next, even though he protested and looked at her with wide eyes. She rocked him onto the rollboard with strong hands and the methods learned from thirty limp patients this afternoon. She had gotten better with every patient and was grateful now. David would be too, as she was uncertain if he had sustained any spinal injuries.

She had him up on the gurney and sprung the bed upward to a workable height before she made eye contact with him. His left hand shot out and grabbed her arm, startling her and keeping her from rolling him out to the lobby area in front of the cafeteria where the light was better.

“David?”

“Jillian, tell me.”

She knew what he wanted to hear. But everything wasn't going to be all right. He'd gone headfirst down concrete steps. He was messed up. His right leg had swollen even more since her initial assessment and she was certain there was internal bleeding. Of course Jordan would have followed all the protocol and briefed David on his condition and options and let David make those decisions.

She wasn't Jordan.

But she tried.

With an awkward motion she took his face in her hands, hindered by the thick plastic neck collar immobilizing him and looked him in the eyes. “You have at least a broken right leg and a dislocated right shoulder. I think something is wrong with your hip as well. I'm going to check you for spinal cord injuries first. Then I'm going to take you out to the tent and fix you up. It's going to hurt. Because I'm the only one awake. But ninety-nine percent says you're going to be okay.” She paused, added, “Later.”

With her penlight she checked his pupils. She was going to pray every night never to have to watch for ‘equal and reactive’ again. Then she prodded him repeatedly. It was a medical test, but Jillian admitted that it was just systematic poking to see if the patient could feel things. She undid the Velcro holding the collar in place before reaching both hands around his neck and feeling the vertebrae. Nothing felt damaged to her trained fingers. So she left the collar off and began what would be a bumpy and excruciating ride for David out to the tent.

He was clenching his jaw by the time they arrived. Wheeling him inside, her eyes darted to Jordan, lying right where she'd left him, not bothered by any of this. Leaving David on the metal gurney, she went about setting up.

Jillian stole bedsheets and cut them into strips. She lined up shots of pain medications and muscle relaxants. She administered the doses and braided sheets while she waited for them to take effect. She ignored all the protocol about asking David what he wanted. She would fix him as best she could.

He could sue her later. Besides there were surely sunshine laws to cover malpractice during mass human extinctions.

When the dosing had done its job, Jillian shifted him to the matted bed pushed into the corner by Jordan's, and warned David what she was doing just moments before she tied him to the frame. She palpated his hip and wished for an x-ray. But with a deep breath of acceptance she diagnosed that the pelvic girdle was broken. Without a team and an anesthesiologist, all she could do was bind it, and they'd have to re-break and re-set it later.

With great care Jillian bound his hip as best she could and she went so far as to tie his knee to the bed, thinking she could stabilize it and still be able to reset the tib-fib. She explained as she went. And David was a good soldier, stoic and cooperative, following all her suggestions no matter how bizarre. So she looped a sheet carefully around his foot and ankle and pulled with all her small might, and accomplished nothing.

“What did you do?”

With lips pressed together in disappointment and thought, she turned back to her patient. “In your language I believe it would be expressed as ‘jack shit’.” She turned away to think.

Then tried again. The third time she applied pressure by hanging back on the sheet, the weight of her borne completely by his lower leg, hoping to stretch it far enough that she could settle the snapped bones back into their rightful places. Her feet climbed, both leaving the floor, and she wasn’t sure if she’d be able to set his bones before she dislocated her own shoulders from the effort. But at last she managed enough pull and she felt her strength overcome the tension of his muscles and let the bones slide.

The hard part was in letting his leg slip back together gently. She couldn’t afford to have them snap back into place and splinter or jam or, god forbid, miss and slide past each other again, causing more muscle tearing and tissue damage as they went. So her strength drained as she fought for control, and with a last sigh she realized the muscles were no longer fighting her. The bones had found each other again. She could let go.

Stopping to breathe for a few minutes, she made a quick makeshift splint then set about replacing Jordan’s IV bag. It was non-exerting work. David’s shoulder would have to wait, she didn’t have even that simple procedure in her right now. Plus he was so doped up, it wasn’t like he would know.

Jillian stayed clinical. She went to the cafeteria and fetched a few bananas, bottles of juice, sandwiches, and even a few cookies. With arms full, she wound her way through the slumbering tents back to David and Jordan.

David asked how the penguins were doing.

“Fine.” She didn’t look up. From the penguins question and the slightly slurred quality of speech the man was either seeing the birds or believed he was at the north pole.

Jordan didn’t say anything. Just quietly submitted to the hand she laid palm down across his chest to be sure that he continued breathing.

Turning back to David, she rolled him, taking advantage of the muscle relaxants. With careful explanations that he ignored, Jillian educated him about the procedure. But the medications were working better than she had expected. He was of no help whatsoever. He agreed to everything, but couldn’t even sit still. Worse, he tried to help - insisting on turning, sitting, and generally being a nuisance.

She promised him a cookie if he stayed still, and that, of all things seemed to work. But it didn’t stop him from mooning at her like a lovesick calf.

“You know you’re beautiful.”

What do you say to that? If you say ‘no’ he’ll just go on. “Yes.”

“Can I touch you?”

“You have no idea what you’re saying.” After she popped his shoulder into place she fitted him with a sling and proceeded to adjust it. Leaning over him she added an extra Velcro strap, thinking that goofboy might just do something stupid if he wasn’t tied down.

“I know exactly what I’m saying. This medicine just took away my concerns about saying it.”

That was interesting. “What were those concerns, David?”

“That you would slap me.” His tongue sounded thick, but that would pass as he sobered up. As would this.

“You know, I think that was a good concern. – Hey!” She smacked his hand away from her butt, thinking that maybe a good slap was warranted. If she didn’t leave a mark he’d never know better.

“I feel this way about you all the time.” A conspiratorial look on his face, he leaned far enough forward to risk falling off the gurney, which was the last thing she needed. God, the man was a danger to himself.

“Yeah, well why don’t you talk it over with the penguins?”

Confusion. Blessed confusion. He tried to gesture with his disabled arm, and seemed even more perturbed that it didn’t move. “Where did they go?”

“They’re visiting the back of your eyelids, David. You have to lie down and close your eyes for a long time. The penguins will . . .” This had to be good . . . “peck you when it’s time to open your eyes.”

“Yeah.” He nodded, in complete agreement before slowly laying himself back. Closing his eyes carefully, he waited for the penguins.

If he hadn’t been the last man on earth, she would have laughed. Instead she went outside looking for another gurney, and hauled it in. Keeping her gaze close to the ground, Jillian ignored the suits and med staff that were still visible in white and black against the grass. Those she hadn’t moved yet. They would have to survive another night. She was exhausted.

• • • •

IT WAS THE INTERROGATION room of nightmares. Borne of too many cop movies. The light shone in his eyes obscuring everything else in the world.

He didn’t even remember the world. Just that there were questions.

Voices were asking him things he couldn’t answer. He pushed his arm up to shield his face, but it wouldn’t come. He was rewarded with a sharp pain every time he tried to lift it. And he couldn’t distinguish who was holding him down, who was speaking. Just the glare flooding his vision to the point of pain.

Jordan squeezed sore eyes tight to stop it, but the red glow permeated his eyelids, and snuck between every time he moved. The voice wouldn’t shut up. He made a noise, the sound was painful to his own ears but it reoriented him.

Gravity was down, behind him. He was on his back, in bed.

With each time he squinted, he recognized more and more in the blobs around him. The light was sunlight, not artificial. The voice was to his left. The pain was in his left hand.

He moved it, snapping it painfully against something metal.

The bedrail.

He moaned.

“Jordan!”

Her voice pierced the haze.

Jillian.

It was all he got to think before he felt her hands, soft and cool, on his arm. Her voice was asking for his open eyes. He tried to say her name, and was quite certain that he didn’t achieve it. But she responded like he had. “That’s right, I’m here. It’s good to see you awake. I was getting worried.”

Don’t worry about me.

But he couldn’t form single words, let alone the whole thought.

It.

He’d had it.

And he’d woken up. The realization expanded his lungs to full capacity, to gasp in surprise at his own survival. With the dawning came the idea that he had to get his eyes open no matter the cost. He fought the burning and the low, shallow sound that accompanied the forced vision. But he waited. And the first blob came into focus.

It was David, on the gurney beside him who had provided the interrogation, and was still at it. “Abellard! You are about the last one up. Don’t worry, I kept our girl here company.”

Jillian’s voice cut through the haze, clearer than anything else around him. “Yeah, you weren’t much good at anything else.”

“Ooh, baby, that hurts.”

As did the banter that they shared when he couldn’t even see. But Jordan forced his eyelids wide, waiting while she became visible. Still a little fuzzy, Jillian’s smile was obvious.

Rapid blinks brought the world into sharp relief one painful frame at a time. The white of the canvas, bleeding in sunlight. The silver of the bed bars, used for children and the elderly. Or the comatose.

He considered asking to have them put down so he could feel human again, but the face that came into view was David’s and in a blink Jordan realized what was wrong. It looked like David had gotten in bad with the mob. “David?”

“Yeah?” David shrugged, with only one shoulder. “In your professional opinion I am fucked-up, huh?”

“What happened?”

Jordan missed the first part of the explanation, simply because he was shocked he had spoken and David had answered. Despite the feeling that his mouth was stuffed with moldy gauze, he was articulate.

“-down the stairs. The rest is pretty obvious.”

“Stairs?” He tried to lift his head, and it took a moment to realize the blue that had settled beside him was Jillian in her scrubs, her palm flat against his forehead holding him immobile.

“Don’t try to sit up yet.”

But he wanted to hear about these mythical stairs that had started wailing on David while he himself had slumbered on.

David pointed with his unslung arm, still dressed in doctors scrubs, although by now Jordan was sure that everyone knew he wasn’t a physician. “The last flight. I’d just woken up and was weak. I was trying to get to Jillian. And I slipped.” His finger gestured beyond the tents and Jordan recalled the long, tall stairwell that led up to the classrooms on top of the hill.

“You fell down the stairs?”

The world was undergoing a phenomenal change, the likes of which had not been witnessed by humans of any kind before. And David fell down the stairs?

Jillian’s voice added in. “He was basically useless. Which sucked because he and I were the only ones awake for two days. We came right out of it.”

His gut twisted, although in relief or fear, he was uncertain. “You were immune.”

“Well, we went under. I don’t know that I’d call it immunity.” Again she pressed her hand flat to him, this time across his chest, and it was embarrassingly easy for her to push him back down. He hadn’t even realized that he’d been trying to sit up. “I did blood tests out the wazoo. . . we’ve got nothing that I can find.”

The way Jordan figured it, if she couldn’t find the pattern, it didn’t exist.

Licking the roof of his mouth, he tried to ready it to speak again. But Jillian saw him and went into action. Propping the head of his bed slightly she pushed his pillow into place and handed him a small cup of juice.

Positively heavenly, it made up for the abrasion of the invalid treatment. If he'd been strong enough he would have told her to quit. But, well, that was the point wasn't it?

After a second cup, he found his voice and spoke over the questions David was still asking. "Who else?"

Her chest moved visibly. "Well . . ."

He could see the gears. She needed to find a place to start and that meant there was a lot.

"I can't get Landerly on the phone. I think he's under." She busied her hands, drawing a dose of something and injecting it into David's IV. "In fact, we've set a couple of people to calling different places and recording what they report."

"Are we Central Headquarters now? That doesn't make sense."

"No, it doesn't. But we put ourselves in the path of the swap. So we were one of the first places under, and one of the first to come out. I'll be glad to hand all the data to Atlanta as soon as they come around."

"Nothing from them?" Jordan shook his head. His blood pumping stronger at the mention that Landerly was down. That all of Atlanta was.

"Not yet."

"Here?" He was sitting, having left horizontal behind, his legs dangling over the side down where the baby rail ended. His head would have been swimming from being upright if it hadn't been swimming from the news he was getting.

"We've kept just over a third." Jillian's sigh echoed in the still air.

And Jordan noticed the absence of the sound. "What happened to David?" The geologist's head was back and he'd passed out. A bolt of fear went through Jordan, that David had fallen under again. But Jillian's reaction was nothing if not nonchalant.

"His pain medications knock him out. He gets real chatty when he hurts."

Jordan eyed the blond man, who even in sleep, and looking like he'd seen the hard end of a big stick, maintained his aura of superiority. It covered him like a blanket, and clung to him like his last name.

Jordan turned back to Jillian; she looked fatigued, but stoic.

"When did he fall?"

"Two days ago. Within an hour of waking up. Just down the last flight. Worst of it is the cracked hip girdle."

Jordan winced at the thought. But Jillian just continued with the list. "He also has a tib-fib, dislocated right shoulder, bruised collarbone, two ribs with hairline fractures, and three bruised. And a nasty cut on his head, stitches compliments of me. And a strained ankle."

"Damn." Jordan blinked. It sucked to be David right now.

"Yeah. I was the only one up. I didn't get everyone inside because of him. . . ." Her eyes went to the ground, her breath in uneven expansions.

Jordan waited for her to lift whatever had weighed her down.

"I think some of them went hypothermic. . . . When I saw him I thought he was going to help me. But then . . . he fell . . . he just needed so much care."

"Jilly. It's okay." He wasn't sure what else to say. It wasn't like he had been here to help. "You did the best you could. And you saved David." That fact was clearly important to her, so Jordan tamped down the fiendish little thoughts rising inside him at the idea of David heading to the great beyond and dozens of other lives being saved. But he didn't share those with Jillian.

He also knew there was nothing more he could do for her guilt. Not now. So he tried the fine art of distraction. “Who else is up?”

“I can tell you better who is down. We’re waiting for more to wake.” She rattled off some of the names of techs they had been working with. Some she just described: Steven, one of the guards; the two brothers in the cafeteria, the Sanders’; Mr. Miles and Mr. Moore the two high school science teachers who had helped out. “That cute blonde girl who liked you so much,” Jillian tilted her head, her mouth pulled back on one side, conveying the sorrow she just couldn’t quite hold in. “Lucy?”

He snapped up, “Lucy Whitman?” Not that he knew her well enough to miss her, but . . . he sighed.

Jillian’s face turned even more grim, and he knew what was coming. “The ones you didn’t mention.”

She shook her head, but her voice left a little room for hope. “There are a few still under, but. . . Dr. Sorenson’s animal wrangler friend hit his head when he fell and died fairly quickly. Maybe it was nicer that way. Fast.”

“Leon Peppersmith. What about Becky?”

“Holding on, but faint.” Her hands waved uselessly, sharing with him the knot inside her. That the simple technicalities of life were still beyond her skills. “We’ve learned to recognize the signs that someone is coming out-”

He smiled. Jillian. “Of course you have.”

“-but she doesn’t have any of them. Her breathing is getting weaker and weaker.”

“Ventilator?”

“We don’t have enough to spare. . . . But I got her one anyway. . . . not that it’s doing her any good. You know, it’s just like the beginning. It’s always ahead of us. We can read the signs but we can’t prevent or counteract any of it.” Again the useless gestures. The breaths in.

Then a spark. Her head snapped up, she smiled, making full eye contact and beaming in a way he hadn’t seen before. Good. Something good was coming.

“I got you this.” She pulled several pages from her pocket. He saw the list of names, marching in precise columns.

He blinked. Pages of names. A list of what?

He started to ask but he caught sight of James Linder Carvell and LeAnn Jessica Lee. The back of his brain tickled. He should know –

They were from his high school.

Lake James.

“Survivors?”

She smiled and nodded. “In the order they woke up, not alphabetical. Kelly and Lindsey aren’t there. But I found ten Abellards. Jackson is your father, right?” Her eyes were wide wondering, waiting.

He nodded, trying to stop the tears that formed.

His Dad.

He flipped two pages, seeing the occasional name highlighted. Jillian had done it. The lines were too precise to be anything other than machine or Jilly. All the highlights were Abellards.

Jackson Stelman Abellard.

It stared up at him in black and white, painting a truth he hadn’t even felt in his heart. Releasing the tears down his face. Thank you, God.

Jillian didn’t give him any space, just beamed up at him. “I knew you’d want to see that.”

He nodded, biting his lip. Trying to be more together, less hindered by babyrails and emotions. He used the backs of his hands to wipe at his face.

“Ow!” He had raked the IV needle down his cheek. It hurt enough to make him wonder if he had drawn blood.

But Jillian reached up and wiped his face, her fingers were soft and warm – and demeaning. He brushed her away. “Thank you.” The mumble was all he could muster.

He started again, trying to learn what he had missed. “All of Lake James went under?”

She nodded, forgetting that he had pushed her aside, “Everyone. The whole US, the world. As best as we can tell the poles swapped. That was it. The shift.”

“Really?”

She gestured to the prone form on the gurney next to him. “You’ll have to ask David. But that’s what he believes.”

Jordan couldn’t help but look around the ten-by-ten tent that had been his world for four days. Even the town of Oak Ridge was nothing in the global sense, “How did we learn all this?”

Jilly’s smile was crooked. “Not by me.” She punctuated with a sigh. “I think I’m not human really. It would explain a lot.”

The frown pulled his features central, her phrasing was so strange. Not human?

But she stopped him before he could begin. “The women all went under first. Even with me and David, I went first. So, logically, the women started waking up first.

“Apparently when a real woman wakes from a coma the first thing she does is call everyone she knows. Three women woke up first. Within the hour they had made contact with forty different states and seven other countries. That doesn’t even include the ones that didn’t answer.” She looked incredulous for a moment, before that slid away to reveal guilt. “I had been awake a full day and a half by then, and hadn’t even thought to try to contact my own family.”

Her eyes slipped to the ground. Never revealing what, if anything, she had found out about her sisters and parents. Not that he was surprised. That was just Jillian.

The gears slipped into place. Maybe she and David did have a lot in common.

But he didn’t have time to dwell on it.

“Dr. Brookwood!” A tech ran into the tent, clearly out of breath, but pushing the words through anyway. “You said you wanted to be notified if anything happened to Dr. Sorenson.” Jordan could hear her breathing from eight feet away. “She’s slipping.”

Jillian threw one last look at him before darting from the tent, stethoscope and penlight in hand. Looking like an ER doc in full mode. But she must be these days, he reasoned. He still hadn’t figured out how she had taken care of David’s breaks and dislocations all by herself.

He motioned for the tech to come give him a hand. And she caught her breath before reaching out and steadying him so he could slide down to shaky legs. But he stood firm after the first attempt. The IV remained attached, and he began to scratch off the tape at the back of his left hand, but the tech stilled him. “We’ve been leaving them on.”

But then he’d be stuck, tethered to the bed. And he told her so.

She lowered the pole and handed him the half-full bag to hang onto, before turning him around and taking a safety pin to his clothing. Within moments he was strung up with his IV attached at the back of his collar. When he glanced up he saw that the tech was wearing one the same way. “So this is the latest fashion rage?”

“Dr. Brookwood thought it up.” She smiled. Of course they all loved Jillian. She was brilliant, she saved their lives probably. While he slept. “She’s very smart you know.”

“Yes, I know.” But he left the tech there to share her remaining praise of Jilly with the sleeping Dr. Carter. Taking off, he followed the little blue streak, full of energy that he didn’t yet have, and brains that he never would. Her dark hair flying loose behind her a beacon he followed through the tents.

• • • •

BECKY SORENSON LOOKED like an angel. At least the kind Jillian had always imagined as a kid - rosy lips, pale skin in peaches and cream, with a cinnamon dusting of freckles. Vibrant hair in shades of red reserved only for the very lucky. Colors she herself would never possess.

Jillian looked at the doctor lying there. She certainly didn’t look like a world class biologist. She looked like another version of Snow White. They ought to get her a bouquet and glass case and let her wait for Prince Charming. In Jillian’s estimation that part should be played by Leon Peppersmith. He was huge and handsome and sharp as a tack. And since Becky wasn’t awake to say what her preferences were, Jillian would decide for her. Although she couldn’t even force a mental image of Leon prancing a horse through the forest, looking for a princess. Possibly wearing tights.

She almost laughed.

And the thought disintegrated. Becky’s knight wouldn’t show. He had died of a blow to the head. Something any one of the handful of CDC docs could have fixed had they been anything other than comatose. Leon had been one of a few who had died, not due to the reversal, but to ‘other’ causes.

At least Becky wouldn’t know that he hadn’t survived.

Jordan nearly plowed into her as he entered the tent. She didn’t have to turn and look. The labored breathing was all his.

It was only then that the nurse hovering over Dr. Sorenson looked up, stethoscope still in hand. “Her blood pressure is still dropping. Her pulse is uneven and fading.” She shook her head, brown curls unruly from all the work. She stepped aside, revealing that the bed next to Becky had the sheet pulled up over the face.

“When did we lose him?” Jillian pointed.

“About two hours ago.” The nurse looked over her shoulder at the body, her distress turning to compassion. “The crew hasn’t found a place to put him, and we need to tag him so his family can find him.”

Jillian’s head spun. Again. Another thing her one track mind had never even been concerned with. She had been trained to do these things. Her checklist included ‘notify family’ and ‘label patient,’ but it just didn’t spring naturally into her mind the way it had for everyone else.

The wedge that had always existed between her and society slipped a little further into the widening crack. With a nod, she checked Dr. Sorenson over for herself. Jordan slipped in beside her, remarkably steady on his feet for having just come around.

With wide eyes Jillian faced him. “It seems the longer they stay under the harder it is to pull out. At first people were waking up left and right. Then it petered off. When you woke up . . . well, no one else has since.” Her shoulders hunched in abject misery. “I’m afraid no one else will.” And I can’t tell you how glad I am that you did.

The ventilator provided a steady rhythm and forced the rise and fall of Becky’s chest while Jillian and Jordan worked silently. They ran extra fluid into her.

Becky’s heart still beat, only missing the rhythm occasionally. Mostly it was just slowing down. The powerstroke of the left ventricle had reduced to little more than a squish of fluid. The peach tones of her skin, already lacking their usual vibrance, were slipping to grays. Jillian pushed medication after medication, until Jordan's hand on her arm stilled her.

She listened to the infrequent lub-dub of Becky's heart fade to just a single sound. Her head snapped up as the ventilator gave one last hiss, then stilled. Jordan stood with his hand draped over the switches he had turned to stop the machinery. The heart monitor gave one last beep, and Jordan turned it off too, before it could go into its synthetic whine, letting everyone within earshot know its patient had died.

She felt her shirt get wet before she realized that she was crying. And threw herself at Jordan, the only remaining human being that she knew. His arms wrapped around her. "Jillian, you saved so many."

"But all I can do is watch. I can't change anything."

His hand stroked her hair, following it all the way down to the middle of her back. Her eyes squeezed against the visions in her head, and focused where she had buried her face in the front of Jordan's jacket. "I didn't save any of them."

"Yes, you did."

"Before they fell, some of the men called their friends, they told them what was coming. Told them to get inside and lie down at the first signs of nausea. They saved people all over the world." She shook her head against his chest, leaving smears of tears darkening the fabric. "Even here, so many were inside, on gurneys, lying on the ground. Some even had IVs run on each other. . . ." A hiccup forced its way up her throat, escaping in an embarrassing giveaway. "But I couldn't get them all inside . . ."

"You saved David."

Her breath let out. That she had done.

His voice flowed over her again like a wave. "I told them all to get inside - to lie down."

She sniffed. "You saved them."

"But the ones who didn't. . . well, that's what they chose. You shouldn't feel guilty about that."

She hadn't saved anyone, really.

She chewed at her lower lip, still not looking up at him. Taking deep breaths, she fought the feeling of being out of control. Something that she hadn't known was so very frightening until just this moment when she admitted it.

And her brain started ticking. Fifty three hours she had been awake. And slept only six. In small shifts, too. She'd eaten only five small meals in that time. Thank God for the IV she had worn up until this morning.

No wonder she was so tired. The world had slipped away, and she was powerless against the changes that had come . . . that were still coming.

So she wasn't surprised to realize that Jordan was carrying her out of the tent, even though she didn't know when she had passed from standing on her own feet to having her weight entirely borne by him. As she looked over his shoulder she saw the curly haired nurse tug at the sheet to Becky Sorenson's bed, and pull it up over her face.

Jillian squeezed her eyes to block the image, but it followed her.

As if in reaction to the unwanted sight, she felt her brain just shut off.

She had been trying to wake up for a long time. Maybe two or three hours. It wasn't her usual sleep. She heard sounds around her. Another person, several maybe.

And the thread snapped - the one that had held her back from consciousness. Even though her eyes wouldn't obey and open, and her fingers wouldn't quite respond to her commands. She was finally truly alert. Inside her own body.

The person next to her spoke in deep tones, but not to her. "How are you feeling?"

"Ehhh." Just a moan from the second voice - whoever the first person was talking to.

"We're glad to see you're awake." Becky could sense or smell the man. She knew that he had shifted, that he was looking down at her. "From this twitching, it looks like your friend will wake up here really soon, too."

Becky tried again to make her fingers move, her toes flex, her eyelids spring open. None of it worked as she intended. But she must have accomplished something, because smooth warm fingers glided into place, holding her hand. The deep voice spoke again. "I know you're coming around. Just relax, it'll come. I remember."

She breathed deeply, then fought pain as sharp light penetrated her vision. Her face pulled tight to counteract the intrusion.

"That's my girl." The hand continued to hold hers, to squeeze occasionally with human contact, but he spoke to the blurry voice. "Would you like some juice?"

A bell rang, and reverberated around her skull. "Aauuuhhh."

She was shocked that the sound had been her own voice.

Another voice joined in, "What can I bring?"

"Juice. Several cups."

"Are these the last of them?"

She felt the vibrations of his body movement through his hand. He had nodded. "Probably."

Becky worked her mouth, the feeling of age-old cotton making her wish she was still under. "Mmmhlllhh."

"Dr. Sorenson, can you squeeze my hand?" The voice was close, she could feel his heat and detect that he was blocking part of the light that was causing her so much pain. She pushed aside the smell of the onions he had eaten recently.

She thought about squeezing. She could feel his fingers, but was unsure if she had actually accomplished the motion until he spoke. "All right, then." Pause. She waited for him to flip up her eyelids and shine a penlight in them. But he didn't. "Can you say your name?"

"Becky." It croaked out of her mouth like frogs escaping flashlights in the night.

"Perfect."

It had been far from it, she knew. Maybe the man was a dentist - that's how he could understand what surely was nothing more than a mumble.

"What are you giggling about?" His voice shook revealing that he, too, was laughing.

"You understand me."

He smiled. A kind, round face, with uneven teeth, and brown eyes.

She blinked slowly, immediately blurring her vision.

"If I sit you up will you drink this for me?"

The cup he held up looked like . . . urine.

She must have cringed. He spoke again. "It's apple juice. It's what we've got."

So she nodded. Her neck releasing loud moose noises within her skull as she moved it.

"I'm Jack. Your RN." He didn't hold out his hand, and Becky figured they'd already done their handshake. In efficient movements she was sitting, the gurney creaking louder than her own bones, and he had pushed her hands around the cup, helping her bring it to her lips.

Heaven.

She hadn't believed apple juice could be so good. She'd hated it since her mother had poured it down her throat day after day as a kid. But now . . . now it was sweet and clear and took her home.

To the living room with the old couches. The wear on the front carpet leading a path out the front door and continuing onto the paint and down the porch steps. The sagging split rail fence that greeted a person as they entered the yard, and asked them to return when they left.

Why had she memorized it so intently when she was there last?

Sitting bolt upright, Becky whacked her head on something.

No.

That wasn't right. Sitting had simply caused a headache the proportions of which matched a good whack upside the head. "My family!"

Did they know about her?

Becky knew the Nevada site had been under for four days before people started waking up. Were they worried about her?

The voice interrupted her worrying. "The lists are coming in as we find things out."

"Lists?" The light was still too bright and she shielded her face from it.

"Survivors. Who's passed."

Looking at her expression, the RN continued with his explanation, "The reversal hit everyone, right after it hit here. It was a few hours behind in some places, in others a whole day. But pretty much everywhere is waking up now."

Becky inhaled. Pretty much everyone was waking up. "So the lists of the dead are short?"

His kind smile faltered. "No."

"What?" How could that be? Nevada had lost some, but . . .

"We've lost over half."

"What?!" Again the pain of a baseball bat hitting her head. "Ahhhhh." She leaned herself back, squeezing her eyes against the light and the fire of tears. Again she said the two most important words. "My family?"

"I'll bring you the books."

Books? They had been 'lists' but now they were 'books'?

He squeezed her hand again, this time in sympathy and not as a medical check. And then Jack disappeared out the tent door into the bright world beyond.

When she opened her eyes, Becky found her tent mate staring at her in deep sympathy. She tried to change the subject from her tears. "Do you know what day it is?"

"It's Tuesday . . . I'd like to look at the lists, too. I have family all around here. Aunts, uncles, cousins. I already know my friend, Peter Wilson, he was a tech, didn't make it." Tears welled in his own eyes, and he showed no manly concern about hiding them from her, a total stranger. "He ran my IV for me, and made me get in and lie down." She saw and heard the intake of air, "He saved me."

But her sympathy was running low. Still she gave it her best shot, even though to her own ears it sounded hollow and vague. "Then he accomplished what he wanted, I'm sure. We're all going to lose someone in this."

Her words only served to wind herself up tighter. To make the outer edges of the world go fuzzy. Her family wasn't small. If they'd lost just over half . . .

She didn't want to think about it. So she checked out her IV, noted that vitamins had been added. Just when she had forced her breathing back to a shallow imitation of normal, Jack sauntered in carry reams of printed pages.

Becky sat herself upright. Ignoring the pounding in her head, she held her hands out. But Jack wouldn't give it to her, "Now, what city do you need?"

"Knoxville." Jack started to hand her the blue covered book.

But Becky remembered. She had sent them to Aaron. "No! Charlotte!"

"North Carolina?"

She nodded frantically, barely able to wait while Jack thumbed through the books looking for that county. "They were visiting, so that's where they'd be listed, right?" Right?

"Your guess is as good as mine." But with two hands he held out a gray bound volume, green and white striped computer paper was compiled and clipped inside, looking like an ancient corporate budget.

She set it carefully across her lap, barely registering that the man in the next bed had asked to see the local book. Lifting the front cover she saw only the word LIVING at the top of the page, and immediately with no fanfare it listed names, social security numbers and addresses on some. A few were just descriptions. In the order they'd been found. No real rhyme or reason.

Names sounded familiar to her, but not familiar enough to pause and think back. She was searching frantically for her family. She found her father. Her breath escaping. She had one.

Three pages later she found Brandon. Both listed at Aaron's address.

Twenty pages later she had found no one else. Just a half unfinished page, and the top of the next page reading DECEASED, as casually as LIVING had been labeled at the top of the first page.

Breath held, Becky read on. She knew what she would find. Her mother, her brother Aaron, and baby Mel. But she had to know for certain.

She found her brother on the second deceased page. Melanie was less than half a page later. Becky felt her lower lip curl, her teeth biting into it in a rabid attempt to stop the tears even if she couldn't stop the knife cutting through her heart.

She blinked it away, telling herself she would let go when she found her mother.

But nineteen pages later she still hadn't.

Jack had stood by patiently, helping Wilson, as his name seemed to be, locate people he knew.

She interrupted, not caring about the manners her mother had drilled into her. Not when she didn't know where her mother was. "What about the people not listed? In either place?"

Jack shook his head. "It usually means they're unknown. Not found. Still comatose." He shrugged. "Like we just put the word out on you two, and a couple others from the past hour. But there's still a good handful of people here who haven't either come around nor given up the ghost yet." He shrugged again, looking like the whole world had gone crazy and he just wanted to be a nurse. Well, Becky thought wryly, the world is now populated with patients. "Other towns fell after us, so they're coming around later as well. They have even more undecideds."

Undecideds?

That was what you were in college if you didn't know your major. It seemed a remarkably callous label for people who had not yet died.

Her mother was 'undecided'. "When do we find out about them?" She couldn't lose her mother.

“We’re getting wires and phone calls and faxes all the time. If you want to give a few names the hub will keep an eye out for them. I think there’s a form to fill out. Would you like one?”

A form to fill out?

But Becky held it together enough to nod.

Jack swept away the juice cups and de-cluttered the tiny tent in efficient motions as he made his way off to retrieve the offensive forms. But Becky stopped him short. “Do you have the local lists?”

She had to do something to keep from breaking down. She couldn’t turn into Jell-o now. She forced herself to breathe deeply and evenly. She chewed her lips. And graciously accepted the green bound forms.

She found no one on the LIVING list. A few techs, a few nurses. But of the small handful she really knew, there were no names.

The DECEASED list held just as much mystery as answers. Only two names were on the list. Early on, Leon Peppersmith. His even had an asterisk by it. The small star took her to the ends of the row where it was listed: **blow to the head*. She had to flip back to the first page to discover that the notation meant he had died of something other than the reversal.

Blow to the head.

Had he fallen while he carried her? What? God forbid, murdered?

Becky shuddered, and shoved it out of her mind. There wasn’t a damn thing she could accomplish from this hospital bed.

Jillian Brookwood and David Carter II were missing. But on a fresh page, labeled DECEASED and obviously quite recently added, were ten names. Dr. Jordan Abellard appeared near the end.

• • • •

JORDAN HAULED JILLIAN back to their tent, her weight getting heavier every minute. He’d barely come out of a coma himself. But he wasn’t about to complain, everyone was making superhuman efforts. Trying to keep as many alive as possible didn’t allow for relaxation and recuperation. Unless you were Doctor David Carter the second.

The geologist sat propped up on the gurney that Jordan had initially put Jillian on several days earlier, toying with his IV and drinking a soda. Jordan resisted the urge to tell him that both actions were bad for his health. But then again, if you were willing to pitch yourself down the stairs to get out of helping, then Jordan didn’t have a real vested interest in making things rosy.

He pressed his lips together, forcing the thought aside. David certainly hadn’t thrown himself down the stairs. The man was no idiot. It was just circumstance. So he forced a smile. “Hi David. Are you feeling better?”

Dr. Carter nodded, then motioned with his chin – probably everything else hurt – to Jillian lying limp in Jordan’s arms. “Is she okay?”

Again a nod was sufficient. Jordan spoke coolly as he arranged her on the bed he had vacated only hours before. “She’s either sound asleep or passed out. Too much work in too little time with too little to eat.”

“So what will you do?”

Jordan shrugged. “Let her sleep. Maybe run an IV if it looks like she’s dehydrated.” Out of habit and the necessity to do something, he checked all her vital signs. Of course they all checked out. Jillian probably wouldn’t suffer her pulse or blood pressure to be anything less than textbook. He asked David if there was anything he needed. Without coming right out and saying that quiet was necessary for Jillian to sleep, he suggested reading materials, or a headset.

But David shook his head, and rolled away, making like sleep wasn't far off the horizon for him either, and Jordan was grateful for that small thing. He closed the flaps to the tent, hoping to create a false darkness in the room, but only succeeding in marginally dimming it. The tent leaked sunlight like a sieve.

He considered letting himself back out, thinking he should go and be useful. But David's chest was already rising and falling in steady cadence. And just the short time watching the two of them sleep was enough to lull Jordan into a chair. Painfully uncomfortable, he leaned back, lolled his head to one side until it contacted the pole of the tent.

He watched Jillian lie still on the gurney for . . .

Well he wasn't sure. Only that he dreamed Landerly had shown up and was shaking his shoulder.

Then the tent pole thunked his head as Landerly tried a little harder.

With a purposeful wrenching of his eyes, Jordan got them open to see that Dr. Landerly was, in fact, standing beside him, a cane clutched in his hand. As Jordan looked, he became more convinced that he had woken within his sleep state.

The left side of the older doctor's face had a bit of slack to it. His left arm seemed a little less rigid than usual. But Landerly looked just as formidable as ever. And now in his right hand he grasped the cane, either as a walking implement or a weapon. Jordan had no doubts that Landerly would never use the cane on anyone. He could simply point out faults and weaknesses until you admitted you were lower than worms, and begged to be beaten instead of fired. "Sir?"

The dream vision answered back. "Abellard. Good to see you awake. How long has our girl been under?"

He looked at his watch. 5pm. It was getting dusky outside and that translated to a portion of the dark he had strived for inside the tent. "Five hours. I figure she has another ten before she even begins to catch up on what she's missing."

"What the hell are you talking about?" Landerly lifted the cane from the ground as he gestured.

Jordan sniffed away the last clinging vines of sleep and told Landerly. "I think she only slept about six hours over more than two days." He sighed. "And about worked herself to death."

"You've been asleep."

It was just a statement. But from Landerly's mouth it was a bit more of an accusation. Why wasn't Jillian awake to talk to the boss? The two of them would be laughing like old pals in a heartbeat. But no, he got Landerly all to himself. He decided if things got tough, he'd just sic David on the old man. He nodded his acquiescence - yes, he'd been sleeping, God forbid.

Landerly leaned down. "She's not asleep."

"What?"

"She's comatose." Landerly walked over to her and lifted her hand. She showed no response, neither to the invasion of another person moving her limbs, nor to the drop her arm endured flaccidly back to the mattress when Landerly let it go. "I checked her. She's showing nothing."

Jordan was on his feet and wide awake. But this time he was desperately trying to talk himself into the fact that it was a dream. "She was asleep when I brought her in here." He paused, thinking back. "She almost passed out, but she showed movement. She murmured or something . . ."

"Well, not now." Jordan heard Landerly drop himself into the chair he had just vacated. But he kept his back turned. He blinked. He breathed deeply. Did everything he could think of to wake himself up from this. He did everything he could think of to wake Jillian up.

But she didn't rouse. Not to pressure or pain. Not to her name or his. And he realized that she hadn't moved from where he had laid her when he brought her in.

Through tightly clenched teeth, he turned back to Landerly and asked, “Well, what do we do now?”

But he saw his anger was misplaced. Landerly’s cane sat off to one side, his head rested in his right hand, and that elbow rested on the arm of the chair, as though the effort to hold any part of him upright was just too much.

Jordan didn’t ask. He suspected that Landerly’s own coma hadn’t been too kind to him. He hadn’t been sure the old man would make it out. Especially when, with the final sweep of the reversal, so many young, vibrant, and perfectly healthy people were succumbing.

But the poles had swapped. David had predicted it and, as usual, he’d been right. Everyone had fallen under for at least some period of time. The world had lost billions as best he could figure. The whole population reduced by slightly more than half.

No more China’s Only Child Policy. Property values would be reasonable again in New York and LA. There was clean-up to do - everywhere. The earth was shattered as far as he was concerned. And fallout was going to last for decades, minimum. At no point in his memory could he pinpoint a worldwide disaster like this since the dinosaurs had died out.

But at least, he had thought, they were finished.

Now was the time to pick themselves up and move on.

But Jillian. . .

How was she under again?

What the hell did she have?

He threw all these questions at Landerly and then some. But Landerly shrugged, said he didn’t know.

Jordan shook her again. But, of course, there was no response.

His eyes blazed holes in the top of Landerly’s head, the only part the old man was showing. “How the hell are we supposed to figure this out? She’s the brains of this operation!” He gestured back at the prone form in her blue scrubs.

That, at least, made Landerly look up at him. Finally some strength in his eyes. “This took my wife and daughter away from me. . . . and I don’t mean to sound horribly trite and cliché, but I did spend too much time at the office. And I do regret it.” He stood to his full height, able to look down on Jordan if only by half an inch. “But I will not let you tell me that we’re useless without her. You and I have more brains in our heads than ninety-nine-point-nine percent of the population, and we are trained for this. So let’s get a move on.”

He began walking out of the tent. “Draw her blood and meet me in the lab. We have profiles to review and phone calls to make.”

• • • •

HER EYES HURT. HER fingers twitched randomly. And there didn’t seem to be anything she could do about it. With effort Jillian pried her eyes open. The tent top came into view again along with a weird sort of déjà vu.

She remembered she had practically passed out after Becky had died. And Jordan carried her back and laid her on the gurney.

She looked around, the dim light in the tent telling of evening.

But something was wrong.

It took her a moment to place it.

She'd been moved. The gurney where Jordan had laid her down, the last thing she remembered, was at a ninety degree angle to the one she was on. She could see that it was vacant when she bent her neck back and looked. The empty bed was military sharp, the sheets drawn up quarter-bounce tight.

She breathed in, thinking that she felt well rested. And wondered why they had left her alone. Well, I needed sleep, that's for sure. But it had only been about five hours according to her watch.

Or . . . twenty-nine hours.

That was a distinct possibility. That would explain the well-rested feeling. Much better than five hours.

David!

She was in his bed. So where was he? And why hadn't she woken up when they moved her?

With an audible groan and severe pressure in her head, she swung her legs over the side. Stopping there to take a rest and wait for the little man with the ball-peen hammer in her head to stop whacking her, she squeezed her eyes. And heard the muscles move in what sounded like a mid-pitch thunder roll.

She must have sat there for about five minutes by her musing. Brain churning despite the pain.

Twenty-nine hours. Definitely.

That was the only explanation for her muscles feeling so unused. She forced her breathing to deepen, her ribs feeling the stretch again.

A normal life would be so appreciated. Waking up in her apartment. Going in to work to fill out forms about botulism. Or salmonella. Maybe a pet dog to keep her company. Or a cat.

With sadness she wondered if both species still existed. That was a bizarre thought. A world without cats. Mushu. A portrait of her beloved childhood kitty, the first and only fuzzy pet she'd ever had, popped into her head.

She pushed off from the gurney, landing on shaky legs and, using the bed frame, stabilized herself. Another minute. Time to walk.

Just then she heard a voice. Her reaction time being slow, she was barely able to shield her eyes as the tent flap was thrown in. Because she was facing west, the sunset poured through the open side, illuminating the silhouette of a woman holding back the heavy fabric.

"Oh my God, Doctor Brookwood! You're up!"

"Of course I'm up." Why wouldn't she be? Again something niggled at the back of her brain. She knew that voice.

As the woman approached into the darker portions of the tent, she developed eyes and features. Lucy. Jillian sniffed. She blinked. Hadn't Lucy died? Well, whoever was keeping the records had done a crappy job. She wondered who else was mis-recorded. Her own family. Jordan's. She shuddered.

"Is something wrong?" Lucy tilted her head as if trying to see her more clearly.

"No. It's nothing." But Jillian wondered. She held her tongue, figuring Lucy wouldn't want to know she'd made the 'dead' list. Or maybe she would. "It's just . . . I thought I saw your name on the 'deceased' list. You might want to call your family."

Lucy raised her eyebrows disbelievingly, and turned to a physician who was standing right beside her. The young man shrugged and Lucy turned back to Jillian. "Dr. Brookwood, I'll check that right out. But if you'll just sit back, Dr. Lee will take all your vital signs."

"Vital signs?" Jillian almost laughed. "Wow. Are y'all getting paranoid?" But she knew what it was like to have a non-compliant patient, so she shrugged out of the left sleeve of her jacket, being careful not to drag the cuff along the IV insertion site on the back of her hand. But she didn't even scrape it, just continued to question the doctor.

Her first thought was that he was very intent on listening to her pulse as he took her BP. He didn't even make eye contact. As though he had never done this before. Her second thought was that he was young. Which was disturbing, because she was considered young to be a practicing physician.

He stood upright and nodded at her. "It's all textbook."

She smiled, feeling a little condescending, even though she wished it would go away. "I'm always 120 over 80." He wrote in her chart, having had it thrust out to him by Lucy. And Jillian startled. She hadn't remembered to pull a single chart this whole time. It was the right protocol but it hadn't even crossed her mind. And clearly the record keeping was getting screwed up if Lucy Whitman had made the 'dead' list.

But she shook it off. "What's with the complete set of vitals after a nap? Did it concern you that I slept so long?"

"Well, it was a long nap." Lucy looked at her young physician in some side glance that Jillian couldn't decipher. But she didn't want to. She hadn't ever been able to make hide nor hair of Lucy. So she let it be.

She started out of the tent. "I'm going to go now." She had to find Jordan, and David. And the more she thought about it, they needed to be in charge of notifying Becky Sorenson's family, whichever of them had survived. And Leon Peppersmith's, too. She'd let the person in charge handle the rest. But she felt she owed it to those two families. And she knew Jordan would agree. But as she passed the front entry of the tent the young doctor's hand shot out and grabbed her upper arm. The grip wasn't harsh, but she also wasn't going to go anywhere until he decided to release her.

And that pissed her off. Trying to stay as level-headed as she could, she ground the words out between her teeth. "Would you mind explaining to me why you're restraining me?"

She felt the heat flare under her skin as he had the balls to look sheepish. "Oh, I'm not restraining you, doctor."

"Then remove your hand."

He did, but stepped in front of her. And just as she was about to yell at him, he spoke. Again sounding trite. "I just think it's important that you understand that you just woke from the coma that you saw so many patients go into."

Her muscles relaxed. "Well now, there's the problem. I was actually out of this coma before any of you were. I woke up first." She continued even though they were clearly questioning her. Sharing furtive looks as if she were a child. "I went back to sleep because I was exhausted. I had spent so much time hauling people inside and checking them out that I practically passed out."

She could see that they didn't believe her, but she had really ceased to care. They had been busy sleeping their time away, while she had worked herself to the bone. Then the little smartass in the white jacket tried again to stop her from leaving the tent. "Dr. Brookwood . . ."

"Dr. . . ." She read the name on the front of his jacket, since she had forgotten it precisely the moment after Lucy had told her. "Lee." She'd had enough. "I'm leaving."

"I don't think that's wise."

Her teeth clenched again. As if it wasn't bad enough that the world had dropped dead one by one around her. That Landerly was threatening to name the damn thing after them. This little . . . whatever he was, was trying to restrain her. "I understand that you don't think that. I don't care."

"As your physician-"

She didn't let him get any further than that. "You aren't my physician. You'll do well to remember that I am a physician."

He opened his mouth and she didn't let him start, just gave him something to chew on. "I am also your superior."

With that he huffed out his breath and turned to Lucy Whitman. "Well, I guess we've done what we can."

"All right then." Lucy handed him the chart. "We did the right thing. If she won't listen then that's her own fault." The two of them strolled out of the tent looking like old chums. Like there hadn't been a fully charged atmosphere just a second before.

But Jillian took it as a breath of relief. The air was clear now. They were gone.

And, as usual since this whole thing had started, she had plenty to do.

She had to find Jordan, and see where he had moved David. And . . .

Jillian blinked.

She had just realized that she never found out what had happened to Dr. Landerly.

Her chest constricted a little at the thought that he was probably gone. She'd seen his labs, and he had all the hallmarks of the ones who had failed early.

• • • •

DAVID'S STARE HAD GONE blank.

Jordan had witnessed the blow to pride the man had taken just to ask for morphine, and he had happily pushed the drug into David's IV. It took only a second away from the paperwork that he was pouring over with Landerly. And for a moment it took his mind off Jillian.

It was all insane.

Jillian and David had seemed immune. But she had slipped back under - for no apparent reason. Why hadn't David gone back under? It had to have something to do with the pattern of exposure. Jordan's hands clicked through the rhythms of capping the needle and flicking it into the sharps container while his brain wandered through problems.

He had identical exposure to Jilly, up to a point. When he had gone to Lake James he had continued going in and out of the weaker bubbles. Jillian and David had stayed in Nevada, and had wandered into the path of that sweep - which felled everyone in its path, healthy, old, young. And now they were showing different symptoms than everyone else.

His theory was Swiss cheese it had so many holes. The problem was that they weren't just different now - they had been different even as far back as Nevada. When that reversal had swept, Jillian and David had walked out. And the way Jilly had told it, they had stood within the bubble and watched others walk in and fall at their feet. So they had to have been mutated, or different, before that.

If only Jillian would wake up and tie the loose ends.

Landerly hadn't come into the tent to check on her. The old man was too much like Jillian. If it was scientifically interesting he would be able to stand for hours and watch a patient breathe. After about two minutes of that he would be able to point out that every seventh breath was some micro-seconds shorter than the others and why that was significant. Then he'd check the chart for the patient's name. But if there was nothing new about this patient, someone else could make the effort.

So Jordan had called his father, leaving Landerly alone with the reams of lists. Glad to hear Jackson's voice, and no longer startled by the fact that his Dad would cry over the phone. Jordan didn't know what had connected them again, finally, but he wasn't about fight it or hinder it in any way.

Now he watched as David passed through the initial phases of morphine intoxication. David's musculature relaxed, his face no longer quite so tense. The glazed look wasn't uncommon either. But David hadn't been really talkative since they had brought Jillian back in.

When Jordan explained that she was under again, Carter had wrenched himself around trying to get a look at her, even though she was directly behind his head, and the shoulder harness prevented him from doing anything of the sort.

What Jordan hadn't been able to get the geologist to say what he was feeling. Jordan had two good guesses. The first was that he was actually concerned for Jillian, which normally Jordan would have dismissed. But Dr. Carter seemed to have developed an attraction to the little dark spitfire and Jordan certainly couldn't fault that. The second option was that he and Jillian had gone step by step together. Immune in Nevada. Falling under here just after everyone else. Waking early. It was a logical progression that David was watching her to see what was coming next, if he might fall back under as well.

But he just stared at the white walls of the tent. He said he was writing his paper in his head while he waited for his laptop. Someone had confiscated it for medical use, while he'd been recuperating from his fall, and the staff had yet to locate it. David wasn't happy about that either. His theories were floating out there in the ether, he had said.

Jordan watched while David sank into a peaceful slumber, then woke the man, just for a second. Just to be sure.

Then he steeled himself, knowing he had no more cause to avoid Landerly, which he knew in his heart of hearts was exactly what he was doing. And he marched himself right back into the records tent.

Landerly didn't look up, or acknowledge his return in any way other than to begin speaking. Jordan briefly wondered if Landerly had simply continued the conversation all along, not even realizing he was gone. He suppressed the smile that fought to be free and tried to pay attention.

"We don't have an age bias. Or a race bias. Nor seemingly a continental bias."

"Why 'seemingly'?" Jordan seated himself and picked up one of the tomes.

"Many continents aren't fully reporting - like Africa. There's an interesting case. With their numbers of AIDS infected I'm curious how they'll fare. But they're barely reporting at all. The towns that are look like they match our numbers here and Europe."

"What about India?"

"Same. Their reporting is better, but not great." He removed his glasses, aging himself ten years in the process, and rubbed at his eyes. But his voice continued. "There's some issue with the Australian Outback as well. There are a lot of people, some aboriginal, that may never have been accounted for. And we don't know what happened to them."

Jordan thought for a minute. They had been frantically writing everything down as they thought of it and discounted it. Although he hadn't been sure what it mattered until Jillian had slipped back under. But now there was a goal - they had to see if there was any way to pull her out. And help anyone who went back under like her.

"What about gender bias?"

"What?" Dr. Landerly had already engrossed himself in the next long list, jotting on it in slashes of pencil, with no regard for the fact that the book would be looked over by anyone with family in that area. That they might not want to see Landerly's number counting or comments on age and race in their family member's margins.

Jordan spoke, knowing he was rehashing, but thinking that it might trigger something important. "The women went under first, pretty much everywhere. So this thing does have some sort of gender distinction. The only person who's slipped back under is female."

"HmMMMM." He flipped through several pages. "I haven't seen it in the survival rates."

Jordan just set down his pencil and began flipping pages looking for anything unusual. But after several hours his butt hurt. He hadn't found anything that stood out. And he needed to check on David.

And Jillian.

Without a word, he got up and walked out. He couldn't go into the tent though. And without even a hesitation stalked past, going through the dark of night, under glaring overhead field lights creating enough light between the tents to see by. Stepping carefully on the cold dark grass, he made his way into the now functioning cafeteria and got himself a soda. Which he'd gotten hooked on again after having practically given them up when he graduated med school. Oh well. He wasn't dead. He'd survived a disease worse than the plague. What was a soda going to do him really?

With his soda in hand, he forced himself back to the tent that Jillian and David shared. Afraid of what he would find when he checked Jillian, he tried to rouse David first. And had no success.

Tamping down the frisson of fear that escaped up through his senses, he set down the drink and went about it the right way. But he got no response. "David!" He tapped on the man. Pinched him. Yelled again.

Nothing. The geologist didn't even sputter when Jordan yanked up his eyelids and shone his penlight directly in. Damn the man.

"Landerly!" He used all his lungpower. "Somebody get me Dr. Landerly from the records tent!"

A tech popped his face in and asked Jordan to repeat the instruction. Jordan thanked him and went through with the rest of a vital signs check. After he'd been through everything he knew to do, twice, he gave up and turned to Jillian. Landerly walked in just as Jordan finished taking her vitals.

"Landerly." He heard the shaking in his voice, and there wasn't much he could do about it. "Her respirations are at sixteen."

"So? That's within normal."

He shook his head. "Jillian's always textbook. She's always eighteen. Right when she went under the first time and this time, too. When she's asleep . . . she's eighteen."

Landerly cocked his head.

But Jordan kept going. "She's slipping."

With her lower lip between her teeth, Jillian walked out into the dark beyond her tent. People scuttled here and there, each seemingly with a purpose. Many of them held charts, and most of the tents were lit like Jack-o-lanterns, a soft glow perfusing through the canvas and pouring blindingly out of the openings. In one of the open tents doctors in white coats were passing papers around in a lively debate while a mechanic in the background took a wrench to one of the UV-and-visible-light machines. It looked like a Christmas card for the scientific community.

It was organized. Purposeful.

What a difference a day could make.

Jillian took a deep breath and found her own purpose. She was starving. All the family notifications could wait, but she'd pass right back out if she didn't eat something. With determination, she headed toward the building, passing square white tents, the flaps ruffling in the breeze, and she pulled her jacket a little tighter.

With luck, she'd find Jordan in the cafeteria. Maybe even David - if she'd been asleep for twenty-seven hours and woke up in his bed then his hip must have been well enough to get into a wheelchair. He could be anywhere, as long as he had someone to keep an eye on him. She figured he'd be downgraded from morphine to Percocet by now.

And if they weren't there, then at least someone she knew would be. Throwing open the door she was assaulted by the smells of cheap Italian food. The pasta wouldn't be quite al dente, and the sauce would be thin. And the bread would be steamy, meaning not crusty.

And it would be heavenly.

She followed her nose, not even bothering to look around for anyone she knew. If they wanted her, they would have to yell. Loud.

She grabbed a thick Corian tray and piled it high with food as she moved down the line. The bread was in her mouth before she even began ladling up soggy looking green beans.

But in minutes she was sitting alone at a table, methodically moving the fork from plate to mouth, eating as fast as she could, breathing deeply and inhaling the smells until she had finished every bite.

After sitting for a moment, she hauled herself up and stacked her tray on top of the trashcan as she exited into the cold night air. The sky had gone from trailing reds, that she remembered as fact and not as feeling, to dark navy set with bright stars.

For the first time in her life it gave a deep feeling of belonging, of being a tiny part of something else. Jillian stood silently. Digesting. Breathing. Staring. Wondering if the world would shift again beneath her feet. If she'd get sick, pass out, fall under again. But she was fairly confident that it would stay steady now. That her deep inhales wouldn't draw in anything dangerous.

It was all broken by the revving of an engine as the car pulled into the drop-off lane, reminding her that they had hijacked a high-school.

Her brows pulled together.

If the car was pulling up, that meant it had been somewhere, even if it was just around town.

The reports told that the whole world had switched. That everyone had gone under and either woken up or died. But that meant as soon as they cleared things up here, they could go home.

Suddenly the air wasn't so inviting. She didn't feel so safe.

She longed for the streets of Atlanta. Not even Signal Mountain where she'd grown up. Georgia was the home she had chosen. She could go back to her job, maybe even get in a few days of nine-to-five, write some reports. Jillian snorted to herself, likely she would spend the rest of her career writing this report.

Turning away from the parking lot, she heard another car turning over and pulling out, more evidence of freedom seeping in through the closed gates of the city. She headed back into the tents to find Jordan and David. A smile played across her lips. At least David wouldn't be able to move very fast, and that ought to make it easier to catch up to him.

In her own tent again, she was shocked to see that all evidence of Jordan was gone. Jillian frowned before realizing that he had probably moved back upstairs.

Without thought, she turned and pounded her way up the four flights. Thinking that signs of David had been removed from the tent, too, and he certainly wouldn't have moved back up stairs he couldn't climb. But she continued. Empty of life and sound, the dim hallways were lit only at every fourth fluorescent, to give you a way to see, but saving energy as well.

Jillian started to laugh out loud at that, but stopped herself when she heard the noise start a macabre echo down the length of the hallway. Energy conservation would be a whole different ballgame with less than half of last week's occupants now on earth.

Reaching the top, she saw that the room signs, the plain hand-printed taped-up notes, had all been pulled down. But she found 204, and turned the knob.

The room was lit only by the light peeking in from the hallway, and that was low at best. She flipped the switch, squinting against the instantaneous full glare. And blinking at the . . . lack . . . of everything.

The cots were stacked in the corner. No duffles or briefcases were anywhere. The maps, where Jordan had plotted the growth of the bubbles and the sites where people had gone under, were gone. As well as the flow charts and the grids of lab values, all pulled from the walls and absent.

With a sigh, Jillian switched off the light, leaving the hallway a dim shade of gray as her eyes adjusted. She took off at a jog, back the way she had come. Rushing through the halls at a ground eating pace, she only slowed when she hit the tops of the stairs, thinking of David's fall. Tightly holding the railing, she forced herself to slow down, finally reaching the bottom after what felt like an eternity.

As she shoved open the double doors out onto the field of tents she was greeted by the sounds of humanity - busy people wandering in the glow of the corner floodlights, just not very many of them. The wind shifted and caught a faint odor, carried in from beyond the tent city. Her nose twitched at the decaying flesh that was more a slight burning sensation than any real odor. But then the wind must have changed direction again, and it was gone.

Making her way into the maze, she said hellos to those she recognized and those she didn't. Finally arriving at the records tent, she pushed back the canvas and startled the person inside. "Can I help you?" He sat by a bank of phones, his hands cradling a yellow legal pad filled with lists. People to call. Places to hear from. Faxes to send.

"Please." She smiled even though she was frustrated that her own search had turned up fruitless. "Where can I find Dr. Abellard and Dr. Carter?"

The man blinked. His brows drew together, but not in thought. He looked concerned. For the life of her, Jillian couldn't figure out why, and she was too tired to work at it. So she simply leveled a look at him that she wasn't going to wait very long. And he got to work. Pushed his glasses up his nose and began thumbing through a list of names and tent numbers. Damn, everyone had gotten organized while she'd been asleep.

"Dr. Carter is in tent forty-three."

“And where is that?”

He smiled again, a fake look that mean nothing but that she was being placated. “There are fifteen tents per column. Starting on the left, from the cafeteria. They number front to back and then snake back to front and so on.”

She nodded. David was near the back of the third row. “And Dr. Abellard?”

The man tilted his head. “Dr. Abellard passed away a good number of days ago. I’m surprised no one told you.”

Jillian sighed and shook her head.

For having all their charting done, and numbering the tents, they had only achieved the look of organization.

Because their lists were fucked-up.

• • • •

DAVID BIT BACK A LOW moan. He ached everywhere. They hadn’t woken him up for his Percocet. And he needed his Percocet. Every muscle protested as he moved it. Each piece of him creaked and pulled.

It was deep into night inside the tent. Even though he could tell that there was an overhead light just outside. The top of the tent gave an unearthly glow that didn’t go further than a foot or two, leaving a fog of black huddling in all the corners and thick along the grass floor.

He breathed deeply, waiting for any monsters within to jump out at him, but after a minute nothing had moved, so he went about pushing himself up on his elbows.

David tilted his head from side to side waiting for the pain to stop his movement. When it came, it was softer than he had expected, a stretching rather than tearing feeling. His head was able to turn further. He could look directly over his right shoulder. Although what that gained him he couldn’t say as the tent was nothing but dark.

He breathed again, a little deeper each time, wishing he was repelling along the side of a sheer cliff. Layers of rock and time passing up as he slid down. Each telling of a different age. A few feet of color denoting millions of years of life and death and silts. In pure silence.

Instead, he was dealing with a dry throat. So he couldn’t call out to the people who were invariably making the shuffling noises outside his tent, couldn’t ask for the medication. Unlike the morphine, it wouldn’t make him drowsy. But he would be able to sleep, pain free.

So he worked up a good breath to shout out.

But just as he started to hiss out a noise, the tent flap pulled back, allowing in light and a dark figure he recognized instantly.

“Jillian.” He croaked.

“Hey, David.” But she didn’t look up. Just scratched at the back of her hand, and turned to examine it in the light of the opening.

“What’s wrong?” Again it was barely more than a hiss with some voice behind it. But she understood.

“I just . . .” She turned back to him, then reached up and flipped on the overhead light, drowning him in the harsh glare that receded as his eyes adjusted.

After he stopped squinting he saw that she was holding the back of her hand up to him for inspection. But he didn’t see anything. And he shook his head at her. He wasn’t a damn doctor so he didn’t know what the hell she wanted him to see.

“No mark.” She stated the obvious. “There should be a mark.”

“Because?”

“Because I wore an IV for four days! It just came out yesterday. But it’s gone! There’s not even tape residue, that’s the weird thing.”

“Bully for you.” He laid his head back down and found some air. “Can you get me a-”

“Your leg!” She practically screamed, like she had completely lost it. He was getting ready to say so when she yelled it again. “Your leg!”

So he looked, to see the black widow or rattlesnake that was going to end it all.

He’d be grateful if the death went quickly.

But there was nothing there.

Ah, good to know I’ve discovered the final phase. Utter insanity.

Jillian still stared, and he sighed. She wasn’t going to listen about the Percocet.

Her voice was tinny, and frightened sounding. “Where’s your cast? I worked really hard putting that thing on you! And your shoulder sling?” Her hands were on him, testing him for injuries and her face was frowning. Not at all the image he had harbored of Jillian feeling him up.

But he looked, and the cast was gone.

With a sharp frown he bent the leg.

“No! Don’t re-injure it!” She grabbed for him, trying to stop him, but wasn’t fast enough.

His leg bent - and it didn’t feel that bad.

So he shrugged. “You must be really good, Doc.” He smiled. “Someone must have taken it off. Do you think you can get me a-”

“They wouldn’t take it off while you sleep! That’s medically contraindicated.” She started to walk a tight circle. Thinking and worrying a trail into the grass beneath her feet.

What it seemed was that Jillian was contraindicated with his getting his damned Percocet.

“Where are your x-rays?” Her hands flew across the practically spotless countertop. “Are they in the other tent? When did they move you?”

“I don’t know.” Juice. Juice would be good, too. Or maybe some liquor. Hysterical woman always went down smoother with a good Jack and Coke.

Jillian planted her fists on her hips and her glare on his face. “How did you not wake up when they moved you? Or cut off your cast?”

Like he would know! He shrugged. “The morphine?”

“We didn’t give you that much!” She turned away from him, taking her scrunched up face and his hopes of getting a Percocet. She stepped just outside the tent and grabbed the next tech she could find.

He heard her ask about his x-rays before he decided to close his eyes and wait it out. There were some raised voices, akin to yelling, but not quite a fight. It was clear that Jillian disagreed with the tech and the tech was a bit afraid of the angry doc. Then again, Jillian wasn’t just any doctor. She had found this thing. She was hot shit in her little blue scrubs and ponytail, seeming no older than twenty until she opened that way-too-intelligent little mouth of hers.

David smiled. It was a hot little mouth, and oh, what it would do to him-

“David! Tell him you fell down the steps!”

Good, just the thing he wanted to rehash. Maybe she’d ask him to tell about the time his Grandfather had walked in on him masturbating, too. That’d be some nice icing on the humiliation cake. So he closed his eyes and mumbled to the tech. “I fell down the steps.”

“No you didn’t.”

David blinked. And stared at the kid. The little prick sounded awfully sure of himself. “Yes, I did. When I walked down. I broke my leg and bruised my ribs.”

The tech laughed then, as though he had finally caught on to the joke. “Must have been a bad dream then.”

Jillian’s mouth hung open for a second. And the tech turned to leave, his white jacket puffing a little in the night breeze. “Wait!”

He turned back, a question in his eyes.

“Bring the portable x-ray, please. I need films on him.”

David sighed. Then he popped up. “And Percocet!”

But the tech had already cleared the open space of the tent flap, and Jillian was worrying her circle in the grass again. Son of a bitch.

• • • •

BECKY PUSHED HERSELF off the gurney. She’d fallen back asleep almost instantly. Even as she had been sucked under into dreams she had wondered how a person got so tired in a coma.

But she’d woken back up. The covers mussed and tangled around her. Sleep had been a light wrap that had been easy to throw off this time. And she yawned and stretched and faced a new day.

For a brief moment.

Until she remembered that she had lost Aaron. And Baby Mel.

And maybe her mother had been moved from the ‘undecided’ list. Either woken up, or died. The heaviness wrapped and suffocated, but Becky shrugged it off. There was nothing she could do. And this wasn’t her personal tragedy, either. It was everyone’s. She had to go out and help. And maybe that would help her, too.

She leaned out and worked the safety rails. Popping the side down and slipping onto the ground, testing out legs that were barely sturdy enough to stand on. But that made sense.

After a moment she stabilized herself. When the world stopped swirling around her, she cursed her fuzzy mouth. She’d sell her soul for a toothbrush. With a languid blink she realized that she didn’t have to.

Her duffle was stuffed under the gurney, all things organized and neat. So she squatted down and rifled through the bag until her fingers brushed against heavy steel. Closing around the barrel, Becky brought the gun out of its hiding place. Clearly no one had searched her bag. With raised eyebrows she rummaged, and triumphantly held up her overnight pack.

A few minutes later she dried and repacked her face soap and toothbrush. For a moment she fingered the bottle of sunscreen, then thought that one day’s exposure wouldn’t kill her. She needed the feel of pure sunshine on her face.

She needed to walk.

To get away.

She’d have research to do for the rest of her days, trying to prove or disprove what had happened to various species and why. There’d be a whole new field - ‘Post pole-reversal biology’. So, for now, she didn’t need to do much. It would still be there tomorrow. Right?

But she didn’t much care.

There was a civic-center across the street. She could walk over, and get away from the scientists and the bustle and the worry.

Tucking her toiletries bag away, she felt her fingers brush the gun again. She could hear cars on the road. But she didn’t really know how it was out there now. With a pause, she grasped the gun and tucked it into the back of her jeans, then rummaged again until she came up with the clear snap case that held three extra tranquilizer darts.

She wouldn't use it unless she had to, and it wouldn't kill anyone.

Becky set out of the tent. Quickly making her way to the edge of the field, she gave one last look over her shoulder then bee-lined for the sidewalk that paced the turnpike. With a startled glance, she saw that the traffic lights were working. But of course they were. This was Oak Ridge - the town of physicists - if they couldn't get things up and running no one would.

The few cars on the road obediently followed the signals, stopping patiently and waiting, even though the road was completely clear. Her brows lifted in shock. And she decided against crossing straight for the civic center, instead going down to the light where she wouldn't have to jaywalk.

Becky was grateful for her decision when a cop pulled into the intersection and sat patiently while she got all the way across the street. The convenience store on the corner called to her.

She walked up the pavement and pulled back the door, startled by the loudness of the bell. Maybe it was just that the bell sounded so much louder now that the world lacked its usual turbulent background noise. She looked about, "Hello?"

But no one answered. She went to ring the old-fashioned ding-bell on the counter but saw the hand-lettered sign instead. Leave money. Make change. Honor system. Thank you.

Honor System!?

But there was already a pile of money. Pennies and quarters strewn amongst bills. Just waiting for whoever would take it. Becky could have. She wouldn't have. But she could.

She contemplated it as long as it took her to decide that she needed two packs of Cheetos and a large fountain cherry coke. She was eating while she added up her purchases and looked up the total on the tax-finder card that had been left on the counter. She took coins in exchange and made her way back out into the strange day.

The civic center loomed ahead, and she crossed through the damp grass, wetting her sneakers and not much caring. There was a crowd gathered in front of a tiny stage; they cheered periodically but she didn't know what at. A few steps further and she began to hear the voice.

"-we have almost all the police force!"

A cheer rose up.

"-and the FBI!"

Another cheer.

"Most of the thieves and murderers gone!" Cheers again. But Becky waited to hear what was coming.

"The CIA gone, too." This time the cheers were punctuated with laughter.

The woman on stage raised her fist high into the air. "I tell you, it is The Ascension!"

The roar of the crowd continued for several minutes this time, while Becky stood on the frayed edges. Her eyebrows knit together, while she contemplated the deaths of Aaron and Melanie. The Ascension?

But the voice broke her thoughts again. "This is God's world. And we are God's chosen. And we are to re-build Eden. Here!"

Becky turned her back to the thunder of cheers. Hadn't these people lost loved ones, too? Or did they just believe that those they had lost weren't worthy?

With a heavy heart, she turned to go back to the safe little village of tents. Back to the place she had so recently sought to escape. This time she had to seriously fight the urge to jaywalk. But God forbid, any of the ascension-ites saw her and deemed her unworthy of Eden.

It was hard to be upset with people who wanted to make heaven on earth, who thought this was a chance to make a better place for everyone. But where did they get off thinking they were the ones God had chosen? Her mother had always told her that those who died were closer to God. So that would make this crowd a composition of the un-chosen by that standard.

Becky almost chuckled.

• • • •

JILLIAN WOKE WITH A start. The gurney was uncomfortable, although not in any way she could pinpoint. It was also heartstoppingly high. From up here she could see the large brown envelope that held David's processed x-rays.

She hopped off the bed, the icy dew from the grass seeping instantly through her socks. "Shit." She tried to keep it under her breath. A quick look revealed she hadn't woken David. And the damage was done. She'd change her socks in a minute. First she wanted to see those x-rays.

She had kept several techs up half the night worrying over x-rays and demanding that the films be returned as soon as humanly possible. Every one was making weird faces at her and Jordan hadn't stopped by at all. With a sigh, she held the x-ray up to the light and wondered where he was. No wonder these people all thought he was dead.

Her face pulled into a fierce frown.

There were no marks of a tib-fib fracture at all. She pressed her face closer, looking for details, but still found nothing.

Wanting desperately to believe it was the light, she moved to the opening of the tent, her socks squishing with each step. She frowned, turned the large stiff picture, and frowned again.

Nothing.

Even years-old fractures showed on x-rays. Bones bore the marks of past sins long after they had healed. But David's showed nothing.

Not on the chest x-ray. The tiny fissures she had seen on his earlier films were gone.

And so were the films.

She shook her head.

There was suddenly this veneer of organization. Protocol was being followed to the letter. Yet too much was messed up. David's films had disappeared. Jordan was 'dead'. Lucy was supposed to be dead, but was walking around.

And then the healing thing . . .

Her IV puncture was minor. But David's tib-fib . . . that was huge. What if the reversal had sped up the healing process? It was hypothesized that the dinosaurs were so large because the magnetic field had been stronger seventy million years ago - the bigger field supported larger life. Would it also heal faster?

Her heart started racing beyond her standard seventy-two beats per minute. It was enough to make her want to run to the cafeteria and steal a good serrated knife and cut herself, to watch how long it took for the scar to close.

But there had to be a faster way. A better way. Just in case she was wrong.

With her lower lip between her teeth, Jillian thought for a moment, then smiled.

Feeling every step upon the cold grass, she pushed through the flap into bright day. People milled everywhere, and she grabbed a tech as he walked by. "Did you ever break a major bone?"

He shook his head.

Damn.

But she tried again.

And again, until one guy laughed. "I used to skateboard. You'd be hard pressed to find a bone I didn't break!"

"Excellent." She didn't bother to explain much beyond the fact that she wanted to x-ray all of him.

He grinned and handed his tray of urine samples off to another tech passing by, glad to give up the mundane in exchange for being a guinea pig. Jillian wended her way through the tents, the tech in tow behind her. Without much ado, and throwing all of her authority around, she shoved the operator aside and shot every inch of the kid, using up film like there was no tomorrow. Handing each one off in turn, she demanded that it be processed immediately.

The first film came back as she was finishing his jaw, having saved his head for last. And knowing that she'd radiated this kid, top to toe, in the name of science.

She held the film up to the light, with the tech looking over her shoulder. There were two breaks. One clean, the other not so much. "Did you break this twice?"

He nodded, pointing. "Six years ago, and ten years ago."

Jillian frowned, then accepted a second film as it was delivered from the tent next door where two techs were developing the x-rays as fast as they could. He had broken his left femur. It had pins, and bone scarring. She could see the old collarbone break. He even admitted to having cracked it twice in the same place, which was perfectly consistent with the level of damage.

This kid was a mess.

And it was all still there, in black and white and foggy gray.

She asked him questions, pinpointing break after break. And about to give up as she slid the last film into the envelope. "Did you ever break anything else? Anything we didn't look at?"

He shook his head. "I think you caught them all."

Her breath sighed out of her, she'd been so certain that she'd find something. "Well, if you think of anything, come get me. I think I'll be in tent 43."

With a shrug and a sad smile, he went off to find more work to do. And Jillian went back to the tent to find David, and shoes.

Now that she'd proven nothing, the cold had seeped into her feet, and through the bone up her shins. She needed to soak them in a hot bath, or at least wrap them in a foot warmer.

Was it just her and David that healed rapidly?

She slogged around the last corner, looking into the tent at the back of the person standing by the gurney and laughing with David.

Memory tugged at her brain, until the woman turned around.

And Jillian screamed.

Becky Sorenson was smiling, until the bloodcurdling noise came out of Jillian's mouth.

Techs and physicians rushed through the still open tent flap, dragging in biting air that she didn't - couldn't - feel.

Becky Sorenson was staring at her, questioning the scream that Jillian only just managed to shut down.

"Are you all right?" The physician had shoved everyone else out of the way, and had his fingers on her neck, already checking her pulse. Although why he would check that, when she was clearly alive and upright, was beyond her.

Jillian pushed at him, only wanting him to go away, and beginning to believe she was truly crazy. "I'm fine. I was just startled. Becky reminded me of someone who had died, and I thought . . . well I had a shock. But I'm good, so you can go. . ."

She knew she was prattling, but she couldn't stop.

Where was Jordan? He'd make her a flow chart and explain some of this. Or at least offer something. Was she really going insane?

At last when the extra people crowding the tent had been shoved out, Becky pushed her down into a chair. "Do you care to explain what that was really all about?"

Jillian shook her head, knowing she had held Becky's hand while she died, just two days ago. The healing power of the reversals must be even stronger than she had thought. That was the only viable explanation she could come up with. But it was hardly a reasonable one.

She just looked up at her colleague, into Becky's blue eyes, and asked, "Did you ever break any bones?"

"Just my finger. A long time ago." Becky gave her that are-you-losing-your-mind? look. "What does that have to do with anything?"

Jillian buried her face in her hands and fought back tears. She couldn't go mad. She just couldn't. She wouldn't survive it. The only thing she always knew to be true was that she could put pieces together. But someone had dumped her puzzle, and nothing fit.

She started with what she knew. "David fell down the steps. About four days ago. Right after he woke up. He broke his leg. But it doesn't show on the x-ray. In fact, someone took off the cast I put on him."

Jillian looked up just long enough to see Becky nod. She continued telling how his shoulder had healed, and how her IV mark was gone.

"Wow. You two were immune for a while, and now you super-heal?" Becky's hands found homes on her hips and she stared at the tent ceiling, making sure the view in her retinas was nothing that would interfere with the cranking of her brain.

But Jillian had no qualms about interrupting Becky's thinking. "No. There's more."

"What?"

"You're the best."

Becky's brows raised.

With a sigh, Jillian let it slip out. "I held your hand two days ago while you died."

"I'm not dead."

"Thanks." Her tongue was laced with dry wit, good to know she'd still have that when they locked her up. "I'm a physician, I already diagnosed that."

"I woke up yesterday at four." Becky shrugged. "I never died."

Jillian felt the old familiar cold steel of a gear click in place in her head. "What day is it?"

"Thursday."

She gulped air. It was a day earlier than she had thought. "But that's it. You died yesterday. At . . . just before four."

"No, I woke up."

Jillian stood, ready to fight. "I checked your pulse. Jordan declared you dead. I watched them pull the sheet over you."

"But I didn't die."

Again, click, another gear shifting. "Do you have a twin?"

Becky shook her head and looked at Jillian like she would a small child. "Did you dream it?"

The cold seeped up Jillian's socks into her feet, this time going straight from there to her heart. Becky's voice interrupted her thoughts again, "Because Dr. Abellard died several days ago according to the lists.”

Jillian shook her head. “The lists are messed up. Lucy Whitman is listed ‘deceased’ and she’s not. Jordan isn’t either. And David fell down the steps.” She looked to David, beseeching, knowing that if he didn’t corroborate she’d have to check herself in to the loony bin.

Becky looked over at him, too. And much to Jillian’s relief, he nodded. “I fell down the last flight of stairs. Broke my hip and leg, dislocated my shoulder, and cracked ribs. I don’t feel any of it now. But I remember Jillian pulling on bedsheets and stuffing my shoulder back into place.”

It sure wasn’t how she’d describe it, but he did get the job done. And he smiled showing even white teeth. A smile just for her, that reached to his eyes. He knew she wasn’t nuts. And that was enough, for now.

He explained how he didn’t remember getting moved here, or the cast coming off. And Becky took the quandary upon herself, leaving the tent, and asking the people passing by how Dr. Carter had come to be in this tent.

Jillian stood and listened just behind the tent flap. Three techs told the same story. They had found David in the room upstairs, and carried him down to this tent. Down all four flights of stairs. He’d been comatose the whole time.

Becky came back in and looked from Jillian to David.

David sat fully upright for the first time. “So I never broke my leg?”

She smiled, while Jillian watched in abject horror, but unable to do anything, as her body virtually refused to listen to any of her commands.

David slid off the gurney and stood on wobbly feet. In a few minutes he let go of the gurney and walked on his own. Another fact flying in the face of all her memories. Even David remembered the fall.

Had they simply shared a dream?

Becky walked back in the tent, even though Jillian didn’t remember her stepping out again. Her face conveying that she had bad news even before she spoke the words. “They said that Jordan is at the mortuary. A few of the bodies were transported waiting for someone to sign off on them.”

Jillian shook her head. Jordan was alive yesterday.

Because she’d only slept for four hours yesterday if it was Thursday. That meant she’d seen him less than twenty-four hours ago.

Becky nodded at her. “We need to go. I’m headed there to get Leon Peppersmith’s belongings. They should go to the CDC or to his family.”

Silently Jillian agreed to the trip. Her brain telling her that if Jordan was at the mortuary he would be there working, making decisions or taking samples.

Becky waited while Jillian changed her socks and put on shoes. Then told them she already arranged a car to go see about Leon’s things. Softly she asked. “If he’s alive, then where is he?”

At the mortuary! But Jillian fought down anger, accompanied with fear and bile pressing at the back of her throat. Without a further word, she followed David and Becky to the car.

David walked with an easy swing to his stride. He clearly hadn’t broken the bones. Not four days ago. He chatted with the biologist. Somehow able to make meaningless small talk, even though he said he remembered the same things she did.

Sliding into the backseat, she listened quietly while Becky told of the woman rousing the crowd about The Ascension.

When they arrived, her feet stepped out onto the gray of the blacktop, the morgue and coroner’s office located under the small police station that served the entire town. A steel door let them inside, where they passed down a long hall and through a walk-in refrigerator door.

The air changed texture, to a created, and probably expensive, climate, that was, ironically, nearly the exact temperature as the air outside.

Jillian still couldn't find her tongue when the coroner told Becky that they had Dr. Abellard. The fuzzy noise behind her eyes worsened. There was no way that Jordan was here. She hadn't dreamed him alive.

Yet the coroner pulled open a door and slid out a tray.

He peeled back the sheet, revealing Jordan. Sleeping in shades of gray. Lacking the small movements that betrayed life.

Still not believing, she reached out, felt his hair. It didn't feel right. It felt dead. He didn't respond, as her brain told her he wouldn't. He looked like someone had cast Jordan in wax, and laid him out here, a la Tussaud's. But her brain knew it was deceiving itself. Even as she refused to accept, it was her own voice telling her the truth. He was gone.

Jillian felt the pressure at the edges of her vision. She saw the sparkles, right before the roaring worsened, and everything went black.

Jordan stood at the edge of the gurney, just on the other side of the baby rails. Jillian slept. Just caddy corner, David, too, slept the sleep of the dead. There was no eye movement, no motion whatsoever from either of them.

He had allowed himself five minutes every hour to come and check in on them. Her - if he was being honest. He had slept here in the chair last night, in case either of them came around. But he had barely roused himself each time the alarm on his watch had gone off. He had forced himself to set it for two hours, thinking that he might get into a much needed deep sleep cycle if he could stay asleep for long enough.

But from the way he had creaked this morning, and felt like he was moving through sludge all day, Jordan was sure he hadn't had any REM.

He had talked to his Dad on the phone this morning for an hour.

Jackson Abellard had joined up with the work crew, hauling bodies, demolishing houses where people had been left to rot, and getting Lake James up and functioning again. He'd said it was sad what had happened. But that he felt truly alive for the first time since Jordan's mother had died.

Jordan had told about his own woes: that there was no pattern to the deaths, that he was ready to give up, but Landerly felt there had to be something. So they'd been pushing, and analyzing, and finding jack.

Jackson had laughed. "It does seem random as hell. We lost the vast majority of our electricians. But for some reason we've got lawyers out the yin yang."

Jordan had laughed, too. Wishing Landerly would stop beating the dead horse. Or the billions of dead horses. Wishing Becky Sorenson had lived, to go check out the frogs and report something of use to distract Landerly.

His watch beeped at him. Signaling that his brain had wandered and he'd lost track of his five minutes.

Not surprising.

He looked down at Jillian again, seeing her hand hanging loose within his own grasp. He told himself that fingers twitched first a lot of the time. That he touched her so he could feel what he might not see, not because he wanted to.

Turning to go, he reluctantly let her hand slip free of his, almost missing the finger jerking as it slid from his grasp.

Without covering the space between, he was over her bed, hovering, watching.

Waiting.

And seeing nothing.

It must have been nothing.

But still he picked up her lifeless hand, holding her fingers sandwiched between his own. Rubbing them. Hoping for a response.

And finally his breath hitched, when he felt it again.

Just a twitch.

His breath gushed out. "Jillian! Jillian!" He chided himself for calling out to her. She would come around as she chose. Not because he said something. Something she probably still couldn't hear, or even process as her own name. Then he did it again. "Jillian, can you hear me?"

Another twitch. This time it was her whole hand, quickly grasping his, before slackening again.

He patted the side of her face. Tapped the back of her hand. Listened to her breathing. Counted eighteen breaths per minute.

She groaned.

“Have you been standing here looking at your girlfriend this whole time!?” Landerly yelled like a man half his age, even if he hobbled along with a cane at his side.

Jordan’s jaw clenched and he didn’t turn to address the man yelling at his back. “She’s not my girlfriend. She’s my partner.”

“Then why are you standing here making lovesick puppy eyes?”

Yup, the old man couldn’t be bothered to notice a person he was speaking directly to, but he seemed to have pegged Jordan without a sideways glance. Son of a bitch. He ground his teeth and focused on the tiny quivers of Jillian’s lips. “She’s coming around.”

“Really?”

He heard the uneven footsteps. The grass was cold enough to crunch with the punctuation of his cane as Landerly made his way beside Jordan. With quick, agile fingers Landerly took her pulse, watched her eyelids as they began to show REM signs, and pulled out his stethoscope to hear her breath sounds.

Jordan spotted the cane hooked over the baby rail, looking for all the world completely unnecessary. Landerly’s feet planted apart, as though the earth might tremble beneath him and he’d need his balance. After a moment, he nodded.

Another few minutes later she began to mumble. And Jordan started speaking again. “Jillian. We’re here. Jordan and Dr. Landerly. Open your eyes. Come on-” Baby. He bit off the endearment before it slipped out.

In the space his slip provided she mumbled again.

Then again.

Jordan leaned over, smiling as her eyes slowly opened and closed. Opened and closed. They rolled, denying her the focus she was trying to achieve. And he remembered forcing back the darkness and crawling out only a few days ago himself.

Finally her eyes opened fully and stayed that way, they found him, latched on to his grin, and he watched, smiling, while recognition dawned.

Until her scream shattered his eardrums.

She looked at him like he was Satan incarnate.

And screamed again.

Then he watched in abject horror as her eyes rolled back in her head and she passed out.

“What the hell?” Landerly shoved him out of the way, the strength in his arms surprising but unnecessary. Jordan was as stable as a wet noodle and shuffled easily to the side, sliding into the chair, barely looking up as Landerly’s voice cut through him again. “What did you do to her?”

Glad to know you’re so certain that I did it, old man. But he didn’t speak, only shrugged and wondered if Landerly was right.

This time it was Landerly tapping her hand and her face. None too gently from Jordan’s viewpoint, but maybe she wouldn’t scream and pass out when she saw him. He could see the twitches as she came around again. And he sent up a silent prayer of thanks, to a God he was no longer sure was there, that she hadn’t slipped right back under.

He heard her voice as though it came from under glass, “Doctor Landerly?”

“We’re here.” Landerly motioned behind him for Jordan to get up and join him at the bedside.

Again the soft lilt of confusion, “But you’re dead.”

Landerly thumped his chest, and Jordan would have laughed had he had it in him. “Nope, alive and hale.”

“Jordan?”

He stepped up. “I’m here.”

Her breath whooshed out of her, “Oh thank God,” as she launched herself into his arms. Her face pressed into his neck, the scent of her permeating his senses, her soft breasts pressed to him as she wrapped herself around him.

His hand stroked at her hair. Even as he realized he was giving himself away to Landerly there was nothing he could do to stop it. But he ruined it anyway. “Why did you scream?”

She pulled back, untangling herself from him, taking the warmth with her. “You were dead.”

“Hmm?” He heard Landerly’s voice on top of his own.

“You were both on the ‘deceased’ list.” Her face looked so earnest. “From several days ago.”

“You must have dreamed it. We both woke up several days ago.”

Her head shook, in the stilted manner of someone denying, not to the world but to themselves. “I didn’t dream it.” Her eyes bored into him, and he felt as though they could see straight through to whatever was behind him. “Becky Sorenson took me to the mortuary.”

He started to point out that Becky had died, that Jillian had been there, but she spoke again, cutting off his thoughts, again chilling him to the bone. “I saw your body.”

• • • •

“PINCH ME!” JILLIAN held her arm out. She looked to Landerly, “that does work, right? If I feel the pain I’m not dreaming?”

Landerly actually reached out and took what felt like a good bite out of her arm. “Ow!”

Jordan looked at the two of them like they’d gone mad, and Jillian felt the chill wrap around her heart again. Her voice was barely a whisper as she pushed it out. “Don’t look at me like that. I can’t be crazy. You were dead.”

“But I’m not.” He shrugged. “I woke up the day after you did. . . the first time.”

Click. Another gear snapped into place.

“Oh shit!”

Landerly’s eyes snapped to her. He’d probably never heard her swear before, but she didn’t care. It was falling into place. “That’s it!”

Both men raised their eyebrows, identical expressions on very different faces. Her tongue fluttered in her mouth, trying to form words for the abstracts in her brain. “That’s what Becky said. She said she woke up at the same time we saw her die.”

“Okay. But she’s really dead.” Jordan squeezed her fingers.

Only just then realizing that he had been holding her hand, Jillian yanked it away as though it burned. In essence it did. This man, who had become her best friend, maybe by default, clearly didn’t believe her.

“None of them are dead!” She wanted to shake them, make them believe. But her brain rolled over and took charge. She had to tell them first.

“Sit!”

Both men scrambled to obey the authority in her voice. Jordan politely gave Landerly the chair, and hoisted himself onto the counter. When she looked to the gurney, expecting to find it empty, she started.

David was laid out there, as still as the desert night, and trussed up like a turkey.

But after a thought it made sense.

David, comatose here, was still with Becky, wherever that was.

She smiled, because when he came around, he'd corroborate her story. And she started by telling the two men that.

"David will corroborate what?" It was Landerly, interrupting before she even started.

She pinned him with a glare. "Everything. No more questions until I finish."

She explained that she had seen people who were deceased here. That those that were alive here, were dead there. "Gary Winchell. He's a tech. He's dead, right?"

Jordan shrugged at her, still not putting together all the pieces she was feeding them.

She pointed to the open flap of the tent, at the white coats scurrying by. "Well, send a tech to check the 'deceased' list. Because I x-rayed him head to toe this morning."

Jordan hopped to his feet and obediently sent for the lists.

"I hadn't met him until this morning. But ask around. He was a skateboarder. He's broken every major bone in his body. Two tib-fibs on his right leg. Left collarbone, twice in the same spot. . . ." Her voice failed her again. With her eyes she pleaded with Jordan. "How would I know that otherwise? You've been around me the whole time, how else did I learn that?"

His gaze was steady. "To be perfectly scientific, Jillian, I haven't been around you all the time. You were off with David a lot."

But just then, an out of breath tech arrived with the local binder. Jordan flipped through, stopping at Gary Winchell, and handing the book over to Landerly.

His voice was uncertain as he probed. "So everyone who's dead here, is alive . . . there?"

Her shoulders sagged. "No." The admission sounded small and hollow even to her own ears. She hated the holes in her story, wished that it all sewed up neatly and precisely. "They lost most of their elderly, too." Her head snapped up. "And Leon Peppersmith. He's dead there too."

Her jaw hurt, and she realized she was clenching it. "People are waking up there at precisely the times they die here, and dying there at precisely the times they wake up here." She was repeating herself and getting nowhere. "David was out the whole time. He was awake here, breaking his leg, while he was comatose there. He only woke up there about nine last night."

The two men looked to each other with a sharp movement.

"That's when he went under again, isn't it?" Her excitement sharpened in her bones.

It was Jordan who spoke, and she could tell he tempered his response, not wanting to give in, to validate her too much. "I discovered he had slipped under shortly after nine."

Her voice softened. "He didn't fall down the stairs there. Because he didn't wake up until yesterday. So his leg isn't broken, his shoulder never dislocated. I was trying- we were trying to figure out how he healed so quickly, but I realize now that he didn't. He was just never injured."

Click.

"Leon Peppersmith!"

They looked at her, waiting.

"He died in both places. But it's because he didn't die from the reversal. He hit his head. He lost blood, that's what killed him."

Jordan again stepped into the ring. "But he did that here. So why would he have that head injury there?"

"We were all here. But here isn't here."

Oh, hell. She wasn't making any sense now. But she plowed ahead and tried again to untangle what she was thinking and saying. "We were all here. We all went under, and things shifted. Making two parts. Some people woke up on one side and some on the other.”

Jordan leaned toward her. “So there are two earths?”

“Yes!”

“Jillian, that all sounds very . . . Hitchhiker’s Guide to the Galaxy.”

She let out a frustrated breath.

“Fine! Let me tell you who I met there. They’ll all be in your little ‘deceased’ list.” She jabbed her finger at it.

“Lucy Whitman.” For a moment she pronounced the name, feeling triumphant, but then she shook her head. “That doesn’t count, I saw her name on the list before I went under. I could have conjured her.”

She thought again. “The coroner is a Dr. Whitman. He’s Lucy’s Dad right?”

Jordan nodded. Of course he would know that.

But she kept talking. “He’s an older man with gray hair.”

But who wasn’t? She saw the question mirrored in Jordan’s eyes, so she did a better job. “He had male pattern baldness, and piercing blue eyes. He has the same smile as Lucy’s. He’s about five feet six inches tall, short for a man. He’s medium build, mild clubbing of his fingers, and has a thick gold wedding band on his left hand, no other jewelry. . . Oh, and silver glasses.”

She sat there on the edge of her gurney, feet dangling, feeling very self-satisfied.

Jordan nodded. He looked to Landerly. “She did describe the man to a T.”

Jillian looked over her shoulder. “And David is there . . . right now, he and Becky are probably wondering what happened to me, why I went back under.”

Landerly steepled his fingers, not talking, not looking at her, letting his brain digest. It was Jordan who leaned forward and questioned her. “Do you really believe all this?”

She nodded slowly, turning her lips inward, as though that might hold back the tears that threatened. “If I don’t believe it, then I have to accept that I’m crazy.”

“You may have dreamed it all.” He shrugged.

She nodded again, acceptance not coming easily. “Then I may very well be dreaming you now.”

His smile was quick and steady, “I assure you I am quite alive.” He stood, stretching, his movement proclaiming him finished with his part of the conversation. “You aren’t dreaming this.”

“That’s what they told me, too.” A small laugh burbled out of her, but she stopped it before it bloomed into hysteria. Tears pushed at the back of her eyes. “I don’t think I’m dreaming.”

Jordan nodded. “It’s a shame we didn’t put an EEG on you.” His hands rested on his hips as he paced slowly.

Her eyes opened, wide and clear, as she looked up. “But we can put one on David right now.”

Landerly nodded. “If he is dreaming . . .”

She shook her head vehemently, “It doesn’t prove anything one way or the other. I know. But if he isn’t . . .” She let out the sigh that had fought to escape. “When he wakes up he’ll tell you all the same things I did, then you’ll know he didn’t dream it. I’ll even leave the room so you can question him separately.”

Landerly’s voice was smooth and modulated. “You seem very sure of yourself.”

“I am.” Holding out her hands, palm up, she played her last card. “If he doesn’t corroborate everything, then you can lock me up.”

In unspoken agreement, Jordan left to fetch an EEG, and Landerly stood, putting too much weight on the cane to get out of the chair. His fingers quickly probed along her jawline. She almost laughed, thinking that a massive infection would explain some serious hallucinating on her part. But she could tell he didn't find any enlarged lymph nodes. He took her blood pressure, and listened to her heartbeat, and let out a tiny chuckle.

"What?" As she asked it, she noticed his eyes had changed from calculating and scientific to human and warm.

"Abellard was right. You are textbook."

She only nodded. Of course she was textbook. Humans varied, everyone deviated from the norm in some way or other. But not her, and this whole mess was just another convincing factor that she was less than human in some way.

"You pass all the physical inspections, so I'm going back to the records tent. You and Abellard get something to eat and bring me some when you finish. Maybe you can help us find the sorting factor."

"Sorting factor?"

He turned back. "Why those people died - or lived."

She couldn't raise her voice, couldn't find the energy to be loud and forceful to this man. But she just as much could not let him walk out uncorrected. "It's not just dead and alive. There are three categories. Alive here. Alive there. And dead in both."

His back to her, he nodded, and left. As he hobbled off, looking older than he ever had before, she wondered if he really wanted to study or just didn't want to trek the distance to the cafeteria.

Alone in the tent with David laid out on the other bed, Jillian moved her sore muscles. Her jaw had already gotten its workout, but her legs and arms could use some good range-of-motion exercises.

She stretched and twisted, feeling for the third time the strain of movement on long unused muscle. She began to wonder if she would feel this every time she awoke. If each time she fell asleep she would have to wonder where she would wake up.

Before the thought could depress her, Jordan wheeled in the cart containing the EEG set up. Wires hung in wrapped loops off the side of the cart, the ends little silver snaps waiting for the corresponding pads. Jordan had two pages of the thick foam stickers with the snap backs and small sponges in the center holding conducting gel.

When he turned his back to her she heaved herself off the bed, and grabbed the babyrail as her legs tried to buckle under her. Without seeing him move in behind her, Jillian only felt his arm slip around her waist and lift her fully upright, legs extended, and finally supporting herself. She batted his hands away and carefully walked the two feet to get to the head of David's bed. Without a sound she began pushing away his blond hair, snapping the wires to the pads and sticking them across his head. For a moment she pushed away her own concerns, and admired the pattern that the probes made - simple, mathematical, containing no fear, concern, or disbelief.

Within minutes the small screen was tracing a series of green lines across its face, showing the brainwave activity of a comatose David. The theta waves were low, indicating a non-dreaming state. But that didn't mean anything. Not until he passed at least three hours - overnight would be better to prove that he hadn't entered any REM sleep cycles, no dream phases.

They watched silently until the lines completed their first trek across the screen, then they turned to get dinner.

• • • •

JORDAN WATCHED HER while she ate. She consumed food like he had normally only seen her consume information. But he didn't judge. He hadn't been through what she had. Even in the simplest sense.

He hadn't walked the reversal long after it wasn't safe for anyone else. He didn't awaken before anyone else and toil to save lives. And he hadn't slipped back under. Never mind what she claimed she had seen.

She wasn't speaking to him. Not in the flat-out-refusal way that a child would mete out punishment, but he could sense her withdrawal, her pain that he didn't just blindly believe all that she said.

The one thing she had done was convince him that she believed it. But it didn't make sense, not the way she said. And she could have dreamed it. Hell, everyone had a dream or two that felt so real you bought into it, even after you woke up. His lips pressed together. The difference was that people who dreamed woke up. And, once confronted with some sort of evidence, they let go. He had once dreamed his puppy had died, but he woke up and was corrected by a single bark. A good lick on the face and the dream was banished.

Here, two full hours later, Jillian still believed. And she was trying to spread the news, at least to him and Landerly.

And she could have dreamed it. He had watched her thumb through the 'deceased' list when she'd been awake the first time. Jordan also knew that her brain was razor sharp. It could have memorized, somewhere in her vast subconscious, the entire list. Who knew what a brain like Jillian's was able to catalogue? If she had once passed by that tech's file, if it had been open, she could have absorbed every fracture, every nick on every bone.

He watched as she carefully cut the turkey slices on her plate with the dull cafeteria knife, slicing neat squares from the ovals before her. She dunked them in gravy then chewed them, her motions as uniform as her cuts, and she never made eye contact. She was angry.

Equivalently she'd had the answering bark. He'd talked to her, they'd touched. Landerly touched her. She had dreamed they were dead, but all the signs saying otherwise couldn't convince her.

And that theory. That was neat. She managed to sew it all together so it worked. One set here, one there. She could simply continue the dream when she went to sleep.

With new eyes, he looked at her, knowing that she felt it, and that she wouldn't return the gesture. Was she simply so smart that she could drive herself insane? His dream had dispersed, although the memory of the terror was still glass-clear in his adulthood. But he didn't - couldn't - make up ways for it to have truly happened. Jillian was smart enough that she could.

He waited while she methodically finished the food on her plate. Wordlessly, she stood and went back into the line. If her back hadn't been to him she would have seen his jaw unhinge.

Maybe she's pregnant.

David.

Like lightning, a bolt of deep jealousy traced a sharp path through him. He worked to push the thought back down inside, to shove it low and bury it deep. She was just eating a lot because of the stress on her system from being comatose for a good portion of the past week.

He saw her exiting the line and coming toward him. The cafeteria plate no longer in her hands, but replaced by a paper napkin roll of plasticware, and a black plastic plate piled high with food he couldn't identify through the steam inside the lid.

His breath let out. Not pregnant.

"Ready?" She looked at him, but only at the surface. And when he nodded she began walking away. Not waiting for him to get up. Not looking back to be sure he followed.

He trailed behind, mesmerized by the soft sway of her hips, the light blue scrubs hugging the curves that were partially obscured by the jacket she had slung on. Her sneakers cut even steps in the shortest path to the records tent. In the dimming light, it was one of the few lit up like a bulb. A faint shadow marked the spot where Landerly sat just inside.

Jillian lifted the flap and pushed her way in, the canvas falling back into place behind her so that Jordan had to open it for himself.

Landerly was taking the plate from her, looking more like her grandfather than her boss. For the old man she had smiles and easy conversation. They were already discussing the fact that Landerly still couldn't identify a sorting factor, other than the one that he and Jordan had already figured out. He lifted the lid from the plate and stabbed at the turkey with his fork, explaining while he cut the meat into neat, even squares. "The elderly and infirm died. The people who had any or all the markers you two found before the complete reversal hit. But a lot of young people died that I can't account for. There's no age or race bias . . ." His voice trailed off as he dunked the perfect cube of turkey into the little puddle of gravy Jillian had gotten him.

And Jordan almost turned tail and ran. Dear God, he was stuck in a small tent with two of them. Falling hopelessly head over heels for one of them, and she wasn't speaking to him. Instead of fleeing screaming, he opened his mouth. "There's a gender bias that the females fell under and woke up or died first. But beyond that, there's no statistically significant difference in who woke up and who died."

Jillian cocked her head. "Did you check for a religious difference?"

"Huh?" Jordan heard it come out of his own mouth. Years of education and student loans down the drain.

"The Jewish people are the only religion that's its own race, but there may be a religious bias in the sorting. I don't know anything about the physiology of religion, but something must exist."

Jordan resisted the urge to roll his eyes. Of course, he and Landerly had been wracking their brains, but Jillian in her first few minutes in the tent proposed something they hadn't thought of. She drove him nuts, so why the hell did he like her so much?

Without being asked, Jordan slipped out of the tent and went in search of Jason. Lucy was gone now, and she had been a fantastic go-to girl. He'd wondered if she'd had some sort of crush on him, or if she was just that efficient and willing to do whatever needed to be done. Jason was simply driven. He saw the opportunity afforded by the drastic shift in population, and he was going to come out on top.

Jason was in one of the other lit up tents. Of course. He would work well into the night, sleep a few hours and wake up early. He'd make sure he was indispensable. And certainly that's how Jordan found him, sitting at a desk, frowning at the yards of graphs in front of him. "What's the trouble?"

Jason looked up, a hint of startle showing on his face. "I must have messed it up, but . . ."

Jordan almost smiled. Messing up didn't seem like much of an option for someone like Jason. "What did you mess up?"

"Well, I figured that if compasses were acting up, maybe other things had, too. My first thought was the MRI. It's magnetic, so that made sense."

"Is it messed up?" Jordan stifled his inward sigh. The last thing anyone needed was more problems, but if they existed they needed to be checked out.

Jason shook his head, still looking confused. "No, it was fine. I guess the internal field is just too strong to be bothered by the earth's field. The NMR was next. Same issue. But both the IR and UV-vis are honked up.”

“Honked up?” That was one he hadn’t heard in a scientific sense before.

“I got nothing. So I tried to recalibrate it.”

Jordan felt his fists hit his hipbones. “And . . . ?” It felt like he was pulling teeth over messed up machinery when he needed Jason working on finding out what he could about Jillian’s religious bias theory.

“I recalibrated the UV-vis.”

“Oh.” Well, that certainly hadn’t been what he expected, not given the look on Jason’s face. So he launched into what he needed. “We-”

“No. I recalibrated it. But our visual red recalibrated in the UV scale. The whole thing’s off by a frequency of 300 hertz.”

“Hmmm.” So the machine was fucked. He tried again to speak.

But Jason wasn’t having any of it. “I got my Dad to check the ones out at the labs. They all recalibrate the same. I even called U Mass and UCLA. They’re the same.”

Jordan nodded. “Good, I’m glad you got that solved.” And he shifted mental gears. After explaining what they needed, Jordan headed back, pushing aside thoughts of the future. If Jason reacted by over-working and over-thinking, others would react by shutting down. Suicides were a highly likely outcome. Some had lost their entire families. And it was inherent in the human species that some people just didn’t survive that.

He shook his head, trying to make out the two voices as he approached. Jillian’s soft lilt, her laugh, and Landerly’s response, for the first time Jordan detected a scratch in the old man’s voice and wondered how many years of his younger life the man had spent smoking. He pushed through the canvas flap, enjoying the feeling of the heat enveloping him. Lord knows, the two of them had probably solved all the earth’s problems while he was out.

Jillian was at a desk, her seat turned to face Landerly’s, while she sifted through reams of printouts, talking as she went, and Dr. Landerly was polishing off the last bites of the dinner she had put together for him.

“Jordan,” It was the first time this evening she had spoken directly to him, since he had dared to indicate that he wasn’t completely on the dual-earth bandwagon. Landerly wasn’t either, but for some reason the old man remained in her good graces. Jordan looked at her, eyes up, waiting. “Didn’t they say something about the wardens all dying in Nevada?”

He frowned. “They didn’t all die.”

“Yeah, but wasn’t there a disproportionately large number? Far more than fifty percent?”

Landerly nodded, wondering where she was going. “All the first people who woke up were murderers. Single killings, passion killings. You found that.”

But Jordan shook his head, for the first time since Jillian spouted off about her dreams, he and Landerly were on the same page. But Jillian wasn’t and Jordan put voice to his concerns. “I don’t think that murderer / non-murderer is going to be the sorting factor, I’ve looked at the list.”

She brushed them both aside with her hand. “Of course not, but job description might. Oh-” Her eyes widened as she cut off her own thought.

Again he and Landerly waited.

“You weren’t there. . .” He could see her getting excited. But even when she opened her mouth she still didn’t make sense. “I wasn’t there either!”

For a moment he wondered if they were really going to wind up putting her into a straight jacket. And he barely managed a sad sigh before she spoke again.

“Becky mentioned something on the way over to the coroner’s. That she’d been over to the Civic Center across the street and they were having a rally.”

“I didn’t see a rally.” He looked askance to Landerly and the old man just shrugged.

Jilly’s eyes narrowed and her face took on the expression of a viper ready to strike. “Of course you didn’t see it. Becky did. It wasn’t here.” She gave a long suffering sigh. “So try this on for size: At the rally they believed the reversal was the Ascension because all the lawyers had died and . . . the police force had mostly lived. So had the FBI,” she paused, her eyes rolling up skyward as she relived the memory, certainly in her brain she could hear Becky speaking. “But almost no CIA. Low survival among thieves and murderers.”

She pinned him with a glare. “Check it.”

“What?” He still wasn’t quite up to speed on what the idea was, even though he’d understood what she said as plain English.

“Job descriptions. The lawyers and CIA and thieves and murderers are alive. Here. Because they’re dead there. We’ll also be short a good police force, and the FBI.”

He frowned. He understood; he just wasn’t buying what she was selling. “The FBI just all died?”

“I doubt it was all of them!” She was as frustrated with him as he was with her. And from off to the side he could see Landerly watching the whole exchange with his eyebrows so high they almost popped off his head. Jordan was just too damn frustrated to laugh about it.

Jillian started in on him again. “Most of the FBI is dead. I’ll bank on that just like I’ll bank on David corroborating my story. Has anyone thought to check on him?”

Of course not, no one really likes him.

Jordan tried to squelch the thought. His mother had taught him better. And as a physician he had taken an oath to be better.

But it was Jillian who stomped out of the tent and went on her way to check on David.

He tried to take a moment to gather himself. But it was practically impossible with Landerly sitting there watching him. So he forced himself to don the appearance of not being wound into knots. He faced Landerly, “Now what?”

Landerly shrugged from the seat he had occupied the whole time. “I guess we get cracking on checking the job descriptions of everyone we can find.”

• • • •

“DAMMIT LEON.” BECKY muttered under her breath.

“What?”

“Nothing.” She managed about half a smile and shook her head at David. She wasn’t going to repeat it. Not the cursing of the dead. Not her anger at Leon for leaving her here to sort out the species by herself.

Of all the people who had died in the reversal, Leon was the one she had been sure would make it if anyone would. He radiated health. It was worse that he had died of a hit to the head - nothing more than a scratch to Leon. But there had been no one awake to lift him into a bed and stitch him up.

The only remaining Peppersmiths were still in Minnesota, faxing in fabulous data on some seriously unfabulous extinctions. Leon’s sister had stepped up to fill the lead spot, the business running smoothly in the face of personal and global tragedy. John Overton had died as well. And Becky let out a breath when she thought of the gleam in his eyes when they talked about the downed moose. Overton hadn't been anywhere as useful as Leon had been. And it was wrong of her, but she couldn't muster up any real pain at the loss.

David went back to working on his hands and knees some five yards away. He was chipping at an exposed surface of granite, the tiny pickaxe making a rhythmic ping against the scar he was creating in the earth. He was making too much noise now to hear her if she muttered.

The crickets had stopped for a mile in every direction when he had started the nasty noise that signaled to the wildlife that they were not alone. The predators had gone into hiding, away from the now rotting feast that had been left out for them. Luckily they had eaten enough that the smell wasn't overwhelming and Becky had adjusted to it. David worked like he didn't notice anything, quiet except for his little axe and his breathing, in a circle of illuminated glare. One knee flat, the other up, with his elbow resting on it, his fit torso encased in a red L L Bean jacket that spoke of money and sport. He looked like an ad rather than a scientist. The only glimmer of truth in the whole bright image was that his hair was thinning on top.

Becky went back to unearthing the things that had taken great pains to earth themselves in the first place. They squirmed and fought, but only rarely did they escape. She apologized to the souls of each of them, and again wondered what God thought of what she did to his creatures.

Her minister when she'd been in high school had thought God wanted the people to use the creatures to help the people. She was certain there wasn't any real danger of being smote down by anyone organic or overly holistic in the East Tennessee Baptist Church. But nowhere in the bible was there any good solid reference to God's or Jesus' ideas about the worms and their scientific versus holy purposes.

So she dug them up.

"You about done?" David's voice was clear in the unearthly quiet.

"Yup!" She scrambled to gather the few containers she had brought with her. Her cell phone shoved deep into her pocket. She wasn't 'finished'; she hadn't really started. She was simply taking advantage of being out. David had said he was coming out here to check the rock formations, either with her or without her.

And after Jillian had gone back comatose, Becky didn't think any of them should be anywhere alone, and certainly not David. He was the one who seemed to function the most like Jillian. And he could simply pass out and slip under at any moment.

Granted, Jillian had been triggered. She had seen Jordan Abellard's body in the morgue and let out that soul shattering scream. The hideous noise had only ended when Jillian had passed out.

So Becky didn't find the brilliant Dr. Carter so all-knowing wise when he decided to come out to the back of beyond in the middle of the night to chip rock, even if it was her own backyard. Her mother and father would be bringing Brandon back here. They had Melanie and Aaron buried in Charlotte where he had been working, where the reversal had hit them.

For a moment she had to scrunch up her face to keep the thoughts and therefore the tears at bay. The steady ringing of metal on rock had stopped. And with a sniff, she looked to her right, to the perfect size twelve tan hiking boots that bore just enough scuffs to show that they had been worn, once before, maybe. "Need a hand?"

The fitted black glove reached down into her view, and she was certain he was offering to tug her to her feet, but she couldn't face him yet. And David wasn't the kind of man you just threw yourself at when you needed a good cry. So she slapped a salamander in a clear container into his palm.

The palm lifted out of her vision and came back empty, so she held up another and another, until she had corralled her thoughts and was able to face the man.

And to think she had come out here believing she was protecting him from going comatose out in the woods. Nope, he was far more stable than she. It was just Jillian with the issue.

She stepped pace behind him on the trail, only briefly musing at following him down trails she had walked since she was old enough to wander away from home. But before she realized that they had come that far, she was blinded by the sudden glare of the motion-sensor spotlight on the side of the empty house. Her hand flew up to shade her eyes and she caught a brief burning glimpse of David doing the same thing, just before she ran into his back.

“Umph.”

Well, that was beautiful. With a deep breath in, she apologized.

“Don’t worry.” He pushed the button on the car key and the sleek black Mercedes in front of them blinked and made a few laser-like noises. Becky figured he’d gone out and bought it. But she wasn’t sure when. Or why. There were tons of available cars these days. But it seemed that David just needed the black Mercedes. Or maybe it had needed a man that wore L L Bean and breathed money.

Again, she held out her gloved palm, waiting patiently until he relented and handed over the keys. She wasn’t about to let him drive. No matter how sure she was that he wasn’t going to slip into a coma.

A few minutes later the black leather, hand-stitched backseat was covered with pieces of rock, baggies of silt and soil, and plastic containers of water and writhing creatures. Definitely not what the Mercedes-Benz corporation had built this luxury-mobile for. Why couldn’t the man just admit that he played in the dirt for a living and get a truck?

Becky turned the key, threw the car in gear and, when the gas pedal made the car start reversing out of the bumpy gravel drive, she figured the engine was running. The flood light snapped off as they pulled out of range, shutting down the still picture the house had made beyond the windshield.

But Becky put that thought out of her mind, too. At least her folks would be back in a couple of days and it wouldn’t feel so eerie. She hadn’t even brought herself to go inside this time. Even though the dust layer would have been microscopic, she would know it was there, feel that the house no longer had a family in it. That it knew it was unused.

So she pulled away, using the high-beams to illuminate a road she knew by heart.

David stared out the side window, although if he could see anything other than the green reflection of the dash lights, she wasn’t certain.

Twenty-five minutes later she pulled into the lot at the high school. The tent town was ghostly white, moving slightly in the breeze. A few of the tents were lit up from the inside, like Japanese paper lanterns. But David didn’t see any of it.

He had fallen sound asleep on the ride back, having reclined his seat and wedged his head against the door jamb.

“David.” She kept her voice soft, as though maybe it weren’t her intention to wake him.

But he didn’t respond.

A seed of thought began forming at the back of her brain, and she decided that she didn’t care if she startled the hell out of him. She grabbed his shoulder and shook him for all she could. “David! David!”

“David! David!”

The voice seemed muffled, and at a distance. It was a wonder he could make out his own name it was so murky. And he was tired. Why couldn't Becky let him sleep? It seemed like he had just slid away. Finally, peacefully getting the rest he needed. The seat of the Mercedes was warm and soothing, because he'd turned on the ass-warmer.

The salesman had a better name for it than that, but David didn't care. It made everything else about the car worthwhile. Even the pricetag. So David wrote yet another check out of his trust fund. He'd sworn never to touch the account, but lately it seemed that was all he had done.

He started to roll sideways, away from the sound of her voice, but the sheets were cool, and her voice was receding. Good. She was going to let him sleep.

He slid away, letting the recesses of dreams come close and fold him into a place where he simply didn't care that he was in a car, sleeping in the parking lot. A thought about hubcaps slipped through his head and he could see the parking lot filled with rows of little black Mercedes.

“David.”

Damn, her voice had gotten-

It was a man. A male voice. And he remembered that she had left, that he had heard her skittering out of the- . . . the car?

“David.” A hand clasped his shoulder, the grip commanding rather than soothing. “I can see that you're coming around. Watch that arm.”

Arm?

Son of a bitch. They weren't going to let him sleep. He sighed and rolled toward the sound, trying to force open his eyes, but it wasn't working. He rubbed at his face.

His arm was ripped from his body. For just a moment causing a blinding pain, then the feeling rescinded to a bright burn.

“Aaaaaggggh!”

He barely registered that it was his own voice through the haze. Even though he didn't move it again, his shoulder punished him with a throbbing sear that onset with every heartbeat. He opened his eyes even as he chewed the inside of his lip in an effort to create a controllable pain that would overshadow the uncontrollable one.

Finally his vision settled on the man in front of him. Forcing his eyes to follow the clean lines of the scrubs, he looked up into Jordan Abellard's too-blue eyes.

He screamed again. And scrambled for the head of the bed, hoping to get away from the face he had seen cold on the slab just that morning. But again his shoulder punished him with a tearing feeling, followed by a sharp burn that permeated the whole area.

David would have let out another yell, but as the doctor leaned closer David pushed with his legs, and was rewarded by the hot certainty that the limb had been sawed off and left open about halfway down his calf. Something stabbed, swordlike, through his hip up into his abdomen.

His left arm held. His left leg didn't feel like it had been severed, and so he used those to right himself. Holding one hand in front of him, he warded off the dead hands reaching toward him. “Back off, you son of a bitch!”

Finally he was able to feel his throat, and it too was mad at him. Sandpaper rubbed on every exposed surface, creating an intense, raw, seeping pain that clouded his vision further.

“It’s me, Dr. Abellard.” The head tilted, the chocolate hair sliding and falling a little too long, as the eyes focused on his face.

“No shit. Get back.” He held his palm out, as though the sight of the soft side of a hand would keep anything at bay besides a gnat.

But the Jordan-thing did as it was told.

“David?”

It was a kind, soothing voice. But that was all it said.

David started running at the mouth. Although he wasn’t sure why. “You’re dead! I saw you this morning dead- . . . cold- . . . at the coroner’s.”

“Huh?”

It wasn’t Jordan. Jordan was more eloquent than that. Every bad zombie movie he had ever seen flashed through his brain. Becky was complaining about extinct species. The techs and doctors droned about all the deaths. There was no reason that the walking dead couldn’t be a part of all this.

The Jordan-thing stared back at him; its mouth moved asking something about the morgue. But David ignored it. He was frowning at his arm, and a horror worse than the dead man standing and talking to him poured over him. The pain that had receded to a dull rhythmic ache was in his right arm. At the shoulder. The shoulder that was in a blue standard issue immobility sling. With the Velcro strap around his chest. Just where he had remembered it. “My shoulder was dislocated?”

“Yes.” Jordan nodded.

“When I fell down the last flight of stairs?”

“Yes.” His expression clearly telling that he thought David might have injured his brain in the fall as well.

“But I healed. . . . my leg healed.” Again the words stumbled out of his mouth, along with some weird belief that if he just explained, things would right themselves. “I was walking. Becky took us to the coroner’s. Jillian can show you the x-rays. I-” He wasn’t making any sense and he knew it.

Jordan pulled up a chair and a notebook, before pulling a sleek, expensive pen from the unassuming pocket stitched on the front of his scrubs. “I’m going to ask a few questions and take some notes, okay?”

David gritted his teeth and remembered from two days ago. “Can I have a Percocet?”

Jordan nodded, but his words didn’t quite match. “When we finish, okay?”

Again his teeth ground - one of the few body parts he could work without instantaneous punishment in the form of rending pain.

Jordan dove into the thick of it. “I’m dead?”

“Well, you don’t look very dead.” He could feel the sarcasm flowing through his veins. “You got a twin?”

He shook his head. Looking far too like Jordan for David’s stomach to stop clenching. “Well, there’s a body at the morgue that had your name on the toe-tag, and your name on the ‘deceased’ list. And from the looks of it, I can see why they got you confused. You should check into having a brother you don’t know about.”

Jordan nodded.

“When did you see it?”

“This morning. Maybe eleven a.m.” It felt like an interrogation, but he let the doc go. The sooner this crap was over, the sooner he got his Percocet.

“Who was there with you?”

“Jillian Brookwood, Dr. Rebecca Sorenson, and the coroner, Dr. Whitfield, Whitson, something.” He stated each name clearly for the record, mentally pushing back the feeling of having his hip ripped open.

“Becky’s dead.” Jordan leaned forward trying to see how David would react.

Was this one of those horrid mental studies? “Hey doc, I thought they banned this type of psychological research years ago.”

“What are you talking about?”

David shook his head. “You know, where you tell people their family is dead just to see how they react. . . this ain’t right.”

Jordan breathed deep and shook his head. “I’ll explain it all as soon as I can, but Jillian’s telling us some pretty weird tales, and she says you’ll corroborate them. She ran to get me when she saw you coming around.”

Jillian! She would get him Percocet. “Bring the doc around then.”

“I can’t. Not until we’re finished.”

Anger burst through him, washing past in a hot rush. “I’m in pain here. While you pussyfoot around. And I don’t even know why the hell I’m re-injured. So get the hell on with it.”

“Why don’t you believe Becky Sorenson is dead?”

“Because I was just with her.” He looked at his watch. The time and date matched. “I was in the car. My black Mercedes I bought this afternoon. I fell asleep. About twenty minutes ago maybe.”

“You saw her twenty minutes ago?” Jordan leaned forward, his face a mask of incredulousness.

“That’s what I just said.” He forced his breathing to stay steady. Percocet was coming. Just ignore the pain and the fact that you are at the mercy of this sadistic doctor. He almost admired Jordan for having the balls to hold him hostage in his bed.

“And Jillian was there?”

“No. She passed out when she saw your body at the morgue. Screamed like a banshee and dropped like a stone. She went comatose. Becky and I brought her back. One of the docs had checked her out and said her heart rate was low and her breathing shallow.” He watched while Abellard’s face gave away everything he felt for the pretty little brunette. Whether he admitted it to himself or not, it was there in plain writing for all the rest of the world to read. But David kept talking. “They hooked her up to monitors and watched her. Becky and I went out to gather some data.”

“You left her?”

“I wasn’t going to sit around and watch her not move. Not much I can do to help anyway.” Yup, Abellard was in a bad way.

“You walked?” He motioned with his pretty pen to all the breaks that would clearly prevent any of David’s story. David ate a sigh. None of it made sense. And if Jillian was awake then where was she anyway?

“I healed. No marks on the x-rays that there ever was a break on any of the bones. Hip in the socket, girdle unfractured. I don’t know what this is about,” He gestured to all the casting and bindings he wore, “but it hurts like a mother-fucker.”

Jordan muttered under his breath. David heard the words son of a bitch, but it was hard to believe that phrase had come from Jordan’s mouth. David knew he must have simply heard the words he would have said. Abellard stood and stretched, long lean lines that made David ache with jealousy and wonder where the hell his good health had escaped to.

“I’ll send Jillian in with that Percocet. You can talk to her.”

He straightened where he sat, propped against the pillows, his hip burned, reminding him not to bend. His arm twitched, and his leg sent pulses of pain to every part of him. He ignored it. “When did Jillian wake up?”

“As of about noon.”

“But she was still under when Becky and I left this evening, around six.”

Jordan nodded, “She’ll explain. She was awake here.”

• • • •

JORDAN WALKED CALMLY from the tent, making certain he was well beyond the flap before he bent over and put his hands on his knees, finally allowing himself the deep gulping breaths that his body had been fighting for. Oxygen seeped into his system like a drug, reassuring him about everything in the world except the fact that Jillian had been right.

Whatever the hell she had seen, truth or not, David corroborated it.

She had seen him start to wake up, and bolted from his tent, fetching Jordan. Telling him to ask all his questions, her eyes gleaming with the promise of vindication.

Well, she had it.

Jordan had checked the EEG readings several times and found the only conclusive thing he could have found. David showed no markers of dreams at all - which meant that the creepy explanation that he and Jillian had shared a dream wasn’t going to fly. Instead they had as conclusive of evidence as they would ever find that the even creepier explanation Jillian had proposed would hold.

The toes of small, very familiar sneakers entered his line of sight, and he fought to stand upright and look less shaken than he felt. Jillian’s voice reached him before his eyes made it to her face. “It all matches.”

She didn’t ask. She didn’t have to. Jordan knew it was obvious from how he was reeling from his interview with David. But he forced himself to stand erect and look her in the eyes. “He needs Percocet. Then come back and talk to me, please.” He heard the begging quality in his tone. Recognized that it was in response to the instant her eyes had fled elsewhere worrying about David.

“He doesn’t even know why he’s in casts; why he isn’t healed.” It was a statement, in a faraway voice, deep concern about the only patient he hadn’t seen Jillian treat as a scientific subject. He told himself the rolling in his gut was from the fact that David’s story had smacked him around and upended his world.

Jillian scampered off, fetching meds for David and disappearing into the tent.

She had woken up on the other side, wherever the hell that was. And so had David. He had talked to Becky, less than an hour ago. He had chatted with Lucy Whitman’s dad long after the man had died.

Jordan started. For a moment he didn’t care about Jillian and David. Was his mother there? Eddie? Was it just the land of the dead? Had it always existed and Jillian and David had simply been thrown there by the reversal? His breathing picked up pace again and he sprinted into the tent, to ask her.

But he pulled up short when he saw her standing beside the bed. Talking. Telling David about the two parts, how they were passing back and forth. Jordan held himself in tight check waiting for a spot to interrupt, until Jillian shifted revealing her hand held softly in David’s. His voice found itself, putting the setting to rights. He had no claim, and wondered where the hell all this was popping out from. He had sat across a desk from her, finding her cold and impersonal. And now . . . well, intense attraction was a normal outcome to a shared traumatic stress.

Armed with this explanation, his brain worked again, and he pushed out the words. “Was it just a place that has always existed? Were other people there? Grandparents who died a long time ago?”

He shook his head in frustration, wondering how to explain what he meant. But Jillian gave him a sympathetic ‘no’, needing no further background, knowing instantly what he was trying to ask. “There were still a whole slew of people who actually died in the reversal. Remember, Leon isn’t anywhere. I didn’t find any evidence of anyone’s long departed ancestors, and no one seemed to think they were in heaven, which I’m sure would have come to mind if suddenly all your dead relatives were around.”

Jordan nodded. And admitted to himself what he had only briefly hoped: his mother wasn’t there.

Until that moment, he had simply accepted her loss. That a long round with cancer slowly ate her. That it had destroyed his father as well, even though it didn’t kill him. Only in the glimmer of chance did he realize how much he missed her. But he re-packaged it into its small neat box and shoved it back into the recesses of his brain.

Jordan stepped out of the tent, knowing Jillian would follow, soon. And steeling himself to the reality of it all: that Jillian had wandered across unbreachable barriers and hadn’t even known it.

With far more force than necessary, startling Landerly from his now almost permanent spot in the straight chair, he shoved his way into the records tent. Jordan made a note to get a recliner. He thought he’d seen one in the faculty lounge. Landerly’s brows went up, silently asking what Jordan knew was coming.

He nodded. “It all matches. I-” He shrugged. “I guess it’s all correct. Hers is now the only theory that makes sense.”

“What about all the dead? People deceased from a long time ago?”

That crept him out - the fact that it was now his brain working like Landerly’s. “I already asked. And no.”

Jillian came into the tent behind him, her sneakers so soft on the now worn grass that she didn’t make a sound, but he felt the cool night air follow her, and he smelled her. “So, you two believe me now.”

Both men turned to face her and nodded. Jordan knew what was coming next.

“There’s not much option is there?”

• • • •

THE TWO MEN SIMPLY stared at her.

Jillian knew.

They wanted to believe she was crazy. That she simply believed it was true.

But it was.

“I’m right aren’t I?” For some feminine reason, it wasn’t enough to feel vindicated. They would actually have to say the words. Their acceptance meant everything.

Jordan looked at her through suddenly narrowed eyes. “Until we come up with a better explanation.”

She felt her mouth form into a shocked ‘o’. He would just keep looking until he found a way to discredit her. “What better explanation is there?”

“Well, maybe this one: you and David share a psychosis, nothing more.”

“Psychosis!?” She could have thrown something at him, and wished she had something solid and heavy at hand. Something better than the stethoscope she had casually tossed around her neck upon standing upright. If her boss hadn't been watching, she just might have slugged him, then slugged him again for being right.

It was possible. The world didn't turn on her wishes.

She sniffed in and tried to put the pieces of a calm expression back into place. To let her clenched lips relax. It was much harder than it ought to be.

"Children?" Landerly's condescension made it happen much faster than her will did.

She looked over and saw that Jordan, too, had been distracted from their fight.

Dr. Landerly held up his cell phone, "I have a Doctor Melanie Sorenson on the line. . ."

Jillian felt her brows pull together. But it was Jordan who filled in the blanks. "That's Becky's sister's name, but I thought she was a child . . ."

Landerly smiled. "That explains a lot." He turned back to the conversation he had muted with a well placed thumb. "Yes, Dr. Sorenson, what do you have for us?"

While they stood there, hovering, he had a conversation with the small girl. Jillian could make out a high-pitched but well-modulated voice because Landerly had his volume up so loud. "notebooks, huh? . . . Becky's field notes. . . . Thank you. We'll come and get them."

In a few more sentences he signed off and looked at the two of them. "You guys get a fetch job. I want those notebooks."

Jillian didn't object, but she was curious, "How did she get your cell number? No one has that."

Landerly grinned. "I think she talked her way through."

"She's seven!" Jordan looked incredulous.

Landerly laughed. "We'll have to keep her in the CDC's sights. . . . Now go get a map and get out to Dr. Sorenson's house."

Jillian turned to go, her jacket still around her even in the warm tent, she really just hadn't thought to take it off. Jordan's hand on her shoulder stilled her, but it was Landerly he spoke to. "Jillian's not going."

Anger exploded through her in a wash. "Excuse me!?"

Still he didn't face her, simply made his case to the man sitting and watching with a bemused expression. "What if she slides back under?"

"I won't!"

When his eyes found hers, dark lights burned in his gaze. "You don't seem to have any control over it."

"I'm up and around!"

"Yeah, and we thought that last time, too!" His fingers gripped her arm, in that one sure way letting her know she wasn't calling the shots here.

"Well, you could slip back under at any time, too, you know."

"No! I've been out here doing research. There doesn't seem to be anyone else in the world that slipped back under. No other fantastical tales of the 'other side'. Just you and David."

"Fantastical!" He was still trying to undermine her. Bastard.

"She can go." Landerly's cool calm rode over them, radiated out from his seated position, where he clearly still commanded the respect he was due.

"But-

Jillian resisted the urge to stick out her tongue when he cut Jordan off. "You'll be with her. She'll be fine even if she does go back under." With that said, he turned his attention away.

Jillian knew where her bread was buttered, and she started off toward the operations tent.

Jordan didn't follow her, just seemed inclined to stay behind and stew, so she let him. Five minutes later she emerged from the tent with the keys and quick printed map, thinking she'd just go by herself, until Jordan turned the corner and smacked into her. "Ready?"

His voice was tight and clipped, and he yanked the keys from her fingers even as he asked. "I don't trust you to drive. You might slip away and kill us both."

Her mouth hung open but she followed him out, through the rows of mostly stationary cars and trucks, until he seated himself in the driver's seat of one and expected her to slide into the passenger spot.

Fine. Two can play at that game.

And she managed to stay silent for about half the trip. Then finally it just burbled out of her. "Why are you so upset about me coming?"

His hands visibly clenched on the steering wheel, but he explained. "The last time you went under, your vital signs started dropping."

"That isn't uncommon."

"Yes, but yours kept slipping. That isn't uncommon either, in patients who die in their comas. So no, I'm not real comfortable having you in the car and driving you further away from medical care."

She kept her mouth shut and waited out the rest of the ride. They finally arrived at the old farmhouse, where the front door opened even before they put the car in park on the gravel driveway.

A small redhead with her hair flowing down past her shoulders came out the front door. She was in typical kid clothes, but no pigtails. And she walked with an air of intelligence and introduced herself in perfect little belle form before handing over a pile of black and white, well-worn composition books. "These were Becky's. She left them here, because she did a lot of the frog research here. Y'all should have them."

It was Jordan who thanked her by name, took the books and shook hands with the hunky blond older brother, took a few minutes to learn what they did.

Aaron was a lawyer. And Jillian resisted the urge to point out that fit the profiles of those who had survived. The lawyers were over here. Of course, one lawyer didn't prove anything.

Melanie sniffed and ignored her. That made sense. Jillian didn't think she'd ever had a way with kids. Even when she'd been one. But the little girl spoke a mile a minute to Jordan. Didn't they all?

"Becky told me to go to the magnet school in Knoxville. I didn't want to, but--"

"Why not?" He was down on one knee, just below Melanie's eye level, and Jillian watched, fascinated. She just wanted to see how it happened, because a real conversation with a child was so far out of her own scope.

"I didn't want to ride the short bus. I didn't want to be different." She sniffled again. "But now I think maybe that's okay."

"If you want."

Her little head nodded vigorously. "I can learn to be a biologist."

"From what I hear, you already are." His hand settled on the small red head, and he managed to do it without coming across as condescending.

They said a few good-byes and Jordan made it clear that he needed to get Jillian back right away, although that was a pile of crap as far as she was concerned. But on the way back she put her head on the windshield and curled into the car door.

Jordan's hand was rough on her shoulder. "Don't you dare go to sleep. Don't even think about it." His eyes looked out over the road but his attention was on her, she knew. "You are not going under on my watch.”

• • • •

BECKY SAT VIRTUALLY still in the heated tent as she shuffled through the composition books she had dragged from home. The house hadn't felt quite so cold or lifeless when she had gone back this morning, and wound up having an hour and a half all to herself. Maybe it was because she and David had been through there. Maybe because she had accepted that the house no longer answered her back.

The notebooks, too, felt useless.

All the creatures in them had survived. The Warblers were thriving, and in the right place. The bees were still making the weird columns in Los Angeles. All her frogs were out and hopping: in her own backyard and in McCann. And she had to wonder what the hell it was all about. Why did they mutate? And would they ever know just what the effects were? And since the shifts only happened once every 60 million years or so, there was no real scientific need to find out.

But they did have to find out what the hell was happening to Jillian and David. Maybe there was a connection between what was happening to them and the frogs and other amphibs. The shift had taken a different toll on some species. Maybe it was doing the same to Jillian and David. And in the meantime it was taking its toll on Becky, too.

The mirror in tent 43 revealed the blue marks under her eyes. Initially only smudges, they had bloomed to full on bruise-like shades in the last twenty-four hours. Jillian passing out at the morgue had shocked a solid ten years onto Becky's age. Just when she thought everything had stabilized - hell, the frogs had righted themselves even - Jillian managed to scream herself into a coma.

Luckily David had caught her. Becky had her wonderings if it was because he felt something for the dark-haired doctor or if it was because he didn't. She couldn't read him. And wasn't sure she wanted to.

Then he had slipped away in the car on the ride home. That had put another ten years and two shades of pale on her face. If she added it all up she just might need to start smoking.

Dr. Jordan Abellard had died early.

David Carter was under, and so was Jillian Brookwood.

And she sat here, staring into space, because she had gotten tired of watching the clock move, sleeping in the straight-backed chairs, and fearing the ever-present slowing of the heart monitors.

The last two were slipping away, of the four who had initially discovered the reversal.

So she was here. The only survivor.

The day sent sun streaming in through the pores of the tent, making the desk lamp into a simple waste of electricity. The heater worked overtime, even though hot spots formed on her jeans clad legs where patches of sun filtered down to her. But she shivered.

Maybe when her folks showed up.

Maybe then she'd start to right herself.

“Becky?”

The voice was soft and familiar even if she didn't place it, and Becky turned to see who had approached through the open tent flap behind her, and let out the same ghastly sound that had come from Jillian's throat at the morgue.

Jillian Brookwood stood upright in the doorway, the straightforward expression and blue scrubs not any sort of indicator of whether Becky was having a hallucination or seeing the real person.

Jillian didn't respond. She couldn't. She was being jostled by the doctors and techs who came to check out the unearthly sounds emanating from tent 43. Becky closed her mouth, having developed a sudden fear that she, too, could scream herself into a coma.

Jillian's frown at being jostled around and shoved aside was all too appropriate, and Becky lost the fears. Shoving the techs out of the way, she engulfed Dr. Brookwood in a too-familiar hug. "When did you wake up? You seem fine! How are you feeling? Do you want to sit down?"

Jillian just waved away all the concerns and looked Becky in the eyes and smiled. Her grin revealing even teeth and a dimple. Her eyes nearly glowed and Becky wondered what was up.

She was baffled as Jillian shooed the others out of the tent, closing the flap behind them, before forcing Becky to sit.

"You're going to think I'm crazy-"

Becky had to interrupt. "Trust me. At this point there is no crazy."

"While I was under I figured it out." Jillian's eyes flashed: she knew something, and Becky knew that she would, too, in just a minute.

"You are the only person I know who could 'figure something out' while comatose. So what did you discover?"

Settling her hip on the desk, Jillian spoke and Becky absorbed. "During the time when everyone was under the earth shifted. It split. Not in half . . ." She gestured like slicing an orange, then waved a hand while she searched for words, which was significant in and of itself. Jillian was never at a loss for the right word. "There are two places now. Identical. Maybe two whole earths."

This time Jillian's hands found purpose. She wrapped them around an imaginary ball, fingers entwined, then pulled her hands apart, leaving her fingers in place. Her motions now showed her holding one of her imaginary earths in each hand. She shook her head at Becky, "I don't know where the other earth is, but I've been there. I think they're actually in the same place," her hands gestured as though the two little earths melded, "But in different . . . I don't know the word . . . 'realms'?"

Becky followed and Jillian must have gauged something from her face, for her eyes scanned once then she continued. "So the people who died here, woke up there." She gestured as though she still held small planets in her hands. "And those who died there-"

"Woke up here."

"I don't have it all worked out, but I am certain people can't exist in both places at the same time."

"So in order to wake up here, they had to die there, and vice versa." That was the logical tail, Becky knew, and in confirmation, Jillian nodded. Her thoughts turned over, and for once Jillian waited for someone else to draw their own conclusions. Becky didn't stop to wonder why she had been granted this rare privilege. "So, on the other side there are otters? But no frogs? No honeybees?"

Jillian shrugged, her blue scrubs revealing the sharp curve of her shoulders, and Becky realized that the doctor had lost weight. But even as thin as she was, she had shucked her jacket first thing when she'd come into the tent. And only now did Becky reach out the short distance to turn down the heat. Only now did she feel a little less cold herself.

But Becky saw right away that Jillian wouldn't wait for her feelings to catch up, so she tuned into Jillian's voice, already in progress. "-don't know about the otters but we have all the animals that were having troubles before the reversal."

Becky felt one eyebrow rise, "And you know this how?"

"Because when we went back under, David and I woke up there."

Becky wanted to release the sigh she was holding back, but years of southern manners forced her to retain it. "Of course you did, otherwise how would you have figured that out? I bet David fell down the steps there, too, but what about-”

Becky gasped as the air was forced out of her by way of a merciless hug from Jillian. She had blinked and missed seeing it coming - only suffered the feeling of having the wind knocked out of her.

But Jillian didn't apologize; she shined. “You are so much smarter than the boys. Even after I explained the whole thing, they still didn't believe me!”

Becky shoved aside the sinking feeling that Jillian was serious, and ignored the dance of joy. “The boys?”

“Jordan. Landerly. David's there now.” Jillian had answered straight up, but her brain wasn't engaged with Becky. It was on its own track and further into the conversation than Becky was. And for a brief moment she wondered how Jillian could do that.

But because it was Jillian, who would take the conversation and run, Becky pushed through another round of thoughts and tried to give credence to the theories. “If all the animals that were abnormal before the reversal survived both here and there, then maybe they were reacting to it. Preparing in some way.” Jillian nodded, and Becky dove in with her objection. “But where did you get your list? I don't know if anyone had as comprehensive a list as I do.”

Jillian's eyes twinkled again. “We have your list. . . . well, on the other side they do. We got it yesterday. Seems a kid talked her way through to getting Landerly's cell number and called him up posing as a biologist-”

“Melanie?!” Becky felt her whole body lean forward, and even as the name tumbled from her mouth, she knew she'd be devastated when Jillian said ‘no’.

But Jillian was nodding before the word was through. “She said she was Doctor Melanie Sorenson. Said she had your notebooks and that you would want the CDC to have them. That she'd found them in the house.”

“In the house?” Everything had made sense up until that.

“They came back a day or two ago, and yesterday afternoon Jordan and I drove out to get them.”

Becky's belly clenched. “Dr. Abellard? You two drove to my house? But I was there this morning!” She paused as it washed over her. She wouldn't see Melanie ever again. She wasn't going to slip into a coma and find the missing pieces of her family. “But I was here.”

Again Jillian nodded, her head looking like the little bobble dogs everyone had in the back windows of their cars, what with the incessant nodding and the grin. The funny image kept Becky's tears at bay. It helped that Jillian didn't see how she felt and just kept talking. “We met her and your hunky older brother Aaron. They came back and he decided they should stay.”

“Aaron.” The name rolled off her tongue in some sort of homage, but she was too mentally busy to figure it out. “Of course he's not here, he's a lawyer.”

Jillian almost cackled. “You know, it took me hours to convince Abellard and Landerly that people were sorted by their occupations. And they still didn't begin to get any of it until David woke up pissed off about being casted from hip to toe.” With a sad smile she changed the topic with no segue, but Becky followed her. “Melanie said she was going to go to that magnet school you suggested, that it didn't matter if she had to ride the short bus.”

With that the constriction in her chest expanded saturating every part of her. Creating pressure inside until it forced its way out in tears and sobs. But she didn't know what she cried for. Because she was happy they were alive. Or because, no matter where they were, they were still gone from her world.

David pushed through the blackness. Struggling to find light. And knowing even as he came around just what was happening. He was coming out again. And from the feel of his twitches and jerky, involuntary hand-squeezes and such, he wasn't broken up.

Hal-a-fuckin'-loo-yah..

The other side wouldn't be so bad if he wasn't bashed all to hell.

He laid there, eyes still closed and lacking the control necessary to open. He didn't push much. It never seemed to help anyway. The darkness would recede on its own terms.

So he waited it out, feeling the air pull into his lungs a little deeper each time. His breathing and heart rate sped up bit by bit, while his consciousness rolled around in his head, waiting to solidify.

"David?"

The tone came through sweet and clear.

Jillian. "Are you coming around?"

No, honey, I thought it'd be best to hang out in the netherworld for a stretch.

He felt rather than commanded the exasperated sigh that fled his lungs.

And, pure as bells, Jillian laughed from somewhere over him.

"Well, we don't have to worry about any impostors."

He would have smiled, but was caught off guard by a second female voice coming from behind her. Sorenson. "With all the other problems we have, I'm glad we don't have that one."

But Becky's sarcasm was brushed aside by the slightly southern lilt of Jillian, so close. "We're glad you made it back to us, David."

Was there any question that he wouldn't?

He cringed at the raw scrape in his throat. He could live without this wrenching process of waking up. Sound forced its way out of his mouth, but he didn't have much time to process it, because light shined in through the miniscule slits his eyelids had formed and it burned like a mother-fucker.

Another sound emanated from him, and he turned slightly, wincing as he went. But in a moment of clarity his consciousness congealed. No pain. No breaks. Here he was as good as new.

David let his breath out and blinked his eyes a few times even though they felt like they were filled with sand. Jillian's gentle hands grasped his shoulders and applied soft pressure to wake him up. Hold off on the shaking, honey, I'm coming around.

"He's coming around." Her voice was a little muffled, and within the light he could make out a long, dark chocolate streak - her ponytail. She was talking over her shoulder to Becky. But the streak swung out of the glare and her face moved in closer to fill his vision. Her eyes burning like aquamarines and becoming clearer with each moment. "We weren't sure when you'd come out."

He nodded slightly, and opened his mouth to speak, but Jillian beat him to the punch. "Your vitals were getting concerning until about an hour ago. You were dropping well into the low end of normal and we were debating a few measures. But you're here now."

"You, too." He wasn't sure why those words were the ones that came out of his cotton-filled mouth. And from her frown neither was she. But he licked his lips and worked his tongue for a moment before he explained. "Abellard put you on an IV. . . . for low heart rate. Something about your volume."

She nodded, absorbing and understanding what he relayed, even though he didn't. "My blood volume. Goes with low blood pressure. Over there?"

He nodded. Then with a few deep breaths he gathered the energy to prop himself on his elbows. He ignored Becky and Jillian while he sat up, piece by piece. They didn't seem to take much notice of him until he was fully upright and rotating his ankles and knees, the sensation of stretching muscles flowing through him in the sweetest of ways. This beat the hell out of living in casts and popping Percocet.

He wanted to get out and walk around. Hell, he'd have turned cartwheels if he could have. Well, maybe if it wasn't so gay.

"Hey, cowboy," Jillian's grasp wrapped around his upper arms and held him on the gurney, "don't go anywhere without a little help."

He thought about waking up with the searing pain in his shoulder and hip, and that, over there, he never got out of bed at all. "Well, I only have half the practice at it that you do."

"Touché." She had the grace to wince.

With a sigh of acceptance he let Becky and Jillian brace him on either side, and he actually enjoyed the sharp pains that shot up his legs when his feet hit the ground. He looked at the small women trying to hold him upright with Lilliputian efforts. Men might have done a better job, cushioned his landing a little more, but right now neither woman seemed to notice that she was plastered, full-length, down his side. David noticed. And smiled.

"I'm hungry."

They both looked up at him. Maybe wondering why such normal words had fallen out of his mouth in such an absurd situation.

Becky shook her head, and he could feel the movement where her chest was smushed against him, just under his ribcage. "I forget how fast you two come around once you do wake."

David stifled a perverted smile as Jillian shrugged and the movement drew her breast against him. She explained, "Once you come around, it's just like any other day. . . except the part where you're crazy."

David actually laughed at that. He didn't care to imagine the way that Abellard and Landerly must have grilled her. They had given him hell and they hardly knew him.

Her voice cut into his thoughts again. "So, let's head over to the cafeteria." She tugged on his arm, and he realized that even together, they couldn't budge him.

"No." He extricated himself from their grasp. "What I want is to drive my new Mercedes and go out somewhere and have someone cook me a nice big steak."

"That sounds heavenly."

They almost started drooling and he had a momentary vision of a bubbling hot tub, with the drooling faces inserted. Except he had once had Jillian in a bikini in a hot tub, and there had even been beer, and . . . nothing.

Becky's voice chimed in, "I'm game. But where would we get a steak now?"

Still they proceeded with full hope that it was possible, the women shrugging into their jackets and Jillian tossing him his brown suede bomber after her hands were through her own sleeves. They filed out the tent flap, his fingers encircling the ring of keys in his pocket. A brief burst of relief settling into him that they were really there. That he had actually bought the car. Here.

He pulled the keys out, letting the short frigid gust of wind steal heat from his fingers. But he didn't care. Looking up to see how far the chattering women had gotten ahead of him, he stopped dead.

No way in hell.

But it was.

In the flesh.

“David.” The old man spoke through thin lips. His hair whiter and wisper than the last time they had seen each other. His chest a little more of a barrel, but in general he seemed the same. Certainly in great shape for a man of sixty-nine. And David knew, with the certainty that he knew himself, that if the weight was there, then the old man simply hadn’t been able to get it off. “Dad.”

His right hand shot out, years of reflex and training, and grasped the slightly wizened version that met it.

“How long has it been?” His father’s voice was cultured and smooth. Of course. Naturally, everything about him spoke of wealth and power, just the way he planned. And David felt the added pressure of another disadvantage: David Carter The First also hadn’t just awoken from a coma.

God, he hadn’t even thought to check the lists to see if his old man was alive over here. And here he was - in Tennessee of all places.

David’s chest settled into lead. He came to see me. He gathered himself and answered his father’s question. “Two years.”

“Too long.”

Not long enough. But he mustered a weak smile.

Jillian and Becky stood in the background of the portrait his father made, behind the space the old man commanded. He wished they would go back to their female chatter, and stop watching this drama unfold, because David knew what happened every time he and the old man talked.

Damn, he had really thought he was done with the man when his name had turned up on the lists. But that was there. It would be best to just get it over with. “What are you doing here, Dad?”

He felt his body shrink back to adolescence, his maturity level drop several notches. And things he had carefully shoved to the back of his life begin a steady seep into the here and now.

“I came to see my son.” He gestured with the brilliant mahogany cane David had only just realized he was carrying. “I hear you’re the wizard who discovered all this.”

Where the hell was the old man going? David waited for the knife to come out, the other shoe to drop. But he only nodded. Knowing, even as he did it, that Jillian and Becky were standing right there listening, and that they deserved their due. But he couldn’t bring himself to give it, not when The First stood in front of him.

“Very impressive.”

David heard, but didn’t believe, the praise. Years of experience had taught him that the better the complement was, the harder the knife came from behind. So he waited, and the old man spoke again. “Did you use my hotspot theories?”

Ah, the joy of honesty. “I used a few. But in the end they didn’t pan out.” Again he fronted what he hoped looked like a genuine smile, and promptly changed the subject. “Dad, I’d like you to meet Dr. Jillian Brookwood and I believe you’ve met Dr. Rebecca Sorenson several years ago. They’re both with the CDC.”

Jillian nodded, of course she had already figured it out. His father scanned the two women, keeping his smile in place. But David knew. Dad wore a full business suit, and a small tic of the muscle along his jaw revealed what he thought of Jillian’s scrubs and sneakers, and worse yet, Becky’s faded old jeans and hiking boots. But his father just nodded in return, and acknowledged the two women in a polite way. Only David knew that it was less than his usual greeting. The one he reserved for esteemed colleagues and ornament women.

The invitation he extended was with his usual graciousness. “I was wondering if you would do me the honor of joining me for dinner.”

David felt both stares swing his way. He warred between being grateful that the females deferred to him in front of his father, and frustrated knowing there was no polite way out.

Before he could answer, his father stepped up to the plate and steered the conversation. “I have my limo waiting.”

Great. He felt his insides congeal and sink. Becky’s jaw dropped open and Jillian tried to hide the lift of her eyebrows but didn’t quite swing it.

David conceded defeat, a position he was used to when The First was around. And his father smiled, a big genuine grin that ate at David. Was it because he was happy that people would join him for dinner, or because he had succeeded in manipulating the situation?

The driver stepped over, decked in his full black suit, and held the door while Becky and Jillian slid in the back. They resembled puppies running loose in a mansion - young, out of place, and oblivious to all of it. He followed his father into the tight black confines of the car, wondering how the hell this had happened.

The earth had undergone a radical transformation. Over half the population had died. People were still trying to just get their lives back on track, to get institutions up and running. And his father had found a limousine, complete with a monkey-suited driver.

The voice, so like his own, broke through his thoughts. “Now, do you have a preference for dinner?”

Jillian and David looked to Becky, who shrugged as if to say, ‘I don’t live here either’. But her mouth opened and she spoke the words. “We were thinking about steak, but I’ll be honest, we have no idea where to get one right now.”

David bit down on the end of his tongue, wondering what his father would say. But the old man reached across the space between them, his hand clapping his son on the back. And for a brief moment David thanked the fates that his father had found him in this world and not the other one, that he hadn’t been forced to have this conversation from a gurney, behind the safety of the babyrail. “I’m staying at the Garden Plaza Hotel.”

“It’s open?” Becky’s voice cut the air with her shock. “The convenience store is still on the honor system. There are a few fast-food joints that are up and running, but-”

David watched while his father nodded at the plebes, unsurprised by their lack of understanding. The First always lived as though money could buy anything. “I had them open it. The driver will have called ahead to tell them how many to expect.”

The old embarrassment crept over him. He had been raised this way, but for whatever reason, it hadn’t stuck. His father considered it a huge shortcoming. And David was appalled that his father believed the world came running with the wave of a few bills. It was worse when The First believed that his son should, too.

He saw Becky and Jillian exchange glances. But whether it was awe over his father’s abilities, or a good moral sense that disliked the buying and selling of everything, he didn’t know.

It was clear that The First was through with their shock and he simply turned to David. “That was some very impressive work you did, son.” His father’s eyes caught his. The complement seemed genuine. “All the universities will be trying to grab you for next term.”

His father actually seemed proud - like he was glad The Second was his son. He never really had been before. There had been moments like this where it had felt like the rift was closing, not healing, but getting narrower. And always before, David had reached out. Always before, when he had pulled his hand back it was bloody.

Still, he wondered.

• • • •

JORDAN STARED AT THE inert form as he felt his chest caving in on itself.

Jillian lay still and quiet, spread across the gurney in front of him. At a perpendicular was David. They had watched him slip away about ten hours ago. The geologist's vital signs were dropping slowly but surely.

But it was Jillian who had already sunk into dangerously low numbers.

She was the one that worried him.

Jordan couldn't say he'd feel anything but professional failure if David completely slipped away. But if Jillian did . . . he didn't even want to examine that too closely.

They had initially covered her with a blanket, in a feeble attempt to retain some of the body heat she was so rapidly depleting. A few hours ago he had added an electric blanket, heating her from the outside. He and Landerly had made the call to run an IV into her just after David had slipped away.

But she'd been under now for sixteen hours.

A long time.

Her vitals were lower than he had ever seen them. And still slipping lower. The electric blanket made up for some of the cold leached into her system by the IV fluid. Her core temperature was ninety-seven - low, but close. He began tucking the blanket around her, under her feet, along her side. She made no response.

Not that he had thought she would. But he did keep hoping.

With a last look, he turned his ministrations to David, noting with professional detachment that his temperature was stable and very close to normal. Jordan pulled the hospital issue blanket up just under David's chin after taking a full round of vital signs and recording them in the chart left open on the desk at his side.

With a glance at Jillian, Jordan reached down and calmly turned up the space heater. He told himself that it was chilly in the tent, that any additional help maintaining her body temperature would be welcome. But there was nothing else he could do. Techs were looking in on the pair every five minutes. And her vitals signs were ebbing away in a flow that was too slow to actually watch.

He wandered to the cafeteria and ate a dinner he couldn't remember ten seconds after he swallowed the last bite, staring straight ahead the whole while.

Where was Jillian? If her theory was right, then she was somewhere with Becky and now David, too. And if there were two separate realms on top of each other, maybe she was here, in the cafeteria. His eyes darted from one spot to another. Thinking he might catch a shadow of Jillian, or, just maybe, see through to where she was.

He didn't want to believe it. Coma was a medical mystery of sorts. Unlike near-death-experience, it was believed and quantifiable, but with no true underlying explanation. No solid evidence about what happened to patients' conscious minds while they were under.

A black composition book sat unopened on the table beside him, and all around him real shadows existed, cast by other team members. They talked and waved like a hurricane around the silent eye, but they didn't interact with him, these stragglers last CDC scientists.

The tent town was still up in its entirety, but in the past day or two the population had thinned out as the scientists had returned to jobs and families. There was even talk of needing to re-open the high-school.

His watch showed that he had been sitting there, eating his forgettable food, for nearly an hour. He'd been lost in the blank walls of the cafeteria, looking for Jillian, when according to her, the other side was just as populated as here. There would be shadows and hints of people everywhere if he could see them.

He turned to make his way back out into the cold night, through small but vicious gusts of wind, that wouldn't register with him at any level other than the most cursory. And he would begin again - go through his whole routine, checking on Jillian.

She looked exactly as she had when he left her. But when he counted, her heart rate was another beat per minute slower. She was another breath per minute slower, too. And that was very significant given the low rate she was already at.

He wandered off to get Landerly. "Her resps are slowing." He spewed it out as he pushed through the tent flaps, any 'hello' a wasted formality on the old scientist.

"We shouldn't interfere until she's in serious danger. We'll go back in an hour."

Jordan felt his heart clench. The old man had simply brushed it off. But then again, he was an MD, too. He knew his numbers and had seen far more than anyone's fair share of medical mysteries. So Jordan forced himself to sit. Then to open the notebook and pretend to do . . . something like working.

He felt Landerly's eyes on him before he heard the voice. "So what do you think of our girl's theory?"

Jordan shrugged. "She believes it."

Landerly nodded. "That puts a lot of weight behind it for you."

It wasn't a question, so Jordan decided to neither acknowledge nor refute it. "She has all the right information. And I don't know how she could have gotten it any other way. Nor how she could have gotten such perfect corroboration from David . . ."

Again Landerly nodded. "Let's work from the assumption that she's right. How does this second earth work? Where is it?"

He almost laughed. That was exactly what had been ricocheting around his brain since Jillian had slipped under. The only thing that occupied his thoughts except Jillian's status. "It's right here. It's the same earth you and I are on."

"Then why don't we see them? Where are they?"

His brain focused. God bless the old man for the distraction. "It's like x-rays. It passes right through and we don't detect it."

Landerly scrunched his face.

So he continued. "There's more space between atoms than the atoms themselves take up." He tapped his hand on the table. "My flesh doesn't go through the table, not because there's too much stuff but because they vibrate in the same range. That means they bump into each other. Higher and lower vibrations pass through us. Like UV light. It's borderline, and it gets through the top layer of our skin. So if something was much higher or much lower, it wouldn't even be in our range. We'd pass right through it and never know it was there. Like x-rays.

"If we follow Jillian's theory, then at some point while everyone was under, the vibrations could have shifted into two distinct bands. And some people stayed with one and some with the other. Jason found that shift in the UV-vis scale. Jillian put a lot of stock in that. She's probably running a panel on the other side right now." Landerly didn't say anything, so after a few seconds Jordan continued, just to fill the empty space. "It might explain some of the shifting. In fact, that shifting may be why everyone got sick in the first place. We just didn't hold up well in the Earth's splitting vibrational level."

Landerly pondered it. Jordan could see it on his face. And saw that he, too, had found holes or gaps in the theory. It wasn't a perfect theory, but as usual, Jordan was stuck waiting for a better one to come along. Certainly Miss Jillian could come up with something.

Landerly tapped his thin lips with his pencil. "So how did it get decided who wound up on which side?"

"Jillian says there's a job description bias."

Landerly shrugged. "She's right. They've got most all the cops, we've got the lawyers. They've got preachers and we've got teachers. We got the CIA almost to a man. Now that's creepy."

Jordan almost laughed. But it was creepy. "Surely there's no God sitting up there saying 'lawyers this way, cops that way'. What I can't figure out is how it ended up that way. Geography would have made more sense, especially given that the root of the problem is a geological phenomenon."

"There is some geographical bias." Landerly leaned forward, the fact that he moved from his standard, laid back, steepled-fingers position indicated that he was interested in the topic. Very interested.

"Like what?"

"It's not obvious, but it is statistically significant. We have more Californians, less southerners, more east coast, less bread basket." He dragged a pencil across the map he had flipped open as he spoke.

"But there are greater and lesser populations in those areas. It just matches with the census."

Landerly shook his head, and Jordan knew he'd been chastised, "Beyond that. Based on percentage of the population those areas are higher and lower."

"Oh." Of course Landerly hadn't missed an obvious point like that. Jordan and Jillian had been hired to be the man's field hands - not his brain. "Maybe there's a meteorological factor, like humidity or cloud cover."

There was never a response to his idea. The older man simply bent back to his work, flipping pages, making spreadsheets with data from the deceased lists and survivor lists, adding in colored bands with Jillian's info.

It wasn't long before the requisite hour had passed, and Jordan popped up to check on Jillian.

He was back within a heartbeat. "She's too low."

He reported the fact to Landerly, but he didn't ask anything. He simply left, running through the tents, asking everyone where he could find a ventilator, wondering why he hadn't been better prepared when he had seen this coming. Maybe because he hadn't wanted to believe.

He called the hospital, who said they couldn't spare one. So he yelled until he was hoarse and a ventilator was on its way. Luckily the small local hospital was barely across the street. Within twenty minutes the techs were wheeling the thing his way, bumping it across the chewed up grass, while Jordan cringed, wondering if it would still function by the time it reached her.

He pulled her gurney out so he could stand at the head, and lowered her a notch, then drew a deep breath before beginning the process of intubating her. He was far more stressed than usual. Jordan had done a hundred intubations, but this one counted. As he finished and let out a shaky breath, the techs hooked up the machine and her lungs started expanding with the forced air at her normal eighteen respirations per minute.

The tent cleared out, leaving him alone with the two patients, and he wanted to feel relief. But he was closer to crying when Landerly showed up. “I figured you’d do it sooner or later.”

Shock sent him staggering back a step. “You wouldn’t have done it?”

A deep sigh, holding untold decisions, preceded the remark. “I don’t know. I only knew that I didn’t have to, that you would make that decision. I might still let her go.” He shrugged, old bony shoulders making points beneath his white jacket.

“Why?!” Fury raged through him alongside the despair he had felt at his father’s bedside. But this was worse. This time he felt he should be in control. He just wasn’t.

“I-”

But he cut Landerly off. “Why did you hire me anyway? I thought I was this brilliant scientist and she would do all the nitpicky stuff. Then I realized she’s the brilliant scientist and the perfectionist. So why the hell am I even here!?” God, he should have been in a pediatric office. He could have made a difference there.

Here, what had he done? Tagged along behind Jillian. Nodded acquiescence to her ideas. Charted her theories.

His breath rushed out, his volume shrinking.

But Landerly’s voice caught him. There was a smile in it. “I thought you would have figured that out by now.”

But Jordan only shook his head, pacing a small section of the grass while his eyes darted everywhere revealing the scattering of his thoughts.

This time it was Landerly who filled the space, compelled to talk to cover the harsh mechanical rhythm of the ventilator. “There were other doctors who were individually more qualified than either of you. More experience, et cetera.”

Not helpful, old man.

“But I put you two together thinking you would be the best team.”

“But Jillian is just like you. Why would you need me?”

Jordan’s gaze went to the upper corners of the tent, the glazed focus an attempt to fight off the waves of emptiness. His fists perched on his hips, as though he might physically fend something off. So he was surprised when he felt the weight of Landerly’s arm across his shoulder, the paternal gesture so out of character. “Jordan, Jillian is not just like me. She’s smarter than I ever was or ever will be. I think she thinks in the same kinds of patterns, but she’s faster and better at it than anyone I’ve ever seen.”

Jordan nodded agreement, thinking that the one thing he wanted to know still wasn’t answered.

“And you, son, are a fool if you don’t see it.”

Well, then, I guess I’m the fool. But he didn’t say it out loud. Just waited while the ventilator clicked and grated its way through another two mechanical breaths.

“You’re the heart. Jillian couldn’t be what she is without you. I know you got those people in Florida talking. I’ll bet you’re the only reason that we have any data from Nevada that isn’t just a jumble of numbers. I’ll bet you’ve even listened to her think, then turned around and managed to interview everyone to find out if she was right or not. Jesus, five minutes into your interview you had me telling you things about my family and lifestyle that people who worked with me for years don’t know.”

Defeat. That’s what was sagging in him. But he answered the absurd ideas Landerly laid out. “Sure, but anybody could do that. There’s no effort or special skill, I just-“

“No, anybody can’t. I can’t. Jillian can’t. Most good physicians can’t. There must be special talent or someone as smart as Jillian would have figured out how to do it. Or at least fake it. And I’ll tell you something else, if you asked Jillian how she does what she does, she’d tell you the same thing: she just does it. It’s just the way her brain works.”

That much was true. Jillian brushed off her gift as though it wasn’t exceptional or unique.

Jordan pulled in a few sighs, finding it difficult to let his body just breathe when he was faced with the fact that Jillian just wasn’t.

So he changed the topic, found a way to get out of the tent, if only for a few minutes. He probably would be compelled to come back after that long anyway. “Speaking of Jillian’s brain, I want to hook her up to that EEG.”

Landerly nodded, before slowly and painfully making his way out of the tent. Jordan followed, his gait a shuffling mimic of the old man in front of him. In a moment he returned with the EEG set-up, thinking he should have brought two back and hooked David up as well. But it wasn’t like he was busy for the next ten hours or anything.

The gurney was still pulled out, so he stood at the head of the bed, where he didn’t have to look at her motionless face. With gentle hands, he brushed her hair aside and placed the probes one after another in the appropriate spots. But as much as he wished it, there was no response from her.

So he stepped back and flipped the switch, watching as the green lines crawled across the screen. To anyone else, they could have been anything. Lie detectors, seismographs, heart beats. But he knew what he was seeing, and he stared. For how long, he didn’t know.

The rustle of a person coming through the tent flap finally roused him back to himself. And while he hadn’t been really ‘in there’, his brain had catalogued every passing line. He knew them all and he knew what they meant.

Landerly’s voice cut through his thoughts. “Well?”

“She’s almost brain dead.”

Jillian had been shivering beneath the covers of the gurney in tent 43, and finally it was getting warm. Becky, of course, had simply crawled under the blanket on the bed next to her and sunk into sleeping oblivion without a second thought.

For Jillian it wasn't so easy. Alone now with her thoughts, she was unable to find rest. The shifting plagued her. She had looked for answers for most of the day. Checking out that UV-vis problem that Jordan had brushed aside. And sure enough the scale was way low here. And getting lower.

That was concerning. She had checked out the machine earlier in the day and then come back later with another sample. The machine had been just a little off, and she'd had to recalibrate.

But if that was due to anything other than her own error, that could mean the vibrations were moving further apart. The earth wasn't finished separating, it still had further to go. And where would she get stuck?

When she admitted it to herself, the insomnia was a physical manifestation of her fear - of not knowing where she would wake up, or with whom.

She was the reason Becky had insisted they stay together. Even going so far as to sleep alongside each other on the plastic coated and damned uncomfortable gurneys. So Becky would know on waking if Jillian had gone under again during the night.

Not at this rate she wouldn't.

Becky had also insisted that David sleep in the tent next door and had drawn up a schedule for the techs on the night shift to check in every hour. It seemed like they were gremlins, breaking the seal that the tent flap had made against the light. Just as she would feel she was finally drifting off, resting, the light would shine right into her eyes.

She had asked – begged - them to stop checking. Even if she went under what could they do except say 'look, there she went'? But none of them would agree to leave her be. The second check had come just minutes ago, kickstarting her brain when it had finally begun to fall silent again.

She knew they were checking on David as well, although there was every possibility that he had managed to sleep like a baby. He seemed to be able to just turn himself off and on. But then again, maybe he wasn't doing so well tonight. He was facing bruised and broken ribs, fractures and learning to walk again on the other side. He'd rather wake up here.

And he'd been agitated all evening. While she could quantify it, Jillian was hard pressed to name the source. Even though the steak dinner had been great and his father had been nothing but proud. Once she added that thought in, she would bet her life savings that he wasn't sleeping either.

Jillian tucked that thought back under her bonnet as well. At dinner she'd said something about hating that Landerly didn't believe her, and the server had leaned over and quoted the Bible to her - warning her that her hateful thoughts went against the teachings of Jesus.

Becky hadn't said anything, she'd been familiar with the parable the woman had named, but David had commented on the high quantity of Jesus and God he'd seen around. More than one group thought they'd ascended. Jillian was just waiting for them to don their identical Nikes and drink the Kool-aid that would get them to the mothership. The way she figured it, Darwinian selection wasn't just about predators selecting you out of the herd. Self-selection was as good as any, and darn cheap in light of societal costs.

“Pssst.”

Had someone just said 'pssst'? No way, no one said that! She ignored the sound.

But it came again. This time accompanied by a crack of light at the tent flap and a “Jillian, you awake?”

Even whispered, she recognized the voice. “Coming, David.”

Part of her didn't want to wake Becky, the other part of her wanted to do it just to disturb the peaceful sleep she was so jealous of. But she slipped softly into her sneakers, and pulled on her jacket, before passing quietly through the tent flap to where David waited, rubbing his hands together for warmth.

“Couldn't sleep?” They both said it at the same time, then laughed, until they remembered to curb it. Aside from a few night shift techs, everyone else was asleep.

David grabbed her hand, and she was grateful that he'd kept his warm. “I was thinking we might take a walk to wear ourselves out, but it's really too cold.” She nodded agreement, and didn't protest as he pulled her along to his tent, where he popped on the interior light at the end of the table.

She blinked a few times, then adjusted. Finally upright, and admitting she was awake, she could feel the exhaustion in her muscles. “So, we'll just sit up and keep each other company until we finally pass out?”

“That's my guess.” He shrugged, “I don't want to go back. I'm bashed to hell over there.”

She climbed up on the gurney, getting her feet out of the cold that pooled on the floors of the small tents, “But with physical therapy-”

He cut her off. “I've had three doctors over there tell me that I'm facing at least a year of rehab. And another surgery to re-break both my hip and leg so they can be re-set.”

Jillian cringed, but he waved her discomfort and guilt away.

“You did an amazing job. All by yourself. But I may never walk without a limp. And that's after all that therapy. Why do it?”

She nodded, understanding straightforward reasoning for a problem that was anything but. “And your Dad's here.”

“Yeah, I don't know what to make of that.”

She felt her head tilt, the outward manifestation of her natural curiosity.

“We've never gotten along. He never accepted me; I was always inferior . . .”

“But he was nothing but complimentary tonight. You're the best son in the whole world.” She didn't mean for it to come out as sarcastic as it did, but David understood. He laughed.

“Yeah, that worries me.” She could hear the resignation in his sigh, “We've been so far apart for so long that . . . I don't know.”

“Do you want to patch things up with your Dad?”

His shoulders shrugged. His head shook ‘no’. His mouth said “I guess.” And his hands came out, palm up, to question all of it.

It was all she could do to stifle the laugh that bubbled low in her. And she was grateful for the lightness of it. It beat the hell out of the fear she'd been trying to sleep with. She was only sorry that her improvement had come at David's expense. “Oh well. True, your Dad is here, but so are the Jesus freaks. And it's not like there's much you can do about it anyway.”

His head turned square on to hers, and their gazes locked. “So doctor, tell me what you think is going to happen to us.”

Just like that, it was her turn to shrug, to shake her head. “Our vital signs keep dropping lower and lower every time we go under.”

“Abellard said something to that effect when he looked in on you right before I popped over here.”

Good. She knew where she’d wake up if she came to over there. “I figure we keep passing back and forth until we die on one side, then we’ll be stuck on the other.”

David didn’t respond. How could he when she had just placed their mortality squarely in front of them? Her voice was low, in response to the difficulty she was having pushing it out. “With the way our stats have been dropping recently, I don’t figure we’ll go back and forth too much more. Maybe two times. Three or four at the most.”

He nodded. “Do you think we’ll feel it? Or we’ll never know, just realize that we keep waking up in the same place over and over?”

Again her head shook. It was the only thing she could think of. She couldn’t just shrug a response to every question. But the same ones had been tumbling through her own head all evening. “There’s another possibility.”

“Name it.”

“It’s worse.” She couldn’t look at him. Instead she studied the neat, even stitching on her once white sneakers, noting how the dirt had clung, clearly outlining the threads as they marched in efficient lines across her toes. “We could get caught between. Die both places.” Again her shoulders went up, and she suppressed the thought that she would get some really buff deltoids from all this shrugging. “We have to acknowledge that we might not survive this at all.”

Still she didn’t look at him, just waited through a few well-placed breaths until he spoke. “Any ideas why we got caught between?”

She laughed, a short bark of disbelief. “I still can’t figure out why people ended up on one side and not the other. There are a lot of Bible thumpers over here . . . but . . .”

“I think Becky had a good point that there was a lot of right and wrong over here. The Bible thumpers just seem to fall into that category.”

Her brain wrapped around that for a moment, wondering whether there were a lot of shades of gray on Jordan’s side.

In that moment, as she drew that breath in, she knew that this wasn’t the place for her. That if she could choose, she’d be there. With her job. With Jordan and Landerly. The way David would chose to be with his family here. But she couldn’t choose, so she ignored the thought, and started herself in another direction in hopes of shaking it. “I figure we got caught in between because of some weird pattern of early exposure. But I can’t figure out why Becky or Jordan or anyone from McCann doesn’t have it, too. Jordan says there are reports from about three other places in the world. Each with one person who keeps going back under.”

“Have any of them actually died yet?”

She knew he was looking at her, but she wasn’t ready for eye contact. “Not that I know of. But I haven’t seen Jordan in a full day now.” Maybe it would have been easier to stay in her own bed and toss and turn with her own thoughts rather than dealing with David’s.

“What if there were another option? What if you could choose?”

Her head snapped up, to find his blue gaze boring into hers. For some reason she felt he saw deeper than the surface of her for the first time.

He broke the spell by speaking. “It works because we want to stay on opposite sides.”

That was all he said, but she could see where he was going with it. “No.” It was just a whisper. She couldn’t do it. “We don’t even know that it will work.” Fear ran through her, icing her limbs, holding her still when what she wanted was to leap from the bed and flee back to the cold gurney waiting in tent 43.

“We may die if we do nothing.”

“I can’t!” She started to actually move away from him, but his hand shot out, grabbed her arm, jerked at her as her feet hit the ground, preventing her flight from progressing past that first leap.

“Then you go back and forth. But do it for me when you wake up over there.”

“I can’t.” The anguish in her system burst forth in tears, “I can’t.”

He wanted her to . . . what? . . . hold a pillow over his face? Squeeze his throat? Medicate him? Any way to end his life. Over there.

“Then hire someone.” He hadn’t let go of her arm, and while he wasn’t bruising her, neither was she going to wrench free. “I’ll give you all my banking codes. You can draft yourself a check from my account and pay them.”

“David . . .” She searched for any logical ‘no’. “I’d go to jail.”

His gaze was steady, and should have been ice cold for what he was suggesting, but it was warm as the blue center of a hot flame. “I can get the names of some people from my Dad, it won’t be traced. You can just give them the banking codes. Let them get their own money. I’ll be very rich over there because my father has died and I’ll have more than I can spend.”

She couldn’t fault his logic. But neither could she agree.

Her head still shook back and forth. He slid off the bed, and stood looming over her, holding her upper arms firmly in both hands. Only then did she realize that streams of tears were pouring down her face. She couldn’t do any of it. Not go back and forth anymore, nor could she end it. He looked her square in the eyes and asked again, “Please.”

Again she shook her head, and started to refuse again, but he headed her off.

“What are you going to do? Go back and forth and maybe die? Wind up wherever you happen to be? Maybe in between, and who knows what the hell that is! I can release you over here, too . . . and stop this.”

She heard the soft ripping of the Velcro on the tent flap behind her. A tech popped his head in, and she saw David’s gaze connect over her shoulder with whoever it was. “I guess you two are both still awake.”

David simply nodded and started to look back at her, a certain dismissal of the young tech, but the voice came again, “Are you two okay?”

Her nod and David’s curt ‘yes’ must have sufficed, because the tent flap softly closed behind her, and the heat from the small orange-glowing heater at her feet seeped around to envelop her again, shutting out the cold that had reached in and tickled her from the open gap.

David’s stare returned to her face. “I don’t want to go back there. I live there on a gurney in a haze of pain and Percocet-”

“You’ll get better!”

“I am better. Here.” He was restraining himself from shaking her. But it wouldn’t have mattered. She could feel her heart thundering in the empty cavern of her chest. But she forced even breaths, afraid that if she passed out, she’d only shuttle herself back and forth again. Her eyes burned. Her mouth was swollen from where she’d been chewing at her lip, and her vision was glazed with tears.

“It’s simple. And it’s what we both want.”

She didn’t try to respond. She couldn’t have anyway, his mouth closed over hers, stopping all her protests.

Jillian simply surrendered. She needed this. Needed to feel his hands slip from her biceps to the back of her shoulders and pull her closer. His sweater was softer than she could have believed when her fingers passed over it, feeling the hard muscle beneath. She didn't even stop and make any quantifiable assessment of him. Just kissed him back.

She didn't protest as his fingers, tough and soft at the same time, pushed the tears away. "David . . ."

He pulled away just long enough to get her to open her eyes. And when she did he shook his head. So she closed them again, and raised her mouth, never once wondering if his would meet hers.

Jillian didn't realize when he had backed them the two steps to the gurney, only that he had followed her shoulder blades down her back, arching her body into contact with his, and finally arriving behind her thighs, where he lifted her astride him into the heat of him, and the unmistakable arousal.

He took one sharp look at her eyes. He knew what he was doing, and he wanted to know if she did. His hand snaked out to shut off the desk light that was now glaring in his face. With a blink they were bathed in the soft orange glow of the heater and the deep shadows that filled the spaces.

Later she remained there, naked in his arms, untied from her existence, until the pieces started gathering and settling back into place. There were no sweet words. She wouldn't have believed them anyway. Didn't have any of her own to speak in return even if he lied and said it. There was just the sound of two bodies, breathing heavily out of rhythm in the blackness of the tent.

He pulled the blankets over the both of them. Letting her drift with her own wayward thoughts while he settled in, his arms locked around her.

They hadn't used any sort of protection.

But it seeped slowly through her, not causing any real alarm. She wouldn't likely live long enough to be concerned about that. Her muscles were limp, and the darkness was saturating her thoughts. And she was grateful that she was finally going to get some sleep. Grateful that the pull of sleep was deeper than usual, not just because she was sated.

Because she knew she'd wake up on the other side.

His voice murmured to her while she sank away. But she made out the words. "I'm staying awake, Jillian. You go. And when you get there you can keep me here."

She couldn't gather the thoughts to fight him, nor the muscle to protest. Couldn't even really remember what her objections were. It was a simple solution to a simple problem, based on her own logical theories.

"Do you want me to leave you there?" His breath was humid against her cheek, letting her know how close he was. But she was too far gone to gather an answer.

She thought she said 'yes'.

• • • •

JORDAN FELT LANDERLY'S shoulder beside him. He didn't know if the older doctor was aware that they were touching or not. If maybe he was leaning for a little physical support, or if it was because they had been staring at Jillian's stats for too long now. Listening only to the machinery and the sounds of crickets beyond the tent. Looking at the lines on the computers that tracked her progress, or lack thereof, while the artificial light held the dark and the night at bay. Unable to make a decision about the lifeless looking body that Landerly had started referring to as 'Our girl' when he wasn't talking directly to her.

Jillian's hair was neat, untangled and lying behind her on the sheet. She was in blue scrubs. Jordan had talked a few of the techs out of changing her into a gown. The gowns were demeaning no matter who you were, but she was their superior, she was a doctor. She deserved the scrubs.

She was pale, beyond pale. She didn't look dead. Thank god. The oxygen that the machinery was forcing into her system kept her skin tone within the range of the living, if not exactly healthy-looking.

For a moment Jordan allowed the morbid thought that the mortuary make-up person wouldn't have to do a lot of work on her. But he squashed it as soon as it arose. They wouldn't have to do any makeup on her. He couldn't let it get that far.

Landerly shifted, finally bearing all of his own weight, or supporting himself on the cane so that he didn't lean on Jordan anymore. That probably signaled a decision.

"Our girl hasn't sparked a sign in hours. Her EEG looks almost brain dead. There's no real activity."

It was just a statement of fact, not a manifesto to unplug her, but Jordan reacted as though it was. "So? She isn't brain dead. Not quite. And we don't know anything about this. We can't make this decision. There's no precedence . . ."

"True."

Jordan felt the tension ease, seeping slowly from his system.

"But that doesn't mean we can justify the machinery, the cost, all of it. We may need to let her die."

The taught wire feeling returned, instantly solidifying in him. He had barely held back his protests about Landerly treating Jilly like a cost-benefit analysis. He shook now with the strain. "I know you care about her, so how can you think that? How can you say we should 'let her die'?"

"Because I do care about her. Because I see her as a person and not as . . . well, I don't have the feelings for her that you have."

Jordan finally admitted it to himself. His father had seen it, had even asked him point blank. And if Landerly saw it too . . . well, the only person less observant to human feelings than Landerly was Jillian.

And for a moment Jordan cursed her. If she could have looked at him and seen it, then she could have responded. Whatever her answer may have been. That she was crazy about him. That she lusted after him. Or maybe felt pity for him because he'd fallen in love with her and she didn't feel anything in return. At least he would have known.

Instead he had this - this unholy clinging to another person. She wasn't responding to anything that went on around her, much less his feelings. And he had to admit, in light of what was happening to her, his emotions were small potatoes.

"She's too low. Are you going to take her off?" The voice came from behind him somewhere and he didn't recognize it. And that was probably a good thing. He held himself back from smashing in the face of the tech who had walked in and made the remark about ending Jilly's life as casually as if he'd been updating them on baseball scores.

"No." He pushed it out through clenched teeth, turning to face the tech for a brief moment, hoping his expression meant that he was not to be asked again.

"Sorry," The young man was tall and skinny, just gaining some peach fuzz, and he began backing away. "I didn't realize . . ."

Jordan managed a nod. This was probably a high school kid who was volunteering and getting training. Jordan remembered how green he'd been back then. It had been easy for him, and interesting. And he remembered the first time he'd been scolded for saying how neat something was when a patient was suffering. He'd paid attention. Maybe this kid would, too.

“Well, are you?” Landerly's voice broke the roar of thoughts running through his head.

“No.” He didn't look at the numbers. Didn't read the printouts. Didn't listen to the beeping of the heart monitor, as it slowly lost some of the steadiness that was the hallmark of a stable heart. And he didn't look because he knew what it would say.

If it had been anyone else, he would have turned it all off. He probably would have turned it off hours ago. It wasn't that she'd been gone for so long, it was that she was entirely sustained by machines. And he knew she didn't want that.

Jillian might not want to be sustained by machines, Jordan thought, but screw her.

“There’s no sign of brain activity. People don’t come back from brain death.” Landerly’s voice was softer than usual. Jordan could hear where the sounds were tempered with his own sadness at the loss of Jillian. Or maybe at the loss of her brain.

Knowing that he had to come from a place of logic, and nothing else, he fell back on the one solid argument he had. “There’s no precedence for this. So we can’t take her off. We don’t know what will happen.”

“But-”

There wasn’t a counterargument good enough as far as Jordan was concerned. And he had lost his fear of Landerly days ago. So he plowed right over the old man. “The only thing we know is that they took the man in Sri Lanka off his mechanics and he died nearly instantly. So we can predict that if we take her off, we’ll kill her. We need to leave her on for scientific purposes, if nothing else. So we can see what happens when one of these people gets the chance to come back through.”

Landerly nodded, and Jordan saw his smile. “Good idea. But it would help if you could find some evidence here. Anything that justifies keeping them hooked up. I like the ‘it’s for science’ angle. I’ll have to see what the brass thinks. They get the final say.”

Without anything further, Landerly turned and placed his weight against the cane that was constantly with him. Jordan felt the sweep of pride soak through him, it seemed the old man had been rooting for him, placing his faith in Jordan to find a good answer that would keep her alive.

So, with renewed energy, and the constant tension of one whose fate is decided by others, he turned back to the charts and beeps, this time listening with a purpose. For a moment he just stood and counted, hearing the synthesized blips interspersed with the techs outside the tent and the bugs that lived here where it was city, but not all concrete. He didn’t have a musician’s sense of rhythm and timing, but he could count. And so he rattled off a silent ‘one-two-three-four-five-’ before her heart triggered the machine to beep again. He counted to the next one and the next, getting four and six then six then five again. She was bradycardic - definitely too low, and not keeping good pacing.

He turned to the papers, the tiny strip of green grid with the single black line that represented all the functions of her heart tracing across it. It told that she had been this way for a while. Yards of it unfolded, showing that the rhythm had declined steadily and not stepwise

He next used the attached keypad to scroll back through the EEG stored on the computer screen. It didn’t print out unless it was commanded to. So he scrolled back to the beginning of the reading, and watched as her theta and delta waves lost their height and depth. Nothing. It slowly transformed from a linear representation of the basic workings of a human mind to flat lines. He thumbed through, his eyes occasionally skipping back to looking at Jillian herself, and not just the computerized readouts of her.

But her chest rose and fell in an inhumanly steady beat. She didn’t twitch or move.

And his eyes went back to where he was scrolling through the hours. The green lines passing in front of him as they had when they were recorded, only in super fast-forward.

He almost missed it. It was beyond the middle of the night and his eyes were tired. But there it was - brain activity – a cluster of bumps and ridges. Not the kind of upper consciousness activity he would have liked to see, not like when a person worked a math problem, but something deeper. It registered mostly in her theta waves. Just a few simple bumps. But Jordan quickly highlighted the section, and typed in a few comments about the time and duration, before sending it to the printer.

With a purpose, he got up and slapped at her hand. "Jillian, wake up, wake up."

But it was futile, as he had known it would be, even though he had hoped.

He almost grabbed the printout and ran to Landerly when he decided to look one more place.

With a few commands the computer shifted screens, to David's readout. Jordan hadn't been much concerned with David's vitals or EEG. And why should he be? David was holding up much better. His vitals were low, but he didn't yet need a respirator. They had only hooked him to an IV an hour ago.

The lines in front of him were the same as they had looked when they hooked him up the first time, in an effort to see if he was dreaming. Before he had corroborated Jillian's wild story.

Jordan realized that he didn't question her now. That she either made sense, or he was simply grateful that, while he might lose her, she wouldn't actually be dead. It was possible he had wrapped his brain around that and latched on so tight because he wished to believe. He had noticed that neither he nor Landerly had been out spreading the theory around. There was no talk of papers or panels or meetings, just the ongoing discussion between the three of them.

Holy shit.

David had it, too.

Jordan popped up and pulled the three pages from the printer, holding the first one next to the computer screen. The time was identical. And so were the bumps and ridges in the theta waves.

They ended at the same time as well. What the hell was going on over there an hour ago?

He highlighted and printed again, not bothering with typing this time. Jordan stood and waved at the printer. He told himself that three seconds wouldn't make a difference in whether or not Jillian made it, but he still swore at the cheap printer. Jerking the page free even before the machine released it, he darted out to find Landerly. Seconds later he ripped through the opening of the records tent, already explaining before he had even made eye contact. Landerly's head snapped up and Jordan knew he had read the hope there. But he also saw the cell phone pressed to the old man's ear, and he stopped mid-word.

He waited while Landerly waited, listening to what was being said on the other end of the line. Landerly nodded, though the listener wouldn't see it, and did what Jordan guessed was as close as he would get to actually rolling his eyes. So Jordan held up the printouts, knowing that Landerly could look while he disagreed with whoever was talking. He pointed out the blips and bumps.

But that only lasted a second before Landerly yanked the paper out of his hands and interrupted the person on the phone. "Listen, we have evidence of brain activity. We can't take her off. I'm faxing it over, and you're authorizing this."

Jordan smiled.

"Goodbye." It wasn't friendly, more curt and resigned than anything. And Jordan was glad that he only had to deal with 'the brass' through Landerly. Dealing with Landerly was tough enough.

Landerly held the pages back out. "Make copies and fax them back to Atlanta. Attention Brassard." He nodded to Jordan. "Good work."

But he didn't ask anything about what Jordan had found, didn't examine the lines any more closely. He had turned back to his books and charts before Jordan realized that he had been dismissed.

Feeling blank inside, he stepped away to photocopy his pages, walking softly, no longer at the breakneck speed he had used to get here. He was at the tent flap when Landerly's voice caught up with him. It was almost softer than the air, and held the loss of all Landerly's years. "Did you forge those?"

Jordan was stunned speechless. His mouth hinged open, but no sound came out. Finally, he found his voice. "No!"

But he was too late and Landerly spoke over him, drowning out his protest. "Never mind. Those pages are keeping her alive. I don't want to know."

With utter disbelief he turned back to his boss. "They're real. I didn't forge them."

Landerly just smiled. "Don't act so insulted. You do have a history of it, you know. I just hope that you did a good job, so they won't discover it."

God, it was unpleasant to be a grown man and feel like a scolded kid. It was just the kind of kick in the pants he could do without these days. His voice was soft, not betraying his frustration. "They're real. I swear it."

Landerly nodded his head. "Good. Good. Plausible deniability and all."

Jordan simply left. He had found a way to keep Jillian alive, and right now it didn't matter if the doc believed him or not. Jillian had her funding.

In a slow daze that told of the middle of nights spent sleepless and tense, he wandered over to the communications tent and looked up the numbers. He pushed buttons and sent the pages through, thinking that Jillian would have had the Atlanta fax number memorized. He promised himself she'd be glad to rattle it off when she came around.

Without any of his previous impatience, he didn't pay much attention to the pages chugging through the fax. He simply blinked one moment and realized the machine had gone silent, and the pages had fluttered around his feet.

He made copies in the same daze, then shuffled back to the tent where Jillian and David slept. But as he pushed his way through the flaps he heard the moan.

His head snapped up. Hoping.

But he knew that hadn't been her voice. He knew the voice that moaned. And while he was anxious, and excited, he was also deeply disappointed.

Walking over to the bedside, he began talking before he even got there. "David?"

Fingers twitched. Eyeballs moved beneath the eyelids in a pattern similar to REM sleep, but now identifiable as coming out. The moan came again, sounding more like the creak of old hinges than anything human, and Jordan wondered briefly why their bodies weren't getting more used to this. Why it wasn't seeming just like a normal waking up.

As usual, a stray glance cast its way toward Jillian, but registered nothing.

David, however, was rapidly coming around. His eyes fluttered. His hand clenched in a full grasp, and his right arm twitched, eliciting a swift intake of breath that Jordan guessed was none other than pain from having pulled against that dislocated shoulder.

"Son of a bitch!"

Jordan almost laughed at the words. They weren't perfectly formed. But he could tell what David had said.

"Hey, David." He smiled at the man on the gurney. Maybe this meant Jillian would wake up, too. But then again she had gone under first.

Jordan pushed that thought away, it would do him no good, and he turned back.

David's eyes focused on him and he spoke again. "Son of a bitch."

"Thanks."

"I'm not supposed to be here." The words were thick but no longer slurred.

“What do you mean?”

A sigh of defeat escaped David, and for the first time that Jordan had ever seen, the regal bearing slipped away from him. “I was staying awake. I was . . . well, I guess I wasn’t.” He turned to look at the wall, and Jordan heard the whisper, “Shit.”

So he distracted David, waved the EEG papers in front of him. “You want to tell me what happened about an hour ago?”

“What?” It worked. David was no longer swearing nor looking at the blank white canvas in front of him.

“About an hour ago both you and Jillian registered some brain activity.”

“Really?” He reached for the papers with his left hand at the same time he asked, “What time is it now?”

“About two a.m.”

David examined the readouts in front of him, and, as smart as he was, Jordan figured he had at least a rudimentary knowledge of what he was looking at. “So that’s what it looks like.”

“What what looks like?” Jordan held up the second set of papers. “Jillian’s got it, too. What is it?”

David took a breath and gathered himself, looking at Jordan, really looking at him, for maybe the first time ever - not just sizing him up, but reading him. And maybe even reading correctly. Jordan couldn’t say he liked it. David reading him made him damned nervous. But he needed to know. “What is it?”

“Jillian will have to tell you.”

That was what happened when David read you. Nothing good could come of it. So Jordan nodded and tried again. “Maybe you can ask her next time you see her.”

“Why don’t you ask her yourself?”

His mouth opened for a rude comeback, but he noticed David pointing with his right finger. The hand wasn’t good for much besides pointing to the left, but it did its job now.

And he heard it: a rustle of sheets.

Abandoning David, he flew the three steps to stand directly beside her. Eyelids quivered with the rapid movement beneath. Her fingers twitched again, and her chest moved like she would moan.

But she couldn’t, because of the tube down her throat.

So Jordan stood over her, barely feeling the smile that spread unknowingly across his face, as her lids fluttered and fluttered again before opening. “Welcome back.”

• • • •

HER EYES BURNED. AND all she could think was that this was the worst part, so she forced herself through a few rapid blinks.

Jordan stood over her, an idiot grin on his face. “Of course you came back, I just saved your life.”

What the hell does that mean?

But she really couldn’t give it much thought. She couldn’t talk yet. She still felt rusty. But if she could have she would have started in. That was just like her and Jordan. She wakes up from a coma, and he starts sparring with her.

It felt good to be home.

The air was better over here, or something.

But she closed her eyes, letting the grit slide past. Because she remembered what David wanted her to do. What she was pretty sure she had agreed to do, just before she drifted off to sleep.

“No! Jilly!” Jordan’s voice, frantic with worry, broke through her morbid thoughts. She felt his hands on hers, smacking at the back of them, touching her forehead, resting on her cheeks. But she couldn’t much blame him for panicking when she closed up and shut out the world. She did keep slipping into a coma. So she opened her eyes to the relief on his face. And only then did she register the sounds around her.

Crickets chirped in the background, a few birds made calls in the middle of the night. It sounded like home. But overlaying all that was the bleep of a heart monitor, the hiss of a ventilator, and the feeling that she was wired to everything. Only then did she catch a glimpse at the edge of her vision, and managed to tie together what the dry feeling in her throat was.

She was intubated.

And Jordan would never have done that to her if he hadn’t had to.

A moment of pure panic settled over her. Now that she knew what the tube was, she had to get it out. Her brain knew she shouldn’t remove it herself, but her hands scrambled for purchase and her eyes watered. Her chest fought for the right to breathe, fighting the ventilator.

Warm strong hands closed over hers, and while she knew it was Jordan, and that she should have been comforted, the hands pushed hers away, stopping her from her goal. Before she could protest, his face was over hers, his eyes staring at her, making certain she understood. “Jilly. You have to wait. Let me listen, then we’ll take it out.”

He was lying. He wouldn’t necessarily remove the tube. Only if the sounds were right. Only if she was going to breathe well enough for herself when he took it out. But she wanted to believe.

The urge to swallow was overwhelming. She wanted to fight, but she tamped it all down, knowing that Jordan was right. And she simply blinked a few tears back, as she felt his hand slide under her shirt. The plastic circle of the stethoscope touched her once, twice, waiting each time, while she forced patience upon herself. She counted.

“You’re good.”

The words brought a flood of relief, but no real comfort. She managed a slight nod, filled with panic and tension, when he asked her point blank if she was ready. Jordan walked her through coughing, while he steadily slipped the tube up her throat. She had to cough twice, even though she knew it took most patients only once.

Finally when she was able to breathe for herself, she felt like oxygen was flooding her, even though she was fairly certain she’d been getting more of it through the machine. Her lungs worked rapidly, reestablishing their dominance.

Again she felt the hands. They grabbed hers and pinned them at her side. Why? Why was he holding her down?

Again, teal eyes looked into hers. “Jilly, you’re shaking, you were about to knock out your IV.” His arms came up to hold her, one hand stroking her face, and only as he said the words, “Jilly, don’t cry” did she realize that his fingers had come away wet.

So she squeezed her eyes shut, and leaned into him, while he pulled her into a sitting position, as she re-learned to breathe. In and out. In and out. Finally settling into a semblance of her normal rhythm.

“You feeling better now?”

Her head jerked around. And her lungs began to shove all the air out. It should have been a scream, but she still didn’t have much of a voice from being intubated. Instead, she pushed out a soft but shrill wail that seared her throat like nothing she could ever remember.

David nodded at her, not bothering to look happy, or surprised, or anything other than pissed off.

When her breathing returned to normal, she realized she was staring at him. Just as she was going to do something about it, a gentle pressure on the side of her face turned her back to where she was inches from Jordan's concern. "It's just David." But he looked at her a little deeper, wanting an explanation of why David would make her scream.

So she told him.

Only no sound came out.

And after a moment she realized it was a damn good thing that no sound came out. Because she had started to explain what had happened.

David was going to have to kill her over there. There was no way she could show her face again. No doubt the techs had already found their naked, comatose bodies entwined on the gurney. Oh yeah, that was one for the books.

She felt the heat flood her face, and she did her best to bury it in Jordan's chest.

At last she found a whisper, and, figuring it was the best she was going to get, she settled for it. "David's supposed to be asleep."

"Because?"

Her breathing was kicking up and she wanted to fan her face with her hand. To fight the flush, to work off some of the nervous energy, to cover for the fact that she was panicking again. She never did things like that - and certainly not where she was going to get found out.

She turned and looked David in the eye. "We made a deal."

"Good." His voice was like ice. "I was afraid you were going to back out."

"So you showed up here to check on me?" She shifted in Jordan's arms, but he didn't seem to want to let go of her. Jillian really gave it no thought, other than that it was comfortable, and it was working to stave off another panic attack. There was nothing she hated more than being a helpless female.

Word by word, her voice grew stronger, "Trust me, I'm not backing out after that wake up." Her eyes focused on the straps and casts that held David in the bed, if not by force then by inability. "Is that what it's like for you when you wake up over here?"

He didn't speak, but his eyes held hers as he nodded.

She shuddered a bit at the thought. "I don't want to do that again."

"No shit, Sherlock." He grinned, but it wasn't in humor. "So you'll do it?"

She couldn't look him in the eye, not with what she was agreeing to. But in the end, this would set her free, too. "Yes."

When she found some backbone, some of the flash of anger she had felt before returned. "So why are you here?"

He spoke plainly as though it wasn't his fault. "I fell asleep."

"Why?"

"I'm male, it's what we do!"

She couldn't help the flush that crept up her cheeks, and David laughed just a little, a real laugh, at her expense. She felt more than saw Jordan's bewilderment through his arms. Finally, he found a voice to add to the conversation. "What?"

"Nothing." She and David both said it at the same time, looking away, and she figured Jordan had to have figured it all out. But when she finally looked up again, he seemed just as confused.

Silence reigned for a while, but it was David who started up again. “So, do you want to tell him what we decided?”

Thoughts of conspiracy charges flitted through her head. It was bad enough that she would do the thing. “No.”

But David surprised her by taking a stance. “I think we ought to. I don’t want to take a chance that you’ll back down.”

“I won’t-”

But he didn’t allow her to finish. His eyes quickly darted from Jordan to her and he simply began talking over her. “I think the boy has a vested interest in setting this to rights. I think he’ll be helpful.”

“What the hell are you two talking about?” Jordan’s voice cut through the argument, and Jillian knew there was nothing she could do to stop David from telling Jordan whatever he wanted. She also realized in that moment, that she didn’t want Jordan to know what she had done. That she had been curious and frustrated and scared, and that she had turned into willing arms.

She couldn’t really work up any good shame over it. She just didn’t want the embarrassment of the explanation. And the way she figured it, in this world it didn’t exist. But the men talked right by her thoughts, and Jillian needed to know what David was spilling.

But he wasn’t spilling anything, he was performing a careful set-up worthy of a courtroom. His question was directed at Jordan, “What happened to Jillian while we were under?”

As Jillian waited for his response, she realized that at close range his jaw was squarer than she thought, his shadow had progressed well beyond five o’clock, but it wasn’t enough to hide the clench of a tiny muscle in the side when David grilled him. “Her stats got so low we had to put her on IVs and intubate her to keep her breathing. Then the brass decided you two weren’t worth the money to keep on the machinery.”

Her breath pulled in, again burning her raw throat. “They were going to pull the plug on me?”

He nodded, “You looked brain dead.”

“I woke up just in time, then.” The pure chance of it didn’t sit well with her, but it didn’t have to, Jordan spoke up.

“No you didn’t. I found enough evidence to mount a case and they decided to let us keep you on it.”

Jillian felt her bones lose some of their starch, and she slumped down against him. “Thank you.”

When he nodded, she felt it against the top of her head.

But David interrupted again, keeping the conversation on the track of his choice. “If we can work this out, then Jillian won’t go under again.”

“I’m listening.” Jordan’s voice was hard, and so were his arms. He clearly didn’t think he was going to like what he heard, and Jillian knew he wasn’t.

“When I get back over there, I’m going to pull her plug, or medicate her, or suffocate her if necessary.”

The arms around her tightened with each gruesome description, until she couldn’t draw in enough air. They let up only when she started the makings of another panic attack. But Jordan had only a quick apology for her before he lit into David.

But she watched David, and he may have been lying on his side, casted from stem to stern, but he spoke with authority and slowly chipped away at Jordan’s resistance.

Jordan threw every what-if? at him. “What if she dies?”

“Then I die.” Jillian jumped into the fray. She wanted Jordan’s help, but she wasn’t about to let him talk them out of this. “It’s better than this going back and forth. That was the worst wake up ever. At the rate things are going I’m going to die soon anyway. At least this way I get a choice.”

Jordan focused on her, effectively removing David from the conversation, and by his intensity, David might have not even been on the planet. “So if he kills you over there, then you stay here . . .”

She nodded.

“Are you sure that’s what you want?”

Again, “Yes.”

Jordan stared David down. “What do you get out of this?”

But David didn’t give any ground. “You two do the same for me over here. So I can stay there.”

“But why?” Jordan had leaned back away from her. He looked back and forth between the two of them, as though he saw what had happened, even though it hadn’t been mentioned. As if to ask, ‘why would two lovers want to go separate ways forever?’

Jillian stepped in before David could. “His father’s over there. And over here he’s facing massive amounts of therapy and at least a couple surgeries. There he’s whole.”

David looked embarrassed by that last bit, like he always was when the topic of his tumbling down the steps came up.

For the next half hour Jillian stood up and stretched, and traced a circle already worn in the grass, while Jordan grilled them both. He brought up every contingency he could think of. Threw out every way it could go wrong. Pointed out time and again that no one knew what could happen and that they just might really kill themselves in some very warped version of Romeo and Juliet.

Jillian pressed her voice into service. “I’m going to die soon anyway. If I’m lucky I’ll get stuck on one side or the other - just wind up wherever I am when my vitals finally give out. This way I get to choose, I get to stay here.”

His eyes looked through her. He saw so much more than anyone else. But he was thinking. And she knew he couldn’t argue her logic.

Finally he spoke. “Potassium chloride.”

She almost jumped with joy, she just didn’t have quite enough energy.

“Will you please tell me what the hell he just said?” David’s droll tone cut into her happiness, but she simply turned and gave an explanation.

“It will stop your heart, and then mostly break down. No autopsy would turn it up unless they were looking for it. And you already have an IV so there won’t be any puncture marks.”

David nodded. “Painless?”

Jordan shrugged. “You’ll be comatose, you shouldn’t feel a thing.”

David rolled over and looked at Jillian, “And what about you?”

How did she answer that? How did she choose a method to die? Especially when what she really wanted was to live. But in order to do that, she had to kill off the Jillian on the other side. She shuddered before opening her mouth.

But the sounds she heard weren’t from her voice. It was Jordan. Explaining that the potassium chloride was the best method, where to find it unless the tents had been rearranged, how to draw it up, and how to inject it.

“Good.” David turned and rolled onto his back, staring at the ceiling, speaking to the air in general. “Now there’s just one more problem. How do we get me back under so we can do all this?”

Jordan had begun to question his own sanity. He was walking through the tents with a syringe of potassium chloride in his top pocket. It was hidden by the jacket he wore, and he was certain that no one would notice.

What he wasn't certain of was why he had done it. They should have plenty of time once David went under to get the medication and dose him. They should have hours. But he had seen the opportunity and drawn it up right there in the supply tent.

No one had been around and this way he didn't have to steal a whole bottle. Record keeping was still pretty poor, but a whole missing bottle would be pretty suspicious.

His heart tripped along at a faster rate. Jillian walked quietly at his side, having stood guard outside the tent while he drew up the liquid. She had spoken out loud, letting Jordan know that someone was there, and loudly repeated that the man was going to the cafeteria. It was a good job of relaying the information without letting on that she was speaking to be overheard or that Jordan was following the conversation from inside.

God, he had felt like a kid stealing a look at the files in the principal's office, and he couldn't remember the last time he had felt so guilty or so low. Jillian didn't speak as they traipsed quietly to the cafeteria, and he wondered if her thoughts were the same as his, if she ever questioned her theory. If she was wrong, and it was all a shared dream, then they were killing David. Just flat out murder.

He pushed that thought aside. If she was right, and they didn't do anything, she'd die if she fell under again. The trend that all five of the people going back and forth had established was to have their vital signs drop lower and lower the longer they were under. And to drop more rapidly each time they went back under. She had barely survived the last time, and Jordan was certain that she wouldn't survive the next one.

He saw his hand go out to the cafeteria door, swinging it wide and ushering Jillian through. She walked like nothing was wrong, like a normal human, not one who had nearly died two hours ago. Not one who had him arguing with the heads of his company, a government company nonetheless, to keep her on life support. People on ventilators shouldn't just get up and walk around.

And doctors shouldn't carry syringes of potassium chloride in their pockets in case the opportunity to kill a patient arose.

Jordan also doubted the quality of his decision making skills. He wanted Jillian here. No doubt about that. Having the threat of David removed didn't bother him any either. Killing David to get his way did.

He was halfway down the cafeteria line before Jillian tugged on his jacket sleeve and pointed out that he hadn't gotten anything. Shaking his head, he started choosing food from the other side of the line, not really caring that he didn't have anything but side dishes. He was simply here because he was hungry. His brain didn't care what he ate, just that he did it.

Jillian's plate was piled high, with carefully chosen and precariously balanced foods. A moment's surprise registered until he remembered she had eaten this much the last time she had come out.

Her enthusiasm for the rather inedible food relayed that she wasn't thinking what he was. How could they be certain that Jillian wouldn't go under first?

They had discussed the possibility of trying to medically induce coma in David. But that had problems. If they didn't get David through to the other side, then when they killed him they might actually kill him. And if he didn't wake up, he wouldn't be able to cut Jillian loose. Which meant she would slide under again, and most likely die, if not just here, then in both places.

And there was another critical problem with it: they had no idea what they were dealing with. So they had no idea if it would work. And there wasn't time to experiment.

So they would simply have to wait for David to go under.

And keep Jillian here.

And Jordan had no idea how to do that.

Eventually he realized that all of his food was gone from his tray except a spinach side dish. He must have disliked it, because he had eaten everything else. But he had no memory of that decision at all. And Jillian was looking at him weird.

"You ready?" His voice slipped out as his eyes finally made contact with hers, real contact in the here and now, and not in the missing world of his thoughts.

She nodded yes, a tiny gulp showing along her exposed neckline as she blinked. Too quickly his brain registered that her eyes didn't reopen and he forced himself to not reveal the hot rush of adrenaline he felt every time she closed her eyes for longer than a second. Every time, he was suddenly and certainly afraid that she was slipping. But she had opened her eyes wide each time before, and he waited until she did it this time, too.

He understood again the meaning of the phrase 'with heavy heart' as they walked silently back to the tent. He supposed his heart would sink through his abdominal cavity if this didn't resolve itself soon. But then again, there was a murder to commit, and the way he figured it, it was likely that Jillian would want to shed herself of him and any reminders of this night as soon as possible.

Jordan didn't like it. But he had to find a way to be okay with it. He'd be able to call her, or at least check up on her, and know she was all right. Killing David didn't lead him to any fantasy worlds where he could roll over at night and watch her sleeping. And he forced himself to re-examine all his decisions.

Was he doing this just to get Jillian? Or was there any real justification to break his Hippocratic Oath? He understood and believed in all that Kevorkian had fought for. That people had the right to die, to choose their own quality of life. And David had initiated this idea.

Grass crunched under his feet in the chill night air as he considered the geologist's sanity and his own ability to show proof that he had agreed to the wishes of a logical man when he came up before the judge and jury for this one. But he couldn't come up with anything. They were operating on a theory for which the only proof was in Jillian and David's heads. And half that proof would be dead shortly.

Jordan considered calling it all to a halt. But one glance at Jillian beside him changed his mind. There was no way to stop this for her if they didn't let David go back. He couldn't even imagine David's job on the other side, though for a brief moment he tried. Hopefully the potassium chloride would do the trick. But in the end David was a logical man to his very core. He would hold a pillow over Jillian's face and be sure he felt her slip away if it came to that. Jordan almost laughed out loud at how well he could place his trust in David's aberrant code of honor.

But as he pulled back the tent flap even the cynical laughter died in his throat. David was glaring at him.

"Yes, I'm still awake." His teeth gritted and Jordan noted the pale clench to his jaw, figuring it was pain even before David spoke it. "I need a Percocet to get anywhere near where I can sleep. And I really want to get some sleep."

Jordan nodded.

Again it was David who drove the conversation, but with him sitting on his gurney waiting to be killed by an overdose of KCl, Jordan wasn't as threatened by it as he usually was.

"Just give me enough to send me under."

"No!" Jillian's voice jumped, strained and brittle, into the edges of Jordan's brain.

David glared, his eyes issuing some very serious threats for a man in slings and casts. "It's what we all want. Are you afraid of autopsy reports or something?"

Jordan knew what Jillian was thinking, and, unfortunately for David, he agreed. His voice ground out low and conspiratorial. "We could send you into medical coma. But we have no idea what it would do to you, if it would be the same as slipping under on your own. So you can only have the same doses that we gave you before."

"Then give it to me."

Jillian darted away, as quick as one of Becky's lizards, and returned with a paper cup with two of the round blue pills in it. It was a large dose, but Jordan figured they were no longer concerned with addiction.

David swallowed them down with a jerk of his head, then instantly fixed his stare on the two of them. "Go! I won't go under with you two watching me. I'm hoping I'll pass out from boredom."

They turned, and Jordan watched as his hand went out to hold the tent flap for Jillian, a dying, useless piece of misplaced chivalry if ever there was one. The night air hit them like a slap in the face, and with it came the jarred thought that Landerly hadn't been by to check on David since he had awoken.

But Landerly was a pretty sharp tack and Jordan wondered if the old man hadn't figured out what they were up to. His absence wouldn't be a stamp of approval necessarily, but at least it meant he wouldn't interfere.

In the distance he could see sunlight behind the mountains. He'd never really been anyplace like the Appalachians before, where sunrise was visible in the distance while it was still pitch black where you stood. The irony wasn't lost on him, and in a desperate bid for sanity he tried changing the subject. "So what went on with you and David last night? Around midnight?"

He could see that he had startled her. She blinked a few times and made an attempt to gather up scattered thoughts, but she didn't do it all that well. "What?"

He shoved his fists deeper into the pockets of his jackets, keeping them warm and out of the way. "Both of you had EEG activity at the same time – the same activity - even though you were reading almost brain dead."

"I was almost brain dead?"

"Yeah, so I figured something major must have happened . . ."

• • • •

BECKY STARED DOWN AT the human shape on the bed. It was so much easier to think in terms of frogs. When she distanced herself, she wasn't bothered by the fact that she had found the two of them entwined and naked. She had reached her hand into frog terrariums before and simply removed the amphibs from all kinds of compromising positions.

Never once had she felt she had violated the frogs' sacred privacy. But never had she been in the position of moving the frogs, and adjusting things so that the techs wouldn't see. Never had she had to threaten a cage cleaner so that he wouldn't report what he saw.

So she had nearly broken her back putting a gown on Jillian and pulling a spare pair of scrubs pants onto David. She had sweated bullets in the fear that one or the other would wake up while she was dressing them. She had even rehearsed a small come-uppance speech to level at them if they did wake.

But they didn't.

She had moved Jillian rather than David, simply because she was lighter. It was hard enough lifting any amount of dead weight.

But now she stepped back as the techs moved around the room like bees in a field - working, making rapid efficient movements, flitting from one body to the other. When she lost focus the machinery became the drone of the hive, and she could imagine she was elsewhere. Somewhere where she didn't have to stand over two friends and wait.

To hear vital signs that she barely understood for humans. She knew appropriate blood pressures and pulse rates for cheetahs and moose and amphibs of all types. But with humans she knew just enough to constantly ask the techs if it was time to worry.

And from the looks on their faces it was approaching time to worry.

She hadn't mentioned a damn thing to David Carter The First. Even if he didn't recognize her, she remembered him, and how upset he had gotten over being given partial information. If she kept him up to date, the man might worry about his son, and Becky wasn't about to go spreading rumors that she couldn't substantiate, not to Carter Senior. No, she would wait until she had all her numbers, then she would tell him the facts.

But she could see what wasn't being said. There were frowns, and stethoscopes, heads nodding, followed by electrodes being attached. While she stood silently, the river of activity flowed around her on all sides. Her breath heaved in when she saw one of the women return with fistfuls of supplies. Becky recognized the IV bags and needles even in their sterile plastic casings. She had seen enough of it over the past week to know what it was all about. She knew that it wasn't good. And she knew that she should help. She just wasn't sure how.

So she stepped back to the edge of the square tent and bent her head. It had been far too long since she had done anything like it. She had missed church for a month of Sundays, always neck deep in one project or another. But her mother had pointed out, that with what had happened and all, the churches were now full. It came as no surprise that people would turn to God. But for the first time, she felt the need for it herself.

The words rattled in her brain, rusty from misuse, but she felt her way around until they became clearer, cleaner.

Please God, help my friends. Guide me to help them. Show me how I can do your work. Help me to understand. Help them to understand. She didn't feel her hands clasp together in front of her. Didn't know her lips were moving. Didn't feel the activity in the tent slowly come to a standstill around her. But she felt the peace. Help all of us here to help them. To come back healthy and whole, or to find your kingdom in heaven.

Becky didn't worry too much about the sex the two had clearly engaged in. There was too much biology ingrained in her as deep as the Baptist teachings she'd grown up with. God wouldn't punish them for doing what he had evolved them for. This was about finding the way. Whichever way was right for each of them.

"Help me to be helpful."

"Amen."

"Amen."

The chorus of voices startled her head up, shaking her from the cocoon of prayer she had woven around herself. Her eyes shifted, focusing on the roomful of medical techs and nurses, splashes of color in varied shades of blues and greens against the white of the canvas tent.

But, to a person, every head looked up from where it had been bent. Eyes met hers. Nods were directed her way. And hands went back to work.

• • • •

JILLIAN FOUGHT THE yawn that escaped her mouth. She knew it would simply cause Jordan more worry. But she wasn't good enough to hide it from him. Hell, no one was.

"Stay awake, Jillian. Walk."

His fingers grasped her arm in a purely clinical manner and she had to wonder why that was. He was Jordan. And he'd never distanced himself from her before. Not when she'd thought he should. Nor when she'd wanted him to. He was always Jordan. But right now she'd have ground out the formal title "Dr. Abellard" if she could have found the energy. "Walking makes me tired!"

"You have to stay awake!" His breath washed over her face, he was so close. And for a moment she thought of the mint gum he had been chewing. That was Jordan, friendly even when he was hauling her around, trying to keep her awake even though it was late in the evening. The sun was setting and her nerves and brain were setting with it.

Her body pulled away from her thoughts, creating a sense memory of one of the better hotel beds where she had curled up next to Jordan's heat, and sunk into warm soft sheets, the covers velvety beneath her fingers and across her cheeks.

She almost drifted off there on her feet.

But Jordan yanked her arm nearly out of the socket, and she was catapulted back into the cold night and away from her reverie.

She sniffed in, her lungs and nose searing from the tiny icicles in the air. "Medicate me—"

"No." He didn't even look at her, just interrupted before the last sound was out, his mind made up.

"Then I'm going to bed."

That got his attention. And as he spun around and glared at her it dawned that that was exactly what she had intended to do - shake Dr. Abellard back into being Jordan. "If you go to sleep, you might die." His own breath was ragged, and for a moment she snapped fully alert, realizing that maybe the cold, clinical Jordan was easier to deal with, rather than this face of fear and pain. But what would she feel if it was the other way around? And in fact it was the other way around as well. If she slipped off, she would lose Jordan . . .

His voice cracked even as it cut a path through her thoughts. "We don't know what the medication will do to you."

"True, but we have a good idea what sleep will do, and it isn't pretty."

He started to walk away, conversation closed, but she held back, stopping him when her arm and body didn't follow his lead. "You know, I have slept and woken up on the same side before."

"But that was several times before. It hasn't happened recently, and I sure as hell don't trust it." He let go of her arm and it felt as though the night seeped under her skin, chilling her where the heat of him had comforted just a moment before. "I just wish David would go under." His hand, now without purpose, scrubbed aimlessly through his hair. As usual a few pieces stood up on end, leaving him looking as frazzled as she knew he felt. "I feel like fate is fighting us here. That your body is trying to get you back over there and his is trying its damndest to stay here."

"Medicate me."

All his peripheral movement stopped. His gaze squared on hers. "And if I kill you?"

“I have to stay awake long enough for David to go under and to wake up and get the job done.” She couldn’t give explanation to David’s job. “There’s no way I’ll make it now. Not that long. We have to try it. My brain is shutting down. I’m beginning to not care that I might not wake up. My body wants sleep.”

He blinked, leaving his eyes sheened in a glaze, and then he blinked again and it was gone. She wasn’t sure but that she might have imagined it or maybe she was just looking through her own frustration. Her muscles ached, and her eyelids fought for closure. She was ready to sit on the hard earth and simply cry at the injustice and frustration of it all. But the earth was too cold. Her butt would freeze. And while that might keep her good and well awake for a little while, it would quickly lead to hypothermia, and blissful, if deadly, sleep. Since that death wouldn’t be due to the coma-state sleep induced she was pretty certain it would actually kill her.

Jillian made the best decision she was capable of, her shoulders slumping, and her head tipping forward to allow her hair to hide the tears brewing in her eyes. “Please.” The word fell out of her mouth, with no force behind it.

But Jordan heard it. He always did. And as she started to drift away right there, she knew he was taking all of it in. The slumped shoulders, the exhaustion, the tears – he would know they were there even if he didn’t see them.

She felt his hands, cold, on either side of her face. With all the energy she could muster, which wasn’t much, she fought against him seeing into her when he lifted her face to look in her eyes. All she could do was glance away and pray that the tears didn’t fall in fat, rolling drops and embarrass her.

“Okay. But you stay awake until we get to the medication tent.” He stared right into her eyes, waiting for her to make visual contact and acknowledge what he’d said. But then he slapped her cheeks a little bit, jolting her. Jillian wanted to be mad about it, but knew that the startle had woken her up, just a little.

His hand encompassed hers and, without looking back, he pulled her one shuffling step at a time to the meds tent. Her butt immediately located a chair that was upholstered but still remarkably hard. Government chair. The words flitted through her brain as she slouched into the corner, waiting while he checked the meds. He kept up a steady stream of chatter, but she couldn’t have said about what.

When her brain worked enough, she threw in an “uh-huh” or “mmmhmmm” and he didn’t slap her again so she guessed she had him fooled. The poles of the tent came up slowly behind her, cradling her head and making the chair just the tiniest bit comfortable. Comfortable enough. Tension drifted from her shoulders as she thought of fluffy beds and hammocks on beaches. The ocean sounded so soothing, and she inhaled deeply, enjoying the scent and the heat of the sun rising in front of her.

Shit.

Someone was upset.

Jordan was upset.

But the sunrise was beautiful and the day was so warm. Her hammock swayed in the heat. All was orderly until a fly began to buzz in her face. She waved it away, swatting at it haphazardly, but thinking that it was surprisingly heavy when she did hit it.

Something landed on her arm, and in curiosity she turned her head down to see a large chameleon. It was purple and slow moving and made her smile.

Until it bit her.

“Ow!”

“Jillian!” Jordan’s voice was in her face. And as she blinked she realized that his eyes were too.

A panic attack overtook her, her hands shaking, her breath pushing in and out far faster than her usual eighteen breaths per minute. Her eyes scrambled through the scene before her, searching for some sort of purchase, some reason for the growing dread.

But there was nothing of concern. The space heater sat directly in front of her, its warm glow heating her face and chest and leaving her back feeling chilly.

“Jillian.” Again Jordan’s face swam before her. “I gave you some adrenaline to snap you out of it.”

That explained the panic attack. She would feel all the effects because of the medication, but her brain had back-figured that, if she felt it, she must also have been alarmed. She managed to slow her breathing for the most part, but couldn’t stop the shaking in her hands. Then the damn chameleon bit her again.

As she looked down at the little fucker, she realized that Jordan had a second needle in her arm. It wasn’t much more than a sting once she had identified it.

He quickly removed the needle and shelved the medications, letting her sit through the seeming eternity while he did all of it in close to slow motion.

Jillian knew that she was experiencing the adrenaline the same way people felt in the middle of a car accident, that time stretched and they could stop and think things through. She almost laughed as she realized that he had simply medicated her to feel like she was awake for a long time. In reality, the adrenaline would wear off soon and she would slip back asleep.

But he had given her something else, too . . . he had explained it while he shelved the medications. She could dig that much out of her memory, but she couldn’t remember what he said he had given her. Truth be told, she didn’t really think she cared, just as long as it worked.

The palm of his hand swung squarely into her field of vision, and it took her a moment to realize that he was offering it to her to grab. She latched onto it, and before she realized what was happening, he had used her own grip against her to pull her to her feet and haul her behind him.

“It’s time we went to go check on David again.”

Jillian agreed, but was too strung out to say so. She found herself able to perceive the cold, but not care. If her jacket had fallen off she would have simply shrugged and gone on walking through the frigid air, leaving it in the grass behind her.

“I’m not leaving you for a moment, Jillian. I don’t trust you not to pass out like you did in that chair. You scared the shit out of me.”

Again she nodded, even though she knew he couldn’t see her. Not when he was walking at a brisk pace facing into the night, and away from her, while he kept up his steady stream of talk.

“I also need to be sure that the meds don’t do anything to you. So you won’t be able to shake me for a good while.”

She almost laughed out loud.

And when he turned and looked at her strange she realized that she had laughed out loud. In fact, she still was. From the look on his face Jordan wondered what was so funny, or if she had finally cracked from all of it.

It took effort, against the drugs coursing through her bloodstream, but she formed the words. “Like I could shake you anyway.”

He nodded, his face in an odd resigned expression, and went back to pulling her like a skier through the maze of tents. Why had he made that face? Her own face scrunched up in thought and she tripped over a . . . blade of grass or something. Would she ever be able to figure Jordan out? Probably not. Not completely.

She was just beginning to wonder if that was a good thing or a bad thing when she ran into his back. She felt her nose crunch against him. She registered that it hurt, and that her finger had bent, too. She just didn't care.

She laughed again when the words came out of her mouth. "I am so thankful that I never developed a cocaine habit."

"Great, you're high."

It was just a statement of fact. But Jordan's exasperated tone made it even funnier. He got into her face again, and she wondered briefly why the hell he kept doing that. When he shook her gently she figured it out for herself. Even in her face he couldn't quite get her attention. Whatever he had given her sure felt good.

"Jillian. Be quiet. I don't want you waking David if he's asleep."

She nodded. All gravely serious for the one instant that she could hold the straight face without laughing. He pulled her through the tent flap and she ran into the back of him again. With a quick jerk and movements that she couldn't catalog, Jordan yanked her around in front of him, so her back was pressed against his front, and got his hand clamped over her mouth. With all that restraint, her eyes focused and she saw what he saw.

David, passed out cold.

She shook off his arms, and walked forward, her focus entirely on the man lying on the gurney. He was reposed, looking peaceful in spite of the casts and slings. So she did the easiest test she could think of. She reached out to lift his arm.

If it fell, dead weight, back to the mattress that was as good a sign as possible.

But when she grabbed his hand his fingers curled against hers reflexively. Jillian heard that her voice was too loud only after the word had escaped her mouth. "Damnit!"

• • • •

THE TOUCH THAT HE FELT on his fingers was enough of an anchor to pull him back. His eyes fought to open, and already he perceived the faint light from the other side of his eyelids. He smelled the tent, felt the sheets, and heard the voice. All his senses were functional, now he just had to gain control and get up.

Funny how the very act of waking up, which he had done every day of his life, was only now something that could be catalogued - something he could control. It seemed it had always just happened before, with alarm clocks or daylight making the decision for him.

As he fought to make his muscles obey, they came into play one piece at a time.

His fingers jerked against the hand that touched him.

"You're waking up, huh?"

His brain recognized the voice, it just didn't quite place it.

But with a few determined tries David forced his eyelids to flutter then open. They snapped immediately shut, squeezing against the dim orange light thrown by the space heater. He fluttered them again, allowing his pupils to adjust and at last, he managed to focus on the woman standing over him.

"Good evening."

Becky.

Thank-fucking-God.

He scrambled upright, checking the next most important thing.

Jillian.

His brain registered that she wasn't in the bed with him, and that he had scrub pants on.

"I moved her, she's right behind you." But Becky's hands pushed him back down. She wouldn't let him up, and he fought against it, opening his mouth to protest only to realize that he was muzzled.

His hands scrambled to remove the thing that hindered his jaw, but again Becky just pushed his hands away. "Let me check."

Her face looked sincere, and it was Becky. He didn't think she could lie about slipping the family dog her broccoli. Deciding he'd have to be a fool not to trust her, David sat back and waited.

Becky kept talking. "The techs told me that if you woke up, I could take the oxygen mask off—" ohhh. "-if you were above 95. And you are. The numbers rose right up while you were waking. So give me a moment to untangle you." Her fingers worked at the elastic that held the mask onto his face, setting him free of the bindings. "You dropped off pretty fast once you went under. And you can't run off just yet. No big movements. I have to watch you for at least fifteen minutes to see that you hold that 95 percent."

Fifteen minutes?

"I can't have you crashing on me."

"Thank you." They were the first words he had pushed out, and as usual they were a little froggy sounding. But he figured that he needed to be nice to everyone, as he had some serious business to attend to. And he wondered if Jillian had already set him free back on the other side, or if he would feel it when it did happen.

"Don't move too much. You're still hooked up to IVs and electrodes and such. There's an EEG and an EKG and pulse oximeter."

He looked down at his body and saw what looked like a human circuit. Wires and tubes fed in and out of everywhere. And suddenly, his chest and head started itching. Surely it was just perceived sensation from knowing that there were stickers holding electrical contacts on him, but knowing that didn't make it itch any less.

With a deep breath he decided to do what was needed. He would have to find a way to turn around and look at Jillian, even if he couldn't do anything about her until the techs and doctor set him free. He could at least start assessing the situation.

Slowly, pulling and tugging wires, he twisted until she was in view.

Jillian was draped peacefully along the gurney. Her hair fanned out around pale skin, her eyes stayed closed and still in a way that could never be mistaken for real sleep. She wore a medical gown, and while he knew she would have hated it, it was far better than lying there naked. With a deep breath, a certainty hit him in the gut. She would die in that gown.

"I untangled you two." Becky's voice was soft over his shoulder, and he listened for, but thankfully didn't hear, any condemnation or rebuke.

"I moved her myself and dressed both of you before I let anyone else in. I figured it wasn't their business. Or mine for that matter, but . . ."

Her wariness bled through into her speech. And David looked back at her, taking in the soft, droopy red curls, the age that had layered itself onto her face, and the worry that made her look much more adult than the first time he had met her. He didn't think anyone would mistake her for a kid again.

"Thank you." He heard the words and the sincerity. And realized that she would get suspicious any moment now if he didn't get it together and stop being so polite. "So what's up with Jillian?"

“She’s got lower vital signs than you do.”

He could see the oxygen mask, the IV and all the brightly colored wires. She looked like the bride to his Frankenstein.

David scanned, looking for the rubber covered point along the IV line where nurses could inject medications. Jillian had pointed one out to him when she had explained what to do. His eyes stopped and rested when he found it, just a short ways up the tube coming from her left arm.

He needed to get to the supply tent and find the potassium chloride.

“I don’t know if she’ll be okay.”

That jerked him back. Becky’s face had a layer of worry, and her head shook slowly from side to side.

“Will she die?” Would it all be better if she just died? God, he prayed he didn’t sound hopeful.

But Becky shrugged and didn’t look at him like he was evil incarnate.

He sat, breathing, in and out. Silent while his mind chugged. Becky must have better things to do, but she didn’t budge. Maybe she had promised not just to keep an eye on him but to actually watch his every movement literally until that fifteen minutes was up.

David needed to sort through his thoughts. And he didn’t like her staring at him. Although it didn’t seem there was much he could do about that.

For a brief moment he entertained the thought of bringing her into his confidence. But he squashed that quickly. Becky was too religious to help him kill Jillian. Even if it was what Jillian wished. Even if she would be set free to live elsewhere in the process. He was pretty certain that Becky believed they were getting shuttled back and forth, but he was certain that, if left to chose, Becky would let God handle things.

But God hadn’t handled much in David’s life to his satisfaction, and he wasn’t about to let the big man have another go at it over something this important.

Besides, if he didn’t succeed, Jillian would likely wake up over here, and he had no doubt that she’d have no qualms about killing him for failing. And if the thought of the promised eight surgeries and twenty-four months of physical therapy didn’t terrify him, living with Jordan while Jillian was stranded here sounded even worse.

He sat with his thoughts while Becky sat with hers and watched him. He wasn’t much for prayer, but he did ask that she not be able to read his face. Rebecca Sorenson was probably one of God’s favorites, and He would use her to stop David if necessary.

The tent flap lifted and a physician walked in. David knew he had seen the man before, but couldn’t recall the name. Thank God doctors knew they weren’t memorable and saved everybody time by stitching their names onto their jackets.

“He’s up!” Dr. Lee exclaimed.

Becky nodded, “About ten minutes.”

The doc frowned and both of them knew what he was about to say. Becky cut off the protest. “I was told not to leave him, and no one was nearby. Not to mention, as long as you guys are doing your job, someone will be by within fifteen minutes. Still want to yell at me?”

The snappiness registered with David, making him wonder when she’d grown a backbone. But come to think of it she’d been growing it all along, just like she’d been adding those years to her face.

The doctor shook his head at her. He couldn’t yell. It was a southern thing, David saw, for the women to be able to lay you low and leave you with no good response.

But even if the doc couldn’t give Becky the what for, he could torture David. Coming over he started in with his stethoscope. He listened to David’s chest and back. He held his two fingers over

David's wrist, counting the pulse and feeling for its strength in a way that always seemed vaguely sexual. He was glad when the doc nodded and said he was good enough to get up.

I could have told you that. How many times have you woken from a coma, huh?

The snide remarks churned in his head, and probably across his expression, until the doctor started yanking off the EKG attachments, taking tiny patches of hair with them. "Ow!"

The smile he got said suck it up.

Damn doctor.

After he yanked every last sticker, the doctor turned to Jillian, taking stats and jotting things in her chart. Which, of course, he just had tucked under his arm. They were way too technically precise around here. Which was odd, because here and there were really the same place, and he hadn't seen a single chart on the other side. And he sure had a hell of a lot more to chart over there. The doc scribbled a few things, and David tensed.

But the two fingers against Jillian's wrist didn't rouse her. Neither did the thumb raising her eyelid to reveal an unfocused lake of blue beneath. David couldn't hide his shudder as he wondered if the docs had been doing that to him. The doctor smiled and left. And aside from being unhooked, it was like the man had never been there.

"I guess you're cleared for take-off." Becky's voice interfered with his thoughts again. Bringing him back to the fact that he had to hide what he was going to do.

With his legs wobbling beneath him, she helped him down. He was getting better at it every time. But hopefully this would be the last.

A few precariously balanced steps later he shrugged Becky off and said 'seeya' to her startled face. But better that she be pissed than suspicious. He wandered into the cafeteria forcing himself to eat something, even though his stomach rebelled at what he was about to do. All he could even pick up was a bag of chips, and he forced himself to munch them slowly, one by one, while he wound his way back out into the cold day. The red glow of sun hit him where it had made it's final bid to creep over the tops of the mountains while he had been in the cafeteria.

He tried - tried - to be normal, knew he was an asshole, and tried to put that into his walk. He tried to find the meds tent. And found it exactly where Jillian had said it would be.

David just wasn't sure how to get potassium chloride out of it without looking furtive. So he headed in, thinking he'd play innocent and act all confused if someone caught him and kicked him out.

The light inside was a too-bright fluorescent, and he was glad. He would be able to read the names on the shelves and bottles clearly. His only concern was that he might be casting a shadow on the outside.

He wasn't sure if he'd find it filed under the scientific 'K' or English 'P'.

It jumped out at him in the 'P' section after he'd checked every 'K'. Pocketing the bottle he scrounged for a needle. Knowing that if they saw him now he'd have less of a chance of bluffing his way out.

He found the needles, and a syringe, and fumbled with thick fingers to plug the two together. He'd contaminated the injection all to hell, and he knew it, but since he was going to kill her with it, did a little bacteria really matter? He bit his lip at the thought of actually, purposefully killing another human being. And not just any human: Jillian.

He drew up the solution into the syringe, realizing only after he did it that he'd forgotten to wipe the top with alcohol, and he'd contaminated the whole bottle of clear solution, too.

Why hadn't he watched ER more often?

He couldn't steal the whole vial. They'd count that it was missing, and Jillian's death might get investigated. Being here wouldn't mean much if he was in jail. And for a brief moment he thought about Jillian incarcerated on the other side. She might not have figured it out yet, but Jordan would be the one pulling the trigger for her. David knew it.

He couldn't in good conscience put the contaminated bottle back. He'd hurt others.

He squelched the laugh that threatened to bubble up.

After a minute of frantic searching for a way to right the problem without stealing the bottle, he squirted the solution out of his needle, wetting the grass at his feet. But it was such a small amount that it disappeared before he could account for it. He drew up more, again squirting it at the ground. After about ten times, he drew up a full syringe, carefully twisting the needle to get the solution out when it was low in the neck of the upside down bottle.

A sound outside made his neck snap straight. And for a moment he held rabbit-still, quiet except for the volcanic rush of his breathing, waiting while footsteps passed by outside with voices laughing and chattering.

His stale breath let out, the steel in his shoulders dissolving. He had to finish, and quickly. He'd give himself a heart attack and die. Then Jillian wouldn't. And he'd be dead here. Then they'd kill him on the other side.

God what a cluster-fuck they were going to have if anything went wrong.

David replaced the contaminated bottle exactly where he'd found it. It was there to be catalogued, but now too low for anyone to use. Someone would get pissed at whoever had left it, but no one would get hurt.

Except him!

He re-grabbed the bottle and wiped the fingerprints off it. Stupid, stupid. A clean bottle was a giveaway that someone had been intentional with the meds. He touched the glass to the backs of his fingers, thinking that would leave it not looking wiped, but not leading directly to his door.

Surely a DNA test would point to him, but they'd have to be pretty suspicious of him before they dragged out that artillery. Capping the needle and pocketing it, he listened at the tent flap, and, not hearing anything, stepped out into the still morning. With the syringe safely ferreted away, his brain wandered to what would happen after he killed Jillian.

His lab in Chicago waited for him.

The First had been kind and proud and supportive for twenty-seven hours in a row.

His body worked.

He could settle in there. Dig into his lab, and run core samples from the local oil wells for the rest of his life. David figured no one was going to come after him for a few rock plugs after the whole apocalypse thing.

The morning air bit at him as he walked back to the tent he and Jillian had shared only to find a tech pushing a medication into her IV, while she watched the numbers.

David stood quietly, wondering if he'd been beaten to the punch. Especially when Jillian's heart rate began to race, then slowly leveled and dropped off. The tech shook her pretty blond head, and turned away.

"Ack!" Her blues eyes jerked wide open at the sight of him, and her hand jumped up splaying perfectly manicured nails wide across her chest to slow her own racing heart. "I didn't see you there." Then the hand came out in a gesture halfway between a handshake and a request to have the back kissed. "Lucy Whitman."

David had to unclench his right hand from around the needle hidden in his jacket pocket and he grasped her fingers, making sure he didn't reveal anything. Just in case he had squeezed so hard he left an imprint of the syringe on his palm.

"What did you do to her?" He pointed at the still prone form, getting paler as she lay amidst the dark ribbons of her hair.

"We've been injecting potassium chloride into her every half hour." Lucy missed the shock that registered on his face and kept going. "Trying to raise her heart rate and maybe even jolt her out of it." The slim shoulders lifted in the shrug that seemed to be the new universal response. No one knew much of anything these days. At least the sun was still coming up regularly.

He schooled his voice to remain steady, grateful that he was standing behind Lucy, watching Jillian's lack of movement from over the tech's shoulder. "Won't that stuff kill her?"

She laughed, a soft airy sound that shot straight to his groin, as she turned to face him. Her red lips looked like they were good for more than just explaining medications, and David was grateful that he would stay here, where he was clearly functional.

"It won't hurt her in the concentrations we use. It's very dilute."

He focused on the words and their meanings, absorbing what she'd said and not just how she'd looked. By the time the oxygen was going to his brain again, she'd excused herself and left the tent to report on the patient.

David blinked a few times, searching for the way that this would help him. He wished he had Jillian's brain right now. But that would defeat the whole purpose. He didn't even realize that he was gravitating toward her until his hip was spiked by the slightly open drawer Miss Blonde must have left. Son of a bitch!

He stilled his hand just before he slammed it. Revenge never played well against inanimate objects, and he could see needles lying on a once sterile drape in the bottom of the drawer.

Dark marker, in very bad handwriting denoted that there were four KCl syringes and that the solution was very dilute compared to what he'd pulled straight from the bottle. There were also a few in varying concentrations of epinephrine. Although why the docs would want to give Jillian a 'fight or flight' response, he couldn't figure.

Pulling his own syringe from his pocket he compared the two. His was fatter and would never pass as one of those if he just laid it in the drawer. Plus it didn't have the bad handwriting on it. For some reason all the anal retentive people were over here. He might like that in his lab, he thought. But now he got himself back to the problem of making his syringe look like the ones in the drawer - the ready-made injections for Jillian.

Becky ducked her head in, and he quickly yanked his hand back behind him, hoping that he could hide the needle and that the second-grade maneuver had actually worked. But it seemed she didn't notice. "Lucy just came by and told me that it didn't work. Jillian's heart rate is dropping lower and lower." Becky's soft sigh came to him through the air that was suddenly too warm in the little tent with the tiny sun contained in the space heater. "Maybe next time."

"When is next time?"

His heart soared. And crashed. He might not figure it out in time.

"Maybe an hour. They're afraid they're losing her." Her lips pressed into a sad smile. But like everyone else, Becky had gotten used to the idea of losing people.

He tried a very un-David-like move, and hoped it would get filed under 'everything is weird these days'. "I think I'm just going to sit here with her."

He hoped that Becky understood that he'd like to do it alone. It worked too well. Doctor Sorenson's sweet smile held the belief that he was truly Jillian's lover, wanting to sit and hold her hand. And obligingly she ducked out while he held back the laughter that threatened from the irony of it all. And for a moment he just stared at the syringe in his hand.

He did sit vigil beside Jillian's bed for a while. At least it would have looked that way to anyone who stopped in. But his mind was churning, trying to figure out how to get his solution into one of those syringes.

Then he wouldn't have to pull the trigger himself. He could just wait until a tech picked up the right syringe and did the job for him.

He sat there staring at her, until he was startled by another tech beside him. He hadn't heard the kid enter, just jumped when the finger tapped his shoulder, and the young voice asked would he please scoot over so that Dr. Brookwood could be examined?

David blinked a few times and didn't say anything, just watched while the boy, who must have been no older than twenty, went through all the same motions of taking vital signs that the doctor had. He cranked up the oxygen, opened the flow on the IV a touch, scribbled notes in the chart and left.

David's own heartbeat set up a steady countdown. He had to do something quick, get that syringe traded out. He was reaching for the drawer when the tech burst back through the tent flaps again. The sun was up high enough that light filtered through all the pores in the tent, and the tent flaps let in just enough that a person who was paying a little attention would know that someone had come in.

David nearly jumped clean out of his skin, his senses hyper-alert with the work he was about to do. But the tech was paying no attention to him. As long as David was out of his way, the practiced movements came off like clockwork.

His eyes focused with fascination, David watched as the guy pulled the first syringe from the left of the row in the drawer. For a few brief moments he executed the precise rhythmic set up, yanking the needle cap with his teeth, he swabbed the rubber covered spot on the Y-tubing, and injected the full syringe. With his eyes transfixed on the machinery and the numbers it was blurping out, the tech's hands slid the used syringe into the red plastic biohazard box mounted behind the countertop.

Again David watched with perverse fascination while her heartrate spiked and then plummeted again.

The tech sighed in defeat and turned to leave.

David almost let him go, but blurted out at the last minute, stopping the tech. "Wasn't that fast? I thought it was going to be an hour before you tried again."

The tech nodded solemnly. "Her sats are too low. We've bumped it up."

David took a swallow, and tried his best to look like a heartsick lover. He hadn't tried to act since high school theater. His father hadn't come to see him in that performance either, and for a brief moment he reminded himself that this Eden had a snake. Swinging his focus back to the job at hand he started to ask how long it would be before they came back, but he stopped himself, knowing it would be soon enough. "I'm not sure if I can watch this. If I leave, can I just come back and sit with her?"

The tech tilted his head, and gave a sad smile. "Of course you can, Dr. Carter. We don't mind."

David made short work of plucking the left-most syringe from the drawer and squirting the contents onto the ground before carefully pulling the plunger from his own fat vial. He stuck the needle in the back and drew up the pure stuff, trying to splurt out the air bubbles, then delicately aligning it with the level on the other syringes.

He replaced it at the left-hand side of the drawer and carefully shut it. His feet had almost made it the tent door when he spun and went back - switching the pure syringe to the second spot.

It would be soon enough.

And he would be nowhere near when it happened.

Home beckoned.

• • • •

JORDAN'S HANDS HAD a fine tremor. He could read the same in Jillian's, but knew that hers was due to the medications. His was due to the fact that he was about to kill a man.

As they walked quietly back toward the tent where David lay, his brain was anything but silent. That was the tent where Jillian had spent so many hours, unmoving and unresponding. She wouldn't go there again. Not after this. She wouldn't be reminded of it, and neither would he. They would pack everything up and head back to Atlanta.

Landerly had flown out this morning, leaving only a note. There were a few lines that made Jordan believe that the old man knew what they were up to and was heading out of town to get himself a little more of that 'plausible deniability' he liked so much.

Inside his jacket pocket, Jordan's gloved hand made a warm nest where it curled around the syringe. Outside of his pocket he tried to keep himself relaxed and looking less than suspicious. But his lungs breathed in a little too deeply, and he forced his eyes to wander the landscape. Although the sky cut bright shades of blue above him the daytime hours were cold now, too. And the air smelled heavy with tiny shards of ice. Snow wasn't far away, and he wanted to be back in Atlanta before it fell.

He wouldn't be able to stand being trapped in this town when the ice came and made all the roads through the surrounding mountains impassable. It was the exact reason the government had built the town here, and the exact reason he had to get out. His heart hammered with it, and he wondered absently if he would suffer a major coronary at a relatively young age from all the stress he was enduring now.

The heat hit him first, signaling that he should pay attention. He had stepped through the tent flap Jillian held open for him, and he was assaulted again by the vision of this man lying on the gurney. When David was awake he was every inch holier-than-thou. Richer-than-thou. Better-than-thou. And funny and charming enough to be fairly likable anyway.

There was going to be a perverse satisfaction in pushing the plunger.

"Can we do it this time?" Her voice was the only organic sound in the tent. Barely loud enough to be distinguishable over the beeping and printing noises that provided a lush synthetic jungle.

Every time they had decided it was time to do it, they had talked themselves out of it. The last time, an hour and a half ago, they had talked themselves up to this. Their first concern had been that he was truly under. Not on some snap turnaround. When David had been out for just half an hour, they said he certainly wasn't awake on the other side yet. If they stopped his heart before he awoke over there they might truly kill him. At an hour and a half they gave him until three hours under, just to be sure.

David's vitals had taken the steady plunge they expected. He might well die on his own, they offered up all the possibilities, but Jordan knew that he and Jillian were just chickening out one way after another. And being smart, they were able to come up with really good arguments for allowing themselves to wait.

This was it though.

If they didn't do it this time, David might wake back up.

Jordan ignored thoughts that told him he might really be killing the man. And that the woman at his side was delusional. With his feelings for her he couldn't overlook his obvious bias. Yes, jail time was a definite option. Or perhaps he'd just suffer a simple lifetime of guilt.

He sighed as she pressed the Velcro on the tent flap together. "All right, keep watch." He pulled the syringe from his pocket, quickly clenching it between his teeth and swabbed the IV tubing.

"Don't you dare!"

He almost jumped, and nearly coughed out the syringe. "Wha?" It was all he could pronounce with the thing in his mouth.

"I'm doing it."

Removing the potassium chloride so he could speak, he braced his fists at his hips and stared her down. "Jillian, no."

"Jordan, yes." Her eyes were unrelenting, and matched her tone.

He felt his mouth open in protest. But as usual, Jillian's brain worked faster than his and she shot him down before he even got a good aim.

“It’s my life I’m buying. I’ll pay for it myself.” Fire leapt in her gaze and she lunged for the needle in his hand.

Only then did he realize that he was stronger and taller than she was, and he could win this argument even if her little tongue was sharper. He jerked the needle over his head.

“Don’t you dare!”

“Dare? It’s done.” He shrugged, keeping the needle high while she plastered herself to him and jumped, attempting to reach what was way over her head. While he controlled the needle, he could think at his own pace. “Let me do it. If anyone suspects anything, they won’t suspect me.”

“Bullshit! You two have been circling each other like caged tigers for weeks now. But I’ll be damned if I know why. Anyone with a brain in their head would suspect you.”

Circling each other? It was that obvious? Jesus. But the needle was still out of her reach, despite numerous jumps. So he had time to think.

“You’re clearly mentally deranged. For God’s sake, you think you’re going back and forth to another planet!”

That stopped her in her tracks. “What?”

“That’s what they’ll say, Jillian. You’re high up on the suspect list, too, you know.” He kept his voice soft, but not soothing.

“Then even if they convict me they’ll put me in the psych ward, I’ll be out in no time. Give me the damned needle.”

She jumped again. And Jordan fought for another argument, another hurdle to put in her path. But again she thought it through before he did. “I’ll scale you like a tree.”

“I’d like to see you try.”

And try she did. He almost laughed, it felt like junior high all over again. Except the part where the argument was about who got to kill David. That sobered him up.

Again as he opened his mouth to argue, the words that filled the air were hers. “You do it. I’ll just sit down,” she stopped the useless jumping and lowered herself into the corner chair, tucking up her legs and letting loose a languid yawn, setting off coils of alarm in him, “and go to sleep.” Her head drifted down against the pole, her soft lashes fluttering shut and then going still.

His heartbeat stopped with her eye movement. “Damnit, Jilly!” It was practically a yell. People would come from all around to see what was going on. They’d both get locked up and David would come back. All this arced through his thoughts as he grabbed her shoulders and violently shook her awake.

“Here!” He slapped the needle into her hand. She played dirty, but with that threat he had to let her win.

Even now she was blinking and re-orienting herself. Just like that, she had actually fallen asleep. And he couldn’t let her. Not until they were sure.

As he watched, Jillian forced air into her lungs. She awoke by sheer willpower, and stood on less than solid legs. But then she mustered up the sweetest I win smile he’d ever seen and he bit back the word that appeared at the back of his tongue. Bitch.

He stood at the threshold of the tent, hoping to hear through the Velcro closures if anyone was coming. And grateful for the excuse not to watch her. He heard no one, and so after a few seconds he turned around expecting her to be done.

But no. She came square into his visual field, burning into his retinas an image that he would see for the rest of this life. Long after Jillian was gone, he would remember that he had watched her kill David. She injected slowly, counting to make sure she kept the pace.

Four-mississippi-five-mississippi-six-mississippi-

He thought the sound was simply in his head, but then realized he could hear her voice faintly, her lips moving across the texture of each sound while her eyes stared at the readout screen. Just as it should, David's heart slowly picked up speed, passing normal, and plateauing at 110 before finally starting to slow.

Jordan knew what that meant, and sure enough, when he looked, Jillian had depressed the plunger all the way to the end of the syringe. But she didn't withdraw, just stood there mesmerized by the numbers. Jordan softly crossed the room to her, but she didn't notice until his hands closed over hers, grasping the needle and IV line tight in her fingers and separating the two.

Still she stood, just staring, until he decided to pull the needle from her hand before she dropped it. Jordan busied his hands shoving the syringe down into the sharps box, the red plastic probably having swallowed the last evidence of their crime. The drugs would break down quickly inside David, and given his condition, hopefully no one would ever suspect anything other than that his heart gave out.

But looking at Jillian, Jordan suspected a lot more.

Tears swarmed her face, marring her cheeks and dripping unceremoniously from her chin out of time with the slowing heartbeats. She didn't shake or sob, just swallowed her air in tiny gulps. He couldn't place his finger on it, but he could read it, something about the way she leaned in toward the man on the gurney, something in her eyes. She didn't feel guilty. She felt loss.

With the evidence gone, they could simply stay and watch. Jordan felt compelled to be certain it worked. He would never forgive himself if he came back and David was alive, or God forbid, awake.

He didn't control his hands so much as he felt them settle on Jillian's shoulders. Somehow that touch let loose what had only been the surface, and she began sobbing in earnest. Still, it took a moment before she turned and buried her face against him.

His arms went around her, a gesture of simple human kindness. He didn't really want to comfort her for the loss of a man he was glad had somewhere else to be. But the curiosity was too much. And the need to finalize it in his head was overwhelming. So he forced himself to get it out quickly. "You fell in love with him."

After the words came, he realized that he hadn't asked. He hadn't needed to. And he held her while she cried, and let himself kick his own ass for how he had fallen for her.

It was definitely time to go back to Atlanta. He realized now that he had a job waiting for him, with or without her. And that he couldn't simply pack her up and make her come with him. She had family to attend to. He had to get up to see his Dad more often. Call his father and tell him that the girl had made it, and that it hadn't all worked out in his favor but that he'd be okay in a while.

His skin itched in the restless way it did when he needed to act and hadn't for whatever reason. He hadn't itched going to Atlanta. The job offer had come through and he had simply thrown all his belongings in a few boxes and notified his student loans where he was moving and took off. There hadn't been time to want to go, simply the going. But now he needed to leave, and he was tied here, at least for a few more days.

He had to be sure that Jillian could sleep, and only sleep. Not slide into some brain-dead state and slip away. That she would wake up if she was roused, and make all those normal movements that she did while she was asleep.

"No."

The word startled him from his thoughts and, for a moment, from his restless urge to leave. “No, what?”

“No, I’m not in love with him.” Her voice was soft and low, but solid. He knew when she lied, and this wasn’t one of those times.

“Then why all the tears?”

At first she just sighed, and he could feel the movement against his chest. Her mahogany hair was loose and hanging heavy down her back, and teased him just under his nose. All of which reminded him that he had to pull away, that he needed to pack up and leave.

“I’ll miss him.” She jerked against him, and he thought it was a sob, but when she looked up the grin on her face was unmistakable. “I know he could be an ass, but I liked him.”

Jordan shook his own head, “Yup, that’s David. Too much money and too much charm.” But at least I still have all my hair.

“Was David.”

His body jerked as he realized the beeping had gone silent. The EEG showed no activity at all. The pulse-ox was slowly dwindling lower and lower and was already low enough that it was well below the amount of oxygen necessary for human life.

Jillian turned away and looked at the body for a moment before she began methodically removing all the electrodes and needles. She put a cottonball over the needle as she slid the IV out, but didn’t seem surprised when no more than a dot of blood welled from the site.

There wouldn’t be any CPR, no heroic measures. Not like if it had been Jillian that slipped away. For a moment the thought entered his head, wondering if he would have been able to push the medications into Jillian if she had asked him to.

Truth be told, he didn’t know. And he shoved the thought to the back parts of his brain, refusing to let it go any further.

At last her hand rested softly over David’s and she turned to look at Jordan, “It’s time to go tell everyone.” Tears still hovered at the edge of her eyes, and even though she had wiped them away, the tales of crying were all over her face.

No one will suspect her.

The thought was comforting even in its morbidity.

They left the tent side by side, and immediately ran into a tech headed their way, “How’s he doing?”

The timing fused through Jordan, they could have easily been caught. But he quelled that with the thought that they hadn’t. And that was all that was important now. It wasn’t like he was going to make this a habit and needed to be better prepared the next time.

“He didn’t make it.” Jillian’s voice hitched at the end of the sentence, giving credence to her sorrow.

The tech looked to Jordan and he offered a quick nod confirming what she’d said. “We unhooked him, he needs to be transported to the morgue. Would you set someone up to do that?”

“Of course.” The young man started to duck into the tent, but stopped himself. “Are you headed over to fill out the death certificate?”

Jordan nodded, even as he saw Jillian stiffen beside him. Neither of them had thought of that apparently. Well, it was a good thing they were desk jockeys for the most part. And luckily they’d been headed that direction anyway.

Half an hour later the certificate had been signed. Landerly had been notified, and he asked Jordan how Jillian was doing. “She’s awake sir. But I’m not sure how much longer she’ll stay that way.”

“Keep her up.” Was all he said before he disconnected the line. And Jordan didn’t even consider it rude. His mother would have killed him if he’d done anything like that. But Landerly was just that way. And Jillian could easily become that way.

She stood and stretched, letting loose a long yawn. “Okay, bedtime for Bonzo, here.”

“No!”

She frowned against the violence of his retort. “Why not?”

“What if he isn’t finished?” Jordan couldn’t stop the words, “He isn’t us, he doesn’t know where everything is. He’ll be slower at getting it done. You haven’t felt anything-”

“Who’s to say I will?” She pushed against her back, calm despite his fluttering. “If that’s our criteria I may never sleep. And I’m already half nuts. Good night.”

“No, Landerly told me to keep you up.”

“Landerly can bite my ass. And I’ll be asleep so I won’t even feel it.” She shrugged her jacket back on, having shed it in the heat of the records tent. “Good night.”

Jumping to give chase, Jordan tugged on his own jacket and followed her out. “Just a few hours more. I’ll medicate you again.”

“No.” She stopped cold in the middle of the walkway and faced him, standing her tired ground. “That stuff felt like cocaine as best I could tell.”

“Then eat. You need food.”

Her eyes blinked, but slower than usual, causing panic to surge through him.

“I won’t eat cafeteria food anymore. Good night.”

“No. I’ll get you something good.” He waved a pointed finger in her face and watched as her eyes tracked it. “There’s a Chic-Fil-A just over that hill.” He pointed with one hand and grabbed her wrist with the other. “Let’s go.”

She resisted, but didn’t have enough body weight to slow him down. “We’re walking?”

“Yup. It’ll keep you awake.” He tugged and she stumbled along beside him, but he didn’t slow the pace. His own feet were keeping beat with the jack-hammering of his heart. He hoped David had gotten the job done. But he didn’t know. And the consequences were too severe if they were wrong. She would just have to keep up.

So she did. She didn’t utter a single word all the way up and over the hill. Only placed her order at the counter and bordered on falling asleep in the booth when he went back to get the food. The skeleton crew of the fast-food joint eyed her a bit. But her behavior wasn’t that odd considering everything else that had gone on.

Jordan made her chose a soda with caffeine and forced her to drink all of it. But he didn’t have to make her eat a single chicken nugget or waffle fry. Those went down all on their own. Her only comment the whole trip was, “I can’t believe this was right here and I didn’t know it.” But he was grateful that at least she wouldn’t be losing any more weight today.

He thought about weighing her when they returned to the tent town, but she was falling asleep on her feet, even as they paced her back to the tent. Jordan recognized that she had led him back to the tent she and David had shared. But they both stopped cold at the sight of the draped body on the gurney.

Jillian did an about face and walked off in a different direction for a few steps, before realizing that she didn’t know where she was going.

Jordan grabbed her elbow, “Come on, my tent’s over this way. I need to keep an eye on you anyway.” He pulled her through the white rows to another of the identical tents, and pushed her inside.

He saw it with new eyes as she scanned the tiny square of space. The single gurney, the orange light shed by one of the standard space heaters, his duffle bag tossed into the corner, open with scrubs and one pair of jeans flowing out of it and across the once neat line of shoes that sat beside the bag. The countertop covered with squared stacks of folders.

Jillian laughed. There wasn't much energy behind it but it was an honest sound. "I would have known this was yours, it looks just like your desk back home." With that final statement she shed her jacket and crawled onto the gurney he had lowered to a normal bed height. For a few minutes they were quiet while he hooked her up to every available machine and set the alarms. When they were finished she adjusted covers while he grabbed folders and lowered himself into the uncomfortable chair in the corner.

He had been awake as long as she had, longer even, and his eyelids blinked in slow rhythm. The paperwork would keep him alert. But it was Jillian that kept him up. She rolled over, adjusted the covers, curled up in a fetal position, and rolled back. His own head lolled as he started to drift off, only to be pulled back by the soft rustle of Jillian's feet touching the ground. "I have to go to the bathroom."

He didn't say anything, just watched while she unsnapped electrodes and wires and slid back into her jacket and shoes before padding off into the daylight beyond the tent walls. Looking around he realized that it was very light inside the tent. But he couldn't be upset that she had stretched her awake time by another half-hour.

He dozed while she was gone, but jerked awake at the sound of the Velcro ripping. Without a word she slipped out of shoes and jacket and into wires and tubes and slid back between the covers, and began her restless tossing again.

His breathing evened and he felt himself slipping, just as her voice cut through. "Jordan. Wake up."

"Huh?" He used his legs to push himself upright and run his fingers through his hair. The daylight was the same shade and angle as he remembered it - only a few minutes had passed.

"Get up here. You're falling asleep in that chair and I can't." She held out her hand and waved him toward her.

It wasn't an invitation of the sort he wanted. It was Jillian, ever practical. But the thought wasn't unwelcome. "It's narrow, I can't have you rolling out."

"So put up the baby bar." Even as she said it, she pulled the release catch, tugging at the side rail. He reached out and, snapped the smooth metal easily into place. The back rail was already up, where he had left it to prevent him from rolling against the tent wall and thinking in his sleep that it was more solid than it was. The only option left was crawling up from the foot of the bed, and he made his way while Jillian shifted and adjusted the covers.

Within moments he curled behind her and draped his arm across her waist, waiting for her to protest. She didn't, just softly leaned back against him, probably completely unaware that he liked it. But she didn't curl into him because she wanted to, there just weren't other options in the tiny space.

With a few deep breaths he slipped off, consciousness growing frayed at the edges of his vision. Before he lost all contact he thought he felt Jillian's body relax, and he prayed that it was sleep.

Becky stood just behind the first row of mourners, draped in her best black. Her parents and Brandon stood beside her, having shown up just to show up. They were using any excuse to see her these days - even Jillian's funeral.

Her eyes skimmed the crowd. The Brookwood women formed a solid front on the other side of the gleaming casket, Jillian one of only two family members they had lost. All this ascension talk had been most difficult on the families that lost one or two. How could they say that their loved ones had been among the damned?

They hadn't even been able to visit Jillian while she'd been awake. They lived on a mountain just north of the Georgia border and had been iced in the entire time. They had spoken to her on the phone once or twice but it was all that they had managed. Of course, they had gotten a warm front, just in time to throw the first dirt at their daughter's funeral. Sometimes God seemed cruel.

Behind the Brookwoods, under the shade of a tall oak, David lingered at the edges. He had been at the edges since Jillian had died yesterday. The funeral had been put together quickly, with the mortuaries running at full speed and processing body after body. Not all of them got a full funeral. There simply wasn't the time or resources. There were talks of mass graves for the unclaimed at the morgues. But no one would hear of it. The bodies would have to stay in the coolers until the religious right and wrong had a service for each of the damned.

Jillian was important though. And her funeral got precedence, just like Jordan's had. Becky had attended it, too, just like she had attended so many others.

She hoped this would be the last, at least for a good long while.

The preacher said the final words, not even looking to his scriptures. He had the whole thing memorized by now. And he read it like he had done this twenty times already this week. He probably had.

Jillian's family stepped back away from the hole in the ground, the light reflecting off the tears in their eyes as they turned to go. There was no reception planned - no time, no group of friends - simply this spot in the cemetery with too many shiny new stones and too many unmarked graves, waiting for the stone-cutters to catch up with demand.

As the mourners parted, David made a tiny salute to her and turned away to duck into his car. He had a flight back to Chicago. He had booked it for yesterday evening, but Becky had convinced him to stay for his lover's service.

She wondered now if he was fleeing because Jillian wasn't here, or if he really didn't care. Becky wasn't stupid; she wouldn't put either option past him. There was also the vague possibility that he had killed her. If you could call it that. He might have set her free on the other side.

But Becky didn't know. She couldn't speculate. So she simply smiled and watched as the black car pulled away from the curb at a sedate pace. He was only a block away before he spun the tires and high-tailed it out to the airport; even from here she could hear the rubber squeal.

A hand touched her arm. "I'm so sorry about your friend." Her mother's voice came over her like old quilts.

"She's in a better place now." Becky said the words, the same ones everyone said, but she believed in a way she never had before. "So are Melanie and Aaron."

Her mother offered only a tight nod, to say 'thank-you, but no more'.

Becky wouldn't take that though. "Mom, Aaron and Melanie are together."

“Of course.” The hand patted her on the arm while her mother visibly disengaged from the conversation.

“Mom! Listen to me.” She took a deep breath and let it all fall out. “When Jillian would go into a coma, she would be awake somewhere else. With Jordan, her lab partner. And she said a little girl hacked her way into the CDC phone lines convincing the staff that she was a Doctor Sorenson.”

Her mother blinked, still not comprehending, still not wanting to. But Becky pushed, her mother was made of sterner stuff than this. “She talked to Jillian. Mom, it was Melanie. Jillian and Jordan drove out to the house and picked up the notebooks I left behind. They saw Aaron and Melanie.”

“When?” Finally she had her mother’s attention. Rapt green eyes, so like her own, fixated on her daughter.

“Three days ago.”

“But they were already-”

“There. Mom, they’re not here. But they aren’t dead.”

She felt the cold seep in as she watched her mother’s spine stiffen and shield her from belief. The disconnect was more powerful now, now that she had less siblings to fall back on. Her mother turned away. “That’s just silly.”

This time it was her hand that grabbed at her mother’s arm. But she wasn’t gentle. She didn’t follow the dictates of society. And she didn’t care. “It’s not silly, it’s true. Jillian described Aaron and the house to a T. She said Melanie decided to go to the biology magnet even if it meant riding the short bus. How would she have known?”

Her mother’s face took on the worried look of the convinced.

“It’s true Mom. They’re just somewhere else.”

“Then why aren’t they here? Why did God split up a good family?” A glaze of tears threatened at her mother’s eyes, and suddenly with that acceptance Becky knew what to do. Even though she didn’t know she’d been deciding.

“God split up a lot of good families, Mom. I don’t know why. But we’re together and they’re together. Aaron moved home to be with her.” She sighed. “And I’m moving home, too, Mom.”

“Rebecca!”

Arms were thrown around her with a joy that took her off balance. It made the other mourners stop and stare. But only for a moment. Things were odd these days and funerals were a dime a dozen. Black was getting a lot of wear, and a happy outburst at a funeral wasn’t something to be too surprised about.

“I may not move into the house. But I’ll be close.”

Her mother’s smile curved up, holding all the wishes a parent could have for a child.

“I’ll see if I can get grants from the CDC to study the species here. Or maybe go back to the University. See if Warden is still there or not.” Her mouth pulled up in a resigned grin.

If he was, she’d handle him. She had more clout now, maybe even some recognition.

She hugged each member of her family, then each member of Jillian’s. She told them the same thing: that Jillian was in a better place. But she didn’t elaborate. They looked like they wouldn’t want to hear it. Like they all had sticks up their asses. Then she sent up a little prayer asking forgiveness for her thought. And followed it with a second prayer that the sticks be removed, before turning to catch the car that was heading back into Oak Ridge.

Three scientists shared the midsized sedan with her. In the same tasteful gold that all the CDC cars had been. She declined a front seat and spent the short trip to the center of town staring out the window at the landscape she knew so well - the patches of brown along the hillsides, the organic shapes of the Appalachian mountains rising up against the backdrop of too-blue sky.

And sure enough, even though no visible clouds rolled in, the color changed quickly and surely to grey during the short drive. When they exited the car they were treated to the first flakes of the first snow of the season.

With closed eyes, Becky stood at the edge of the high school field, and smelled the air she knew so well, felt the prickle of cold as it invaded her senses, and knew that she couldn't go back to Atlanta. Not for longer than it would take to pack her things.

She belonged here.

It was five o'clock, before her father managed to come get her. He simply hugged her and they were silent for most of the winding road home. But when they got there the front door opened to greet her with heat and laughter.

She went to put her things in Melanie's room, believing that Mel was here, even if she couldn't be seen. That by being in this house she was as close to her brother and sister as she could be. She took in a deep breath of the smells of little girl and clean ruffled curtains before heading out to have the spaghetti dinner they had held for her.

• • • •

JILLIAN TURNED, OR tried to turn, but something stopped her. She tried again, this time attempting to open her eyes as well. Neither worked. As she rolled forward, pins and needles shot up her right arm, as it reacted to being freed from her body weight. Her left shoulder hit something cold and metal. And, as grateful as she was that she could move, she jerked back, eliciting a grunt from the wall behind her.

Jordan!

"Jordan?" Her voice was mumbly, and right then she knew. She lacked the deep dry creak of waking from coma - she was here, where she had planned, hoped, to be.

"Jilly?" She smiled at the still asleep voice, and for a moment she could believe they were in a Florida hotel, checking out a little girl with a spider bite. But her IV tugged at the tape on her arm and her electrode snap stickers itched. And Jordan's voice became clearer. "Jilly!"

He shuffled his position and she shuffled hers to where she could smile at him. And he deserved a smile, damned if his hair wasn't sticking straight up and out.

He smiled again. "None of the alarms went off. And I set them pretty high. They'd have woken us both if you started slipping." Relief radiated from him in tangible waves. He didn't make any motions of resisting the urge to hug her, and before she knew it she was engulfed and squeezed, but she didn't mind.

But then his hands were everywhere, checking the pulse at her throat, then the radial pulses at each wrist, he looked into each eye separately then moved side to side to see if she was tracking him. She endured to make him feel better until he grabbed a stethoscope from the end of the bed.

She shoved at him, snapping one of the electrodes free, "Get your damn hands off of me! That's going to be cold as-" she didn't get to finish. The machine had reached its count and began wailing the alarm that its patient had dropped below reasonable levels, or removed an electrode, which was not acceptable.

Jillian slapped her hands over her ears, as Jordan scrambled to the head of the bed to disengage the wailing noise. The shrieking was loud enough that it just might have pulled her back had she started to slip away.

The sound stopped, leaving a ringing in her head that almost masked the sound of Jordan's heaved sigh. Just as she laid her head back down and felt some of the tension slip away, three techs ripped through the Velcro and burst into the room looking like white-coated avengers.

"Is everything okay?" They looked everywhere for the source of the alarm, stopping only when Jordan waved a hand from behind her and told them it was all fine.

It was then that their eyes stopped roving and settled on the two doctors sandwiched on one gurney. The taller tech with dark hair couldn't keep his eyebrows from raising. As Jillian turned her head away she saw Jordan's hand shooing them away, and the look on his face told them it wasn't any of their business.

The sigh settled deep into her lungs, making her grateful for the air even as she was frustrated. "Not again."

"Again?" This time it was Jordan's eyebrows that rose.

"Nothing." Great. On both sides now she had been found in the arms of one of her colleagues. It seemed life always had a way of catching up with her. But she fought the frustration by doing something. She yanked wires, freeing electrodes from their snaps and flat-lining all her readings. She sat up, rubbing her head and gently lifting the stickers there, before yanking the ones at the corners of her chest band-aid style. She gave little yelps while Jordan watched with a smirk on his face and a hand out that she slapped each used sticker into.

"I need a shower."

"I hesitate to let you go by yourself." He shook his hand over the wastebasket, freeing the stickers and letting them fall.

"Ahh!" She was a smart girl, she should be able to come up with a better protest than that. But before she could Jordan spoke again.

"I was kidding. It sounds like a good idea." He grabbed towels out of the cabinet and they bundled up, heading across the fields to the gym. She was thankful for the wave of heat that rolled over them when they opened the double doors and traipsed to opposite sides of the large wooden floor.

Only then did she realize that she hadn't brought a change of clothes, and she'd have to climb back into the scrubs she had slept in. Not like anyone would notice, it wasn't like she ever wore anything different anyway.

The hot water felt like a dream, and for a brief moment she let her eyes fall shut and stood quietly, thankful for the solitude. She hadn't been afforded any for over a week now. Everyone had been watching her with beady little hawk eyes waiting for her to slip back under.

After far too long she forced herself out from under the hot spray and tucked the towel around her torso noticing the red marks she had made from yanking the electrode stickers. As she padded carefully out to the locker area the door cracked just a little, no face showed, but she would have recognized Jordan's voice anywhere. "Jillian? What the hell were you doing in there? Surgery?"

"Enjoying the hot water." She waved her hand at him to shoo him back, even though he couldn't see it. "Now go wait for me."

She heard his chuckle as the door swung closed. She dressed and followed Jordan back out the door, where they were greeted by furls of tiny white snow attempting to warm itself in the heat of the gym. Everywhere outside the snow blew frantically. Up. Down. Sideways. It looked like Christmas morning, falling on the tiny tent town just down the hill from where they stood.

They walked through the flurries, Jillian with a soft smile on her cold lips, and as they got closer they could see heated discussions between people in bulky jackets. Jordan approached one of the people, and whether it was a man or woman, doctor or janitor, was all obscured by thick down and fuzzy trim at the hoods. "What's the problem?"

"We have to move everyone out of the tents. They won't hold the snow, and if it melts on the tops it'll pool and leak and we'll lose millions of dollars of equipment."

She and Jordan looked at each other, and she blinked. The other people disappeared at the edges of her vision, and she spoke clearly and happily, free for the first time in forever it seemed. "Let's go home."

Jordan simply smiled.

Side by side they walked back to the tent, and Jillian reveled in her footprints. Tried to track who went where from the pathways already marked by busy feet. Later, while they were packing, the phone rang. Hoping to distract herself, she waved Jordan back to gathering his things. "Jillian Brookwood, CDC Disease Lab." Well, that hadn't come out sounding quite right, but the person on the other end didn't give her a chance to change it.

"This is Dr. Greer Larson, I believe we spoke once before. I'm looking for Dr. David Carter, is he there?"

"Oh." She kicked herself after the word slipped out. She knew better than that - you should never act surprised. But now she had to step up and tell him. "David passed away yesterday."

"Yesterday?!"

She explained, and waited patiently while he asked why he hadn't found his friend on any of the lists. She mentioned the waking and falling under, and heard the deep disappointment in the voice on the other end. He asked if she could give him a moment, and Jillian realized that David's ticket out of here was the loss of a very real friend. And knowing David, one of a very small number.

He came back on the line and started in with a deep breath. "I finally think I have an answer to that question you asked."

She started to say something brilliant, like huh? But he continued, "The cretaceous die-out could conceivably have all happened from an illness. In a matter of days. There isn't anything that says the dinosaurs died over time." There was a brief pause, and Jillian couldn't think of anything intelligent or comforting to say. Again it was Dr. Larson who solved the problem. "I don't know if that helps. I'm sorry if it's too late. But I wanted to pass that on."

She nodded, even knowing he couldn't see her. Then spoke in soft tones, "I'm sorry about David. He spoke highly of you." She remembered. She hadn't realized it at the time, but this was the only other scientist David had ever quoted or deferred to.

They hung up and she settled the phone back in its cradle, then waited silently on Jordan. Without speaking, they left the confines of the tent and the heat, then a little further stepped beyond the edges of the tent town into an explosion of white.

Snow clung in thick pieces to her gloves and jacket, the wind lifted her hair and sent it dancing. "Will we be able to drive in this?"

Jordan bounced the keys in his hand. "I'm from Minnesota."

They found the sedate CDC gold sedan in the parking lot and tossed the bags into the trunk before sliding into the seats. Jillian slammed the door and shivered, even through her jacket the leather of the seat felt frigid.

They warmed the engine for a few minutes. When Jordan didn't start a conversation, Jillian waited with him, silent even when he judged the engine ready and pulled out of the parking lot. She didn't need conversation, she was content just to watch the world float by in little clumps of white. Finally they merged onto the interstate, flurries blocking their vision even more.

She kept her mouth closed, not wanting to interfere with his driving, and let her brain wander. Although they were headed due south, the car's compass read 'north'. Even so, a cold, easy peace settled over her, a calm that had everything to do with the storm she left behind, so that even the storm she was in couldn't shake her.

After a while the flurries subsided to a world with clear air and a thin layer of white frosting. That gave way to a simple dusting of snow. And at last they emerged onto crisp, cold ground, with no signs of the winter they had left behind.

Not ten miles further, Jordan suddenly broke the silence. "We're getting close to Chattanooga." She looked to him, startled. And this time it was he who replied before she could form words. "Signal Mountain isn't that far out of the way. Do you want to stop to see your Dad?" "No." He remembered. "We never really got along. The family I talk to is all on the other side." Even while driving, he turned square to check her out for a moment. "Then why are you here?" Her mouth quirked up in a way that she couldn't help. "Let me rephrase that. My blood family is there. You and Landerly understand me a lot better than they ever did."

He smiled.

And she laughed at him. "I think you two may even like me."

Again the flash of true grin, one she hadn't seen in a long while. "That I do."

For a few minutes she just studied him, taking in the charming profile, the straight nose and brilliant eyes. His smile had faded, taking the boy into man. The mouth opened and his voice interrupted her thoughts. "What about David? I thought you two were getting serious."

"Oh no. David is . . . David. He only really cares about David." She shrugged.

"I thought you liked him."

"I do. I just accept him for what he is, and isn't."

Jordan nodded, eyes still in tune with the road ahead, not looking at her face.

Her voice was small when she spoke, realizing what needed to get said. The first words were always the hardest, and after that it would flow. "Thank you—"

"For what?" He looked at her full on again, teal eyes full of concern for whatever he didn't know.

"For taking care of me. The way Landerly says it, you busted your ass to save my life."

He reddened a bit, but spoke with pride. "Yeah, I did. And I'd do it again . . . you owe me big time."

Her laughter burst out of her, filling the edges of the car, and she wasn't sure if she saw something when he looked at her again. After the giggles died down, she settled back, they still had several hours to go. So she started in, knowing Jordan was the only one who would understand.

"If everything changed when the poles shifted, and some species wound up on one side of the shift but not the other, won't they evolve differently? The whole ecological structure has altered."

"That makes sense." He nodded, but didn't give any other follow-up.

"So, in a thousand years our descendants will have evolved differently from David and Becky's."

"I don't think Becky will have him."

She almost punched him in the arm, but held back.

He spoke again, even as he swerved the car around a tire scrap in the road, "I don't think David should ever reproduce."

Jillian rolled her eyes and steered the conversation back to where she wanted it. "So probably the same thing happened the last time the poles shifted. Some species went one way and some went the other."

She waited until Jordan nodded, acknowledging her idea. “Does that mean that there are dinosaurs somewhere?”

It made perfect sense, but she just wasn't sure she could wrap her brain around it.

The End

• • • •

THANK YOU FOR READING, Resonance, we hope you enjoyed it.

Ready to read more from AJ Scudiere?

When 8 year old Fortune goes missing for ten days, she's mysteriously returned unharmed. Her disappearance reveals secrets long hidden from her mother Mia and she might just be the key to uncovering the betrayals buried with Rafe's family. In those ten days, Mia and Rafe will learn everything they thought they knew was wrong.

"Fortune" is a two-book set that tells the same story from different perspectives. Read either book first!

Click Here For Your Fortune!

• • • •

KEEP READING FOR THE next book in Fractured

• • • •

JUMP TO THE TABLE OF Contents

• • • •

AJ SCUDIÈRE— A BORN nerd, AJ was excited that her birthday often fell on the first day of school. As an adult, she continued on this geeky path, doing a thesis for an undergrad degree and then getting two more degrees. The latest is in Human Forensic Identification and Forensic Odontology.

The author of 20+ books, AJ has won 15 Best Suspense/Best Fiction of the year awards and had her work optioned for film and television. Her work is gritty and always walks the edge of reality.

Join AJ's email list at www.ReadAJS.com/join-now and check out more books, sales, deals, and her latest giveaway.

EDWIN DASSO: DEATH TARGET

---

DEATH TARGET

BY ED DASSO

Author's Rating:

• • • •

Language: *** Sexuality: ** Violence: *****

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE, each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

Death Target (A re-imagined version of the author's previous work, Past Aghast Text Copyright 2006 Edwin Dasso. All Rights Reserved.

This eBook is licensed for your personal enjoyment only. This eBook may not be re-sold, given away to other people or replicated or distributed in any fashion without the express written approval of the author. If you would like to share this eBook with another person, please purchase an additional copy for each recipient. Thank you for respecting the hard work of this author.

This book is a work of fiction. Any resemblance to events, names, places or persons, living or dead, are entirely coincidental.

A medical suspense thriller that will keep you breathless.

After an emotionally wrenching experience in Iraq, army doctor Jack Bass is retired from the military, and takes a job as head of the department of anesthesiology of Southern Medical Center hospital. When two clinical specialists are brutally murdered, the chief of university police focuses on him as the main suspect because of his PTSD history. Jack struggles to find the truth...but isn't sure what it will be. Is he the psycho killer some say he is or is he being set up?

Western Iraq Desert

Jack Bass, MD knelt on the hard wooden planks of the OR tent floor, rocking slightly from side to side. Though he'd wrapped the corpse he held in his arms in a clean white sheet, congealed blood now darkened the linen. Wet streaks made white tracks in the soot covering his face. The teardrops rolled down his cheeks and fell onto the gore-soaked sheet, creating random, salmon-colored specks on the crimson background.

His nostrils still burned from the gunpowder smoke—and the stench of death—he'd inhaled during the battle that had raged over the last twenty-four hours. He ignored the stinging of the small wounds on his face that still oozed blood. An occasional brief exchange of gunfire sounded from somewhere in the compound of the Army Level II Medical Treatment Facility Lt. Colonel Bass had commanded. He heard the commotion but remained motionless, despite the shouts of U.S. soldiers outside growing nearer the shredded remains of the tent.

He startled when the soldiers kicked open the doors of the OR tent, yelling as they entered, rifles held to their shoulders sweeping the interior. Jack still made no effort to rise, his head hanging heavily to his chest. Once they were all inside, the infantrymen quickly worked across the large triage area to where Jack remained on the floor. A few soldiers encircled him and halted.

“Clear!” a sergeant yelled from the door to an OR suite that he held open, peering inside. The sergeant stepped over to Jack, hovering over him, glancing at Jack's Lieutenant Colonel insignia. The sergeant let his rifle hang from its shoulder strap and gazed around.

“Any other staff around, sir?”

Jack didn't respond.

The sergeant focused back on Jack, nudging Jack's shoulder with his hand. “Colonel, sir...we're here to rescue you. You're safe now,” he announced. “You can get up.”

Jack raised his head slightly, staring blankly straight ahead, holding the lifeless body against his chest, sobbing softly as he continued to rock. A pale, flaccid arm protruded from beneath the bloody sheet, flopping slightly with each rocking motion, as if beckoning the soldiers closer...perhaps to tell them of the horrors of the past day.

The experiences of the last twenty-four hours had left Jack Bass feeling as if his soul had been ripped from him. He was now nothing but a shell, and emptiness filled the space where the essence of who he'd been as a man used to reside. He longed for death—longed to join the dead person he held. Longed to join those under his command he had been unable to save.

The sergeant smirked at Jack then pegged two privates in his squad with a glare.

“Get this guy squared away for exfil. I'm gonna scout around the outside perimeter.”

Two young privates gawked at Jack. They exchanged a quick glance and both shrugged. The soldiers pulled at the corpse Jack held but Jack pulled it even tighter against his chest. They quickly abandoned the effort.

“Medic!” one of them finally called out in exasperation.

(1045, Monday)

Gary Frigman, Chief of Police of the university that Southern Medical Center was affiliated with, was making one of his occasional unannounced late-night visits to the ER. He ignored the sideways glances from the medical staff, especially the women, as he snooped around. He'd heard the rumors about how these visits of his gave some of the women the creeps. He scowled. Not his problem. If they didn't like it, who cared? Tonight, he was looking for Dr. Misty Carrel, a new intern, about a parking violation.

He leaned back against the high counter of the front desk, his elbows perched atop it, holding in his pendulous abdomen ER staff and patients scurried about him. Every time a passing female glanced at him then pulled their smocks closed over their breasts, his face flushed hot. Bitches—they'd be lucky to have a man like me.

Eventually, he spotted Dr. Carrel approaching the front desk. He'd pulled her ID photograph up in his police database before he'd come up here, and he recognized her right away. She took a chart from a nurse then rushed down one of the hallways leading toward the exam rooms. After Dr. Carrel had disappeared around a corner, he turned to the nurse at the front desk.

"I need to talk to that Dr. Misty Carrel about a parking violation." He pointed toward where Misty had gone. "What room did she go to?" he asked in an official tone.

The nurse looked slowly up at Frigman, rolling her eyes. "Can it wait, Chief? She's seeing a patient," she replied tersely.

"I'll decide if it needs to wait or not, nurse!"

"Whatever. Room 14, surgery section," she replied then returned to making notes in a patient's chart. "Prick."

Although she'd mumbled that last bit, he'd heard her loud and clear. He stopped, twisting his head back toward her and scowling, but she kept her head down. No, it wasn't worth the effort to let her know who was the real boss around this medical center—he wanted to get at Misty Carrel. He ran his tongue across his lips as he thought about her.

Frigman opened the door to room 14 without knocking. Misty was wearing surgical scrubs, leaning over the patient as she examined him. Frigman's mouth watered as he ran his eyes over her shapely figure.

He cleared his throat loudly. "Dr. Carrel?"

Misty jumped and turned to face Frigman, confusion obvious on her face.

"Yes. Can I help you?"

"I'm Chief Frigman, from the University Police." He hiked up his utility belt, but it slid back to its usual position under his belly.

"Uh. Okay." She cocked her head to the side. "I didn't know the police were involved in this case."

"We're not. I need to talk to you about a parking violation."

She blew out a heavy sigh, her curly blond locks fluttering as she shook her head. "Fine...but this isn't really a good time. As you can see, I'm in the middle of examining this patient—"

"I'll decide when it's a good time!"

Misty's mouth fell open, but she remained mute.

The PA system beeped. “Chief Frigman, please come to the ER front desk right away!” a tired-sounding woman announced.

Frigman craned his neck and looked up at the speaker in the ceiling as he listened. “Damn,” he muttered then quickly turned back to Dr. Carrel, his brows deeply furrowed. “You’ll be hearing from me again soon, honey!”

“Yeah, whatever,” Misty mumbled as she turned back to her patient.

• • • •

(0100, Wednesday)

THE LAB AT SOUTHERN Medical Center, one the busiest trauma centers in the United States, took on a morgue-like atmosphere in the wee hours of the night. A multitude of machines whirred, buzzed, and clicked as Sarah, a lab technician, settled into her chair at her workstation, ready to slog through her awaiting tasks.

“Did you get that medical student all set up back in the microscopy room?” her colleague, Debra, inquired from her workstation.

“Yeah. He said he was just coming off one of those forty-hour shifts—guy looked dead on his feet.” She chuckled. “With the low-level lighting in that room I’ll bet he’s asleep in five minutes.”

“Well, we’ll give Sleeping Beauty a wakeup call at the end of our shift if we need to.”

The lab door flew open and banged against the wall. A faculty doctor wearing a long blue lab coat rushed across the room, coming toward them with long strides. Dr. Jackass was well-known to them...and not in a good way. Sarah shot Debra a quick glance as they warily watched him approach. “Hey, girls, how’s it going tonight?” he called out as he approached, an obviously feigned smile on his face. “I came down to check on a stat blood type and cross request I sent down from the OR earlier.” He held up a small pipette of blood. “I was wondering if you could also run a hematocrit for me while I’m here?”

“Sure, I—” Debra replied.

“I had expected the blood units to be ready by now,” the doctor snarled. “But I’m sure you two have been too busy yacking.” He sneered. “As usual.”

Debra leaned close to Sarah and whispered. “What a prick.”

Sarah pushed Debra away and shook her head at her then snatched the paperwork from the doctor’s hand. “I’ll go check on this for you right away, Doctor.” She turned to Debra. “I’m sure my colleague will be happy to run your hematocrit while you’re waiting.”

“Yeah, absolutely thrilled,” Debra groaned.

• • • •

AFTER FIVE MINUTES of fruitless searching, Sarah slinked out of the large cooler where they stored the blood supplies.

“Damn! How am I going to tell that asshole that I couldn’t find the blood units on his request?” Sarah mumbled, closing the cooler door and leaning back against the cool stainless steel. She shuddered, more from the angst about delivering the bad news than from the cold metal pressing against her back. She looked nervously across the large lab room. The doctor still stood where she’d left him, but now he was alone.

Sarah scowled. I’ll bet that jerk pissed off Deb and she left!

“Oh, well, might as well get this over with,” she muttered then shuffled across the lab, keeping her eyes averted from the doctor.

As she neared him, Sara slowed. His lab coat was askew and had multiple blood spots on it. She hadn’t noticed them before, nor did she remember him wearing latex gloves...and they looked to be covered in fresh, red blood. What the hell? The creepy smile on his face made her shiver yet again.

“Your worthless partner left before she finished running that hematocrit for me.” He put his hands on his hips and glared at her. “I’m really in a hurry, honey—you think you could come over here and get it done?”

“S-sure, Doctor. R-right away.” No! She chastised herself for sounding like a wimp. Don’t let this jackass intimidate you. Don’t give him the satisfaction.

Despite her intentions to be brave, something about the guy made her skin crawl. She crept around the end of the lab bench, her eyes glued on his gory gloves. She looked down and shrieked. Debra was lying in a crumpled, bloody heap at his feet. She had multiple, deep gashes all over her upper body and head. A pool of blood covered the floor surrounding her. Sarah stood frozen, unable to tear her gaze from Debra’s mangled, inert body.

A vicious blow to the side of Sarah’s head knocked her back against the workbench, her flailing arms knocking over a rack of test tubes. The glass containers smashed into bits on the floor, scattering shards across the aisle. Her head was spinning like she had a bad hangover, and she fought to remain standing.

(0120, Wednesday)

Mark Quinn jerked his head off the cold, hard tabletop, his eyelids shooting open. His gaze darted around as his foggy brain tried to register where he was. He rubbed at his eyes, wondering if he had just dreamed he'd heard a scream. It had seemed so real. He stumbled from his chair to the window separating the small room he was in from the main lab, squinting as he peered into the large space. Sarah, the cute lab tech who had helped him earlier, was draped over a lab bench, clawing at the top of, struggling to pull herself upright.

"What the hell?" Mark whispered.

A man wearing a faculty lab coat, a crazed scowl on his face, his latex gloves covered in blood, stepped forward and rained a flurry of punches on her head. Her hands slowly slid across the surface of the lab table as she dropped. She fell from sight but her hands shot up, grabbing at her attacker's lab coat as she fought to pull herself up. She grasped his nametag, ripping it from the breast pocket. The man again hammered her head with vicious blows. She slumped, her hands sliding down his torso as she lost her battle to stay upright.

Mark pinched himself, like he'd done as a kid, checking that he was actually awake and not just having a nightmare. What is happening? He squinted, trying to get a clear look at the man's face but the guy had his back turned to Mark or he moved so quickly that Mark never got a clear view. Who was this guy? Was he a faculty doctor or just somebody who's stolen a faculty lab coat? The man suddenly stopped punching, his gaze shooting over in Mark's direction.

Mark dropped to his knees, cowering beneath the window. He shook his head hard. No...I-I must be dreaming...maybe hallucinating. I've been awake forty hours, after all. What was this guy up to? Why would his hands be covered in so much blood? And, where was the other lab tech Mark had seen earlier. Had he seen me? What should he do? He should intervene, but—what could he do?

Mark rose to a crouch and ambled toward the door and opened it an inch but stopped, paralyzed by indecision. His mind was still in a fog and he struggled to process what he'd just seen. Mark wiped sweat from his eyes, his gaze darting around the small room.

"Stop fighting me!" came a muffled yell from the lab, barely audible through the small opening in the door.

"W-why?" Sarah asked. "Why are you doing this to me?"

"Nothing personal, honey. You were just in the wrong place at the wrong time."

Mark's heart jumped and he eased the door closed then moved back to the window, creeping his eyes to the lower edge, just enough to see over it. The man in the lab yanked a syringe from his pocket and flicked the cap off the needle, jabbing it downward. He then straightened, bent slightly at the waist, breathing heavily as he glared downward, his arms hanging at his sides. He then raised the large, empty syringe in front of his face, smiling as he gazed at it, before shoving it in a pocket. He wiped blood from his latex gloves onto his lab coat sleeves, leaving bright red streaks across the pale blue fabric. Mark swiped sweat from his eyes again. He had to do something!

Mark slinked back to the door, easing it open and crawling on hands and knees to the corner, peering around the edge of the wall. The guy was still standing there. Mark began to rise as he kept his gaze glued on the thug. Mark froze when the guy pulled a large, military-looking knife from beneath his lab coat, raised it above his head, and swung it viciously downward like some crazed samurai. A stream of bright red blood spurted into the air, spattering across the front of his jacket.

Mark ducked his head back, putting a hand over his mouth to muffle a shout. No! I just want to wake up—this nightmare sucks!

Mark's heart felt like it was going to pound right through his chest wall. He snuck another glance around the corner. The man swung again and again, wildly plunging the bloody blade downward, each thrust causing more blood to splatter onto his lab coat. The doctor's evil grin grew broader with each stab. Mark dropped to his knees, shaking his head. All he'd wanted to do was look at the stupid slide then go home to get some sleep! Now he wondered if he was going to survive the night.

Mark scabbled back into the small microscopy room, cautiously peering over the edge of the windowsill again. The doctor had stopped his hacking. He held the gore-covered knife at his side, gazing downward. His lab coat was covered with spatters of blood, making it look like a grisly, Pollock-like painting.

The man tossed the knife aside, stepped back, and removed his gloves. Suddenly, the killer started to turn toward the small room where Mark was hiding. Mark flopped to the ground beneath the window. A swirl of questions flew around inside his head. Had he seen me earlier when he'd looked in my direction? Is he coming to kill me, too? Should I just stay hidden here or make a run for it? Mark pushed himself so hard against the wall under the window, he thought he would crash right through it.

"Dammit! What should I do?" he hissed.

There's just one more thing I need to do to finish this, the man wearing the blue, faculty lab coat mused as he rushed toward the rear of the lab, smiling.

One of the killer's gore-soaked shoes slid on the floor as he rushed toward the rear of the lab. He lost his balance, flailing his arms wildly and an outstretched hand slammed hard against the pane of the microscopy lab window.

"Dammit!" The doctor quickly recovered then took a deep breath, standing still for a few seconds. That would have been just great to slice my arm open on a broken window! He gazed down at his blood-covered shoes then glanced behind him. A trail of crimson footprints led from the dead girls to his current position. He smacked his forehead and rolled his eyes. Dumbass! Take off your shoe covers. He peeled his surgical shoe covers from his feet and shoved them in a pocket. He glanced at the lab window, scowling at the bloody palm print splattered across the glass.

"Goddamit! Why don't I just leave my friggin' signature for them!" he growled.

He frantically looked around for something to wipe away the hand print. The sound of voices in the hallway outside the lab filtered into the room. He froze and listened.

"Double damn!"

The voices were getting closer. He swiped sweat from his brow with a sleeve as he wiped at the handprint, doing little more than smearing it around. What they'd said in the Army was true: the best plan went to hell as soon as the battle started! The handle on the main lab door clicked and the door opened a crack. He stared at the pink smear and groaned. It was time to go!

He crashed through the rear lab door, piecing together possible alibies even as he ran down the dark alley behind the hospital. He stripped off the blood-caked lab coat as he sprinted into the dark, letting it fall to the grimy pavement.

This will still be all right, he told himself.

"Sarah?" a female voice called out in the lab.

Mark's eyes launched open. He'd assumed the killer was after him next when the guy had slapped the window above where Mark hid. He started to rise from where he was crouched but suddenly stiffened. Wait—what if someone thinks I did this?

"Debra?" the woman in the lab called from the doorway.

Slowly, he began to rise again then shook his head and dropped back. No! Maybe they'd just leave. Then he could check on whoever had been attacked...though, he doubted there'd be much he could do for them.

The front door to the lab banged closed. Mark exhaled a long breath. He slithered up the wall to peek out the window. The place appeared deserted. Good! After a moment, he crawled to the door, opened it slowly, and paused to listen. He then scrambled on hands and knees to the closest row of lab tables and peered hesitantly around the corner. No one there.

Mark squatted, motionless, considering what his next move should be. I can't afford to get sucked into a murder! He twisted his head around, trying to work out the tight knots in his neck muscles. I'd probably get tossed out of med school just for being a person-of-interest in a murder. And I'd never get accepted into another school...then I'd have nothing. Nothing! After years of working my ass off. Though he wanted to bolt out the rear exit and run to his car, he kept envisioning Sarah, the cute lab tech who had been so nice to him earlier tonight. He had to try to help her. He'd call 911 and try to stabilize her if he could. He yanked his cellphone from his pocket, frowning when he saw there were no service bars. Damn! The lab was deep in a sub-basement of the hospital. He shoved the phone back into his pocket.

He'd just have to do whatever he could by himself. He crawled on hands and knees to the aisle where the attack had taken place. He stopped for a couple of seconds, mentally steeling himself, then glanced around the corner of the long cabinet.

"Oh, my god!" he muttered then threw a hand over his mouth. His eyes went wide as he stared. He had never seen so much blood—not even during a trauma case in the OR! Though Mark's time in the hospital had helped him overcome his usual urge to vomit at the sight of gore, the image before him caused bile to rise and burn the back of his throat.

It was probably a waste of time to check for a pulse, but he had to do something. He crawled next to Sarah's body, placing his fingertips on the ghostly white skin of her neck. He snatched his hand back, as if from a flame. Dead! He shot a glance at Sarah's coworker. No sense in bothering to check her for a pulse. Blood barely dribbled from her deeply slashed neck. Her head hung by a thin strand of skin and muscle, flopped to the side at an unnatural angle. Mark turned his attention back to Sarah.

A lump formed in his throat. She'd seemed like a really nice person. Why would someone want to do this to her? He slowly pulled her lab coat up over her face. A plastic ID badge fell from the folds of cloth, a man's smiling face looking back at Mark as he stared at it. He squinted, looking closer at the name and picture on the ID badge, his brows shooting up. What? Who was Jack Bass?

Voices came from the hallway near the lab entrance again. He needed to get the hell out of here, or he'd be, at the very least, a person-of-interest for the murder! Something he couldn't afford to have happen. He was already struggling financially to stay in medical school.

He snatched the ID badge from the floor. It might come in handy if he became a suspect for some reason. He raced to the microscopy room, grabbed his backpack, then bolted toward the rear lab door. He slipped on one of the fresh, bloody footprints left by the murderer and fought to keep his balance.

"Oh, Sarah, where are you, girl?" someone called out in a friendly, melodic voice from the main lab entrance just as Mark smashed through the rear exit.

Mark sprinted down the dark alley, praying he hadn't been seen.

Mark glanced back over his shoulder at the lab door as he ran. His feet became entangled in something, and he stumbled and fell hard on the rough asphalt, rolling twice before coming to a stop. He growled and tore at the cloth wrapped around his ankles. He started to throw it aside but stopped. Something wet and sticky covered the cloth. Something wet and sticky, like blood. He held it up to catch the glow of a nearby streetlight, and a shiver raced up his spine as he stared at the blue lab coat. Dark reddish-brown blotches covered most of the coat. Did this belong to the killer? He jumbled it into a ball then jumped to his feet and disappeared into the welcome concealment of the night.

As Mark worked his way through the dark parking lot, a university police car with lights ablaze sped into the ER driveway. As the vehicle rounded the bend, its headlights flashed across him. He crouched between cars and froze. His heart beat against his ribs, his breath caught in his lungs, and he gasped. Had the cop seen him? Tires screeched as the vehicle skidded to a stop. Was the officer going to get out of his car and come Mark's way? He slowly twisted his gaze toward the ER entrance, afraid to look. The campus cop hopped out of his squad car and was immediately besieged by a crowd of agitated, clamoring hospital staff.

Mark blew out a long breath then slowly rose. Keep your cool, Quinn. Don't look guilty. Just keep a nice, casual pace over to your car. He reached the car, sneaking another quick glance toward the cop before wrenching the door open, cringing at the loud creak of the rusted hinges. He tumbled into the seat and threw his backpack onto the passenger-side floorboard. His hand shook as he fumbled to slip the key into the ignition switch. Jesus, he was scared! He started the car, crouching low in his seat as he guided it slowly down the aisle. He stopped at the exit gate, his foot thumping on the floorboard as the gate bar crept upward.

"C'mon, c'mon, you piece of crap!"

As he drove the car through the gate, he twisted to take one last look at the cop by the ER and the mob surrounding him. Good! Nobody looking this way. He pulled onto the empty street and sped away. Several blocks from the hospital, he let out a long sigh, his shoulders slumping.

"What the hell just happened?" he shouted, squeezing the steering wheel tightly, his pulse pounding in his temples. "I can't believe what that asshole did to those girls! Nobody should die like that."

The short drive to his apartment complex seemed to take hours. Mark flicked his gaze up at the rearview mirror every few seconds, watching for the blinking red lights of a cop car to appear behind him. He pulled slowly into his apartment parking lot. After getting out of his car and quickly surveying the area, he dashed into his apartment. The blast of cold air that swept over him as he opened the door was a welcome sensation on his sweaty brow. He eased his apartment door closed, locked it, then leaned back against it. Weak, he slid down to the floor. He drew up his knees, resting his head on them.

"I made it...but now what?" he mumbled.

(0145, Wednesday)

Frigman waddled into the ER, stopping just inside the sliding doors to survey the area, scowling at anyone who met his gaze. He hated being called out in the wee hours. But when Bill Turrel, the officer on duty, had called, he was adamant that Frigman needed to get to the hospital ASAP. A noisy group of people crowded around Turrel near the front desk. The guy looked relieved when he spotted Frigman.

“Hey, Chief.” He waved him over. “Chief! Over here!”

Frigman frowned and hiked up his gun belt, which immediately slid back down, then sauntered toward Turrel. The boisterous crowd quieted as they turned toward Frigman, and then they all scurried away, the female staff pulling their sweaters tight over their breasts. Frigman glared at every woman who covered her bosom. Bitches! He stopped in front of Turrel, pulled off his cap, and ran his fingers through his greasy, tangled hair.

“Why the hell did you call me in, Bill?” He shoved the hat back onto his head then poked Turrel in his chest hard enough to make him stumble backward. “You better have a damn good explanation for this,” he growled.

Turrel grimaced and rubbed at his chest. “Uh...I hate to break the bad news to you, boss, but it looks like we may have a couple murders on our hands over in the lab.”

“You’re jerking my chain, right, Bill? Is this some kinda prank?” He scowled at Turrel. “It ain’t funny if it is.”

Turrel ran a finger inside his collar, pulling on it as he twisted his head around. “No, boss! These people”—he waved an arm around at the ER staff—“say there are a couple of bodies all hacked up in there.”

Several of the people milling nearby turned toward Frigman and nodded in unison.

“It’s horrible!” one of the nurses cried into her hands as she held them over her face. “I just went down there to get a lab result that was overdue, and...oh, God...those poor girls!”

Frigman sighed dramatically then turned back to Turrel. “All right, let’s go check it out.” He poked Bill in the shoulder. “But no one else goes in there until I give the all clear.” He started to walk away but stopped suddenly, spinning back to Turrel. “And don’t call any outside law enforcement unless I tell you to.” Frigman turned to the small group, jabbing an index finger at each person. “Everybody keeps a lid on this until I’ve had a chance to check it out.” He glared at each of them. “Capiche? I don’t want the damn hospital rumor mill here running overtime!”

Frigman inched open the main lab door just enough to wedge his head through the opening, shooting a quick glance around the interior then cocking his head to listen. He twisted his head back toward Turrel. The man stood there behind Frigman, shifting from one foot to the other.

“Relax, Bill! You look like some schoolgirl who has to pee rather than a police officer.” He pointed at the floor. “You stay here. I’ll call you if I need you.” Frigman narrowed his eyes as he glared at Turrel. “Remember...nobody comes in here! Not even you.”

“Consider it done, boss.”

Frigman pushed the door open and crept in, stopping just inside, his gaze crawling over every nook and cranny. The automated lab machinery whirred and clicked. Frigman slinked from one row of lab tables to the next, quickly peeking down the aisle between them then moving to the next. He wrinkled his nose. Is that blood I smell? He pinched his nostrils. He hated the smell of blood. Shit made him want to gag.

He peered around the corner of the next aisle and froze, his eyes shooting wide. Well, that explains the smell. The odor became overpowering, and he fished a handkerchief from his pocket and held it over his nose. Two women were lying on the floor in the middle of a large pool of congealing blood. As if on cue, he gagged. Both had multiple long, deep slashes covering their bodies. Jesus! Looks like somebody took a machete to them! One had an arm nearly completely severed. The other had her neck nearly sliced through, her head hanging sideways, held in place only by the shoulder it had sagged onto.

He tiptoed to them, quickly touching each, the coolness of their pallid skin telling him they’d been dead for some time. He searched under and around the corpses as much as he could without disturbing them. He arched his brows when he spotted a large, gore-covered Ka-Bar knife lying on the floor, partially hidden under a bench ledge. Military knife. Nice touch.

He quickly explored the rest of the lab, rifling through trash bins and storage closets. Something was wrong—there was something missing. He stood in the center of the lab, turning slowly, scanning the entire room. It had to be here somewhere. He startled when Turrel called out from the entrance doorway.

“Hey, boss. Got a minute?”

“I told you nobody comes in here until I give the okay!” Frigman yelled.

Turrel winced and lowered his eyes to the floor. “Sorry, boss, but...I-I have a lady here who thinks she saw someone running out the back door...j-just before she found the bodies.” He raised his eyes hesitantly. “Just thought you might want to talk to her.”

Frigman rested his hands on his hips and glared silently at Turrel for several seconds. “Yeah. Sure—send her in.” He shook a fist at Turrel. “And keep the hell out of here—like I told you, moron!”

Bill backed through the door, his gaze focused on the ground. After a few seconds, a young nurse slinked into the lab. She didn’t announce herself. Didn’t say a word. Her gaze constantly darted around the room as she stood silently just inside of the door, leaning against it as she chewed at a fingernail. Tears had caused her mascara to seep from her eyes, leaving long black streaks across her face, making her look like a frightened zebra.

Frigman eyed her up and down. Sheesh! Looks like I got a crybaby on my hands. He sidled toward her then stood silently before her for a few seconds, staring at her. She swiveled her head around constantly, looking everywhere but at Frigman. A couple of tears spilled from her eyes, and she swiped at them, further smearing her mascara.

Frigman glanced at her nametag. “So, Debbie, is it?”

She jumped. “Y-yes...D-Debbie.”

“And you’re a nurse here?”

She nodded, making makeup-stained tears fall onto her white smock.

“Well, Debbie, why don’t you tell me what you saw? Be as specific as possible, and don’t leave out any detail. Think you can get your shit together enough to do that?”

Her mouth hung open a few seconds as she glanced at his face. “Y-yes.” She gnawed again at a fingernail.

He pulled a small notepad from his pocket and huffed. “All right...tell me what you think you saw.”

“W-well, I’m working in the ER tonight...” She shrugged, a wan smile flashing across her lips. “I’m new, so I’m still learning—”

“Yeah, yeah, that’s great, Debbie. Welcome aboard and all that crap...but I don’t need your life story—just tell me what you saw.”

Debbie stole a glance at Frigman’s face, stifling a sob, tears now cascading down her cheeks. “S-sorry, sir. Well, when I came into the lab earlier to check on a lab report that was overdue, I saw someone running out the rear door.”

“And?” Frigman wagged his hand for her to continue. “What did this person look like?”

“I-I don’t know. They were running out the back door just as I came in.” She stuck her hands in her pockets and looked away. “All I saw were the coattails of their lab coat—but I’m sure it was a lab coat.” She snuck a quick glance at him. “I think it was a man, though.”

“That’s it? That’s all you got for me?”

“I-I got scared when I didn’t see anyone in the lab...a-and nobody answered when I called out. I wasn’t sure what to do, so I started looking around. It didn’t take long before I found them.” She threw her hands over her face and sobbed. “It was terrible!”

Frigman rolled his eyes. “All right, Debbie, keep yourself together.” He jabbed a finger at her. “So, you didn’t actually see who it was running out the rear door, but you’re sure they were wearing a lab coat and it was a man? Is that right?”

“I-I think so. They were too big to be a woman...”

“How big?”

She shrugged.

Jeez! What an idiot! “Anything else, Debbie?” Frigman asked, stuffing his notepad back in his pocket.

“Y-yes.” She peeked through her fingers, stealing a quick glance at his face. “I know I shouldn’t have looked around after I found the girls, but...I wanted to make sure there was no one else hurt that I might be able to help—”

“Very admirable, but you’re right—you shouldn’t have wandered around a crime scene. What else you want to tell me?”

“I-I’ll have to show you.” She pointed to the rear of the lab. “It’s back in the microscope room in the rear of the lab.”

Frigman looked in the direction she was pointing. “All right, show me what it is you think is so damn important—but be quick about it,” he grumbled.

She led Frigman to the rear of the lab, turning her head away as they passed the aisle where the two bodies lay on the floor. She held the door to the microscopy room open, stood in the doorway, and pointed at a microscope on a table.

“I don’t know if it’s important, but that scope still has a slide on it...and its light was still on when I came in—like someone left in a hurry,” she mumbled then looked timidly at Frigman. “The clipboard next to it has a name on it—I’d guess it belongs to whoever was using the scope.”

Frigman shoved his way past her, his belly pushing her aside as he squeezed through the door. He snatched up the clipboard, gazing at the name at the top. “Huh—Mark Quinn.”

“Looks to me like he left in a big hurry...like, maybe, running out the back door? Maybe after he killed those girls,” Debbie murmured.

“Want me to pick this Quinn guy up for questioning, boss?” he asked, pointing at the clipboard.

Frigman and Debbie both jumped and spun toward Turrel. The man stood right behind them in the doorway to the little room.

“Dammit, Bill!” Frigman glared at Turrel. Not only had he disobeyed a direct order, he’d scared the shit out of Frigman by sneaking up on him like that. “No! And what the hell are you doing in here? How many times do I have to tell you to stay out in the hall?”

“I just wondered what was going on—you been in here a while.” He fiddled with his badge. “You, uh, think we’re gonna need some outside help on this, boss?” he mumbled.

“No! I don’t! Now get your ass back out in that hall. And don’t you dare call anybody!” He jabbed an index finger into Bill’s chest. “In case you’ve forgotten, we’re state police officers. I don’t need any damn ‘outside help’.”

Bill walked away, and Frigman turned to Debbie, jabbing a thumb over his shoulder. “You can beat it now, girlie.”

She turned, but Frigman shot out his hand and grabbed her shoulder, spinning her back to face him.

“I want you to keep this to yourself. Understand? If you blab, I might have to lock you up.”

“Y-yes sir.”

Frigman watched her closely through the window that looked out into the main lab. She scurried around the periphery of the room, staying as far from the two bodies as possible. He pulled out a chair and plopped onto it, resting his forehead on the palm of his hand.

“This night is not going well at all.”

(0600, Wednesday)

An alarm clock blared. Mark shot upright on his bed, shocked from his slumber. His eyes flew open, and his gaze darted about the room. His shoulders sagged, and he blew out a long breath. He was at home in his own bed, where he'd been since he'd gotten home a few hours earlier, though he didn't feel the least bit rested. He sat there a few moments, rubbing at his eyes as his grogginess cleared. Memories of the prior evening hit him like a slap of ice-cold water after diving from a high board. Had those events really happened? Or had he dreamed them up in a nightmare? He threw his legs over the side of the bed.

"Had to be a nightmare," he mumbled. "But it seemed so friggin' real." He shuddered.

He caught a glimpse of his reflection in the dresser mirror and groaned. He was still wearing the clothes he'd worn yesterday, and dark circles rimmed his eyes. He stripped and stumbled out of his room, rubbing his face as he headed to the bathroom. He tripped over his backpack, his gaze instantly zeroing in on the piece of blood-covered lab coat hanging out of the top.

"Sonofabitch! It wasn't a nightmare!" He flopped back against the wall, burying his face in a hand and shaking his head slowly. "What do I do now?"

He couldn't not show up for rounds—that would surely draw attention to him...especially with the prick senior resident on his team. If he went, though, would he do or say something that would raise suspicion? He slapped a hand against the wall.

"I can't afford to get sucked into this!" He pushed off the wall and shuffled toward his bathroom. Maybe a cold shower would help him think.

• • • •

MARK STOOD UNDER THE uncomfortably cold water, his head hanging as the icy torrent goaded his mind into awakening. After a few minutes, he snapped his head up. It was a temporary solution, but what else could he do right now? He'd hide the evidence in the attic then go to the hospital—try to act like everything was business-as-usual. He'd let things settle down for a few days and see what developed before deciding what to do next. Then he would think of some way to anonymously tip off the police about what he'd seen—maybe put the evidence somewhere they'd find it.

He dressed in a hurry then dragged a chair over to the attic opening. As he was placing the lab coat and gloves into the musty space, he noticed a dried, bloody fingerprint on the inside of one of the latex gloves, clearly defined in the talc powder that always lined them. He gingerly placed the gloves atop the lab coat then glanced at his watch.

"Crap! I'm running late for hospital rounds."

As per his usual morning routine, he sorted through his backpack, checking to see that he had everything he'd need for the day. His throat tightened. "Where the hell did I put my clipboard?"

The clipboard contained his patient list, notes for all the tasks for the day, as well as the results of various labs and diagnostic tests for his patients. He dumped the contents of the backpack onto the table.

"Where the hell...?" He smacked his forehead with a palm. "Dammit! I must have left it in the lab last night!"

(0630, Wednesday)

“I am so tired!” Jack Bass grumbled, putting his feet up on the desk in the OR anesthesia office and yanking off his sterile cap. “I’m too old for this crap!”

He was starting to wonder what had possessed him to accept the chairman position for the anesthesia department at a major academic medical center. It had seemed like a good career move after he’d retired from the Army, but it was proving much more demanding than he’d expected.

Last night, his first call night on the new job, was worse than he’d ever expected to experience in a civilian role. He’d managed plenty of penetration injuries during his Army service but had somehow forgotten that penetration injuries also ended many arguments among inner-city dwellers in major cities. Having to handle the usual cases of one redneck beating on another over a woman, or some dirtball stabbing another person during a robbery was bad enough. But then the night took a turn for the worse—a couple of gangs began “debating” sales territory. Apparently, their approach to negotiating involved using Uzis and Berettas.

“Must’ve been a full moon last night. All the crazies were out!” Jack mumbled, stirring powdered creamer into his now cold cup of coffee. He took a sip, cringed, then set it aside. He eyeballed the pizza still sitting in its box on the desk then shrugged and pulled a piece loose. He bit into the cold cheese and stale crust, chewed, swallowed, then threw the rest back into the box.

“Cold pizza for breakfast worked just fine back in college, but I think my tastes have matured since then.”

He pushed the box aside and started writing notes in patient charts, his eyes growing heavy. He rested his head on top of the stack of charts, his thoughts drifting back to the previous night.

• • • •

THE ELEVATOR DOORS leading from the ER to the OR suite creaked open, and a surgery intern shoved a patient in a wheelchair out of the car.

Eyes wide, the intern glanced around frantically. “We need to get this guy in an OR, stat!” he shouted.

A young Hispanic man slumped in the wheelchair, barely conscious but writhing and groaning, a large machete buried deeply in his skull.

Jack and the anesthesia chief resident on call, Ed Thomas, came running from the anesthesia workroom.

“Well, this is something different,” Ed commented as he gawked at the patient.

Jack and Ed hurriedly examined the patient, then Jack turned to the surgery intern.

“Relax—he’s stable,” Jack said calmly then pointed. “Take him to the prep area and put him on a gurney while the OR team gets a room set up. I’ll call the neurosurgeon while you go find someplace to stay out of our way.” Jack took a step then stopped and turned back. “Next time, call and warn us before you bring up a serious case like this—it’s poor form and bad medicine.” He poked the intern in the chest. “Don’t do it again.” He waved at Ed then pointed at the patient. “Get him ready and into Trauma Two ASAP.”

A short while later, the case was started, and Jack stood next to Ed at the head of the OR table, peering over the drape to watch the surgeons.

“This is definitely a strange one. He’s gonna have a splitting headache tomorrow,” Jack quipped then snorted.

The OR circulating nurse glanced nervously at Jack, and chuckled half-heartedly.

Jack met their gazes and shrugged. “Sorry. Weak humor is a bad habit of mine.” He turned to Ed. “This guy looks stable—you okay if I go check on other cases?”

Ed scanned the patient’s vital signs on the multiple digital displays. “I think we’re cool, Dr. B. Go ahead.”

Jack hustled down the hall toward the next OR.

“Stat chest coming up from the ER!” A voice blasted over the PA system.

“Sonofabitch!” Jack growled. “Stat chest” could mean any of a variety of injuries, but they were always critical, complex cases. Jack ducked his head and stepped through the door into the next OR. “Everything okay in here?”

The anesthesia resident turned to him and nodded.

“Good...sounds like I’m gonna be tied up for a bit,” Jack said.

“I heard,” the resident said, pointing at the overhead speaker.

Jack spun and trotted to the department’s front desk. “What’s up?” he asked Janice Dwyer, the OR’s head nurse.

“They’re on their way up from the ER with a gunshot wound to the chest.” She shrugged. “Sorry, that’s all I know. Should be here any second.” She jabbed a finger toward a hallway. “I’ve got a crew setting up trauma OR three, and I called the blood bank to give them a heads up.”

“Got it—I’ll go check on the room.” He turned away then stopped and turned back. “You’re good at managing this chaos.”

Janice smiled nodded curtly. “Thanks. See you back there.”

He nodded, his gaze following her for a couple of seconds. She reminds me of Lori.

Jack rounded up medical staff and assigned them various tasks to prepare for the case. A ding announced the arrival of the ER elevator, and he went to stand before it. The doors hadn’t even opened completely when a gurney carrying a thrashing, moaning young man shot out. Several medical personnel holding equipment or IV bags surrounded him, all yammering directions.

Jack ignored the chatter and focused on quickly assessing the patient. The strong scent of alcohol on the man’s breath was overwhelming and the bandage on the upper left anterior rib cage was saturated with bright-red blood. Crimson tendrils spilled from it down his chest wall and soaked the white sheet beneath him. Another wound was low on the right rib cage. Damn! That’s likely through the liver. Going to be a lot of blood loss during this surgery! He hurriedly wadded up a piece of sheet and pressed it firmly onto the wound, running alongside the gurney as the patient was rushed into the OR.

The surgeon, Dr. Scott Barris, and a senior surgery resident stood at the OR table, prepped and ready. Good. We’ve got a good attending surgeon. The patient was transferred to the OR table and the surgeons made an incision immediately after the surgical drapes were in place. After pumping in several units of blood, the patient eventually stabilized, and Jack took the opportunity to make a quick round and check on the other active cases.

“Dr. Bass, call the front desk—stat!” a voice blared over the PA system.

In the middle of inserting an arterial line in another unstable trauma patient, Jack twisted his head around to the OR circulating nurse. “Call the front desk and tell them I’m up to my ass in alligators—whatever it is will have to wait a few minutes.”

The nurse no sooner hung up the phone when another page blasted out. “Dr. Bass—sorry, but I really need you to call me now!”

Jack secured the arterial line in place and gave the resident a thumbs up then vaulted to the wall phone and called the front desk.

Janice answered on the first ring. “Jack, I know you guys have your hands full back there, but I just got a frantic call from the ER. Sounds like there’s a big shootout going on between a couple of gangs. The paramedics called from the scene—they said there are no less than a dozen wounded at the scene.”

“Can’t they triage them elsewhere?”

“I asked the same thing. The other hospitals are all overflowing, too.” She took a deep breath. “Get ready...sounds like you’ve got at least half a dozen stat chests on the way up soon. I’ve got my crews setting up rooms four through six.”

This night was going to hell in a handbasket. “What the hell are we supposed to do for staff? We’re spread thin already!”

“I’ve called a few people at home—they’re on their way in. Anything else I can do to help you?”

Jack grunted. “Send me back to a battlefield—it’s not so crazy there.” He started to hang up then put the phone back to his mouth. “We need more blood units in OR two, and everybody else is going to be busy setting up—I guess I’ll have to go get it myself.”

“Be fast about it!”

“Trust me, I’ll make short work of it. Bye.”

He sprinted toward the staircase that led down to the subbasement where the lab was located, formulating a triage and staff assignment plan as he ran.

(0650, Wednesday)

• • • •

JACK SHUDDERED, SHAKING himself from his reflections. Well, that sucked. Hope I don't have another night like that any time soon.

“Dr. Bass, what should I do with this last body?”

Jack jumped and spun toward the intern standing in the doorway of his tiny office. “Huh?”

“Remember? We had too many bodies for the morgue to handle last night...we've been storing them in that little cysto OR. I can't find a place for this one, though.” She jabbed a thumb over her shoulder.

Jack clambered from the chair. “Let's go see if we can make some room somewhere, Misty.”

Jack pushed the gurney holding the bloody corpse as Misty guided it. They stopped at the door to the small OR, stood shoulder-to-shoulder, and gazed inside. Two gurneys were pushed together with six blood-spattered bodies stacked across them like cord wood.

“Jesus! Really?” Jack mumbled, staring. Darkened blood pooled beneath the stack of bodies. He stared at the ripples running across the surface with each drop of blood that fell from the gruesome pile above. The splashes reverberated in the small room like a little waterfall in a cavern.

Jack began to shake, his eyes glazing over. No! Not now!

• • • •

JACK'S MIND TOOK HIM back to Iraq. He held his combat helmet in place on his head as he sprinted toward a landing med-evac helicopter. The armored vest he wore over his scrubs chafed his armpits as he ran. He skidded to a stop beside the helicopter, twisting the handle and throwing open the door. A medic leaned over a bloodied soldier, holding an IV bag high. He nodded at Jack.

“Hey, Doc.”

The medic jumped to the ground next to Jack, put the IV bag on his shoulder, and grabbed the handles of the stretcher, then he turned to look at Jack.

“This guy's got a bad sucking chest wound.”

Jack threw back the blanket, gazed at the gaping wound a second. The guy wouldn't be able to breath worth a damn until that got fixed. Jack pulled the cover back in place. “We've got OR two waiting! Get him in there now!” Jack waved an orderly over. “Help get this guy to number two. Right now!”

Jack stepped aside as the stretcher was carried off then hopped up into the helicopter cabin, snapping his gaze around the inside. What the hell? He leaned into the cockpit, tapped the co-pilot on the shoulder, then jabbed a thumb in the direction of the cabin.

“What the hell's up? That's no way to transport wounded,” he yelled over the screaming of the turbine engines.

The co-pilot spun to him, met his gaze, then leaned to look around him at the pile of bodies stacked against the rear wall of cabin. He snatched his headphones off and put his mouth near Jack's ear.

“They're all dead, Doc. We're just bringing the bodies back.”

Jack twisted back around, staring at the pile of bodies, his gaze following the drops of blood dribbling from the pile and forming a large red puddle on the metal floor. A shudder shook his entire body. He'd seen far too many young warriors who were beyond his help by the time they got to him. He shook his head slowly, disgusted. Why would men choose war as an answer to disagreements so often?

• • • •

“DR. BASS? HEY, DR. Bass—you okay?”

“Get those men into OR two, soldier!”

Misty's eyes widened, and she stepped back. “Uh...should I call someone else to help me?”

Jack panted heavily, his head snapping around, his throat constricting. He was drowning! He couldn't breathe!

Misty tapped him on the shoulder and hopped back. “Dr. Bass...you're freaking me out!”

Jack spun toward her and swiped saliva from his lips. Misty took another step back, bumping against the gurney. Jack held his hands over his ears then shook his head hard, his eyes refocusing.

“What?” His entire body shook. He sucked in a deep breath.

“Do...you need some help?”

Jack hung his head. “No...no. I'm okay. Not enough sleep lately. Are we done in here?” he mumbled.

Misty stared at him. “Uh...you were going to help me stack this last body on top of the others.”

Jack looked at the corpse then at the stack of bodies and bobbed his head. “Yeah...sure. Let's do it.”

Misty shot repeated, furtive glances at Jack as they carefully moved the corpse. Once they had the body positioned and covered with a fresh sheet, Misty scampered over to the door then stopped, gazing back at Jack.

“Thanks. Bye.” She spun and bolted away.

Jack grunted, frozen in place, still staring at the mound of carnage.

(0740, Wednesday)

Dr. Lamar Waymon entered the OR suite, stopped at the front desk, and glowered at Janice. “Where’s Bass?” he demanded.

“I don’t know, Dr. Waymon.”

“Then go find him, you dumbass!”

Janice muttered something unintelligible, stood, and walked away.

Waymon looked around his former domain with a sense of pride and ownership. He’d built this damn department...and as far as he was concerned, he still owned it. The medical center’s board of directors had felt differently, though, and had removed him as the Anesthesia Department Chair several months prior. He considered the concerns they’d expressed about him to be nothing more than exaggerated nonsense. He didn’t feel that the hiring of that know-it-all punk, Bass, hadn’t helped the situation, either. He shook a fist in the air.

“I’ll show those bastards they made a big mistake when they removed Lamar Waymon from his throne,” he snarled.

Waymon snapped his head around. Where had that idiot nurse disappeared to? He growled then stormed off toward the OR anesthesia office. When he entered the office, Jack Bass was sitting in a chair, his feet on the desk, looking dazed.

Janice stood beside him, gazing down at him, a concerned expression on her face as she tapped on his shoulder. “Dr. Bass.”

“Hard at work, I see,” Waymon said. “I bet you left all the bad cases from last night for me to finish up today, eh, Bass?”

Waymon considered himself above being assigned on-call duty, but Jack Bass had insisted all faculty be on that roster—including himself. What a martyr! Truth be told, Waymon hated taking care of these patients. He considered them nothing more than unappreciative lowlifes, and the world would be a better place if he just let them die.

Waymon snorted and scowled. “You look horrible!”

Jack slowly sat upright in the chair, turned his gaze to Lamar, then looked down to his chest. Lamar wrinkled his nose. Bass’s scrubs were caked with dried blood, and sweat soaked much of his shirt. Jack shook his head like a dog shaking off water after a bath, then he glanced back up at Janice. His eyes went wide, and he frowned.

“Janice? When did you get here?”

She turned to Waymon, jabbing a thumb over her shoulder at Jack. “There he is, Lamar.” She stepped to the door, stopped, and spun back. “And don’t ever call me a dumbass again, or I’ll make a complaint to the board.” She jabbed a finger at him. “Something you really can’t afford to have me do.”

Jack turned to Waymon, yawning and stretching. “Thanks, Lamar. Good to see you, too.”

Waymon swept his hand at Jack. “Not much of a role model for trainees, looking like that.”

“Well, we were kinda busy last night, Lamar.” He stared up at Waymon and arched an eyebrow. “I really didn’t have the time or inclination to fret over how I’d look for you this morning.”

Waymon stabbed a thumb over his shoulder toward the OR suite. “Doesn’t look like you were very busy—”

Jack bolted from his seat and stared into Waymon's eyes. "Why don't you just follow me, Lamar. I'll show you what we've been up to all night. One picture is worth a thousand words—and the picture I'll show you might just save me from hearing a thousand words of bitching from you."

Waymon rolled his eyes. Bass could be so overly dramatic. Such a martyr. He snickered. "Going to shoe me all the patients you killed?"

Jack waved Waymon after him. "Let's start in the cysto OR."

Jack held the door open to the darkened cysto room then flipped on the light. The fluorescent bulbs flickered then flooded the room with a bright glow. Waymon grunted at the sight of the corpse pile. He turned to Jack and smirked.

"Did any of your patients actually manage to survive?"

"That's it, Lamar! I've had it!" Jack spouted. "I'm tired, and I'm disgusted." He poked Waymon hard on the shoulder. "And I really don't feel like listening to any of your petty bullshit this morning. I don't know why you've got a bug up your butt for me, but that's your problem, not mine!" Jack glared at Waymon for a few seconds then took a deep breath. "Now...do you want my report or not?"

What a thin-skinned hothead. Waymon turned and sauntered away. "I don't really need you to report anything, Bass. I can see the results of last night." He stopped and turned back to Jack. "Don't forget, I was doing this when you were still just—"

"Save it, Lamar! Don't want to hear it." Jack brushed past Waymon. "We can get along or not—I don't really give a shit! Believe me, though, I feel no compulsion at all to put up with any of your crap!" He stopped and glared at Waymon. "And if I hear of any attempts on your part to cause divisiveness in this department, you're fucking history. Got it?"

"Screw off, Bass!" Waymon replied. You young punk! "Nobody talks to me that way!"

"I just did—deal with it."

Jack spun and dashed from the dank, smelly room. "I don't need anything from you, Bass!" Waymon yelled after him.

Jack made his way toward the locker room. As he passed the front desk, he stopped. Janice sat in her chair, toiling over paperwork.

"Great job last night, Janice—I was quite impressed with how well you managed the chaos."

She looked up from her papers. "Thanks. I was impressed with you, too—you've obviously done this sort of thing before."

Jack stared at her a few seconds then hung his head. "Yeah...you might say that," he muttered.

"Sorry you got the baptism by fire experience last night. That was one of the worst nights I've seen in my time here."

Jack snorted. "Looks like my usual call-night black cloud has followed me here." Jack flashed her a smile. "Have a good day, Janice."

Jack stepped toward the locker room, anxious to shed the bloodstained scrubs and take a long, hot shower. Then I'm going to go home and have myself a big drink of something strong!

"I overheard you and Lamar in the cysto room...the intercom was on." She winked at him "I'm sure you'll come to love him as much as we all do," Janice said.

Jack stopped abruptly and looked over his shoulder at her. She wore a Mona Lisa smile. He guffawed.

"I'm sure I will." Yep. He was going to like Janice just fine.

(0930, Wednesday)

Every time Mark looked over his shoulder during work rounds, he caught his jerky senior resident, Dan, staring at him. Did he suspect something? Am I giving myself away somehow? Mark glanced at his wristwatch. It was already nine thirty, and he hadn't heard anything unusual. That was encouraging. Maybe he'd luck out after all. Maybe it's a good time to sneak down to the lab and grab my clipboard. Hopefully, no one had stumbled onto it since last night. Mark took a deep breath, approached Dan, and nodded his head down the hallway.

"I'm heading down to the lab to check on the results of the thyroid studies we did on Mrs. Abercroft," Mark stated. "I'll be back in a few minutes."

"You can go, but you'll stop by coffee-and-donut rounds on the way back—bring me a couple of Krispy Kremes and some coffee," Dan replied, jeering at Mark. "Scut puppy."

"Sure, fine. Whatever."

He couldn't afford to let his supervisor get under his skin today. Dan already acted like he knew something was wrong. Mark wasn't going to be maneuvered by the jackass into somehow giving himself away. He spun and marched to the elevator. When it arrived, he climbed on, tapping his fingertips against the metal wall of the elevator as it rattled down to the sub-basement.

He stepped off the elevator and headed down the hallway of the catacomb-like floor toward the lab. He rounded the corner near the lab entrance and stopped so abruptly he almost stumbled. A university cop stood at the door, one hand resting on the butt of his pistol. Mark's face flushed hot, droplets of sweat immediately forming on his forehead. Should he just duck back around the corner? The policeman turned toward him, slid his sunglasses down his nose, and peered over them. Mark's heart began a wild gallop, and he ran a finger inside his collar, pulling it away from his neck as he twisted his head around. Stay cool. Don't act guilty.

"Need something?" the cop asked.

He pointed at the lab door. "I-I'm a medical student—I-I'm just here to check on some lab results for one of my patients." Sweat dribbled from his armpits, tickling at his ribs as the droplets trickled down his sides. Damn! He was going to give himself away! The cop was looking at him like he already knew Mark was guilty of something.

"I-I'm a little late for rounds, Officer—can I just go in and get the labs? It'll only take me a minute."

The cop arched an eyebrow, staring silently at Mark for several seconds. He stepped aside and nodded at the door. "Go ahead. Just don't touch anything...and stay away from the yellow crime scene tape."

"Crime scene! What crime ever happens around here—somebody steal a test tube?"

"It's no joke, boy!" The cop slid his sunglasses back up over his eyes and looked down his nose at Mark then jabbed a finger at him. "And it's none of your damn business what happened. Just get your ass in and out of there fast."

"Y-yes, sir."

Mark lowered his head and sped past the officer. He scanned the lab as he strode toward the room where he'd left his clipboard. The techs on duty shot him quick, strained glances then resumed their tasks. Mark glanced sideways down the aisle that was cordoned off with yellow crime scene tape, cringing when he saw the large blood stains on the floor. He shook his head slowly and groaned. Nope. Definitely wasn't just a nightmare.

His chest tightened with each second he remained in the lab. He struggled to control his breathing, yearning to finish his task and get the hell out of there—before what little composure he was managing to hold onto crumbled like a sugar cube in a cup of hot coffee. He quickened his pace, rushing into the small microscopy room. He stood near the door, his gaze darting about the room. Where was it? Crap! He scurried around the room, looking on tabletops, under tables—in every nook and cranny he could spot. No clipboard! He stared at the microscope he'd used last night, swiping sweat from his eyes.

“I could have sworn I had it right here next to this scope!”

Had someone found it? His guts twisted into a painful knot. Did the cops already have it? Had he just been kidding himself about avoiding getting involved in the murders? His gaze shot toward the techs, who were visible through the window. Should I ask someone if it was found?

“Damn it!”

He hurried out of the small room, holding his head down as he raced past the techs. His legs felt like lead, and it seemed to take forever to reach the door. Mark shot a quick glance over his shoulder toward the techs then yanked open the door to the hall. The cop was just on the other side, his arms crossed over his chest as he stared at Mark. Mark jumped, his mouth falling open. He knows! He backed up a step.

“Find what you were looking for?”

Mark choked then swallowed. “Um, no—I-I mean, yes. Yes, I did.”

The cop cocked his head. “Kind of a nervous type for a doctor, aren't you?”

“Uh, oh, well, uh...just a little distracted today.”

The cop grunted and stepped aside. Mark wanted to run. Wanted to bolt down the hall, up the nearest stairs, and run away. Never come back. No! Control yourself, dammit! He ducked around the next corner, panting as he stopped and leaned back against the wall. He banged his head repeatedly against the hard, cool surface. Now what do I do?

Mark shuffled down the hospital ward hallway toward the nurse's station, his head hanging, a flight of thoughts and questions assaulting his mind.

"Hey, scut puppy!" Dan stepped out from a patient's room right in front of Mark, blocking his way.

Mark startled. "W-what?"

"Cops are looking for you, scut puppy." Dan cackled like an old witch, pointing to the far end of the hall.

Mark lifted his gaze and looked, groaning when he saw a morbidly obese university cop conversing with the charge nurse.

"What did you do—kill a patient?" Dan spun, waving an arm and pointing at Mark. "Hey, Chief Frigman. Here he is—the criminal you've been looking for," he shouted.

Mark's gaze darted from Dan to Chief Frigman. The cop waddled hurriedly down the hall toward him, the charge nurse following on his heels. Mark's heart pounded, and his mouth suddenly became parched. Sweat poured down his forehead, dripping from his brow. He twisted his head around, looking for the nearest door to a staircase. Should he run? Clearly, they had something on him—this visit surely wasn't a coincidence. He turned back to Dan, his eyes narrowing to slits.

"Dan, you best shut the hell up, or I'm going to kick your smart-mouthed ass right here," he growled.

Dan backed a couple of steps away, stared at Mark a few seconds, then puffed out his puny chest.

"Oooh, I'm scared, tough guy."

Mark balled his fists and stepped toward Dan, but the scrawny jerk spun and rushed away, casting quick glances over his shoulder as he scurried down the hall. Mark turned to Frigman. Damn! Frigman held Mark's lost clipboard under his plump arm. Sweat from Frigman's armpits had begun to soil some of the papers that were clipped on it.

"You Mark Quinn?"

Mark's shoulders sagged. "Y-yes, sir."

"This your clipboard?" Frigman held it out, putting the tip of an index finger on Mark's name label.

Mark nodded slightly. "Uh...looks like it, yeah. Thanks for returning it."

Frigman glared at Mark. "I'm not 'returning it', boy. I'm taking you with me so we can have a little chat." He jabbed a thumb over his shoulder. "I already told your supervising resident and the charge nurse that you'll be with me the rest of the day."

The cop grabbed Mark's arm, squeezing tightly enough to make Mark wince.

"Let's go," Frigman said.

Mark sheepishly raised his gaze to the charge nurse. Her face was pale, and she repeatedly licked her lips as she returned his gaze. She put a hand gently on his shoulder.

"It'll be okay, Mark. I'm sure Chief Frigman just needs some information."

She had always treated Mark well—taken him under her wing. Mark nodded then hung his head.

"A-am I under arrest?" he mumbled.

Frigman slowly leaned his head forward, peeking over his sunglasses at Mark. "Should you be?"

"N-no, of course not! I haven't done anything wrong." Why do all these university cops wear sunglasses inside? Maybe they were fans of the movie, In The Heat of the Night. Weird.

Frigman stared silently at him for several seconds. “For someone who hasn’t done anything wrong, you seem kinda nervous, boy. C’mon.” He tugged Mark behind him down the corridor.

• • • •

FRIGMAN SHOVED MARK onto a cold metal chair in an interrogation room in the small university police headquarters building then paced silently around Mark, glowering at him. He stopped in front of Mark and rested his hands on his hips, hooking his thumbs in his gun belt.

“So, Mr. Quinn, do you know where we found your clipboard?”

Frigman’s voice sounded distant. Mark had never been in a police station, let alone in an interrogation room. How had this happened? What had he done to deserve becoming involved in such a horrendous situation?

Frigman kicked Mark’s chair. Mark jerked back, but before he could say anything, Frigman bent down, rested his hands on the arms of the chair, and brought his face inches from Mark’s. His hot breath wafted across Mark’s face. Mark squirmed, twisting his face away from the sickening smell of stale Fritos and unbrushed teeth.

“Wake up and pay attention! I asked if you know where we found your clipboard?”

“N-no, I have no idea—I lost it recently. No idea where. I’m glad you found it. Thanks.”

“Don’t play games with me—you know damn well where we found it!”

“No—really, I—”

“We found it in the lab—the same place we found two murdered women!”

Particles of food mixed with spittle flew from Frigman’s mouth onto Mark’s face. Mark tried to push farther back in his seat but had no more room. He leaned his head back, twisting it from side to side.

“Oh. That must be why the crime scene tape was in the lab today.” Mark shook his head. “I can’t believe there was a murder right there in the hospital lab! Who was—?”

“Cut the crap, boy!” Frigman stood straight, arching an eyebrow as he regarded Mark. “How’d you know about the crime scene tape?”

“I saw it when I was in the lab earlier today.”

“What?”

Mark shrugged. “The officer at the door said it was okay.”

“Godammit, Bill!” Frigman mumbled, his face flushing.

“I beg your pardon?”

“Nothing! Just shut up unless I tell you to talk!” Frigman leaned on the chair arms again. “I know you were in that lab last night when those women were murdered—don’t try to bullshit me.”

Mark smiled feebly. “Well...I admit I was down there looking at a slide a few days ago. Don’t remember what day it was...”

“Uh huh.” Frigman paced around Mark. “Do you usually wear a lab coat at the hospital?”

“Well...yeah. Medical students are required to.”

“And what color is your lab coat?”

Mark stared up at Frigman. Where was he going with this line of questioning? “White...medical students can only wear white lab coats.” Sweat was running into his eyes, causing him to squint and blink frequently.

“Need a towel, Mr. Quinn?” Frigman asked, sarcasm underlining his words.

Relax, Quinn! Mark chided himself, fighting to remain focused.

“Let me explain how I’m putting this little story together.” Frigman stopped in front of Mark, jabbing a chubby index finger at him. “You were looking at a slide in the lab last night. A witness says they saw a man in a lab coat run out the rear door of the lab.”

Frigman again leaned on the arms of the chair. Mark fought back the urge to gag at the smell of the man’s fetid breath.

“You see where I’m going with this, boy?”

“Uh...not really...”

Frigman slapped his palms on the armrests. “Dammit! Stop screwing around! You don’t seem to understand; you’re in hot water, boy! Deep in hot water!”

“Okay, okay. I was in the lab Tuesday afternoon. I was looking at a slide from one of my patients. That’s probably when I left my clipboard there. It had been a long night. I was tired, and I guess I forgot it there.” Mark looked up and shook his head. “But I-I don’t know anything about any murders...and I didn’t see anything unusual when I was in the lab.”

Frigman scowled at him for a couple of minutes. Mark turned his head from side-to-side, trying to evade Frigman’s horrible-smelling breath.

“All right, Mr. Quinn, let me see if I have this straight. You were in the lab the day of the murders.”

“Maybe.”

Frigman stabbed a finger at Mark. “Shut up! You say you didn’t see anything unusual, and you don’t know anything about any murders. Does that about sum up your statement?”

Mark squirmed and nodded. “Yeah...that sounds about right.”

Frigman glowered at him. “Okay, Mr. Quinn. I’m not going to arrest you...today. You are a person of interest for these murders, though. You know what that means?”

Mark shook his head. “No,” he managed to squeak, even though his throat felt like it had a boa constrictor wrapped tightly around it.

“It means I don’t want you going anywhere outside this city.” Frigman paused, and his dark, beady eyes locked intently on Mark. “It also means that we’re going to be keeping a very close watch on you.” Frigman paused again for a few seconds then poked his finger in Mark’s chest. “Got it?”

“Y-yes sir.”

“Go on—get outta here.” Frigman waved a hand at the door.

“Can I get a lift back to the hospital?”

“No. The walk’ll give you time to think.”

Mark sighed deeply as he descended the front steps of the police station. Life just sucks sometimes! He kicked at a rock on the pavement and punched the air.

“Why is this happening to me?” he blurted. “Even if I don’t get arrested, I might get thrown out of med school.” His shoulders slumped. “Then I have nothing!”

“That boy knows something,” Frigman muttered as he watched Mark through the window blinds. “And I’m gonna find out what.”

(0600, Friday)

Jack stood in front of the large whiteboard that hung on the OR suite wall near the front desk, absorbed in reviewing the day's schedule and making mental notes about how to manage the caseload.

"Hello, Dr. Bass—I see you're an early riser, too."

Jack jumped and spun. A weighty police officer stood behind him, holding out a hand. His belly lapped over his gun belt, and sweat stains rimmed his armpits, despite the cool temperature in the OR suite. His tie was knotted loosely beneath his open collar, which dug into his meaty neck. Heavy jowls hung below his thick, pouty lips.

"I'm Gary Frigman, Chief of the University Police here at Southern Medical Center."

Jack arched an eyebrow as he appraised Frigman. "Uh...nice to meet you, Gary." Jack reached out slowly and shook Frigman's hand. The sweat on Frigman's palm coated Jack's hand, and he jerked it back then wiped his hand on his pants. Jack hated slimy handshakes!

"Sorry I haven't been by before to meet the new Chairman of Anesthesia—"

"I'm kinda busy, Gary. Nothing personal, but I don't have time for a social call." Jack crossed his arms over his chest. "Can we do this another time?"

"Actually, I prefer 'Chief Frigman'."

"Yeah—whatever. Can we do this another time?"

Frigman hooked his thumbs in his gun belt and cocked his head. "No! I have a few questions I wanted to ask you about an incident here at the hospital."

Jack twisted his head around on his shoulders and rubbed the back of his neck, his pulse quickening. What the hell was this guy up to? Jack's bullshit meter was reading in the red and he didn't want to deal with this right now. "What incident? What're you talking about? Did I park in the wrong spot?" Jack quipped.

Frigman scowled. "I have more important things to worry about than where some damn doctor is parking! This is serious business, and I don't care for your jokes!"

Jack leaned back against the wall and stared silently at the officer. "Then why don't you cut to the chase, Gary."

"Are you aware of the crime that took place in the lab the other night?"

"Yes. Rumor is there was a murder. Sounds crazy—is it true?"

"Goddamit," Frigman mumbled.

"I didn't catch that, Chief—what did you say?"

"I said, that's right. It was actually a double murder, and they were killed in quite a grisly fashion."

"Okay, I'm sorry to hear that, but...what's this got to do with me?"

"The murdered women were sliced up pretty badly." Frigman took a step closer to Jack and stared into Jack's eyes. "We found a military-style knife at the crime scene."

Jack shrugged. "Okay."

"You were in the army, weren't you?"

"I was...a lifer, in fact. Medical Corps."

“Hmmm. Interesting.” Frigman rubbed his chin. “We believe the murders took place early Wednesday morning—”

Jack shoved himself off the wall, forcing Frigman to back up. “Look, Gary, like I said, I’m really busy. I don’t need a rundown on the details—but can you be a little less cryptic, and tell me specifically why you’re here bothering me?”

Frigman’s face turned red. “Fine!” He thrust a finger at Jack. “I need you to tell me where you were early Wednesday morning! Very early.”

Jack dropped his mouth open then guffawed. “You’re kidding me, right? Are you pranking the new guy?”

Frigman shook his head, his jowls flopping. “I don’t kid about murder, Doc. Now...tell me where you were.”

Jack’s face flushed hot, and he balled his hands into fists. “Are you implying that I am a suspect?” He leaned down, putting his face close to Frigman’s. “What kind of jack-ass, Barney Fife police work is this?”

Frigman backed away and held his hands out in front of him. “Calm down, Doc—”

“Kiss my ass! How dare you accuse me of something like that! What evidence could have possibly led you in my direction?”

Frigman puffed out his chest. “Look here, Dr. Bass, I’m the Chief of Police, and you’ll talk to me with respect. I’m here doing my job. I have information that points at you, and I’m investigating that lead.”

“What ‘information’? What are you talking about? And be specific!”

Frigman rolled his eyes. “I already told you—we found a military knife at the crime scene. We believe it was the murder weapon.”

Jack glared back at Frigman for a few seconds then stepped toward him. Frigman backed up, and Jack took another step. Frigman took another step back.

“That is pure bullshit! That’s not a lead—it’s grasping at straws!”

Jack poked his finger in Frigman’s face and jutted his jaw out.

“I’ve heard the scuttlebutt about you, Gary.” Jack prodded him again. “You need to understand something—I’m not some naïve student nurse you can bully. Don’t try to pull your bullshit Kojak routine on me! I won’t put up with it.”

Frigman squirmed against the desk, turning his head from side-to-side. “Okay, okay...sorry if I came on a little strong.” He pushed at Jack. “Can you give me a little space?”

Jack blew out a long breath and backed away.

“Thanks.” Frigman took his hat off and swiped sweat from his balding head with a sleeve. “I didn’t mean to insult you—but I do have a job to do. That means following up on every lead I get. Nothing personal.”

“No, of course not!” Jack snorted. “Why the hell would I take such an accusation personally?”

Frigman eyeballed Jack then flashed a toothy smile, revealing bits of something orange stuck between several teeth. “Let’s start over, Doc. Can you answer a few quick questions, at least?” He pulled a pad and pen from his shirt pocket.

“If they’re quick...maybe.” Jack backed away and crossed his arms over his chest. “Shoot.”

“Well, I was talking with that OR head nurse the other day. She mentioned something she saw you doing the morning after you were on call recently.” Frigman jotted in his pad, glancing fleetingly at Jack then back at his pad. “The morning of the murders.”

Jack smiled wryly, cocking his head to the side. “And what might that be, Chief?”

“She told me she saw you napping at your desk that morning. Said you were all sweaty and moaning.” He locked gazes with Jack, a smug expression on his face. “Made me wonder—did you do something that night that might have given you nightmares?”

Jack didn’t respond for a few seconds as he mulled over the comment. Was this clown serious? He burst out laughing. “You gotta be shittin’ me, Gary! You came here to question me about some murders because I was groaning in my sleep? Oh, man!” Jack shook his head and laughed again.

“It’s not funny, Bass!”

“I’m not laughing at the murders; I’m laughing at you. The fact that you came to talk to me because I was moaning when I napped is laughable.” He stifled another snicker. “That was the morning after a terrible call night here. I was exhausted and was grabbing a little cat nap at my desk because I’d been up all night.” He put his hands on his hips and glared at Frigman. “I gotta tell ya—it’s a hell of a stretch for you to make a connection between that and those murders.”

“And you have witnesses who know where you were at all times?”

“Yeah, Gary, plenty of them.” Jack arched an eyebrow as he locked gazes with Frigman. “What I’m really curious about, though, is why the hell you’d make such a ridiculous attempt to consider me a person-of-interest. What’s the hidden agenda here?”

Frigman remained silent, shifting his weight quickly from one foot to the other several times, then he jutted his chins.

“Well, Doc, I heard you had a rough go in the Army when you were over in Iraq. Heard you’d even been locked up for a while in a nut ward for Post-Traumatic Stress Syndrome—PTSD.”

“How the hell did you hear about that?” Jack snarled through gritted teeth. “That’s confidential personal health information. You looking at it without my permission is a federal offense!”

Frigman waved a hand dismissively, like he was shooing away a fly. “Never mind how I heard about it.” Frigman closed his notepad and slid his pen into his pocket. “I’ve heard about PTSD. Heard it can make a person kinda wacky. I’ve even heard that somebody with PTSD might do things without realizing it. Bad things.”

Jack glared at Frigman for several seconds, his pulse pounding in his temples, his body tensing. He wanted to grab this clown by the throat and shake some sense into him. “You should know I’m going to file a complaint with the DoD about you gaining access to my files.”

Frigman shrugged nonchalantly. “Yeah, whatever. You wanna tell me about your PTSD?”

“I have nothing to hide, so...yeah, I’ll tell you about it. I was hospitalized for a short time after I returned from Iraq. Why, is none of your business. As far as PTSD making somebody wacky, that’s pure crap! There is no clinical credibility to such claims.” Jack jammed a finger at Frigman. “None at all! That chapter of my life is closed...and PTSD is no longer an issue for me!”

Frigman shrugged and put his notepad in a pocket. “Not so sure I agree with you on that, Doc. Seems to me it might still be lingering if you’re having nightmares,” Frigman said. “Meanwhile, I’ll be checking out your alleged witnesses.”

Jack raised his finger at Frigman. “Gary, you better be—”

“Thanks for your time, Bass.” Frigman snorted. “Wish I could say it was a pleasure.” He turned and waddled toward the door. “Do me a favor, Doc—don’t leave town any time soon,” he called over his shoulder.

Jack stood frozen for a couple of seconds, his mouth still hanging open, his finger still raised. What the hell was that all about? He lowered his hand and slowly closed his mouth. His shoulders slumped. Damn! I guess the cat’s out of the bag. Before long, the whole damn hospital would know about his PTSD. He looked toward the front desk. Janice was shooting quick, nervous glances in his direction.

“Oh...hi, Janice. How you doin’ today?”

She looked up, a thin smile flashing across her lips. “Jack...I didn’t mean to eavesdrop...” She repeatedly clicked the pen she was holding as she glanced down at some papers. She slowly turned her gaze up to Jack. “But I heard what Frigman was saying to you.”

“And...is it true? Did you rat me out?”

She rested her head in her hands and shook it slowly. “That lardass! He promised me that was a confidential conversation! I didn’t think anything of it when I saw you moaning in your sleep...” She twisted her face up to his, her lip trembling slightly. “If I’d known he planned on using it against you...”

“Don’t worry about it; you didn’t know.” He leaned on the counter in front of her. “Maybe it’s time, though, that I told you my story—straight from the horse’s mouth, as they say. Doing anything for dinner tonight?”

“Not really.” She shrugged quickly. “I guess we could go grab a quick bite.” She growled softly. “That clown Frigman is such a jerk!”

“Yep. Can’t argue with that. Actually, my first impression of Chief Wiggam is that he’s a flaming jackass.”

Janice laughed out loud. “I see you’ve heard his nickname, huh?” She giggled again. “How can anyone who has watched The Simpsons look at him and not think of Wiggam?”

“You got that right,” Jack replied, smiling. “How about I just swing by here at the end of the day, and we’ll pick a place to grab some dinner?”

“Sounds like a plan.”

“See ya later. Looking forward to dinner.”

Jack ambled toward his office, a jumble of thoughts racing through his mind as he wiped sweat from his brow. He blew out a long breath. Was he just kidding himself about PTSD no longer being an issue for him? He had to admit he did still have memory lapses during some of the bad flashbacks.

(That evening)

There was an air of awkwardness as Janice and Jack sat at the restaurant table, struggling to start up a conversation. They took sips of their drinks, gazed at the menu or around the room between furtive glances at each other, and smiled wanly when their eyes met.

“Never been here before.” Jack pointed his beer bottle around the patio of the dumpy restaurant.

“I hope it’s okay.” She picked at the label on her beer bottle. “I-I thought it might be a place you’d like.”

“I like the ambiance—early American plank tables are one of my favorite furniture styles.”

Janice chuckled. “You know, Jack, you have a good sense of humor...but you keep it well-hidden at work. I’m glad to see you’re not always as intense as you are in the OR.”

Jack’s face flushed. “Well...I guess everybody’s gotta have fun sometimes.”

She smiled as she watched him over the rim of her glass. “Yes. Yes, we do.”

• • • •

BY THE TIME THEIR MEALS arrived twenty minutes later, Jack felt much more at ease. “No kidding?” Jack asked, setting his beer on the table. “How long were you in? What years were you active? Where were you stationed?” He took a deep breath and shrugged. “Sorry, I’m kinda going off, aren’t I?”

Janice giggled. “A little. Well, I’ve been out about eight years. I was in for four. I spent most of my time in the States but did do a one-year stint over in Frankfurt, Germany.”

“Well, I’ll be go to hell! Our active time overlapped, and I did time at Frankfurt, too!” He wagged a thumb at himself then her. “I was a lifer—I’m surprised we never bumped into each other somewhere.”

“Big Army, I guess.”

“Yeah.” Jack took a swig of beer. “I figured you might be ex-military based on some of the things I’ve seen you do at the hospital. The Army taught us all to do things the ‘Army way’, didn’t they?”

“Yeah, but it was good training that’s been useful.”

Jack gazed at her, arching an eyebrow. “So...why’d you get out?”

“I just got tired of trying to fix broken young bodies only to have them sent back out to get broken again.” She snorted. “Those that could be fixed, anyway.” She turned her face down. “Too many couldn’t,” she mumbled.

“Roger that,” Jack said then stared blankly into the distance.

“So...you were career Army. That surprises me—you don’t seem a lifer type.”

Jack shrugged quickly. “Didn’t exactly plan it that way. I got into ROTC in college to help pay my school bills. Then ROTC offered me a scholarship for medical school, so I spent four more years in. By the time I finished my medical training, I owed the Army eight years of service.”

“Why stay for twenty then?”

“Guess I got caught up in some interesting assignments. Before I knew it, I had over ten years in...got regular promotions, didn’t know of any interesting job opportunities in the civilian world...” He took another swig and sighed. “Didn’t really have much of a civilian life to go back to so just decided I’d put in my twenty.”

“Sounds like another story there.”

Jack looked away. “Yeah...one I’d rather forget...” he muttered.

“Okay. I won’t push.”

Jack turned his eyes back to Janice and smiled. “I met some great people in the Army, did some interesting work, and got to see the world.” He gently swirled the beer in his bottle. “Hope I’m not boring you too much,” he muttered.

She put her hand on his arm and flashed a smile. “I’m glad you shared with me—it helps me get to know you a little better. And trust me, you are anything but boring.”

He shrugged. “Meh. Your opinion.”

Jack resisted the comparison that kept prying its way into his thoughts—Janice reminded him of Major Lori Darden, the only woman he’d ever let himself love as an adult. Memories of Lori triggered the usual pang of torment, and he knew to shut those thoughts down before they led to the predictable melancholy. Jack felt a wave of relief when the waiter arrived with their meals. Keeping his mouth full of food would give him a reprieve from feeling pressured to talk. They both picked at their plates a few minutes, then Janice set her fork down and gazed at Jack.

“You said you wanted to tell me some things about your past? I get the sense I haven’t heard the most important part yet.”

Jack swallowed, almost choking. Had he made a mistake offering to fill her in? Should he follow through? He lifted a forkful of food toward his mouth then slowly set it down on his plate and wiped his mouth with a napkin. He cleared his throat and met her eyes.

“I-it may help you understand some things about me.” He blew out a long breath and looked around the dining area. “This isn’t easy for me to talk about...I hope you’ll bear with me.”

Janice nodded. “Of course, Jack.”

Jack surveyed her face closely. “Also, I’m telling you this in strictest confidence. I hope you’ll honor that.”

“Whatever you say won’t go beyond me.” She put a hand on his shoulder and gazed into his eyes. “Go ahead, I’m listening.”

Jack forced a smile then blew out a long breath. “Okay, here goes.” He looked away and growled softly. “I don’t know how that ass, Chief Wiggam, got access to my confidential medical information, but I will find out.” He turned his eyes to her. “Anyway, I want to give you the complete and correct information—hopefully, I’ll relieve any potential concerns you might have about me.”

“He’s a prick,” Janice interjected quickly.

“Yep. Anyhow, he told me about you spotting me napping a little restlessly the other morning after call. You were a nurse in the Army, Janice—I’m not going to try to bullshit you. After my last deployment, over in Iraq, I was diagnosed with severe PTSD. Spent a month on the Walter Reed Psych ward.” He took a sip of beer then locked gazes with her, wondering what her response was going to be.

“Did something bad happen?”

“You might say that. But I can’t talk about it.” He grimaced and stared at the tabletop. “I-I just can’t.” He was silent a few seconds. “I got a stamp of good health when I was discharged from Reed.” He shrugged quickly. “I might still have an occasional flashback, but mostly, I manage my PTSD well.” He paused briefly to look at her, but she had a deadpan look on her face. “There’s no denying I still have nightmares—that’s likely what you witnessed the other morning.” He leaned back and ran his fingers through his hair. “I guess all the gunshot victims we had that night must’ve triggered something.”

Janice slowly folded her napkin then looked askance at Jack. "I hate to admit it, but...Frigman did tell me about the psych ward," she muttered. "He used that as a reason to ask me to keep an eye on you..."

Jack slapped the table. "What? That jackass!"

She touched his arm again. "Don't worry, Jack. I know PTSD can be rough."

He nodded slowly. "During a particularly bad episode, I may...wander in my sleep." He turned to her, looking into her eyes. "But I want to reassure you...that's about it. It doesn't turn me into some crazed killer." A flash of doubt flew through Jack's mind, and he quickly shook it away. He didn't always remember his wandering. Sometimes, he only knew about it because he later discovered something he'd done while in one of his PTSD dazes. "We okay?"

Janice sat quietly for a few seconds, surveying his face. She placed her hand atop his, squeezing gently. "It took guts for you to tell me about this...especially since we barely know each other. I'm touched."

Jack slowly slid his hand from under hers and moved it to his lap. "Well...I just don't want you to have any undue concerns."

"I do know about PTSD from my time in the Army. I know you're not some maniac killer. That's just Hollywood BS. I don't have any concerns about you." She wrung her napkin, twisting it tightly. "It pisses me off that Frigman took what I told him and blew it all out of proportion."

Jack's shoulders sagged. "Good. That's a relief."

"I like working with you and hope that will continue to be the case. Believe me, if I have any concerns about you, you'll be the first to know."

"Thanks. Feel free to chat with me any time about any concerns."

"We're good, Jack."

Janice bit into her burger, gazing at Jack over the top of the bun. Her first impressions of him had been good. The more she got to know him, the more she liked him. It really took some guts to share what he just did with her. She did have a nagging curiosity, though, about just how bad his PTSD might really be. The nurse in her told her he was downplaying its seriousness.

The two men sat opposite each other at the desk in the office. Little illumination filtered in through the large office windows from the lights around the sprawling Southern Medical Center campus, casting dim shadows about the room.

“It was not a good idea for you to come here tonight. I assume the visit is for good reason?” the man sitting behind the desk stated.

“Yeah, yeah, I know, boss. Relax. It’s nothin’ bad. I just thought it was important to give you an update—in person,” the man across the desk replied.

“Fine—get to it then.”

“Looks like he might have an alibi—don’t know if it’ll hold up or not, but he’s got a story. Any ideas for planning next steps?”

The chair creaked as the man behind the desk leaned it back. “I’m managing my part of this just fine. We’re about to get a nice big one coming in, and we can’t afford to have it blown because of any undue attention.” He leaned forward, propping an elbow on the desk. “That’s my plan.”

“What about what I just told you?”

“That’s your department! I’m not supposed to be involved in that part of this gig...and I don’t want to be. You’re the one who let this get screwed up, and you need to clean it up—with no loose strings!”

“I didn’t screw this up, boss! Our other partner wanted to get more directly involved, and he screwed up. I’m not taking the heat for him.”

“Okay, okay.” The man behind the desk threw his hands up. “Now’s not the time to start bickering! I’ll talk to him—you just figure out a way to clean up this mess so we can get back on track. Am I clear?”

“Yes...I think it’ll require doing something about this Quinn kid, though.”

“Whatever! I don’t really care, and I don’t want to know any details. Just do what you need to do.”

The man in front of the desk reclined in the overstuffed leather chair. “Consider it done, boss.”

(Two weeks later)

Jack sighed as he placed the form he'd just signed atop the others in the out-box sitting on his office desk. He hated the administrative duties that went along with being chairman of a large academic department. He much preferred being hands-on in an OR or ICU, teaching, rather than filling out requisition and budget forms. Teaching was the real appeal of this job for Jack, not the title or status.

One of Jack's least favorite tasks was going through the mountains of mail he received each day. He grabbed his letter opener and snatched up the first envelope. Procrastinating a little more, he stopped to admire his letter opener. It was quite unique, and sometimes, he wondered what people might think if they saw it. It was a razor-sharp US military-issue Ka-Bar knife. Gold-plated and inscribed with a simple, "Dr. Jack Bass – Thank You," it had been presented to Jack by an Army Ranger colonel whose life he'd helped save when the colonel had been involved in a helicopter crash during a training exercise. Jack had been among the first responders and had pulled the officer from the burning wreckage.

He slid the blade under the envelope flap and deftly slit the paper with a flick of his wrist.

"Back to work, Bass."

He worked his way through the pile, eventually getting to a thick manila envelope.

"That's weird." He flipped it over. "Stamps but no postmark." No return address, either. He grunted then sliced it open, set the knife aside, and extracted the contents. He skimmed through the sheaf of papers. There was no cover letter to explain the materials, so he wasn't quite sure what he was viewing. He pressed the intercom button.

"Mary, do you know anything about this manila envelope with no return address on it? Any idea where it came from?" he asked his assistant.

"I noticed that one, Dr. Bass, and wasn't sure what to do with it. It's not a standard interdepartmental envelope, so I don't think it came from anywhere on campus. I thought it was US Mail because of the stamps, but I couldn't find a postmark. I called our campus mail delivery person, and they didn't remember if it was in their USPS bundle or not. So, sorry—I just don't know where it came from."

"Mary, as usual, you're right on top of things. Thanks."

Jack stroked his chin, perusing some of the forms he'd extracted. After inspecting the entire heap, he began organizing the different forms and letters into piles of similar content. One pile contained copies of letters from different government agencies and foundations, all of which appeared to be grant announcements. The dollar amounts ranged from $10,000 up to a couple million dollars. Some of the letters were addressed to the president of Southern Medical Center, a few were addressed to Dr. Lamar Waymon, and several had the addressee blacked out.

The next stack contained financial spreadsheets and monthly budget statements for the anesthesia department from the past few years. Several line items on the spreadsheets had been highlighted with a yellow magic marker. What was that all about?

The third pile confused him most. There were a number of what appeared to be deposit slips for several bank accounts in the Cayman Isles. The account numbers and account holder's name had been redacted. He didn't recognize the names of the financial institutions. I can't imagine these are banks used by the medical center. Jack finished looking through the paperwork then leaned back in his chair, lacing his fingers together on top of his head.

“What the hell is this stuff, who sent it to me...and why?”

He gazed at the stacks of papers for several minutes, trying to decipher their meaning. Somebody must have thought this stuff was important enough to send, yet, the sender hadn't provided any explanation. What did they expected Jack to do? He held a finger to his lips. I'd best not trash these just yet. He assembled the papers, inserted them back into the manila envelope, then placed it into his miscellaneous file.

(2330, Monday)

After another torturous night on call, Mark was dead on his feet, and the thought of crawling into his bed at home consumed his thoughts. He threw his backpack across the car and onto the passenger seat then plopped down behind the wheel. He rested his head briefly on the steering wheel then started his car.

He pulled onto the busy street running along the edge of the medical center, looking in his sideview mirror for an opening in the traffic so he could change lanes. His eyebrows shot up. Was that a cop car that just pulled out of a side street? His gaze darted from the traffic in front of him to his rearview mirror. Sure enough, a patrol car soon pulled into the lane right behind his car. Damn! Now what?

Mark swallowed, his hands trembling as he gripped the steering wheel. He tried not to be obvious but repeatedly up at the rearview mirror. Whenever he changed lanes, the cop car followed. Whenever he turned onto a street, the cop car followed. Whoever it was, they obviously weren't worried about being discrete.

Mark finally pulled into his apartment parking lot and whipped his car into a space. The cop car pulled in right behind his car and stopped. Mark reached to gather his things but then stopped, staring into the mirror, waiting to see what happened. He sat for a couple of minutes, but the cop didn't get out of his car. Mark snatched up his backpack, sighed, and climbed out. As he locked the door, he snuck a glance at the driver in the cruiser. It was the campus cop who had been guarding the lab door the other day! What could he possibly want?

Mark walked to the back of his car and began working his way around the rear of the cop car. When he tried to step behind it, the patrol car zipped backward a few feet. Mark froze and stared at the back of the driver's head. What the hell is this clown doing? Mark tried again to step behind the car, and the driver repeated his action. Screw this! Mark moved up to the passenger window, leaning down to look in at the cop. The driver slowly turned his head toward Mark, smirked, then pointed an index finger at him, making his thumb like a pistol hammer and pretending to shoot Mark. The cop car then sped off.

Mark stood with his mouth hanging open, watching as the car careened down the street, smoke billowing from its rear tires. Mark's heart thumped against his ribs. What the hell was that all about?

(2330, Thursday)

“Gee-od, I can’t believe how fast these weekend call nights come around,” Jack complained, plopping down in the creaky, old office chair in his office.

His past few call nights had been far better than his first at Southern Medical Center, giving him hope that the black cloud that historically hung over his head on call nights was finally dissipating. Actually, Jack had been looking forward to this night because some of his favorite anesthesia residents were rotating through the service this month. He’d hoped some cases would come through the OR that would provide interesting teaching opportunities.

Jack quickly grew bored with sitting in the office and decided to prowl the OR Suite. As Jack passed the front desk, he did a doubletake. Janice sat at the desk, reading a newspaper. He leaned casually on the counter in front of her.

“To what do we owe this great honor?” Jack teased. “I didn’t think you worked nights.”

Her middle finger slowly rose, but she didn’t speak, and she continued to hold up the paper in front of her face.

Jack guffawed. “Gonna be a long night I see—I’m getting abused already.”

Janice lowered the paper, smiling broadly over it. “I hate being interrupted when I’m reading such interesting news,” she stated sarcastically. She folded the paper and tossed it aside. “I was wondering when you were going to get here to keep me from dying of boredom. And to answer your question, I don’t work nights. I offered to cover for Amy tonight so she and her husband could go out for the evening—it’s their anniversary.”

“You’re so-o-o nice—”

“Yeah, yeah, can the sarcasm, Jack. You know us old maids don’t have a social life, anyway.” She pointed at her shoulder. “It’s going to be a long night, so why don’t you come around here and give this old maid a shoulder rub.”

Jack smiled as he worked his way around the counter to stand behind her. “And what do I get in return for a good back rub?”

Janice twisted in her seat and looked up at Jack with a wry smile on her face then turned forward, settling into the chair.

“In your dreams, buddy,” she replied in a deadpan tone.

He guffawed. “What are you accusing me of?”

She chuckled. “You’re such an old perv, Jack.”

Jack smiled down at her. They had become friends over the past few months, even going out for dinner several times, always having a great time together. They were both serious when it was time to be serious at work but still enjoyed joking with each other now and then. There was even an occasional prank...when they had the time and energy for it.

“Slow night, huh? Hope it stays this way,” Janice said.

“Me, too,” Jack replied. He finished kneading her shoulders then sat in a chair next to her.

He pointed at the newspaper. “Can I have the sports section, please?”

“You gonna rub my back some more?”

“Maybe—after I recover from the rejection you just gave me...and finish the sports section.”

“Jeez, you’re high maintenance.” She handed him a section of the paper.

“Oh, my god! We sound like an old married couple, don’t we?” Jack said, snorting. “How pitiful.”

Janice looked at him out of the corner of her eye. “Yeah, how...pitiful,” she muttered softly.

He leaned back in the chair and put his feet up on the desk then buried his nose in the paper, looking for articles about his favorite sport, auto racing. Jack soon finished scanning the paper, set it down on his lap, and sighed. He turned toward Janice.

“So, what’s new with you?”

Janice set her paper down, too. “Well, have you seen my new car? It’s a red—”

The phone on the desk rang.

“Damn, hold on a minute, Jack!” She picked up the receiver. “OR, Janice speaking.” She listened a moment. “Uh huh. When? Okay, we’ll be ready,” she said then hung up. “We jinxed ourselves by talking about it being a slow night...when are we ever gonna learn?” She jumped from her chair. “Got a stat chest on the way up. Multiple gunshot wounds. Pretty unstable is all they told me. Let the games begin!” She dashed down the hall.

• • • •

THE STAFF HAD JUST finished preparing Trauma OR 1 when a gurney containing a blood-covered patient crashed through the double doors into the room. Jack was at the head of the table with his chief resident, Ed, and a junior anesthesia resident, Dirk. They were both exceptional, and he’d hand-picked them for this case.

Jack visually assessed the patient as the staff transferred him onto the OR table. The young man’s shirt had been cut away so there was a clear view of the three bullet entrance wounds on the front of his chest—two on the left side and one on the lower right. Very dark blood oozed profusely from the right-side bullet hole. Damn! That one went through the liver—this is going to be a long, bloody case. Jack spun to the circulating nurse.

“Call the blood bank. Tell them to set up twenty units...and be ready to prep more!”

“Any big lines in?” Jack asked the surgery resident who’d accompanied the patient from the ER.

“A sixteen and a fourteen gauge, I think,” the surgery resident responded breathlessly. “Guy’s pressure bottomed out down in the ER—sixty over palp last I heard, so we brought him right up.”

Jack could barely feel a pulse in the radial artery as he checked for a place to put the arterial line. That was not good.

“Barely have a pulse here—better get the cowcatcher setup ready, Ed.” The cowcatcher was a special IV tubing set that would allow them to infuse multiple units of blood through a single, large IV. “We’re probably gonna be pouring a lot of blood into this guy,” Jack called over his shoulder.

Dirk was untangling and organizing the IV bags.

“C’mon, Dirk, let’s get that blood under pressure!” Jack snapped, pointing at the unit of blood hanging on a pole. Jack slid the catheter into an artery on the man’s wrist, hurriedly connecting it to the monitor tubing. “Ed, what’s the pressure from the art line?”

“Fifty over zero.”

“Okay, I’ll watch the monitors—you get a Swan introducer into his internal jugular ASAP!”

The Swan introducer was the largest bore IV available. Putting it directly into the large vein dumping directly into the heart would allow them to quickly infuse massive amounts of blood and fluid.

“Dirk, get that cowcatcher hooked up to the central line as soon as it’s in—and put every unit under pressure!”

Dr. Scott Barris burst through the doors into the OR, only one of his cowboy boots covered with a sterile bootie, the other shoe cover still in his hand.

“Hey Jack. What’s up?” Scott spun toward the circulating nurse, holding his arms out in front of him. “Gown and gloves!”

“Multiple GSWs, bilateral thorax entrance wounds, probable liver injury, BP’s 50 over nothing—and we’re struggling to keep it that high.”

“Thanks, Jack.” Scott gaped at the surgery residents standing near the foot of the OR table. “What the fuck are you guys waiting for? Gown up, dammit!”

As soon as the sterile drapes were in place, Scott sliced through the skin of the man’s chest. Jack moved to the head of the table to help hang units of blood.

The double doors suddenly flew open, smashing into the wall behind them. Everyone but Scott jumped and spun toward the commotion. Two young Latino men stood in the doorway, the MAC 10 machine guns in their hands pointed at the medical staff.

“What the hell’s all the racket?” Scott asked.

“Shut up, gringo!” screamed one of the Latino men.

Scott turned slowly, peering over his shoulder at the two young men dressed in gangbanger colors. He then looked over his glasses at Jack, who responded with a shrug. There was a deathly silence as the two Latinos sauntered into the room, pointing the barrels of their guns alternately at several people. One of the Latino men moved to the head of the operating table and ripped the drape off the patient’s head.

“It’s him!”

Scott continued working inside the man’s chest. “What the fuck are you doing? You just ruined my sterile field!”

One of the men shoved Scott away from the table. “Shut the fuck up, old man!”

They took positions a few feet to one side of the operating table.

“Everybody away from the table—now!” the one who’d shoved Scott screamed.

“Hold on there, hombres! This guy’s gonna die if we stop now!” Scott said, stepping toward the OR table.

One of the Latino men fired a short burst into the ceiling.

“That’s the idea, gringo. Now get the hell away from the table or die with him!”

Jack’s gaze darted from one gangbanger to the other then to Scott and the medical staff. What the hell should he do? Going bare-handed against two automatic weapons didn’t bode well for survival.

“Yeah, asshole, we shot him to kill him and he will die—now!” the other Latino chimed in.

The last comment triggered something in Jack’s head. Something unwelcome. Unpleasant. His throat constricted, choking off the air from his lungs. He recognized the early warning signs of a PTSD flashback as he fought the intensifying panic. Not now! His whole body began to tremble. He shook his head hard. No! I can’t afford to get distracted by this right now! Shadowy images tickled at the fringes of Jack’s mind.

The Latino men exchanged a quick glance. “Let’s do it!” the Latino man wearing a red bandana said.

Both of them blasted away at the patient on the table. The deafening roar of the guns echoed off the tiled walls. The patient’s body danced around on the table, torn apart by the shower of slugs. There was a sudden silence when the guns had emptied.

Jack spun to look at the monitors. The blood pressure plummeted to zero, and the EKG tracing was nothing but a flat line. You got your wish—he’s dead.

Jack twisted back to the killers, the shadowy images in Jack's mind taking form. He battled them, but visions from the OR in Iraq hammered at his consciousness, flashing through his mind, just as quickly displaced by his current reality. It was like watching an old-time movie, scenes strobing between his past and the present, swirling together in fleeting, spectral visions. Jack's resistance crumbled. The Iraqi major stood before Jack, holding a pistol against Lori's forehead, a mist of blood and brains flying from the gaping wound in the back of her head. The voice of the Iraqi major taunted Jack, his words echoing. "I shot her to kill her, and she will die—now!" Jack's face flushed hot, and every muscle in his body tightened, an overpowering hatred bulldozing through his mind. Jack snatched a syringe of a paralyzing drug from the top of the drug cart and slipped down behind the large anesthesia machine.

"Dr. Bass, what're you doing?" Ed whispered.

Jack did not acknowledge the question.

One of the Latino men bolted toward the doors, waving an arm at his partner. "Let's go, Mano!"

The second Latino didn't move. He stood there, glaring at everyone in the room. After a few seconds, he ejected the empty clip from his machine gun and reached into his back pocket for a fresh clip. As he pulled out the new clip, the staff in the room gasped in unison, huddling together and backing away.

"C'mon, man, we gotta get the fuck outta here!"

"Too many witnesses!" the shooter in the OR yelled back as he fumbled with inserting the fresh clip into his gun.

Jack sprang from behind the anesthesia machine. He swung the syringe downward, plunging the needle deeply into the back of the neck of the gangbanger who was reloading his gun. The man dropped the ammo clip he'd been holding. Jack jammed down the plunger with his thumb but was shoved away before he could inject all the contents. The Latino bent to recover the ammunition clip from the floor. Jack lunged again from where he was sprawled on the floor, stabbing the needle deep into the man's thigh, injecting the rest of the drug.

The Latino swung the butt of his gun around, the metal smashing into the side of Jack's head, stunning him. A warm rivulet of blood flowed down his forehead into his eyes, blurring his vision. The Latino finally got the full clip inserted into his gun, but his hands were trembling. He glared down at Jack, pointing the gun at him.

"What did you inject in me, you asshole?" he screamed. He attempted to pull the bolt back on his gun to chamber a round. He fidgeted with it for several seconds, the shaking of his hands getting worse by the second. He glared at Jack. "Tell me!" He wobbled, his legs soon shaking as much as his hands. He scowled at Jack then brought the gun to bear on him.

Jack crab-crawled backward until he was wedged against a wall.

"You gonna die, gringo!"

The Latino pointed his gun at Jack's chest but struggled to hold it steady, his arms and hands shaking wildly. He fired a few rounds, but his wavering aim resulted in the bullets smacking into the floor near Jack then ricocheting into the wall. Chips of tile pelted the side of Jack's face, prickling like bee stings.

The gunman set his jaw and squinted down barrel at Jack. His arms slowly dropped to his sides, and he lost his grip, the machine gun falling to the floor near Jack's feet. The young man dropped to his knees then fell limply forward, his face smacking wetly against the cold granite floor.

Jack shot a fleeting glance at the gangbanger lying on the floor then looked up at the other killer still standing in the doorway. Jack scrambled for the machine gun. He snatched it up, staggering as he stood.

The man in the doorway turned and left, letting the doors swing closed. Jack burst through them an instant later. The gangster had made it halfway down the hall. He turned his head to look over his shoulder, and his eyes shot wide as Jack raised the gun in the fleeing murder's direction. Jack pulled the trigger. The explosion of gunfire pounded at his ears. Brass casings bounced wildly against the walls, scattering on the floor at Jack's feet. Chips of plaster, ceramic tile, and ceiling flew everywhere as the wild spray of bullets cascaded over the area at the end of the hall where the young man was running. Jack held the trigger until the clip was empty. The man disappeared around the corner at the far end of the hall.

After several seconds, Jack stumbled back into the OR. His medical colleagues gasped, collectively backing up a step when Jack moved toward them. What was wrong with them? Why are they looking at me like that?

"Dr. Bass...Dr. Bass! Are you okay?"

Jack's ears were still ringing, and it took several seconds before the voice calling his name finally registered. Someone was shaking him by his shoulders.

"Dr. Bass...Jack...it's Janice—are you okay?"

Jack shook his head, reality gradually elbowing aside his hallucinations. He glanced at Janice then at the gun in his hand.

"What the hell?" He dropped the gun to the floor, looking at it in disgust. He glanced up into Janice's eyes. She looked afraid. Afraid of what? Me?

"Wh-what happened?" he asked.

"I'm not sure, but you scared the hell out of us!" she stated then threw her arms around him, pulling him close and burying her face in his chest. "Don't ever do anything like that again!"

Janice held Jack's trembling body close. Though she had just witnessed an incredible act of bravery that had probably saved all their lives, she also recognized that Jack seemed to have been in a different place during his actions. When he'd come back into the OR, his eyes were red and bulging, large veins standing out on his forehead, foamy saliva trickling from the corners of his mouth. What the hell just happened to him? Was that one of his PTSD flashbacks? He seemed so out of control. Janice leaned her head back and looked up at his face. Could something like this have happened down in the lab the night those techs were killed?

Although she didn't want to admit it, she'd developed feelings for Jack...but she didn't want to be hurt emotionally if the authorities discovered he'd murdered those two women. She shook her head slowly and backed away from Jack. I just can't believe that's true! I don't care how bad his affliction is—he's no killer.

She turned to the staff.

"I'm going to call the police."

(0600, Saturday)

Jack sat at his breakfast table, the new day's sun casting an orange hue across the polished top. He watched the birds flitting about the azaleas in his back yard as he sipped casually at a cup of coffee. He glanced at the clock display on his microwave and groaned.

"So much for sleeping in..."

In a case of unwelcome déjà vu, he again found himself on a forced medical leave while psychiatric staff "evaluated" him. Unfortunately, they had called the Department of Defense and had gotten access to Jack's military medical records, learning what had happened to him in Iraq and the impact those events had on his mental health. Of course, that led to certain conclusions about Jack's actions in the OR shooting a couple weeks prior.

The psych staff told him how he'd scared his medical colleagues that night. He had no recollection of his actions in the OR but couldn't believe his coworkers had felt threatened by him. His inability to clearly remember the events from that night troubled him deeply. The psych staff told him that his psychiatric history gave them concerns about additional similar and unpredictable actions. Jack hadn't missed the subtle references to the recent lab murders that peppered their conversations.

Even though he still didn't understand what all the ruckus was about, he knew it was a waste of time to complain about any of this. He'd been down this road before and knew complaining would be a waste of time. Just like after he'd returned from Iraq, they wouldn't listen. What was done was done. There was nothing he could do to change his situation.

So here he sat. Bored. Perplexed.

"So much for that simple civilian life I'd planned," he grumbled, standing and shuffling over to the coffee maker. Jack refilled his favorite coffee mug emblazoned with "World's Greatest Doctor," a gift from his previous coworkers. He glanced at the label and snorted.

"Maybe it should read, 'World's Craziest Doctor'."

Jack shook his head hard. Enough mental masturbation and self-flagellation. He took a sip of his hot brew. I think I'll sneak into the office and get caught up on work so I'm not so swamped when I finish this medical leave.

• • • •

(One hour later)

JACK HURRIED INTO THE hospital, leaving his sunglasses on as he rushed through the maze of hallways, hoping he could get in and out without being noticed. He paused outside the entrance doors to the OR suite, peering through the small windows to see if any staff were milling around. Good! Nobody in sight. He pushed the door open just enough to stick his head through, quickly scanning the area again, then he tiptoed to his office. A wave of relief rushed over him as he entered, closing the door behind him. He leaned his back against the door and wiped sweat from his face.

"Sheesh! Relax and get a grip on yourself, Bass."

He sat at his desk, soon becoming immersed in working through the backlog of paperwork.

A knock sounded on the door. Jack jumped but sat quietly, his gaze glued on the door, hoping whoever was there would just go away. There was another knock, harder this time.

“C’mon, Bass, I know you’re in there! I watched you on our surveillance cameras when you snuck in,” Frigman bellowed.

Jack hung his head, his shoulders slumping. Well, this day just went down the crapper. He slowly opened the door, sweeping his arm dramatically toward a chair.

“Chief Frigman, so good to see you! Please...come in.”

“Can the sarcasm, Doc,” Frigman stated tersely. “I watched you slink into the hospital—wondered why you’re sneaking around early on a Saturday morning.” Frigman sat on the offered chair, which squeaked loudly under his weight. He scanned the office then looked at Jack. “What’re you up to, Bass?”

“What am I up to? Why...nothing, Gary. Just trying to get caught up before I come back to work next week. That’s all.”

“Uh huh,” Frigman replied, regarding Jack through narrowed eyelids.

“I’m sorta busy—do you need something, or is this just a social call?” Jack asked.

“You think you’re pretty clever, don’t you, Doc?” Frigman stared at Jack for a few seconds. “Actually, I came here to ask you some questions...and I don’t have time for your cynical bullshit.”

Jack shrugged and raised his hands at his sides, feigning innocence.

“I heard about how you went crazy in the OR—attacking people with drug injections, shooting machine guns...” Frigman shook his head slowly and jutted his chin. “Heard about the wild look on your face.” He snorted. “Heard you scared the crap outta your coworkers—some of them thought you were going to shoot them, too.”

Jack’s pulse pounded in his temples, heat spreading across his face and down his neck. He clenched his teeth but remained silent. He wasn’t going to let Frigman bait him.

Frigman shifted forward in his chair, leaning a pudgy forearm on the desk. “I also had an interesting chat with your shrinks. They told me you don’t remember what you did—situational amnesia I think they called it. Heard of it, Doc?”

Jack nodded.

“I asked the shrinks if PTSD could ever cause situational amnesia—let a person do something without their being aware of their actions.” He jabbed a finger at Jack. “You know what they told me?”

Jack waved his hand dismissively then picked up a piece of paper and gazed at it. “No. What?”

“They told me that it was rare, but there are cases like that in the textbooks. Can you believe that, Doc? Someone with PTSD can be violent without any memory of it—no recollection of their actions at all. Crazy, huh? Oops—no pun intended,” Frigman said then laughed mockingly.

Jack wanted nothing more than to throw Frigman out of his office. Instead, he took a deep breath then released it slowly, fighting to remain calm. “Hmm. Well, thanks for the medical lecture, Gary. What’s that got to do with me?”

Frigman hopped from his chair, knocking it to the floor, and shook a fist at Jack. “This is what it’s got to do with you—I think your PTSD might be more of a problem than you want to admit! And I’m tired of you playing games with me!”

Jack stared silently at him a few seconds then picked up another piece of paper and gazed at it. “Believe me, I’m not interested in playing games with you,” he responded impassively. “Frankly, I’d be thrilled if I never saw you again.”

“You asshole! I know you murdered those lab techs, and I’m gonna find a way to prove it!” Spittle flew from Frigman’s mouth onto the paperwork on Jack’s desk. “And you’re not going to hide behind any insanity plea because of your stupid PTSD!”

Jack gave Frigman a deadpan look, glancing quickly at the saliva-speckled papers then frowned at Frigman. “Please relax, Gary. You’re messing up my papers.”

Frigman growled, his face reddening. “I’m going to keep digging, Bass. Until I find something. Now, do you have anything different to tell me about what you were doing the night of those murders, or are you still sticking to your original story?”

Jack stifled a laugh. “I think you watch too many Kojak reruns.” He smiled leaning back in his chair and clasping his hands behind his head. I’m not giving this clown one more bit of information...or my time. “I already gave you a statement. It stands—as is.”

“I’m gonna get you, Bass.”

Jack bolted from his chair and leaned over his desk, resting his fists on it. “Why, Gary? Why are you so hell-bent on pinning this on me?” He took a deep breath and slowly lowered himself into his chair. “Never mind. I’m sure you have your stupid reasons...” Jack pinned the cop with his gaze. “But I think this is harassment.” He stabbed a finger at Frigman. “And if it continues, I’m going to the medical center president and have him intervene. Comprende?”

Frigman snickered. Jack shook his head. What a condescending prick...

“You just do that, Doc.”

Jack had had enough. “Anything else, Gary? I’ve got a lot of work to do.”

“Not now, Doc. Just remember—I’m watching.”

“Yeah, got it. You’re watching.” Jack stood, rounded the desk, and opened the door. “Good-bye, then.”

“See ya, Doc,” Frigman said over his shoulder on his way out the door.

Jack slammed the door. “Always a pleasure, Gary.”

He set Frigman’s chair upright then sat, again working through the mail. He froze when his gaze fell on an overstuffed, unmarked manila envelope.

“Aw, crap. Not again.”

He flipped it around. It was just like the last one he’d gotten—no return address or postmark. He slit it open and dumped the papers onto his desk. The contents were similar to the ones he’d received in the last packet, but this time, there were several newspaper clippings, as well.

He arched an eyebrow. “That’s interesting.”

He read the newspaper articles. They were obituaries for two past faculty members of anesthesia department. One was for Dale Wallace, MD, who had died during a mugging in the parking lot at Southern Medical Center late one night. The second was for Bev Costas, MD, who was found dead from a narcotics overdose one morning in the women’s OR locker room.

“Whoa! I thought these stories were just urban legend.” He rubbed his chin. Two dead faculty members in a short period of time. Why wouldn’t Waymon have told him about something this serious?

Jack unlocked a desk drawer and thumbed through the miscellaneous section. He located and pulled out the manila folder he’d placed there a few weeks ago then dumped the contents onto his desk next to the newly received bundle. He spent the next several minutes organizing the two sets of contents. There were the same types of spreadsheets and deposit slips in both envelopes. The dates on the second set of documents were highlighted with yellow magic marker. The sender seemed to be trying to tell Jack something, but he’d be damned if could figure out what. He ran his fingers through his hair and sighed.

“I wish whoever sent this would just point out what they’re trying to tell me.” He leaned back in his chair, staring at the piles of papers. Hard to believe this is all coincidence. “But why send all this stuff to me?”

Jack locked the papers in his desk drawer then propped his elbows on his desk, resting his chin on his clasped hands. What should he do? After a few minutes, he snatched up his cellphone and scrolled through his contacts, looking for his friend, Wes Watley. Jack dialed Wes’s number.

Jack and Wes had met when they were in the Army and stationed together in Germany. Wes was a CID investigator who’d been involved in the investigation of strange events that had happened to Lori and Jack when they were stationed there. It had turned out that their commanding officer at the time had a serious grudge against Jack and Lori—serious enough to try to kill them. Repeatedly. Wes and Jack had saved each other’s lives on several occasions and consequently, had struck up an enduring friendship. After getting out of the military, Wes had joined the FBI and was now a SAC up in the northeastern US.

“Wes Watley.”

“Hey, Wes, it’s Jack Bass. How’s it going?”

“Doin’ great, Jack. Movin’ up in the world and makin’ a difference,” Wes joked. “How are you doing?” There was silence for a few seconds. “I heard you had a rough go of it after what happened in Iraq.” Wes paused again. “I-I know how much you loved Lori.”

“That I did. Very much..”

“I’m really sorry I didn’t drop by when you were in Walter Reed.”

Damn! How the hell did so many people know about my time at Reed?

“Yeah...life goes on. But it’s over and done with. I retired from the army after that little fiasco. Took a position a few months ago as chairman of the anesthesia department down here at Southern Medical Center. That’s kinda why I’m calling—I wanted to pick your brain about some strange goings on here.”

“Uh oh—scary words when uttered by Jack Bass,” Wes quipped. “Ask away.”

Jack described the events that had taken place during the few months since his arrival at Southern Medical Center, telling Wes about the murders, the harassment and accusations by Frigman, and the anonymous mail he’d started receiving.

“Jack, I don’t know what’s going on down there, but it certainly sounds weird. Wanna hear what I think you should do?”

“Hell, yes! That’s why I called.”

“First, much as I hate to say it, go out and get a good lawyer. Don’t worry—from what you’ve told me, it’s unlikely you’re at any real risk...but you need a lawyer to keep that Frigman clown at bay. Don’t talk to him again without your lawyer present. Second, send me copies of those papers you’ve received. I’ll take a look at them and nose around to see what I can find out, especially about the offshore accounts. Third, try to find out who’s sending you the information and why.”

“I wouldn’t have a clue where to start.”

“It’s probably somebody closer to you than you think. Be discrete and selective before you start asking questions, though. Lastly...watch your back, Jack—I know how your luck runs, and I’m more than a little nervous about this. It sounds like there’s something bad happening down there and it’s making the hairs on the back of my neck stand up.”

“Me, too. I’m wondering what the hell I’ve gotten myself in the middle of...this time,” Jack said then sighed loudly.

“I don’t know, ol’ buddy, but I’m glad you called me. Actually, I think I’ll give my colleague down in that field office a call and fill him in—see if he wants to check around the medical center.” There was a short silence. “And, Jack, seriously—watch your back!”

“Thanks, Wes. I really appreciate the help. I wish this call had been about a more pleasant topic.”

“Well, Jack, when you call, I’ve learned not to be surprised by anything. Send me that stuff ASAP, and I’ll give you a call as soon as I’ve reviewed it. Bye.”

Jack scurried through the hospital on his way to the parking lot, the hairs on the back of his neck standing up. Was Frigman watching again—observing Jack’s every move over the surveillance cameras? What if Frigman caught Jack carrying the documents he’d just discussed with Wes. He resisted the urge to look up at the security cameras, though he’d love nothing more than to flip off each of them as he passed by. Despite his efforts to remain calm, Jack arrived at his truck with his shirt sweat-soaked and his hands shaking. He fumbled with his keys and briefcase.

“Hey, Jack.”

Startled, Jack spun, dropping his keys. “Oh...hey, Janice.” The warmth of a blush spread up his neck and across his face. Why am I being so nervous around Janice? I need to relax. He took a deep breath, releasing it slowly. “You spooked me.”

“Sorry, Jack, I didn’t mean to.” Janice smiled as she watched him pick up his keys. “It’s good to see you.” She pointed at his briefcase. “Is this a sign you’ll be coming back to work soon?”

“Yep. Next week.” He nodded toward the hospital. “Just thought I’d slip in quietly on a Saturday and get caught up with the paperwork backlog.” He flashed her a quick smile. “What’re you doing here on a Saturday?”

“I don’t have a life, either,” she said then chuckled. “I’m doin’ that paperwork thing, too.” She glanced at his shirt, a look of concern covering her face. “Why are you sweating so much? It’s usually freezing in the hospital.” Her brow knitted. “Are you okay?”

“Uhhh, sure...I’m fine.” I wish that was true! There were actually too many weird things happening that Jack didn’t have an explanation for...and that bothered him. A lot.

She leaned an elbow on the hood of his truck and cocked her head. “You’re a terrible liar, Jack Bass. Is there something I can help you with?”

He sighed and looked at the ground, rubbing the back of his neck. “That prick, Frigman, came to my office while I was in there. Accused me again of those lab murders. He told me he’s watching me with all the security cameras...he’s really getting me paranoid.” He shook his head slowly. “I’m really unhappy with myself for letting him get to me like this.” He slapped the side of his truck. “He’s really pissing me off! I just don’t need this sort of bullshit right now!”

She put a hand on his shoulder and squeezed gently. “Relax, Jack. Everybody on this campus thinks he’s a jerk. My staff like you and are looking forward to your return. Granted, some of them are a little intimidated by you, but they still respect you and enjoy working with you. Ignore Frigman. He’s a jackass.”

He shrugged and remained silent, kicking softly at a rock near his foot. He knew Frigman was a jackass—that wasn’t what was bothering him so much. I wish I knew why he was bugging me so much about these murders. But he didn’t want to bother Janice with these concerns. Jack had always been independent. Figured things out for himself. He wasn’t going to change now.

“Hey, I have an idea. If you don’t have plans for the rest of the day, how would you like to come out to my lake house? We can have some beer, grill some brisket, and cruise around the lake in my boat. Just chill out the rest of the day. You in?”

Jack smiled broadly. He couldn’t remember the last time he did something like that. “Well...if you’re sure you want the company, hell, yes!” Jack opened his truck door and threw his briefcase on the seat then turned back to her. “You have a lake house and a boat? Cool! I’ve been dying to get out on the lake ever since I moved here. I found a great meat shop where we can get a good brisket, and I ___”

“Whoa, slow down, cowboy.” She giggled. “You just be my guest today. I was planning on working out there this weekend, anyway, so the fridge is already stocked,” she said.

“Well...okay. How do I get there?”

“If you can leave now, you can just follow me.”

“Then let’s blow this Popsicle stand! What kind of car are you driving?”

“That red convertible SL right over there.” She pointed at a nearby Mercedes.

Jack’s glanced at the car then back at Janice and arched an eyebrow. “Okay—shouldn’t be hard to spot that in traffic.”

As he pulled up to the lake house, Jack gawked at the beautiful, contemporary-style stone house on a waterfront lot. There was a dock off the back yard, a nice-looking runabout sitting on its hoist. Janice met him as he climbed out of his truck.

“Wow! I’ve always dreamed of a place like this—I’m jealous,” Jack said, nodding at the house.

“Thanks, Jack. It’s my refuge from a crazy world.” She smiled at him. “I can tell by the look on your face you’re wondering how I could afford all of this on a nurse’s salary.” She took his hand and pulled him toward the house. “My husband did quite well in business, and as much as I hate to say it, he also had a very good life insurance policy.”

“Oh.” Jack had dealt a lot with death but still never knew what to say in response to such news. “I didn’t know... I-I’m sorry.”

She nodded, keeping her eyes on the ground. “I still miss him a lot, but it’s been several years. I’ve kinda learned to cope with it.”

“Yeah, losing a loved one can be a little rough sometimes...” he mumbled, thinking back to the death of his mother. She’d been beaten to death by Jack’s father during one of his drunken tirades. Jack’s chest began to tighten, and he shook his head to rid the memories...for now.

Janice raised an eyebrow, a look of curiosity on her face as she glanced at him. She led him to the kitchen and opened the refrigerator. “Corona or Miller Lite?”

“Corona would be great.”

She handed him a beer and a lime then extracted a knife from a drawer. “Would you do the honors?”

“Sure.”

“While you’re slicing the lime, I’ll get the grill fired up and put the brisket on. Then we can go out for a cruise on the boat.” She dug around in the fridge.

“Actually, if you’ll put the boat in the water, I’ll get the brisket going,” Jack said. “Smoking brisket is a specialty of mine—got any mesquite chips?”

“Everything’s out by the smoker; you’re welcome to use whatever you find there.” She stopped at the door and nodded toward the boat. “Do you water ski?”

“Um, yeah, but I didn’t bring any swim trunks...and I’m too old to skinny dip.”

Janice laughed. “Though I might like to see you ski naked, I think my husband’s trunks would fit you. Want to try them?”

“Well...okay. You sure you don’t mind?”

“Not a bit.” She pointed toward a hallway. “There’s a box in the guest bedroom closet that has Hank’s name on it. Help yourself.”

Twenty minutes later, Jack smiled as he gazed at the glowing coals under the brisket. Just right. He closed the smoker lid and wandered down to the boat.

“Hop in, Jack.”

Janice wheeled the boat out onto the lake, settling in at a slow pace. Jack slouched down on a bench seat opposite her, nodding and smiling as she pointed out some interesting sites on the waterfront. Occasionally, Janice looked over her shoulder and smiled at him. He wasn’t sure if it was the beers or the setting, but a relaxing warmth enveloped his mind, reminding him of being held in his mother’s arms as a young child. He smiled broadly and closed his eyes. He would have been happy to stay there forever. Just forget the hospital and Frigman. Forget the world.

They arrived back at the house late in the afternoon when the sun sat low in the sky. All in all, a thoroughly enjoyable afternoon, he thought as he secured the boat.

“I wish I could’ve talked you into skiing, Jack.”

“I didn’t want to embarrass myself.” He shrugged. “Besides, I really enjoyed just putt-putting around the lake.”

She finished raising the boat on the hoist. “Me, too. Hungry?”

“Starving.”

“If you get the brisket off the grill, I’ll get the side dishes. I thought we could just sit on the back deck to eat—the view of the sunset is great from there.”

They went into the house and loaded their plates, grabbed some cold beers, then sat at the table on the deck. Jack kept his mouth full of food, a convenient excuse not to talk. He’d always been horrible with small talk, especially with women. He’d soon emptied his plate and hopped from this chair.

“I’ll go get us some beers.”

When he returned, Janice had moved to a wooden swing and was smiling demurely at him. She patted the seat next to her.

“Come sit next to me, Jack.”

He swallowed. “Uh...sure.” He sat on the far end of the swing. Jack had always been uncomfortable being in intimate situations with women. The physical and verbal abuse his father had rained upon Jack when he was a child had made him grow up timid. Even if his father wasn’t beating him for no reason, he’d tell Jack that he was a worthless excuse for a human being—someone that nobody liked. So, Jack had learned to avoid being around people...other than his mother. She was always loving. When he was a child, people called him shy; as an adult, some people labeled him distant and withdrawn. Except for Lori. She had seen through all of that. She’d learned the story of his childhood. Understood why he acted as he did...especially when a woman was trying to get closer to him, emotionally, or even physically.

They swung gently for several minutes in silence. Jack squirmed, running a finger up and down the chain that held the swing. He watched the golden orb of the sun setting, sneaking quick glances at Janice.

She turned and looked directly into his eyes. “You seem a little nervous—you doin’ okay?”

“It’s, uh...it’s been a while since I’ve had one-on-one time with a woman.” He shot a quick glance at her. “Guess I’m a little out of practice...”

“Something to do with the lost loved ones comment you made earlier?”

He stared into her eyes for a few seconds then looked away, shrugging.

She put a hand on his arm, and his whole body tensed. He wanted to jerk his arm away but knew that would be rude. A bead of sweat trickled down his brow. “Jack...just relax. I get it—I’m a little ‘out of practice’, too.” She slid across the swing and leaned against him, pulling his arm around her shoulders. “Is this all right? I’m getting a little chilly.”

He nodded. “S-sure.” His chest was tightening. Jesus, Bass! Relax! You’re acting like a little schoolboy.

“I guess I’m acting silly, aren’t I—like a kid, I mean?”

“I don’t think you’re silly at all. I’m enjoying this.” She lifted her head from his shoulder, turned her face to him, and smiled. “I hope I’m not making you uncomfortable.”

He shook his head. “No.” He wanted to jump up and run away! “Well...maybe a little.”

“Want me to move back to the other end?”

He pulled her close and shook his head. “No. It’s not because of you...it’s just me. I like you being next to me.” He sighed. He loved the feel of a woman’s warm body next to his. Other than his mother and Lori, though, he’d always avoided it because it made him so uneasy. “You’re right—I just need to relax.”

“Good.”

Janice settled her head onto his shoulder and put a hand on his chest, caressing it softly. They rocked gently, watching the magenta and orange streaks of the sunset fade into darkness.

“I hate to risk ruining the mood, but...do you mind if I ask you something about work?” Jack asked.

“Awww, you will ruin the mood with that topic.” She shrugged. “Go ahead, though. I’ll answer whatever I can.”

“Did you know Bev Costas and Dale Wallace?”

Her body tensed, her hand on his chest freezing in place. She remained silent for several seconds.

“Yes...I knew them.” She squirmed and took a sip of beer. “Why do you ask?”

“Well, somebody sent me some newspaper clippings of their obituaries. I’d heard vague tales around the hospital about some faculty members who’d died under strange circumstances but never heard any details—figured it was just the rumor mill churning.” He shrugged. “Seems someone wants me to know more, though.” He removed his arm from her shoulders and turned toward her. “You hear much about their deaths?”

Janice remained silent for several seconds, her mouth falling open a bit. “I don’t know any more than anyone else does—it was all kept very hush-hush. Dr. Waymon refused to talk about it.” She grunted. “The jerk yelled at anyone who brought it up in his presence. Chief Wiggam didn’t seem to think their deaths were suspicious—just swept it all under the rug. If anyone asked about it, he told them it was none of their business.”

“What’s the scuttlebutt on what actually happened?”

She turned toward him, looking into his eyes, then turned away and sighed.

“I’ll tell you—but you didn’t hear this from me.”

Jack smiled at her and ran a finger across his chest “Cross my heart.”

She slumped back on the swing. “Dale Wallace was a young and promising assistant professor in the anesthesia department. He died from a brutal mugging in the hospital parking lot late one night as he was leaving work.” She chewed at her lip. “Some of us were concerned there was more to the story, though.”

“How so?”

“He was quite outspoken about fixing things in the anesthesia department that he felt needed to be fixed.”

“Nothing wrong with that.” He shrugged. “Doesn’t sound like something that would result in his being murdered.”

She glanced at Jack and rubbed her forehead. “It wasn’t just that. He’d started acting paranoid, almost scared, for several weeks prior to his death.”

Jack rubbed his chin and arched an eyebrow. “Hmmm. What about Bev Costas?”

“She was found dead only a couple of months after Dale’s demise. The official word was that she died of a narcotics overdose. Supposedly, several empty vials of morphine were found near her body, and she had large amounts of morphine in her blood at autopsy.” She twirled a lock of hair around a finger and looked into the night. “None of us bought into that story. I asked the pathologist who did her autopsy, and Bev didn’t have the needle tracks that are typically found on an IV drug abuser’s body.”

He'd even checked between her toes. Nothing. She only had one injection mark on her entire body. He felt that was very odd."

"That's strange for several reasons." Jack crossed his arms over his chest and leaned back in the swing. "And what did Waymon have to say about her death?"

Janice snorted. "He said it was all 'mere coincidence'. Tried to convince the OR staff that the rumors were only conspiracy theories. He downplayed everything." She huffed. "What a crock of shit! He even put forward the hypothesis that she may have overdosed intentionally because of the death of her secret lover, Dale Wallace." She shook her head. "Sheesh! What a jackass!"

"I'm not surprised."

She growled softly. "Bev had two young children, for chrissakes! She always seemed a very dedicated mother. She just wasn't the type to throw that all away just to get high! On top of that, none of us believed Bev could overdose, even if she was using, her being an expert with the dosing of morphine, and all."

"Makes sense."

"Anyway, Waymon continued to reassure the staff that it was all an 'unfortunate coincidence' and that everyone should just get on with their jobs." Janice glanced at Jack. "The way he said it, though, made it sound like there was an 'or else' on the end of his statement. Staff didn't dare raise any further questions. Nobody wanted to risk the wrath of Dr. Waymon."

"So...everybody just let it drop?"

She shrugged. "What else could we do? We were all running a bit scared of Waymon...the university police didn't seem concerned..."

"Can I ask one more question?"

"Depends on what it is."

"Did you know them well? Were they good people?"

She turned to him, a mix of incredulity and confusion on her face, then turned away. "Personally, I thought of them both as exceptional people and good doctors. I was really shocked by their deaths."

"It all sounds very weird."

"Yeah, very, Jack. Look, I'm not trying to be difficult, but...I really don't want to rehash all of this. Many people, including me, got really paranoid about all that stuff. Some were afraid they might be the next unexpected death if they asked too many questions. Call it goofy if you want, but I'm still scared."

"Sorry I brought up such a sensitive subject—I was just curious." He was silent a few seconds. Should he ask? Had he already pressed her for too much information? "You think those deaths might be related to these recent lab murders?"

Her head snapped around, and she searched his eyes for several seconds. "You're not the only one wondering about the possibility of there being a connection...and it's got people frightened again. Please"—she grabbed his hand—"just keep your distance from all of it. Just leave it alone."

"Well, Janice, I wish I could just ignore it." He blew out a long breath. "Unfortunately, Frigman has accused me of the murders, and, well...looking the other way when something bad is happening is just not my style." He stared straight ahead, setting his jaw. "Something stinks around that place, and I need to find out what."

"Just be careful, okay? I'd hate to see you get hurt...or die unexpectedly." She rested her head back on his shoulder and was silent for several seconds. "Jack, I can't believe I'm actually bringing this up, but...I do know Dale Wallace's widow. I could see if she'd be willing to talk with you. Maybe she knows something I don't."

“Absolutely! I don’t want to cause any trouble for you or anyone else. I just need to figure out what’s going on.” He paused for several seconds. “Subject closed. Now, what do you say we just get back to enjoying this beautiful evening?”

She smiled as she looked up at his face then snuggled a little closer. “That sounds much better.”

Jack and Janice chatted about a variety of topics over the next few hours. Jack set his empty beer bottle on an end table and glanced at his watch then scooted forward to the edge of the seat.

“Whoa! It’s after midnight. I’d better get going.” He clambered from the swing and turned back to her. “Let me help you clean up before I go.”

Janice grabbed his hand and pulled him back onto the swing, her eyes searching his. “Don’t worry about cleaning up; I’ll take care of that tomorrow.” She smiled awkwardly. “You know, we’ve had a few beers tonight...and it’s a long drive back to town. Don’t you think it’d be safer if you just stayed here tonight? I have a guest room you’re welcome to use. I-I’d really feel better if you didn’t drive back tonight.”

“I’d hate to impose...”

“Don’t be silly—if I thought you’d be imposing, I wouldn’t have asked.”

“Well...if you’re sure it’s okay.”

“Done. C’mon, I’ll show you the guest room.”

She grabbed his hand and led him into the house. Her warm, smooth skin felt good in his hand. Watch it, Bass! You don’t want to get hurt...again. When they reached the doorway of the guest room, Janice turned to face him.

“Well, here it is.”

She moved her face up to his and put her hand behind his neck, drawing him closer. A shiver ran down the back of his neck as her lips touched his. Jack tensed. The feel of a woman’s lips on his felt good. He should stop her. Not let himself give in. His mind raced. Her lips felt so good. He kissed her back. What should I do? Her lips parted and her tongue probed Jack’s mouth. He gave in, lifting her and pulling her close, their tongues intertwining wildly. After a moment, Janice pulled her head back, took a deep breath, and stroked Jack’s chest.

“You know, Jack...you don’t have to stay in the guest room.”

Damn! I shouldn’t have done that! I-I can’t let this happen again... He set her down, pulled her hand from his chest, and held it in both of his hands, gazing into her eyes. He hadn’t noticed before—they were a shade of green similar to Lori’s. A breath caught in his chest, and he stepped back.

“Janice, I-I can’t. Sorry. It’s got nothing to do with you—I’m very attracted to you and hope we can get to know each other much better...” He rubbed the back of his neck as he gazed up at the ceiling. “It’s just that I’m still getting over the loss of someone who was very close to me. The only woman I’ve truly loved as an adult.” He turned his eyes down to hers. “It’s just too soon... I-I’m not ready to risk feeling that kind of pain again.”

“I’m sorry, Jack. I didn’t mean to—”

“Don’t be sorry! It’s very appealing to think about going into your room and making passionate love for hours...” He shrugged and rubbed a toe on the carpeting. “I just don’t think I’d be a very good partner tonight.” He looked up and stroked her face softly. “I hope you understand.”

“I won’t say I’m not disappointed, but, yes...I understand. Do you want to tell me about it—your loss, I mean? It might help to talk about it. It sure helped me when I lost my husband.”

He shook his head. “No. I-I just can’t yet—it still hurts too much to even think about her death.” He pulled Janice against him, wrapping his arms around her for a couple of minutes. “Tell you what. To pay for my spending the night, I’ll get up early and make a nice breakfast for us,” he whispered into her ear. He backed away. “Flapjacks or eggs?”

“Since you’re cooking, I’d like both.” She laughed softly. “And don’t forget the bacon, coffee, and toast.”

She gazed up at him, the twinkle in her eyes causing a spasm in his chest. Lori’s eyes twinkled like that. He turned his head away. No! Don’t look!

“Consider it done, boss,” he mumbled. He gave her a quick kiss on her forehead then turned toward the guest room door.

“Sweet dreams,” she said as he stepped into the room.

Jack froze, unwanted images from Iraq suddenly flying through his head. He grunted. “Yeah...right. Sweet dreams.” He flopped down on the guest bed and stared at the ceiling. A shudder trampled across his body, causing the whole bed to shake. Damn! I was afraid this would happen! He shook his head hard. Get out of my head! The icy tentacles of his psyche’s sprites groped hungrily at his mind. He fought against the images that were playing through his brain like a movie. He flopped restlessly on the bed, groaning as he tried replacing the horrible images with more positive ones. He could not let himself fall asleep! He knew what the outcome would be.

His battle was futile. The late hour, large meal, and alcohol ganged up on him like a bunch of playground bullies to overpower his will, and he drifted off to sleep.

Jack writhed on the bed, soon becoming entangled in the sweat-soaked sheets, the dreams soon becoming his reality.

• • • •

(Fifteen months prior, Southwestern Iraq desert, dusk)

LIEUTENANT COLONEL Jack Bass, MD, commanding officer of the U.S. Army Level II Medical Treatment Facility based in the southwestern part of Iraq, was walking and joking with the head nurse of the unit, Major Lori Darden. They had just finished a forty-two-hour stint of treating a constant onslaught of battle casualties, the Med-Evac helicopters ceaselessly pounding the air as they'd landed and taken off. They had finally treated the last of the injured and were exhausted, in a state of goofiness that commonly followed such an extended period of high-stress activity.

Though it would be hard for many people to imagine how anyone could laugh and joke at a time like this, for Jack and Lori, it was a form of stress management. Like most well-seasoned battle trauma surgery veterans, laughter was preferable to the alternatives of crying about the wasted young lives...or drinking themselves into a stupor.

Though they loved each other dearly, they had agreed to put any long-term romantic plans on hold until they had a lifestyle that was more conducive to a stable relationship. In other words, after they left the armed services. Despite their absurd schedules and time apart, though, they shared an unbreakable emotional bond.

In addition to some stateside assignments, this was Lori's and Jack's second combat deployment together. Despite Jack's efforts to dissuade her, Lori had taken steps to make certain she would be assigned with Jack on this deployment. He was thrilled to have her company, both on a professional and personal level, but he was not happy she was there...in harm's way.

They entered the tent that served as Lori's quarters, intending to have a quick nightcap before catching some much-needed rest.

"Kahlua and cold decaf work for you?"

"Talked me into it, you silver-tongued devil."

Lori reached into her locker, dug out her ubiquitous bottle of Kahlua, then poured some powdered decaf coffee into a couple of used Styrofoam cups. She held out the cups containing the liqueur and powdered coffee, and Jack poured some water from a canteen into them. He took one then sat next to her on the edge of the bed.

"Cheers," they both said as they touched cups.

They sipped on their drinks and cringed but soon drained the cups. They snuggled up next to each other on Lori's small bed, and before long, the fatigue and liqueur lulled them to sleep.

• • • •

(Early the next morning)

LORI'S AND JACK'S HEADS both snapped up. They exchanged a quick glance.

"That sounds like AK-47s!" Jack muttered, throwing his legs over the side of the bed.

"It sure as hell does!" She grabbed her helmet from a hook near her bed. "And it sounds like it's coming from within the camp!"

“What the hell?” Jack grumbled, pulling on his scrub shirt. They were miles behind the front lines. How could this be?

The sounds of a firefight escalated quickly, one staccato of gunfire answered by another. Confused voices were calling out from multiple directions. Jack jumped up, threw his shoes on then bolted toward the door. Lori sprinted out the door right on Jack’s heels. She tapped him on the shoulder, and he stopped, twisting toward her.

“I’m heading to the OR triage area,” she said.

“Keep your head down and no heroics!” Jack yelled after her as she sprinted away.

“Same goes for you!” she hollered over her shoulder.

“I’ll let you know what’s going on as soon as I know something!” Jack yelled then spun and crouched down, cautiously working his way toward the gunfire.

Jack soon came across an injured US soldier and hoisted him onto his shoulders. He trotted toward the OR tent, his legs feeling like they were going to explode as he ran the last few steps. He crashed through the doors, the severely wounded man now hanging limply on his shoulder. Blood-spattered nursing staff broke away from their tasks to help him maneuver the young man onto a nearby gurney. Jack moved to the scrub sinks to wash the soldier’s blood from his arms and hands. As he rinsed, Mitch Sanders, the unit trauma surgeon, stepped next to Jack.

“What the hell is going on out there, Jack?”

“I don’t know, Mitch, but it’s got me worried,” Jack replied, rubbing at the back of his neck. “I grabbed the worst-injured guy, but...” He stopped scrubbing and looked at Mitch. “Judging from the number of casualties I saw on the way over here, our defense ranks gotta be getting pretty thin.”

Someone slapped Jack on the back of his head, and he spun. He turned to see a disheveled Lori scowling at him.

“I thought I told you no heroics! You scared the shit outta me when you took so long to get here. Then you come flying in covered in blood!” She shook her fist in his face. “Don’t do that shit!”

“Sorry.” He put a hand on her shoulder. “Relax. I’m fine.” He waved his hands over himself. “None of this blood is mine.” He looked past her at the busy triage area. “What’s the status here?”

“It’s a cluster.” She pointed a thumb over her shoulder. “What’s up out there?”

Jack shrugged. “I don’t know. I ran across that shot-up kid before I could figure that out.”

Lori frowned. “All right. Well, we’ve got plenty for you to do here.”

Jack dried his hands and followed her into the triage area. He got busy, tending to the casualties, cocking his head to listen as the gunfire outside waned then stopped abruptly. A din of mumbling worked through the staff. He looked around, the staff returning his gaze with hopeful looks. He finished securing the ABD bandage to a gunshot wound then stood slowly, blowing out a long breath.

I guess people are expecting me to show some leadership...

Jack motioned to two medics. “George, Walt, get your armor on and get some stretchers ready—we’ll start a search detail for wounded ASAP.”

“Yes, sir.” They both responded, scrambling toward the locker where personal armor was stored.

Walt approached the exit but the door smashed inward, knocking him onto his ass. Several armed men burst through the door, firing their AK-47 rifles into the air as they jostled into the tent. Jack took a step toward them but was knocked to his knees by a rifle butt jammed into his stomach. He tried to stand but an Iraqi soldier smashed his knee into Jack’s face. He fell back to the floor.

One of the soldiers went to the entrance doors, held one ajar, and yelled something outside. A few seconds later, a man sauntered in, surrounded by armed fighters. Jack looked up from the floor. This must be the big cheese. Lori approached the man who'd just entered, standing in front of him with her hands on her hips, glaring at him.

“What the hell are you doing? We have wounded that need to be cared for!”

The man slapped her hard across the face, knocking her to her knees. Jack jumped up and took a step toward Lori's attacker, halting instantly when he felt the barrel tip of an AK-47 pressed against the side of his head. He shot a glance at Lori. Blood flowed from her nose. Jack's pulse pounded in his temples, and he growled. He took another step toward her. She shook her head, held out her hand for him to stop and mouthed, “No.”

Lori clambered to her feet, jutting her chin out defiantly as she glared into her attacker's eyes. He raised his arm again. He started to swing his hand toward her, stopping suddenly when there was a loud shout from the doorway. He glowered at Lori then slowly lowered his arm. He stepped to the door, and the man there whispered something into his ear then disappeared outside. The commander turned back to the interior, a sneer on his face.

“I am Major Ahmad, Commander of the Western Brigade of Republican Guard Fighters, and you infidel invaders are now my prisoners. Do exactly as I say, and I may show mercy toward you—I may even spare your lives,” he stated in heavily accented English. He ran his gaze over the medical staff. “Who is in charge here?”

“I am,” Jack yelled, stepping forward. “Lieutenant Colonel Jack Bass, US Army Medical Corps.” He pointed at the armed fighters dispersed inside the tent. “I strongly protest this unprovoked attack on unarmed noncombatants.” He hoped his voice sounded more commanding than he felt.

“Shut up! You are an infidel member of an invading army.” He stepped in front of Jack, shoving him in the shoulder. “I don't care about your protest!”

“But...we're just Medical Corps staff.” Jack waved an arm around the triage area. “And we have several wounded here that need immediate attention.”

Major Ahmad glared at Jack in silence for a few seconds then cast a gaze about the room of wounded, a look of disgust on his face. He turned to his second-in-command and muttered something, sweeping his arm around the room. The soldier immediately turned to his troops and yelled a command, pointing at the wounded. Several fighters took up positions near the wounded, pointing their rifles at them.

The Iraqi Major then turned to look directly into Jack's eyes, a demonic grin on his face. He uttered a single word, and his soldiers fired point blank into all of the wounded US soldiers.

“Well, Colonel Bass, it appears you no longer have wounded to concern yourself with.” The Major laughed. “Now you can give me your full attention!”

Lori lunged at the major. “You sonofabitch—”

He drove the butt of his AK-47 into her stomach so hard Jack felt her breath blow across him, even where he stood, a couple of feet away. Jack rushed to her side.

“Leave the whore be!” the major yelled.

“Screw off! And don't call her a whore, you asshole! She's a nurse and an officer who holds the same rank you do.” Jack gently brushed Lori's hair from her face. “You okay?” he whispered.

She nodded, still gasping for breath. Jack turned from her and glowered up at his captor.

“All right, you've made your point—you're in control. What do you want from us?”

“Let me begin by explaining to you that all of your defense forces are dead. Your lives depend on you doing as I say. Listen closely and I will tell you exactly what you will do—I will say it only once then you will follow my instructions to the word or suffer the consequences!” he rattled off, spittle flying from his lips

Jack gave a slight nod. “Go ahead.”

“First, you will provide medical care to my wounded fighters.”

“That’s not a problem—” Jack started to respond.

The major back-handed Jack hard across his face. “Do not interrupt me!”

Jack’s face flushed hot, and he balled his fists, fighting the urge to grab the major by the throat and squeeze the life from him. He rubbed his face, taking a step toward the man. Lori tugged on his arm.

“Jack, please...just relax,” she whispered.

He glanced at her then turned slowly back to the major. “My apologies, Major. Please...continue.”

“I will provide you with a radio, which has been tuned to the frequency of your regular Army command headquarters. You will tell them that you are under attack and require immediate assistance.” A grim smile, showing his darkly stained teeth, slinked across his face. “Meanwhile, my freedom fighters will prepare a surprise reception for your fellow infidels.”

Jack shook his head. “Nope. I’m sorry, Major, but I can’t help you with that. I’m happy to provide care for your wounded, but I can’t voluntarily expose my staff to any combat situation—we are noncombatants,” Jack stated, doing his best to try to maintain a commanding tone.

Lori stepped up next to Jack, grasping his hand and giving it a gentle squeeze. That signal told him she agreed with his decision, which made Jack feel a little more confident.

The Iraqi major whipped his pistol from his belt and pointed it at Lori’s forehead.

He shot Lori point blank, brains and blood splattering the side of Jack's face. She dropped next to Jack like the proverbial sack of rocks. His mouth hung open, his mind frozen, unable to comprehend the surreal scene, even as he looked at the pieces of her skull dribbling down his arm. The Iraqi major stood glaring at Jack for several seconds then shrugged.

"Allah's will be done!" he yelled, raising his gun and spinning to face his men.

They all raised their rifles and chanted.

He turned back to Jack, slipping his pistol back into his belt. "One less American whore," the major muttered, smirking at Jack.

Jack's eyes darted from the major to Lori where she lay in a heap at Jack's feet. Her normally beautiful strawberry-blond hair was matted in a tangled mess of brains, blood, and bone. He fell to his knees, his lips trembling. A sob exploded from his lips.

"No-o-o!" he howled. His chest felt as a knife had been plunged into it. He reached toward her. The hot, hard steel of a gun barrel pressed against the side of his head.

"No! Do not touch her! I shot her to kill her. She will die—now!"

Jack reached to stroke her face. The hammer on the major's pistol clicked, the hot steel of the barrel tip gouging deeper into the flesh of Jack's head.

"As you have just seen, Colonel, I think nothing of killing you infidels. I'm sure Allah is singing my praises right now for having ridded the world of another American whore. If you do not do as I tell you, you will join your whore friend in hell!"

Jack's heart slammed against his ribs. He fought back tears as he glanced around the room at his staff. Horror showed on each of their faces, many with their mouths hanging wide. He quickly slid a finger down on Lori's neck to feel for a pulse. Nothing. His breath caught in his throat. His brain felt like a roaring inferno, consumed by a desire to kill Ahmed. Kill him with his bare hands. He glanced again at his staff. What would happen to them, though? He knew the likely outcome. He slowly stood, tears cascading down his face.

A trickle of blood wormed across the floor from Lori's twitching body, touching Jack's foot, as if even in death Lori was reaching out to him. He jerked his foot away as if the blood was acid. Jack turned to the major, glaring into his eyes. He'd never imagined being able to feel the depth of hatred he felt at that moment.

"You will now follow the instructions I gave you, Colonel."

"Kiss my ass, you dirtbag!" Jack snarled. "Go ahead and pop a cap in my head, but I won't lift a finger to help you cold-blooded bastards!"

"Pop a cap...?" The major looked puzzled. "I don't know of what you speak, but obviously, you need more convincing."

The major stroked his chin. One of his colleagues, who had several large gaps between his few remaining brown teeth, looked at Lori's limp body, licking his lips. He walked over and whispered something in the major's ear. An evil smile crept across the commander's face, and he nodded then threw back his head and guffawed.

A chill ran down Jack's spine.

"Well, Colonel, my men are going to give you a special show. I hope it will convince you of just how serious I am."

"What the hell are you and Grunge-mouth there up to?"

“Oh, you’ll see soon enough.”

The major nodded at his colleague, and the man rushed out the tent doors.

Two soldiers wrestled Jack into a chair, securing him with surgical tape and gauze, then took turns slapping his face and spitting on him as they laughed. Several other grimy soldiers soon entered the tent. Jack’s eyes shot wide as he watched them hurriedly gather around Lori’s limp form and rip the clothing from her body. Jack’s eyes darted between the group of men and the major. He shook his head vehemently.

“No! My God, please, no—I’ll do whatever you ask, but don’t do that to her!” he yelled. “Wasn’t killing her enough? Don’t defile her like this!”

Jack’s face stung from another slap. The major grabbed a large bandage pack from a nearby table, roughly stuffing it into Jack’s mouth then winding surgical tape around Jack’s head to affix it. He put his mouth close to Jack’s ear.

“Too late, Colonel. My men now have expectations that must be met—enjoy the show,” he hissed.

Jack flailed against his bonds, his muffled screams lost amid the excited prattle of his captors. The soldiers took turns raping Lori’s corpse, laughing and glowering at Jack while they performed the repulsive act. Jack twisted his head and closed his eyes, but the major and his second-in-command held his head, prying his eyelids open, forcing him to watch. Another surge of loathing flooded through him like flowing lava, his muffled cries turning into body-shaking sobs. Tears streamed from his eyes, tumbling onto his captor’s hands. The major snatched his hand away like it had been burned.

He jabbed a finger at Jack. “Look, men! Look at this disgusting coward—an American commander who cries for a whore!” He spat on Jack’s face.

The veins in Jack’s neck bulged, his pulse pounding like kettle drums in his head. A hot flush leaped up his neck and covered his face. To hell with any Hawkeye Pierce stereotype. If an opportunity presents itself, I will do whatever is necessary to save my colleagues...and avenge Lori’s death. He didn’t care if he died doing what he wanted to do next. His reason to live was gone—nothing would ever refill the void Lori’s death had left in his soul. He focused on only one thing—exact his revenge on these men for what they had done to the woman he loved.

The last of the soldiers stood from Lori’s corpse and hoisted up his pants. The major snickered and leaned down, his face in front of Jack’s.

“My men need some rest. As you have seen, they’ve been working quite hard.” The major guffawed derisively. “I’ll give you until morning to change your mind, Colonel Bass—then we start doing the same to the rest of your whore nurses.”

Still bound to the chair, Jack was thrown onto the floor of a storage locker next to an OR. The door’s lock engaged, and the bustle outside his prison slowly subsided. His gaze flitted around the closet, his mind churning furiously about what to do.

(0130 next morning)

Jack rocked the chair he was tied to until he was able to roll to his back, giving him a better view of the room. He needed to find something to cut himself loose. He twisted his head around, struggling to search the room. Bingo! A cast saw. Thank God it's plugged into its charger. He maneuvered his chair into a position where he could kick at the shelves the saw was sitting on. After several small kicks, the saw finally fell, clattering as it hit the floor. Jack's gaze shot to the door. Were there guards just outside? Had they heard?

He held his breath, lying frozen for several seconds, waiting for the sound of a key turning in the lock. He released his breath in a gush then wriggled around until his hands wrapped around the saw's handle. His fingertips probed for the switch.

Jack jumped when the saw came to life, buzzing like a cloud of mad hornets. Rivulets of sweat flowed into his eyes, clouding his vision as he twisted his head to-and-fro, trying desperately to get some view of the saw he held. No luck. He'd have to do this by feel. He fumbled to press the tape binding his hands behind the chair against the small blade of the saw. He muffled a groan as the blade bit into the flesh of his arm. Despite the pain, Jack held his arms in position until he felt the bond suddenly give way. His hands now free, Jack twisted, snatching up the saw and cutting through the rest of the straps holding him to the chair.

"Finally!" he mumbled.

Jack turned off the saw then wiggled his fingers to help the flow of blood return to his hands. He lay motionless for a few seconds, listening, then hurriedly peeled away the last tags of tape holding him to the chair. He rose, swaying a few seconds before steadying himself. What should he do next? His gaze shot to the contents lining the shelves. Yes! I can use a few of these things. He looked for a few very specific items he thought would be helpful—a long-handled scalpel, syringes, and anesthetic drugs. He gathered his booty, setting it on a stainless-steel surgical tray. He stuffed the scalpel in a shirt pocket. He filled two large syringes with a mixture of drugs that would knock out and paralyze anyone in a matter of seconds...if injected in the proper place.

At the rear of the storage locker, he used the scalpel to cut a small slit in the tent fabric then placed an eye to the opening, surveying the outside as best he could. Good. No one in sight. He enlarged the hole enough to squeeze through it then crawled across the rear of the OR tent, the sand warm against his hands and knees. Jack froze when he heard voices from just inside the tent. Shit! Were those his captors? He craned his neck, listening. Wait! That sounds like one of the nurses! He gingerly pressed an ear against the heavy fabric. It is! He scratched a fingernail on the tent fabric.

"Hey. It's Jack Bass—but stay quiet!" he whispered.

There was a flurry of movement on the other side of the fabric.

He cringed and shot a quick glance around. "Keep it down!"

He sliced an opening in the material just large enough for him to squeeze his head through. He cast his gaze about the staff huddled around him.

"What the hell?" George, a medic, moved closer. "Dr. Bass! How did you—?"

"Quiet, George! I'll tell you later. Any guards close?"

"None inside the OR tent as far as we can tell. Don't know about outside."

"How's everybody doing?"

“Scared as hell.” He waved an arm around at his colleagues. “The medical staff that were in the OR tent are all okay.” He shrugged. “Not sure about the rest of the camp.”

“Okay.” Jack pulled his head back out then enlarged the incision before squirming through it. “We gotta get out of here now, or we’ll die.” He sighed. “We have no weapons that I know of, no food or water, and no radio available to us.” He shrugged. “Anybody got any ideas how to escape?”

“Well...actually, Walt and I been talking,” George stated, shooting a quick glance at Walt then looking back to Jack. “We’ve got an ambulance sitting in the camp. If it hasn’t been destroyed, we could load everybody in it and make a run for it.”

“Whaddaya think, Doc?” Walt asked anxiously from behind George’s shoulder.

“Works for me.” Jack rubbed his chin. “I guess we should start off by going to check that out as a first step.”

“What’re we gonna do if there are guards, Doc?” George asked.

“I have something that may help with that,” Jack muttered, patting the syringes in his pocket. He wished he felt as confident as he was trying to sound. “It’ll be dicey, but I can’t think of any other options off the top of my head.”

Walt gazed at the syringes, raising an eyebrow. “Uh...whatever you say, Doc. Wish we had something more...definitive.”

“Me, too, Walt.” Jack turned to the rest of the group. “Give us thirty minutes. If we’re not back by then or if you hear shooting, get the hell outta here ASAP. Get away as best you can—head southwest, and you should find some friendlies.” He cast his gaze around the OR. “Find some bottles of water—even if it’s lavage rinse—you’ll need them.” Jack looked at the somber faces staring back at him in the dim light. “Questions?”

Heads around the room slowly shook.

“George, Walt, let’s hit it.”

The three men slipped out then low-crawled until they spotted the ambulance. Walt peered over a small dune to scan the area where it sat.

“I can’t see any obvious damage,” he whispered over his shoulder then slid back down the mound.

“Any guards?” Jack asked.

“One at the rear—another by some sandbags a few yards away. Looks like they’re both asleep.”

“All right, here’s how we’re gonna do this.” Jack pulled a syringe from his pocket. “First, I’ll inject the guy sleeping on the sandbags then try to do the same to the other guard. If you see me wave from the ambulance, get over there quick.” He looked each in the eye. “If I get caught or shot, get back to the OR tent pronto, grab the rest of the group, and get the hell outta here!” he whispered.

“But, Doc—”

“No buts—that’s an order! Anything else?”

Walt and George exchanged a quick glance then shook their heads.

“Okay. See you in a few,” Jack said.

Jack crawled into the dark toward the guard sprawled near the pile of sandbags. You must be nuts, Bass! Sweat soon soaked his clothing. He inched his way to the pile of sandbags opposite where the guard was sleeping. He stopped and took a deep breath, exhaling slowly. He didn’t really have a plan other than trying to inject his disabling concoction into a good spot on the man’s body. He wasn’t sure how to keep the guard quiet for the few seconds it would take for the drugs to take effect. He slithered to the top of the pile and lifted just high enough to see the top of the guard’s head.

Here goes! He wrapped his fingers tightly around the barrel of the syringe, his thumb poised on the plunger, then sprang. Jack clamped a hand over the guard's mouth, swinging the syringe around with his other hand. The guard's eyes burst open, the man flailing wildly as Jack fought to restrain him. Jack rammed the large needle into the man's neck where the carotid artery was located, the main route for blood flow to the brain. He mashed down on the syringe plunger. After a few seconds, the guard's eyelids fluttered then closed, his body sagging limply to the ground.

Jack panted for a few seconds, wiping sweat from his eyes. This may not have been the best idea...but he was committed now. Just don't get yourself killed, Bass! You've got people's lives at stake. He slinked across the few yards of sand to the side of the ambulance, halting just around the corner from the second guard. Jack pulled the second syringe from his pocket.

How can I hit a target I can't even see? He slid his eye to the edge of the machine, stealing a quick glance. The position of the guard would make it impossible for Jack to cover the man's mouth before injecting him. This is not gonna be easy!

He decided to aim for the heart instead of the neck since it presented a larger target. It would delay the drug's delivery to the man's brain by several precious seconds. A lot can happen in a couple of seconds...especially when the other guy has the gun! Jack inched to the corner of the big machine then took a deep breath. He leaped toward the guard, swinging the syringe toward the man's chest.

The needle jammed into a rib and became stuck. Sonofabitch! The guard's eyes shot open, and he jumped to his feet. Jack wrapped his free arm around the man's neck and wrapped his legs around the man's waist, pinning his arms to his sides. The guard yelled, and Jack clamped his arm around the man's neck until his shouts turned into squeaks. Jack fought to maintain his grip on the syringe as the soldier spun wildly, reminding Jack of his days spent breaking his grandfather's wild horses.

Jack wrestled with the syringe, working it in circles to dislodge the needle from the bone. Better quit screwing around and get this done! He yanked hard, pulling the needle free, then quickly redirected it. He shoved it into the soft tissue between the man's ribs, immediately jamming down the plunger.

The soldier bucked wildly, flinging Jack to the ground. Jack landed hard on his side, quickly twisting onto his back. The guard twirled, pointing the barrel of his AK-47 at Jack's chest. Jack threw himself to the side and winced. He could almost feel the bullets ripping his flesh apart. After a couple of seconds, he rolled slowly to his back. The guard's arms had dropped to his sides. Jack jumped back just as the man dropped to his knees on the sand at Jack's feet. The guard's eyelids quivered, then he plopped forward, his face slamming against Jack's chest. Jack gulped in a few gasps of air then threw the man off him.

"Godammit! I'm too old for this sorta shit!" Jack hissed.

George and Walt ran to his side.

"Jesus Christ, Doc, you okay?" Walt asked.

Jack nodded then pointed over his shoulder with his thumb. "Get this thing ready to go"

"I'm on it, Doc," Walt responded.

Jack stood to a crouch. "George, you go back to the OR tent and get the rest of the staff. I'm going to nose around—see if I can find any more of our wounded."

"Be careful, Doc."

"If I'm not back in ten minutes...or you hear shooting, fire this bitch up and hightail it—just get away from here as fast as possible!"

Jack headed off into the murk. It was time for a little payback! Visions of Lori being killed and defiled flashed repeatedly through his mind, stoking a burning desire for revenge. Rage smoldered in Jack's mind, soon consuming his thoughts. He knew he would probably not survive the night, surprised at how little that thought bothered him.

Jack crept from shadow to shadow, finally able to make out Lori's tent in the faint twilight. Hers was the only barracks tent that still stood in the camp, the sides fluttering slightly in a gentle desert breeze. Jack yearned to find the Iraqi major there. He slithered to the doorway, pulling the door flap back a couple of centimeters, peering inside. He could barely make out a shadowy form lying face down on Lori's bed. Jack pulled the scalpel from his pocket, removed its sheath, and snuck through the doorway on hands and knees. Was the person on the bed the prey he sought?

Jack crept to the bedside. The insignia on the uniform signified the rank of major. Bingo! He gazed around, spotting a pistol on the nightstand. He snatched it up then clambered to his feet.

Like the waves of sand blown by the hot desert winds that he'd come to despise, swells of hatred swirled in Jack's mind as he glared down at the man on the bed. His thirst for revenge was unwavering. Unstoppable. He bent to put his lips near the major's ear, pressing the tip of the pistol barrel against the back of the man's head.

"Hello, Major Ahmed." He mashed the barrel of the pistol hard against Ahmed's scalp. "You make so much as a peep and I'll show you as much mercy as you showed my people yesterday."

The major turned his head slightly, an eye shooting open, bulging out and staring at Jack. He slowly twisted his head farther, his mouth hanging open.

"That's right, you bastard! It's me, and I'm pissed! Now let me tell you what you're going to do for me," Jack growled.

Jack snatched up a dirty sock from the floor next to the bed. "First, you're going to stuff this in your mouth." Jack handed it to him. "Then you're going to hold your hands out like a nice boy so I can tie them. And if you get any ideas, let me tell you I won't hesitate one second to kill you—even if that means I die, too."

Jack's shoulders sagged as his gaze fell to the floor.

"You murdered Major Darden yesterday—one of the finest people I've ever known. An angel," he muttered. "The only woman I ever loved as an adult." He shook the pistol in Ahmed's face. "And it's taking every fiber of my self-control not to blow your damn brains out right now!"

The major nodded slowly, grimacing as he slipped the sock partially into his mouth.

"All the way!" Jack growled, jamming the sock in farther with the barrel tip of the pistol until the major gagged. Jack slid open a drawer in Lori's bedside stand, rummaging through the contents until he located a roll of heavy bandage tape. Jack hastily ran tape around Ahmed's head to secure the sock in his mouth then bound his wrists together, keeping the gun jammed against his ribs. Jack trussed the major's wrists to the metal bar of the headboard, using the rest of the roll to bind the man's feet to the metal bar of the foot rail.

"Now you're going to tell me where Major Darden's body is."

Jack rammed the tip of the Beretta's barrel under the major's chin and ripped the tape off the man's mouth. He yanked out the sock and leaned in, putting his ear near the major's mouth. "Tell me."

The major spit into Jack's ear. "Screw yourself, infidel!"

Jack bolted upright, glaring at the Iraqi as he wiped the spit from his ear.

"Wrong response."

Jack shoved the sock back into Ahmed's mouth and taped it again. Mulling over his next steps, suddenly, Jack recalled something he'd seen in Lori's drawer when he'd been rifling through it a few minutes ago. He wrenched open the drawer, quickly finding a bottle of succinylcholine and a syringe. He stuck the needle into the bottle and gazed impassively at the major.

"This is succinylcholine. It's a paralyzing agent. Starts working in a matter of seconds." He partially filled the syringe then pulled the needle from the bottle, holding it where the Iraqi could see it. "Usually only lasts a couple of minutes—but for those couple of minutes, you can't breathe—can't even move. You're still wide-awake...you just. Can't. Breathe. Kinda like drowning...a horrible sensation from what I understand."

Ahmed flailed wildly against his restraints.

"Oh—seems you've heard that, too, eh, Major? You'll have to tell me if it's true..."

Jack deftly inserted the needle into a large vein on the major's arm.

"I'm just going to give you a little at first—just enough to give you a taste of suffocation—then I'll ask you again where Major Darden's body is." He pushed the plunger and leaned in close. "You may want to take a deep breath while you still can," Jack whispered.

Jack stood, watching as the major's flailing quickly waned into complete stillness. Even in the dim light, Jack could see Ahmed's lips turn darker. Jack could easily imagine the fear that must be stirring in the man's mind. After about forty-five seconds, the Major's abdomen started to twitch, followed by erratic breaths a few seconds later. Eventually, the man's breathing became deep and rapid. The color of his lips returned to a normal hue.

"Feels pretty terrible, eh, Major? Now—will you tell me what I want to know?"

"Piss off!" the muffled response came through the sock. The major jutted his chin and glared at Jack.

"Damn, you're stubborn!" Jack replied. "Oh, by the way, if you get enough, this stuff can cause severe brain damage—turn you into a permanent vegetable. Even kill you," Jack said matter-of-factly. He filled the syringe and flicked it with a finger a couple of times. "Of course, that would mean you wouldn't be around to kill any more innocent women and patients...so, not a bad thing."

He grabbed the major's arm, a flash of guilt twisting somewhere deep in his conscience—but it was quickly stifled as he recalled the vision of this man shooting Lori in the head then letting his men gang-rape her lifeless body. Jack slowly slid the needle into a vein, struggling to keep it in place as the major thrashed. Jack poised his thumb over the plunger of the syringe.

"Last chance, Major—you want to talk, or do you want to go for a personal breath-holding record?"

"Okay, okay!"

Jack could just make out the muffled screams as the man nodded vigorously.

Jack pulled out the needle and ripped the tape from the major's mouth again. This time, he put his face inches from the major's and stared into the man's eyes. "You've already caused me to hate another human more than I thought possible. If you spit in my ear again, I'll make sure you die a miserable death," he snarled.

Jack jerked the sock from the major's mouth then jammed the pistol barrel under his chin.

"Her body is still back in the tent where I killed her!"

Jack gawked silently at him a few seconds. This man spoke as if he was proud of what he'd done to Lori. That was just unacceptable. Jack silently re-secured the strip of tape over Ahmed's mouth, set the gun aside, and picked up the syringe. The Iraqi's gaze darted nervously between Jack's face and the syringe.

"Over all the years I've spent in this army, I thought I'd seen all the horrible things humans could do to each other." Jack held the syringe in front of his face, turning it in different directions. "You and your men showed me yesterday that I had not," he mumbled. There was nothing left where his emotions used to reside. A void. Darkness. A chill ran through his body, and he shivered. This must be what death feels like.

"I hate you not only because you callously killed helpless patients...and a wonderful woman I loved dearly"—Jack poked him in the chest—"but also because of what you have made me feel...and do as a result of your actions. I now have experienced hatred more profound than I would have ever imagined—and I've taken lives because of that hatred." He sighed, his shoulders drooping. "And now, I'm about to take another..."

Ahmed shook his head vigorously, his neck veins bulging as he yelled into the gag.

“I will likely regret this in years to come, but right now, I just don’t care—I only know this will prevent you from ever repeating the heinous acts of yesterday.”

Jack slid the needle into the man’s vein and emptied the syringe. “Enjoy, asshole! May you rot in hell!” Jack whispered. He jumped up from the bed and bolted out of the tent, scanning the ruins of his camp. “And may I not be there to greet you...”

Jack’s head snapped around at the sound of the ambulance’s engine firing up. He made no attempt to run after it. The headlights flickered as it zipped out of the camp.

“Safe travels, my friends,” he muttered. At least we fought back and saved ourselves, rather than just rolling over and giving up. He shrugged and snorted. Hawkeye Pearce, I’m not, I guess. His thoughts were interrupted by the sudden din of men yelling and gunshots being fired. He smiled as the ambulance disappeared over a large dune, then he ran into the darkness of the desert. I’ll be there soon, Lori.

• • • •

JACK ROLLED OFF JANICE’S guest bed, landing on the floor with a thump. He awoke tangled in sweat-soaked sheets, his gaze darting about the room as he panted. Where am I? He twisted his head to-and-fro, gasping for air. He gazed out the window at the lake. Oh...yeah. His heart slowed from its frenetic pace. He stood then plopped down on the edge of the bed, resting his elbows on his knees and holding his head in his hands. The sweat from his hair trickled down his fingers onto his forearms. Damn, Bass! You are one heck of a mess.

(0700, Monday)

Mark Quinn was enjoying his rotation through the anesthesia service at Southern Medical Center Hospital, though he was nervous about being so close to Dr. Bass every day. Mark tried to avoid the man as much as possible, still struggling with what he should do about what he'd witnessed the night of the lab murders. The stories about Dr. Bass having recently gone crazy when some gangbangers came into the OR and killed a patient didn't exactly lessen Mark's apprehension level.

Mark stood at the front desk, reviewing the case assignment sheet for the day.

"Forget what that assignment sheet says. I've got something else in mind for you."

At the sound of Dr. Bass's voice, Mark spun, sweat springing to his brow as his gaze met that of the taller, broad-shouldered man standing in front of him. Bass regarded Mark intensely, one eyebrow arched.

"U-uh, okay, Dr. Bass."

Jack flashed a broad smile. Mark couldn't recall having seen him smile before. What was he up to?

"There's an add-on case I thought might be really interesting for you. You heard of a patent ductus arteriosus, or PDA?"

"Yeah, I remember reading about them in pathology. Why?"

"Got a six-day old preemie with a PDA coming to the OR soon. Ed, our chief resident, is going to do the case. I asked him if he'd mind if you came in to watch. He said it was fine with him as long as you stayed out of the way—there's not a lot of room around a body that small. Interested?"

"Hell, yes! Sorry—yes, sir." Dr. Bass was turning out to be great about assigning Mark to interesting teaching cases.

"All right. Go into OR 3 and help Ed get the room set up, and if there's time before the case starts, I'll review the pathophysiology of a PDA with you—explain all of the special considerations we have to make for this surgery." Jack turned and rushed off.

"Thanks, Dr. Bass! I'll come find you when I'm done helping Ed." Dr. Bass seemed to have taken a special interest in Mark, though Mark was uncertain why that might be. Mark was still very uncomfortable around the man...there was just some sort of tension around the guy. Mark couldn't put his finger on why but it was almost palpable every time he was in Bass' presence. He is a damn good teacher, though. Mark went to the supply room, bumping into Misty Carrel, a surgery intern.

"Hey, Misty. How's it going this morning?"

"Good." She smiled at him. "How about you?"

"Good, also. Hey, I wanted to thank you again for dinner last weekend. That was a cool little place you took me to—I really enjoyed it." He shrugged quickly. "Of course, I enjoyed the company, too." He paused, looking down and rubbing his toe on the floor, glancing sideways at her. "We still on for doing something next weekend?"

"I enjoyed it, too. I worry, though, what my colleagues would think of me going on a second date with a lowly medical student."

Mark snapped his head around toward her, his mouth dropping open. He relaxed and smiled when he saw her smirk. "They'd think you have good taste."

"More likely, they'd think I was taking pity on you." She playfully punched his shoulder.

“That’s a low blow.”

She laughed, patting his shoulder as she walked by him on her way out of the room. “Yes, let’s do something this coming weekend,” she called over her shoulder.

(0740, Monday)

“Hey, nurse, you seen Dr. Bass this morning?”

Janice groaned. Frigman... Why couldn't the man leave them alone? She looked up from her paperwork at him, rolling her eyes as she followed his gaze. She pulled the neck of her surgical gown closer about her.

“Well, Chief, I know for sure he's not down my shirt,” she replied.

Frigman's face turned red, and he cleared his throat. “In your dreams, honey.”

“Maybe in my nightmares,” she mumbled.

“What'd you say?”

“Nothing, Chief. What do you need?”

“I need you to answer my question. You seen Bass?”

“Not lately. I'm sure he's very busy getting the schedule started.” Janice returned to her paperwork. “Now, if you don't mind, I'm busy.”

Frigman stood staring silently at her for a few seconds. “Thanks for nothing...nurse. I'll just find him myself.”

“Janice Dwyer—my name is Janice Dwyer, Chief Wiggam.”

Frigman growled, his face turning a deep shade of red. He jabbed a finger at her. “I hate that nickname!”

Janice shrugged. “Oops...so sorry.” She sneered at him. “It just slipped out.”

He spun and stormed away from the desk. A small smile crept across Janice's lips as he waddled down the hall. He paused briefly to look about the immediate area then headed toward the OR anesthesia office.

“Hey, Chief, that's a sterile area!” Janice yelled after him. “You can't just go wandering around in your street clothes. You need to change into scrubs—”

“I can go anywhere I want!” he called over his shoulder as he ambled toward the anesthesia office. “And I don't need your permission, bitch!”

Janice snatched up her phone and called the anesthesia office. I hope you're there, Jack.

“Jack Bass.”

“Jack! Heads up—Frigman's on his way back there right now. I tried to head him off but couldn't...behave yourself with him!”

“Thanks, Janice. I appreciate the warning, and of course, I'll be gracious,” he quipped. “I suppose I owe you another dinner now?”

“You're silly. You don't owe me anything. I'm just concerned about you and Frigman both surviving being in the same room.” She huffed. “Don't let him get under your skin—we've got a busy day today.” She paused briefly. “I will take you up on that dinner, though,” she said. “Bye.”

She hung up the phone then stood and leaned over the counter above her desk, looking down the hallway just in time to see Frigman turn into the anesthesia office.

“Damn! I hope this doesn't turn into a battle royale,” she muttered.

• • • •

JACK SET THE PHONE back in the cradle and quickly steeled himself for Frigman's arrival. An instant later, he sensed Frigman's large mass inside his office, but he didn't bother looking up.

Frigman cleared his throat loudly. "Morning, Dr. Bass. I need a little of your time."

Jack acted surprised by Frigman's arrival, scowling as he gazed up at the man. Jack turned toward his colleague, Dr. Tortuga, who had been discussing a case with Jack.

"Could you excuse us for a minute, please, Dr. Tortuga?" He glanced at Frigman then back at Tortuga. "This won't take long," Jack said flatly.

Dr. Tortuga looked suspiciously at Frigman then back at Jack, raising an eyebrow inquisitively. "Sure, Jack—glad to."

"Thanks."

After Dr. Tortuga left the office, Jack turned again to Frigman.

"And what would this be concerning, Gary? I've got a really busy morning."

Frigman snorted. "Don't be coy, Dr. Bass—you know I want to talk about the lab murders...and it may take more than a minute."

Jack blew out a long breath and rubbed his forehead. "I thought you might say something like that." He leaned back, crossing his arms over his chest. "I'll need to refer you to my counsel, Ken Conlin. I can give you his number if you want. I've been advised by Mr. Conlin not to speak to you without him being present." Jack shrugged and locked eyes with Frigman. "So...I have nothing to say."

Frigman remained silent, his jaw working as if he was gnawing on a tough piece of meat. He raised an index finger at Jack.

"Would you like me to call Mr. Conlin?" Jack asked, reaching for the phone on his desk.

"I'm here to talk to you, Bass, not some damn lawyer!"

Jack stood, leaning his hands on the desk as he glared at Frigman. "You may be a cop, but you'll obey the law just like everyone else! You don't, I'll have lawyers and the FBI breathing all over your fat ass so fast it'll make your head spin!" he snarled through gritted teeth, his chest heaving. Calm down, Bass. He took a deep breath. "What'll it be, Chief?"

Frigman hiked up his gun belt, which immediately slipped back down under his sagging belly. "You think you're so damn smart, Bass!" He paused a few seconds. "No—I don't want you to call your stupid lawyer." He jabbed a finger at Jack. "Don't think that I'm done with you, though!" He spun on his heel and stormed from the office.

Jack plopped onto his chair, holding his head in his hands. Man, I'm getting tired of this crap.

Mark had been listening at Jack's office door. He spun when he heard the office door knob rattle, ready to bolt from the anteroom.

Frigman stopped in the doorway, his gaze shooting up and down Mark. "Christ! I mighta known! You and Bass gonna figure out who to kill next, Quinn?"

Mark tried to feign surprise. "Oh...h-hey, Chief Frigman," he muttered. Just what I needed—bumping into this prick.

Frigman's jowls flopped as he shook his head then elbowed Mark aside. Janice appeared in the anteroom doorway, her glance shooting between Frigman and Mark, her mouth falling open. Frigman narrowed his eyes as he looked at Janice. "You part of this group of wackos too, honey?" he asked then shoved her aside like a fullback bulling his way through a crowd of would-be tacklers.

Mark stepped into the hall and watched the ruddy-faced cop waddle away. So much for being out of the woods with him!

(1930, Sunday, one week later)

The hostess showed Janice to the table where Jack sat nursing a frozen margarita. He was embroiled in thoughts and didn't even notice their presence. Janice cleared her throat, and Jack's gaze darted toward her. His face flushed warm, and he hopped up, pulling out a chair for her.

"Sorry, Janice, I didn't notice you arrive."

She turned to the hostess. "I'll have one of what he's drinking, please." She leaned over and gave him a quick kiss on the cheek. "You look a little troubled—like your mind was a million miles away. Nervous about meeting Sheila Wallace...or is there something else bothering you?"

"Well, I didn't think you'd be able to arrange this meeting so quickly—I'm not feeling very well prepared for this discussion."

"Relax—just see what she has to say."

"I'm also having second thoughts about how smart this is on my part." His gaze moved from his margarita to her eyes. "Am I just going to stir things up again? Will more people get hurt—or worse—because I've started asking questions?" He shrugged. "Maybe I should just leave a sleeping dog lie."

"Look, Jack, Sheila wanted to talk with you—it'll be fine. She's good people, and she wouldn't have agreed to talk if she hadn't wanted to."

"Where should I start? I don't want her to think I'm nuts—"

"Too late, I already told her you are," Janice said.

"What?"

Jack stared at her a few seconds. Was she joking? He was getting to know her better but sometimes wasn't sure when she was just jerking his chain. Janice broke out in a laugh.

"Not funny," he stated.

She pushed affectionately on his shoulder. "I know Sheila—she won't bite and won't think you're nuts, so chill out."

The waiter brought Janice's margarita to the table.

"Cheers," she said, touching her glass to Jack's.

He smiled feebly at her and hoisted his glass.

"Yeah. Cheers." He set his glass down and looked at her for a few seconds. He was really starting to like Janice. She was fun...and funny. Like Lori. His heart twisted a little. "Thanks for helping with this, Janice. You really are a good friend." He leaned over and gave her a short but passionate kiss on her lips.

"Do you kiss all of your friends like that?" she asked.

"No...only the one's I think are hot."

Janice sat quietly with her mouth slightly agape, looking at Jack.

Suddenly, he burst out laughing. "Gotcha back!"

She slapped his shoulder jokingly and smiled. "Bite me."

Jack stared silently at her. Lori used to say that to him. You're doing it again, Bass. You need to stop. His smile drained away, and he scooted back on his chair.

Janice pointed at a woman who had just entered the restaurant. "Oh, good, there's Sheila now."

Sheila waved at Janice, and the other woman smiled wanly and headed toward their table. When she reached them, she removed her sunglasses. She wore no makeup. Dark raccoon circles under her eyes made her look old. I know that look, Jack thought. It was the look he'd seen in the mirror every morning since Lori had been killed.

Janice stood and hugged Sheila then turned to Jack. "Sheila, this is Dr. Jack Bass."

"Nice to meet you, Sheila." He rose to shake her hand then shifted from foot to foot, averting his eyes. "My, uh, condolences on the loss of your husband."

"Thanks—I miss him a lot," Sheila mumbled.

She continued to hold his hand, gazing intently at his face as if she was searching for something very specific there.

Jack slowly drew his hand from her grip then pulled out a chair for her. "Please have a seat. Thanks for coming to chat with me, Sheila." He pointed at his and Janice's drinks. "Care to join us in a margarita?"

"No...thanks. I don't drink much these days." She shrugged. "Just don't feel in the mood..."

"I understand entirely, Sheila—I had a significant loss myself not that long ago," he replied.

Janice gawked at Jack, her eyebrows shooting upward, but he ignored her and went on.

"I don't mean to dredge up bad memories, but some strange stuff has been happening at the hospital recently. I was hoping you might be able to help shed some light on a few things...maybe help me understand...at least from a historical perspective."

Sheila nodded slowly. "I'll help where I can."

"I guess I should start off by mentioning what led me to you." He took a large gulp of his drink then wiped his mouth. "Someone started anonymously sending me information shortly after I started at Southern Medical Center. Frankly, I don't know what to make of the stuff. It appears to be related to research grants for the anesthesia department. The last package I got had copies of more financial documents and your husband's and Bev Costas's obituaries—all with the dates highlighted. I don't understand the relationship between the documents and the dates at this point—might just be a coincidence. I'm suspicious, though, that there's more to the deaths than people have been led to believe." He shrugged. "I think someone may be trying to tell me that, anyway."

Sheila stared into Jack eyes. "I already know about those documents, Jack."

"Oh, did Janice mention them?" Jack glanced at Janice.

She returned his stare and shook her head. Jack paused, scratching his head as he looked back and forth between the two women. He cocked his head to the side.

"But...I haven't told anyone else but my buddy at the FBI..." His mouth suddenly fell open.

"That's right, Jack—I brought those envelopes to your office," Sheila said. "Mary made sure you got them but promised she'd keep the source a secret."

Jack closed his mouth, pressing his lips tightly together for several seconds as he stared at Sheila. When he looked at Janice, she put her hands up and shrugged.

"Uh...can you fill me in on the reason for giving me that information?"

Tears welled up in Sheila's eyes, running down her cheeks and spilling onto the table. "I'm sorry—it's all just so weird—I still can't believe Dale is dead." She sniffled. "Worse yet, that he may have been murdered because he was rocking the boat at work."

"What?" Janice and Jack both chimed.

Jack leaned in close to Sheila, his gaze flitting nervously around the nearby patrons. "Sheila, that's pretty serious—what's got you thinking that?" he whispered.

Sheila sobbed softly for several seconds. "I'm sorry." She dabbed at her tears. "As you might imagine, it's difficult for me to talk about this." She took a deep breath. "Dale told me before he died that if anything happened to him, he wanted me to make sure that information got into the hands of someone I could trust." She looked at Janice. "Janice, that's why I asked you what you thought about Jack. I'd hoped he might be the one who could help me."

"Well, I don't know that I'm the best one to do anything with the information you sent, Sheila. I'm no cop," Jack stated.

She abruptly stopped dabbing at her eyes then met Jack's stare. "But, Dr. Bass, if you don't help, I don't know who else to go to."

She put a hand on his forearm. Jack tensed but didn't move away.

"I know you haven't been here long, but...Janice and everybody else I've talked to in the OR thinks you're a great guy. They believe you're honest and try to do what's right." She frowned and looked down. "Like Dale did...even if it's not the easiest thing to do." She turned her gaze back to Jack's face. "That's why I decided to send you the documents. I'd hoped you'd at least try to do something." She stared at him, a pleading expression on her face.

"Sheila, I—"

"Please help me, Jack! I-I promised Dale I would try to do something if anything happened to him. Please don't let the people who killed him get away with it!" She gritted her teeth. "Help me nail the bastards!"

Jack didn't quite know how to respond, so he sat silently, gaping at her. He could sense her frustration and sorrow. He truly wanted to help but...how? I'm a doctor, not a criminal investigator.

"Can I ask why you haven't gone to the cops?"

Her eyes narrowed. "I did. When I went to the city cops, they told me it was Frigman's jurisdiction. Said they couldn't intervene without his permission and he'd told them he didn't want their help." She balled her fists. "And I don't trust that fat fuck and his cronies one bit!"

"Okay. Tell me more...but no promises." He took another large gulp of his drink then waved his hand for her to continue. This might be related to what was happening with him at work...or might not. He wasn't sure. "What was happening with Dale at work before he died?"

"Dale had received some research grants, but when Dr. Waymon gave my husband the budget for his research, Dale noticed a big discrepancy between the amounts of the grants and the budget amounts that were approved," Sheila muttered between snuffles. "When he approached Waymon with what he thought was an error, Dr. Waymon said that it was not an error. Told Dale it was departmental policy to take a percentage of every grant. Said it went toward departmental administrative expenses. Dale told Waymon he thought that was reasonable but thought fifty percent was exorbitant."

Jack arched an eyebrow. "I agree with Dale on that!"

"When Dale asked Waymon if he could see something to justify taking that much money, Waymon started yelling and cussing at him—even threatened to fire him."

Sheila paused to take a drink of water, her hands shaking badly as she brought the glass to her lips.

"Dale didn't want to get fired—he liked his job, was excited about his research...and I was pregnant." She shrugged. "So, he just backed off. Waymon even apologized for his outburst soon after that." She stifled a sob. "I wish Dale would have just left it that way—but it really bothered him. He kept nosing around, asking questions of other faculty who'd received research grants. Several of them were very nervous talking about it...or just flat-out refused to. He learned there was a departmental fee deducted from all of their research budgets, including Bev's." She paused, turning her eyes to the tabletop, shaking her head slowly.

Jack rested a hand on her shoulder. "Go ahead whenever you're ready."

"Dale then approached Mary and asked if she knew anything about the research budgets. She said she didn't. Then he started anonymously getting the documents I've now forwarded to you. He reviewed them and estimated there must have been millions of dollars of so-called administrative fees skimmed from the research grant monies over the past five years or so. The dollar amounts closely matched deposits made to offshore bank accounts. Unfortunately, the account holder's name was redacted from the deposit information Dale got...but he felt strongly it was somebody in the anesthesia department."

She looked directly into Jack's eyes. "Why would the university use offshore accounts like that?"

"Good question," Jack replied softly, rubbing his chin. "That's very odd."

"There's more. Dale confronted Waymon with all the information, and Waymon told Dale he'd stuck his nose where it didn't belong...despite being warned. He fired Dale on the spot." She sobbed and sniffled.

"Then what happened?" Jack asked.

"He went in late one night to clear out his locker and office. Before he left home that night, he gave me all the stuff I sent to you. Told me to make sure I gave it to someone I trusted if anything happened to him. I n-never saw him alive again!"

She started to sob uncontrollably. Jack and Janice scooted their chairs closer to her, each putting an arm around her shoulders. People sitting at the surrounding tables were stealing quick looks at the trio.

Janice shot a glance at Jack then helped Sheila stand.

"We'll be back in a few minutes. I'm taking Sheila to the lady's room."

Jack sipped at his drink, lost in thought, as he awaited their return. All that Sheila just told me is probably related to what's happening with me now—but how..and why? What the hell had he stepped into the middle of?

After a short time, Janice returned to the table. "Sorry, but Sheila's a mess—I'm going to drive her home and stay with her awhile. Do you mind?"

"Not at all—good idea. I'll call you later." He kissed her quickly on the lips. "Be careful...and don't tell anybody about any of this."

"Sure, Jack. We'll talk later. Bye."

(1800, Friday)

Jack created a plan of action after meeting with Sheila Wallace. First, he'd gather as much information as he could from Frigman about the recent lab murders. Jack needed to figure out if there was a connection to the deaths of Bev and Dale. As he drove to the university police station, Jack contemplated how best to strike up such a conversation. He pulled his truck into a parking space and took a deep breath, fretting about how Frigman might respond. He hoped the crazy cop wouldn't try to lock Jack up. He strolled into the lobby. The officer at the reception desk eyed Jack, looking him up and down.

"Hi, Officer. I'm Dr. Jack Bass. I have an appointment with Chief Frigman—is he here?"

The officer waved in the general direction of some nearby chairs. "Yeah—have a seat." The cop picked up the desk phone and jabbed at a button. "Hey, boss. The asshole's here."

Well, that sets an interesting tone for the meeting, Jack mused. Apparently, Frigman had already told his staff something about Jack. Obviously, nothing good. A large shadow showed on the shades of Frigman's glass-walled office. The squeak of his chair could be heard clearly in the lobby as the figure rose from the desk seat. Frigman opened the door a crack and motioned Jack into his office with a nod of his head.

"In here, Bass."

Jack stepped in, his eyes widening as he cast a gaze around the office. It was a pig sty—files lying about in disorganized piles, several empty food wrappers laying on the floor and desk. A half-empty bag of Cheetos sitting on the desk explained the orange crumbs sprinkled on Frigman's shirt and loosened tie. Frigman waddled behind his desk and plopped down into his chair, breathing heavily. He waved a hand at a chair in front of his desk but said nothing as he scrutinized Jack.

Frigman brushed some food crumbs from the top of his desk onto the floor. "What do you want, Bass?"

"Good to see you, too, Chief," Jack replied. No! Don't start off that way, Jack. "I'm sorry. Let me start over. Chief, we've obviously gotten off to a bad start in our relationship. That's not what I would've preferred. I wanted to come here today and see if we couldn't start over...on better terms."

"Uh huh. I see. Pardon my French, Doc, but my bullshit meter is reading in the red. What do you really want?"

Jack never thought this was going to be easy. Stay calm. Don't let this clown get under your skin. "I get it—we'll never become fishing buddies." He shrugged. "But I hoped we could at least open some lines of communication." Jack scooted his chair nearer the desk. "I've learned about some recent history of the anesthesia department that I wanted to ask you about."

Frigman's eyebrows shot up, and a few beads of sweat rolled down his creased forehead.

So...that got your attention, eh? Jack thought.

"What're you talking about, Bass?" Frigman casually threw a handful of Cheetos in his mouth, leaned back in his chair, and crossed his arms over his chest. He stared at Jack and chewed with his mouth open.

"The faculty deaths that occurred in the department—I understand they were considered a little suspicious?"

"Those cases are closed—"

“Could you share any information about that with me, anyway?” Jack interjected. “Maybe if I knew more about those deaths, I might be able to help determine if they’re related to the recent murders in the lab.”

Frigman leaned forward, resting a chubby forearm on his desk. He glared at Jack. His face reddened as he worked his jaw for several seconds. “Like I was trying to say—those cases are closed!” He jabbed a finger at Jack. “And it’s none of your goddam business, anyway.” Frigman leaned back in his chair, brows deeply furrowed as he continued to glare at Jack. “I don’t know what you’re up to, Bass, but I’m not falling for your line of bullshit.” He waved a hand dismissively. “You’re entitled to read the public police reports about those deaths.” He shook his head, his jowls jiggling. “But there’s no way they are related to these recent murders.”

“I’m not so sure I agree...”

“Screw you, Bass!” Frigman slid forward on his chair and it screeched. “I don’t give a damn what you think!” He jabbed a thumb at his chest. “You know what I think? I think you’re here trying to put up a smokescreen around yourself. That’s something guilty people do.” He slapped a palm on his desk. “Well, it’s not going to work!” He narrowed his eyes. “And it’s only a matter of time till I nail you!”

Jack held up his hands in a gesture of innocence. “Chief, what will it take for me to convince you of my innocence?”

Frigman hesitated for a few seconds. “Well...you may have some information you can help me with.”

“Name it, Chief. I’ll tell you whatever I know.”

“When I was in your office the other day, I bumped into that Quinn kid outside your office.” He squinted. “What do you know about him?”

“Mark Quinn?” Where the hell was he going with this? “He’s a good kid—smart, hard worker... I like him. Why?”

“Doesn’t surprise me to hear you like him—you two seem like birds of a feather.” Frigman picked up a pen from his desk and twirled it in his fingers. “Not that it’s any of your business, but Quinn is also a person of interest for those lab murders. If you want to convince me of your innocence, you keep an eye on that kid for me—tell me if you see him doing or saying anything suspicious.”

Jack felt like he’d just had a bucket of cold water thrown in his face. This makes no sense! “I-I can’t believe Mark would have anything to do with something like that—there’s just no way!”

“You should believe it, Bass.” He smirked and dug out some more Cheetos, throwing the empty bag on the floor near the trash can. “Otherwise, you are the prime suspect.” He gave Jack a quick sideways glance. “We’ve already gotten some solid evidence...just need a little more to arrest the kid.”

Jack stared at him and ran his fingers through his hair. Was he making this up? Why have you been hassling me so much if you think Mark Quinn killed those ladies?

“So, I need you to keep an eye on that kid.” Frigman paused briefly. “But don’t think this gets you off the hook—if that kid confesses that you were involved, I’ll be coming to haul you in, too.”

Jack arched an eyebrow and stared blankly at Frigman. Why is he so insistent that I’m involved with the lab murders? Is he just grasping at straws and hoping to get lucky? Jack huffed and rolled his head around. “Yeah, sure, Chief...whatever.” Jack clambered to his feet, rubbing his chin as he played this conversation over in his head. “Thanks for your time and the information, Chief. I’ll let you know if I see Quinn doing anything suspicious.”

Frigman remained seated, a baffled look on his face. Jack turned toward the door.

“Remember—I’m still watching you, too!” Frigman called after Jack as he walked out of the office.

• • • •

JACK SAT FOR A FEW moments in his truck, pondering what he’d just learned. What the hell is going on here...and what’s Frigman’s play in all this? He needed to speak with Mark Quinn as soon as he could. Needed to hear his side of this story. He slapped the steering wheel.

“Why didn’t I just stay in the Army? At least then I knew who the enemy was.”

(1100, Saturday)

Mark Quinn sat alone on the couch in his spartan apartment. He had a difficult decision to make. He'd stopped deluding himself that this whole murder thing would just go away, and Chief Frigman would forget about him. It was painfully obvious that wasn't going to happen. He had information and evidence he felt could prove his innocence...or be used against him. He had to be careful. He needed to confide in someone, but who could he trust? Talk about a huge dilemma!

"I hate that asshole, Frigman, but...maybe if I share my evidence with him, I could show him I'm innocent." He took a sip of coffee. "That would be bad news for Dr. Bass, though."

He walked into his kitchen and set his empty cup in the sink then leaned against the counter.

I wonder what Misty would think? She might have some good suggestions... He rubbed the back of his neck then shook his head.

"No! I can't put her at risk by telling her about this." If that dipshit Frigman got any inkling she might know something, he'd probably harass the hell out of her. Mark blew out a long sigh. There was probably only one course of action for him to take—it wasn't exactly desirable but was probably the safest bet. He dialed the number on the business card he'd picked up from the countertop.

The phone rang twice. "Chief Frigman, University Police."

Mark poised a finger over the "end call" button, fighting the urge to hang up.

"Hello? Who the hell is this?" Frigman demanded.

"Ch-chief Frigman?"

"Yes."

"Th-this is Mark Quinn. I have something I need to talk to you about." Damn! Relax! Don't let him hear you sounding so nervous. He hated how easily Frigman seemed to intimidate him.

"Quinn? What...are going to finally confess, boy?"

"No! I told you—I didn't do it, but...I was there during those murders. I saw the person who did it." Mark took a deep breath. Telling Frigman had a cathartic effect on Mark's mind.

"Go on. You have my attention."

"I freaked out! I couldn't believe what I was seeing! I-I didn't know what to do...so I just ran." He groaned. "I couldn't afford to get sucked into something like this—I-I thought it would put my enrollment in med school at risk..."

"I knew it!" Frigman yelled. "I'm not going to listen to this over the phone, though. You get your ass down here to the station. Pronto! Then I can record your confess—I mean, statement."

"Okay," Mark mumbled. Had he just made a mistake? "I'll be there in about twenty minutes. Good-bye" Mark hung up the phone, a chill crawling up his spine like some cold, wet amphibian was on his back.

• • • •

FRIGMAN MET MARK AT the front door of the police station and escorted him directly into an interrogation room. Mark squirmed as he sat on the hard, straight-back chair.

"I'm all ears, Quinn. Start talking."

Mark looked around for a recorder, but the table in front of him was empty. "I thought you said I needed to come here so you could record this?"

"I'll decide that after I hear what you have to say—get on with it, kid. What do you have?"

“I’m here because I’ve told some others what I saw.” He looked down at his hands, wringing them on his lap. “They suggested I talk with you.”

Frigman growled. “You shouldn’t have told anyone!” He jabbed a finger at Mark. “You’ll need to give me their names.”

Mark nodded. Why would that matter? “Uh...sure.” He looked up at Frigman. “I was in the lab the night of those murders. I’d fallen asleep when I was looking at a slide in the microscopy room.” He shrugged quickly. “Something—a noise, I guess—woke me.” He shuddered. “The noise from that man killing those two ladies. I-I saw him do it.”

Frigman waved a hand rapidly in circles. “Well, go on, boy. Who was it?”

“I think it was a medical center faculty doctor.”

“I knew it! You mean, Bass, don’t you—was it Dr. Bass? C’mon, boy, spit it out!”

“I can’t really say I know who it was—just that he was wearing a faculty lab coat.”

Frigman stood in front of Quinn, his hands on his hips, his face turning a deep red. “Look, boy, I don’t like playing games. I have a pretty good idea who did it, and unless you give me some good evidence to make me think otherwise, your name is still on the top of the list!” He shook a finger in Mark’s face. “Now, who the hell was it?”

“I-I have some evidence I found at the murder scene.” He shot a quick glance up at Frigman. “You can see it for yourself. I think when you see it and I explain what I saw, you’ll change your mind about me.”

“What?” Frigman poked a finger in Mark’s chest. “You do know tampering with evidence at a crime scene is against the law, don’t you?” Frigman pointed at the door. “Go get it.”

“It’ll take me till tomorrow.”

“You don’t show up with it tomorrow, you’ll be sorry, boy. Now, get outta my sight!”

(0900, Monday)

Frigman reviewed the results of the DNA test then set it on his desk. Holy crap, what a stroke of luck! Bill Turrel had noticed a blood stain on the floor mat of Quinn's car. Turrel had gotten into the car and had gathered a sample. That blood was a match for one of the murder victims.

"We're bringing you in, you little bastard!" Frigman muttered, pumping his fist in the air. He rose from his desk and toddled out of his office, stopping by Bill Turrel's desk.

"Let's go, Bill. We got a DNA match for one of the murdered lab techs on that blood from Quinn's car. We're hauling in that little twit."

Turrel smiled broadly and thrust out his chest. "Glad I mentioned it to you when I spotted it, boss."

"Yeah, yeah, Bill." Frigman rolled his eyes. "That's real good police work on your part. Now, shut up and let's go."

• • • •

(Forty minutes later)

MARK WAS IN A DAZE as Frigman and Turrel dragged him into the police station and threw him down in a chair in the interrogation room. He'd been unimaginably embarrassed when the police came onto the hospital ward to arrest him, taking him away in handcuffs. They'd ignored his repeated reassurances that he would not try to flee if they allowed him to walk out without being shackled. Of course, Mark's senior resident, Dan, cackled and taunted him as the cops dragged Mark away.

Mark surveyed the small room. I hate this place! He was tired of talking to the police. Tired of this whole situation. What the hell did I ever do to deserve all of this? I was just minding my own business...not bothering anybody.

Frigman threw the door open and breezed into the room, a big smile on his face.

"When do I get to make a phone call to my lawyer?" Mark asked.

"Don't try to tell me about the law, boy. I'll tell you when—if I decide to let you make one at all."

Mark's guts churned, doing somersaults in his belly. "You can't do that!"

Frigman whisked his baton from his belt and shook it at Mark. "Don't tell me what I can't do, boy!"

Frigman took a position, standing directly in front of Mark. He'd just opened his mouth to speak again when Bill Turrel stuck his head in the door.

"Hey, boss. We got a visitor—says it's something important."

"Shit!" Frigman grumbled.

"All right, all right—I'll be right there." He leaned down, his face near Mark's. "You just sit here and behave yourself, boy. I'll be right back."

Mark listened as best he could to the muffled conversation taking place in the hallway. He couldn't make out any of the words, but there seemed to be occasional heated exchanges.

Sweating profusely, Mark reached into his lab coat pocket, hoping to find a hanky to mop his brow. His fingers touched the cellphone, and he froze. His gaze darted to the door then to his pocket. In all the commotion, he'd forgotten it was there. I can't believe they didn't frisk me and find this! He inched the phone out of the pocket, his gaze glued to the door. He snuck a peek at the phone just long enough to scroll to Jack Bass's number then mashed on the call button.

Please answer, please answer! Mark's leg pumped like a fleshy jackhammer as he waited. C'mon, c'mon! After several rings, Mark was transferred to Jack's voicemail. He slumped in the chair. Damn! The voicemail beeped. Mark swallowed hard, his throat so dry he was barely able to choke out a single word.

"Dr. Bass, it's Mark Quinn. Frigman arrested me for those lab murders. He has me down at the police station," he whispered. "I-I'm scared, Dr. Bass! I think they may try to do something to me—I didn't know who else to call. Please—"

Frigman burst through the door, holding out his hand. "Give me that damn phone, boy!" he yelled. "Where the hell did you get that thing?"

Mark jumped, nearly dropping the phone. He quickly disconnected then frantically deleted the number he'd just called from the outgoing calls menu.

"It's the phone I always carry." Mark shrugged. "You didn't take it, so I thought it must be okay if I used it."

"Goddamit, Bill, you dumbass!" Frigman grumbled under his breath. He snatched the phone from Mark and shook it at him. "Why didn't you tell me you had this?"

"Uhh...you didn't ask."

"Don't be a smart-ass with me, you punk!" Frigman pocketed the phone. "I'm gonna show you how I handle smart-asses."

He lifted a thick phonebook from a nearby table then stood behind Mark, holding the book firmly against the side of Mark's head. Mark squirmed as he tried to see what Frigman was up to. Frigman grabbed a handful of Mark's hair and yanked his head back.

"Hold still, godammit!"

Mark gave up, scrunching his shoulders and sitting still. Frigman pulled his baton from his belt and slammed it against the phone book. A sudden, excruciating pain pierced Mark's eardrum. It felt like someone had stuck a knife through it. He twisted his head away. "Ouch!"

"No bruises, no broken bones...but plenty of pain." Frigman laughed as he backed away, slipping his baton back into his belt. "Now—you gonna tell me who you called, or do you want a repeat performance?"

Mark nodded slowly as he held his hand to his ringing ear.

"Good! You may not be as dumb as you look."

Frigman moved behind Mark, and Mark cringed, expecting another pummeling. Frigman leaned over, putting his mouth next to Mark's ear. "Who'd you call?" he bellowed, causing another wave of excruciating pain in Mark's ear.

"Nobody! I couldn't get through."

"Bullshit! Don't lie to me. I saw you talking. Do I need to get the phone book again?"

"No!" Mark covered both of his ears with his hands. "All right, all right! I tried to call my lawyer, but all I got was his voicemail."

"Your lawyer? I didn't tell you that you could do that!" He glared at Mark a few seconds, rubbing a fingertip across his lips, then dug the phone from his pocket. "Never mind. I'll just check myself to see who you called." Frigman jabbed at the keys with a chubby finger. After a few minutes, Frigman slammed the cellphone down on a table then bent over, bringing his reddened face so close that his hot, Frito-scented breath washed across Mark's face.

"You little prick—you think you're pretty smart, don't you? You deleted the number from the dialed calls menu, didn't you? Why would you do that unless you didn't want me to see the number?" He jerked on Mark's hair again. "Who'd you call?"

“I told you, Chief! My lawyer,” Mark labored to sound convincing. “And when I do talk to him, he’s going to hear about the phone book thing.”

“Yeah, well, you’re not going to be talking with him any time soon,” Frigman stated, a tinge of nervousness in his voice. He picked up the phone book and toddled out the door.

Mark held his head in his hands, rocking back-and-forth. I hope Dr. Bass checks his voicemail soon.

(1930, Tuesday)

Jack unlocked the front door of his home and shuffled in. He dropped his briefcase on the floor of the entryway and hung his keys in their usual spot on the hook of the umbrella stand. This leaving home in the dark and returning in the dark is getting old. He went through his usual routine of sticking his cellphone in its charger then putting his shoes at the base of the piece of antique furniture. Some of his friends kidded him about being so anal about his routine, but he hated having to search for things when he had to leave the house quickly for an emergency.

Jack entered his kitchen to grab a beer from the fridge and noticed the light blinking on the answering machine indicating he had messages waiting. He paused briefly then stepped to his refrigerator. I need a beer before I do anything else. After he took a long swig, he stabbed the button on the machine then leaned against the counter.

“Jack, it’s Janice. I was wondering if we were still on for dinner tonight? Call and let me know. If I don’t hear from you by about eight or so, I’ll assume you got tied up. Talk to you soon...I hope.”

Jack shot a quick glance at the clock on the kitchen wall. 7:42 p.m.

“Damn! The time totally got away from me.”

He snatched up the phone, dialing as he played over different excuses in his head. She answered on the second ring.

“Janice! Sorry I’m calling so late...I just got home and got your message.” He paused a few seconds. “Are you still interested in grabbing some dinner?”

“I thought maybe you were blowing me off,” she quipped.

“Not at all! I just got stuck at the hospital and lost track of the time.”

“Well, you’ll have to buy, then, to make up for your oversight,” she joked.

“It’s a deal. Give me a few minutes to get cleaned up, and I’ll swing by to pick you up.”

“Okay. See you in a few.”

Jack set his beer on the counter, noticing there was another message waiting. I’ll listen to it after I get back from dinner. He raced into his bathroom, quickly scrubbed, then threw on some fresh clothes. He stopped and briefly examined himself in the mirror, running his fingers through his damp hair. I sure like spending time with her, but...maybe I’m doing that too much? He rushed down the hall, slowing as he neared the kitchen.

“I could sure use another pull from that beer before I leave.”

He ducked into the kitchen and snatched the bottle from the countertop. As he put the bottle to his lips, he noticed the red message light still blinking. Later. He kept staring at the blinking light. Aw, crap! It might be the hospital. He glanced at his wristwatch then stabbed the play button, tapping his foot rapidly as he waited.

“Dr. Bass, it’s Mark Quinn.” Jack leaned closer to the machine, barely able to hear Mark’s whispered message. “Frigman arrested me for those lab murders and has me down at the police station. I-I’m scared, Dr. Bass—I think they may try to do something to me. I-I didn’t know who else to call. Please—”

“Give me that damn phone, boy!” Frigman yelled in the background.

Jack stiffened at the sound of the cop’s voice coming through the speaker.

The message ended abruptly.

“Sonofabitch!” He snatched up the phone and dialed Janice.

“Hello—”

“Janice, it’s Jack. Hey, I am so sorry, but something critical has come up. I’ve got to go take care of it right now. I’ll call you later. I’m really sorry—you don’t know how much I’d rather spend time with you tonight.”

“What is it, Jack—did something happen at the hospital? Anything I can do to help?”

“No. I don’t want to bother you with this, and I’m not sure how long it will take—I’ll call you when I’m done. Maybe we can talk about it then. Gotta go. Bye.”

Jack called Ken Conlin as he rushed out his front door.

The phone was answered on the first ring. “Conlin and Steele Law Firm, may I help you?” a woman asked, her voice pleasant.

“Yes, my name is Dr. Jack Bass. I was calling for Kenneth Conlin. Is he available? It’s urgent.”

“Let me check for you, Dr. Bass. He’s already left for the day, so I’ll need to patch you through to his cellphone—it may take a few seconds.”

“Sure. I’ll wait.” Jack ran down his sidewalk, stopping at his truck door when he heard a voice on his phone.

“Ken Conlin here, Dr. Bass.”

“Hey, Ken. I know I’ve retained you and all, but I’m sorry we haven’t had a chance to talk much yet.”

“No problem. Happens all the time. The receptionist said you told her this was urgent—how can I help you?”

“Well, uh, you know how I told you that Chief Frigman over at the medical center was harassing me about those murders?”

“Yeah. Is that asshole at it again?”

“No, not with me—a medical student I know, Mark Quinn, was just arrested. Stupid as it may sound, Frigman arrested the kid for the murders he’s accusing me of! Quinn’s a good kid, Ken. I seriously doubt he had anything to do with it, so I’m not sure what Frigman’s up to. Quinn seems genuinely afraid that Frigman is going to do something...untoward to him, though.”

“Hasn’t that jackass Frigman brought in outside assistance to help with that investigation?”

“I don’t have any idea. The whole thing’s pretty weird.” He paused. “You sound like you already know Frigman.”

“Oh, yeah. Unfortunately. He’s gotten confused about the law a few times in the past with some clients of mine, so I had to educate him on the proper interpretation.”

“Then you know he’s a total jerk.”

“Yep, sure do.”

“Can you help me out on this?”

“How long would it take you to get over to the police station, Jack?”

“About fifteen minutes.”

“It’ll take me about twenty if I leave right now. If you would, head straight over there, and ask Frigman to see this kid—what’s his name again?”

“Mark Quinn.”

“Okay. Get over there and insist on seeing Quinn. Don’t do anything else—just try to stall Frigman until I get there. If they won’t let you see him, tell them I’m on my way and that they are not to move him until I’ve had a chance to talk to him. I’ll be there ASAP.”

“Great, Ken. See you over there...and thanks again.”

“Glad to help, Jack. Bye.”

The tires on Jack's truck squealed loudly as he veered into the parking lot of the university police station. The truck skidded to a stop askew in a parking spot, and he threw his door open then sprinted toward the building entrance. As he reached the bottom of the flight of front steps, he froze. Above him, Mark Quinn stepped out the main doors. He had his hands cuffed behind his back, and Frigman and another officer each had a hand clamped on one of Mark's arms. Frigman's face immediately took on a burgundy color and twisted into an angry scowl when he spotted Jack. Mark Quinn's shoulder's slumped, and he sighed loudly.

"Well—perfect timing on my part," Jack stated, standing with his hands on his hips.

"Outta my way, Bass," Frigman bellowed. "This doesn't concern you." He jabbed a finger at Jack. "Move or I'll have Bill here arrest you for obstruction of justice." He smirked. "You know, you oughta be happy about this development—now that I know this slug committed those murders, you might be off the hook...unless he tells me you helped him, that is."

Frigman turned to Bill.

"Bill, why don't you escort the good Dr. Bass back to his vehicle and off the property."

"Consider it done, boss."

Turrel released Quinn's arm, stepping toward Jack, pulling his baton from his belt. Frigman shook Mark by his arm, leaning his face close to Mark's ear.

"So, you called Bass, eh, you little brat?"

"Before you start any crap with me Frigman, you should know I just spoke with Ken Conlin." Jack smirked. "A lawyer I believe you know. He'll be here any minute."

Turrel froze in his tracks, shooting glances back and forth between Jack and Frigman.

Frigman excitedly waved Turrel toward Jack. "Get your ass down there and take care of him like I said, Bill." Frigman stabbed a finger at Jack. "Last warning, Bass—get outta the way...or else."

Frigman jerked Mark's arms high behind his back, twisting his shoulder joints into an unnatural position. Mark stood on his tiptoes, squirming and groaning in pain.

"Back off, Frigman! You're not the damned Gestapo—let go of his arms!" Jack yelled.

Frigman's eyes bugged out in his reddened face. "Bill, hold this kid while I escort Dr. Bass off the property." He stepped away from Mark's side, drawing his baton as he approached Jack. He had taken only a couple of steps when a deep voice boomed from behind Jack.

"Frigman! You fat prick—just what do you think you're doing? Put that goddam baton away!"

Ken Conlin stopped next to Jack. "Sorry I didn't get here sooner. Let me handle this now," he whispered.

Jack smiled at Ken. "All yours."

Ken took a small notepad and pen from a pocket and looked at Bill. "What's your name, Officer?"

Turrel looked sheepishly at Frigman then turned to Ken. "B-Bill Turrel, sir."

"You don't need to answer this high-priced mouthpiece's questions, Bill!" Frigman bellowed. "You're an officer of the law."

Bill shot nervous glances between Conlin and Frigman.

"Got it. Bill Turrel." Conlin turned to Frigman. "I'm now counsel for Mr. Quinn. Can I see the arrest warrant, Chief?"

Frigman growled.

"Well, Chief—where is it?"

“I don’t have a friggin’ arrest warrant...yet! I’m on my way to get that now, so get the hell outta my way, Conlin!”

“Chief, Chief, Chief—how many times are you and I going to have to go through this sort of scenario? You know it doesn’t work that way,” he stated, shaking his head. “Take the cuffs off my client now, or I’ll call some of my buddies over at the FBI Civil Rights Division and the Federal Prosecutor’s office. I know they’d be happy to come chat with you...again.”

“Don’t tell me the law, Conlin!”

“Apparently, someone needs to, Chief.” Conlin stepped forward and stabbed a finger at Frigman. “And, it’s Mister Conlin to you.” He pulled his cellphone from his pocket, a finger poised over the keypad. “What’s it gonna be, Chief?”

Frigman’s jaw worked furiously as he glowered at Conlin. He jabbed a thumb over his shoulder at Mark.

“Bill, take the goddam cuffs off this little prick!” he bellowed then leaned in close to Mark’s face, glaring at him. “Next time, you won’t be so lucky.”

When Turrell finished removing the cuffs, Frigman grabbed Mark by the arm, shoving him down the steps toward Conlin.

“Here’s your precious little client, Conlin.”

“Frigman, you ever heard of police brutality? Don’t ever handle a client of mine like that again!”

As Mark took a position between the lawyer and Jack, they both turned toward him.

“You okay?” they asked in unison.

Mark glared at Frigman. “Yeah, I’m fine...but I can’t wait to tell you all about what went on in there.”

Ken threw a business card at Frigman’s feet. “If you have any other questions for my client, there’s my number. See you around, Chief Wiggam.”

Ken put his hand on Mark’s shoulder and hurriedly ushered him over to his car, Jack following closely. When they arrived at Conlin’s car, Ken spun to Mark.

“Mark, I’m Ken Conlin. I’m a lawyer, and Dr. Bass asked me to help you. We need to find a time to talk—soon. I need to know more about why and how you’re involved in this.”

“Thanks, Mr. Conlin. I-I was really getting scared in there,” Mark said.

Ken turned to Jack. “Jack, can you get Mark home? On the drive over here, I got another urgent call I need to attend to.”

“Sure, Ken. Just send the bill to me.”

“Don’t worry about that. I think you and Wes Watley are right, though. Something smelly is going on around here—be careful and don’t hesitate to call any time.”

“Thanks, Ken.”

Conlin climbed in his car and sped off.

“C’mon, I’ll take you to my place and fix us some dinner,” Jack said, the word dinner reminding him that he hadn’t called Janice yet. Oh crap! I hope she’s not mad.

• • • •

NEITHER JACK NOR MARK said anything for several minutes as Jack maneuvered his truck through the traffic.

“Mark, you want to tell me what’s up? Why did Frigman arrest you for those murders—why are you even on his radar for that?”

Mark shrugged and stared out the passenger window.

“C’mon, Mark—you need to come clean with me if you want me to help you.”

Mark continued to sit silently, staring at the bustling traffic.

“Mark! You gonna talk to me? I know you didn’t kill anyone, but I need to know what’s going on.”

Mark twisted to face Jack. “You’re right—I didn’t kill anyone...but I saw the man who did—and I think Frigman suspects that,” he muttered flatly. “I think he might just be trying to scare me into telling him what I know.” He turned his gaze back out the window.

“You know who the killer was?” Jack asked excitedly.

“Yes.”

“Who? Tell me!”

“The nametag I found by the dead women was...” Mark turned back to Jack. “Yours.”

(0600, Wednesday)

Misty hit the alarm snooze button and rolled onto her back, closed her eyes again, then extended her arm to the other side of the mattress, searching for the warm body that should have been there. She was still feeling the warm afterglow of the lovemaking from the previous night and felt like snuggling. When her probing fingers didn't locate the warm flesh they were seeking, she cast a lazy gaze over at the empty spot. Mark was gone. She scanned the room, noticing light coming from under the closed bedroom door.

Still naked, she jumped from the bed and padded to the door, opening it a crack. Mark Quinn was sitting at a small dinette table. He was staring absently at the wall in front of him as he held a cup of coffee. She approached him stealthily from behind, bent over, and put her arms around his neck, nuzzling his head between her bare breasts.

"What are you doing up so early?" she asked inquisitively.

Mark jumped but quickly relaxed, leaning his head into her warm, soft breasts, enjoying the feel of them against the back of his neck. He turned slightly toward her, smiling broadly.

"Just doing some thinking."

She walked around in front of him and perched on his lap, settling into a comfortable position across his thighs, then she looked into his eyes.

"About what?"

Mark started to gently caress the soft skin of her back, aroused when he noticed her nipples harden in response.

"Really?" He snorted. "About all this bullshit that's been going on with these murders at the hospital. What Frigman is up to. How Dr. Bass might be involved. That's what."

Misty put her arms around his shoulders, pulling his head to her, nestling it as she softly stroked his hair.

"I don't like Frigman—he's a perverted psychopath."

"No debate from me—he's a scumbag."

"But Dr. Bass seems like a great guy. You don't really think he's involved with the murders...do you?"

Mark shrugged. "I like him, too... I don't know what to think." He turned his face to her. "I don't even want to think about all this stuff. I just want to focus on school—"

They both jumped as Mark's phone bleated. Mark reached around Misty and snatched it from the tabletop.

"Mark Quinn."

"Hey, Mark. It's Jack Bass. Sorry for calling so early."

Mark bolted upright in his chair, almost knocking Misty off his lap. "Hey, Dr. Bass. What's up?"

"How's your schedule look today?"

"Well, my usual day at the hospital, I'm afraid..." Mark responded sullenly.

"Not anymore, Mark. I talked to an old friend of mine who's in the FBI—gave him the lowdown on what you told me in the truck. He wants to talk with you today then have you take that evidence you said you have to the local FBI office."

"Well, I suppose I can call in sick..."

“No, don’t do that. You don’t need to draw any attention to yourself. What time do you think you’ll be done?”

“It probably won’t be until after six tonight.”

“Okay, that should still work fine. I’ll wait for you in my admin office—not the one in the OR. Just come by when you’re done today. If I’m not there when you arrive, just tell my AA, Mary, I said to let you wait in my office.”

“O-okay.”

“You sound a little down this morning—you hanging in there?” Jack asked.

“I’m trying, Dr. Bass, but...all this bullshit and trying to keep up with my schedule and studying... I’m just worn out.”

“It’ll be over soon, Mark.” Jack was silent a few seconds. “Look, Wes Watley, my FBI buddy, is all over this now...and Ken Conlin is available to you, too. Just hang in there a little longer, and we’ll get all this straightened out. I promise.”

“Okay, I’ll handle it, but I’m ready for it to be over.”

“Ditto, Mark. See you this evening.”

Mark disconnected and gave Misty a hug then a little pat on her bare bottom. “Well, much as I hate to say it, it’s time to go.”

She hopped up from his lap then stood facing him. “Well...aren’t you going to share some details?”

Mark rose and looked into her eyes. “I’d rather not. I don’t want you to get sucked into this fiasco any more than you already are.” He pulled her close, wrapping his arms tightly around her. “It’s my problem—I don’t want it to become yours, too,” he whispered into her ear.

“If it involves you, it is my problem. I wish you’d let me help.” She extracted herself from his embrace and started to walk back to the bedroom, looking over her shoulder with an impish smile. “I do know one way I can help.” she said in an alluring voice. “Unless you really have to leave right this minute.”

Mark looked at her taut buttocks and trim body, smiling sadly. It was obvious she’d been a college athlete. “Yeah, unfortunately, I do—but hold that thought until tonight.”

(1300, Thursday)

Jack leaned against the tiled wall in the hallway between a couple of operating rooms, holding his phone to his ear. “Hey, Nancy, it’s Jack Bass, how’re you today?”

“Hello, Dr. Bass,” Dick Olgent’s executive assistant replied.

“Is Mr. Olgent in? I need to talk to him.”

“He is. Can I tell him what you want to talk to him about?”

“I don’t mean to be cryptic, but...it’s something quite confidential—can you just tell him it’s very serious...and urgent.”

“All right, Dr. Bass, I’ll let him know. Please hold a minute.”

After a few seconds of a canned announcer’s voice extolling the wondrous virtues of the care delivered at Southern Medical Center, Dick Olgent answered.

“Hi, Jack. Nancy tells me you have something urgent you want to talk about. Do you want to come over to my office, or is this something we can resolve on the phone?” he asked in a concerned tone.

“Hey, Dick. Thanks for taking my call. Actually, I’d much prefer to talk in person—I think I may have learned something about those lab murders. I’d really appreciate being able to get a few minutes of your time...today, if possible.”

Silence filled the line for several seconds. “Well, Jack, you certainly know how to get my attention. Do you think you’re in any danger?”

“I don’t know about me being in any danger, but I am worried something bad might happen to somebody else.”

“Well, unless you want me to bump something off my schedule, I really don’t have an open slot until after six this evening. Is that soon enough, or shall I cancel something?”

“After six is fine, Dick.”

“Good. That way, I’ll really be able to focus on what you’re telling me. One other thing, Jack—have you talked with Chief Frigman about this? I think that’s especially important if you think someone may be in danger.”

“No...I haven’t...and I have my reasons.” Jack paused for a few seconds. “I was hoping you and I would be able to have a private discussion before involving anyone else,” Jack said in a grave tone.

“Well, Jack, as the University Police Chief, I think he should hear anything you have to say, but I guess I’ll hear you out first. See you in my office around six. Goodbye.”

(1815, Thursday)

Dick Olgent stood and circled around his desk to greet Jack. “Dr. Bass, good to see you.” He shook Jack’s hand firmly, smiling as he waved him to a chair at a large conference table in a corner of the office. “Please have a seat.”

Jack took a seat, his back to the door, then looked around the office. “Nice office—I love the hardwood paneling.”

“Thanks, Jack. I do like it... I guess rank does have its privileges, eh?” Olgent replied, taking a seat opposite Jack at the table. “You really got my attention with your call earlier today. I’ve been worried all afternoon about what it is you want to tell me. As you can imagine, those lab murders have caused me some sleepless nights.” He leaned his forearms on the table. “Where would you like to start?”

“I’m not quite sure where to start—I believe this all probably started long before I arrived here.”

“That sounds ominous, Jack...that’s been bothering me since you called earlier.” He leaned back, crossed his arms over his chest, and held a finger to his lips. “And you think there are more people in danger now?”

“I do. There’s a medical student named Mark Quinn that I think is at particular risk.” He blew out a long breath and ran his hand over his hair. “Not to mention...me.”

Olgent’s eyes shot wide. “Now you’re really starting to scare me.” Olgent leaned back, resting his chin on a fist, a grave look on his face. “You said you haven’t talked with Chief Frigman about this?”

Jack snorted. “He’s talked to me about it a few times...unfortunately. He’s actually accusing me of the lab murders!” Jack paused a minute. “But I don’t want to share with him what I’m about to tell you.” He rubbed the back of his neck. “I think Frigman may be involved somehow...”

Olgent jumped from his chair and paced back and forth on his side of the table. He stopped and turned to Jack. “That’s a pretty serious accusation. You say he’s accusing you, but now...you’re accusing him?”

Jack nodded. “I can imagine what you must be thinking. Your police chief could be a bent cop, maybe even complicit in murder. Trust me, I thought about this long and hard before I came here.”

“I’m not sure you can imagine what I’m thinking, Jack.” Olgent plopped back into his chair. “Of course, I’ll need to know all the details about what you know, or suspect, before I can decide how to proceed.”

“Well, I have plenty to tell you—I even know of a witness to the lab murders, and he says he has some very compelling evidence.”

Olgent’s eyebrows shot up then he held his hand up in a gesture to stop. “Have you told anyone else about this?”

Jack stared at him. How much should he share with Olgent? On the one hand, he wanted Olgent to have as complete a picture as possible, but... Maybe he shouldn’t have mentioned Mark’s name, either. He shook his head slowly. “No.”

“Nobody outside the university?”

No way Jack was going to mention Wes. “No...nobody.”

Olgent’s face relaxed and his shoulders sagged just a bit. “Good. Let’s keep it that way until I decide what to do next.”

“What are you thinking?”

Olgent gazed at Jack, his brow deeply furrowed. “I don’t know yet—you’ve dropped some pretty shocking news in my lap. It’s going to take a little time to process.”

“I’m not sure we have much time. I’m worried something bad is going to happen.”

Olgent rubbed his chin and gazed up at the ceiling. “You said you have not discussed your concerns with Chief Frigman?”

“That’s right, Dick. Again, I have my reasons.”

“But you’re worried something bad is going to happen..” He turned his eyes down to Jack. “Don’t you think the police should hear about that? After all, Jack, I want to prevent any further catastrophes—want to keep this from becoming headlines.”

Jack squirmed in the chair. Great! Another politician administrator. More worried about bad press than people in danger.

The phone on the desk rang. “Excuse me while I grab that.” Olgent stepped over and answered, listening for a minute then nodding. “Yes... I think that would be best, too.” He hung up and turned to Jack, a wan smile on his face. “Sorry for the interruption. It’s hard for a medical center president to get much undisturbed time.” He motioned his arm toward the door and shuffled toward it as he looked at Jack. “Thanks for coming by and sharing your concerns.”

Jack stood and moved toward the door. I guess the meeting is over. Olgent opened it and held it as he smiled at Jack, offering a handshake. Jack studied Olgent’s face. That’s it? Really? That’s all you want to hear? What the hell was up with that?

“Can I expect some follow up on your plans?” Jack asked.

Olgent nodded and put a hand on Jack’s shoulder. “Sure, Jack...sure.” Olgent pressed on Jack’s shoulder, prodding him out the door.

The door closed behind Jack, and he stood there a few seconds then turned back to the door and arched an eyebrow. Well...that was probably a waste of time. Jack ambled out of the building and walked across the dark parking lot toward his truck, his mind replaying the meeting. Now what? He circled around a high concrete wall at the parking garage entrance, spinning when he heard shuffling behind him.

(1930, Thursday)

Mark had been sitting in Jack's office for nearly two hours. He glanced at his watch then hopped from the chair.

"It's not like Dr. Bass to be late." Mark gazed around the office. "Especially for something this important."

He paced around, examining pictures, awards and diplomas hanging on the walls.

"How could somebody who's done so much be so...humble?"

There were several pictures of an attractive strawberry-blond woman in Army fatigues with Jack in different settings.

"I wonder who that is? I didn't think he was married."

Mark wandered more, his eyebrows shooting up when he spotted the gold-plated Ka-Bar knife on Jack's desk next to a pile of envelopes. He swallowed hard then blew out a long breath. What the hell should he do? Maybe Janice Dwyer knows where he's at. He called the OR front desk, but she'd left for the day. The nurse on duty gave him Janice's cellphone number. He hurriedly punched the numbers into Jack's desk phone.

"Hello, Jack," Janice answered in a sultry voice. "Late again and calling to beg for forgiveness I suppose?"

Mark was caught off guard, unsure how to respond.

"Jack...you there?"

"Um, hey, Ms. Dwyer—it's Mark Quinn. We met recently. I-I'm calling from Dr. Bass's office."

"Oh...hi, Mark." She cleared her throat. "What can I do for you?"

"I was scheduled to meet Dr. Bass a couple of hours ago—he hasn't shown up. That's not like him."

"No...it isn't."

"His AA said he hadn't called her to say he'd be late." He hesitated a few seconds. "I, uh, was hoping you might know where he is."

"No...I don't know where he is. I was wondering myself—we had dinner plans," Janice responded quickly. "You're right, though, it's not like him to be late without calling."

"What we were going to discuss is actually why I'm worried about him," Mark muttered.

"The lab murders?"

A jolt ran up Mark's spine and slammed into his brain like a punch in the face. Was there anyone who didn't know he was involved with the murders? "Uh...yeah."

"Mark, I don't have a good feeling about this—I'm going to call him at the hospital. Maybe he got stuck in the OR for a late case." She paused. "Why don't you look around the office building? If you find him, ask him to call me immediately. If you don't find him in the next half hour, call me back."

"Yes, ma'am." Mark disconnected, a thought suddenly striking him. "I'll call that FBI guy. Dr. Bass said to call him if anything suspicious happened." He dug out his wallet, fumbling through its contents. He found the card and jabbed the numbers into his phone. "C'mon, c'mon." Mark's heart sank when the voicemail greeting started.

"Crap!"

Mark snatched a pen off Jack's desk, jotting down the number given in the greeting. He dialed, drumming his fingers on the desktop as the phone rang several times.

"Wes Watley."

"Mr. Watley, my name's Mark Quinn. I'm sitting in Dr. Jack Bass's office. He and I were supposed to meet a couple of hours ago...but he hasn't shown up. No one seems to know where he is," Mark rattled off then took a deep breath. "He'd given me your card—told me to call you if anything weird happened."

"Slow down, Mark. I need you to answer a few questions as best you can."

"Of course. I'll tell you whatever I know."

"First, what were you two meeting about tonight?"

"Well, it's a long story..."

"Is it about the murders that happened down there in that hospital lab?"

Mark's breath caught. He didn't speak for several seconds. "Uh...yes."

"Okay. Jack's already told me about that. You the medical student who witnessed the murders?"

"Um...yeah," Mark replied, his shoulders sagging.

"Don't worry...you're not a suspect. Jack and I are old buddies, and he told me about his suspicions—how you got caught in the middle of all this. Go ahead."

Mark released the breath he'd been holding. "The University Police arrested me. Dr. Bass was worried that Frigman, the university police chief, might try to do something...bad to me. We were going to talk about what to do next." Mark paused. "I-I have some evidence hidden...and Frigman wants it"

"Then why would he want to do something bad to you?"

"I think he just wants to scare me—so he can get his hands on the evidence. You might say it's very incriminating for Dr. Bass...but I saw the murderer. I-I don't think it was Dr. Bass."

"I smell a setup."

Mark did too. He shrugged. "I don't know... Anyway, like I said, Dr. Bass is a couple of hours late for our meeting—that's not like him."

"No, it isn't." Wes hesitated a few seconds. "Okay, Mark. Here's what I want you to do. After you hang up, go straight home—no detours."

"I was going to look for him in the office building here."

"No! Just go home."

"S-sure."

"When you get home, lock the doors—don't open them for anyone. I'm going to hop the next available flight down there. I'll call you when I hit the ground." He huffed loudly. "Mark, I don't know what's going on down there, but my intuition tells me it's some nasty stuff. Let me give you the name and number of an agent at your local office. If you feel threatened by anything before I get there, call him immediately."

"S-sure."

"Ready for the number?"

"Shoot."

Wes rattled off a phone number. "I hate to run, but I've got some calls to make ASAP." The line went dead.

Mark hung up the phone and plopped into Jack's chair, resting his head on his palms and rocking it back and forth. "Damn, I'm ready for this to end!"

(0610, Friday)

A massive headache greeted Jack as his mind slowly emerged from a mental muck. He opened his eyes, only to find they were covered with a blindfold. What the hell? He peeked through a sliver of a gap at the bottom of the blindfold, turning his head this way and that, trying to survey his surroundings. Was he lying in the cargo area of an SUV? When he tried to sit up, he discovered he was bound and gagged.

The vehicle lurched as the driver hit the brakes, slamming Jack against the seatback. The car sped up again, and he rolled all the way back against the tailgate. This pattern repeated several times, interrupted by the car making several sharp turns before screeching to a halt. Are we driving through a damn obstacle course? Smashing against the sides of the vehicle did serve to wake Jack further, though. He sniffed a few times. Was that the smell of the ocean? He craned his neck. And the sound of gulls squawking?

“See anybody?” a man said from the front of the SUV.

“No. Go ahead and back up to the boat, boss. I’ll keep an eye out.”

The SUV backed a short distance and stopped, then two car doors slammed. Jack shook his head to help clear the remaining cobwebs. What the hell is going on?

“Let’s get with it then—I want him on board before somebody shows up!”

The rear cargo door was thrown open. Jack squinted against the blinding light of the rising sun.

“What are you doing awake, tough guy?”

Something cracked Jack sharply on the side of the head, sending him back into black nothingness.

• • • •

(Sixty minutes later)

THE DIN OF LARGE DIESEL engines and the slap of waves against the hull goaded Jack into wakefulness. His head throbbed. Each violent leap of the boat over a wave felt like someone was slapping the side of his head with a cricket bat. Judging by the time between swells, Jack assumed they were a good way from shore. He tested his bonds. Damn! The tightly wrapped cord would not loosen.

“Goddamit! Where am I?” he roared.

No one responded. After several seconds, Jack let his head slump to the floor.

“How the hell did I let myself get into this situation?”

He lay motionless. Was this it? Was this how his life ended? Had he finally used up all the nine lives his friends claimed he had? He rocked his head back and forth on the floor.

“Damn! Not at all what I had in mind when I’ve thought about how I’d leave this world,” he mumbled.

The engines throttled back, and the boat slowed. Footsteps sounded on the flying bridge above the cabin. Who is driving this thing? And why are they slowing? We’ve got to be out in the middle of the ocean somewhere. And more importantly, what was going to happen next? The engines idled for a couple of minutes then cut off. The footsteps up on the flying bridge moved toward the aft main deck. Someone climbed down a metal ladder from above, then the patio door from the aft deck slid open. Jack gazed at the person entering the cabin, his mouth falling open.

(0700, Friday)

Mark was startled by the loud knock at his door. He jumped, spilling coffee onto his lap. His gaze shot to the door.

“Huh?” Wes Watley said he’d call when he landed. Why would he just show up without calling?

A second, harsher knock rattled the doorframe.

“I’m coming, I’m coming,” Mark called out. He opened the door a crack and peeked through, ready to lambast the salesperson he expected to find.

“Mornin’, Quinn,” Frigman said.

Mark groaned then started to inch the door closed. “Hey, Chief Frigman...sorry, but I can’t talk right now. I was just headed out the door for the hospital—I’m running late.”

Frigman shoved his foot into the opening.

“I gotta go.” Mark looked at the Chief’s foot then at his face. “And I can’t get the door closed with your foot there.”

Frigman did not respond, making no effort to move.

“Maybe we can talk later,” Mark stated then tried to close the door again. He sighed. “I really do need to get going.”

Frigman gave Mark a big, goofy smile. “Look, Quinn, I think you and I got off on the wrong foot.”

Orange particles, which looked like the remains of Cheetos, were stuck between Frigman’s teeth. Mark swallowed hard to keep from gagging and averted his gaze. “Yeah—can we talk about it later, though?”

“I’m already here—let’s talk now.” Frigman pushed the door open and bulled past Mark, gazing quickly around the apartment before spinning toward Mark. “I wanted to let you know that I misjudged you.” Frigman paused, wincing. “I’m sorry for the way I’ve treated you.” He swallowed, as if choking on something. “I don’t blame you if you don’t like me...I was hoping an apology might help.”

Mark’s jaw dropped. “I-I beg your pardon, Chief?”

“You heard me, boy—sorry—I mean, Mr. Quinn. I reviewed the facts again and figure I was wrong about you. I’m here to tell you that. And apologize. I’ve also gotten some new information that leads me to believe it was Dr. Bass who killed those lab techs, not you.” His smile appeared strained. “I was hoping you’d be willing to show me that evidence you said you found—I think it would help me nail him.”

Mark gazed at Frigman, his heart racing. “Mr. Conlin told me not to talk to you without him present.”

Frigman scowled. “You don’t need any damn lawyer, kid—I’m on your side. Can you show me that evidence or not?” He looked around again. “Is it here?”

“Why should I trust you now, after all you’ve done to me?”

Frigman’s face turned red, and he tugged at his collar. “Well, uh...I, uh, was only interested in you because of the evidence I had at the time.” He shrugged. “I understand now that you were just an innocent bystander.”

“Okay, Chief.” Mark smiled. “Does this mean you’ll quit harassing me about the lab murders?”

“Sure, kid, sure. Trust me, after you turn the evidence over to me, you’ll never see me again.”

“That’s good to hear. Sounds like this will all be over for me soon.”

“Yes, it will, Mr. Quinn.” Frigman smiled a crooked smile and nodded. “Very soon!”

“And all I have to do is give you the evidence I found?”

“Exactly, kid.”

Mark stroked his chin, struggling to look unworried, though his mind was churning. “Okay. I don’t have it here, though—it’s hidden over at the medical center. Shall we meet over there?”

Frigman frowned then shook his head, his jowls jiggling. “I’ve got a better idea. How about I just drive you over there? That would be better than driving separately.”

Mark shrugged. “Thanks, Chief. That’s very thoughtful of you.” He turned away. “Let me get my things.”

“Well, well, looks like Sleeping Beauty has decided to wake up,” Waymon said sarcastically. He walked over to Jack and slapped his face several times. “Hey, Jack, old buddy—c’mon, wake up.”

Waymon laughed as Jack tried to turn his head away.

Jack thrashed against his restraints. “Waymon! You crazy bastard! What the hell are you doing? Untie me now!” He gazed at his arm. “Why is there an IV in my arm?”

“You kill me with your tough guy act—oops, I got that backwards. I’m going to kill you!” Waymon threw his head back, letting out a loud cackle. “You’re hardly in any position to make demands, Jack. You’ll find out about the IV soon enough. Why don’t you just lie there like a nice boy and keep quiet while I finish preparing?”

“Preparing for what?” Jack yelled.

“I need to find out what you know about...recent events—and who else you told about it. Then I’ll kill you.” He smirked. “That’s what.”

“What events? What’re you talking about, you crazy sonofabitch?”

“I’m talking about our little enterprise.”

Jack cocked his head. “What enterprise?”

“The enterprise that nosy people like Bev and Dale interfered with...and now, you and that Quinn kid, too.”

Jack’s eyebrows shot up. “You’re involved in the deaths of Bev, Dale, and the lab techs?”

“Involved?” Waymon chuckled. “Hell, yes, I’m involved—but none of it would have been necessary if it wasn’t for you meddlers!”

“Meddlers? How were the lab techs meddling?”

“Well...the lab techs were just an unfortunate necessity—nothing really personal against them...”

“You keep saying we all were interfering with something, somehow, but you haven’t said what!” Jack yelled. “Tell me what the hell you’re talking about!” He fought against his bonds.

“Okay, I’ll tell you. It hardly matters now, since you’ll never be talking to anyone again.”

“Let me loose!” Jack bellowed.

Waymon sat on the couch and lounged back against the cushions. “It all started several years ago when I was thinking how tired I was of busting my ass and getting paid squat compared to what I could have been making in private practice.”

“I’m not interested in listening to you whine about money—you got paid plenty!”

Waymon stared blankly at Jack. “Not really—not for the lifestyle I deserved. Anyway, one day when I was sitting at my desk reviewing grant budgets, it dawned on me—every year my department got millions of dollars in research grants. All I had to do was find a way to tap into them and set it aside for my retirement fund.”

“Retirement fund? What are you talking about?”

“Things were going along just fine. I was building a nice little nest egg, and nobody seemed the wiser. I got a couple of partners along the way, and, long story short, we’ve been putting away upwards of a couple million dollars a year for over five years. All tucked away safely in some offshore accounts.” He rubbed his hands together. “Just waiting for us when it’s time to retire.”

“Partners?”

Waymon rolled his eyes. “Yes...unfortunately.” He frowned. “Back to my story, though. That nosy little prick, Dale Wallace, got too curious. I tried to scare him off, but he just wouldn’t take a hint. We decided to shut up Wallace—permanently. Anyway, when Wallace was being clubbed to death one night, he admitted he'd also told Bev Costas about his suspicions.” He shrugged. “So, one thing led to another...”

Waymon hung his head, shaking it.

“Poor Bev. I really hated to do that to her—with her having young kids and all—but, she was too much of a risk.”

“You act as if killing innocent people is like making a menu selection!”

“Well...it is, Jack,” Waymon stated matter-of-factly. “We had a multi-million-dollar enterprise going, and we weren't about to let any pests mess it up. We figured we only had another year or two to go, and we'd have plenty of money to enjoy the type of retirement we deserved.”

“You sick sonofabitch!”

Waymon looked poker-faced at Jack for a few seconds then held up a hand in front of his face and examined his fingernails. “That's when those assholes on the board stuck their noses in and decided I should be replaced as the Chairman of the Anesthesia Department. Can you believe that? My anesthesia department! Just because a couple of department staff members died!”

He snarled like a dog guarding a bone.

“They did agree to let me handle the recruiting for my replacement, though. My partners and I figured we'd just hire some bozo...somebody who wouldn't bother us. Then we'd be able to just get on with business-as-usual.”

“Bozo? Why the hell did you hire me, then?”

Waymon laughed. “Really, Jack? You're exactly the type of clown we were looking for! We figured some Army retiree probably just wanted a nice, comfortable civilian job. Then, during a background check, we discovered you had been thrown out of the Army because of your cowardice over in Iraq, and you had been locked up in a nut ward afterward.” He snickered. “We agreed you'd be the perfect patsy for the job.”

“I'm no patsy!”

“But...you are, Jack. You're nothing but a naïve boy scout.” Waymon leaned his face in close to Jack's. “But then you had to go and start snooping, too!”

Jack lunged his head toward Waymon's but the restraints kept him from reaching his target.

“I still don't understand why you would come after me now if you thought I was such a dunce.”

Waymon opened his eyes wide and leaned back. “You really are thick, aren't you? Our plan had always called for you to be nothing more than an...interim solution. We figured we'd let you become Chairman, then we'd make sure you failed—in some horrendous fashion.” He shrugged. “The board would be forced to recognize the error of their judgment about me and reinstate me as Anesthesia Chairman.”

“Fail? How?”

“Duh! That's where those lab techs came in. It had to be something egregious. Something the board would have to act on immediately.” He gazed blankly at Jack. “So, I killed them and left evidence incriminating you!”

“You killed two innocent women just to set me up?” Jack shook his head hard. “Jesus! I feel like I'm in a damn Twilight Zone episode.”

Waymon held his arms up at his sides in a gesture of innocence. “It was nothing personal against them—they were just convenient targets. Wrong place at the wrong time, as the saying goes.”

Jack wrestled against his bonds. “Waymon, you're friggin' nuts! You're talking about all of this as if it's just some fiction novel. You've killed people and destroyed lives! Stolen millions of dollars meant for medical research. You are an absolute lowlife—right down there with pond scum. You make me want to puke!”

Waymon’s face turned red, the veins in his neck bulging. He slapped Jack hard across the face. “Shut up! How dare you talk to me that way!”

“I’m gonna do more than talk to you when I get loose.”

Waymon’s chest heaved and his eyes bugged out. “Enough of this! I don’t need to explain myself to you. It’s time to get rid of you once and for all!”

“You won’t get away with this.”

“Yes...I will.” Waymon dug in a pocket and pulled out a syringe filled with a milky-looking substance.

“What do you think of the drug, Propofol?” he asked casually.

Jack tried to scoot away from Waymon but twisted his head around to keep an eye on the crazy son-of-a-bitch. “What’re you doing?”

“I think you’ve got a big mouth, and I need to know who else you’ve talked to about this. I think Propofol is way better than pentothal for getting people to talk.” He turned back to Jack, holding the syringe up in front of his face. “I’m going to experiment on you...until you tell me everything you know.”

Jack rocked his head back and forth. “This is a waste of your time,” Jack said “I haven’t talked about this with anyone!”

Waymon threw his head back and laughed. “How valiant of you, Jack. But I already know you and Quinn are in cahoots. I need to know who else you’ve shot off your big mouth to.” He uncapped the needle and jabbed it into the IV connected to Jack’s arm. “We need to clean up all the loose ends.”

“There’s nobody else!”

“I guess we’ll know for sure soon enough.” Waymon injected the cloudy medication, watching hungrily as it flowed into Jack’s arm.

Jack tried to yank his arms loose from the cords tightened around them. No luck. His mind soon descended into a warm fog, like sinking into murky quicksand in a Louisiana swamp.

“Waymon, you bastard, I’m telling you—no one else...knows...anything...” he said, but his voice sounded odd, as if coming from a distance.

Frigman turned the squad car into the main entrance of the medical school campus and slowed. “Where we headed, kid? Where you got this stuff hidden?”

“I’ve got it stashed in the anatomy lab—all locked up,” Mark replied.

“What floor is your lab desk on? What’s the number...and where’s the key?”

“My desk is kind of hard to find. It’ll be easier if I just show you, Chief. I’d probably just get you lost if I gave you directions.” Mark blew out a long sigh. “I’ll just be glad to be rid of the stuff.”

He glanced at Frigman. The big man was looking out his side window. Mark hurriedly wiped the heavy sweat from his forehead.

“Yeah, sure, kid,” Frigman replied distractedly. “Which building?”

Mark pointed. “There. Basic Sciences Building.”

Frigman swerved the squad car, tires screeching as it hopped the curb and skidded to a stop halfway on the sidewalk.

Mark looked over at the cop with a deadpan expression, pointing a finger across the street. “Chief, there’s a parking spot right over there.”

“Don’t sweat it, kid,” he replied, “we’re fine right here. Let’s get going.”

They climbed out of the car and walked to the steps of the building Mark had pointed out. They ascended to the entrance doors, Frigman breathing heavily and resting his hands on his knees as they stopped at the doorway.

“Where’s...the ele...vator?” Frigman spat out between gasps.

“Not sure, Chief, I always take the steps.” He held the door open, waving Frigman through. “After you.”

Frigman gave Mark a nasty look, grumbling something unintelligible under his breath as he shuffled into the lobby. “I’m not taking any damn steps!”

“My lab is on the third floor—I’ll take the steps and meet you there.”

Frigman grabbed Mark’s upper arm and jerked him closer. “No! You’ll ride up in the elevator with me.”

Frigman dragged Mark over to the elevators and jabbed the button then glared at Mark. Mark stared into Frigman’s eyes then looked down at Frigman’s hand that was squeezing his arm.

“Okay...but you don’t need to break my arm.”

Frigman looked at his hand. He smiled awkwardly then released Mark’s arm. “Sorry, kid. Guess I got caught up in the excitement.”

Mark gawked at him. “Uh huh.”

The elevator doors clanked open, and Frigman waved Mark forward. “After you, kid.”

They stood in silence as the elevator whined its way up the shaft. The chief’s shirt was sweat soaked, and Mark wrinkled his nose at the stink inundating the interior of the elevator. He hopped out as soon as the doors opened. Their footsteps echoed in the vacant, cold halls as Mark led Frigman down them, finally halting in front of a set of double doors.

“Here we are.” Mark pushed a door open, releasing a gush of chilled air carrying a sickening scent of formaldehyde.

“Ahh. That’s more like it,” Frigman said, raising his arms out to his sides and smiling. “Why do they keep this place so cold, kid?”

“It’s the anatomy lab. The low temperature helps preserve the bodies.”

“Man, I wish I’d known about this place before. I’m going to make this my satellite office when it’s hot outside.” Frigman wrinkled his nose. “What’s that smell, though?”

“It’s the formaldehyde that the cadavers are stored in.”

“This where you got the stuff hidden?”

“Yeah—my desk is right over there.”

As they walked, Frigman’s gaze darted repeatedly to the rows of stainless-steel coffins that contained cadavers, and he pinched his nostrils.

“I never did tell you what I found...or where I found it,” Mark said.

“I don’t really care.”

Mark shrugged quickly. “Anyway, I found a few things both inside and just outside of the lab.”

“Good! That’s probably just what I’m looking for.” He rested a hand on the butt of his baton.

“I found Dr. Bass’s hospital ID badge near the bodies in the lab. His lab coat was in the alley behind the lab.” Mark stopped, turning to face Frigman when they arrived at Mark’s desk. “Don’t you think that’s weird—that he’d be so sloppy about leaving clues pointing at him?”

“I knew that sonofabitch Bass was involved!”

“But—wait a minute, Chief—I never told you it was Dr. Bass I saw kill those women.”

Frigman hesitated briefly. “Well, uh, look, kid, I been around crime for a long time. Witnesses get excited in a situation like that...make lots of mistakes about what they remember.”

Mark scratched his head. “I’m not really sure he was the killer, though.”

“Yeah, well, maybe you’re wrong about that! If you’ve got Bass’s lab coat and ID badge from the crime scene, that’ll be enough evidence for me to prove he was the killer.”

“I suppose so...” Mark tossed a quick shrug. “Let me get this stuff out of my desk.”

Mark reached under the ledge on the metal cabinets above his desk, fumbling a few seconds then extracting a key. He bent, sliding the key into the lock of a cabinet beneath his desktop.

Frigman quietly slid his baton from his belt and raised it over his head with both hands.

Jack started to awaken as he felt hands grabbing his ankles and wrists, swinging him through the air.

“Good-bye, Jack.” Waymon laughed uproariously. “Have a nice swim.”

Jack tumbled as he sank into the murk, soon becoming disoriented, unsure of the direction of the surface. The few seconds in the water seemed like minutes, his lungs already aching. The saltwater and after-effects of the drug blurred his vision, but he could still see several large fish circling him. The size of them and the shape of their dorsal fin were the unmistakable silhouettes of sharks.

He recalled his SCUBA training and forced back the panic, replacing it with a sense of calm. The words of his instructor echoed in his head. “If you get disoriented about which way is up, just let out a little air and follow the bubbles.” Jack reluctantly let a few bubbles dribble from his lips then watched them crawl up his chest and belly. He immediately righted himself, aiming toward the dim light of the surface. He tried a dolphin kick with his legs. It worked but steering was a struggle.

He chased his bubbles upward and neared the surface, the shadow of the boat bobbing on the waves above him. He turned toward it. As he closed in on the boat, the propeller blades came into sight. Yes! Those might just work. Jack did a couple of big thrusts to close the distance between himself and the propellers, his head smacking against a propeller shaft.

His leg muscles were on fire! His lungs felt as if they held burning embers. It was taking unimaginable willpower to not open his mouth and take in a deep breath. He twisted, turning his back to the propeller blades, fighting to maintain a position where he could hold his bound hands against the sharp edge. He sawed feverishly, a deepening grayness creeping into his vision as his brain began closing down from lack of oxygen. Jack kicked at the water to push harder against the sharp metal, shooting quick peeks over his shoulder.

The starter motors for the boat’s diesel engines began to grind. He shook his head hard. No! Once the motors fired up, it would likely be mere seconds before the propellers were engaged. They would tear him apart. He sawed even more furiously at his bonds, his vision now little more than a fuzzy, dark tunnel. Despite his limited vision, he still sensed large shadows circling closer in the water. Something cold and scratchy brushed against him, and a large fin slapped against his head.

Mark watched Frigman's reflection in the glass of a picture sitting on his desk. Mark's gaze darted between the picture and the drawer he was rummaging in for a blood-spattered lab coat. He pulled on the jacket, but it snagged on a screw, and he became distracted with untangling it. There was a rustling of clothing and leather behind him. His gaze shot back to the picture frame. His eyes shot wide when he saw Frigman with his baton raised above his head. Mark sprang aside as Frigman's baton smashed into the desktop with a loud crack right where Mark's head had been.

"Goddamit!" Frigman yelled loudly, raising his baton above his head again. "Hold still, you little shit!"

Mark leaped from his squatting position onto the top of the nearby lab table that separated his desk from the next row of desks, rolling rapidly across. He stood on the far side of the wide lab table, glaring at Frigman.

"I figured as much!"

Frigman stood red-faced and panting, wagging his baton at Mark. "You're only delaying the inevitable. Just stand still and take it like a man."

"Screw off, you fat ass! I grew up being bullied by jackasses like you!" He jabbed a finger at Frigman. "And I'm sick of it! Sick of listening to your stupid bullshit!"

"Fat ass?" Frigman shrieked in a voice that sounded like air squeaking from a balloon. "How dare you call me that!" He pointed the baton at Mark. "That just cost you, boy. I was going to kill you quick, but now I'm going to hurt you real bad before I let you die. Let you die a slow, painful death." He jabbed a finger at the lab coat hanging out of the drawer. "I've got the evidence I was looking for, so I don't need you anymore."

"You don't have any evidence—that's my lab coat!" Mark yelled back. "Dumbass! You really think I would trust you—that I'm that stupid and gullible?" Mark pointed at the coat. "Go ahead. Pick it up...look at the name on it!"

Frigman shot Mark a hateful look, quickly glanced at the lab coat then back at Mark. "If you try anything while I check it, I'll beat you silly."

"Yeah, whatever..."

Frigman grunted as he bent, yanking the lab coat from the cabinet then holding it up and turning it around. He stared at Mark's ID badge that was clipped to the lapel then growled. "But...it's covered in blood..." he muttered uncertainly.

"It's my dog-lab coat. Of course, it's covered in blood—dog blood!"

Frigman hurled the lab coat to the floor. "You think you're so damned smart, you little twit—well, it doesn't matter. I don't really need that crap anyway because if you're dead, you can't tell anybody about what you saw." He stepped toward Mark. "So, I'm going to kill you!"

"Gotta catch me first...Chief Wiggam!"

Frigman shrieked like a banshee then lunged across the lab table, swinging his baton wildly. Mark easily jumped out of reach, the baton cracking loudly as it hit the cold, hard marble tabletop.

"Dammit, boy, hold still! I'm not playing games with you!" Frigman waddled around the end of the lab table, like a duck rushing across a busy street.

As Frigman came around the end, Mark rolled across the table to the opposite side. He stood opposite Frigman, sneering at the red-faced cop.

Mark waved Frigman forward. "C'mon—come and get me. Teach me that lesson!"

“Why, you little...!” Frigman reversed direction, trundling back around the table again.

Again, Mark rolled across the tabletop, laughing as he faced Frigman. The cop stood, leaning on the table, gasping. Mark leaped out into the center aisle that ran the length of the room.

“C’mon, Chief, I’ll move out here and make it easier for you.” He waved an arm at Frigman then pointed at the floor in front of himself. “See—nothing between us.”

Frigman leaned on the corner of the lab table, breathing heavily as he scowled at Mark. “I don’t really need to beat you to death.” He reached for his pistol.

Mark dove at Frigman, using a move he'd learned in Krav Maga, smashing a fist against Frigman's forearm and sending the pistol flying. Mark landed on the floor, rolled, then stood and turned to face Frigman.

"Now what you gonna do, lard-ass?"

Frigman rubbed his forearm, yelled, and charged Mark like a linebacker, his head down, arms spread wide. Mark hopped aside. Frigman snarled and spun, immediately stampeding toward him again. As Frigman neared him, Mark deftly stepped to the side, grabbed Frigman's wrist, and reached with his other hand to push on the back of Frigman's shoulder. The movement sent Frigman flying forward, spinning wildly. He lost his balance and smashed into a set of cabinets then slumped to the floor. He gulped in air, his face crimson, his neck veins bulging.

"You think this kung-fu shit is going to save your ass, boy?"

"Yes, Chief. I do."

Frigman groped at the cabinet, struggling to pull himself to his feet. He stepped toward Mark, tiredly swinging a fist at Mark's head. Mark ducked under the blow, spun, and swept his leg across the back of Frigman's knees. The big man crumpled, collapsing to the floor with a thunderous crash that rattled the nearby cabinets. Frigman didn't try to rise, his chest heaving as he guzzled breaths of air, his eyes bulging as he glared at Mark.

"Not so tough when you're not beating up on some defenseless woman or man, eh, Chief? Have you had enough...or do you still want to show me how tough you are?"

Frigman lay on the floor then nodded. "You're right—I'm beaten."

Mark stepped closer and stabbed a finger at Frigman. "Damn straight, you are!"

Frigman waved Mark closer. "At least help me up."

Mark hesitated then slowly stepped forward and held out a hand. Suddenly, Frigman lunged, wrapping his forearms around Mark's calves.

"We'll see who has the last laugh, boy!" Frigman threw a shoulder against Mark's knees.

Mark tipped like a tree being felled. Frigman cackled like an old witch as he scrambled up over Mark.

Misty Carrel dove from the shadows of nearby cabinets, swinging an aluminum baseball bat. The bat pinged as it connected with Frigman's head. The big man slumped onto Mark, and Mark quickly shoved him off. The cop lay on the floor, motionless. Mark stared at the bat in Misty's hands then looked into her eyes.

Misty shrugged. "When you called me just before you came over here, I thought you might need a backup plan."

Mark nodded at the bat. "And that was it?"

"I was on the softball team back in college—had a pretty good swing back in the day. I thought it would come in handy if you needed help."

Mark shook his head. "I asked you to get some help, not come yourself."

"I didn't know who I could get on such short notice. I wasn't going to risk letting you get hurt or killed, so...I just came myself. You were doing pretty well with those karate moves." She shook her head and snorted. "I can't believe you fell for that old trick of him asking you to help him up."

Mark shrugged. "I guess my brain just doesn't work in those devious ways."

Misty smiled. "I guess that's a good trait for a doctor." She threw the bat aside and jumped at him, throwing her arms around him and burying her face in his chest. "Mark, I was so scared when you called—I couldn't bear the thought of losing the man I've fallen in love with."

Mark gawked at Misty, his mouth falling open. "What did you say?"

Misty looked up at him, smiling broadly. "I said I love you." She snickered. "But don't tell anyone I'm in love with a lowly medical student—it could ruin my reputation."

Mark laughed and pulled her tightly against him. "I've loved you for some time, Misty. I was afraid to tell you, though. I-I thought you'd never fall for a guy like me—you know, not a nickel to my name."

"Quit it! Don't give me that 'guy like me' crap."

Mark shook his head hard and pushed back from Misty. "Damn, I wish I coulda recorded what just happened," he muttered.

Misty stepped back and smiled, holding up her phone. "I'm a step ahead of you."

Mark chuckled. "As usual."

"But I don't know how good it is—I couldn't get very close to you two. Let's take a listen."

Frigman began moaning. Misty and Mark spun toward him.

"First, we need to find something to tie him up," Mark said.

Mark strode over to where Frigman's gun lay on the floor, picked it up, and put it in his pocket. He and Misty then searched for something to secure Frigman.

"Bingo!" Misty yelled, pulling an electrical cord from a cabinet.

She and Mark rushed to wrap the cord around Frigman's ankles then struggled to roll him onto his stomach so they could tie his wrists together behind his back. Frigman started to groan more loudly, squirming as Misty and Mark rushed to secure him. After they had trussed him, Mark pulled out a hanky and used it as a gag over Frigman's mouth.

"Okay, Misty. Let's listen to that recording and see what we've got."

"Keep your fingers crossed," Misty said tentatively then pressed the play button.

The voices were somewhat garbled amongst all the background noise, but Mark could just make out the words.

"Goddamit, kid, hold still! You're only delaying the inevitable, so just stand and take it like a man."

He stopped the recording and smiled at Misty. "That's great! Let's see what else we've got."

"Look, you little shit, you think you're so damned smart—well, it doesn't matter. I don't really need that crap anyway because if you're dead, you can't tell anybody about it. Either way, I'm going to kill you!"

"Yes!" Mark shouted, pumping a fist in the air. "You got everything I was hoping for. It may not be the best quality in the world, but I'm sure Wes Watley can have somebody at the FBI clean it up."

They exchanged a high five.

"Speaking of Wes, we should probably give him a call and let him know what's happened." Mark quickly punched in Wes's number.

"Special Agent Watley."

"Hi, Agent Watley...it's Mark Quinn."

"Where the hell are you, Mark? I've called you several times since I arrived. I'm at your apartment...and you're not. I instructed you to stay here! What's up?"

"Uh...sorry about that—I kinda screwed up. Chief Frigman came to my apartment. He brought me down here to the school to get the evidence I had hidden—"

“What?” Wes quickly interjected. “Where are you now? Is Frigman still with you? Tell me what’s going on, Mark!”

“Frigman surprised me at my apartment—made me come with him down to the medical school.” He sighed. “I’d told him I had the evidence hidden here.”

“Not too smart!”

“Yeah...I suppose not...” Mark mumbled. “Let me fill you in.”

Mark relayed the events that had taken place, finishing with the part about the recording he and Misty had just listened to.

“Mark, you’re damned lucky! No wonder you and Jack get along—you two are birds of a feather. From now on, though, do exactly as I tell you.”

“Yes, sir. I’m sorry. Trust me, I wasn’t trying to be a hero.”

“What’s important is you’re not hurt. You sure you’ve got Frigman secured well enough?”

“I don’t think he’s going anywhere,” Mark replied, quickly glancing at Frigman.

The big man was wriggling on the floor like a beached whale.

“All right, Mark. This is what I want you to do...”

After a couple of minutes, Mark disconnected. “He wants us to lock up this lab until he gets here, but he’s not sure how long it will take him. He’s got a bigger problem.” Mark blew out a long breath and rubbed the back of his neck. “Nobody seems to know where Dr. Bass is.”

Misty and Mark locked the dead bolts on the lab doors then stood staring at Frigman. Mark squatted down in front of him.

“Chief, the FBI is on their way here, so you may as well cooperate.”

Frigman’s eyebrows shot up then he nodded.

Mark ripped the gag from Frigman’s mouth. “Where’s Dr. Bass?”

“Look, kid, you’re in big trouble for doing this to a police officer! When I get loose, I’m going to hurt you so bad before I kill you.” He nodded toward Misty. “And the little bitch, too!”

Mark rolled his eyes and looked up at Misty. “Misty, why don’t you play back that audio?”

Frigman’s gaze darted to Misty.

“Gladly.” She smiled and pulled out her phone.

“You little shit, you think you’re so damned smart—well, it doesn’t matter. I don’t really need that crap anyway because if you’re dead you can’t tell anybody about it. Either way, I’m going to kill you!”

Frigman hesitated. “Big deal. I-I don’t care about that crap. I’ll just get rid of the phone, too.” He gawked at Misty and winked. “After I have a little fun with her.”

Misty threw the phone at Frigman, bouncing it off his head.

“You just don’t get it, do you? You ignorant, disgusting swine—you’re caught! You’re going down! We know you’ve killed people, and we have a recording of you threatening to kill Mark. What kind of fantasy-land do you live in?” She shook her head, smacking a palm against her forehead. “You’re not going to get loose, you’re not going to hurt us, and you sure as hell won’t ever lay a hand on me, you...you...disgusting slob!” She spun away, shaking her clenched fists in the air as she growled.

Mark looked at Misty then back at Frigman. “I’d say Dr. Carrel has pretty much laid out the current reality for you. An FBI agent will be here any minute, and we’re going to give him the recording and the other evidence we have. You’re going to jail—probably death row. I hear cons really hate ex-cops in jail, so I doubt you’ll even live long enough to get executed.”

Frigman’s lips trembled then he jutted his chins. “Piss off!”

“Why don’t you just tell us if you know where Dr. Bass is? If you don’t, I might just let Dr. Carrel borrow my dog-lab scalpel and let her practice her surgical technique for castration.”

Misty quickly spun around, a big smile on her face. “Oh, yeah! I like that idea, Mark!” She held out her hands and wiggled her fingers. “Where’s your scalpel? Give it to me.”

Frigman pressed his thighs together, sweating and blinking rapidly as he shot glances between Mark and Misty. His lower lip trembled again.

“Keep her away from me!” he blurted. “I’ll tell you, but...I-I want to cut a deal!”

Mark threw his head back and burst out laughing. “Oh, that’s sweet.” Mark shook his head. “This isn’t some goddam TV show, you moron. And I’m not a DA or a cop. The only deal I might be able to offer is to convince Dr. Carrel not to show you her skills with a scalpel.”

Frigman glanced at them again then set his jaw.

“Go to hell—both of you! I’m not telling you a damn thing. I’ll just wait to see if anyone from the FBI actually shows up. If they do, I’ll make my deal with them.”

“I thought you might feel that way,” Mark replied flatly. He walked over and leaned close to Misty and pointed at a body hoist in the corner of the lab. The hoist had a large sling attached that was used to transfer cadavers in and out of the stainless-steel coffins. "I think if we lifted him on a transfer hoist and positioned him over an open coffin, he might be more cooperative," he whispered in her ear. "Maybe threaten to drop him into one."

She shrugged and nodded. "It's worth a try, I guess."

"We need to secure you better." Mark pointed at a stainless-steel coffin. "We're going to put you in one of the cadaver tanks. Unfortunately, they are all filled with that nasty-smelling formaldehyde you asked about earlier." Mark smirked at Frigman. "I hope the smell won't bother you too much. Don't worry, though, it will wash off after a few months."

"What the hell are you talking about, boy? You're not sticking me anywhere!" Frigman's gaze darted to the rows of stainless-steel coffins. "Besides, there's no way you and the little bitch can lift a stout man like me up into one of those things!"

"Oh, but we can, Chief." Mark turned to Misty. "Dr. Carrel, would you do the honors, please?"

"Gladly," she replied, a big smile on her face.

Misty pushed the hoist near Frigman, then she and Mark unhooked the large canvas body hammock, spreading it on the floor next to Frigman.

"Get that thing away from me, you two crazy bastards! You can't do this to me! I-I'm the chief of police, for chrissake!" He squirmed wildly. After a few minutes, Frigman lay still, his chest heaving. "You...can't...do...this to me..." he gasped feebly.

"Chief, we're going to roll you onto this lift hammock. Once we start lifting you up, you might not want to thrash around like that. I don't know what the weight limit is on this thing—I'd hate to see it break while you're in the air. If that happened, you might have a nasty drop to the ground. Probably break some bones," Mark said.

Misty and Mark rolled him onto the hammock, struggling to position him so they could hook the hammock back onto the hoist. Mark pressed down on the hydraulic piston lever to lift the hammock, standing on his tiptoes in order to apply all his body weight. It hissed and squealed loudly but barely moved. Misty stepped up and added her weight to the effort, and the entire apparatus creaked as the hammock inched off the ground. They eventually lifted Frigman high enough to clear the side of a cadaver tank, resting as they watched Frigman swaying in the hammock, the hoist creaking like an old oak tree in a windstorm.

"I'm sure you can hear this thing squeaking, Chief. Just remember, if you move around too much, you'll probably break it...and drop like a sack of rocks."

Frigman eyes bugged out as he stared at Mark. "You can't do this to me. Put me down!" he snarled.

"Will you tell us where Dr. Bass is?"

Frigman shook his head gently. "Go to hell, punk! Put me down first."

"Have it your way, Chief."

They rolled the hoist near an empty cadaver coffin. Mark opened the hinged cover, letting it fall against the side of the tank with a loud bang. A sudden gush of the nauseating smell of formaldehyde oozed from the container.

"Whew!" Mark backed away, fanning the air in front of his face. "I don't miss that smell."

Misty and Mark positioned Frigman over the open container then backed a few feet away.

"Last chance, Chief, or...in you go," Mark stated flatly.

Frigman wrinkled his nose. "Go to hell, boy. Y-you don't have the balls."

Before Mark could respond, Misty jumped forward and slapped the release lever. "I do!"

The hydraulic piston screeched as it released. Frigman crashed and bounced against the sides of the tank as he dropped, his body wedging into the cold, smelly confines.

“You little bitch!” Frigman screamed as he slowly sank farther into the coffin. “Get me the hell outta this thing—now!” Frigman squirmed, each wiggle lodging him farther down in the steel coffin, the smelly chemical creeping higher onto his plump jowls. He rocked his head violently from side to side, causing the fluid to splash onto his face. “Okay! Okay! I’ll talk. Just get me out of here!”

Mark glanced at Misty. She made no movement toward the hoist lever. Mark stepped over and closed the release valve on the hydraulic piston.

The formaldehyde lapped gently at the corners of Frigman’s mouth as he labored to lift his head above the fluid. “Get me out of here!” he screamed between coughs and gags.

“Are you going to tell us where Dr. Bass is?” Misty asked, scowling.

Frigman glared at them, his face contorted with a mixed expression of hatred and fear.

“Yeah, fine!” Frigman snickered. “Not that it matters—it’s already too late for him. He’s fish bait by now.”

Misty and Mark exchanged a quick glance.

“What?” they chimed in unison.

“Yeah, that’s right, you two idiots. Your big hero is already dead! He got taken for a little boat ride earlier this morning. I’m sure Bass is giving some shark indigestion as we speak.” Frigman’s fiendish laugh echoed eerily out of the casket.

Misty’s and Mark’s mouths hung open as they looked at each other.

“What the hell are you talking about?” Mark asked.

“That’s all I’m telling you,” Frigman responded with a tone of determined toughness. “I ain’t talking to anybody until I get a lawyer...and they’re going to hear about how you’ve treated an officer of the law!”

“All right, Chief. A deal’s a deal,” Mark replied. He knew better than to trust this guy but...he had to give this a try.

Mark leaned his weight on the lever of the hydraulic piston but was unable to budge it. He looked at Misty, but she just stood there glaring at Frigman.

“Um, Misty, I could use some help.”

She looked blankly at Mark for a few seconds then moved next to him. “I was just debating whether we should just close the lid and leave.”

Frigman shot a concerned, pleading look at Mark.

“He called me a bitch, implied he wanted to rape me, tried to kill you...and told us he helped kill Dr. Bass. Why not just leave him?”

Mark stared at her. Was she serious? He leaned close to her. “Misty, I don’t know if you’re kidding or not, but...we can’t do that. It would make us like him, and I don’t want to become that kind of person,” he whispered.

She shrugged then stepped forward, putting her hands on the lift lever then turning to Mark. “Ready?”

They put their full weight on the handle but were barely able to push it. Frigman was wedged so tightly in the steel coffin, they couldn’t break him loose. By the time they abandoned the effort, they’d only been able to raise him enough that the formaldehyde no longer lapped onto his lips.

Mark peered over the metal edge of the box, gazing down at Frigman. “I guess that’s the best we can do for now,” Mark said. “I just hope this lift doesn’t break and drop you farther down in there.”

There'd be nothing we could do to lift you back out if that happened." Mark held his hands up at his sides. "I wouldn't move around much if I was you."

"FBI! This is Agent Watley! Mark, open the door."

Misty and Mark startled. Frigman closed his eyes, groaning.

Mark smiled, heaving a loud sigh as he moved toward the door. "Be right there, Agent Watley."

Mark rushed to unlock the door. Wes Watley was standing just to the side, his gun held at the ready, and another agent was stationed at the other side of the doorway, gun drawn.

"You okay, Mark?"

"Yeah, I'm fine, sir. C'mon in."

Wes stepped in, holding his pistol out in front of him, then turned to Mark. "Where's Frigman?"

"Right over here." Mark pointed at where Misty stood next to the cadaver tank.

Watley's eyes opened wide as he neared the storage tank and saw Frigman wedged down inside it. He arched an eyebrow as he looked at Misty then Mark.

"Long story, sir," Mark replied sheepishly then turned to Misty. "Let me introduce you to Dr. Misty Carrel, a surgery intern here at the medical center."

Wes shook Misty's hand. "Nice to meet you, Dr. Carrel."

"Chief Frigman just told us that Dr. Bass is probably already dead. Said his body was dumped out at sea," Misty rattled off.

Wes stepped up to the tank. "For your sake, Frigman, you better be wrong about Jack Bass. I'll be your worst nightmare if Jack is dead," he growled.

"Just get me out of this thing!" Frigman whined, turning his face away from Wes.

Wes leaned down close to Frigman. "You're not going anywhere until you tell me specifically where Jack Bass is—and you'd better be fast about it!"

Frigman's lower lip began trembling. "I want a deal," he mumbled feebly.

"The only deal I'll make is that I won't kill you right here and now...if you tell me where Jack is."

The cords binding Jack's wrists gave way with a snap.
Finally!

Jack pushed off from the propeller shaft toward the stern of the boat. A sudden gush of water flowed past him as the propellers engaged. He clawed along the bottom of the boat, battling a darkening mental haze. He twisted his head wildly, fighting with all his strength not to suck in a mouthful of water. God, how his lungs burned! His fingers touched the cold metal of the ladder at the rear of the boat. Air blasted from his mouth. Jack used his last ounces of strength to pull himself toward the surface. His face broke free of the surface, and he sucked in a huge breath. Saltwater mixed with the air and sent him into a coughing fit. He coughed so hard he nearly lost his grip on the ladder but held on, his arms shaking.

The boat picked up speed, the foamy torrent ripping at him. His fingers slipped on the wet rung, and he was drug down a step farther into the sea. He crooked an elbow around the ladder, his hands too weak to maintain a grip. Do or die time, Bass! He forced himself to put a hand on the next higher rung, the effort exhausting him. One more! He pulled himself up, one slippery rung at a time, finally freeing himself from the water's deadly grasp. He clung to the ladder, his entire body shaking from both exhaustion and the cold breeze streaming over him. He gulped in deep breaths, trying to recover some strength and gather his thoughts.

He didn't have the stamina to continue hanging from the ladder on which he was precariously perched. Already, his legs had begun to cramp from the awkward position. He needed to get into the boat, though he knew that meant he'd likely bump into Waymon. I hope he's not armed with anything more than that stupid syringe! Jack had to be smart, using the only advantage he had—surprise.

He edged his eyes above the rim of the gunwale, quickly surveying the aft deck. He didn't see anyone. That fishing "fighter's chair" near the rear of the deck could give me some cover. Jack clambered up the ladder and flopped over the gunwale, landing on the deck with a wet smack. His arms shook wildly, barely able to support him as he crawled to a spot behind the fishing chair.

Jack sat there for several minutes, rubbing the cramps out of his legs, energy slowly returning to his body. His face flushed hot and his pulse began to pound in his temples.

"Lousy son-of-a-bitch!" he whispered. "Time for a little payback."

He clambered to his knees, stealing a quick glance around the cushion of the chair. He still couldn't see Waymon, but music and horrendous singing came from up on the flying bridge. Jack spotted a gaffing hook stowed in its rack on the side gunwale. He shrugged. What the hell? It's better than nothing. He grunted. Although they say never bring a gaffing hook to a gun party.

Jack snatched the metal pole and crept up the ladder like a cat stalking prey, pausing with his head just below the edge of the upper deck. I hope he's preoccupied with piloting the boat. His heart sledgehammered against his ribs. He took a deep breath then inched his eyes just above the edge of the deck. Waymon was at the helm, his hands on the wheel, singing loudly along with the blaring radio. Jack let out a quiet sigh.

He climbed onto the flying bridge deck on his hands and knees then slowly stood, tightening his grasp on the metal pole. The boat hit a large swell, and Jack lost his balance, the gaffing hook clanging against a metal railing as he fought to regain his footing. Waymon spun, his eyes shooting wide as he spotted Jack.

“You just won’t stop making a nuisance of yourself, will you, Bass?” he yelled over the noise of the wind and boat. “I should’ve just overdosed you then thrown you over the side.”

Waymon whirled toward the control console, reaching for the gun that sat atop it. Jack had seen the gun and anticipated the move. He charged forward, swinging the long gaffing hook. Waymon grabbed the pistol and swung it in Jack’s direction, but the gaffing hook smashed against the pistol and sent it flying. The gun skittered across the deck until it smacked against the bottom of a railing. Waymon’s mouth hung open, and his gaze darted between Jack and the pistol.

“Yeah, Lamar, I guess you should have,” Jack growled.

Waymon jumped forward, grabbing the end of the gaffing hook, yanking it from Jack’s hands. The long metal pole banged to the deck between them, and Waymon dove for it. Jack sprang forward, putting both of his feet firmly atop the pole, pinning it to the deck. Waymon tugged at it a few times then gave up and stood, backing slowly away from Jack.

“Well, I guess it’s a stalemate—now what?”

“Stalemate, my ass!” Jack motioned to an empty corner of the deck area. “Move over there and kneel on the floor with your back to me.” Jack snatched up the shaft.

“No!”

“Then I’ll just have to kick the ever-loving crap out of you where you are!”

Waymon held his hands up in front of himself, palms out. “All right, Jack—no need to go postal on me!”

Once again, a large swell rolled under the boat, forcing Jack to throw a hand on the railing to steady himself. Waymon launched himself at Jack, but Jack slapped him away with the gaffing hook.

“Too many years of sitting on your ass at a desk, Lamar.”

Waymon sprang once more at Jack, but he sidestepped and twirled to deliver a crushing blow with his elbow to Waymon’s flank, driving him to his hands and knees.

“I, on the other hand, have had years of self-defense training in the Army and have stayed in shape.” Jack waved him forward with both hands. “C’mon—jump at me again. I can keep this up all day. Your kidneys are going to get really sore, though.”

Waymon crouched, backing against the pilot’s control panel, his lips trembling. “Why are you doing all this, Jack?” he yelled. “Are you trying to make up for being such a coward over in Iraq?” He stabbed a finger at Jack. “Why couldn’t you just hide in a closet here like you did over there?” He squinted at Jack and smirked. “It’s that dumb bitch nurse you got killed, isn’t it? Doing all this isn’t going to bring her back from the dead, you know!”

Jack saw red, a hot flush running over his whole body. He leaped toward Waymon, cupping a hand and smashing it against one of Waymon’s ears. Waymon screamed, throwing both hands over the ear.

“Her name was Major Lori Darden!” Jack yelled, his eyes bulging, spittle flying from his lips. “And if you bad-mouth her again, I’ll throw your ass over the side of this boat with an anchor around your neck!” Jack shoved Waymon down, pinning him to the deck with a knee, then leaned down, putting his face close to Waymon’s. “I’m also fed up with your references about me being a coward in Iraq.” He jammed a finger against Waymon’s nose, mashing it flat. “From what I’ve seen of all the bullshit you’ve been putting into research grant requests, you ought to understand that you can’t always believe everything you read.”

Jack glared at him, panting, then lifted his knee from Waymon and reached to retrieve the gaffing hook. Waymon drove both legs into Jack’s stomach then rolled and dove for the gun. Waymon scrabbled to the pistol, snatching it up and standing as he twisted toward Jack. Jack gripped the gaffing hook like a baseball bat and swung it with all his strength. The metal pole connected with the side of Waymon's head with a rack. Waymon flew over the rear railing, landing on the deck below with a loud thud. Jack peeked over the edge of the railing. Waymon lay sprawled on the lower deck, unmoving. A crimson pool of blood was spreading on the deck beneath the large gash on the side of his head.

Jack took a deep breath and blew it out slowly. "I warned you, Lamar." He picked up the pistol, safed it, and tucked it in the waistband at the small of his back. He slumped to the deck, wiping the sweat from his forehead with a shirtsleeve, breathing heavily. After a couple of minutes, he crawled to his feet.

"No time to relax, Bass," he muttered. He had to get Waymon secured then warn Mark and Janice. Then somehow, he had to get the boat to shore. He stood on shaky legs, moving unsteadily toward the ladder, smiling when he saw a coil of mooring rope hanging on a hook next to it.

"Excellent! Just what I needed."

Jack finished wrapping the last few loops of rope around Waymon's chest, cinching them so tightly that Waymon grunted. Jack didn't know what he'd told Waymon when Waymon had drugged him. He needed to call Janice and warn her that Frigman might be after her. Jack just hoped he wasn't too late. Jack's gaze shot to the cockpit helm station. Can I get a call patched through on the ship-to-shore radio? He'd need to rouse Waymon...get his assistance. Jack looked around the cabin, quickly spotting a refrigerator. He stepped to it and yanked it open, smiling when he saw a bottle of water. He snatched it up, unscrewed the lid, and splashed water onto Waymon's face.

"Time to wake up, Lamar."

Waymon's eyelids fluttered. Jack slapped his face again. After a few seconds, Waymon's eyes crept open. Immediately, he began struggling against the ropes.

"Untie me, Bass!"

Jack chuckled. "Yeah, sure—just like you did for me when the shoe was on the other foot." Jack pointed at the radio. "I need you to tell me how to work the ship-to-shore radio. I want to patch through for a phone call."

Waymon remained silent for a few seconds, his gaze searching Jack's face. "What makes you think I'll cooperate?"

Jack reached behind his back and pulled the gun from his waistband.

"I don't have time to play games...and even less interest in doing so." Jack looked Waymon squarely in the eye. "You need to understand something. If you don't cooperate, I'll start using this thing on you...the first couple of rounds will be into your kneecaps. Then I work my way up." He drew the slide back and let it slam closed. "Don't cooperate and you'll be singing soprano by the time I'm done."

Waymon crossed his legs. "Bullshit! You don't have the balls—so save the tough-guy act!"

Jack pointed the gun at Waymon's head and fired. The bullet nicked Waymon's ear then burrowed into the deck, spraying splinters of fiberglass against the side of his head. Waymon's eyes shot wide, and he screamed. Jack dropped to his knees, straddling Waymon, then leaned down, nose pressed against Waymon's.

"You don't know shit about me!" Jack pulled his face back. "As much as I hate to say it, I've seen and done things I'd rather not have to remember." He again leaned his face closer to Waymon's. "What you need to know—right now—this moment, is that I'll do anything to protect the people I care about. Anything! Just like I did in Iraq."

Waymon rubbed his bleeding ear against his shoulder. "You're crazy!"

"So I've been told," Jack replied flatly. He twisted and mashed the barrel tip against Waymon's knee. "I need you to tell me how to do ship-to-shore communication. Now!"

Waymon's face blanched white, and his lips trembled, his gaze glued on Jack's face. He nodded.

"What's the matter, Lamar? Don't like being in fear for your life?" Jack turned back, waving the gun in Waymon's face. "Just imagine how poor Bev Costas felt when you and Frigman held her down and gave her a lethal narcotics overdose. Do you think she was scared...concerned about her young kids? And Dale Wallace when Frigman clubbed him to death—do you think his last thoughts about why his trying to do the right thing was going to cost his children their father?"

"D-don't do anything r-rash, Bass."

Jack laughed. "With the mood I'm in that may be difficult."

Waymon's eyebrows shot up. His lips twisted, but no words came out.

Jack drew the hammer back on the pistol then turned, again pressing it against Waymon's kneecap. "Last chance."

"Okay! I'll tell you!" In a quivering voice, he explained how to get patched through to a regular landline phone.

Jack scurried up to the flying bridge and snatched the radio handset from its hook. God, he hoped Janice was okay! Jack thumped his foot on the deck as he waited several minutes for the call to process. A phone rang, and he tightened his grip on the handset.

"Hello."

He jumped into the air and pumped his fist. "Janice! Thank God!"

"Jack! Where are you? We've been looking everywhere." She took a deep breath. "Are you okay?"

Jack sighed and nodded. "I'm fine...now that I know you're okay. Look, I don't have a lot of time to talk—I just needed to make sure you weren't hurt...and warn you about Frigman. I think he's on his way to your place. Don't let him near you—he's up to no good!"

"Jack, wh-what do you mean?"

"I mean as soon as you hang up, lock all your doors and close your shades. Turn off all your interior lights. Call 9-1-1. Don't open the door for anyone until the city police arrive." He paused a few seconds. "Do you have a gun?"

"Yes, my husband had one."

"Know how to use it?"

"Y-yes. He taught me."

"You got bullets for it?"

"I think so..."

"Good—get it, load it, and keep it with you at all times. If Frigman gets in your house somehow, shoot first and ask questions later. Give him any benefit of the doubt and you'll be dead!" He sighed. "If that happened...I-I could never forgive myself."

"I'll take care of myself," she said firmly. "What about you?"

"Don't worry about me. Talk to you later."

"Jack—"

He disconnected then hurriedly called Mark Quinn. Jack paced the deck as he waited for the call to go through. "C'mon, c'mon!"

A phone started to ring.

"H-hello?" Mark answered.

"Mark! Are you okay? Where are you?"

"Dr. Bass?"

"Yeah. Are you okay?"

"Yeah—I'm fine. We've been scared to death about you, though! Chief Wiggam told us you were dead. Where the heck are you?"

"Let me talk to him," a man in the background said. There was rustling on the line. "Jack, it's Wes. You all right?"

"Yeah, I am now—rotten bastards damn near killed me, though!" He paused a few seconds. "Glad you're in town."

"Just got in. After Mr. Quinn called me yesterday about you disappearing, I figured it was time to get down here. I'm in a car now with him and Dr. Carrel."

“Great! I’m out on the ocean somewhere—not a clue where. Lamar Waymon is on board with me.”

“Is he...subdued?”

“Yes. He’s trussed up like a rodeo steer.”

“Good man, Jack! Frigman just told us about their plans for you on that boat ride. Are you safe now?”

Jack snorted. “Safe? I don’t know about that...but I’m still alive.”

“I swear, Jack, the spots you get into...and out of!”

“You and Mark both said Frigman told you stuff. Where is the fat bastard?”

Wes laughed. “He’d tried to trick Mark into giving him the evidence Mark found the night of the lab murders—then tried to kill Mark. Mr. Quinn and Dr. Carrel kicked his ass. I’ll give you the details later.”

“Mark and Misty are okay?”

“Yep, and Frigman spilled his guts—I know all about what he’s been up to. Right now, he’s headed to a jail cell.” Wes snorted. “Dumbass thinks he’s going to get a plea deal because he’s a cop.”

“I need you to check on somebody right away. Her name is Janice Dwyer.”

“Tell me about her. Who is she? How’s she involved?”

“She’s a nurse who works in the OR with me. I-I’ve been seeing her some after work.”

“Good, Jack! I’m glad to hear you’re getting back out there...after Lori, I mean.”

“Yeah...we can talk about that later, too. Anyway, she helped me figure this mess out and knows most of the details—even some from before I started working at the medical center. I think Frigman was planning on killing her. I just talked to her, and she’s okay, but she could still be at risk. I’m worried there may be conspirators we don’t know about who are involved in this ploy.”

“Who?”

“I don’t know—not even sure there is anyone else. I’m just worried about her. I told her to call 9-1-1, but if I give you her number, would you give her a call—reassure her?”

“Sure, Jack, will do. Right now, we’re on our way down to some marina that Frigman told us about. Gulf Coastal Marina is the name of it. It’s apparently where that boat you’re on has a berth. Think you can get the boat back there?”

“Not on my own, and I may have a hard time convincing Waymon to help me. It could be a while before I get there.”

“All right. Want us to bring Janice down with us?”

“Hell, yes! That’d be great. I’d feel a hell of a lot better if I knew she was with you. I gotta go. Bye.” Jack hung the radio set in its bracket and stood. I’ve got things to take care of.

Jack moved down to the main cabin where he'd left Waymon, taken aback when he slid open the door. Waymon had managed to wriggle his way over to just inside the sliding glass door Jack was entering. He lay on his back on the floor, his arms behind him, glaring up at Jack.

"Untie me, Bass!" He pushed himself up the rear bulkhead, leaning against it.

Jack stepped over Waymon and then turned. Hands on his hips, Jack stared down at Waymon.

"Your little gig is up, Lamar. I just talked to folks on shore—they have Frigman in custody." He leaned down. "You need to help me get this boat back to shore so you can join him in jail."

"He won't be able to help you with that, Jack," a man's voice came from behind Jack.

He jumped and spun, his gaze shooting wide.

Dick Olgent crouched at the bottom of steps leading down to a lower front berth, pointing a pistol at Jack's head.

"I'm the only one here who knows how to navigate." He waved his pistol at Jack. "I saw that pistol tucked in your waistband. You need to take it out—slowly—and drop it."

Waymon jumped to his feet behind Jack, snatching the pistol from where Jack had it tucked. "I got it, Dick!" He peered around Jack at Olgent. "Can I shoot him now?"

Olgent laughed. "You'll get your chance, Lamar." He stepped up into the cabin and wagged the gun at Jack. "Get your hands up, Jack."

Jack slowly raised his hands. "H-how?"

Olgent snorted, shaking his head. "I go down to take a little nap while Lamar takes the boat out, and he lets things go to hell." He looked around Jack at Waymon. "Can't say I'm surprised. When I woke up and came up here and found him tied up, you can imagine my surprise. Of course, I had to cut my partner loose."

Jack's mouth fell open. "Y-you're in on this?"

Olgent laughed. "Of course, I am!" He stuck his chin in the air. "I'm the one who actually got it organized into something profitable." He wagged a hand casually at Waymon. "Lamar had a basic idea, but he was terrible at implementing it."

"Screw you, Dick!" Waymon called back.

Olgent rolled his eyes. "Yeah, yeah...whatever." He pointed a finger at the ceiling. "Why don't you go up and get the boat turned around while I get Jack...situated."

Waymon grumbled under his breath and left the cabin. His footfalls soon sounded from above.

"Now what?" Jack asked.

Olgent gave Jack a deadpan look. "Why, we take you back out and finish the job Lamar screwed up. What else did you think would happen, Jack?"

Jack took a step toward Olgent. "You clowns are not going to get away with this!"

"Ah, Jack, Jack, Jack—the big Army colonel still trying to be in command up to the very end, eh?" Olgent stated, taking a step back. "I really am sorry it's come to this. You couldn't just let a sleeping dog lie, could you? No, you had to keep digging...stirring things up until you gave us no choice."

Jack stepped forward again, and Olgent cocked the gun.

"One more step and I shoot you...and I'd really rather not. I detest violence."

"Not enough to save Bev Costas and Dale Wallace, though," Jack snarled.

“Unfortunate but...” Olgent shrugged. “Just collateral damage.” He pointed the gun at the couch. “Now, get over there and sit down...and shut up.”

Olgent sat in the helm seat and twisted it to face Jack. Olgent remained silent for a few seconds, his elbows resting on his knees.

“You know, Jack, I actually like you.” He grunted. “I even think you’re much better at running your department than Waymon ever was. The people in your department, as well as those in the OR, really seemed to like and respect you. Hell, even the surgeons liked you!” He blew out a long breath. “Unfortunately, that’s not why we hired you.”

Jack glared at Olgent, arching an eyebrow and cocking his head. “What the hell are you talking about, Dick? Waymon said something like that, too. Why did you hire me if it wasn’t to run a department well?”

“I don’t know what that psycho told you, but when the board forced me to replace Lamar, he and I felt we needed somebody who would just follow directions—without asking questions.” He snickered. “Kinda like in the Army, Jack.” Olgent nodded toward Jack. “We thought you were that person. We thought with your disreputable Army record in Iraq that you’d be that nice little patsy we were looking for.” He leaned back on the couch and shrugged. “Needless to say, all your interfering has shown us we were wrong.”

“What the—my Army record from Iraq? What did you hear—and from who?”

“Frigman may be a jackass, but he does have a few useful talents—you know—background checks, security concerns, and all that stuff. He got access to your Army records and found some very interesting tidbits regarding your history when you were over in Iraq.” Olgent hung his arms up on the back of the chair, lounging against the cushion. “Frankly, as I’ve gotten to know you, I’m surprised you were so cowardly over there.”

“What? What are you talking about?” Jack growled, warmth flushing up his neck onto his face.

“I’m talking about how the Army said you acted under dire circumstances. I mean, really, Jack—hiding in a closet while your staff were killed all around you. What kind of leadership is that?” He snorted. “Then the rescue squad finds you crying like a baby, holding some nurse you got killed.”

Olgent’s casual reference to Lori as “some nurse” made Jack’s blood boil. Images of her brains trickling down his arm when she was shot flashed through his mind. “You don’t know squat about what really happened over there!” he shouted.

Olgent jabbed a finger at Jack. “And as if that wasn’t enough, they had to commit you to an insane asylum when you got back to the States. C’mon, Jack...how could we not think you’d be a perfect lackey?” He chortled.

Jack’s thoughts flashed back to Iraq. Back to the intense hatred that had swelled within him when Lori was killed and her corpse abused. Back to the immense emptiness in his soul that had followed. He fought to suppress the painful memories, not wanting to reopen the ragged wound her death had torn in his psyche.

“What do you mean, ‘lackey’? Lackey for what?”

A particularly large swell slapped the boat broadside, pitching the deck violently, throwing Olgent from the tall chair he was perched on. Olgent wind-milled his arms wildly as he fought to regain his balance. Jack burst from the couch, vaulting toward Olgent. He grabbed the back of Olgent’s shirt, spinning him and throwing him to the floor. The gun flew from Olgent’s hand and slid across the deck. Another swell smashed against the hull, and Jack stumbled. Olgent raised his legs and rammed a powerful kick to Jack’s knees. Jack felt like a human pinball as the buffeting waves and kicks tossed him about.

His gaze shot around the cabin in a frantic search for the gun. His back turned to Olgent, Jack was staggered by the blow Olgent delivered to the back of one of Jack's knees. Jack fell forward, his head banging against a cabinet before he ended up sprawled on the deck. The tossing of the deck worsened the spinning sensation in his head as he lay face down on the floor, stunned, struggling to regain his bearings. Olgent climbed to his feet, holding onto the helm chair.

Waymon appeared at the rear door, throwing it open. "What the hell is going on?"

“Get the gun, Lamar!” Olgent yelled.

“Where is it?”

“Somewhere over there in the corner—hurry up, dammit!”

“Screw the gun! I’ve got something else just as good.”

Jack rolled onto his back to see Waymon slinking toward him, a large syringe in his hand.

“I’ve got a little argument settler that will work just fine.”

Waymon snatched the cap off the needle, raised the syringe above his head, and lunged at Jack. Jack rolled to the side and scabbled to his feet. He grabbed Waymon’s coat and threw him across the cabin. Waymon’s head smashed into a wall, and he slumped to the floor. Olgent drove a shoulder into Jack’s flank, knocking him to the floor then jumping on top of him. Olgent sat on Jack’s chest, scrambling to reach something on the floor above Jack’s head. Jack twisted his neck just enough to see the gun inches from Olgent’s fingertips. Jack slithered up a few inches on the floor, reaching for the butt of the pistol. Olgent snapped it up from just beyond Jack’s fingertips.

Olgent swung the gun toward Jack’s head. Jack raised an arm, using an elbow to block Olgent’s hand that held the gun. Damn! He suddenly recalled something an old Army sergeant told him. Jack wrapped his raised hand around the back of Olgent’s neck. He grasped a handful of hair to hold Olgent’s head firmly then plunged the thumb of his other hand deeply into Olgent’s eye socket. When Jack felt his thumb reach a point behind the fleshy eyeball, he hooked his thumb and yanked it outward. Olgent screeched and jumped off Jack, dropping the gun as both his hands flew up to cover his eyeball dangling from its socket on a bloody strand. Jack rolled onto his side, grabbed the pistol, then jumped to his feet and spun.

Both Olgent and Waymon were lying on the floor. Waymon was still, Olgent was coiled up in a fetal position, whimpering softly, his hands cupped over his injured eye. Blood trickled between his fingers. Jack crossed the cabin and stood over Olgent.

“Dick, I’m sorry I had to do that...but you left me no choice. Why don’t you let me take a look at that eye?”

Olgent drew back from Jack and balled his body up tighter.

“Let me at least bandage it. Do you have a first-aid kit somewhere?”

Olgent moaned then held out a shaky finger, pointing at a blue first-aid box hanging on the opposite cabin wall.

After a few minutes, Jack finished securing a bandage over the bloody eye socket from which Olgent’s eyeball hung by a few threads of pinkish tissue. Jack didn’t want to listen to Olgent’s continued sobbing, so he threw a coil of rope around Waymon’s wrists then made his way up to the flying bridge. He walked to the helm, twisted the keys to cut off the engines, then flopped onto a bench. He took a deep breath and soon fell into a slumber.

Jack awoke with a start and bolted upright, his gaze shooting to his watch. Damn! How did I let myself do that! He scrambled down the ladder to the main cabin. Olgent was still whimpering on the floor, and Waymon was still out cold. He collected the syringe that Waymon had held, found the cap, and put it on the needle. He shoved it in a pocket then found a pen and a small notepad in the helm glove box. He then stood over Waymon, using a foot to roll him onto his back before kneeling next to him and patting his face.

“Wake up, Lamar.”

Waymon’s eyes fluttered open, and he scowled at Jack.

“Lamar, it’s time for you to fess up to everything. I can’t remember all the details because I was drugged when you were bragging to me before.” Jack nudged him. “Here’s your big chance to regale me again with your schmuckery...and don’t forget the part about you murdering those lab techs. Then trying to frame me for it—then trying to kill me!” Jack stood and poked a finger down at Waymon. “You’re going to talk—I’m going to write it down. Then you’re going to sign your confession.”

Waymon snorted and rolled his eyes. “Just what is it you really want, Bass? You want in on our action?”

Jack snorted. “I want to make sure you pay for all the suffering you’ve caused—the deaths of innocent people, the destroyed lives of others, patients who still suffer because you stole the research money that might have helped them... Shall I go on?”

“Screw off, Bass!” Waymon waved an arm at Jack, as if shooing away a fly. “I was just making sure I got what I was owed.”

Jack smiled devilishly. “Oh, you’re going to get what you deserve, all right—”

“Lamar, he’s not screwing around!” Olgent muttered, pointing at the bandage on his eye and the wound on his ear. He hung his head. “It’s over.” He raised his head and glared at Waymon. “And you’re not going to blow any chance I have for a plea deal because you can’t control your temper...or your mouth. You’ve always had a problem with shooting off your mouth, you know.”

“You can screw off, too, Dick! You goddam turncoat!”

Olgent shrugged as he looked at Jack. “I tried, Jack. Just remember that.”

Jack waved the gun in Olgent’s direction. “Get over there by your buddy, Waymon.”

“Make me!” Waymon replied defiantly.

“Oh, crap!” Olgent said as he hunched his head.

Jack fired a round. It ripped into the floor near Waymon’s feet, and he off the ground. His gaze snapped from the jagged bullet hole in the floor to Jack.

“Bass, you crazy bastard! You’ll sink the fucking boat!”

“I don’t care, Lamar—as long as you go down with it.”

“You’d better do what he says, Lamar,” Olgent piped up, pointing again to his injured ear.

Waymon looked like a nervous chicken, his head snapping back-and-forth between Olgent and Jack.

“Next one’s in you, Lamar,” Jack stated. Jack was fed up of all of the games. His patience was gone.

“All right, all right!” He moved slowly toward Olgent, crossing his skinny arms across his chest when he reached Olgent’s side. “You’re going to pay to fix that hole.”

Jack laughed and shook his head. “You truly are a whack-job, Lamar.”

Jack moved cautiously to the medicine cabinet to retrieve the roll of bandage tape he'd used earlier. He grabbed it and turned to Waymon.

“Okay, Lamar, turn around slowly.”

Waymon turned, a grimace distorting his face.

“I'm going to roll this tape on the floor to you—pick it up and give it to Dick. Dick, when he hands it to you, I want you to wrap it tightly around his wrists then his ankles. Tightly!”

Jack sent the tape rolling toward Waymon's feet. Waymon gave Jack a dirty look then bent to retrieve it. He flipped it to Olgent, who fumbled to catch it.

“Here, take it...traitor.”

Waymon glared at Jack as Olgent secured his wrists.

“Nice and snug, Dick,” Jack said.

Olgent halted, briefly glancing at Jack then pulling the tape tighter. Olgent finished then looked expectantly at Jack.

“Your turn, Dick. Turn your back toward me.”

Jack waited for Olgent to turn away then vaulted across the cabin. He snatched the tape from Olgent and fastened his hands behind his back. Jack grabbed Waymon's shoulder and shoved him to the ground. He wrapped the remainder of the tape tightly around Waymon's legs then fastened the last piece over his mouth. Jack took a deep breath before tucking the gun into his waistband. He stood over Waymon.

“Lamar, we can do this the easy way...or something not so easy—I don't care either way.” Jack leaned down and ripped the tape from Waymon's mouth.

“Ouch! You prick—that hurt,” Lamar blurted. “I wish we’d never hired you, Jack—you’ve messed up everything! We had a perfect plan and it was going just fine...until you came along.”

“I didn’t ask to get dragged into your screwed-up little scheme...and I’ll bet the people you killed would say the same thing. Now, talk! Start at the beginning and don’t leave out any details.” He pulled out the pen and pad.

Waymon laughed. “You just don’t get it, Jack—it’s too late! By now, Frigman has taken care of your little bitch nurse friend and that medical student...and has confiscated whatever evidence that little brat found.” He cackled. “By the way, I know what he found, Jack—and it’s got your name all over it. Very incriminating,” he said then paused, struggling to a sitting position on the floor. “I think it’s you who needs to cooperate with Dick and I.”

Jack stared blankly at him, his mouth agape. “Lamar—”

“Bass, either cooperate, or Frigman will see to it that you never even survive until any trial!” Waymon screeched.

“I’ve got some news for you about him. I just got off the phone with my FBI friend. Frigman’s in custody—he’s not going to come and save you two clowns. He’s probably turning on you as we speak in order to save his own ass.”

“Bullshit! You’re lying!”

“Sheesh! You really are a nutjob, Lamar,” Jack said then stood. “Well, I gave you a chance to do this the easy way. Now you’re going to have the same experience Dick and you gave me earlier today. You’re going to swim with the fish—just like I did.”

Jack jerked Waymon to his feet and pushed him through the cabin door onto the aft deck. He dragged him to the fighting chair, flinging him into the seat and fastening the lap belt around him. Jack went back into the cabin and opened the bait well then smiled. There were a couple more bags of the bloody fish parts still in the well. Jack shot a quick glance at Olgent, who was keenly watching Jack’s every move. He had an opportunistic guise on his face, like a boxer waiting for his opponent to drop their hands. Jack stopped rummaging and gave Olgent a stony stare.

“Dick, I don’t have any more tape to secure you better, but I expect you’ll behave yourself. You will—right?” Jack asked, patting the pistol in his waistband and tapping an ear.

Olgent went pale, gave just a hint of a nod, and turned away. Jack returned to the rear deck, stood at the railing in front of Waymon, then dumped the contents of the chum bag into the water. He peered down into the clear gulf waters for a few minutes, grinning at the sight of several dark shadows emerging from the depths. He turned to face Waymon and leaned back against the railing.

He pointed a thumb over his shoulder. “Looks like our dinner guests are starting to arrive. I think it’s about time for you to share the experience I had earlier today.” He jabbed a finger at Waymon. “Unless you start talking.”

“Suck an egg, Bass. You don’t have the balls.”

Jack stepped to Waymon and yanked him from the chair, bending him over the railing so Waymon could view the growing number of swimming predators gathering near the boat. The water roiled as various types and sizes of fish fought over the morsels, all quickly parting when a large shark made its way through the center of the group.

“Wow, Lamar, look at the size of that one!”

Waymon made no sound, but his eyes grew wide.

“Man! What a horrible way to go—ripped apart, bit by bit, by a bunch of damn fish.” Jack shook his head then twisted Lamar back toward him, their faces inches apart. Jack stared directly into Waymon’s eyes.

“Ready to confess, Lamar, or would you rather go for a swim with them?” Jack asked, his hands on his hips as he gave Waymon a deadpan gaze.

Waymon shook his head violently.

Jack sighed. “Have it your way then.”

He threw Waymon back into the deck chair and secured him with the lap belt. Jack walked over to a hoist for large game fish that was located at a rear corner of the deck. He unlatched the winch and unreeled a length of steel cable. He kneeled and threaded it through the tape wrapped around Waymon’s ankles, and the bound man flailed wildly.

“You’re only delaying the inevitable, Lamar...unless you decide to cooperate.”

“Screw you!”

Jack shrugged then secured the cable hook and walked over to the winch control handset. He pressed the button to raise it, holding it long enough for Waymon’s ankles to be lifted a few inches off the deck.

“Change your mind yet?”

“Like I said, you don’t have the balls, Bass!” Waymon replied. “I heard all about what a coward you were in Iraq.” Waymon threw his head back and chortled. “Sheesh! What a chickenshit!” Waymon then spat a large glob of mucus on Jack.

Jack had dealt with enough belligerent drunks in emergency rooms to have been spat on before. Since being bound and spat upon while being forced to watch what had been done to Lori’s corpse in Iraq, though, he’d developed an extreme aversion to it. His guts twisted, and his pulse pounded in his head. He balled his fists so tight they hurt. His mind was descending into the dark mental crevasse of a bad PTSD episode, abruptly morphing into an emotionless robot.

Waymon stopped laughing and stared, alarm growing on his face as he watched Jack Jack hit the button on the winch again then turned to watch as Waymon was lifted several feet in the air. He flopped around on the end of the cable like a large fish.

“What the hell are you doing, you crazy bastard? Put me down!” Waymon ranted.

Jack said nothing. He swung the boom over the side of the boat, leaving Waymon hanging above the water. Several large shadows were circling beneath him as Waymon gawked down at them, spinning slowly on the cable like a big crystal ball on a dancefloor ceiling. The dorsal fins of large sharks occasionally pierced the water’s surface just under Waymon.

“You shouldn’t have spat on me, Lamar. I have no tolerance left for your antics,” J, hearing the words as if they were uttered by someone else...someone who didn’t care...someone who’d thrown in the towel on life.

“Bass, quit screwing around and put me back on the boat. Then we can talk. You can tell me what you really want. Money? The department chair? No problem—just get me down!”

Jack remained silent, staring blankly into space for several minutes before speaking in a flat, somber tone.

“You know, Lamar, I saw—and did—some terrible things over in Iraq that no person, certainly no doctor, would ever expect to be faced with.” He averted his gaze to the deck, shaking his head. “I lost my soul from that experience.”

He turned his gaze to Lamar.

“And you know what—when I’m faced with a similar situation now, much as I hate to say it, I feel almost...compelled to take action just like I did in Iraq. It’s like I can’t quite control myself...”

“Blah, blah, blah—you really are nuts, Bass!”

“Maybe. It’s scary, even to me, to know I can get like this. I don’t like realizing what I’ve done sometimes after I snap out of it.”

Jack pressed the winch button to lower Waymon, letting it jerk to a stop every few inches. When Waymon was a couple feet above the surface, Jack threw more chum into the water. The water soon churned like a boiling cauldron, hungry predators fighting over the scraps. A shark broke the surface, its large, tooth-filled mouth opened wide as it lunged up at Waymon. He bent up at the waist, fighting to stay out of reach of the gaping maw.

“Y-you can’t get away with this, Bass! If you drop me in the water...it’s...it’s murder!”

“I guess you would know all about murder, wouldn’t you?” Jack held up the winch control box. “Talk or I dunk you!”

“Piss off, Bass! Get me down!”

“I’ll let you down, all right.”

Jack lowered Waymon in short, jerky increments. Waymon bobbed and bounced on the line like some crazy marionette. Suddenly, a large shark leaped from the water. Waymon barely dodged the snap of razor-edged teeth. The shark brushed Waymon’s shoulder as it fell back into the water, sending him into an even wilder spin on the end of the cable.

“Okay! You win—I’ll tell you whatever you want to hear—just get me out of here!” Waymon struggled, frantically attempting to keep himself in a position where he could watch the predators and stay out of their reach.

“Just to be clear,” Jack stated, “if you try anything, and I mean anything, you’ll be right back where you are now—and next time, you will go into the water.”

“Yeah, yeah, whatever. C’mon, hurry up! I can see a big one coming back!”

Jack waited several seconds. He doubted he could trust Waymon but... Jack raised him and swung him back onto the boat. After lowering Waymon to the deck, Jack stood astride Waymon, looking down at him, still doubting the man was going to cooperate.

“All right, Lamar, let me get a pad and pen.” Jack had to hear this. Had to know first-hand that someone else had murdered the lab techs. Self-doubt had encroached on his mind about this ever since Mark had told Jack that he’d found Jack’s name tag at the murder scene. He needed to have proof that he wasn’t insane, wasn’t a murderer...just suffered from severe PTSD.

Waymon flopped onto his back and glared up at Jack. “I’m not going to tell you anything until you untie me!”

Jack rolled his eyes. “Lamar, you know I can’t do that. I just can’t trust you—”

“Then I’m not going to tell you anything!” Waymon blurted, jutting his jaw.

Jack hesitated for a few seconds then reached behind his back and pulled the gun out of his waistband, showing it to Lamar.

“Just keep something in mind. Whether I feed you to the fish dead or alive is irrelevant to me.”

“Yeah, I get it. Now get this fucking tape off me!”

Jack held the gun on Waymon and started stripping the tape from his body. Jack paused before removing the final few strips of tape that secured Waymon’s arms. Jack pointed the gun at Waymon’s face.

“Roll over onto your stomach.” Jack ripped off the last few pieces of tape then hopped up and backed several feet away. “Okay...get up—slowly. Then we’ll go into the cabin so I can write down everything.”

Waymon stood, turning to face Jack, staring at the gun pointed at Waymon’s chest. Jack motioned with the gun at the cabin door.

“Let’s go.”

As they entered the boat cabin, Olgent spun on the helm chair to face them, an inquisitive look on his face. Jack looked in his direction.

“Just turn back around, Dick. There’s nothing for you to see,” Jack muttered.

Olgent exchanged a quick glance with Waymon then slowly turned his seat to face away from the other men. Jack pointed the gun at the couch against the cabin wall.

“You sit over there, Lamar. I’m going to sit at the dining table.”

Waymon shuffled to the far side of the cabin, spinning and plopping melodramatically onto the couch. Jack took a seat at the dining table, carefully setting the gun on the tabletop. He arranged the pad in front of himself then waved his hand at Waymon.

“Go. Tell me everything you told me earlier—before you drugged me.”

Olgent intermittently stole quick glances over his shoulder as Waymon talked, wincing several times at some of the gruesome details.

“Lamar, you talk about multiple murders and embezzlement as if you’re describing a medical experiment...you do realize what you’re confessing to, don’t you?” Olgent asked with incredulity.

Jack spun to glare at Olgent. “What’s the matter, Dick—don’t like hearing the details of your little enterprise? No doubt, you preferred to just stay insulated from the truth while you sat in your ivory tower and let your goons do your dirty work.”

Olgent turned his gaze to the ground and rotated away without responding.

“Are you going to listen to me or not, Bass? Waymon asked. I don’t like being interrupted.” He gave Olgent a dirty look. “You, too, Dick—don’t interrupt me.”

Jack let his mouth hang open as he stared at Waymon. Could this guy really be this vain...this arrogant? This heartless? “You really are a pill, Lamar! Can’t wait to get on with bragging about your deeds, eh? Please—continue.”

When Waymon got to the part of his story about the night he hacked the two lab techs to pieces, Olgent again cringed, eventually covering his ears with his hands.

“Then, after we killed you and Quinn, we’d be back to business as usual,” Waymon finished then scowled at Jack. “There—is that what you wanted to hear, Bass? You know, it doesn’t matter what I tell you—you’re not going to survive, anyway.”

Jack finished writing, set the pen down on the pad, and gazed at Waymon for a couple of minutes. Lamar was truly insane. Driven to horrible deeds by his greed. Jack just couldn’t wrap his head around that mindset. “I am amazed at your ability to deny reality, Lamar. You should be a White House press secretary.”

Waymon snorted. “Whatever! Anything else?”

“No—I think that ought to just about do it.” Jack picked up the gun and stood. “Now it’s time for you to sign this before I secure you again. Just stay where you are—I’m going to come over there and put some of that tape back around your legs before I give you the pen.”

Waymon jutted his chin defiantly, scowling at Jack.

“For all the good it will do you...”

Jack picked up a couple of smaller pieces of tape from the floor near Waymon. They were tangled, but he thought they’d hold until he was able to retrieve more from the aft deck.

“Hold your ankles out, Lamar.”

Jack wrapped a couple of strands around Waymon’s feet. Hmm...not too good. It will have to do, though. Jack stood and put the gun in Waymon’s face. “Just sit here like a good little boy while I go get more tape.”

Waymon sneered at him. Jack went out and gathered several more pieces of tape from the deck then re-entered the cabin. The sea had gotten rougher while they had been drifting, large swells tossing the boat back and forth. The unpredictable bucking of the ship caused Jack to stagger like a drunk, shuffling unsteadily across the cabin toward Waymon. Olgent merely looked on aloofly as he watched Jack struggling to maintain his balance. Waymon looked like a vulture sitting on a branch, waiting for roadkill to take its last breath.

Jack lost his balance as a big wave smashed against the side of the boat. His arms flailed, and his hand smacked against the doorframe, knocking the gun from his grasp. Waymon vaulted from the couch and drove his shoulder into Jack's stomach, knocking him back out the door. Jack sprawled on the deck, watching Waymon. He stood in the open door, tearing the strands of tape from his ankles. Jack rolled and scrambled to his knees. Waymon kicked him in the ass, sending Jack sliding across the wet deck. His head smacked up against the gunwale. He rolled over, pushing himself up against the wall.

Waymon dug in a pocket and pulled out a large syringe, quickly uncapping the needle. "Always carry a spare." He stepped toward Jack, a maniacal grin on his face. "I told you that you'd never survive!"

Waymon stepped closer, raising the syringe above his head like a dagger, ready to plunge it into Jack. When Waymon drew his arm back, Jack shot out a foot, kicking Waymon in the knee. He screamed and dropped the syringe, grasping his knee with both hands. Jack dove across the deck and snatched up the syringe. His gaze flashed between it and Waymon.

"What kind of crazy concoction is this, Lamar?" Jack rose and stepped menacingly toward him. "Let's find out what it does to you."

Waymon flailed his arms at Jack, trying to ward him off. Jack shot out a hand and slapped Waymon across the face. He stumbled backward, scrambling around the deck to get away from Jack's onslaught.

"I'll bet you're a little surprised right about now, aren't you, Lamar? You probably actually believed everything you heard about my Army experience."

"Because it's true!"

Jack mimicked a gameshow buzzer. "Ehh. Wrong answer, Lamar! Want to see what's behind door number two? Like so many assholes, you like to call others what you really are—a sniveling little coward."

"You're nuts, Bass!"

"Only when some schmuck makes me that way, Lamar. And I'll bet you think you should be above being treated you like this, don't you?" Jack jumped forward and slapped him across the face again.

Waymon whimpered and turned away.

"I know how you're feeling—the loathing you feel when someone is bullying and torturing you...the sense of helplessness. Not fun, is it? I know that feeling—and I hate it! And you've made me feel that way in spades on this boat." He grabbed Waymon and threw him to the floor then pinned him there with a knee on his chest. "My whole life I've been made to feel that way by one bully or another, including my own father." He poked his finger in Waymon's chest. "No more!" Jack roared. "I've had it with all of you bullies!"

"Get off me, Bass!"

Jack grabbed Waymon's arm and jumped up, yanking him back to his feet. Waymon's face was red, tears welling in his eyes.

"What are you going to do?" he asked in a demanding but jittery voice.

Jack did not respond. He dragged Waymon to the fishing chair and tossed him into it. Jack bent, putting his face close to Waymon's.

“You had that thug Frigman do your dirty work...unless it was something pitiful like attacking innocent, defenseless women, eh, Lamar? But when you can’t give somebody a sucker punch or stick some goddam syringe into them from behind, you’re not so brave, are you?”

Jack locked gazes with Waymon for several seconds then stood, looking at the syringe he held.

“You seem to enjoy sticking this thing in people—let’s see how you like it.”

Jack pinned him to the seat with a forearm across his chest then slid the needle into Waymon’s neck. Waymon thrashed and wailed as Jack probed Waymon’s neck with the needle, finally locating the jugular vein.

“Ah—bullseye,” he said as a flash of blood appeared in the hub of the syringe. “On with the test!” Jack injected the contents of the syringe slowly.

“Screw you! I’ll never let you do anything to me, you assshhooollle,” Waymon screamed.

He kned Jack in the stomach, and Jack lost his footing on the wet deck, stumbling backward against the railing.

Waymon bolted from the chair, his legs already wobbly from the drug. His eyelids were fluttering. He staggered toward Jack, flailing his arms before him, punching out at Jack. Waymon dove at Jack, but he hopped aside, and Waymon fell onto the railing, grappling clumsily at it as he teetered. Jack spun back toward him just as Waymon toppled in slow motion over the banister. Waymon hit the water before Jack could even react. He rushed to the railing.

“Stop splashing around, Lamar—you’re going to attract a shark!”

Waymon slapped at the surface of the water as he struggled to stay above the surface. “Sshhcrew offff, Basshhh.”

“Stop flapping like that, dammit! Just hold on a second, and I’ll toss you a life ring.”

Jack grabbed a nearby life ring from its rack and vaulted back to the rail. He tossed it onto the water near Waymon.

“Grab that and I’ll pull you in!”

Waymon responded by holding up his middle finger at Jack. A large shark broke the surface, grabbing Waymon’s upraised arm in its large mouth rimmed with dagger-like teeth. Waymon shrieked as the shark jerked its head back and forth until it tore his arm from his body then disappeared beneath the surface of the crimson-stained water.

A couple more sharks joined in, each ripping pieces of flesh from their prey. Jack spun from the railing, cringing. The shrieking continued for only a few more seconds. Jack gazed at the syringe still in his hand then threw it over his shoulder into the water.

“Here ya go, Lamar. Maybe your little ‘argument settler’ will help you out.”

Jack shuffled toward the cabin. What a waste! Lamar died unnecessarily because of his greed...I just don't get it. Jack shook his head. He tugged open the cabin door, stopping in the doorway. Olgent was bending over the pistol on the floor, reaching down for it.

Jack gave a little laugh. "Well, well, well, Dick. You just never give up, do you?"

Olgent paused, still bent over. He turned his face to Jack then back to the gun.

"And, no, you won't be able to grab it, point it, and shoot me before I get to you."

Olgent's gaze darted back-and-forth between Jack and the gun.

"You've only got one eye left, Dick—you want to risk losing that one, too?" Jack growled tiredly.

"So, cut the crap—you're getting on my last nerve!"

Olgent's shoulders slumped, and he hung his head, resting his chin on his chest.

"Get back on your perch," Jack said.

Olgent shuffled to the chair and slid onto it. Jack retrieved the gun and put it in his waistband then sat on the couch, staring silently at Olgent for several seconds.

"I need your help with something. You help me and maybe I can put in a good word for you."

Olgent's head snapped up, his eyebrows arching. He regarded Jack a few seconds then nodded.

"That's good, Dick."

Jack pulled the gun from his waistband and set it on his lap with a somewhat exaggerated motion, smiling when Olgent's gaze locked onto the weapon. "I hope I don't have to use this, but if you don't cooperate...well." Jack leaned forward and glared at Olgent. "Do you believe I'll use it, Dick?" he snarled.

Beads of perspiration covered Olgent's forehead, the color draining from his face. He nodded.

"Good. I need you to help me get this boat back to that marina."

Olgent scowled and he shook his head hard. "You told Waymon you talked to your friends—my guess is that they're waiting with the cops at the marina." He jutted his chin and glared at Jack. "No deal. You said you'd let me go."

"I never said I'd let you go! I said I'd put in a good word...if you help me."

"Nope. I'll help you get the boat to shore...somewhere else."

"That's an unfortunate choice, Dick." Jack drew the pistol, pulling the slide back slightly then letting it slam closed with a metallic clank. He slowly raised the gun and sighted down the barrel at Olgent's head. "Good-bye...and good riddance."

"Wait a minute, Jack!" Olgent held out his hands and twisted his head away. "Don't do anything rash!" He slowly turned his face back toward Jack, peeking sideways out of his remaining eye. "All right...I'll help get the boat back to the marina!"

"Good. No more games, eh? I really don't like being forced into actions like this—like you said about yourself, I find violence very distasteful." He lowered the gun.

Jack stared at him a few seconds. "And while we're on the subject of me doing something I find distasteful, let me set the record straight for you about my time in Iraq. In order to save the lives of my staff, I was forced to kill several enemy troops—hand-to-hand, face-to-face combat. The only reason you saw what you did in my Army personnel record is because some Army PR desk jockey in Washington decided they didn't want to risk bad press about an Army doctor killing people." He shook his head. "Even if they were enemy combatants and had killed some of my staff. So, please spare me any more bullshit about me being a coward."

Olgent stared blankly at Jack then shrugged. “Whatever...I really don’t care at this point.”

Jack vaulted from the couch toward Olgent. “Well, I care!” he yelled. “So, don’t ever let me hear you say another word about me being a coward!” Jack glared at Olgent, his chest heaving. He blew out a long breath and shook his whole body. He needed to calm down and get ashore. He just wanted to make certain Janice was safe. Wanted to hold her in his arms. He spun the helm seat so Olgent was facing the bow then backed slowly toward some bench seats, raising a couple of them and peering into the underlying storage spaces as he kept the gun trained on Olgent. In the third stow space he found what he was looking for. He extracted a coil of mooring rope.

He pulled it out and walked over to Olgent, handing him one end of the line. “Hold this.”

Olgent arched an eyebrow as his gaze shot from the rope to Jack, then he shrugged and held the end. Jack spun the chair around several times, wrapping the cord around Olgent and the seat backrest. He snatched the end Olgent had been holding and tied it snugly.

“Not that I don’t trust you, Dick.” He smirked. “But I don’t trust you.”

Jack stepped to the helm control panel, looking over all the gauges and levers.

“What do I do first?”

Olgent sighed. He didn’t respond for several seconds. Finally, he shrugged. “First, turn on the blowers in the engine compartment,” he said in a pouty tone, nodding at the helm dash. “It’s that red switch on the right labeled blowers.”

Jack went through the startup routine as Olgent instructed and soon had the boat crawling slowly over the long, sloping swells.

“How do I steer this barge back to the marina?”

“You don’t need to—I have the coordinates programmed into the autopilot,” Olgent replied. “If you scroll through the destination choices on the screen of the autopilot there”—he nodded at a digital display on the dash—“you’ll see berth as one of the choices. Just scroll to it and press the select button.”

Jack engaged the autopilot, and the large boat soon picked up speed, cutting through the water. Comfortable that all was working as it should be, Jack leaned an elbow on the dash and gazed at Olgent.

“Amazing what you can buy with all the research money you’ve stolen. I guess you put it to better use than those silly researchers who might have saved some lives, eh?” Jack stated. “But as long as you’ve got your cool little toys, that’s all that matters, right?”

After resting briefly, Jack climbed up to the flying bridge and got on the radio to call Wes. “Special Agent Watley,” Wes answered on the first ring.

“Hey, Wes—”

“Jack! Where the hell are you? We’ve been waiting at the marina. What’s happening? Why have you been out of touch so long?”

“Whoa, slow down, buddy—you know I can’t think that fast. I’m fine, just fine. I’m heading back to the marina now, but I have no idea where the hell I am or how long it will take to get there.” He paused. “And by the way, I guess you ought to have an ambulance there, too.”

“What? I thought you said you were okay.”

“I am, but Dick Olgent isn’t in very good shape. I’ll give you the whole lowdown when I get there. See you in a bit.”

“Who the hell is Dick Olgent?”

The president of Southern Medical Center—turns out he was the ringleader...”

“Sheesh, Jack! Your commanding officer tries to kill you back when you were in Germany, now a university president tries to kill you—I think you have a problem with authority figures,” Wes joked.

Jack laughed. “Or they’ve got a problem with me.” Fleeting memories of the many beatings he’d received at the hands of his father when Jack was a child ran through his head. As always when this occurred, his heart twisted, and the confusion he’d known as a boy recurred.

“Hey, I’ve got Janice here with me,” Wes replied. “Want to say hello?”

Jack shook the morbid thoughts away and bolted upright in the captain’s chair.

“Hell, yes!”

“Hi, Jack. Please tell me you’re okay!”

“I’m fine.” He huffed. “Why won’t anyone believe me? I’ll be better, though, when I get to wrap my arms around you. How’re you doing? That low-life Frigman didn’t try anything with you, did he?”

“No. Mr. Quinn and Dr. Carrel took care of him before he could try anything.”

“Janice...I’m so sorry for having gotten you involved in this mess. If you had been hurt, I would have never forgiven myself. I’ve already been the cause of another wonderful woman’s death and—”

“Jack—stop it already! You didn’t get me involved in anything. I did. Don’t beat yourself up so much,” she said in a consoling tone. “Hey, I gotta go. Wes is motioning that he needs the phone back. I’ll see you soon...and I’ll give you that big hug. Bye.”

Wes came back on the line. “Gotta call some other folks. See you soon. Be careful.”

Jack hung the radio handset back in its holder then leaned back in the chair, a broad smile on his face as he sprawled on a bench seat along one side of the flying bridge.

It was good to be alive. The bright sun shined down on Jack, warming not only his body but his very soul. The moist, briny breeze blowing through his hair felt especially refreshing—the sounds of the sea, the gentle swaying of the boat—as if Mother Nature was creating a symphony of pleasure for him. The soft rocking of the boat and the caressing softness of the couch on which he lay took Jack back to a fond but distant memory of being held in his mother’s arms, gently embraced against her warm bosom as she rocked him to sleep. The wonderful, relaxing memory combined with Jack’s fatigue sent him into a slumber.

THE LOUD BLAST OF AN air horn brought Jack awake . He rocketed upright on the couch. Still in a daze, he quickly scanned his surroundings, trying to regain his bearings. The Bertram was inside the breakwater of the marina and was still barreling along at speed. A second loud horn blasted from another large boat heading in the opposite direction, the pilot of the other boat shaking a fist at Jack.

“Slow down, you idiot!”

Jack waved back apologetically as he scrambled to the control console. He yanked the throttle levers to idle and disengaged the autopilot. He shot a nervous glance toward the rapidly approaching docks.

“C’mon, slow down, dammit!”

Jack’s eyes darted to the rapidly nearing wharf. Dammit! How do I slow this pig down? His gaze flew across the control panel as his breathing became more rapid and sweat dripped from his brow. He finally just cut the engines, his shoulders drooping as the boat began to rapidly lose momentum.

“Not very smooth, Bass,” he chided himself, quickly scanning for the correct berth among the maze of moorings jutting into the waters of the harbor.

“Screw it!” he said after fruitless searching. “I’ll just tie up at the main wharf where the fuel pumps are—I want to get off of this damn thing.”

Jack tried to steer the big cruiser in the direction of the main pier, but the boat responded sluggishly, and he soon realized he would have to restart the engines in order to steer. As he re-engaged the props, he noticed more and more people on the fueling dock start to turn toward him, watching keenly as the Bertram continued to loom closer to them. Several had concerned looks on their faces and started to back away, and others rushed off the dock, looking nervously over their shoulders as they scampered away.

Jack’s heart pounded as he fumbled clumsily with the throttles and steering, the boat jerking and lurching in response. He cringed as the big boat finally hit hard against the bumpers along the side of the dock then scraped noisily against them for several feet before bashing against the stern of another boat. Those who had been on the dock and had already made a mad scramble for safety now stood a few yards from the dock, staring wide-eyed at Jack. A man burst out of the marina building, running toward Jack as he yelled angrily and shook his fists in the air.

“I think I found the owner of the boat I just smashed into.” He cringed. “Sorry, buddy,” Jack mumbled. He cut the engines, trying to feign calm as he walked to the ladder, but his legs were still shaky.

“What the hell kind of fool trick was that, you idiot?” a man standing in the open door of the fuel hut called out. “You drunk or something?” He scurried toward the boat.

Jack waved at him. “Sorry! I’ve got an emergency on board. The real captain is injured, so I had to bring the boat in,” he called out. Man, will I be glad to get off this thing!

“Well, you should have called so we could have gotten you help before you got here!”

“If I knew how to do that, don’t you think I would have?” Jack roared, not interested in yet another conflict. “Now, how about you stop yelling at me and help me tie this boat off?”

“All right, but then we’re going to talk about all this damage you caused,” the marina manager replied.

“Yeah—got it. My bad,” Jack called back.

“FBI!” Wes shouted.

Jack looked around. Wes was jogging toward the boat, holding his FBI ID out in front of him, his other hand holding his handgun at his side.

Wes skidded to a stop next to the marina worker. The man gazed at Jack then his eyes shot back to Wes.

“FBI? What the hell’s going on? Do you know that moron on the boat?” The man pointed up at Jack.

“Back off!” Wes shouted. “There’s an ambulance up in front of your office building—why don’t you just go help them get the stretcher down here?”

The man remained motionless, his mouth hanging open as he turned back to Jack. He rotated and walked toward his office, grumbling and shooting occasional glances over his shoulder at Jack then shaking his head.

Wes stood on the wharf just below where Jack was looking down from the flying bridge.

“Everything under control, Jack?” he called out in a concerned voice.

Jack laughed. “Have you forgotten who you’re talking to, Wes?”

Wes snickered. “Good point. Let me rephrase. Any imminent danger?”

Jack shook his head. “Nah! It’s all good but man, am I glad to see you!” Jack replied, peering down over the edge of the bridge.

Wes holstered his weapon and moved toward a mooring line that lay nearby on the dock. “Likewise, buddy, likewise. You gave us all a hell of a scare,” he called over his shoulder.

Wes quickly threw a mooring line around a cleat on the bow, repeated the action at the aft of the boat, then hopped onto the deck. As he crossed the deck, he gawked wide-eyed at all of the blood smeared around the floor then hurried toward the ladder to the flying bridge.

“Jack, looks like a damned battlefield down here,” Wes said, arching an eyebrow as he gazed at his friend “You want to fill me in on a few things?”

Jack poked his head over the edge of the upper deck above the ladder. “Yeah, I suppose I do...but it’s a long story, and I want to get the hell off this thing first.”

Wes looked up, smiled, and shook his head. “I wouldn’t expect anything but ‘a long story’ from Jack Bass.” Wes quipped.

“I’m just happy I’m still alive to talk about it.”

Jack quickly clambered down the ladder then turned to face Wes. He stood silently for a couple of seconds, smiling broadly, then threw his arms around Wes and gave him a bear hug. “Really good to see you, buddy,” he said then released Wes and stepped back.

Wes pointed at the crimson blotches covering much of the deck. “So...what’s all this?”

Jack looked at the smeared stains on the deck. “That is a mess—not to worry, though, most of it is just fish blood, not human.”

“That’s something of a relief, but you said ‘most of it’ isn’t human blood?”

“Yeah...not exactly the circumstances I had in mind for the next time I went to sea on a fishing boat,” Jack mumbled.

“I bet not.”

Jack watched the marina worker leading two EMTs rolling a stretcher toward the boat. His eyes widened. Janice walked just behind them. Wes followed Jack’s gaze then smiled.

“Why don’t you go say hello while I get things in order here?”

“Sounds good to me.”

Jack jumped from the boat onto the wet dock, stumbling and nearly falling. Janice’s laugh reached his ears as he struggled to regain his balance. They rushed to each other, falling to the ground with their arms wrapped tightly around each other, laughing together. They came to a rest with Janice lying on top of Jack. She sat up, straddling him, looking into his eyes. She gazed at the blood on his clothing and the bruises and small cuts on his face and arms, her eyebrows knitting.

“You sure you’re not hurt?”

“I wouldn’t quite say ‘not hurt’, but I’m fine—nothing but a few scrapes and bruises. It looks worse than it is.”

He reached up, placing a hand behind her neck, gently pulling her face to his, their lips meeting in a warm, wet, prolonged kiss that had more emotion behind it than any other kiss they had ever shared. When their lips parted, Janice pulled away slightly, tears streaming down her cheeks. She swiped them away with her hand.

“Jack Bass, is it always this crazy with you?”

He laughed as he reached up, gently wiping the tears from her cheeks.

“Let’s hope not!” he said, even as flashes of Germany and Iraq flitted through the fringes of his mind. He shook them away and sat up, hugging her tightly. “We’ll have plenty of time to find out, though.”

Janice’s eyes shot wide, and a smile crept onto her face. “I was hoping you’d say something like that.”

Jack smiled and gave her a quick peck on the cheek. “I should get back down to Wes now,” he whispered into her ear.

“Okay, but I’m going to keep a much closer watch on you from now on,” she joked.

“Likewise,” he replied.

They untangled themselves and stood, looking silently into each other’s eyes for several seconds. Jack slowly turned away, still holding her hand. When he finally released her, their fingertips brushing lightly, and a shiver ran up Jack’s arm.

“Don’t go anywhere—I’ll be right back,” he said over his shoulder.

“Trust me, I’m not going anywhere, big boy.”

Jack smiled as he trotted back toward the boat. Life was good again. As he neared the ship, he could see the EMTs now had Dick Olgent strapped to a stretcher, a bloody bandage covering his eye. Wes stopped them on the rear deck, placing handcuffs on Olgent’s wrists as he read him the Miranda statement. When Wes finished, he nodded at the EMTs, and they started their struggle of moving the stretcher from the boat to the dock. Jack clambered onto the boat.

“Time to tell me just what the hell went on out there, Jack. The cabin looks just as bad as this back deck.” He looked at Jack and raised his eyebrows. “Worse, if I consider the bullet holes in there.”

Jack smiled and put his arm around Wes’s shoulder, leading him into the cabin. “Come on, I’ll tell you all about it.”

Jack led Wes to the table where he’d left the notepad on which he’d earlier recorded Waymon’s confession.

Jack picked up the pad and handed it to Wes. “Waymon’s confession about the scheme he, Frigman, and Olgent had going.” Jack pointed to the bottom of the page. “Waymon even signed it.”

Wes glanced at the notepad. “But...where’s Waymon now?”

Jack described the events of the last couple of days and what happened on the boat.

“So, Waymon slipped and fell over the side?” Wes asked, a tinge of skepticism in his voice.

Jack looked into Wes’s eyes. “What’s that look? He did fall! I tried to save him, but he refused my help. Then...well, you know the old saying, ‘what goes around, comes around’.”

“Explain.”

“Waymon met the fate he and his cronies had planned for me.”

“Which was?”

“He was torn apart by sharks.”

Wes finished jotting his notes then put his notepad in a pocket. “Is that all of it, Jack? You’re telling me that’s exactly how it went down?”

Jack was a little surprised at the question. “Hell, yes, Wes—exactly! I can’t believe you’d even ask me that!”

Wes held up a hand. “Relax. I believe you—I just had to ask...officially.” He shrugged. “Personally, I never had any doubts. Besides, that Quinn kid told me about what he’d seen and the evidence he has hidden. He and Dr. Carrel also, how shall I say—convinced Frigman to confess.” He chuckled and shook his head then told Jack about how Frigman had gotten wedged into a cadaver coffin. “We have plenty of corroborating evidence and testimony.”

Wes led Jack out of the cabin. “C’mon, let’s get the hell outta here. I’ve got a crime scene to secure, and you’ve got someone to go celebrate with.”

“Right.” Jack clapped Wes on the shoulder and smiled as he gazed toward Janice.

(Two weeks later)

Jack squirmed in his chair, listening to Dwayne Meeley, the lead counsel of the medical center, as he droned on about the “situation” Jack had created. A thin smile creased Jack’s lips as he mused about the ironic sense of déjà vu between this situation and those that had happened in the aftermath of Iraq. Once again, he found himself in the crosshairs, but this time, he’d taken steps to protect himself, having learned from his experience.

Jack had given all the documents he’d received from Sheila to the FBI. They felt the papers clearly showed Waymon, Olgent, and Frigman’s grant money embezzlement activities. They also had plenty of evidence to link the three to the related murders. Frigman and Olgent were also singing like canaries, turning on each other in an attempt to get a plea deal.

The Medical Center Board was, however, unhappy that Jack had not consulted them before turning over the documents to the FBI. They told Jack they’d have preferred to have had an opportunity to generate a damage control strategy for the potential public affairs fiasco. True to the form of many such governing bodies, Jack thought. They’re more interested in covering their own asses than doing the right thing.

“Look, Dwayne, can we just cut to the chase?” Jack asked. “What do you want from me, and what are you offering in return?” Jack cocked his head to one side and stared quietly at Meeley.

Meeley cleared his throat, delaying several seconds before replying.

“Well, Dr. Bass, the board has decided they don’t want the risk of negative media exposure.” Meeley glanced over the top of his glasses at Jack then quickly away.

Jack sat silently for several seconds, poker-faced as he stared at Meeley. “Go on.”

Meeley opened his briefcase, rummaging through it.

“The board is prepared to make you a very generous severance offer in return for certain guarantees from you.” He pulled out a paper and held it up, gazing at it. “We all feel it would be in the best interest of the medical center if you were no longer on staff—”

Jack scooted forward in his chair, brusquely interrupting. “And why, exactly, would that be, Dwayne? What, exactly, are the reasons for dismissal?”

“Well, Dr. Bass, we prefer not to think in terms of dismissal. Rather, you’d be leaving for health reasons.”

“Then exactly what would those ‘health reasons’ be, counselor?”

“We had mental health and stress in mind...” Meeley replied somewhat sheepishly.

Jack exploded out of his chair and stood glaring down at Meeley.

“No way! You assholes are not going to railroad me into admitting this all happened because I have some mental health issue! Just. Ain’t. Gonna. Happen.” Jack jabbed a finger at him. “So, you better come up with a better scenario, or I head to the press with a full disclosure. Then all of you can sweat out how you’re going to explain it all to the reporters that’ll come here from everywhere—the murders, the embezzlement, the involvement of your goddam police chief and medical center president!” Jack slowly settled back into his seat. “Now, that would be some negative media exposure!”

Meeley gazed at the floor and nodded.

“Let’s try this again,” Jack said more calmly. “Tell me what you’re really willing to offer, and I’ll tell you what I’m willing to accept. If that won’t work for you, this meeting is over.”

Meeley again cleared his throat, wriggling in his chair as he held a document out for Jack.

“We’re offering three months’ salary and a favorable public statement regarding your tenure—”

“Not even close to good enough!”

Meeley cringed.

“Let me tell you my offer, Dwayne. And listen good because it’s non-negotiable, and I’ll need an answer...now! Or there will be no deal.”

“Go ahead...but there’s no need to yell at me. I’m just the messenger...”

“Sorry, Dwayne. Sometimes, I yell at people who are being total jackasses to me. And messenger or not, you were part of this decision.”

Meeley nodded, not making eye contact.

“You clowns want me gone—fine! Consider me gone, but here’s what it’s going to take. You’ll give me two year’s salary as severance, and you’ll release the statement that I’ve drafted.” Jack took a deep breath and calmed himself. “You people brought me here, put me at mortal risk, and now that I’ve fixed your screwed-up situation, you want me to conveniently disappear. Okay—it is what it is. But it’s going to cost you—just like you all nearly cost me my life!”

Jack reached into his briefcase and pulled out a document and handed it to Meeley. Meeley raised his eyebrows, looking at the paper Jack held out.

“What’s this?”

“It’s the press release I just mentioned—it explains that I’ll be leaving to provide healthcare in underserved, third-world countries, and that Southern Medical Center is appreciative of all of the excellent services I’ve provided in my short tenure here. That’s it—no changes, no edits. In return, I will offer to cooperate fully with any ongoing FBI or local law enforcement investigation. I will not discuss the details with any press but, instead, will refer them back to you.” Jack reached out and flicked the paper Meeley held. “And, Dwayne, I will be monitoring any responses given to those I refer to you. If the responses in any way incriminate or criticize me, I go public—with all the gory details.”

Jack leaned back in his chair, waiting for Meeley to finish reading the press release then again reached into his briefcase. Jack pulled out another document that he held out to Meeley.

“More, Jack?”

“Oh, yeah. This is a copy of a severance agreement I had my lawyer draft—this and the press release have already been reviewed and approved by the FBI legal folks, too.”

Meeley’s shoulders slumped, and he groaned.

“We can sign all this now and be on our merry ways, or you guys can try to play games with me, and this will likely get very ugly.”

Meeley took a couple of minutes to finish reading then cleared his throat again. “You say none of this is negotiable?”

“Correct.”

“I don’t think we can—”

“Then give me the documents back, and I’ll be on my way...but you should probably watch the evening news.”

A sheen of sweat formed on Meeley’s bald head.

“Dwayne, should I remind you again of a few key points...”

Meeley looked up at Jack, a somber expression on his face. He shook his head. “No. That won’t be necessary. I’ve got it. Off the record, I don’t blame you for feeling this way.” He was silent for several seconds. “I’ll need to make a copy of these.”

“I have two copies with me—we can sign both and be done.”

“Okay...” Meeley pulled a pen from a pocket.

Each of them placed a copy of the signed documents in their respective briefcase. Meeley reached out to shake Jack’s hand.

“I hope you understand, Jack, it’s nothing personal.”

Jack looked at Meeley’s hand and then into his eyes. “Yeah, I’ve heard that a lot since I’ve been here, Dwayne. It feels very personal to me, though. Good-bye.”

Jack stood and spun, leaving Meeley’s office without shaking hands.

Jack went home. He needed a drink and a chance to relax. It ended up taking two drinks before his ire began to drain away. He set the empty Cosmopolitan glass on his kitchen table and slumped in his chair, his eyes glossing over as he dozed off and began dreaming.

• • • •

(Fifteen months ago)

JACK SAT IN THE ROCKING chair, wearing a bored expression as he listened to the JAG captain proceed with his explanation of the Army’s position on Jack’s future. He had hoped to hear about an early release from a mandated month in the psychiatric ward of Walter Reed Hospital. Though Jack had assured his caregivers he felt fine and was ready to resume active duty, there was a continued insistence that he stay there, isolated on the locked hospital ward. The excuse repeatedly given was that his psychiatric caregivers felt he was still suffering from protracted and severe Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. Jack had to admit he was likely afflicted with PTSD but also felt that the counseling he’d received would be more than sufficient for him to self-manage the problem.

“You see, Colonel Bass, the Army’s position is that it would be bad press if the American public were to hear about an Army doctor killing enemy combatants—and, especially, that he used medical supplies to do it.”

Jack snorted. “Yeah, because war never results in enemy combatants being killed, eh?”

The captain looked nervously over his wire-rim glasses at Jack then continued. “Some might even construe the deaths as...murder.”

“What?”

“We’ve interviewed all the surviving witnesses of your unit, Colonel.”

Jack stopped rocking and leaned forward, staring intently at the JAG officer, then he shrugged. “And?”

“Well...we have some concerns.”

“Look, I admit I killed enemy combatants in order to save my staff—after patients and our commanding nurse were killed mercilessly, I might add. So, I just don’t understand the issue here.”

Poker-faced, the lawyer nodded silently then continued. “Our investigation also determined that you, personally, acted decisively with great bravery and at great risk to your own well-being. Because, and only because of that fact, at this time, the Army is not pursuing any charges or conducting any further investigation into the incident.”

The captain squirmed in his chair and shot another quick glance at Jack.

“That is, if certain terms are agreed to by you.” The captain’s gaze darted back and forth from Jack to the documents he’d pulled from his briefcase.

Jack scooted to the edge of his chair. "And...those terms are?" he asked tersely.

"Quite frankly, Colonel, you present a significant quandary to the Army command staff. On the one hand, you were quite heroic, but, on the other hand, you pose a significant public relations risk for the Army. I'm afraid if General Smithson hadn't intervened on your behalf—"

Jack interrupted. "Just answer my goddam question, Captain! What are the terms?"

The captain hesitated briefly then held out the documents to Jack.

"After careful consideration, the Army is willing to make you a very generous offer to resolve this quandary."

"Quandary! I acted to save the lives of my staff and myself!" Jack slouched back in his chair, crossing his arms over his chest, confused and frustrated. He suddenly leaned forward and snatched the papers from the captain's hand.

The JAG man pointed at the papers Jack held. "The documents describe the terms. Let me explain them," he stated, clearing his throat and shifting uneasily again in his chair.

"Please proceed, Captain." Jack set the documents on his lap, leaned back in his chair, and frowned.

"In consideration of the injuries you incurred during those actions, you are to be awarded a Purple Heart."

Jack shrugged quickly but said nothing.

"As well, your decisive actions likely saved the lives of not only your staff but also a number of regular troops. Therefore, you are also being awarded a Silver Star."

Jack's eyes went wide. "What?" he asked, surprised. "I don't deserve that!"

The captain flipped to another page and continued hesitantly, "But because of the concern that public knowledge of some of your actions may tarnish the reputation of the Army Medical Corps, you will be offered an opportunity for an immediate honorable discharge with full retirement benefits commensurate with your rank. You will be required to sign this agreement, stating you will never speak to anyone of the events in Iraq. Furthermore, the Army has decided this will now be labeled as classified information and, therefore, will not be released for public access. If you are ever asked about said events, you will simply state that the events are classified, and you can't comment." The captain stopped and took a deep breath, looking expectantly at Jack.

"Continue." Jack made a circular motion with his hand.

"Additionally," the captain went on as he glanced over his glasses at Jack, "if you do not willingly sign this agreement or if you sign it and ever violate it, the Army is prepared to bring you up on charges of murder and start formal court martial proceedings. You will be arrested, stripped of your rank, dishonorably discharged, stripped of any retirement benefits...and possibly imprisoned." The captain's brow was covered with sweat as he sat staring blankly at Jack.

Jack sat silently for several seconds then took a tissue from the box sitting on the end table next to his chair. He gave it to the captain.

"I think you might need this."

Jack mulled the words he'd just heard as the lawyer fidgeted and repeatedly wiped his brow.

"Captain, I'm sorry you were sent over here to do this dirty little deed, so I want you to know I'm not mad at you. I am, however, mad and disappointed at this," he responded, holding up the document the captain had handed him. "Though I strongly protest this action, you can tell your superiors that I will not do so formally and will agree to the terms."

Jack sat forward, gazing intently into the captain's eyes.

“Believe me, I wish I could forget the whole experience, but I’m afraid I already have a ‘life sentence’ of those memories. I’ll be only too happy to never speak of it again...maybe that will help lessen the torture of this PTSD.”

The captain pushed his glasses up his nose, shifting anxiously in his chair.

“That said, I guess I don’t have much choice about signing this agreement, do I?”

The captain maintained a blank look and shrugged.

“Thank you, Colonel Jack Bass, for all of your years of devoted service...” Jack mumbled sarcastically as he imagined the text of his retirement announcement. He shook his head slowly and held out a hand.

“Got a pen? They don’t let me have sharp objects in here.”

• • • •

JACK SAT UP IN THE chair with a start as he awoke, sweat-soaked as usual after a flashback. He looked at his wristwatch.

“Shit! Two in the morning!”

He plopped back in the chair, staring at the ceiling.

“I just can’t take any more of this,” he grumbled dejectedly. “I need to end it.”

(0630, Friday)

Jack's secretary, Mary, looked up from her keyboard and smiled as he walked into her small anteroom.

"Hey, Dr. Bass. How'd the meeting go?"

"Fine. They agreed to my terms," Jack replied with a hint of sarcasm, winking at her as he sat on the corner of her desk. "You know, Mary, I'm really going to miss you... I've really enjoyed working with you."

"Likewise, boss."

"Would you quit calling me boss? You know I don't like that." He shook his head, a hint of a smile on his lips.

"Okay...Dr. Boss." She shrugged and chuckled.

Jack rolled his eyes. "Whatever happened to just plain, old Jack?"

"Can't do it, Dr. Bass; you've earned the respect of the title. Besides, there is no 'plain old Jack' in this room, only a great boss."

"C'mere, you troublemaker," he said as he held his arms out to her. Jack leaned over and gave her a warm hug. As he straightened, he looked at Mary.

"What's the matter?"

"I just wish you'd have arrived sooner... Poor Dr. Wallace and Dr. Costas—I feel so bad for them and their families." She turned her gaze to the floor. "It sucks that they got killed for trying to do what's right."

"I know—sometimes, it feels like honesty and competency are liabilities in the workplace anymore. It does suck."

He hopped off her desk and strode into his office, quickly immersing himself in the task of packing. He was holding a picture of Lori, admiring it, when he was interrupted by a gentle knock at the door.

"Come in." He hurriedly placed the picture in a box.

Mary inched open the door and entered, wringing her hands. "Would you ever consider staying, Boss? Everybody I talk to—and me—really like you...we all think you could really help make some positive changes here."

"I wouldn't mind staying, but it's not my decision. The powers that be here at the university feel it would be better if I left," he muttered. "And all things considered...I have to agree."

Mary put her hands on her hips. "The 'powers that be' are dumbasses, then," she said, wringing her hands. "We'll sure miss you."

Tears trickled down her cheeks, and Jack walked to over to her, embracing her and patting her gently on the back. "Mary, it's not like I'm going to the moon—I'll stay in touch."

"You'd better." She pushed herself away and wiped at her tears. "Look at me—bein' all mushy and unprofessional. I need to get back to work."

Jack held her hand as he looked into her eyes. "I'll miss you, Mary. I've come to think of you more as a friend than a co-worker," he said.

"Gotta get back to work—get ready for a new boss." She spun and left, pulling the door closed behind her.

Jack stood a few seconds, looking at the door, swiping a tear from the corner of his eye. Thank God, his father wasn't there to witness Jack crying—it would have resulted in a beating, just as it always had when he was a kid.

As he continued packing, he tried not to dwell on the rumor that someone on the university board had influence in the local district attorney's office and had helped Olgent cut a deal if he testified against Frigman and Waymon. Wes Watley had been very apologetic when he'd told Jack about the possible development earlier in the morning but stated he was unlikely to be able to impact that decision. Jack finished packing, cast a quick glance about the office, and backed through the door with his box of belongings. When he turned to face Mary's desk, she wasn't there.

“Elvis has left the building,” he muttered sarcastically as he walked out the office door.

Jack pulled into the driveway of Janice's house and sat in his truck for a few minutes, trepidation preventing him from opening the truck door. Finally, he took a deep breath, stepped out of the truck, and approached her front door. Janice threw it open before he knocked, smiling warmly at him.

"I wondered if you were going to sit out there all day," she joked. "I was about to come out and join you."

"Oh, sorry about that. I-I was just gathering my thoughts about what I need to tell you," Jack responded clumsily, his gaze darting about.

"Uh oh. That sounds...ominous." Her smile dissolved, and a concerned look crept onto her face. "Jack, now you have me worried—is this going to be something I don't want to hear?"

He looked at the ground, rubbing the toe of his shoe inanely on the concrete. After a few seconds he looked up at her. "I hope it's not something you don't want to hear," he said in a tenuous voice. "It took me so long to work up the courage to come talk to you about this... It would be tough to swallow if you wouldn't let me tell you."

She pulled him through the door. "C'mon in. I've got some coffee on—we can have a cup and chat."

Janice poured them both a cup of coffee as Jack took a seat at her breakfast table. She set the coffee cups on the table then sat, looking at him, her face drawn and pale. "Jack, you know me well enough to know I don't beat around the bush. You seem like you've got something on your mind—just go ahead and tell me what it is. I'll deal with it."

Jack fiddled with the handle on his coffee mug for a few seconds and cleared his throat a few times.

"I just came from the medical center—got everything packed up from my office." He took a sip of coffee and set the cup back on the table, focusing his gaze on it. "I guess that means I'm done here. I don't quite know where that leaves me, career-wise...or personally."

Jack looked up from his coffee cup, glancing at Janice's face, immediately wishing he hadn't. Tears welled up in her eyes.

"Janice...I-I'm sorry. Please don't cry." He shook his head. "Sheesh, I'm lousy at this sorta stuff—I feel like an adolescent boy." He took her hand, leaning closer to her, looking into her eyes. "I-I'd actually hoped what I'm trying to say would not be something that would make you feel bad."

She squeezed Jack's hand, her gaze anxiously searching his face.

"I'll apologize ahead of time if it doesn't sound romantic and comes out kind of awkward, but here it goes. Janice...I really like you. If you think you could ever be interested in an oaf who can't seem to stay out of trouble, I'd love to see if we could explore a...longer-term relationship. You don't have to answer me now—"

She heaved a big sigh and slapped his shoulder playfully then threw her head back and laughed.

"Of course, I'd love to continue with our relationship—I can't believe you were even concerned about that." She blew out a long breath. "Hell, I thought you were going to dump me!" She smiled broadly, got up from her chair, then sat on his lap. She put her arms tightly around him, her face brushing his as she nuzzled at his neck. "Oh, Jack, sometimes, I just don't know about you. This is why you were all nervous when you got here?" She chuckled again.

"Well, I, uh..."

“Jack, I know us old maids are not supposed to have a love life, but...I think I’ve been falling in love with you for some time now. You’re not an oaf, and you’re not a troublemaker—you’re a sweet man who makes me feel good.”

Jack put his arms around Janice, pulling her close in a tight hug. “I tried not to, Janice, but...I think I’ve fallen in love with you, too.”

She leaned back and stared into his eyes. “Jack Bass, you just made me a very happy old maid.”

“But there is something...”

She sat bolt upright. “What?” she asked, alarm in her voice.

“Well, I’ve got something I have to do...and it’s going to take me out of town. I don’t know how long it will take—probably no more than a few days, though. I wanted to ask you...if you’d be interested in going on a nice, long trip with me after I get back.”

“I could answer that better if I knew where we were going and for how long.”

“I want to keep the location a surprise. I haven’t worked out any details yet, but we can stay there as long as we like.”

She stared blankly at him then arched an eyebrow.

“Don’t worry—where I have in mind is very nice, very private...and has beautiful weather.” He winked at her. “And this time, I’ll bring my own swim trunks.”

“I don’t know, Jack...” she teased.

Jack’s heart suddenly raced. He pulled at his collar as he stared at her, his mouth agape.

“I’m kidding! You need to stop worrying so much. Yes, I’ll go! It sounds like fun...and I could use a little mystery in my life. When would we be leaving?”

“I was hoping we’d be able to hit the road in a week or so.”

“That’s not much warning, but what the hell, it’s about time I was a little more impulsive. It’s a deal!”

Jack put his hand gently behind her neck and pulled her lips to his for a kiss. Her tongue gently caressed his. After a few seconds, she pulled away from him and stood, still holding his hand.

“C’mon, big boy. If you’re going to be away for a few days, I need to get as much of you as I can right now.”

Jack’s heart thumped, and he smiled as she led him into her bedroom.

Jack stepped out of the cab into the chilly Washington, D.C. morning. He scanned the always-humbling scenery of Arlington National Cemetery. He put his cap on then rubbed his gloved hands together in an effort to keep the chill away. His breath created small, cottony puffs of icy crystals as he started his trudge across the frost-embossed lawn.

Jack felt a little odd, even out of place, wearing his Army dress uniform now that he was retired. But when he came to this hallowed place to visit fallen comrades, he believed he should dress in a fashion that honored those who rested here eternally. A chill ran down his spine. He was unsure if it was from the cold of the morning or the sight of row after row of perfectly arranged grave markers, each denoting the remnants of what had been a human life.

The location of the tomb marker he was visiting was as permanently emblazoned on his mind as the name that was carved into the stone of that marker. After several minutes of walking on the frost-tipped grass among the tombs, Jack finally stopped, turned to face her marker, and snapped to attention. He'd never been very good at such military etiquette but performed as sharp a salute as he could. He then kneeled on one knee, leaning forward and gently kissing the top of the gravestone. His lips lingered on the marker until the frigid marble forced him to pull away.

"Hey, Lori. How've you been?" He dug in a pocket, pulling out a small bottle of Kahlua. "I brought something for you." He smiled feebly as he gazed at the bottle. "Your favorite brand." He gently set the brown bottle on the ground next to the marker, knowing that sooner or later some wino would stagger through the cemetery and find a little treasure. Still, he repeated the gesture with every visit.

"I really miss you, girl. I-I'll never be able to forgive myself for allowing you to be killed."

Jack turned around, easing himself into a sitting position on the frigid ground in front of the grave, leaning back against the headstone then drawing up his knees and resting his arms on them.

"I sure could've used your help with this last little fiasco I got myself into—I'm sure I would have handled it much better if you'd been at my side." Jack took a deep breath then released it in a long sigh. "I really miss being able to talk to you about tough issues like that one... We always managed to work them out together, didn't we?" He smiled sadly. "What a team we made, eh?"

He leaned his back head against the stone, gazing up at the glorious blue sky.

"Lori...I really screwed up by never settling into something more permanent with you. I really did think that was the best thing to do with us both being in the Army and constantly assigned apart from each other." He hung his chin to his chest. "I just never thought about you being taken from me forever—I always thought there'd be time for us after we left the service. Time for marriage, a home...a family. But here I am, once again kicking myself over that decision—and knowing I'll never be able to correct it."

He patted the ground then caressed the grass gently. "I-I don't want to make that same mistake again. I've met someone I'm very attracted to...and I think we could have a nice relationship. Her name is Janice, and she's a nurse, too—I think you'd like her." He reached back to put his hand on the tombstone, stroking it as he paused a few seconds.

"I know, I know—you'd tell me I need to get on with my life and forget about you, but...I want you to know you'll always be in my heart and in my thoughts."

He stood, turning toward the grave as he dug a hand in a pocket of his overcoat.

“I probably won’t be able to visit you for a while, so I had this made—so you’ll know you’re always in my thoughts.”

He stood and draped the chain of the small, engraved plastic placard over the grave marker and moved back a few steps to look at it. He wiped a few tears from his cheek, stepped forward to straighten the placard, then moved back again and nodded. Perfect. The placard was a simple, black plastic marker with letters engraved in white that read, Love you always. Jack. He stood ramrod straight and saluted the marker again then wiped more tears from his cheeks. “I still love you...and always will. Good-bye, Lori.”

He did a sharp about face and rushed back toward the waiting cab. He took out a hanky to wipe his eyes and face as he approached the vehicle, not wanting the driver to see he’d been crying. The harsh training his father had repeatedly beaten into him about men not crying still influenced his behavior. He crawled into the welcome warmth of the cab.

“Dulles, please.”

As the cab drove slowly out of the cemetery, Jack looked back, placing the palm of his hand against the window.

“Good-bye,” he muttered.

The cabbie looked in his rearview mirror and gave Jack a warm smile. Jack returned it awkwardly and looked quickly out the window, tears flowing again, his father be damned.

• • • •

WHEN HE ARRIVED AT the airport, Jack hoped his eyes weren’t still puffy and red. As he walked into the terminal, he started smiling as he thought about the trip on which he was about to embark, barely noticing all of the gazes he was receiving from other travelers. He grinned and nodded at those who would look him in the eye as he anxiously searched the crowd for one specific face.

He finally spotted Janice standing at the counter where they’d agreed to meet. She, too, was searching the crowd. As he grew near, their eyes met, large smiles quickly covering both of their faces. They fell into each other’s arms and embraced tightly, remaining unmoving and silent for several minutes. Jack savored the nearness and warmth of the lingering hug. Eventually, Janice lifted her face from Jack’s chest and pressed her lips to his. Jack became fully absorbed in the pleasure of a long, open-mouthed kiss, despite the crowd bustling around them. When they finally separated, she backed up a step and looked Jack up and down.

“Wow, Jack! You look pretty sharp all dressed up like that. I’m impressed with all the chest cabbage. What’s the occasion?”

“Oh, uh...just had to finish up a little business in town—but now, it’s time to retire this uniform permanently.”

Janice looked at Jack but didn’t probe further.

“You’ve got the tickets I sent you?”

“Right here.” She patted the large purse hanging from her shoulder.

“Great! I hear the beaches on Barbados are wonderful! Ready for some sun and surf?”

“Yeah—and I can’t wait to finally see you in a swimsuit.”

He took her hand in his, and they started walking.

“And I can’t wait to get out of this uniform and into swim trunks.”

She squeezed his hand, smiling up at him with a twinkle in her eye. Each grabbed a bag and walked hand in hand toward their gate.

This is not the end...

JACK'S STORY CONTINUES with another hypnotic, spine tingling episode.

*Click Here To Read, Book Three, Death Management!*

KEEP READING FOR THE next book in Fractured

JUMP TO THE TABLE OF Contents

EDWIN DASSO, MD, A USA Today and Amazon International #1 Best-Selling medical thriller author, writes works of fiction that leverage many of his "stranger than fiction" experiences from years of practice at major medical centers and community hospitals.

"You might be shocked at some of the events in the books that are based on an actual experience."

Member of the International Thriller Writers. His "Jack Bass Black Cloud Chronicles" series has been developed into a TV series, "Jack Bass, MD.". Network feedback has been very positive.

Fiction writing is reviving a lost love from earlier periods in his life where he enjoyed writing short stories. In addition to a number of years as a practicing anesthesiologist and critical care specialist, he has published articles in national healthcare journals, written many "Ask the Doctor" columns and has spoken frequently at national healthcare forums. He has also been instrumental in designing and deploying population health programs to help people deal with depression related to poor health.

Visit www.eddassobooks.net and sign up with your email address to receive news, updates and special offers.

SURGICAL RISK
BY ROBERT I. KATZ

Author's Rating:

Language: ** Sexuality: ** Violence: ****

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE, each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

Surgical Risk Copyright © 2002 by Robert I. Katz

This is a work of fiction. Any resemblance to any person, living or dead, is strictly coincidental.

All rights reserved, including the right to reproduce this book, or portions thereof, in any form, without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles or reviews.

Do you love a hero who pulls no punches and never gives up?
When a former girlfriend is found strangled in a hospital call room, surgeon Richard Kurtz and detective Lew Barent are drawn into a twisted tale of bitter revenge.

“SO THIS CHARACTER COMES into the Emergency Room,” Nolan said. “He’s well dressed. He looks normal. He smiles politely, apologizes for bothering us, and says he has six acupuncture needles up his penis.” Crane, Liebert and Kurtz silently ate their pizza while they considered Nolan’s statement. Six acupuncture needles up the penis, all of them felt, deserved at least a moment of silence.

Crane wiped olive oil from his fingers, opened the box and picked out the last slice of pepperoni. “Didn’t that hurt?” he asked.

“It didn’t seem to bother him,” Nolan said.

“But why did he do it?”

Nolan grinned. “Probably because he’s a pervert.”

“He didn’t say that, did he? ‘I like to shove things up my penis because I’m a pervert.’”

“I guess not,” Nolan said.

“Well, what did he say?”

“He said that he had an itch.”

“Hell of an itch,” Crane said, and took a bite out of his pizza.

Crane was stout, with broad shoulders and thick, muscular arms. Nolan was tall, stooped and lean. Both men were pale, pasty faced and sunken eyed. It was a body habitus endemic to surgery residents, a breed that rarely saw the sun and subsisted for the most part on pizza, take out Chinese and junk food.

“So what did you do?” Kurtz asked. Richard Kurtz had been an attending surgeon for nearly three years. He was almost as pale as the residents but somewhat better rested and much better fed. The others stared at him. Nolan gave a quick, cautious smile. Three nights before, a skinny kid with a pierced tongue, a pierced nose and probably a pierced brain, tripping out of his mind on amphetamines, with tattoos covering most of his torso, had tried to strangle one of the orderlies; but beyond the simple application of brute force the kid had no technique whatsoever. Kurtz had knocked him down and sat on him, an act which considerably reinforced Kurtz’ already macho reputation. Privately, Kurtz thought the reputation absurd, but he wasn’t going to fight it.

“We took him to the O.R., did a cysto and managed to grab them with a biopsy forceps. Turned out there weren’t six of them. There were eight.”

“Jesus,” Crane said with a shudder.

Kurtz raised a brow, shook his head and took a sip of his coke. “That’s even weirder than a gerbil up the ass,” Liebert said.

They all nodded in unison but the gerbil story was old hat, and probably untrue. Kurtz had heard it from several different sources over the years. Supposedly one of Hollywood’s top action heroes, a guy married to a gorgeous model whose face had appeared on every magazine cover in America, had come into the E.R. at New York Hospital with a gerbil up his ass. It made a great story—but no such case report had ever appeared in the medical literature.

“Does anybody know which particular foreign body in the rectum is responsible for the greatest number of E.R. visits?” Kurtz asked.

“Dildos,” Nolan said immediately. “And vibrators.”

“Very good,” Kurtz said. “What’s number two?”

“Cucumbers?” Crane said.

“Nope. They’ve been reported, but they’re not in the top two or three. Anybody?”

Nolan shrugged. Crane ate his pizza. Liebert smiled like the good little medical student that he was, waiting to be enlightened.

“Depends on the study, actually,” Kurtz said. “One says rubber balls, one says glass bottles, another one says wooden dowels.” He shrugged.

Crane visibly winced. “I’ve seen a couple of vibrators. I haven’t seen any wooden dowels.”

“Trust me,” Kurtz said. “You will.”

“I read a letter in the New England Journal of Medicine a couple of years ago,” Nolan said. “It was written by a British urologist visiting America. He was invited to look in on a cysto and he sees a sign in the patient’s bladder saying, ‘Drink at Joe’s Bar.’ At first, he thought it was the American penchant for advertising carried to an extreme, before he realized that the guy had shoved a swizzle stick up his urethra.”

“That’s bullshit,” Kurtz said. “There are just as many nut cases in England as there are over here.”

“Hey, I’m just telling you what it said.”

Crane leaned back in his seat and covered a yawn with his fist. “I read a letter in The New England Journal from a physician who was out jogging in the middle of winter. It was really cold out and his running suit wasn’t warm enough. By the time he got home, he could barely feel his penis. Nobody was home, so he dropped his pants and began to warm it up with his hand. At the same time, while he’s standing there in the foyer, he begins to flip through the latest issue of the New England Journal, which is sitting there with the mail. Just then, the front door opens and in walks his wife. The letter said that she wasn’t amused.”

“I don’t get it,” Liebert said. “What do you mean?”

Crane rolled his eyes. Nolan grinned. “The wife thought he was jerking off while reading the New England Journal.”

“And the New England Journal printed this?” Liebert said.

“I guess they figured it was sort of a human interest story.”

Kurtz put his feet up on the edge of the desk, took a slow deep breath and willed his tight muscles to relax. The hall outside his office was dimly lit and silent. It was one A.M. Only an hour before, they had finished sewing up a young woman who had been stabbed in the chest by a jealous boyfriend. But at the moment things were quiet: no cases in the E.R., all the patients tucked in and sleeping, no vomiting or sudden fever or cardiac arrest. Nothing to do but sit tight and wait for the shift to end. They should go get some sleep themselves, Kurtz thought. You never knew.

“But wasn’t he embarrassed?” Liebert asked.

“Who?” said Nolan.

“The guy with the acupuncture needles: wasn’t he embarrassed?”

“Oh, him.” Nolan yawned, seemingly bored with the subject. “Not in the slightest. The attending urologist told me afterward that the guy would probably get a stricture. He’ll have trouble peeing for the rest of his life.” He shook his head again. “Crazy.”

“Crazy,” Kurtz murmured. He put his feet down from the desk, opened a drawer and began to rummage through it. “You want to see crazy?” He found what he was looking for buried under a pile of old papers. “This is really crazy.” He held it up.

Crane scratched his head. Nolan slowly nodded. Liebert blinked, wrinkled his nose and stared.

It was a chest x-ray. Three flat razor blades nestled between the lungs, obscuring the shadow of the heart. “A psych patient,” Kurtz said. “His name is Bill Mose; he’s a schizophrenic. He sits around, watches T.V. and smokes cigarettes.” Kurtz shrugged. “You talk to him, he makes no sense whatsoever but he occasionally expresses the opinion that he’s being persecuted. He considers himself to be misunderstood and perfectly well adjusted. He likes to eat things.”

“Jeez,” said Crane, “like Hannibal the Cannibal.”

“He doesn’t eat people,” Kurtz said, “just things.”

“I thought they didn’t allow smoking in the hospital,” Liebert said.

“They do for the long-term inpatients. Some idiot decided to make a civil rights case out of it and threatened to sue.”

“What happened to him?” Liebert asked.

“We got the razor blades out with an endoscope. Within a week, he had swallowed a pencil eraser and a couple of pens, so we took him to the O.R. and did it again.”

“Is he still alive?” asked Crane.

“So far as I know, he’s upstairs,” Kurtz said. “On the locked ward. He’s been there for years.”

Three nights later, a pharmacist’s aide came to the door of the locked ward, peered in through the glass and waited until every patient within sight had moved away to a healthy distance. At this hour of the night, there were only a handful: Bill Mose and a few others whose inner clocks ticked to their own distinctive beat. The aide looked to be a new one. Mose didn’t recognize him, but he obviously knew the routine, quietly waiting by the doorway while the patients shuffled off. As always, Mose was the last, but finally he too reluctantly moved down the hall, and the aide turned the key in the lock and entered, closing the door behind.

The patients ignored him, all except Mose, who pretended to as much apathy as the rest but whose attention focused like radar on the jangling keys that represented freedom.

The pharmacist’s aide handed over his shipment of pills while the head nurse signed for them and a little redhead with a sour face named Weems began to put the pills into each patient’s medicine drawer.

The pharmacist’s aide walked back down the hall, scanned the immediate area to make certain that none of the patients were near enough to slip out and inserted his key. The door opened. The door closed. Sadly, Mose shook his head and shuffled up to the solid steel barrier, staring down the hall outside the unit to the elevators. As he always did, Mose grasped the doorknob and tried to turn it, expecting the usual solid resistance, but this time something was different. It took him a moment to realize what it was: the doorknob turned smoothly in his fist. The door swung open.

Confused, Mose peered out into the hallway, then back into the ward. He frowned, uncertain, then he slowly smiled. His heart pounding, fully expecting to hear the nurses’ excited voices yelling behind him, he stepped out into the corridor, closed the door silently and padded down the hall, whistling between his teeth.

Dr. Sharon Lee let the hot water run over her face and stood under the shower for a long, luxurious moment, forcing herself to relax. It was three A.M.

Sharon Lee hated stat C-sections. Everybody did. A fifteen year old girl, with no history of prenatal care, had come into the E.R. in labor and been rushed up to obstetrics with a frank breech. Sharon shuddered and breathed a long sigh and felt her heart finally begin to slow down. The residents had started without her and a good thing, too. Mother and baby were both doing fine but they had been very, very lucky.

Sharon had a clinic in the morning but it would take a half hour to get home and the same amount of time to get back. The call room beds were lumpy but the rooms were quiet and it wasn’t worth the bother to leave and then return.

She finished her shower, got into clean surgical scrubs and crawled under the covers. Then she turned out the light and rolled over, snuggling into the pillow. Her eyes closed and within minutes she was asleep.

The sound of a door creaking open awakened her and she wondered for a hazy moment where she was before a pair of hands gripped her throat. She tried to struggle, to cry out, but the hands were too strong and soon a red haze settled over her eyes and her struggles grew weaker and then she shuddered one final time and was dead.

At nine A.M., as he did every weekday morning, Oscar Hernandez knocked on the call room door and waited. After a moment, he slid his key into the lock and pushed the door open. He stopped suddenly, gulped and stared. "Oh, my God," he whispered. Carefully, he closed the door and re-locked it, then he hurried down the hallway to the nearest phone.

KURTZ' FIRST PATIENT in the morning was a burly construction worker who clung to a conviction that nothing was really wrong with him, despite the pain that made him wince whenever he moved his right side. The anesthesiologist, Vinnie Steinberg, had given the patient a sedative as soon as they entered the room and now his eyelids fluttered and he smiled sleepily while they put on the EKG and the blood pressure cuff. Steinberg took a quick look at the monitors, made a notation on the anesthesia record, winked at Kurtz and pushed the plunger on a syringe of propofol. The patient mumbled once more that he only had a "stomach ache," then his eyes glazed over and Kurtz went outside to scrub.

When he got back ten minutes later, Nolan and Crane had already put the drapes up and Nolan was standing by the patient's side, holding a knife and looking at Kurtz expectantly. "Go ahead," Kurtz said.

Nolan's knife slid in, split skin, fat, fascia and muscle. Crane helped him while Kurtz silently watched. Nolan reached the bowel, followed it along to the cecum and pulled it up onto the skin. The appendix sat there on the end, long, red and swollen, oozing a bit of serous fluid from the tip. "Just in time," Nolan said. Kurtz nodded. The appendix would have ruptured soon; the patient was lucky.

The operation went smoothly. Nolan circled the appendix with sutures, tied off the blood supply, put two clamps around the base, cut between the clamps and handed the specimen off to the nurse. Then he cauterized the stump, inverted it into the serosa, tugged the sutures tight, tied them and began to close.

"Okay," Kurtz said, and removed his gown. He ignored the whispering at the head of the table. The anesthesiologists were always talking about something and unless there was a problem with the patient, it didn't concern him.

"Hey, Richard."

Kurtz looked up. Steinberg peered at him over the drapes. "Did you hear the news?"

"News?" Kurtz frowned. "What news?"

Steinberg shook his head dolefully. "Sharon Lee," he said. "She's been murdered."

Scene of the crime: a bedroom. A single bed, a nightstand, a desk with a lamp, a bathroom with a toilet and a shower that connected with another bedroom on the other side, a green linoleum floor. All hospitals had such rooms, Barent had been told: a call room for the staff to sleep in at night when they had to be there but didn't have to actually work. There were two wings of such rooms, one for the residents and another for the attendings. The residents were required to spend their nights on call in house and so their rooms saw a lot of use. The attendings' rooms were usually empty. Barent wondered about this fact but doubted that it would be much help in narrowing things down. Most likely, everybody who had ever worked here knew it.

The Medical Examiner had already come and gone, having solemnly declared the cause of death to be strangulation. No surprises there, considering the deep bruises on both sides of the neck. The body was still lying on the floor where it had fallen, evidently after a struggle, since the bedclothes were tangled together and thrown about the room. The victim was wearing green surgical scrubs. The shirt was torn and pulled up over her face. She was a good-looking woman, if a corpse could ever be described as good-looking—slim, firm, nice breasts. Sharon Lee: Doctor of Obstetrics and Gynecology, thirty one years old, never married, no children, father dead, mother still living, one sister. Successful. Barent sighed and shook his head. Not any more.

Barent walked over to the window, parted the drapes and allowed the bright winter sunlight to shine in. They were on the Seventeenth Floor of a twenty story building on the West Side of Manhattan. Below, cars drove silently along the pavement. A row of apartment buildings, most of them less than five stories high, rose on the opposite side of the street. Beyond the apartments, the grass and trees of Riverside Park sloped down to the Hudson River, covered now with gleaming chunks of ice.

Easton had started out in 1912 as the Riverhead Psychiatric Institute, a rest home and rehabilitation center for wealthy alcoholics and neurotics. Then, in 1930, a grateful patient named Ernest Easton had died and left the place his entire fortune, on condition that the institution expand into surgery and general medicine. The Board at the time had eagerly accepted the proposed changes, but even today, more than seventy years later, nearly a quarter of Easton's patients were psychiatric, a situation that the present Board had no desire to change. Psychiatric patients rarely needed CAT scans, respirators or Intensive Care Units. Psych patients were, more often than not, low tech and cut rate.

The central courtyard of the building contained a playground, scattered trees and half a dozen picnic tables where residents of the locked wards were often brought for exercise, recreation and fresh air. In the late 1950's, the hospital had constructed an office tower for its physicians called the Hampshire Building. The Hampshire Building was made out of glass and red brick. It connected to Easton by a Third Story walkway built over the street.

"He didn't escape through the window," Moran said.

"No." It was two hundred feet to the ground. Barent turned away from the window and blinked, his eyes adjusting slowly to the relative darkness of the room. "Why do you say 'he?'"

Moran puffed up his cheeks and surveyed the dimensions of the room. "Pretty young woman. It seems likely."

Privately, Barent agreed. Statistically, most murderers were male, and women, when they did commit murder, were rarely strong enough to do so with their bare hands. "We don't know that yet," Barent said. He said it as much to himself as to Moran, who looked down at the body and ignored Barent's comment.

Barent flipped through his notebook and opened it to a clean page. The notebook served to keep his thoughts in order but its primary function was to act as a prop, something to impress the witnesses, maybe intimidate them a little. People tended to think very carefully about what they were saying, watching their words get written down as soon as they left their mouths.

"What have we got?" he asked Moran.

Moran glanced at the lab techs methodically quartering the room, taking measurements, dusting for fingerprints, preserving it all on film. They went about their business as if Barent and Moran were not there. "Presumably she locked the door but forgot about the bathroom. The doors to the bathroom and the bedroom on the other side were both unlocked."

"I see," Barent said. "Unless she did check the locks and somebody else had a key."

Moran gave a little shrug of his shoulders and glumly nodded. Beyond the barricade at the end of the hall, a small crowd of people were clustered, doctors and nurses and other hospital employees curious about what was going on.

Barent looked once more at the still body, shook his head and walked out. He followed Moran down the hall and sat behind a desk in one of the small call rooms. "Bring in the janitor."

Moran gave him a reproving look. "I believe that the preferred term is 'environmental service technician.'"

Barent barely cracked a smile. "Of course."

The 'environmental service technician' was plump, about fifty, with faded gray eyes and a bewildered, frightened expression. He sat in the chair and hunched his head down onto his shoulders.

"Can you tell me what happened, Mr. Hernandez?" Barent asked.

Hernandez blinked at him. "I opened the door," he said. "She was lying there, not moving. I went and reported it. That's all I know."

"The door was closed?"

"Yes."

"Was it locked?"

"I put the key in and turned it. If it wasn't locked, I didn't notice."

"But it might not have been locked?"

Hernandez spread his hands to the side and shrugged.

"Have there been any robberies reported from any of the call rooms? Any fights?"

"I don't know about any of that stuff," Hernandez said. "You should talk to Security."

"Security..." Barent tapped his pen against the notebook. Hernandez eyes stayed glued to his own hands, folded in his lap.

"Did you notice anything different in the hallway outside or in any of the other call rooms? Any signs of a struggle? Dirt on the carpet? Blood? Overturned furniture?"

"No." Hernandez peered glumly up at Barent. "Nothing like that."

"Did you know Dr. Lee?"

"I seen her around. I never talked to her."

Doctors, reflected Barent, probably didn't have much to say to 'environmental service technicians.' "Alright, Mr. Hernandez. Thank you. That's all I have to ask you for now."

Hernandez looked at him uncertainly. "I can go?"

"Yes." Barent scribbled in his notebook. "We'll get in touch if we need to talk to you again." Hernandez quickly nodded, got up and lumbered out. Moran shook his head. "Too bad nobody else was up here," Barent said. "They might have noticed something."

"Yeah, and we might have had a few more bodies."

A point. A definite point. "Not much in the way of witnesses, though," Barent said.

"There is one guy outside who wants to talk."

"Who?"

"Guy named Richard Kurtz: a surgeon, former boyfriend."

"Really?" Barent was frankly surprised. Former boyfriends of murdered young women usually walked quickly and quietly in the opposite direction. "Show him in," he said.

Kurtz came in and sat down. He stared at Moran, who shrugged and left the room. Kurtz was tall and lanky, with a pale complexion, dark eyes and dark curly hair. He looked at Barent impassively.

"Why did you want to talk to me, Doctor?" Barent asked.

Kurtz barely smiled, a thin humorless line in his white face. "I figured that sooner or later you would want to talk to me. Better to get it over with."

"I see," Barent said. What Kurtz said was most likely true, but still, Barent didn't like being anticipated. He frowned, picked up a pencil and made a notation in his book.

Kurtz peered at the notebook and suddenly grinned. "When I was in the Army, I spent about a year as a clerk for C.I.D. One of the investigators used to carry around a tape recorder. It made the suspects real nervous. You could see their eyes watching the spools go around, getting down everything they would say. Then he'd smile at them and switch it off. "This is just between you and me, now. O.K.?" Real confidential." Kurtz shrugged. "Sometimes it worked."

C.I.D. Barent hadn't known that, but then of course he knew nothing at all yet about Richard Kurtz or any of the other people who worked here. Kurtz had just a hint of a drawl in his speech, not quite Mid-West but not pronounced enough to be Southern.

"You were a cop?"

"No. The cops were mostly career types. I was just a kid. I enlisted right out of high school. My family had no money and I figured it was a good way to get out of West Virginia."

That accounted for the drawl. "Where were you stationed?"

"Munich. Nineteen-Eighty-One to Nineteen-Eighty-Four."

"Munich." Barent puffed up his cheeks and gave a sour little laugh. "Munich...I passed through there once. Real nice city. I was in the Army a little earlier. Da Nang and Kwang Tri.

"How did you get to be a doctor?" Barent asked.

Kurtz gave Barent a long, brooding look, his head cocked to the side. "One of my classmates used to be a traveling groupie with the Allman Brothers' Band, though I don't suppose she put that particular qualification down on her application. She went into pediatrics. Another guy who was a pretty good friend of mine used to run with a street gang. He got kicked out of high school when he was sixteen. He told me about some fights he got involved in. It seems he didn't enjoy that part of it very much, so he would just hang out near the edges of the crowd and kick the ones who were down. He's a gastroenterologist in South Carolina now. We had a former Broadway producer, a professional trombonist, at least three lawyers, four with M.B.A.'s and probably ten or more who had been in the military." Kurtz shrugged. "The science nerd stereotype is not entirely accurate."

"The Allman Brothers..."

"So she said. I didn't check her references."

Barent took a moment to try the idea on for size. Kurtz was right. People—which certainly included Barent—were not likely to imagine their doctors "traveling" with a rock band or getting kicked out of school for juvenile manslaughter.

He shrugged. "What can you tell me about Sharon Lee?"

"I met her here in the hospital. We went out for about three months."

"Was your relationship sexual?"

Kurtz barely blinked. "Now and then."

"Why did you break up?"

"I guess you could say we got on each other's nerves."

"How so?"

"Sharon's father was a partner at one of the big law firms in the city: Cravath, Swaine...Milbank, Tweed... I forget which one. Her mother has lunch with the girls and goes to garden shows. Sharon was rich, smart, good looking and used to getting her own way." Kurtz smiled wryly. "She liked men she could order around."

"And were you a man that she could order around?"

"Well..." Kurtz drawled. "I wasn't Sharon's usual sort. When she met me, Sharon had just broken up with a guy named Barry Kantor who ran a car dealership in Rahway, New Jersey. Barry was a nice fellow but not very exciting and Sharon was in the mood for something different. It turned out that she didn't like different. Sharon thought I was some sort of natural man or something, just because I didn't hold a teacup the way her JAP friends did. She thought that was great, at first, but it wore thin pretty fast. I wasn't sensitive enough for her."

Barent could understand that. Kurtz didn't exactly look sensitive. He had a square jaw and massive shoulders and looked like he was carved from a piece of granite.

"She was Jewish?"

"The family was non-religious but the name used to be Levine."

"Who broke up with who?"

"It was mutual." Kurtz shrugged. "We both made a mistake."

Barent nodded, wrote a few words in his little book. He looked up. "You have any idea who might have wanted her dead?"

Kurtz stared at him, his eyes unblinking. Barent met the stare with perfect equanimity. After a moment, Kurtz let his breath rumble out and grimaced down at the desk. "No," he said.

"How about Barry Kantor?"

"He got married a few months later. Last I heard he had two kids. I doubt it."

"After you, who was she involved with?"

"I haven't the faintest idea."

"I see." Barent stared at the walls, then he shook his head. "Thanks for your time. I'll give you a call if I have any further questions."

Kurtz made no move to get up from his chair. "Can I see the body?" he asked.

Barent frowned. Kurtz looked like he meant it but it wasn't exactly the usual procedure. "You're sure?"

"Yeah," Kurtz said shortly.

"C.I.D., huh?" Barent closed his notebook. "I really shouldn't." Kurtz waited, hunched forward a little, sitting very still. "Okay," Barent finally said. "Come on." He rose to his feet.

The lab techs were almost done. There was only one left in the room, down on his hands and knees, gathering samples of dust from under the window. "Don't touch anything," Barent warned.

Kurtz nodded but didn't look at his face. He stared down at Sharon Lee's body, saying nothing, while Barent stared at him. Barent wasn't sure about Kurtz. Usually he was pretty good at reading people, but not Kurtz. Finally, Kurtz breathed a long, slow sigh and glanced back at Barent with tired eyes. "Thank you," he said.

Barent nodded. "Don't mention it."

EXCEPT FOR THOSE INFREQUENT occasions when a delusional patient grew violent, there was rarely any excitement on the locked ward. Breakfast tended to be the high point of the morning and none of the patients missed it. There were three fold out tables in the Unit cafeteria, seating six patients each. Bill Mose always sat in the chair nearest the door. Only when he did not show up for breakfast did anyone become suspicious. The Head Nurse, a woman named Reilly, ordered, “Search the Unit.” Within minutes it had been established that Bill Mose was no longer on the ward and Miss Reilly alerted Security.

Security already knew.

The voices were particularly loud this morning, so loud that Mose could barely make out what they were saying to him, but the message they carried was a familiar one nonetheless. He looked down at the knife in his hand and almost snarled in frustration. He had already tried more than once to get it down but the knife was just too big to navigate the back of his throat. There was a lot of noise here. Confused, he shook his head.

“Don’t let him get us!” a little girl cried. She clutched a raggedy teddy bear to her chest and began to cry even louder.

A nurse—Mose knew she was a nurse from the white uniform—grabbed the little girl, dragged her into a room and slammed the door. Suddenly, the hallway was nearly silent. The knife in his fist swayed slowly back and forth, leaving trails of colored light in the air.

Mose giggled. He hadn’t had such fun in ages. The nursing station was nearby, filled with interesting things. Mose shuffled up to it. A container of paper clips sat near the phone. Mose smiled, and his mouth began to water. Perfect, he thought.

Just then, a pinging sound from the end of the hallway distracted him. He looked up. A squad of five men dressed in uniforms emerged from an elevator and raced toward him. They stopped abruptly, a few feet away. One of them, a large, black man said, “Put down the knife.”

The knife? Mose stared at the knife. A beam of light flew at him and Mose flicked at the air. The men backed slowly away. “Spread out,” one of them whispered.

The big, black one looked at him. “We can’t spread out,” he said. “We’re in a hallway.”

“Oh.” The first man blinked at the walls. “That’s right.”

The big one reached down to his belt, removed a billy club attached to a loop and hefted it in his fist. “Let’s get him,” he said.

They stared at each other, then inched forward, the big one up front.

Flickering beams of sunlight shone in through a latticed window at the end of the corridor. The beams of light hurt his eyes and Mose stabbed at them. “Get away!” he shrieked. His hands trembled. Random twitches danced along his skin. He howled, stabbing randomly at the light that clawed at his eyes. While the men stared, he stumbled against the wall, shrieking, and the knife clattered out of his hand.

“Alright, men,” the big man yelled. “Get him!”

It took all five guards to subdue him. Mose struggled wildly, squirming and twisting. He called constantly upon the name of Christ as he fought. “Jesus!” he screamed. “Jesus, help me! Help me! Ahhh!” He fought and shrieked and struggled and finally they had him face down on the hallway with his hands behind his backs. The big one pulled out a pair of handcuffs and snapped them on Mose's wrists and then he slumped down in relief, wheezing.

"Oh, man," he said. "I'm too old for this." He shook his head and hauled himself to his feet. "Okay, let's get him down to the E.R. They can call Psych." He looked at the knife lying on the floor and pointed. "And bring that. It's evidence."

Barent scratched his head and watched Bill Mose struggle. Two large orderlies had arrived from the Psych Unit upstairs a few hours before and methodically put Mose in a straight jacket. They had wanted to bring him back to the Unit but the E.R. docs had vetoed this idea, feeling obligated to work Mose up for any physical injury before releasing him. Mose seemed hardly aware of what they were doing. He panted and moaned and cried out to his own private demons while dribbling bloody saliva.

"What makes him any more of a suspect than anybody else in this place?" Barent asked.

The Chief of Hospital Security was a retired cop named Wellesley. Wellesley had a red face, a bull neck and enormous, rolling shoulders. His thighs were so large that they rubbed together when he walked, making him waddle. The buttoned down collar, maroon jacket and restrained black tie seemed absurdly out of place on Wellesley's squat, massive body. He seemed bewildered by Barent's question. "He's a known lunatic and he's been rampaging around the hospital with a knife."

This was true, Barent reflected, but it had no obvious connection to the death of Sharon Lee. "Dr. Lee wasn't killed with a knife," he said. "She was strangled."

"Then whose blood is on it? Nobody else has reported an injury." Barent looked at him and shrugged. "Probably his own. His mouth is bleeding. Is there anybody around here who knows this character?"

"I do." A tall young man with frizzy black hair, horn rimmed glasses and a pale face stepped out of the crowd gathered in front of the Emergency Room desk.

"Who are you?" Barent asked.

"William Werth. I'm his psychiatrist."

William Werth looked like an eager puppy. Barent peered at him doubtfully. "Is there any place around here we can sit down and talk?"

"Sure. Come this way."

Werth led him down the hall to an empty examining room and closed the door. The room had a treatment table covered with a roll of white paper, a metal cabinet filled with tape, gauze, sutures and other medical instruments, a round, vinyl chair on rollers, and a tiny fold down desk.

"I'll take the table," Barent said. He hoisted himself up and let his legs dangle over the edge. Werth sat in the chair.

"Okay," Barent said. He fixed his own glasses more firmly on his nose and glanced down at Werth. "That guy is your patient?"

"Ever since I've been here."

"How long is that?"

"Four years."

Four years...Barent shuddered. Not a place he would want to spend four years. "He's been here all that time?"

"He's been here for seven."

"Jesus," Barent muttered.

"We let him out sometimes, always with a group. You had to keep an eye on him. He tended to bolt."

"Does he have any family?"

“He had an older sister. She died a few years ago.”

“Inpatient psychiatric care doesn’t come cheap. Who pays his bills?”

“Actually, Mose is pretty well off. The sister left him everything.”

“Really?” Barent’s ears pricked up. “And if he dies, who gets it?”

“I’m not sure.”

“Who would know?”

“Mr. Robinson might know. If he doesn’t know, he ought to know who would know.”

“Robinson?”

“The Hospital Director.”

“Seven years...” Barent carefully removed a sharp pencil from his inner jacket pocket. He wrote Robinson and seven years down in his notebook. While he was writing, he looked at Werth out of the corner of his eye. “Any women up there?” he asked.

“On the Psych Floor?”

Barent nodded. “Yes.”

“Sure, there are,” Werth said. “But they’re in a different Unit. We keep the men and women separate.”

“Why is that?”

Werth folded his hands on top of the fold out desk and looked up at Barent with earnest surprise. “To put it in layman’s terms, these patients are completely out of their minds. Reality is a concept that they cannot deal with, or even recognize—but the sex drive stays with you until you’re pretty much dead.”

“So what? I thought sex between consenting adults was legal in this state.”

Werth swiped a hand through his hair and suddenly looked like a puppy that had just been spanked. “They’re not consenting adults. In order to give consent you have to be mentally competent. If one of these women got pregnant, we’d get our asses sued.”

Barent blinked at him. “That ever happen?”

“Not here.” The look on Werth’s face said that it had happened somewhere.

“So far as you know, did Mose ever have a relationship of any sort with another patient?”

“No,” said Werth. “Never. Mose is a schizophrenic. They can’t relate to other people. They have no capacity for any but the most superficial emotions.” Werth shook his head. “He was one of the easier patients to handle, actually. He’s totally dissociated from reality but except for his obsessions, he was almost always docile.”

“Obsessions? What obsessions?”

“He eats things. Any small, inanimate object he can get his hands on.”

Barent’s brows rose. “Sounds like quite an obsession.” He scribbled in his notebook. “And so far as you know, is there any relationship between these sorts of obsessions and a tendency to murderous behavior?”

“None at all.” Werth shook his head again. “The two things have nothing to do with each other.”

Barent tapped the tip of his pencil against the notebook while he considered. Certainly, Mose was now a suspect in the murder of Sharon Lee, if for no other reason than his obvious capacity for violence—despite what Werth said about it—and his lack of an alibi. Where had Mose been all night? Nobody seemed to know how long ago he might have vanished from the locked ward upstairs or where he might have been hiding. But Barent distrusted the whole situation. Murderers were rarely so obliging as to drop into his lap like a plum. Still...

“I’m going to have to take Mr. Mose into custody,” he said. “His medical problems won’t be neglected. He’ll be brought to a Psychiatric Hospital.” A quick grin flit across Barent’s face. “One a little more secure than Easton. If it turns out that he had nothing to do with the murder, then he’ll be returned here in a few days. Is that alright with you?”

“Do I have a choice?” Werth’s pale, freckled face turned abruptly red.

“No,” Barent said. “You don’t.”

• • • •

“MOSE?” KURTZ WHISTLED softly through his teeth. “I don’t believe it. I simply do not believe it.” He drained his beer and signaled to the waitress for another.

Bill Werth nursed a Rusty Nail, stirring it with a plastic straw every minute or so. “Running around the hospital with a knife didn’t exactly help his cause.”

“He’s psychotic, for Christ’s sake!”

“So?”

“What do you mean, so? Who knows why schizophrenics act the way they do?”

Werth shook his head. “Certainly not me.”

Kurtz gave him a disgusted look. “I’m sure your patients would love to hear that.”

“Let me amend my statement,” Werth said. “We do know that schizophrenia is a disturbance of dopamine transmission in the brain, leading to delusions, hallucinations and an inability to accurately perceive reality. We have a pretty good idea of the pathophysiology involved in the condition, and we have had some minimal success in treating it. What we have been totally unsuccessful in doing is figuring out why a particular patient suffers from a particular delusion.” Werth shrugged. “So sue me for malpractice.” He sipped his drink and crushed a piece of ice between his teeth.

Shrinks. Nothing amazed them, nothing surprised them. And they were so used to dealing with failure that failure quickly ceased to bother them. Kurtz had the surgical outlook; you fixed what was wrong with them and they got better. Kurtz expected his patients to walk out of the hospital on their own two feet and not come back. “Do you believe he did it?” he asked.

“It doesn’t matter what I believe,” Werth said.

Kurtz heard him with only a part of his mind. He kept seeing Sharon Lee lying on the floor, naked and dead. Sharon and he had had a rocky relationship from the beginning and they had broken up more than two years before but that vision still bothered him. It bothered him a lot. “Where is he now?”

“I don’t know. They took him away. Barent said he would be returned in a few days if the evidence cleared him.”

“Bill Mose weighs about a hundred twenty, hundred thirty at the most. He couldn’t have done it even if he wanted to.”

“Sure he could.” Werth held his drink up his mouth and took a long sip, then patted his lips with a napkin. “He could have if he stumbled across her when she was sleeping. And anyway, psychotics tend to be a lot stronger than they look. They don’t have normal inhibitions. If they want something, they go all out.”

“Bizarre behavior does not constitute evidence.”

Werth sipped his drink again and frowned down at the melting ice. “Barent seemed pretty sharp. If there is any physical evidence, I’m sure they’ll find it.”

Kurtz barely heard him. He stared into his beer and felt like grinding his teeth.

“You want something to eat?” Werth asked.

Kurtz shook his head. “No.” He glanced at his watch. “I’ve got to get going. I have a date.”

“Kathy?” Werth asked. Kurtz nodded.

“Lucky girl,” Werth said.

Bill Mose spent the first few hours exploring. Mose was confused. The place seemed like the locked ward he was used to but somehow, it wasn’t. The people had different faces. The rooms had different layouts and were spaced differently around the floor. There were bars on the windows. The nurses were all male, large and well built. He didn't spend too much time thinking about it, though. Mose had always been intimate with the inexplicable. He accepted it. He had no choice.

He wondered a little about the events of last night but they were already hazy in his memory. The policeman had asked him a lot of questions and Mose had tried to answer them but the policeman had not seemed happy. Then there was another man; Mose was uncertain of his name but he had seemed to be his friend. A lawyer, the man had said, appointed to represent him. Mose recognized that word...lawyer. He had seen a lot of lawyers on T.V.

The food here was no different than it had been in the other place. The pills were the same. One of the large nurses handed him his thorazine with a cup of water and waited until he had swallowed it. Then they showed him his new room and his new bed and locked the door.

That was just fine with Mose. Mose tended not to worry too much about the future. The future was a concept that he had heard of but did not really understand or believe in. The bed was soft and Mose was tired and he lay down and prepared to sleep.

Tomorrow could take care of itself.

Kathy Roselli was a Teaching Assistant, working toward her Ph.D. in the English Department at N.Y.U., where Dina Werth had recently been promoted to Associate Professor. The two women were good friends. Dina and Bill Werth had introduced Kathy and Richard Kurtz at what they had described as a "dinner party." It had been an obvious fix up since Kurtz and Kathy were the only guests, a state of affairs that had annoyed Kurtz at first and seemed to please Kathy no better.

Kurtz quickly decided, however, that annoyance in this case would be counterproductive. Kathy had very pale, clear skin, straight, jet-black hair, enormous brown eyes and a lithe, willowy body that set Kurtz' imagination to happily dancing.

Kathy's annoyance lasted a little longer. "A surgeon?" she whispered, and glanced at Dina with a frown on her face.

"He's very nice," Dina said firmly. "Aren't you, Richard?"

Kurtz, who had found himself so hypnotized by watching Kathy's lips that the words coming out of them were just a blur, barely noticed the interchange. He had been trying to discuss the Knicks' chances of going all the way with Werth and he had completely lost the thread of both conversations. Kathy had white, even teeth and very full lips, moist and (he thought) succulent. He found his mouth watering as he watched her. "What was that?" he asked.

"Nothing," Dina replied. "Nothing at all. Would you like a drink?"

"I'll have some white wine," he said, his eyes fixed on those plump, succulent lips.

"I knew a lot of pre-meds when I was an undergraduate," Kathy ventured.

"Oh?" Kurtz replied.

"They studied quite a bit." That was kind of her, Kurtz thought, very kind. He really admired how delicately she put that.

"It's unfortunate," Kurtz agreed. He was determined to be agreeable. "Pre-meds aren't exactly popular, even among themselves."

"Well, they did seem rather narrow minded."

Kurtz nodded. "In general, an unsavory bunch," he said. "But some of us do manage to resist the stereotype. I try to keep an open mind, myself."

"Really?" She smiled at him. "Do you like opera?"

"Can't stand it," Kurtz said agreeably. "How about you?"

Her smile grew wider. "I prefer ballet."

“Ballet,” Kurtz said. “I like ballet. I understand Alvin Ailey is in town. Would you like to go?”

She looked at him and said, “Maybe.”

He called her a few days later and renewed the invitation. She accepted.

That had been four months ago.

He met her tonight at a little place downtown called the Rathskellar. It had wooden tables and dim lighting and served beer, schnitzel and bratwurst. Kurtz ate there often. It reminded him of his days in the Army. Tonight, however, the menu sat listlessly in his fingers and Kurtz noticed neither Kathy nor his surroundings.

Kathy looked at him doubtfully. She had never before heard the name Sharon Lee, but he had blurted out the whole sorry story as soon as she arrived and now he sat silently, staring into his opened menu, unable to concentrate.

“You’re sure you want to do this?” Kathy asked.

Kurtz blinked. “Excuse me,” he said. “What was that?”

“The whole thing is terrible. Wouldn’t you rather just go home and forget about dinner?”

“No,” Kurtz said. “No. That’s alright.”

“What were you thinking about?”

He had been thinking of Sharon Lee’s dead body and Barent and the investigation, and how the guys he had known in Germany would have handled the case. Kurtz had turned down the opportunity for full C.I.D. training because it would have meant at least one more tour of duty and he had already decided what he wanted to do with his life, but he did wonder sometimes how things would have turned out if he had decided differently.

“I was thinking of the Army,” he said. “And Munich. Have you ever been to Munich?”

Kathy shook her head. “I was in Europe the summer of my sophomore year but I never got to Germany.”

“My favorite place was the Hofbrauhaus, the largest beer hall in the world. It dates back to the fourteenth century. The waitresses look like linebackers in dirndl skirts. They carry four steins of beer in each fist. I remember one time, I was sitting outside on the balcony. It was sunset. It must have been July, maybe August. Two guys came in with a young woman and sat down not too far from where I was. She was the most German looking girl I’ve ever seen in my life, about six feet, blonde, broad shoulders, gorgeous. She could have been an advertisement for Lufthansa or the Hitler Youth. The guy I was with—his name was Jimmy Schwartz, from Brooklyn—he looked at this girl and he shook his head and he said to me, ‘My God, it’s Brunnhilde.’ They must have seen us talking but I don’t suppose they heard what he said because all of a sudden the girl turns to me, leans over and says, ‘I know what you’re thinking: typical American tourist. Right?’ Turned out she was a kindergarten teacher from Wisconsin.” Kurtz shook his head. “Things aren’t always what they seem. You know?”

Kathy smiled doubtfully. “I’m afraid I don’t see the connection.”

“I just can’t believe he did it,” Kurtz said.

Kathy peered down at her menu and studied it for a long moment. “Did you know,” she finally said, “that the state of Wisconsin was largely settled by German immigrants? So maybe things are exactly what they seem to be, after all.”

Kurtz stared at her. “Really?”

“Really,” she said.

“I didn’t know that.”

Kathy gave a small, apologetic smile. “Do you still want to stay?”

“Sure,” Kurtz said. “We’re here. We might as well eat.”

“Okay...then I guess I’ll have the sauerbraten, with red cabbage.”

“A wise choice,” Kurtz said. He looked at her, then looked down at his menu. “But I still don’t believe he did it.”

“You’ll have to talk to Mr. Wellesley. He’s our Chief of Security.” The Hospital Director’s name was Edwin Robinson, a tall, thin man with a bald head, prominent jowls and a red face. He wore a blue, three-piece suit with a watch chain stretched across the vest. Barent couldn’t remember ever seeing one of those outside of an old movie. “I already have,” he said. “But I was wondering if you could give me your impressions as well.”

“Impressions? I have no impressions. I believe in facts, and if I don’t know the facts then I keep my mouth shut.”

Not a bad philosophy, Barent thought. “Did you know Sharon Lee?” he asked.

“We have over five hundred physicians on our staff. I believe I’ve met her. I don’t really remember.”

“How about Bill Mose?”

“The psych patient?” Robinson laughed softly. “I do remember him. He’s been here for years. On Christmas and Easter, the hospital holds a special dinner for all the inpatients. The Administrative Staff helps to serve it. We feel that it’s good for morale.”

“Dr. Werth told me that you might know the disposition of Mr. Mose’s money. It seems that he has some.”

Robinson frowned. “He has a lawyer...” Robinson scratched his head. “What was his name?” Then he snapped his fingers. “Pike,” he said. “Jeremy Pike. He’s the one who pays all the bills.”

Barent wrote Jeremy Pike down in his notebook.

“How about Richard Kurtz?” he asked. “Do you know him?”

“A surgeon. He finished his residency and went into partnership with Edward Ornella, one of our senior staff, about three years ago. People here seem to think highly of him. That’s all I know.”

Barent nodded, made a few more scribbles in his notebook, then closed it. “Thank you,” he said. “We’ll keep in touch.”

The staff on the Obstetrical Unit seemed subdued, almost shell shocked. Barent hardly blamed them. Complications and crises were supposed to happen to the patients, not the doctors. Two of the nurses and one of the secretaries were quietly crying. Barent noticed one of them in particular, an attractive young woman with long brown hair and soft, green eyes. Her nametag said Peggy Ryan.

He spent an hour on the Unit, talking with most of the staff. The ones who had worked the late shift had been asked to stay until he finished with them. One or two seemed annoyed at this but none had actively protested.

“Did Dr. Lee receive any phone calls last night?”

“You mean at home?” The ward clerk at the main desk was named Rita Mendez. She was about forty, a thin, homely woman who seemed quietly competent.

“No. I know that she had an emergency case last night, and I know that somebody must have called her in. I mean while she was here, on the Obstetrical Unit.”

Rita Mendez shook her head. “I don’t think so, but I really couldn’t say.”

“Did she have any particular friends on the Unit, anybody that she socialized with, or even talked to very much while at work?”

“Nobody that I know of.”

Sharon Lee, it seemed, was not the most sociable person in the world. She took care of business and kept her personal life private.

“How about the ones with the sniffles?” Barent asked.

“Were they friends of hers?”

Rita Mendez shrugged. “You’d have to ask them.”

He did. Peggy Ryan was still tearful. Her voice tended to crack unexpectedly. “I hardly knew her,” she said. “But she was so young and so attractive. She had everything to live for. It’s terrible.”

The other nurse, a woman named Alice McMahan who appeared to be in her late thirties, said pretty much the same thing. “Dr. Lee was the quiet sort. I don’t think any of us knew her personally.” She shook her head. “I hate it when someone I know dies, particularly someone with their whole life ahead of them. It makes no sense.”

The secretary, a girl barely out of high school named Carol Jennings, could hardly speak. “How could this happen?” she sobbed. “How?”

Barent tapped his notebook and wondered the same thing.

Sharon Lee’s office staff had consisted of a secretary named Barbara James and a nurse named Audrey Parker. Barbara James was a thin, middle-aged lady with prominent white teeth and dyed blonde hair. Audrey Parker was an overweight young woman with a plain, round face and acne. Both of them seemed to have the I.Q. of a flea.

“Arguments?” Barbara James looked at him stolidly. “No. I never heard any arguments.”

“Had she received any threatening phone calls? Any patients upset about anything? Any of the staff who didn’t get along with her, for any reason?”

“Upset? Phone calls?”

Barent wondered if maybe there was an echo in the room. “Yes,” he said.

She shook her head. “No.”

Audrey Parker was just as bad. She stared at his face with round, colorless eyes, her jaws working steadily on a piece of gum. “I don’t know anything,” she said. “Don’t even ask.”

Barent could believe it. Where had Sharon Lee gotten these two? And why? Maybe she had wanted to be the only attractive woman in the office. “I’m afraid that I have to ask,” he said.

Audrey Parker shrugged, a ripple going down her shoulders, spreading across her chest and down to the tops of her fleshy thighs. Barent waited for an instant but she didn’t say a thing.

Ten minutes later, he closed his notebook. Audrey Parker was right. She knew nothing and she couldn’t have cared less.

Wellesley also had been cooperative but unhelpful.

“I miss it sometimes, the action; you know what I mean?” Wellesley had a wistful look on his face.

“How long were you in?” Barent asked.

“Twenty-three years.” Wellesley sighed. “I know it’s dumb. I go home at five every night. I drink a martini and watch T.V. and shoot a round of golf with the Missus. I get to watch the grandchildren grow. I’m not sorry to be out of it, but sometimes...” He shrugged. “Ah, well, you know how it is.”

Actually, Barent didn’t, and he sincerely hoped that he never did. Barent planned on leaving when he hit sixty and never looking back. Wellesley, he suspected, was merely indulging in a little nostalgia, brought on by shooting the breeze with another old pro.

“You like it here?” Barent asked.

“It’s okay.” Wellesley said it without enthusiasm. “The only problem is these people don’t take it seriously. They hire me to do the job but they don’t understand that ninety per-cent of security is the people who work here having the right attitude. After the World Trade Center went down, it worked a little better for a few months, but then it slacked off. I don’t have enough men to make this place secure. I never will. They want it secure, they've got to take the initiative, ask people who don't belong what they're doing here, assume some responsibility." Wellesley shook his head sadly. "We have guards posted by the front doors, by the E.R. entrance and by the elevators. Anyone going up to the floors is supposed to show either a hospital I.D. card or a pass, which they get at the information desk in the lobby. After eleven at night, they're supposed to sign a book by the elevator. But the fact is that during the day the place is so crowded that anyone can just walk up. Late at night the system works a little better."

"I understand," Barent said, and nodded. About what he had expected. The evening and night shift guards had noticed nothing suspicious. The day shift people had been uncommunicative. They seemed embarrassed, probably unwilling to admit that a murderer had walked in and waltzed right out and they had never noticed the difference. "Can you give me copies of the sign in book for the past forty-eight hours?"

"Sure," Wellesley said.

They were unlikely to be much use but you never knew.

The nurses on the Psych floor had been equally unhelpful. Nobody had any idea how Mose had gotten out. "Probably somebody left the door open." The Head Nurse, a tall, red headed woman named Burke, who had a round face and nice green eyes, said it with gloomy satisfaction. "Maybe the orderly who delivered the pharmacy cart."

The orderly swore it wasn't him, but you couldn't expect him to admit it, and it didn't matter anyway.

Jeremy Pike was equally unhelpful. "The will was quite specific," Pike said. "A trust fund was established, sufficient to pay Mr. Mose's medical care for the remainder of his life. After that, any equity left over is to be donated to the American Cancer Society. Miss Mose died of cancer, you know."

Barent didn't, but he made appropriate, regretful noises and hung up. Scratch that idea, he thought. Nobody seemed to have a motive to frame old Mose.

The preliminary lab results and the initial autopsy findings on Dr. Sharon Lee were ready by the afternoon of the next day. The tox screening would take a little longer but Barent would be very surprised indeed if it showed anything. This was not a case where the subtleties of poison or drug overdose seemed likely.

He closed the door to his office, sat down behind his desk and read the report slowly and carefully. Cause of death: asphyxia. She had been strangled, which they already knew. Deep bruises on both sides of the neck. Microvascular hemorrhages in the lungs and in the brain. There were small bite marks on her breasts and some tiny lacerations in the vagina. But no semen. Too bad. If Mose had raped her, he hadn't ejaculated. There had been a Bic pen lying next to the body. They had examined it for blood or vaginal secretions but it was clean. Barent grimaced. There were a number of foreign hairs on her scrub suit, but they could have come from anyone. The call room was not cleaned as often or as well as it should have been. A lot of hair and skin fibers were mixed in with the dust gathered from the room, and a few of these seemed to match the ones found on the scrubs. Similar fibers had been found on Dr. Lee's clothes, hanging in the call room's tiny closet. Some other, thicker strands seemed to be horse hair, in varying colors. Barent made a note to find out if Sharon Lee had been into horses.

Plenty of fingerprints—only to be expected in a room shared by many people—but none that the Police or FBI files had flagged.

Barent's eyes narrowed at the next section. He read it through carefully, then read it again. There were traces of blood under the victim's fingernails—A negative—which was Bill Mose's blood type. DNA analysis was not yet completed. Barent made a soft, clucking noise and smiled to himself. He picked up another folder, the one on Mose. They were still trying to figure out where Mose had been all night long but so far, no luck. That bothered Barent but it was a big building and much of it was largely deserted at night. Even during the day, it was rare that anyone would find a need to go into the basement storage rooms or the boiler plant. Mose's clothing was dirty, but no dirtier than the corners of Sharon Lee's call room. The knife was a typical dinner knife. Trays with dishes and dirty utensils had been found in five out of the twenty-one attendings' call rooms, some of them obviously there for a day or more. It seemed to have been customary for the doctors to bring food up from the cafeteria. There was no such tray in the room where Sharon Lee had been killed, but Mose could easily have picked the knife up in one of the adjacent call rooms.

Strip search of the suspect had revealed four small lacerations on his left upper arm. The blood stains on the knife were not from Sharon Lee. As Barent had suggested to Wellesley, they appeared to be from Mose himself. There were cuts on his tongue and the inside of his lips. Barent remembered what Werth had said about Mose's propensity for swallowing small objects and shuddered. Evidently the knife had been too big for him to get down. Luckily for Mose, the knife was rather dull. Otherwise he could easily have bled to death.

So that was it. If the DNA typing matched, the case was pretty much wrapped up. They would have enough to go to trial and Bill Mose would spend the rest of his life locked up in the custody of the State. Barent thought about that for a moment and found that he regretted it. It seemed so completely inadequate. Mose was going to spend his life locked up in any case, and Barent doubted that Mose would ever notice the difference between his old Unit and an institution for the criminally insane. People who commit murder ought to be punished. They should have to live in a cramped, crowded cell and sleep on a narrow cot and eat lousy food and dream of a world that they would never see again. Their lives should change, and not for the better.

Barent shrugged and closed the folder.

“SO WHO DO YOU THINK is the most obnoxious surgeon in the hospital?” Steinberg asked. “It doesn’t really matter, just give me a name.”

“Farkas?” the resident said. “He’s pretty obnoxious.”

“Okay, Farkas. Now suppose Farkas turns to you in the middle of a case and says, ‘Doctor, I need a laser beam. I want you to turn that overhead light into a laser beam.’ What would you say to that?”

Like all anesthesiologists, Steinberg thought of himself as a philosopher and a diplomat but was really a repressed personality, hostile, passive aggressive and full of resentments over petty, imagined slights. Kurtz bent over his patient’s abdomen, sewed over an ulcer and listened with half an ear as Steinberg talked to his resident, a kid named Chao.

“I’d tell him he was out of his mind,” Chao said.

Steinberg shook his head. “Big mistake. Of course, he probably is out of his mind but telling him so is not going to help matters. Look at it this way—your job is to make the case go smoothly, right?”

The resident nodded, looking doubtful.

“Now telling him he’s out of his mind is treating him like he’s not out of his mind. It’s pretending that he’s really a normal human being, even though he’s acting like a jackass. But you got it right the first time. He is out of his mind. You don’t tell a lunatic that he’s out of his mind. What’s the point?”

“So if Farkas asks you to do something asinine, the proper response is to give him a big smile and say, ‘Gee, Dr. Farkas, I don’t know if that’s going to work. But I’ll try!’ Then after you’ve tried, you turn back to him and you say, ‘Gee, Dr. Farkas, I couldn’t do it. I’m sorry, but I tried!’ And he’ll probably think you’re not the best anesthesiologist in the world but, oh, well, you tried. And that’ll be the end of it.

“Now think what would happen if you did what you suggested. You tell him he’s out of his mind, you’d get into an argument and then you’d both end up pissed off. How does that help the situation? Believe me, it doesn’t. It’s completely counterproductive. What you have to do is think of yourself as a psychiatrist of the operating room. You have to always keep in mind that the guy with the knife in his hand is almost as much your patient as the patient. Try to maintain what the psychiatrists call a ‘therapeutic relationship.’ Believe me, things will go smoother.”

“Steinberg,” Kurtz said amiably, “you are such an asshole.”

“Whoops,” Steinberg said, “the walls have ears. Now remember, be therapeutic.”

Kurtz sniffed but otherwise maintained a dignified silence.

Chao smiled behind his mask as Steinberg beamed over the drapes at Kurtz.

“Okay, Steve,” Kurtz said to Nolan. “Why don’t you close?” Steinberg continued to beam. Kurtz gave him a disdainful glance and walked off, his head held high. Behind him, Steinberg chuckled.

Older hospitals, Kurtz reflected, did have a certain elitist charm. Most of the newer places had one large cafeteria, where patients and staff mingled indiscriminately, but Easton still preserved the tradition of a separate dining room for the doctors. The food came from the same kitchen that supplied the patients and the rest of the workers, but they dressed it up with a sprig of parsley or a carved carrot. The tables in the Doctor’s Dining Room were made out of old oak and the chairs had armrests and cushioned seats. The walls were covered with faded oil paintings of distinguished physicians from the hospital’s past and they charged about thirty per-cent more for the privilege of eating there.

Kurtz resented getting ripped off but he ate there whenever he wasn't tied up in surgery; it was expected.

He took a tray through the cafeteria line, shook his head sadly at the day's choices and settled for beef stew, with a side order of French fries and a slice of cheesecake. While he was paying, he surveyed the tables. It was a little past noon and the place was crowded. One table near the window had a few empty seats and he walked over and sat down.

Jim Farkas was holding court. "The Dow can't keep going up this way. I've been raising cash for the past two weeks. We're overdue for a correction; then I'll buy back in." Farkas was a plastic surgeon, and therefore rich. He was also middle aged and stout, with a bald head and a smooth, unlined face that popular rumor attributed to an advertisement for his own wares.

Phil Longo was an orthopedist, a frequent fishing buddy of Kurtz and Bill Werth. Dick Weber was a pediatrician. Pediatricians made a lot less money than surgeons, a fact that the pediatricians, along with all the other practitioners of the self-styled 'cognitive specialties' such as family practice and internal medicine, complained about constantly. In Kurtz' jaded view, a view shared by all members of the 'technical specialties,' the internists and pediatricians deserved to make less because when you came right down to it, they really didn't do much of anything, spending the majority of their working hours either dealing with chronic illness that couldn't be cured or prescribing pills for minor ailments that would go away in a few days no matter what you did for them.

Weber looked both bored and vaguely pissed off, which Farkas seemed not to notice. Longo flashed Kurtz a grin and squinted down at his tray. "I pity your coronary arteries," he said.

Kurtz nodded thoughtfully while he chewed a French fry. "My cholesterol is one-sixty. I've got good genes."

"Lucky you."

"I saw a cartoon once," Farkas said, "I think it was The New Yorker, a little guy is sitting in a chair surrounded by elephant tusks, African spears, carved wooden statues, paintings—all sorts of stuff. He's looking at his wife and saying, 'I've decided to put my money into things.'" Farkas nodded decisively. "That cartoon was supposed to be funny but it had a good point. Rare coins have been doing great and now is the time to buy them, just coming out of a pullback. Also art. I've picked up a collection of Miro lithographs for a great price. They should double in three years, maybe triple."

"You do any interesting cases lately?" Longo asked Kurtz.

"Yeah," Kurtz said. "Two weeks ago I had a guy with a hepatic cyst. Echinococcus."

Longo wrinkled his brow. "That's a tapeworm, isn't it?"

Kurtz nodded. "He's from New Zealand. It's common around sheep. People eat the eggs, the larvae migrate to the liver, or sometimes the lungs, and form cysts. If a cyst ruptures, it can be fatal."

"I've never seen a case."

"Hey, Kurtz," Farkas said. "You ever been to Sanibel Island?"

"Sanibel Island?" Kurtz said. "No."

"It's down in Florida, off the Gulf Coast. I've got a little condo there, place on the beach. Perfect for getting away from it all and forgetting the cares of the world."

Kurtz grunted and Farkas peered at him. "Weird, this thing about Sharon Lee. I'm glad they got the guy who did it. You used to go out with her, didn't you?"

"Yes," Kurtz said carefully, "I did."

Farkas nodded, and then, amazingly, he said. "Sorry to hear about it. She was okay." This display of compassion seemed to exhaust Farkas' store of sensitivity. He immediately took off on a tangent into the realm of Commodities Futures and how Fed policy on interest rates would affect the course of the market.

Kurtz frowned down at his stew, suddenly no longer hungry.

Longo gave a tight little grin and said to Kurtz, "I hear Sanibel Island is pretty nice. We should all go down there and borrow his place for a few weeks. You think he'd mind?"

Kurtz' secretary had gray hair and narrow shoulders and sat very straight in her chair behind the front desk. Her name was Rose Schapiro. The patients liked her. So did Kurtz. She was always cheerful, she never called in sick, she typed eighty words a minute and she had never lost an insurance form.

He arrived back at his office at one o'clock. Mrs. Schapiro looked up from her computer screen and said, "Have a nice lunch?"

"Not bad. Has Ed shown up yet?"

"He's in Room Three," Mrs. Schapiro said, "removing a mole."

"Good," Kurtz said. Edward Ornella was one of the Grand Old Men of the surgical staff but he was overdue for retirement and for most of the past year had been easing himself out. He had recently stopped operating and now confined his practice to consults and office work.

Just then, Ornella came out of the back treatment room, drying his hands with a paper towel and smiling. "Richard," he said. "Nice to see you."

"Hello, Ed."

"Well, I've made my contribution to the ledger for today." He threw the paper towel in a wastebasket and wagged a finger at Kurtz. "Now remember," he said, "time is money." Still smiling, he put on his coat and walked out of the office.

Mrs. Schapiro watched him go and shook her head sadly. "Ten years ago, he was a great surgeon."

"He's still a great surgeon, when he wants to be."

"I guess that's what I mean, then. It's sad."

"I don't believe he sees it that way. He's really looking forward to shucking the rat race."

"Do you think so?" Mrs. Schapiro laughed softly. "I don't think anybody looks forward to being old and useless."

Maybe not, Kurtz thought, maybe not. Not having to work for a living was hard for Kurtz to imagine, much less not wanting to. "Is Mr. Gallinas in yet?" he asked. Gallinas had a lump in his thigh that was probably a benign sebaceous cyst but every once in a while the most innocent appearing lump surprised you. It made sense to take it out.

"He arrived a few minutes ago. He's in the back."

"Okay," Kurtz said. He took off his jacket, hung it in the closet and put on a white doctor's coat. "Room Two?"

Mrs. Schapiro nodded.

Kurtz smiled and rubbed his hands together. "Lead me to him," he said. "And don't ever forget, time is money."

At four A.M., Herman Delgado climbed up the fire escape in back of a brownstone on the lower West Side of Manhattan. The stars shone overhead but there was no moon out and the night was very dark and very cold. Herman's breath steamed in front of him.

All good citizens, even the citizens of the city that never sleeps, were dormant at this hour of the morning. Herman Delgado had little fear of being seen as he lay on his stomach on the cold steel grating of the fire escape and cut a triangular patch out of the window with a glasscutter. He had fixed a piece of duct tape to the middle of the patch, and when he gave it a quick tap with his gloved fist, it came loose but did not fall. Gently, Herman Delgado lowered the piece of glass into the apartment inside, reached his hand in and released a clasp on the window. He slid the window up and clambered inside.

The apartment was dark. Delgado carefully closed the blinds and pulled a flash light from his pocket. A cone of light played over a stove, dishwasher and refrigerator. Confidently, as if he knew that nobody would be home, he walked down a narrow corridor and into the living room. The main light switch had a dimmer on it. He set it to low and turned it on. Herman Delgado smiled and rubbed his hands together.

The apartment was decorated with low, white leather couches, white shag rug, solid oak coffee table with a glass top, abstract paintings on the wall whose muted purples and pinks blended unobtrusively into the room's decor. Delgado moved into the empty bedroom and began to rummage through the dresser drawers. He took his time and did it right, searching thoroughly and carefully and not bothering to put things back where they belonged. In the middle left hand drawer, he found the jewel box. Opening it, he held up a white gold ring set with a single emerald cut diamond, nodded and stuffed it into the inner pocket of the denim jacket that he wore beneath his coat. He shuffled through the rest of the pieces in the box, selecting most of them and discarding only the few that he knew were not worth trying to fence.

When he was done, he walked back into the kitchen, peered out the window, just to make certain that nobody was lurking down below, then clambered back onto the fire escape and vanished into the night.

• • • •

“IT STILL BOTHERS YOU, doesn’t it? Sharon Lee, I mean.”

“What was that?” Kurtz asked.

Kathy smiled at him. “See? You’re so pre-occupied, you hardly hear a word that people say to you.”

Kurtz shifted uncomfortably in his seat and cracked a weak grin. “Did Nolan ask you to talk to me?” “Liebert,” she said.

“Liebert?” Kurtz blinked. “I’ll have to have a little talk with Liebert.”

“Better not. He might complain to the Dean.”

Kurtz nodded but he barely heard her. “Okay, I won’t have a little talk with Liebert.”

Kathy had a two-bedroom place on Bank Street that she shared with a post doc in history named Jennifer Levy. Jennifer was away for the weekend. Kurtz sat on Kathy’s couch and sipped Scotch and soda and tried to act like what Steinberg might have called a “normal human being.”

Kathy sat next to him and held her own glass of white wine with both hands and took a small sip.

“I’m sorry,” Kurtz said. “I really am. I can’t figure out why I feel this way. Sharon and I broke up almost two years ago. I hardly ever thought about her.” He shrugged. “I’ll get over it. I just don’t know when.”

Kathy nodded. “She was important to you at one time. You can’t forget that.”

“No.” He gave a shaky laugh. In reality, while the murder of Sharon Lee was the focus for his current sour mood, Kurtz knew that he had been vaguely unhappy for quite some time. He had a sort of desperate longing for...something. Something he had trouble defining. Certainty, perhaps. Or maybe just significance...Kurtz had been on the staff at Easton for nearly three years. Long enough to get comfortable. Long enough to get bored. A lot of physicians felt this way. The process took these very smart, very hard driving, very competitive people and it tortured them: all the endless, obsessive work to master the enormous reams of material, the agonizing fear that a moment’s ignorance or lack of attention could result in a mistake and the knowledge that even a small mistake could wind up killing someone. The stark reality was that you had to be perfect because nothing less than perfection was allowed—and nobody was perfect.

All that pressure...for years, always climbing the ladder toward the ultimate, elusive goal: four years of college, four years of medical school, five years of surgical training. Two years at least to build a practice. And then you were there: physician and surgeon, respected practitioner of the art. Real life. No more steps on the ladder, no more goals to strive for, nothing to do but do the same things you were doing day after day—operate in the morning, see patients in the afternoon, never let the battery on the beeper run down because a disaster could strike at any instant—always pretending that you were in control, that you were good enough to do the job when only God Himself was good enough to do the job because sooner or later everybody died.

Doctors were freaks about control. You had to know everything. You had to be on top of everything. Nothing happened by chance. And if anything—anything at all—went wrong, you could be absolutely certain that the god damned lawyers would look at the situation just exactly in that light. It was your fault—even if it wasn’t. No excuses allowed.

And then Sharon Lee had been murdered and it seemed like the last straw, because nothing was more out of control than cold-blooded murder.

“I’m sorry,” he said. “It’s just the way I feel.”

Kathy sipped her wine and looked at him over the rim of the glass and said, “Nobody can argue with the way that you feel.”

“Yeah.” He gave his head a little shake. “Like I said, I’ll get over it.” He stared into his drink and hoped it would be soon.

“Barent?”

Barent sighed. He knew this voice and he rarely enjoyed hearing it. “Yes?”

“It’s John Costas. At The News.”

“I know,” Barent said.

“Hey, what’s the matter? You don’t sound glad to hear from me.”

“Well, John, you don’t usually make my job any easier. You understand what I’m saying?”

“Come on, Barent. I gave you great press on the Carmody murder.”

“You gave us credit for catching the perpetrator. That was after calling us idiots for three weeks because we didn’t.”

“I was just doing my civic duty, Barent.”

“And selling newspapers. Don’t forget selling newspapers.”

“Well, selling newspapers is my job.”

“Really? Gee, I didn’t realize that. And here I thought your job was journalism. You know: informing the public, telling the truth, exposing corruption—that sort of stuff.”

“Ouch,” the voice said amiably.

“What can I do for you, John?”

“I hear you have positive evidence regarding the suspect in custody, the wacko. I’m talking about the murder at Easton.”

“Where did you hear that?”

The voice was cagey. “I have my sources.”

Barent grunted.

“Well, do you?”

Briefly, Barent considered denying it but decided against it. Costas had no monopoly on inside sources. If Costas had heard it, then every other reporter in Town would be trumpeting the story and he might as well keep the son-of-a-bitch at least minimally friendly. “Yes. But that’s off the record. Anyway, the Commissioner’s called a Press Conference for tomorrow. He’ll announce it officially then.”

“Hey, no problem. Off the record’s my middle name. I prefer it that way. If they can’t check your sources, then they can’t check your quotes. Know what I mean?”

“Yes, John,” Barent said. “I’m afraid that I do.”

Bill Mose was not bored. He woke up in the morning when the nurses told him to and he brushed his teeth and washed his face and then shuffled out to eat breakfast. After breakfast, he wandered into the social room and smoked cigarettes and watched T.V. Tom and Jerry were followed by Porky Pig and Porky Pig was followed by Chip and Dale. Mose lacked the ability to follow the plots but the colors and the action held his rapt attention.

Vaguely, as he watched, Mose became aware of an uncomfortable sensation somewhere in his abdomen. He ignored it. He had had such sensations in the past and they had always gone away.

He smoked his cigarettes, taking deep sucking drags. Ten other men sat on the couches, all of them smoking and staring at the T.V. When one cigarette burned down to the filter Mose would light another. Once, when he had finished a cigarette, he glanced around the little room. The patients stared blankly at the television screen. Two beefy aides sat in the corners. Nobody was looking at him. He smiled to himself and swallowed the filter, then puffed contentedly away.

Herman Delgado sat on the roof of his building and snorted a couple of lines in the frigid cold. Herman didn't mind the cold. The air was clear and still and the sky was very blue. From up here, the dirty snow down on the street looked clean, white and pure. Sitting out on the roof, he felt like he had the city all to himself. He liked that feeling.

Across the roof, a single pigeon had set up housekeeping in the old pigeon cote that Herman had placed there. When he was sixteen, Herman had seen On the Waterfront, with Marlon Brando. He had loved the scenes with the pigeons on the roof and he had gone out and bought himself a pigeon cote. What he hadn't figured on was the fact that birds made a lot of birdshit and cleaning up birdshit was not Herman's idea of a good time. So after a couple of days he had decided to ignore the pigeon cote. He left it where it was, though, and the stupid birds still used it.

His nose and the tips of his ears grew numb, partly from the cold but mostly from cocaine. Herman laughed softly to himself and watched his breath steam away in the frigid air. After a little while, he felt the need to move and he went back inside and climbed down the stairs.

Ten minutes later he was out on the street, feeling good. The money he had gotten for the stolen jewelry would keep him in crack and eager women for a month. He wriggled his toes in his new Bass shoes as he walked down the icy sidewalk.

A black Lincoln Town Car slowed as it passed by him and a window lowered. From the back seat, a grating voice issued. "Herman," the voice said. "I want to talk to you."

Herman hesitated, the hair on the back of his neck prickling. He forced himself to smile. "Boss?" "Get in, Herman."

Herman shrugged and opened the door and slid into the back seat. The door closed and the limousine pulled away from the curb. Inside the car sat the man Herman had referred to as "Boss." Next to him sat the driver, a big guy named Tony, plus another man who did not turn around or even move but who Herman recognized with a jolt of sudden fear. In the back seat, smiling at some secret joke, moving his head to music that only he could hear, staring straight ahead, sat a man whose real name was unknown but who was called "Bose", because his deep voice had reminded the Boss once of the sounds issuing from a stereo speaker.

They traveled for about a mile with the Boss frowning out the window, then he turned to Herman with sad, hooded eyes and shook his head sorrowfully, saying nothing.

Herman stared at him. "Boss?" he said uncertainly.

The Boss drew a deep, resigned sigh. "Herman. Why do you have to be so stupid?"

Herman drew himself up, offended.

"You've been warned, Herman. You're not operating alone any more. You're part of an organization. You show initiative, that's fine. But initiative is supposed to contribute to the good of the organization. Simply put, Herman, you do a job and the organization doesn't get its cut, you become a liability that the organization can no longer afford."

Herman looked at him, at his set expression and empty eyes, and knew sudden fear. He turned to the man sitting next to the driver. "What's he mean?" he whispered.

The man said nothing. He gave a tiny, disgusted snort and shook his head.

"No! You gotta help me!"

Bose turned toward Herman, holding a gun. The black opening at the end of the silencer on the barrel seemed to stare at Herman like an accusing eye. The gun went off with a soft pop. A tiny gout of flame came from the muzzle, and Herman felt something cold spread out from the center of his chest. He looked once at the little dribble of red leaking down the front of his jacket, then his eyes glazed over and the world faded. The last thing he heard before death took him was Bose' deep, beautiful voice saying, "Goodbye, Herman.

IT SNOWED AGAIN ON the night before Christmas, covering the potholes and piles of garbage with a soft, white blanket. The sounds of bells ringing and people singing Christmas carols drifted through the air, and the city— or at least the section of it that was Lew Barent’s main concern—seemed to have grown curiously and unusually calm.

Barent spent most of the week following Sharon Lee’s murder on routine matters. In the mornings he sat behind his old wooden desk and did paperwork. On Tuesday afternoon and again on Thursday he went to court to testify in a case involving a prostitute who had stabbed her pimp. The case was unusual in that the girl was an undergraduate at N.Y.U. with no prior record who claimed to be putting herself through college on the proceeds.

“Men?” she sniffed at one point. “I don’t have a very high opinion of men, thank you, but I didn’t stab him because I hate men. I stabbed him because he beat me. He deserved it and I don’t regret it one single bit.”

She was blonde, freckled, pretty and demure and the jury seemed inclined to believe her. So did Barent.

On Wednesday morning Barent reviewed a report on the current activities of Bill Mose, who had done nothing at all out of the ordinary for a schizophrenic—which is to say, he had done nothing at all except eat, sleep, smoke cigarettes, stare at the T.V., go to ‘occupational therapy’ (which meant pasting paper and sticks of wood together with glue in a futile attempt to make ‘art’) and wander around the Unit.

On Friday morning he received a call from Harry Moran. “Lew?”

Barent breathed a sigh. It had been, he thought fleetingly, much too good to last. “What’s up, Harry?”

“I’m down by the Hudson, opposite 23rd Street.” Moran’s voice stopped.

“Yes?” Barent prompted. “You were saying?”

“Oh, sorry. One of the blues was telling me something. It’s a body in a trash bin. Hard to say how long he’s been in there but long enough to be frozen stiff. Shot once in the chest.”

Barent looked at the diminished pile of papers on his desk and sadly shook his head. “I’ll be right there,” he said.

Bill Mose was off his feed. Usually a careful and meticulous eater, he seemed to have lost his appetite. The uncomfortable feeling in his abdomen had grown over the days to a constant, throbbing pain. He looked at his food and felt nauseous. A sheen of sweat covered his forehead. When he sat up suddenly, a wave of dizziness washed over him.

On the morning of his fifth day in the new place, he found himself unable to get out of bed. When the aide came in to usher him up, he ignored the insistent voice and simply lay there, huddled in misery around the pain in his gut.

“Come on,” the aide said. “None of that.” He reached out a hand, shook Mose by the shoulder. Mose ignored him.

The aide shook his head. “It’s time to get up. You know you’re not allowed to just lie there.” He gave Mose another shake, then grabbed him under the arms and attempted to haul him out of bed.

It was too much. With a convulsive heave, Mose’s stomach spasmed. He groaned in misery and collapsed back onto the bed as a torrent of green bile spewed out of his mouth and covered the legs of the astonished aide.

“Shit!” the aide shrieked. “Look what you’ve done to me!”

Mose ignored him. He was too busy retching.

“Goddammit...” The aide stuck his head out into the hall and called out to the nursing station. “Get somebody in here with a mop and a bucket!” He wrinkled his nose. “And get a doctor!” He muttered, “They better pay me for these pants. God damn nut case...”

Three hours later, Mose was in an ambulance back to Easton. The staff psychiatrist had had enough presence of mind to evaluate his distended abdomen and high pitched bowel sounds, make a tentative diagnosis of bowel obstruction and put down a nasogastric tube. Mose pulled it out through his nose as soon as the ambulance got under way.

After that, they tied his hands together, which served little purpose since the damage had already been done but which made the aides feel better. The two policemen assigned to guard the prisoner en route watched impassively and said nothing.

When they arrived at the E.R., Mose was trundled in on a stretcher and deposited on a hard metal table while his entourage sat down in chairs to wait. After a half hour, Mose again began to vomit. The policemen looked at each other and decided to wait in the hall. One of the aides stuck his head out and said to a passing nurse, “This guy is throwing up. Can’t you get a doctor in here?”

The nurse puffed up her cheeks and gave him an irritated look. “We’re very busy,” she said. “Someone will be with you shortly.”

“But—” the aide began.

The nurse cut him off. “You’ll just have to wait your turn.” Defeated, the aide went back into the room and watched helplessly as Mose continued to retch, covering himself, the table and the floor around him with foul smelling, watery green fluid.

Finally, a harried looking intern came in, took as much of Bill Mose’s history from the aides as they could recall, listened to the patient’s heart, lungs and abdomen, called for x-ray, started an I.V. and phoned in a consult to surgery. Then he left.

Fifteen minutes later, a technician rolled in a portable x-ray machine. The technician glanced at the order sheet and said, “Chest and abdomen?”

The aides looked at him. One of them shrugged helplessly.

The technician grunted. “Help me up with him, would you?” he said. The aides lifted Mose while the technician slid an x-ray plate under his back. “Okay,” he said, “step back.” The aides left the room until the machine buzzed, then returned.

“Now the chest,” the technician said. They repeated the process and the technician left to develop the films.

Mose, his stomach finally empty, closed his eyes and had almost dropped off to sleep when Nolan arrived, accompanied by Liebert. “Oh, boy...” Nolan muttered. “Kurtz isn’t going to be too happy about this.”

Liebert wrinkled his brow and gave Nolan a worried frown.

While they were examining Mose, the technician arrived with the films and Nolan snapped them into a view box on the wall. “What do you think, Doctor?” he asked Liebert.

“Dilated small intestine with air fluid levels. A bowel obstruction?”

Nolan gave him an approving look. “Very good,” he said. “How about this?” He pointed to a hazy shadow surrounding a clear density in the middle of the abdomen.

Liebert wrinkled his brow. “I don’t know,” he said at last. “It looks like metal.”

“Well, it’s not soft tissue and it’s not bone,” Nolan said. He grinned. “He probably swallowed something.” Nolan sat down, quickly wrote up an admission History and Physical and some orders while Liebert examined the somnolent Mose more thoroughly, daintily stepping around the puddles of vomit on the floor.

“Okay,” Nolan said to Liebert. “Let’s go tell the O.R.”

A half hour later, Nolan and Liebert wheeled Mose into the operating room, his hands tied to the rails of the stretcher. Nolan had put down another N.G. tube but Mose had managed to twist himself around and once again pull it out. The two policemen, wearing surgical headcaps, shoe covers and white paper “bunny suits” over their uniforms followed along behind.

Liebert was still arguing. “The patient is incompetent. There’s no consent. You can’t operate without consent.”

“It’s an emergency,” Nolan said. “You don’t bother getting consent in an emergency.”

“Kurtz shouldn’t do it. He’s too involved.”

“Tell it to him.”

Liebert frowned unhappily. “I already did. He told me he’s on call, it’s his patient and I should mind my own business.”

“Good advice,” Nolan said.

“Well, then we should get an ethics consult. There’s always an ethics counselor on call. That’s what they told us.”

Nolan turned and gave Liebert an annoyed look as the stretcher skidded around a corner. “Look, kid, you want to call the chaplain or the hospital lawyer or whatever other bureaucrat they supposedly have available to help us poor nincompoops make difficult moral decisions? Jesus. These people get bothered so seldom with this sort of stuff it would take ten, maybe fifteen minutes for whoever it is to wake up and even understand what you want. Then he’d probably decide to consult the rest of the committee, because frankly, the people who are supposed to make difficult moral decisions are usually better at passing the buck than doing their jobs. All told, you’re going to waste at least another hour, probably a lot more, and this guy needs to be operated on right now. So forget about it.”

Liebert shook his head. “Hell,” he said. “I’m only a medical student. I’m just trying to do the right thing.”

“Well, the right thing to do right now is to shut up and let’s start operating.”

Kurtz met them in the O.R. Mose had already been placed on the table. The EKG showed a rapid but regular rhythm and his blood pressure was normal. Steinberg nodded to him when he walked in but was too absorbed in what he was doing to talk and Kurtz sat down in a corner of the room. Truthfully, Kurtz hardly knew how he felt about this case. Bill Mose was small, dirty, miserable and sick. He didn’t look like Kurtz’ conception of a murderer. Still, Kurtz knew that Liebert had a point. Maybe his personal involvement should have disqualified him from operating. Morosely, Kurtz shook his head. Mose was his patient and he wanted to do it, and he was going to do it. And if anybody had a problem with that, they could argue about it later—after it was too late.

With great concern, he watched what Steinberg was doing, ready to step in and lend a hand if he was asked. The induction of anesthesia was particularly dangerous in a bowel obstruction. The intestines were bloated and full and even if the stomach was de-pressurized with a nasogastric tube, there was no guarantee that the tube had gotten into every fold and corner. The patient had to be presumed to have a stomach full of vomitus, and if Mose happened to vomit after the anesthetic had deprived him of his normal reflexes but before the trachea was protected by an endotracheal tube, then the acidic bile would flow down into the lungs and the patient would most likely die from aspiration pneumonia—if he didn't drown outright.

“You ready?” Steinberg asked his resident. The resident nodded. “You checked your laryngoscope? The suction is on?”

The resident gave him a harried look and nodded again. “Okay,” Steinberg said. He glanced once more at his monitors, then pushed a syringe of a short acting narcotic, waited thirty seconds and gave propofol, followed immediately by succinylcholine. He pushed down on the larynx with his left hand, compressing the trachea onto the esophagus, and waited.

The patient's eyes glazed over and he stopped breathing and thirty seconds later, he began to shake all over as the succinylcholine took effect and every neuromuscular junction in his body discharged at once. Then he stopped shaking. For three minutes at least, he would be completely paralyzed. “Go,” Steinberg said.

The resident inserted the laryngoscope into Mose's mouth and lifted the jaw. “You see it?” Steinberg demanded.

“Good view.” The resident kept his eye on the vocal cords and held up his hand. Steinberg, still keeping pressure on the larynx, handed him the endotracheal tube and the resident slipped the tube between the vocal cords and into the trachea.

Steinberg breathed an audible sigh of relief and turned to Kurtz. “He's all yours.”

“Nice job,” Kurtz said. He stepped outside to scrub and by the time he returned, Nolan had opened a huge incision from the sternum all the way down to the pelvis. The bowel lay inside the abdominal cavity, swollen and distended. Kurtz elbowed Nolan aside, reached into the pelvis and ran his fingers up the length of the descending colon, which felt entirely normal. The same for the transverse and the ascending colon. The ileum too was fine, undulating with peristalsis like a gigantic earthworm. Midway through the jejunem, he found it. “See here?” he said.

Nolan and Liebert peered in. Nolan nodded, reached in, felt the area that Kurtz had indicated and nodded again. “Something hard.”

Kurtz lifted the bowel up onto the skin, made an incision and inserted a suction catheter. At least five hundred cc's of green fluid drained out. Then he put clamps on both sides of the obstruction, cut off the offending segment, plopped it into a basin and handed it to the scrub nurse. He stapled the ends together, told Nolan to close and went over to the scrub table. “Could I see that?” he said.

The scrub nurse handed him the basin. With the clamps on, the segment of bowel looked like a stuffed sausage. Kurtz picked up a knife and cut into it. In the middle, blocking the passage, was a sodden mass of fibrous material. With a Kelly clamp and a pair of forceps, he delicately spread the fibers. In the center of the mass was...Kurtz frowned.

“What is it,” Nolan asked.

Kurtz picked it out. It glinted in the light. “It looks like a gold ring,” Kurtz said.

SHARON LEE AND RICHARD Kurtz had been a beautiful couple. Everybody said so. None of their friends could understand it when they broke up. “It’s my fault,” Kurtz would tell them. “She’s too good for me.” Since nobody felt it prudent to ask him exactly what he meant, the comment tended to forestall further questions.

What he meant, actually, was that Sharon Lee had been a lunatic. He never did completely figure her out, though when he met Sharon’s mother he thought he understood her a little better. Children of alcoholic parents often grew up with a chip on their shoulder and a need for control, which made medicine an appropriate career choice because it was a field where Sharon’s particular craziness was almost admired. Great doc, that Sharon Lee, really takes care of her patients. Except that she was nuts. Kurtz had given her a key to his apartment and once, when he called to tell her he had to break a date because he had an emergency case in the O.R., he arrived home later to find Sharon gone and the telephone ripped out of the wall. Kurtz shook his head in amazement, remembering. Nuts. If there was anything an obstetrician should have understood, it was the unpredictable nature of both their jobs. She was wild in bed, though. She had made love obsessively and passionately, groaning and crying out, almost screaming, which had embarrassed Kurtz at first but which he got a kick out of once he got used to it. But even in bed, she had to keep control. You get on top. Turn that way. Kiss my nipples. Rub there. Harder.

Kurtz figured that he was probably not the easiest person in the world to get along with but Sharon Lee had been something else entirely.

Kurtz sighed and looked out the window and sipped his brandy.

His apartment was on the Eighteenth Floor of a building across town from the Medical Center, overlooking the East River. One whole wall was covered with plate glass. Two nights after he had operated on Bill Mose, he lay on the couch in his living room with a snifter of Courvoisier X.O. and watched the water flowing by. The Gil Evans Orchestra with Miles Davis was playing softly in the background: “Summertime,” from Porgy and Bess.

He and Sharon had been together in the summertime. For three whole months, they had spent all their nights together, sometimes at Kurtz’ apartment, more often at Sharon’s place on the lower East Side. There was a little park-like area out back, almost a courtyard, which had a winding stone path surrounded by a garden. They would lie in bed at night after making love and hold hands and stare out at the stone path surrounded by yucca and Japanese maples and azaleas, the stars shining overhead and the moths flying through the beams of antique copper lamps that made their wings glow like they were on fire.

Real romantic. Except it had only lasted for three months, which was probably about a month and a half too long.

Sharon hadn’t been a bad sort, he reflected. Be generous. Their personalities had simply been incompatible. Everybody has their little quirks. Their quirks just hadn’t meshed.

After the breakup, they had hardly spoken for a year. After that...it no longer mattered. They were simply two people who knew each other. They said “hello” when they passed in the hallways and that was about it.

Kurtz had gone out with a lot of women. He had never felt like sticking with any of them...until Kathy. Kathy, he had to admit, was different. He thought about Kathy a lot lately. Kathy could let a man be. Kathy felt no obligation whatsoever to conform to anyone else's expectations and she didn't expect anyone else to conform to hers. Sharon, in addition to her need to keep the upper hand in a relationship, had always seemed to define herself in terms of other people: her snide, rich friends, her almost but not quite adequate boyfriend. Kurtz, frankly, had no desire at all to re-make himself into anybody's image of the ideal man.

Who might have wanted Sharon Lee dead?

That was the question, wasn't it? Barent thought Mose had done it... Even Bill Werth thought so, and truthfully, Kurtz had no good reason to think otherwise. Only a feeling.

Just then, the phone rang. Kurtz gave it a frown but it kept on ringing. Finally, he reached over and picked it up.

"Hello, Dr. Kurtz?"

"Yes?"

"This is Harry Moran. Sorry to bother you, but Detective Barent and I were wondering if you might be able to come downtown and talk with us."

"Now?" Kurtz glanced at the clock across the room. "It's eight o'clock. I have surgery in the morning."

"Something's come up. We think that you might be able to help."

"Is this about Sharon Lee?"

"We're not interested in your parking tickets, Doctor. You know what I mean?"

Kurtz hesitated. "Where are you?"

"We'll send a car."

"Coffee, Doctor?"

"No, thank you."

"You mind if I smoke?"

Kurtz grimaced at the air outside the glass separating Barent's office from the rest of the squadroom. The place was filled with desks, most of them empty at this hour. "If it's all the same to you, I'd rather you didn't. It gives me a headache."

Barent shrugged. "Sure."

The door opened. Moran came in, sat down in a corner and proceeded to look bored. Moran, Kurtz had already figured out, liked to look bored.

"We have a problem," Barent said. He stopped, frowned down at his desk and swirled his cup of coffee with one hand. "Harry and I are no longer as certain as we were that Bill Mose is the one who murdered Sharon Lee."

"Really..." Kurtz sat up straight in his chair. "That's a surprise."

Barent morosely nodded. "Two nights after she was killed, Sharon Lee's apartment was robbed. All of her jewelry was stolen."

Kurtz frowned, mulling this over. Barent gave him a moment to think about it, then said, "Yesterday afternoon, the body of a man named Herman Delgado was found in a dumpster near the Hudson River. He was murdered—shot in the chest." Barent held up a photograph of a white, circular smudge, perhaps six inches across. "You know what this is?" he asked.

Kurtz shook his head.

"It's a gloveprint. You wear them for awhile, leather gloves pick up oils from your hands and your fingers. The pattern of pores and ridges on a piece of leather can be just as distinctive as a fingerprint."

"Go on," Kurtz said.

“That’s an enlargement of a print taken from Sharon Lee’s apartment. It matches the forefinger of the right hand glove that Herman Delgado was wearing when he was killed.” Barent reached into his desk and held up a small object. “And then there’s this.” He flipped it to Kurtz.

Kurtz caught it. It sat delicately in his large fingers, a man’s gold ring, with a black onyx face. The letter “D” was inscribed on the face next to a single small diamond. The ring glittered in the bright light. “It looks like the ring I dug out of Mose,” Kurtz said.

“It is the ring you dug out of Mose. The Pathology Department at Easton didn’t want to give it to us, claimed it was confidential. We had to threaten them with a subpoena.”

The ring had lodged in Bill Mose’s small intestine and a mass of fibrous material, presumably a collection of cigarette butts, had adhered to it, making an obstruction that had blocked his small bowel. Kurtz turned it every which way, but it remained a simple gold ring.

“When he was a kid, Herman Delgado used to run with an uptown gang that called themselves the ‘Blades.’ He had a fairly extensive criminal record. Petty larceny, assault, car theft.” Barent shrugged. “Of course none of this proves anything at all. D for Delgado? Who knows? There are twenty six letters in the alphabet and millions of rings around. No way to tell for certain where Mose ran across it. Still, psych patients don’t move around much and there were never a lot of visitors up there on the Unit.”

Barent leaned back in his chair, emptied his coffee cup and smiled. “No real evidence to tie Herman Delgado to the murder—though I think it’s fairly safe to say he was the one who robbed Sharon Lee’s apartment—just enough to make me look at the possibilities. For instance, it’s possible that Herman Delgado knew something about Sharon Lee’s murder. It’s possible he was killed to keep him quiet. It’s possible that he knew her apartment would be empty because he was the one who killed her—or he knew who killed her.”

“Anything’s possible,” Kurtz said. “It’s possible he knew she was killed because he read about it in the newspaper.”

The corner of Barent’s mouth twitched. “True,” he said. “Sad but true.”

“Why tell me?” Kurtz asked.

“Why, indeed?” Barent shrugged. “If Bill Mose didn’t do it, then who did? You think maybe you could fit the bill?”

Kurtz pursed his lips and stared curiously at Barent’s face. Barent was about fifty-five. He was short for a cop, barely five nine, but he had kept in shape. He had thinning black hair with a bald spot on top and gray eyes behind wire rim glasses. The eyes were looking at him keenly. “Gee, Detective,” Kurtz said. “Why don’t you go fuck yourself?”

Barent smiled thinly and almost laughed. “I could speculate about possible motives—Sharon Lee and you were romantically involved; perhaps there was jealousy, or resentment.” Barent tipped his head to the side, peered into his empty coffee cup. “I have no real reason to think you did it. I have no reason to think you didn’t.”

“Well, I’m not going to give you one,” Kurtz said.

“Could you re-fill this for me, Harry?” Barent handed Moran his cup. Moran poured it full from a pot in the corner of the room and brought it back. “Motive is the question,” Barent said. “Was it just some punk looking for a cheap score?” Barent held a hand up and rocked it from side to side. “Unlikely. There are easier places to find someone to rob than a hospital in the middle of the night. And this business with Mose. Assuming of course that it wasn’t Mose who killed her—about which I am still uncertain—the way he was set up shows a lot of cool nerve. It also implies an inside job, because the average crook on the street who’s committing murder would not have hesitated to kill a witness who stumbled on what he was doing. The murderer must have been able to recognize that this guy would never be able to identify him, was in fact a human being with about three functioning brain cells.

“And who killed Delgado? You might say that people in Herman’s line of business get killed all the time, and you’d be right. But the timing is certainly curious.”

Kurtz frowned at him, still angry but unable to think of anything constructive. “I think I’ll take that cup of coffee you offered me,” he said finally.

“How do you like it?” Moran asked.

“Cream. Two sugars.”

Moran grunted, went over to the pot and poured Kurtz a cup. Kurtz sipped it. The coffee was good. No reason it wouldn’t be good. Policemen, like physicians, spend a lot of time working at night. They probably consumed gallons of the stuff.

Kurtz felt off balance and vaguely unreal. He hated the feeling. Control, he thought. Kurtz had spent years dealing with an environment that defied absolute control, but one that he at least understood. He was no longer used to feeling so out of his depth and he resented it. Barent sat there while he drank, looking at him with a sad expression on his craggy face.

“So you think someone in the hospital did it,” Kurtz finally said.

“I think someone in the hospital had something to do with it. I doubt they were working alone.”

“Why not?”

Barent smiled his sad smile. “Who killed Herman Delgado?”

“Oh,” said Kurtz. “Right.”

Barent shrugged. “You’re a smart guy, Doc. It takes a lot of brains to get through medical school, learn to do the things that you do. Most crooks are stupid, but in any line of work you’ll find that some people are more successful than others and the really successful crooks are not stupid at all.” He stared down into his coffee, shook his head sadly and sighed. “One more thing,” Barent asked. “Did Sharon Lee ride horses?”

Kurtz looked at him sharply. “She rode all the time. They kept three horses on the estate. When she was a kid, she used to dream about going to the Olympics.”

Barent wrote something down in his notebook, then looked up at Kurtz. “So much for dreams. I wish I could make something profound out of that but I can’t. The only thing I can do is try to catch the people who killed her. Somebody had something to gain by Sharon Lee’s death. Now who could that somebody be?”

KATHY ROSELLI'S FATHER was a professor of Sociology at Stanford. Her mother taught Anthropology. Kathy had grown up in an environment where diversity of thought was supposed to be cherished (so long as it was politically correct thought) and where money was considered to be crass (though it was a constant source of irritation that the academic life paid so poorly). Other cultures—even the most brutally repressive—were accorded endless tolerance and respect but members of one's own culture who happened to think differently from themselves were assumed to be misguided.

Kathy, Kurtz knew, had enough insight into herself to realize that this outlook was, at heart, parochial and contradictory. "I think it was Woody Allen who said, 'Intellectuals are like the Mafia; they only kill their own.'" She had said this to him once while discussing her parents. Kathy liked to think that she had outgrown the dogmas of her youth. Kurtz sometimes had his doubts.

"How do I look?" she asked.

"You look beautiful," he said. "Stop worrying."

She sniffed. "These women spend half their time at the tanning salon and the other half getting their hair done."

"Very few of them start out with your natural advantages."

"Nice of you to say so." She examined her face in a hand mirror, searching for imperfections. There were none.

"I like your dress," he said. The dress was dark blue, slit up the side of one leg and cut low in front. Kathy's hair, usually hanging down her back in a dark cloud, was pinned up in a chignon. He held her coat for her and she slipped her arms in. While she was doing so, he kissed the back of her neck. Her breath caught and he felt her shoulders tremble.

"We could stay in tonight," he suggested.

"What would the doctors think?" she chided. "Not to mention their assorted wives and concubines."

"We could leave early."

"Why would we want to leave early? I'm sure the conversation will be fascinating: gall bladders and esophagogastrectomies, limited partnerships and closed end mutual funds. What could be better than that?" She gave her hair a last little pat, then turned around, gave Kurtz a grudging smile and reached up to straighten his tie, which he tolerated in silence.

"Come on," she said. "Let's not be late."

They said very little in the cab. A thin flurry of snowflakes drifted out of the sky and the wipers slapped at them lazily as they settled on the windshield. Kurtz stared without seeing at the lights and the snow and mulled over his conversation the other night with Barent. "Herman was twenty: the leading edge of the youthful underworld. These kids, they band together into gangs when they're twelve, thirteen, fourteen, sometimes even younger. By the time they're grown up, they've got ambitions. Herman served six months for armed robbery when he was seventeen. He was in and out a total of maybe a year after that on a variety of charges: assault, possession of marijuana, burglary. It's possible that this involves his old gang. It's equally possible that Herman was working alone or took up with another organization. We should know more in a few days. We'll keep you informed," he said.

"I'm not a cop," Kurtz said. "Why are you bothering?"

Barent smiled at him and blinked his eyes innocently. "It's possible that you may be able to help us."

Kurtz stared at him, the skin on the back of his neck suddenly prickling.

"It seems likely that the solution to the murder of Sharon Lee, and possibly Herman Delgado as well, can be found in Easton Medical Center. You already have some knowledge of police procedure. Believe me, we wouldn't ask you to do anything dangerous. Maybe gather a little information."

"Oh," Kurtz said. "Really."

Barent again gave him his humorless smile. Kurtz said nothing. "Like I said," Barent repeated, "we'll let you know."

Kurtz felt for a moment like an ice cold wire was penetrating his brain. He shivered. "Can I leave now?" he asked.

"Sure." Barent glanced at his watch. It was close to ten at night. "I'll have one of the boys drive you home."

That had been two nights ago.

The first drops of rain began to drizzle down and the cabbie turned up the speed on his wipers. Kathy sat next to Kurtz with a dreamy smile on her face.

Kathy's Ph.D. thesis was almost completed, something to do with the relationship between T.S. Eliot and J.R.R. Tolkien. The two men had been part of a literary group at Oxford that called themselves the "Inklings." When he was younger, Kurtz had not been much of a reader. He would much rather be on a trout stream or hiding in a duck blind with a thermos of hot coffee and a shotgun, but when he got to college, an inspired instructor in a required Philosophy course and another in Introductory Literature had grudgingly changed Kurtz' mind. Maybe his time in the Army had a little to do with it, seeing other people and other places, hearing other languages. Maybe it was simply growing up. Whatever it was, Kurtz had read both Eliot and Tolkien and he thought the association improbable, though he refrained from mentioning this opinion to Kathy.

The cab turned down Central Park South and stopped at a building near 56th Street. An elderly black man in a green uniform opened the door and they walked into a mirrored lobby with a red carpet leading across a marble floor to the elevators. The elevator let them out on the Fifteenth Floor.

The door opened to their knock and Phil Longo stood there wearing a tuxedo and holding a bottle of champagne. A pointed party hat with a crepe paper tassel dangling from the tip perched on top of his head. Longo had a big smile on his face. His eyes were bloodshot. "Happy New Year," he said. "Come on in."

Longo was tall, red haired and well built. Even drunk, he looked good. Longo always looked good. Kurtz wondered sometimes how he did it. His clothes were always straight, his expression attentive, even now through an alcohol haze. It was as if the liquor only affected the surface of his brain. The real Longo was immune to it, somewhere deep inside his head. Longo could spend ten hours in the O.R. on a miserable case and come out looking eager for a brisk round of golf.

"Kathy Roselli," Kurtz said. "Phil Longo."

"Pleased to meet you." Longo said. He blinked happily at Kathy's chest. Kathy gave him a smile and swept past him into the room.

The apartment was enormous, the furnishings varied and expensive. A Queen Anne desk sat in one corner of the foyer and a display case high-lighted a collection of American redware. Longo's wife, Kurtz remembered, collected antiques. Or was that his former wife?

"Nice place," Kathy remarked.

Kurtz nodded. "Phil is an orthopod. Orthopods do well."

“Better than general surgeons?”

Kurtz didn't even have to think about that one. “Absolutely,” he said.

“You doctors have quite a hierarchy, don't you? Who's number one? The dermatologists?”

“If you're talking only about money, probably heart surgeons, or maybe plastic surgeons. Orthopedists, neurosurgeons and ophthalmologists are pretty close. Dermatologists do make a lot but not nearly as much as the surgical sub-specialists. On the other hand, you don't get called out in the middle of the night for acne or psoriasis, so if you're factoring in life style, dermatologists would have to be pretty close to the top.”

Kathy frowned at the display case. “It's good to see that virtue is rewarded,” she said. “Let's get a drink.”

They sipped champagne and mingled. Most of the crowd were doctors, mostly male, along with their wives or girlfriends. And the conversation did tend to center around medicine and money. Also vacations. Everyone, it seemed, was just coming back from someplace or about to go someplace else.

“How well do you know Longo?” Kathy whispered to him.

“Pretty well. Bill Werth and I have gone fishing with him a few times and we've had some beers after work. I always thought he was a nice guy. He does a lot of charity work. He'll probably hit me up for a donation to Settlement House before the evening is over. His wife is on the Board. Why?”

“Just wondering. How about the rest of them? Do you know them all?”

“Most of them. Not all.”

A tray of hors d'oeuvres swept past and Kurtz grabbed a mushroom stuffed with crabmeat and a shrimp coated with barbecue sauce and popped them in his mouth. Kathy chose an endive leaf with a slice of goat cheese in the middle and nibbled on it.

A woman who appeared to be in her early thirties came up to them. She had dark blonde hair piled high on the top of her head. Her nose was straight, her skin perfect. She was small, not more than five two, but her figure was softly rounded, with a tiny waist and swelling breasts. “Hello,” she said, and held out a tiny hand. “I'm Sylvia Longo.”

The hand was hot. What was that movie, the one with Kathleen Turner? Body Heat. The character's passionate nature was supposed to be reflected in her temperature. Sylvia Longo even looked like Kathleen Turner.

“This is Kathy Roselli,” Kurtz said, “and I'm Richard Kurtz.”

Sylvia Longo looked Kurtz up and down with a wide smile. She seemed to like what she was seeing. “Phil has told me all about you,” she said. After the initial perfunctory handshake, she ignored Kathy.

“He has? Nothing truthful, I hope.”

“He says that you're a wild man from the hills of West Virginia, rustic, true to life and unspoiled.”

Kurtz nodded and sipped his champagne, wondering if he should be annoyed, also wondering if it was true. “And I thought the tuxedo hid the real me.”

Sylvia Longo's eyes fixed on his face and Kurtz felt suddenly as if she could see right through his clothes. “It's amazing,” she said. “We can talk about emancipation and equality all we want, but every woman I know dreams about being swept off her feet by some handsome, uncivilized savage.”

“Really?” Kurtz blinked his eyes, and felt as if an electrical connection had suddenly been snapped. He turned to Kathy. “Is that why you like me?”

Kathy shook her head. “She said handsome.”

Sylvia Longo's eyes flicked once to Kathy's face, then back to Kurtz. She grinned. “Well,” she said, “enjoy yourself.” And she walked off.

“Antiques?” Kathy said.

“Maybe it was the first wife.”

They wandered through the crowd. A string quartet played quiet music in the corner of the room. A steady stream of waiters offered assorted hors d’oeuvres to the guests and a table near the kitchen was piled with opened bottles of Veuve Cliquot Grande Dame.

“Hi, Richard,” Bill Werth said.

Standing next to Werth was a tall, fat man with a round, red face, who held out his hand. “How ya doing? I’m John Stills, O.B.- G.Y.N.”

Kurtz shook his hand.

“You’re Kurtz, aren’t you?”

“I used to be,” Kurtz said, “but now I’m Tarzan, Lord of the Jungle.”

“Huh?”

“Never mind. Just a joke.”

Stills wrinkled his brow and peered at Kurtz. “What do you think about this thing with Sharon Lee?” he said after a moment. “Pretty strange, huh?”

Kurtz examined Still’s fat, innocently smiling face and reluctantly decided against strangling him. “Yup,” he agreed. “Pretty strange.”

“I did a lot of cases with her. Good surgeon, you know? Sort of a grouch but she knew her way around a uterus.”

“So I’ve been told.”

“Great party, isn’t it?” said Stills.

“You bet.”

Werth tried to suppress his grin and failed, and Kurtz gave him a sour look. “Where’s Dina?” Kurtz asked him.

“She’s around somewhere,” Werth said. “I haven’t seen her in a little while.”

“She’s in the bedroom with my wife,” Stills said, “examining a Ming vase.”

“We’re going to have to leave soon,” Werth said. “The babysitter has to be home by 11:30.”

“Too bad.” Stills smiled widely and blew an alcohol laden breath at Werth, who silently gagged. “We’ll just be getting started by then.”

“I,” Kathy announced, “need more champagne.”

“I’ll join you,” Kurtz said. Behind them, Werth made a helpless gesture in Still’s direction and then rolled his eyes to the ceiling. Kurtz smiled at him blandly over his shoulder.

“A charming man,” Kathy remarked, “rustic, true to life and unspoiled.”

Kurtz gave her a wounded look and silently drank his champagne.

“You want to go to Vegas?” Jim Farkas peered blearily at Kurtz, glanced with drunken interest at Kathy.

“Las Vegas? When?” Kurtz asked.

“I’m getting together a little trip. Middle of March. We’ll stay at the Mirage, maybe Bellagio. Longo’s going, so is Stills.”

“I’ll think about it.”

Farkas turned to Kathy. “I’m Jim Farkas,” he said. “You like him?”

“Sometimes.”

“He’s a cheap bastard,” Farkas said with a crooked smile. “You should drop him, get together with a guy who’ll treat you right.”

Kathy nodded. “I’ve been thinking the same thing. General surgeons don’t make much money.”

“You said it.” Farkas felt through his pockets, came up with a card and handed it to Kathy. “Here’s my number. You get tired of him, give me a call. I mean it. You’re gorgeous.”

“I’ll keep it in mind.”

“Okay.” Farkas grinned at Kurtz, leered at Kathy and wandered off. Kathy fingered the card and smiled speculatively at Farkas’ retreating back. She put the card in her handbag. “You never know,” she said.

“Isn’t money supposed to be beneath the notice of the true intellectual?”

“I’m beginning to acquire an appreciation for the finer things in life. Dr. Farkas is a very attractive man.”

Farkas was short, stout and bald. Kurtz snorted. “Uh-huh.”

Kathy laughed softly and hugged his arm. “I think you were right, after all,” she said. “Why don’t we leave early?”

BARENT SPENT NEW YEAR'S Eve at home with the family. Betty made a turkey with stuffing and cranberry sauce and after dinner, they watched television in the living room. An old Western was on, The Searchers, with John Wayne and Montgomery Clift, one of Barent's favorites.

About ten o'clock, Michael, the Barents' oldest son, looked at his watch and said, "I've got to get going. I told Janet I would pick her up. We've been invited to a party at the LaRocca's."

Barent glanced at his wife, who gave an imperceptible nod. "Sure," Barent said. "Say hello for us."

Denise, their daughter, was already waiting for her date to arrive, a stockbroker named Paul Janus. Barent didn't like him.

The door bell rang and Denise glanced at Barent. "Don't be too late," he said.

Denise smiled, picked up her coat and kissed him in the middle of his bald spot. After she had gone, Barent felt his good mood beginning to desert him. A commercial came on the T.V. The house grew quiet. Betty watched his face with an expression that he found hard to interpret. Finally, he asked, "What's on your mind?"

"Oh, nothing." She shrugged and looked sad. "I was thinking that they grow up so fast." She smiled fleetingly. "I think Denise is going to marry Paul."

Barent shuddered. "God forbid," he said

"Why don't you like him?" Betty asked.

Barent sometimes wondered the same thing. "I'm not exactly sure," he admitted. "I suppose he's okay." He shrugged. "I guess he's just not my sort. He's sort of wishy-washy, you know?"

"You mean because he's polite?"

Barent grunted and gave her a sour look.

"I mean it," Betty persisted. "The way you talk to him, he ought to punch you in the nose."

"Hey," Barent protested, "if he wants Denise, he can put up with a little ribbing from her old man."

"Like the time you said to him that stockbrokers were parasites and why doesn't he get a job that might be of some use to society?"

"Did I say that?"

"Yes. You did. Believe me, I was just as embarrassed as Denise." Betty's knitting needles clicked furiously together.

"Come on," Barent said. "I didn't say anything like that."

"You did, too. You know you did. And I don't want you to say it again."

"Well, I don't believe it." Barent shifted his gaze to the T.V. but a few moments later looked back at Betty. "But if I said it," he added, "I must have meant it."

On the evening of January 2, Barent walked into a bar on East Houston Street. The bar had a sign in the window that said Exotic Dancers. It was the fifth such place Barent had visited since the early afternoon. He sat down at a corner table and waited to be served. The waiter, a fat white man with greasy black hair, a handlebar moustache and a dirty apron, came up to him. "What'll it be?" he asked.

"Heineken," Barent said, "and give me a burger, well done, with some fries."

The bartender grunted and Barent turned to see the show but there wasn't much to see. Maybe it was too early. On a small stage behind the bar, a solitary dancer swayed to the beat of some hard rock that, thankfully, was turned down low. The girl was blonde, of indeterminate age. She looked vaguely into it but moved without much enthusiasm. She had on a g-string and a bangle of fake pearls around her hips and nothing on top. Most of the patrons ignored her. Her nipples, Barent noted, seemed to be painted. That deep red color could not possibly have been natural.

The bartender re-appeared with a green bottle and a tall glass, poured out half the bottle, plunked it down in front of Barent and said, "Your burger will be out soon. Anything else I can get you?"

Barent nodded. "You see that guy?" He pointed to a thin black man wearing a tan fedora and a bright maroon jacket, sitting at the bar and watching the blonde dancer. "Could you ask him to step over here? Tell him Lew Barent would like to speak with him."

The bartender glanced at the black man, glanced back at Barent without changing the blank expression on his face, and walked away. A few minutes later, Barent saw him leaning over, talking to the black man. They both looked in his direction. Soon after, Barent's hamburger arrived. The bartender put it down and turned away without saying a word. A few minutes after that, the black man slid into the seat opposite Barent.

"Barent," he said. "Don't see you much these days."

"Hello, Croft," Barent said. "How's business?"

Croft's business was prostitution. Croft was a pimp, an unusual pimp in that he took a straight thirty per-cent cut, had his girls tested periodically for gonorrhea and AIDS and never abused them. They wanted to leave, set up on their own, find someone else to peddle their wares, that was just fine with Croft. Plenty of others where they came from. Barent had a certain grudging respect for Croft, though he would never have let him know it. Barent, like most cops, had busted his share of prostitutes because that was part of the job but personally, Barent didn't believe in victimless crimes. Croft ran his business like it was a business. He was also a very sharp character.

Croft put a pained expression on his face. "Now what you wanting to ask me a question like that for?"

Barent cracked a smile. "Old times' sake, I suppose. It seemed so natural."

"Natural is over rated, you ask me. You got floods and earthquakes and cancer and everything else. What so great about natural?"

Barent couldn't argue. He shrugged and finished his beer. "I figured you might be here. You always were a creature of fixed habits."

"If you mean I'm a man who knows what I like, then you right."

"It occurred to me that you might be able to help me."

"Help you?" Croft smiled. He tilted his head back and peered out at Barent from beneath the brim of his hat. "Why should I do a thing like that?"

Barent let a hurt expression cross his face. "Didn't I put in a good word for you with the parole board?"

Croft looked doubtful. "You did? They never told me that."

"I need to know something." Barent went on as if Croft had not spoken. "You know a guy named Herman Delgado?"

Croft puffed his cheeks up, frowned. "Can't say as I do."

"Small time hood: robbery, assault. He used to run with a gang called themselves the Blades. He's dead—shot through the chest."

"Hard to establish a relationship with a man who's dead."

Barent shrugged. "Anything you can find out, I'd like to know. Who did he work for? Who didn't like him? Anything."

"Delgado..." Croft wrinkled his nose, nodded. "I remember the Blades real well: crazy little motherfuckers." Without another word, he got up and went back to his place at the bar and stared as if mesmerized at the jiggling breasts of the blonde dancer.

The burger was pretty good, Barent thought. He finished it slowly, left a nice tip and walked out. He had a few more people he wanted to see before heading home.

New York City was not where Richard Kurtz would have expected himself to wind up. Kurtz was an only child. His mother had died when he was three years old and he barely remembered her. His father was a quiet, hardworking man who never remarried. He had run the farm the way his father and his grandfather had before him and he seemed to assume that Kurtz would do the same.

Kurtz was a farm boy, small town all the way. He was a smart farm boy, though. He had graduated number three in his high school class, which surprised Kurtz almost as much as it would have surprised his friends, if they had only known it. They didn't know it because Kurtz never told them. He was embarrassed to admit it.

He knew he wanted out of there, though. His father might be disappointed in him but Kurtz was smart enough to know that scrabbling in the dirt for the rest of his life was not how he wanted to earn a living. Kurtz wanted out bad and the Army was the easiest, quickest way.

A lot of guys had hated the Army. Not Kurtz. Kurtz figured it was a good deal. You put in your time, did as you were told, they showed you a slice of the world and taught you some skills. Then they paid your way through college when you were done. For a poor kid, it was a very good deal indeed.

So here he was, thirty-six years old, with everything he had thought he wanted in life and somehow, it just wasn't enough. He looked out the window at the cold gray skies and felt a leaden weight on his soul.

I've been alone for a long time, Kurtz thought. A long time. Kurtz spoke to his father occasionally but they didn't have much to say to each other. Kurtz felt genuinely bad about that, but he didn't know what to do about it.

Kurtz had found himself waiting for Barent to call. He knew that he shouldn't. He told himself he was being an idiot, that Barent could only get him involved in something that he would regret, but he couldn't get the image of Sharon Lee, naked and dead, out of his mind. He wanted her killer found. His sense of the natural order demanded it. The thought that a murderer might be lurking in the hospital halls, walking to and fro, eating in the same cafeteria, perhaps working in the same operating room as Richard Kurtz, filled him with alternating horror and grinding rage. He found himself staring at the people he passed, wondering.

He had a week off starting Saturday. He performed no cases after Wednesday. He did not want to leave behind any patients who might go sour while he was gone. He saw a few people in the office, identified a hernia and a possible gall bladder and scheduled them for consultation by Medicine. By the time they were ready for surgery, he would be back.

As he walked into the office on Friday afternoon, he saw that Mrs. Nelson, Farkas' secretary, was sitting behind Rose Schapiro's desk. Farkas had surgery on Friday and the secretaries often covered for each other when their own doctors were scheduled to be out of the office. Mrs. Nelson was a plump, jolly woman with curly black hair. Kurtz liked her.

He saw his last patient, a lady who had had an axillary node biopsy for non-Hodgkin's lymphoma and who was now doing well after radiation therapy, and walked out of the office at four o'clock, ready to party. Mrs. Nelson beamed at him. "Have a nice time, Doctor," she said. "We'll see you in a week."

Kurtz smiled at her. "Thanks. I'll do my best."

Freedom. He stopped on the hospital steps and breathed it in like a drug. It was January Fourth but the sun was shining, the day unseasonably warm. In a few hours he would be in an airplane, heading south. He could hardly wait.

"Jaime Ruiz," Moran said, "is a known psychopath."

"Yeah?" Barent squinted down the length of his cigar, puffed it alight and settled himself comfortably in his seat.

"Yeah," Moran said. "One time he sliced a kid's ear off in a bar because the kid didn't laugh when Jaime told a joke." Moran swerved the car to avoid a pothole and almost skidded on a piece of ice. "How come I always have to drive?" he complained.

"You like to drive," Barent pointed out. "I don't. I like to think."

Moran grunted.

"And do you know what I'm thinking at this particular instant?" Moran looked at him. Barent grinned. "You see that girl?" he asked. Walking along the street was a tall blonde with a red dress, a heart shaped face and a very hard body. "What about her?"

"Would it surprise you to know that I would very much like to walk up behind her, rip her clothes off and fuck her brains out, right there on the street?"

"Not at all," Moran said. "So would I."

"But you're not going to, are you?"

Moran pursed his lips and looked pained. "No?"

"I'm not going to, either," Barent said. "You know why?"

"Tell me," Moran said.

"Because my wife wouldn't like it."

"Yeah?" Moran said doubtfully.

"Yeah. There are rules, you see? Truth to tell, I've got just as many dirty little secrets running around my brain as anybody else. Even Jaime Ruiz. But I behave myself, because that's what all of us are supposed to do in a civilized society."

"Ah, of course," Moran said. "A civilized society."

"Yes, a civilized society. Did Jaime have an abused childhood?"

"I don't know. Why?"

"Because I don't care, that's why. I don't care why a psychopath does what he does. Lots of people have a tough life. Most of them get married, have kids, make money and follow the rules. They don't turn into psychopaths. So fuck him."

Moran looked at him. Barent gave a sour grin and blew a smoke ring into the air. "I'm looking forward to this," Barent said. "It's not every day I get to talk to a known psychopath."

The Vanity Social Club was on East 87th Street. It had opened only the week before and apparently was doing good business. Barent and Moran pulled the car into the parking lot on the side of the building and walked in. The front door opened onto a short corridor, which led up to a curled iron gate and a stand up desk where a tall Hispanic male in a tuxedo presided over those lucky enough to be allowed entrance. Beyond the gate, strobe lights flashed purple across the dance floor and a laser show went on over a stage where a redheaded singer was doing a passable imitation of Gloria Estefan. Her band would never be mistaken for Miami Sound Machine but they weren't bad, the sax especially.

Barent flashed his badge. "Detective Barent," he said. "Detective Moran. We're here to see Jaime Ruiz."

"You have an appointment?"

"An appointment?" Barent raised his eyebrows to Moran. "Do we have an appointment?"

"Why, I do believe so," Moran said. He screwed up his face in thought. "The precinct social director was supposed to call and make one. Why don't you check your book?"

The usher frowned down at his desk and said, "Just a minute." He walked off.

"An appointment," Barent said, and rolled his eyes. "Oh, man."

The usher came back and said, "Come with me." He led them around the dance floor to a set of stairs. Two more men with tuxedos stood at either side of the staircase. "Up there. Third door on your right."

"Thanks," Barent said.

He looked at Barent without expression, turned and walked away. "Well, what's the matter with him?" Moran asked.

The upstairs hallway was covered with a thick, burgundy carpet. Two crystal chandeliers hung from the ceiling. The third door on the right was open. The room inside looked more like a bedroom than an office, except for a dark, wooden desk sitting beneath the window. The window was covered with red velvet drapes. A wet bar sat in the corner. An enormous bed lay against one wall and a bleached oak wall unit covered the entire opposite wall. A thirty-five inch television screen was set in the wall unit. It was playing a movie: Blade Runner, by Ridley Scott. Three men sat in felt covered reclining chairs in the center of the room. Two of these were big and burly and looked Barent and Moran up and down with idle suspicion. The third man was dressed in tight black jeans and a red silk shirt open nearly to the waist. His neck was covered with an assortment of gold chains that hid the upper part of his chest. He had black, slicked back hair and a thin black moustache. A small diamond earring sparkled in the lobe of his left ear. He said, "You Barent?" He didn't look up.

"Yes," Barent said.

"I'm Ruiz." He glanced at Barent from the corner of his eye.

Barent looked around for a place to sit down but there were no more chairs and none of the three looked inclined to offer him one.

"You like this movie?" Ruiz asked.

"It's not bad," Barent said.

"This movie kills me. At the end, when the replicant hold the cop out over the edge of the building and think about letting him drop, that just tears me apart. But he knows he's dying so what would be the point? Let the poor bastard live. Why not?" Ruiz shrugged. "I would have taken him with me, but what the hell?"

"To each his own," said Barent.

Ruiz looked up at him. "What do you want?"

"I want to talk." Barent frowned. "I could talk better if I had a place to sit down."

Ruiz looked at him, looked at the two men setting on either side of him and gave his head a little jerk. One of the men rose to his feet and walked over to the bar. Barent sat. Ruiz turned back to the screen.

"You know a guy named Herman Delgado?" Barent asked.

"Herman Delgado?" Ruiz frowned. "That name's familiar. What did he do?"

"I don't know what he did. He's dead."

The expression on Ruiz' face did not change. After a moment, he yawned. "People die all the time. Why come to me?"

"Our records indicate that Herman used to run with the Blades. The Blades answered to you."

"Oh?" For the first time, Ruiz looked interested. "What happen to him?"

"Someone shot him in the chest and dumped him in a garbage can."

Ruiz puffed out his cheeks and nodded. "That's too bad," he said.

"You wouldn't happen to know why, or even who, would you, Jaime?"

Ruiz gave a small shake of his head. "My people, they come to me when they're in trouble, I try to help them. This Herman Delgado, he a short fellow, little beard?"

"Yes."

"I remember him. He mind his own business. He leave the old neighborhood maybe six months ago. I don't know where. I don't know why. I had no reason to ask. One of my people, he want to go into business for himself, I can't stop him. He ever need me, I'm here."

"Regular little Godfather, aren't you, Jaime?"

Ruiz looked hurt. "What for you want to insult me, Barent?"

"No reason, I guess. We cops tend to be like that."

Ruiz smiled slightly and spread his hands. "Anything else I can do for you, Barent?"

"If you hear anything, you'll let me know." It was a statement, not a question.

Ruiz' smile grew wider. "I always cooperate with the law. It's how I got to where I am today."

Barent reached into his wallet, pulled out a card. "It's got my number," he said, and handed the card to Ruiz.

Ruiz turned the card back and forth in his fingers, as if not quite certain what to do with it. Then he shrugged. "Sure, Barent. I hear anything, I'll give you a call."

CANCUN: SUN, SAND AND fun.

Kurtz had asked Kathy to come along with him. She had seemed to think about it, searching his face with a crooked smile. Then she gave a tiny shrug and a shake of her head. “Thanks for asking,” she said, “but I need to work on my thesis and I could use the time. Have fun.” Kurtz couldn’t argue, but it seemed pretty obvious that there was something else on her mind. He was moody the whole evening after that, which Kathy ignored—if she even noticed.

A blast of heat took him in the face as soon as he exited the plane and he shuddered luxuriously, filling his lungs with the heavy, perfumed air. He walked into the terminal, retrieved his suitcase from the baggage checkout and took a cab from the airport to the Hotel Meridian, a brand new tower of adobe, red stucco and glass rising twenty stories above the beach.

He spent the next two days taking long walks by the water, soaking up the sun on his bare chest, eating ceviche and snapper baked in a salt crust and arroz con pollo and loin of pork with mole, swimming in the sea and floating on his back in the enormous pool.

As evening of the second day approached, he lay on a lounge chair by the water, sipping a piña colada and listening with sleepy contentment to a mariachi band composed of five young boys in Mexican hats playing Guantanamera in the shade of a grove of palm trees. Three more hats lay on the grass and people passing by would stop and listen for a few moments and occasionally throw some loose change into the hats.

Threading their way through the crowded forest of lounge chairs, an elderly lady with curled gray hair and a bald fat man wearing a striped bathing suit and carrying a beach bag walked in his direction. They settled themselves on lounges. The man took a tube of Coppertone out of the beach bag and squirted some on his abdomen. Then he pulled a paperback book out of the bag and idly flipped through the pages while rubbing in the Coppertone with his other hand. Kurtz, lulled by the sun and the warmth of the breeze, his eyes half closed, could see the woman looking him up and down. She smiled, showing large, perfect teeth, and said, “What do you do, young man?”

Kurtz shook his head drowsily. “Excuse me?”

“I saw you with that drink and I wondered, is that a piña colada? I always wanted to try a piña colada. I always think about asking for one but then I always change my mind at the last instant and order rum and coke instead. Isn’t that silly? So I thought I’d ask. Are you an American? You look like an American. What’s your name? Where are you from?”

Kurtz stared at her and shook his head, still half asleep.

The fat man reclined the head of his lounge and lay back, his enormous abdomen rising up like a white dome through his unbuttoned Hawaiian shirt. He gave Kurtz a quick look, shrugged his shoulders and stared at the pool.

“I’m Esther Brinkman.” She jabbed the fat man with her elbow. He ignored her. “This is Stanley, my husband. We’re from the Bronx. Do you like Mexican food? We love it. We come here every year. We used to go to Acapulco and we tried Ixtapa once but Cancun is much nicer. They give you everything you ask for and they have their own water system, all along the beach, but don’t try the restaurants in town, you might be sorry.

“I’m Richard Kurtz,” Kurtz said. “I’m from New York.”

“See?” Esther Brinkman jabbed her husband again, who grunted but didn’t bother turning his head. “I can always tell, something about the eyes. Are you here all alone? A good looking young man like yourself?” Kurtz, beginning to get a hemmed in feeling but not knowing how to get away without seeming rude, said, “Yes, actually. I am.”

“That’s a shame. Stanley, isn’t that a shame?”

Stanley nodded. “Uh-huh,” he said. “A shame.”

“So what do you do?” She held up a hand suddenly. “No! Don’t tell me. Let me guess.” She squinted at him, her little eyes almost closing, her mouth looking like a raisin. “You’re in sales. You’ve got that look, something very persuasive.” She nodded triumphantly. “I can always tell.”

“I’m a surgeon,” Kurtz said. It just slipped out, and immediately he thought, You dope.

“A surgeon?” Her eyes grew wide. “A real surgeon?”

“Yes,” Kurtz said weakly.

She stared at him. “Stanley,” she said, and clutched her husband by the hand. “He’s a surgeon.”

Stanley turned his head and gave Kurtz a blank look. He shook his head sadly and rolled his eyes.

“I have someone you just have to meet. Where is she?” Mrs. Brinkman half rose from her seat and urgently scanned the crowd.

Oh, no, Kurtz thought. “I have to be going,” he said.

Esther Brinkman ignored him. Her eyes lit up and she frantically waved at someone behind Kurtz’ chair, all five fingers wriggling in the breeze.

“Please,” Kurtz said. “You’ll have to excuse me.” He stood, turned, stopped, stared.

Oval face, long lashes, wide green eyes. She was tall. From the tips of her toes to the top of her head must have been a solid, willowy six feet. She wore a white string bikini, which covered very little of her tanned, lush figure. Long blonde hair hung halfway down her back, tied in a ponytail. Her hands were on her hips, head cocked to the side at a wary angle.

“This is Lenore,” Mrs. Brinkman said. “Our daughter.”

Kurtz turned his head, stared at Mrs. Brinkman. She gave him a thin smile. He turned back to Lenore and cleared his throat. “Pleased to meet you,” he said.

Lenore Brinkman said nothing and looked at her mother. She did not, Kurtz thought, look pleased. Mrs. Brinkman stared back at her, a triumphant little grin on her face.

“This is Richard Kurtz,” Mrs. Brinkman said, “from New York. He’s a surgeon.”

“A surgeon,” Lenore said. Her voice was smooth and deep, like molasses. Her eyes went back to Kurtz’ face. She gave her head a tiny shake, pasted a look on her face that was less than enthralled, and breathed a resigned sigh.

Kurtz said, “Can I buy you a drink?”

“Sure,” Lenore said. She glanced at her mother. “Not here.”

Mrs. Brinkman smiled like a bright, predatory bird. “Have a good time,” she said to Kurtz. “I knew you two would get along.”

“I don’t know what it is about the women in my family,” Lenore Brinkman said. She had put on a white jumpsuit and they sat on the hotel balcony, sharing a plate of shrimp with hot sauce and two Dos Equis. The sun was setting over the ocean and the sky overhead was shot full of purple and orange streaks. Far across the sand, phosphorescent waves broke rhythmically on the beach. “They’re all crazy. My uncles are such nice, sweet men but my mother and both her sisters are completely out of their minds.”

“She seemed to know what she was doing,” Kurtz said.

“She knows exactly what she’s doing.” Lenore peeled a shrimp, dipped it in sauce, and bit off half of it. “My mother is a very smart woman. She could have done something with her life, except that girls growing up back then weren’t supposed to do something with their lives. Instead, she bossed around my father and drove me and my sister absolutely nuts.”

Lenore Brinkman had a degree from Cooper Union in Graphic Art and worked in advertising. She was twenty-six years old. She was just getting over a relationship that had not worked out.

“Harrison’s father is an S.O.B. and Harrison didn’t have the backbone to stand up to him.” She shook her head. “Things have been difficult for them lately. They’re old money and money’s been tight, to which I say tough. Let them learn how the rest of the world has to live. They deserve it. Harrison’s father is president of a Savings and Loan.” Lenore snickered and took a chug from her beer.

“I had my doubts about coming along but maybe my mother was right. Get away from it all.” She shrugged and wrinkled her nose at the shrimp she was peeling. Then she said, “Look, I don’t want to string you along. You seem like a nice guy but I don’t know if I’m ready to get involved with anybody just yet.”

Kurtz sipped his beer and stared at the thin crescent of sun still barely visible above the horizon. “I understand,” he said. He thought about Kathy and wondered for an instant what she might be doing, back in New York. “Maybe I’m not ready either.”

Lenore suddenly grinned. “Mom was all over you like a pekingese chewing a bone. You looked pretty funny.”

“I was trying to escape without being rude.”

“Sometimes you just have to be rude.” Lenore put her feet up on the lower rail and leaned her head back. Her hair glinted in the fading light. “Doctors...” She glanced into her beer, then drained the glass. “Every Jewish mother’s dream.”

“Why is that?” Kurtz asked.

“Why?” Lenore shrugged. “I suppose it’s cultural. Jews admire education and it takes a lot of education to be a doctor. And there’s the old stereotype about Jews and money; it’s at least partly true. Jews like money. Doctors make money.”

“Everyone,” Kurtz said, “likes money.”

“With us it’s different. For five thousand years, sooner or later a Roman or a Cossack or a Nazi or the Spanish Inquisition would take everything we had and either kill us or kick us out. But if you had money, maybe you could buy a ticket to somewhere else; maybe you could bribe the soldier who comes to arrest you; maybe you could get away. Money buys security and Jews are nuts about security, an attitude that I can understand completely. I mean, Jews know they’re paranoid, but just because you’re paranoid doesn’t mean nobody is out to get you.

“Now me...” Lenore shook her golden hair out over her shoulders and ran her hands through it. “I liked art. Art is cultured. Jews are very into culture so my parents approved—they could tell their friends I was a genius. But culture is chancy. From a financial perspective, there is nothing in the slightest bit secure about culture. It is absolutely astounding the speed with which a genius can turn into a bum in the opinion of your family if you actually want to do something cultural for a living. You want to play the piano, learn to paint, study ballet: wonderful! You want to be a pianist, or an artist, or a dancer? Forget it; you’ll never amount to anything. You’re a bum. Of course, if you somehow manage to actually be successful, then you’re a genius again.” Lenore shrugged, and peeled another shrimp. “Oh, well.”

Kurtz thought for a moment of his own boyhood, running barefoot through muddy fields in summer, trekking through snow that came up to his chest in winter. Nothing too cultural about that, and nobody he grew up with seemed to miss it.

"I'm twenty-six," Lenore said. "Mom's getting worried. A few years ago, if I wanted to go out with someone who wasn't Jewish, she'd threaten to disown me. I say 'she' because my father never had anything to say about it anyway. Now she's fixing me up with strange men." Lenore gave a little laugh. "I know my mother. She's willing to compromise. You're not a Jewish doctor, but you are a doctor."

The sun had set completely; only a faint orange glow still lingered over the horizon. A waiter walked around the terrace with a cart full of citronella lanterns, lit them and put them up on poles around the railing. Kurtz could hear the band beginning to play inside the Hotel. "Do you like to dance?" he asked.

"Yeah," she said.

"Let's dance," he said, and took her by the hand.

"Mrs. Delgado?"

She was short and fat, with round, plump arms and a round, moon face. She looked at him silently, with open suspicion.

"I'm Detective Barent." He showed her his badge. "This is Detective Moran. Could we come in?"

She stared at them, her large black eyes flitting back and forth between their faces. Finally, she stepped aside and they walked past her into the apartment. Paint was peeling from the walls. Tiny puddles of rust lay on the floor where radiator pipes had leaked. Cheap plywood tables covered with vinyl, three rickety garden chairs and an old collapsed couch with springs showing through the fabric were the only furniture. The faucet over the kitchen sink steadily dripped.

Mrs. Delgado stood in the center of the room, looking at their faces silently and expectantly. Barent cleared his throat. "I'm sorry about your son," he finally said.

She shrugged. "Why do you care? He wasn't your son."

Barent frowned at this and felt the muscles across his shoulders tightening. "That's true," he said carefully. "But I have children of my own, and I sympathize with what you must be feeling." Barent meant it. His own youngest son, Benjamin, had died from leukemia three years ago, at the age of fourteen. Ever since then, Barent had had a lot of difficulty dealing with the bereaved parents of dead children, even if the dead children were career criminals like Herman Delgado.

Moran, who knew this, looked at him with moody surprise. "May we sit down, Mrs. Delgado?"

She glanced at the couch and shrugged. Barent sat. Mrs. Delgado lowered her weight into one of the chairs, which swayed beneath her. Moran continued to stand.

"Mrs. Delgado, it's my job to try to find the people who killed your son. Anything at all that you can tell me might be helpful."

"You a little late to be helpful. Herman, he run with a bad crowd but that the only crowd he ever know. It's hard for a boy to grow up right when he don't have no one to show him how." She sat up straight, her face closed in, her eyes fixed somewhere beyond Barent's shoulder, staring into nothing.

Barent nodded. He flicked a glance at Moran, who gave a minute shrug. He took a small cardboard box out of his pocket and removed the cover. Inside the box lay the ring that Kurtz had retrieved from Bill Mose's intestines. "Mrs. Delgado, could you tell us if your son had a ring like this?"

She looked at it without much interest. "I don't know," she said. "We don't see Herman too much. He spend most of the day sleeping. At night, he was mostly out." She shook her head sadly. "I don't know," she said again.

"Could you tell us who his friends were? Did he have a job? Who did he work with?"

The door opened. A girl no more than twelve stood there, dressed in a green blouse and jeans, frowning first at Barent, then at Moran. "Herman hang out with Jimmy Ramirez," the girl said. "Jimmy Ramirez his best friend. And Carlos Rivera—but Carlos move away and we don't see him no more."

"My little girl, Angela," Mrs. Delgado said. "She's right. You ask Jimmy Ramirez. I don't know nothing about Herman's business. He come in late. He say nothing. Sometimes he give me money." She shrugged. "That's all I know."

Angela sat down at the table, cradled her cupped hands beneath her chin and swung her legs back and forth under the chair. She watched Barent and Moran as if they were strange creatures in a zoo.

"Have you seen this ring before, Angela?" Barent asked.

Angela stared at the ring for a long moment, frowning, then gave a little shrug. Barent glanced at Moran, carefully closed the box and put it back in his pocket. "Thank you, Mrs. Delgado," he said. "Thank you, Angela."

Angela nodded her head. Mrs. Delgado said nothing. As the door closed behind them, Barent could see her staring at the cracked, faded wall. She looked as if she would stay there forever, Barent thought, staring, with no expression on her face.

ON THE EVENING OF JANUARY 6th, a street gang in the Bronx known as the “Black Dragons” invaded the territory of another gang that called itself the “King Cobras.”

Two days before, a fourteen-year-old named Shawna, who had been sleeping with a Black Dragon named Jackson, had gone into a convenience store to pick up some lipstick. Shawna browsed the shelves, turned her head quickly around to see if anyone was watching, and pocketed the one she liked. She stopped at the counter, paid a quarter for a chocolate covered cherry and went out the door.

“Yo.” A tall, well built young man smiled at her. He had a thin moustache and hair cut into a brush, with a gold skull set into the lobe of his left ear.

“What you want?” Shawna asked.

“What I want?” The young man looked her up and down and smacked his lips. “Why don’t you come along with me and find out?”

“With you?” Shawna thought about it while she chewed her chocolate covered cherry. The young man’s jacket was black and looked like real leather. He wore Adidas High Tops and his hair had twin lightning bolts cut down to the scalp on both sides. “You don’t look like so much.”

“No?” He smiled wider, reached into his pocket, pulled out a round tin container that said “Happy Days Chewing Tobacco” and pulled off the top. The tin was filled with soft white powder. He held it out to her. “I got what you want if you got what I want.”

Shawna looked at the powder, looked up at the boy’s grinning face and swallowed. Abruptly, she nodded.

The boy thrust the tin back into his pocket. “Come on,” he said.

“What’s your name?”

The boy looked at her. “Major.”

Shawna followed Major down the street and up the steps of a dingy brownstone. He pulled open the door of an apartment and they both entered. Sitting around a table, passing a pipe, sat five more boys. They looked at her blearily and they all smiled. The door closed.

“Now wait a minute,” Shawna said.

Major’s eyes danced in the light. “You gone get all you can handle tonight, girl. Indeed you are.”

Ten hours later, the boys allowed Shawna to leave. She was crying and she tottered down the street on unsteady legs.

Two nights later, fifteen young men, all of them armed with knives, three carrying pistols, walked into Cobra territory, seeking revenge. The Black Dragons moved in groups of three and converged on a small park where members of the rival gang were known to hang out. One bleary eyed boy sitting on a bench and smoking a joint by himself looked up and saw them. He shook his head, as understanding slowly penetrated. “Hey,” he said.

One of the Black Dragons stuck a knife in him and he screamed. Boys came running from all over the small park, saw what was happening, pulled their own weapons and jumped into the fray.

Somebody on the street must have made a phone call because within fifteen minutes, the distant sound of sirens began to penetrate the screams. Slowly at first, then quickly, the gangs disentangled themselves and melted away. They left behind five dead bodies and seven who were too badly wounded to run. One of these was Jimmy Ramirez, who belonged to neither gang but who had had the bad luck to be conducting a cocaine purchase in the park at the time that the attack took place.

Five police cars, lights flashing and sirens screaming, came roaring up. The cops surveyed the scene, made their calls and within another few minutes, the ambulances arrived.

“Oh, man,” Jimmy Ramirez said. He said it over and over. “Oh, man. Oh, man.” He held a hand over the hole in his side but blood still leaked out. His eyes darted this way and that and he licked his lips with a tongue gone dry. “Oh, man.” He mumbled something under his breath, coughed and then cried out at the sudden pain.

They carted him into an ambulance and sped off. At the E.R., the trauma team ripped off his clothes, put an I.V. into each arm and each leg and drew blood for routine labs and a Type and Cross. By this time, Jimmy Ramirez was almost unconscious, his blood pressure barely detectable. They rushed him out the E.R. doors and down the hall into an operating room where a surgical team stood waiting. Within minutes, Jimmy Ramirez was asleep and the surgeons began working.

The knife had carved a deep laceration in his liver. After six hours of surgery, his wounds had been repaired as well as could be. They still oozed but the liver was soft and held stitches poorly. Any attempt to place more of them was liable to make things worse. The surgeon put packs all around the abdomen, hoping that constant pressure would do the job, pulled the edges of the abdominal wall together and covered them with tape. He didn't suture. In a day or two, if Jimmy Ramirez lived, he would be brought back to the operating room for removal of the packs. They brought him to the I.C.U. unconscious and left him there, oblivious to the soft sigh of the ventilator forcing oxygen into his lungs.

Two hours later, Jimmy Ramirez went into D.I.C.—disseminated intravascular coagulation—his clotting factors and platelets all used up in a futile effort to stem the flow of blood through his wounds. The I.C.U. staff poured in plasma and platelet transfusions as fast as they could, but there was too much organ damage. The platelets were chewed up as soon as they were transfused and Jimmy Ramirez began to ooze from every pore. The heart, deprived of its blood supply, slowed and then fibrillated. A surgical resident began to compress Jimmy's chest while the nurses desperately squeezed in more blood. After an hour, after twenty-seven units of packed cells, twenty units of platelets and ten units of fresh frozen plasma, Jimmy's heart had irrevocably stopped. The Chief Surgical Resident looked at the monitors, shook his head and announced, “Okay, that's it.” Reluctantly, the team grew silent, stared at each other, drew long, weary breaths, shrugged and shuffled out. A respiratory therapist turned off the ventilator as she left. The nurses took a quick break for coffee, then wrapped the body in plastic and sent it down to the morgue.

The little man sitting in the chair across from Barent had coffee colored skin, black hair and a brush moustache. He wore a blue policeman's uniform. His name tag read Arnaldo Figueroa. “Call me Arnie,” he said.

“Okay,” Barent said. “Arnie.” Barent had requested help, somebody who knew the neighborhood that Jaime Ruiz, Herman Delgado and Carlos Rivera had grown up in, and Arnie had been temporarily re-assigned from a precinct uptown. Barent liked him immediately. He was quiet but he paid attention. Arnie used to be a member of a gang that called itself the Latin Sharks but his mother had placed him in a Catholic middle school when he was thirteen and the nuns, Arnie was fond of saying, had “beat it out of him.” He had been a policeman for two years.

“We're not getting anywhere,” Barent complained. “First Delgado, now Ramirez. Every lead we have in this case turns up dead.” Arnie nodded curtly. “I don't know how much I can do for you,” he said. “I mean, I know a lot of those guys but they know me too. Ruiz' men wouldn't give me the time of day.”

“I understand that,” Barent said, “the problem at the moment isn't Ruiz. It's Carlos Rivera.”

Moran, who was standing in the corner, glumly nodded. There were over fifty Carlos Riveras listed in the New York phone books. One of these was the former Fire Commissioner of New York. Seven were old men; two had left the city more than a year before; one was in jail; one was an Engineer who lived in Queens and worked for Computer Associates out on Long Island. None of them could possibly have been the Carlos Rivera who used to be friends with dead, twenty year old Herman Delgado. "Right," Moran said. "We can't find him."

"Carlos Rivera..." Arnie said. "I barely remember him: a tall guy, good looking."

"I don't know," Barent said. The Carlos Rivera they were looking for had been busted at the age of twelve for dealing crack. He had been placed on probation as a youthful offender and then vanished from the criminal justice system. He had no other record. "We've got a picture but he was just a kid." Just a kid who peddled cocaine. The picture had showed a skinny boy with a sullen smile and brooding dark eyes.

"You say he's gone?"

"Angela Delgado says he hasn't been around for at least six months. The neighbors confirm it."

"I still have some contacts," Arnie said. "I'll keep my eyes open but don't hold your breath."

Barent sighed. "Anything you can do would be appreciated."

"Sure." Arnie nodded, got up and left, leaving a leaden silence in his wake. After awhile, Moran shook his head and scratched the side of his cheek. "Maybe it's time to pursue the other angle: Sharon Lee."

"I suppose we're going to have to." Barent moodily drained his coffee, walked over to the pot and poured himself another cup. "God damn it, we let on that the investigation is still open, the media will start asking questions and suddenly it's a circus. Right now it's a closed case. Nobody cares. We have room to move."

"Move where?" Moran asked.

"Yeah." Barent shook his head. "That's the question, isn't it? Jesus, you would think we could find out something as simple as who some two bit hood was working for."

"Maybe he wasn't. Maybe he was on his own. Maybe he had nothing to do with it."

"And maybe he just happened to fall into a dumpster after accidentally shooting himself in the chest." Barent cracked the wrapper off a Partagas cigar and puffed it furiously alight. "I admit the evidence tying him to Sharon Lee is hazy. But there's no doubt that Delgado was murdered and we are paid to find murderers. If it turns out that we're looking for two different murderers, then that's just fine with me."

The phone on the desk rang. Barent scowled at it for three rings and then picked it up. "Hello?" he said. "Barent."

Barent listened and said nothing for a long time; finally he said, "You're sure?" Then he nodded, drew a deep, slow breath and smiled.

"Okay," he said. "I understand. Thanks." He put down the phone and looked at Moran. "Tony Korda," he said.

Tony Korda was half German, half African-American. Tony's father, a soldier during the War, had met his mother in occupied Berlin and brought her back to the States. Tony, the youngest of five children, was born eight years later. Tony's father stayed in the military and rose to the rank of Master Sergeant. They moved frequently, spending time at half a dozen bases in half a dozen cities, finally settling in at Fort Monmouth, New Jersey.

Alone during the day while her husband was at work, and lacking any skills that would make her employable, Tony's mother drank. She took good care of the children when she was sober, but she was rarely sober. When Tony was six, at four o'clock in the afternoon, drunk, Tony's mother fell asleep while smoking a cigarette in bed and died in the ensuing fire. Tony was rescued by a fireman who arrived just before the building collapsed but he suffered third degree burns over forty per cent of his body and burns inside his lungs that left him with pulmonary fibrosis and asthma. He spent the next ten years in and out of hospitals.

Tony Korda always seemed to be in trouble after the fire that wrecked his childhood and took his mother's life. He never touched alcohol, and the smoke from marijuana made his lungs wheeze like burning coals in his chest but he seemed to consider any other psychoactive substance that he could eat or snort or shoot up to be in a different, more acceptable category. At the age of sixteen, he stole a car, took it for a ride with a girl named Lucy and, high on cocaine, wrapped the car around a tree. Lucy died and Tony Korda, still a juvenile, spent six months in detention. He behaved himself for a while after that, graduated high school and went to City College for a year. Tony did well in college but was expelled during his Sophomore year after rape charges were filed against him by a female student.

Twenty years later, Tony Korda controlled a small criminal empire. He was an intermediate link in a chain that began in the jungles of Colombia and ended with a street dealer handing a packet of white powder to a poor kid in a back alley somewhere in New York. He took a bite out of local extortion, ran prostitution in a small segment of the South Bronx, had at least three prominent labor leaders in his pocket, owned illegal betting parlors and had his finger in every scam that took place along the Upper West Side of Manhattan.

"Oh, I would love to nail Tony Korda," Barent said. Just the name was enough to start his blood humming. "I would really, really love to nail Tony Korda."

"What would Tony Korda be doing with a small time guy like Herman Delgado?" Moran asked.

"Anything." Barent shrugged. "They all start out small time. Run numbers, deal drugs...Croft wasn't sure. He said Ruiz and his organization have been doing some business with Korda recently." He stopped for a moment. The cigar smoldered in an ashtray, slow coils of smoke rising up to the ceiling while Barent leaned back in his chair, thinking. There was plenty of precedent for one gang joining up with another. Sometimes they did it willingly, sometimes not. And sometimes no accommodation was possible and one or both sides got wiped out. New York had seen plenty of gang wars. The Blades were no longer just a bunch of kids. Kids have dreams but grownups have ambitions and a guy like Tony Korda could help turn ambitions into reality.

Barent stretched himself in his chair and scowled down at the cigar, which had gone out. He picked it up, lit it again and stuck it in his mouth. "The word Croft got was that Herman tended to be a bit headstrong but Korda was generally satisfied with the quality of his work. That's exactly the way he put it: 'satisfied with the quality of his work.'" Barent loosened his tie, snorted into his coffee cup. "Jesus, a fucking connoisseur of criminal aptitude."

"What business would Tony Korda have with Sharon Lee?" "Well, that's what we have to find out, isn't it?" Barent said. He knocked the ash off his cigar into an overflowing ashtray.

"Ruiz claimed he hadn't seen Herman in six months," Moran said. "You don't think he could have been lying?" He cracked a smile.

"It's hard to believe," Barent said sadly. "He seemed like such a nice guy, for a psychopath."

WELLESLEY HAD BEEN right, Barent thought. Even at night, the place hummed with suppressed activity, dozing now and then but never quite sleeping. A crowd of people milled about the Emergency Room waiting area, reading newspapers, staring into space, wandering up and down the hall. The one security guard posted by the corridor that led into the rest of the hospital had left his position twice in the half hour that Barent had watched him, once to grab a cup of coffee and once to go to the bathroom. Anybody could have waited for the opportunity and walked right in.

Barent himself carried a pass issued by Robinson, the Hospital Director. So far, nobody had asked to see it.

He shook his head, pasted a preoccupied look on his face, stuck his hands in his pockets and walked briskly down the corridor. As he passed the guard station, the officer looked him over, evidently decided that Barent did not look sufficiently suspicious and looked away.

Oh, brother, Barent thought. He walked by without saying a word. He turned right at the end of the corridor and soon came to the elevator bank in the lobby. Another guard was posted here but he barely even glanced at Barent.

Barent pushed the button, waited, and when an elevator arrived, went up to the Sixteenth Floor. From the lobby upstairs, two sets of double doors led into patient units on either side. Barent chose the one to his right, pushed open the doors and walked down the hallway. The corridor was dimly lit. Most of the rooms contained two beds and most of these held sleeping patients. At the end of the hallway was a nursing station. One nurse sat at the desk, writing in a patient chart. She looked up when he walked past. "Visiting hours are over."

Barent flashed her a grin and showed her his pass. "I'm just looking around," he said.

She looked at the pass doubtfully. "Well, please don't disturb the patients," she said. "They're trying to sleep."

"You bet."

He came to a stairwell, pushed the door open and walked up one flight to the call rooms. In the residents' wing, a few tired looking young men and women dressed in scrubs wandered up and down the hallway. They looked at Barent curiously but none of them bothered him. The attendings' wing was silent. A row of blank, closed doors stretched down the hallway. Barent tried a doorknob. It was locked. He tried another. It turned and he entered. The room was empty, the bed neatly made. Idly, he pulled open the top drawer in the dresser. A dirty coffee cup, two old Playboys and a copy of Road and Track sat there. He closed the drawer and walked out. About half of all the doors he tried were unlocked. The floor seemed deserted.

He turned and headed back to the elevators and punched the button for the Obstetrics Suite.

O.B. was brightly lit. Most babies, he seemed to recall, were born in the middle of the night. A team of doctors and nurses dressed in scrubs was pushing a bed down the hall toward what appeared to be a delivery room. A woman, obviously very pregnant, lay on the bed, groaning, while a man who might have been her husband held her hand and walked along beside, looking helpless.

"I've got to push!" the woman moaned. "I've got to!"

One of the doctors grimaced as he guided the bed around a turn. "Not yet," he said. "Just pant. We'll be there in a second." They vanished into the delivery room.

A nurse in a white uniform came bustling up to Barent. "Can I help you?" she asked.

He showed her the pass. "I'm just observing," he said. "Ignore me."

The nurse puffed up her cheeks and frowned. "Well, fine," she said, "but don't get in the way. And stay away from the patients."

Barent had no intention of bothering the patients. Like most men, he was more than a little squeamish regarding the mysteries of birth. "You bet," he said.

The Obstetrics Floor was arranged in a circle, with labor and delivery rooms around the outside. The central core of the circle contained chairs, desks, carrels where doctors and nurses could work on charts or dictate records, a large pot of coffee sitting on a table and a bowl full of donuts. A secretary sat at one of the desks, entering data into a computer. Occasionally, a laser printer hummed and spat out sheets of paper. Barent sat down on one of the chairs and watched. Over the next half hour, he saw women being pushed in and out on beds and stretchers, doctors and nurses bustling about, prospective fathers pacing back and forth, wringing their hands. It all looked quite routine. "Aren't you the policeman?" a voice said.

He looked up. It was the nurse who had been crying the morning that Sharon Lee was killed, the one with the round, cheerful face, Alice something...McMahon? Yeah, that was right. McMahon. "Detective Barent," he said.

"Of course." She hesitated. "If you don't mind my asking, what are you doing here?"

"We'll be going to trial soon. The alleged killer of Dr. Lee went from the Psych Unit up to the Seventeenth Floor without being seen. I wanted to take another look at the layout of the elevators and stairs. The defense will try to claim that it couldn't have happened." As a story, it wasn't much, but it would do.

"Alleged killer?" she said doubtfully.

"It's always the 'alleged killer' until the jury finds them guilty, even if you catch them standing over the body with a smoking gun in their hand."

"If you say so."

"Are things always this busy at night?" he asked.

She grinned. "Usually."

Barent was curious. His real reason for being here was to see who came and went and what the staff up here did about it. Sharon Lee had performed a Caesarian section, gone upstairs and been murdered. Who would have known when the case was finished, or where she would have gone afterwards? Apparently, the immediate world.

"Alice?" A pretty woman with dark hair came up to them. Barent remembered her clearly: Peggy Ryan. "The lady in Room Two is nine centimeters. She'll be pushing soon." Peggy Ryan frowned at Barent.

"Hello, Ms. Ryan," he said.

"Hi," she said uncertainly. "Detective Barent?" Barent nodded.

"I've got to get going," Alice McMahon said, and she hurried off. "Can I help you with anything?" Peggy Ryan asked.

"You work here long, Ms. Ryan?" "About four years."

"You like it?"

"I love it," she said simply.

From one of the delivery rooms, a long, agonized shriek rang out. Peggy Ryan ignored it. So did everyone else. Barent shuddered. Peggy Ryan suppressed a chuckle and then smiled. "You get used to it," she said.

"Better you than me," Barent said.

Peggy Ryan smiled even wider. "It's in my blood. My father was a doctor here. I was planning on becoming a nurse ever since I was a little girl."

"Not a doctor?"

"I thought about it, but nurses are closer to the patients. Doctors rarely have time to get to know their patients and that bothered me. A nurse is all I ever wanted to be."

Barent could understand that. His own father had been a cop. Being a cop was all he had ever wanted to be. He inwardly shrugged. "Well," he said, and hauled himself to his feet. "I'm not learning anything here and I've disturbed you all long enough. Have a good night."

She nodded. "Thank you," she said. Another shriek came from one of the rooms. Barent winced. Peggy Ryan smiled again and hurried away.

Kurtz spent most of the next three days with Lenore Brinkman. They swam in the pool together, snorkeled off the beach and went jet skiing across the placid blue water of the bay. They hired a boat and went out to where the reef dropped off into deep water, and they pulled in kingfish and snook and near the end of the afternoon, Kurtz hooked a marlin. He fought the great fish for an hour while it sounded, the line humming off his reel, then he frantically took in slack when the fish charged for the surface and jumped, its body flashing blue in the sunlight, water spraying in all directions like foam. Then, abruptly, he lost it. The line went dead and he reeled slowly in, the hook at the end empty, a deep aching fatigue settling slowly into his arms and shoulders.

The mate shrugged. The Captain looked at him, an unlit pipe hanging from the corner of his mouth, and then squinted out again at the water, already searching for new prey.

"Oh, Richard," Lenore said, and put her hand on his arm. "I'm sorry."

He smiled wanly. "The one that gets away is supposed to be the biggest." He shook his head and sighed.

Always he thought about Kathy. Kathy sitting with her legs curled under her on the sofa, reading while flames crackled in the fireplace. Kathy looking at him across a table, the light from a candle throwing shadows into the hollow between her breasts. Kathy with her hair spread out over her pillow like a billowing, dark cloud, reaching up for him in the night.

The time he spent with Lenore seemed unreal, like time spent somehow in a dream, in a time outside of time. They had no work, no cares, nothing to do but swim and play and eat and dance and listen to music and make love. Except that they didn't make love. Not yet—but, he thought, soon. Kurtz didn't push it. He didn't want to. The thought of Kathy kept intruding and Lenore—he knew it though they never spoke of it—had memories of her own to contend with.

The three days that he spent with Lenore were perfect. He loved to look at her, the way her eyes flashed green, the way her teeth sparkled, the way her golden hair floated around her head. She was beautiful. She was perfectly conscious of the fact and perfectly, completely, un-self-conscious.

Lenore's mother kept out of their way, her smiling, satisfied face studying their progress from a distance, charting off the milestones. They both ignored her.

On the afternoon of the third day, they walked together along the beach, searching for seashells. The sun was large on the horizon. The water lapped at their bare feet in little waves, which made soft, sucking sounds as they died and drifted back toward the sea.

"Here's one," Lenore said, she stooped and picked up a shining, bright green shell with brown dots, half buried in the sand. She brushed off the clinging grains of sand and handed it to Kurtz.

"It looks like a cowrie," he said.

He put it in the canvas bag he carried at his side. A wave ran over their feet, and he felt himself sink in just a little as the water washed out the sand from under him.

Lenore wrinkled her nose. "That tickles."

She pulled one foot out of the sand and stumbled and Kurtz quickly took her arm to steady her. She gave him a strange look, then slowly, she pulled her arm back and they began to walk, looking for shells. After a few hundred yards, she looked up at him and gave him a crooked smile and took his arm again and leaned against him. Kurtz said nothing. He looked down at the top of her golden head and stopped. Slowly, he turned toward her and put his arms around her back, not exerting any pressure at all, letting her know she could step away if she wanted to. She fixed her eyes on the sand, her head buried against his neck. Slowly, hesitantly, her arms came up and across his shoulders. Then she raised her head, her eyes closed, and he kissed her.

The kiss lasted a long time, and when they broke it she sighed and leaned against him.

"Let's look for shells," she said.

Kurtz held her tighter for an instant before letting her go. "Alright," he said.

Three hours later, they met for dinner at Le Palais, a French restaurant on the top floor of the resort. It was night. Stars shone in through the windows and a full moon glowed down on the rippling water. Kurtz wore a dark blue suit with a tie and Lenore had on a green, silk dress. The restaurant was half full. The lights were kept low and the tables far apart. Candles flickered, and waiters and wine stewards dressed in tuxedos discreetly patrolled the floor.

"Madame, Monsieur, my name is Ramon. I will be your Captain for the evening."

Ramon was tall, slim, young, with curly black hair. He looked like a movie star. He handed them both menus, flashed them a white smile, and vanished.

"Mine doesn't have prices," Lenore whispered. "I hate it when they do that."

"Don't worry," Kurtz said. "Everything is expensive."

She smiled, and he felt his heart go thump. Christ, he thought, I feel like an adolescent idiot.

"Monsiuer, Madame, something to drink?" The wine steward was short, slim and balding, with a pencil thin moustache on his upper lip. "Some wine, perhaps?" He offered Kurtz a wine list inside a red leather folder, then walked off while Kurtz studied it.

Kurtz ordered Dom Perignon, which the wine steward opened with a flourish and a pop of the cork.

"To good times," Kurtz said. Lenore smiled at him very slightly and they both drank. The waiter wheeled a cart over, removed the rounded lid from a tray and served the first course: lobster cocktail, with a sauce made from capers and mustard.

"This is wonderful," Lenore said.

Kurtz smiled in the flickering light and poured another glass full of champagne. "Are you trying to get me drunk?" she asked.

"Would you like me to get you drunk?"

She gave him a grin that vanished as soon as it appeared. "You don't have to get me drunk."

He nodded, and drew in his breath, the back of his neck prickling. She had a faint scattering of freckles across the bridge of her nose. Her green eyes looked black in the dim light. Her golden hair glowed. He stared at her and it seemed suddenly as if she moved in slow motion, as if the two of them existed in their own private world in their own private Universe.

She moved her fork. She raised her glass. She smiled. Kurtz blinked and the moment vanished.

Kurtz hardly remembered what he ate after that. He could look at nothing but Lenore's face, wondering. They had an orange soufflé for dessert, with coffee. The waiter spooned a creamy sauce on top and they ate it quickly, before it collapsed.

By the Captain's stand at the entrance to the restaurant, a man stood talking. Kurtz noticed him from the corner of his eye but paid him no attention. The man showed something to Ramon, who looked at it, looked back toward Kurtz, and nodded. The man stared at their table. He straightened up, squared his shoulders, and walked slowly toward them. He was tall, as tall as Kurtz, with curling, light brown hair and a straight nose. Lenore had her back to him. He stopped, looked down at them, seemed about to say something, then shook his head. He walked past the table and turned, facing Lenore.

She looked up and blinked. For a moment, she said nothing, then her face turned abruptly white and she raised a hand to her cheek. "What is this?" she said. "A joke?"

The man grinned sheepishly. His face was as white as Lenore's. His eyes flicked to Kurtz, then back to Lenore. "No, it's not a joke. Can I sit down?"

Kurtz looked up. The tall young man refused to meet his eyes. He stared at Lenore with parted lips and an almost desperate look on his face.

"What's going on?" Kurtz asked her.

"This," Lenore said disdainfully, "is Harrison Thomas, Office Manager of First Amsterdam Savings and Loan, whose ancestors landed on the Mayflower and whose family never, ever forgets it, or lets anyone else forget it either." She gave a little sniff. "My former fiancé."

"Oh," Kurtz said. "Oh." He grinned, then coughed, and suddenly he felt laughter beginning to bubble up. He couldn't help it.

"What," Lenore demanded, "is so funny?"

"Nothing." Kurtz looked back up at Harrison Thomas. "Sure," he said. "Sit down."

Lenore seemed about to say something, then stopped. Harrison Thomas flashed Kurtz a quick, grateful grin, then sat.

Thomas glanced warily at Kurtz once or twice, but aside from that his eyes stayed glued to Lenore's face. They sat for almost a minute. More than once, Harrison Thomas opened his mouth, but nothing came out. Lenore refused to look at him. He was a good-looking guy, Kurtz thought, a good-looking guy who knows he's fucked up. Again, Kurtz almost laughed—but this time he managed to stifle it. Placidly, he stirred cream and sugar into his coffee. He sipped it slowly, then sighed and shook his head.

Lenore's eyes snapped toward his face. "What's bothering you?"

"Nothing."

She frowned. Kurtz turned to Thomas. "Look, you wanted to sit down. Why don't you go ahead and say what you have to say?"

Thomas swallowed. "Alright." He turned to Lenore. "I was wrong," he said. "I'm sorry. I want you back. I love you."

Kurtz smiled at him, raised his glass of champagne and took a sip. Bravo, he thought. Short and sweet.

"You love me." Lenore said it clinically, in a level, detached voice. "Yes," Harrison Thomas said.

"But your father disapproves. You're supposed to marry a rich WASP bitch. Someone just like yourself."

"I don't want a rich WASP bitch. I want you."

"Finally figured that out, did you?"

"Yes."

"But what are you going to say to Daddy?"

“I already said it. He didn’t like it.”

For the first time, Lenore looked at him with interest. “No?”

Thomas shook his head. “No.”

“Good,” Lenore said.

Thomas looked at Kurtz longingly, silently begging him to leave. Kurtz cheerfully grinned back at him and sipped his champagne. Lenore smiled at Kurtz, then turned back to Harrison. “Go on,” she said.

He glanced desperately at Kurtz, who blinked at him innocently. “Alright,” Harrison said. “I love you. I want to marry you. I can’t live without you.”

“That’s sweet,” Lenore said. “Richard, isn’t that sweet?”

“Sweet,” Kurtz agreed. “Very sweet.”

“I’ll think about it,” Lenore said. She rose to her feet and turned her head so that Kurtz could see her face but Thomas could not, and silently mouthed the words, Thank you. “I’m going to leave now,” she said. “I can’t take any more of this.” She walked off, not looking back.

So much for the perfect evening, Kurtz thought. He raised his glass to Harrison Thomas and said, “Champagne?”

Thomas looked sick. His face was white; his hands trembled. “No,” he said. “Thank you.” Shakily, he rose to his feet. “I’m sorry. Really. I know how this must have looked to you, but there was nothing else that I could do. I meant everything I said. I was a fool.”

“I understand,” Kurtz said.

“Thanks.” Thomas spread his hands to the side and helplessly let them fall, then turned and walked out, his feet dragging.

Kurtz looked at him go and breathed a long sigh. The table looked awfully empty. He turned to the wine steward and motioned him over. “I thought I noticed Hennessy X.O. on the menu.”

“Of course, Monsieur.”

“Good,” Kurtz said. “I’ll take a double.” He smiled wanly. “And please ask Ramon to bring me my check.”

A LIGHT KNOCK ON THE door woke him up. The sun shone in through the window shades, making slanting lines of light across the bed. Blearily, Kurtz looked at the clock. Eight A.M. “Just a minute,” he called out. He put on a robe and opened the door. Lenore stood there.

“Can I come in?” she asked.

He grinned slightly. “Sure.”

She sat in a chair by the table next to the window and stared down at the beach, already filling with sun worshippers. From this distance, they looked as tiny and silent as ants.

“Would you like some breakfast?” he asked. “I can call room service.”

“No, thanks.” She shook her head. “I can’t stay long.”

“Ah...”

She smiled at him briefly. “Yeah,” she said. “I know.” Her voice held genuine regret.

“He seemed,” Kurtz said delicately, “to be an okay guy.”

“He is an okay guy.” She had on jeans and a white tee shirt with a Big Apple logo on it. Her hair was held back with a pink plastic hairband and she wore no makeup. But her cheeks glowed. “Look,” she said. “I’m really, really sorry. I felt that I owed you an explanation.”

“What’s to explain? The situation is obvious.”

She shrugged. “I guess it is, but I still wanted you to know: I liked you. I liked you a lot. If Harrison hadn’t come back...”

Kurtz folded his hands together and nodded. Down below, a surfer had just caught a wave. He rode it toward shore and stepped off his board just as it slid up the beach.

“I loved Harrison. I guess I still do. And I’m proud of him, too. It couldn’t have been easy telling his father to go to hell.” Lenore grinned. “I’m going to take a lot of pleasure out of tweaking the old bastard’s nose.”

“It’s okay.” Kurtz shrugged. He added, “I liked you, too.”

Lenore looked at him, nibbled the inside of her cheek thoughtfully. “I’m glad you understand. I would never have done anything to deliberately hurt you.” She grinned. “What I regret more than anything else is the way last night turned out. I was...looking forward to it.” She stared him in the eye and looked as if she were thinking it over. “I’m still tempted but I know I better not. I’m not sure how I would feel afterward.”

Kurtz gave her a wan smile. “That’s the nicest non-offer I ever received.

“What does your mother say?”

Lenore laughed softly. “She’s not saying. She hasn’t figured it out yet. She’s not certain if a rich executive is as good as a rich doctor, but since you’re both hunks and neither of you are Jewish, she’s withholding judgment.”

“Smart woman, your mother.”

“Yeah.” Lenore rose to her feet, leaned over and kissed him on the cheek, then shook her head with what seemed to be real regret. “I better not see you again,” she said. “It wouldn’t be smart.”

Kurtz nodded. “Good luck,” he said. He meant it.

“Thanks.”

He let her out and thought for a moment about facing the day. Then he smiled to himself and yawned and climbed back into bed. Later, he thought. I’ll think about it later. Right now, I’m too tired.

The rest of his vacation was restful and uneventful. He tried to enjoy himself. He swam and ate and worked on his tan, but something seemed to have gone out of it. He saw Lenore occasionally, across the pool or in the dining room. She would smile at him but that was all and Kurtz respected her wishes. He liked the way that Harrison Thomas hovered over her. Lenore was quite a girl, he thought with a pang. Quite a girl.

Two days later, he was on a plane back to New York, back to his patients and the mystery of Sharon Lee, and most of all, back to Kathy.

His plane got into Kennedy at eight P.M. on Saturday night. It was raining, a cold wet drizzle mixed with snow. He looked out at the rain through the window as they taxied up to the terminal and he shuddered. He hated New York winters, and the already fading memory of Cancun, of the endless sun and the glistening blue sea made the dreary weather even more repellent.

He caught a taxi cab and sat silently in the back, feeling the dark mood of the city settle into his soul as they drove into Manhattan.

“You got a nice tan,” the cabby said to him once. “Been on vacation?”

“Mexico,” Kurtz said.

“Yeah?” The cabby’s ears seemed to perk up. “I was in Mexico once. Tijuana. Burritos and chili peppers. I got the runs. I thought the place was a hole.”

Kurtz shrugged and said nothing. The cabby glanced back at him through the rearview mirror, saw Kurtz frowning at the rain, and grinned. After that they drove in silence.

His mood lifted a bit as he put his key in the lock and opened the door to his apartment. He put his suitcases down by the door, turned on the lights and hung his coat in the closet, then went into the kitchen. He made himself a Bloody Mary and sipped it while he inspected his answering machine. Four messages. The first two were advertisements, then one from Kathy confirming a date for the next afternoon. The last message was from Barent: “Dr. Kurtz, there have been some developments in the case that I would like to discuss with you. Please give me a call when you get in. Saturday until ten P.M. would be okay. Otherwise, please make it at the station during the week.” The message ended with Barent’s home phone number.

Okay, Kurtz thought, you asked for it. He dialed Barent’s number and after a couple of rings, a woman’s voice answered. “Is Detective Barent in?” he asked. “This is Dr. Kurtz.”

The woman’s voice seemed to hesitate. “We’re kind of busy right now,” she said. “Is it important?”

“I don’t know. He asked me to call him.”

“Just a second, then.” He heard her yell out, “Lew, it’s a Dr. Kurtz.”

Barent’s voice came on. “Good to hear from you. You have a nice vacation?”

“Passable,” Kurtz answered.

“Hold on a second.” Barent said something to somebody away from the phone, then came back. “Look, I know I said to call but things have gotten awful hectic at home.” He added in a voice that sounded less than thrilled, “It’s my daughter. She’s just told us she’s getting married. Could we talk during the week? Maybe Monday?”

Kurtz had patients scheduled for Monday afternoon but the morning was free. “Nine A.M.?”

“Perfect.”

“I’ll meet you at the station. Congratulations about your daughter.”

Barent grunted. “Thanks,” he said grudgingly. “I’ll see you then.”

They met for lunch at Le Bibliotheque, a little place on the Upper West Side. It was supposedly French, but the menu listed clam chowder and assorted varieties of cheeseburger as well as croissants and bouillabaisse, and none of the waiters spoke with an accent. Each wall held a narrow bookcase rising to the ceiling, stacked with dusty volumes by Ernest Gann and Thomas Costain and other authors popular in the Fifties and Sixties. The patrons were encouraged to browse while they waited for their food but few chose to do so. The choice of reading material was not encouraging.

Kathy, however, loved books of all sorts, even forty-year-old best sellers by authors who had long since died and faded into obscurity. "Look at this one." She held a fat volume out to Kurtz, who took it reluctantly and weighed it in his palm. "Lord Vanity," Kathy said, "by Samuel Shellabarger. I read this when I was a kid."

"I've heard of him," Kurtz said.

"He was big: Prince of Foxes, Captain from Castile."

"Before my time."

"I'm going to buy it if they'll let me." Kathy put the book on the table and placed her elbow on top of it, as if the book might get up and walk away if she didn't stake her claim to it.

"How's the thesis going?" Kurtz asked.

"Pretty good. I've established some interesting parallels between The Wasteland and Mordor, Sauron's ruined domain. My preceptor is pleased. So..." She looked at him brightly and smiled. "You have a nice time?"

"Not bad," he said.

"You meet anybody?"

He gave her a wary look. "Anybody?"

"Hmmm." She squinted at him out of one eye. "You know, vacations are different from real life. They're supposed to be. That's what getting away from it all is all about. No cares, no worries. Everybody has that exotic glow. You fall in love; you fall out of love. It's easy." She grinned. "I spent two weeks on Ibiza once. You know Ibiza?"

"An Island in the Mediterranean?"

She nodded. "A vacation paradise. Anything goes. I met a guy named Russell who played the guitar and wrote poetry. He was from New York. We had a great time. I even saw him a couple of times once we got home but he seemed different." Kathy examined a roll, broke it in half and nibbled on the crust. "Actually, he seemed like a jerk. Hard to believe it was the same person."

"I did meet somebody," Kurtz said.

She frowned at the roll, picked up her knife and buttered half of it. "Oh?"

"She had a boyfriend. It was nothing serious."

"I'm not sure I want to hear this," Kathy said.

Kurtz smiled. "Then why did you ask?"

"Idle curiosity," she said. "But maybe I should have kept my mouth shut."

Except for the fact that Kathy was a brunette and Lenore a blonde, they looked a lot alike. Kathy's hair was straight and black and hung halfway down her back. She wore a green blouse with a flowered pattern, slacks and comfortable shoes that were good for walking. A modern woman, Kathy. Smart, self-assured, no bullshit. "I missed you," Kurtz said.

"Good."

Kurtz smiled. "Barent left a message on my machine. He wants me to call him in the morning."

Kathy's fork stopped halfway to her mouth. She looked at him over a piece of lettuce and frowned. "Why?"

"I'm not sure. He thinks I can help."

"How? You're not a policeman."

“No, but I know the environment in which the victim lived and worked.”

Kathy thought about that for a moment, then she said, “I imagine a case like this must become an obsession for a policeman. Good against bad. Innocence versus evil. There must be a lot of satisfaction in finding somebody who would commit murder. It must be terribly frustrating when you can’t.”

The waiter set a bacon blue cheese burger in front of Kurtz. He picked it up and took a big bite. “I can relate,” he said. “I can definitely relate.”

“See that you don’t get hurt.”

Good advice, Kurtz thought. He speared a French fry and silently nodded.

BARENT'S OFFICE WAS coming to seem quite familiar. Kurtz sat in the chair across the desk, swirled his cup of coffee and listened silently while the detective talked.

"Tony Korda..." Kurtz said when Barent finished. He felt cold suddenly and rubbed a hand across the back of his neck. "I've heard of Tony Korda. I've seen his name in the papers."

The office seemed strangely quiet in the morning. Only a few patrolmen moved about in the squad room outside Barent's office and the haze of smoke was decidedly less than it had been the last time Kurtz sat in this chair. "So you have no more leads."

"Not exactly true. We have files on more than two hundred people who work, or used to work, for Tony Korda."

"But nothing to tie any of them to either Sharon Lee or Herman Delgado."

Barent barely hesitated, then said, "That's correct."

"Do you have any people in Korda's organization?"

Barent smiled faintly. "What are you, the Chief of Police? Even if we did, I wouldn't admit it to you." Barent shook his head in wonder. "Jesus."

Kurtz felt himself blushing. "Sorry," he said. "I guess you aren't interested in my advice. So what do you want from me?"

"Information." Barent nodded at Moran, who stood leaning against the door. "Harry thinks that it's time we went back to Sharon Lee. He's right. For the moment, Herman Delgado has proven to be a dead end."

"What do you want to know?"

"I want you to tell me who might have wanted Sharon Lee dead." Kurtz blinked. "I already told you I don't know that. How would I?"

"Hopefully, you know more than you think." Barent leaned back in his chair, stretched until his back audibly cracked, and cradled his hands behind his head. "There are only two types of violent crime," he said, "which of course includes murder; there are crimes of passion and crimes of pre-meditation. And there are only two reasons for crimes of pre-meditation: gain and revenge. Seen in this light, most murders are solved fairly easily. Most murders are crimes of passion, committed by a family member or another close associate of the victim. Crimes of pre-meditation are harder because the murderer will almost always plan on getting away with it and will do everything he can to cover his tracks. It's quite likely that the majority of such murders are never discovered to be murders at all. Some old guy dies of a heart attack or some other 'natural cause'"—Barent shrugged—"the body is cremated. Nobody's going to find out that the victim was poisoned, or maybe somebody held a pillow over his mouth. Nobody's even going to look."

"That's disgusting," Kurtz said. Barent shrugged again.

"It seems too simplistic. There are other reasons for murder. There are insane reasons."

"I would classify crimes motivated by reasons of insanity to be crimes of passion."

"There are also disinterested reasons—terrorism, for instance."

Barent frowned. Since the World Trade Center, terrorism was a subject that no New Yorker took lightly. Then he grudgingly smiled and glanced at Moran. "Smart. Didn't I tell you he was smart? A mind like a scalpel."

Moran dolefully nodded.

“It’s true that in crimes of terror the victim may be merely incidental, in that the victim is killed not because of who he is, but because of what he represents, and as often as not any victim at all would do equally well for the purpose—but there is no doubt that crimes of terror are pre-meditated and cold blooded. And the motive is clearly and always gain, political if not personal.”

“I suppose so,” Kurtz said.

“Good.” Barent nodded. “So who had reason to want Sharon Lee dead?”

“I still don’t know.”

“That’s because you’re not letting your imagination work. Alright, look at it this way—she had a sister, right?”

“Yes,” Kurtz said.

“If Sharon Lee is dead, then the sister will inherit a larger share of her mother’s estate.”

Kurtz’ brow wrinkled. “Are you seriously suggesting...?”

Barent held up a hand. “I’m not suggesting anything. I’m merely pointing out that from a monetary point of view, her sister would most likely benefit from Sharon Lee’s death.”

Kurtz drew a deep breath and allowed a slow smile to spread across his face. “Okay,” he said. “I get it. It’s a game: who can come up with the largest number of suspects.”

“Exactly.”

“Okay...you mentioned her sister. Her sister’s name is Sheila. Sheila might well have been jealous of Sharon. Sharon was better looking and got top grades and became a doctor. Sheila married a Psychology Professor at Northwestern and had two kids. She’s a housewife.”

Barent turned to Moran. “Put another check by the sister.” Moran grunted.

“And how about her mother?” Kurtz said. “Sharon’s father left Sharon a lot of money. Now that she’s dead, some of that money must go back to her mother.”

“Good.” Barent nodded approvingly. “Add the mother to the list.”

“Then there are the other obstetricians. Sharon was in solo practice and she was a woman. An awful lot of women want to go to a woman gynecologist; they feel more comfortable. The men in the department might have felt threatened.”

Barent looked thoughtful. “For that matter, every O.B.-G.Y.N. in the metropolitan area could have had reason to want her dead.”

“True,” Kurtz said, and shook his head. “I don’t feel like we’re exactly narrowing things down here.”

“We can narrow them down later. For now, let’s get every possible suspect on the list.”

“Every possible suspect...” Kurtz ran his hand through his hair in disgust. “I assume she was involved with somebody. Sharon always was. So there might have been a boyfriend who was jealous. Or an aspiring boyfriend who might have been jealous. Or a boyfriend’s girlfriend who might have been jealous.”

“We’ll check that out,” Barent said. “Who would know?”

“Her sister might. Despite what I said about her, they were close. They talked on the phone at least once a week.”

“Her sister’s in Chicago?”

“She lives in Chicago. She’s probably here, helping her mother. Sharon’s mother is not the most competent human being.”

“Anyone else?”

“She had some friends from college; I forget the names...Evelyn Something.” He frowned into his coffee-cup. “I think it was Hobbs, Evelyn Hobbs. And Joyce Davenport.”

“Good. Anyone else?”

“Jennifer Parks, her best friend from Medical School. I know Jennifer. She’s a family practitioner.”

“Did she have any business dealings? Any investments?”

“She had a broker at one of the big firms—I think it was Merrill Lynch. From what I remember, he was the staid, conservative sort, nothing too risky. He was an older man. Sharon inherited him, as it were, from her father.”

“Did she get along with her patients?”

“She wasn’t the warmest human being on Earth. I never did understand why she went into obstetrics. But she was dedicated to her work. She was a good doctor.”

“That doesn’t really answer my question.”

Kurtz hesitated. “She tended to be impatient, and she didn’t have the greatest bedside manner. You probably know that obstetricians get sued a lot. There are always things you can’t control, complications that simply couldn’t be avoided. Patients are generally not willing to accept that, and obstetricians don’t like to admit it. Women come into the hospital to have a baby. Things are supposed to go right.” Kurtz shrugged. “Studies have proven that you can fuck up every which way from Sunday and your patients won’t sue you if they like you.”

“What sort of complications are you talking about?”

Kurtz smiled wryly. “All sorts of things. When I was a third year student, I had a patient once with a two-headed baby.”

Barent stared at him.

“It was really identical twins that didn’t quite separate. There was one body with two legs, two heads, two arms and a third vestigial arm coming up out of the shoulder between the heads. The poor thing was a mess. It died after a few hours.”

Barent grimaced at Kurtz’ blandly smiling face. “Does stuff like that happen often?”

“Not often, but it happens.”

Barent shuddered. “Do you know of any suits against Sharon Lee?”

“I think she had a few. I only know about one. It was absurd. A perfectly normal delivery but the kid came out floppy. A muscle biopsy showed viral inclusion bodies. The kid had a congenital viral myopathy, an infection picked up in utero from the mother. It was nobody’s fault but the parents weren’t willing to accept that. They sued.”

“What happened to the baby?”

“I don’t know. Sharon and I broke up around that time.”

“Who carried her malpractice insurance?”

“Probably M.L.M.I.C. They’re the largest carrier in the State.”

Barent made a notation in his notebook. “We’ll look into it. Did she get along with her colleagues?”

“Sure.” Kurtz sipped his coffee, wrinkled his nose as he realized it had gone cold and went over to the pot in the corner to fix himself a fresh cup. “One thing you have to realize: doctors all have tremendous egos. They’re all smart and hard working and successful. Every one of them thinks he’s God’s gift and most of them think all the other doctors are idiots, except, of course, for their own little group of colleagues and friends, who are idiots only part of the time.

“Sharon was no worse than most.” Kurtz shrugged again. “She got along.”

“She had no enemies that you know of?”

Kurtz shook his head. “No.”

“Did anyone in particular—that you know of—dislike her?”

“Beats me.”

Barent surveyed his notebook, frowning, and tapped the page with the tip of his pen. “You’ve given us a few leads. We’ll work on them.” He looked up suddenly and fixed Kurtz with a sharp glance. “Are you willing to do a little more to help us out?”

Here it comes, thought Kurtz. The catch. “Like what?”

“Doctors are touchy about their patients, confidentiality and all that. But confidentiality doesn’t extend to other doctors. Do you think you could get us some information about Sharon Lee’s patients?”

“What information?”

“Just their names.” Barent thought about it, added, “Addresses and phone numbers if you can.”

“You could subpoena them.”

“We could.” Barent nodded. “If we have to, we will. But that would certainly tip people off, now wouldn’t it?”

“You have some hope of keeping this investigation a secret?”

“You never know. Right now, the murderer thinks he’s gotten away with it. He might be more careful if he knew we were still looking. We’re going to try to keep the lid on as long as possible.”

“How long is possible? Sooner or later you’re going to have to indict Bill Mose or admit that you don’t have a case.”

“Mr. Mose is recovering from his recent surgery. He won’t be fit to appear in court for,”—Barent looked up at Kurtz with a bright smile on his face—“how long would you say? A month?”

Kurtz frowned at the haze of smoke outside the office and thought about it. “A month sounds about right.” Then he shook his head. “There’s no way that I can get any information about Sharon’s patients. The hospital computer system doesn’t code to doctors’ names, only patients’ names. If I have a patient’s name, I can find out the doctor, but it doesn’t work the other way around.”

Barent shrugged his shoulders and frowned into his coffee. “Oh, well.”

“Was there anything else?”

“Yeah.” Barent opened his desk and pulled out a sheaf of paper. It appeared to be a long list of words that Kurtz could not make out. “The hospital computer: what type is it?” Barent asked.

“You mean what brand? I think they’re Dells.”

“VAX? UNIX? Java? Microsoft NT?”

“Microsoft something. I’m not sure about the rest.”

“Are there terminals at all the working areas? The nursing stations? The secretaries’ desks?”

“Absolutely.”

“And how are appointments made? The old fashioned way, or by computer?”

Kurtz warily eyed the sheaf of paper in Barent’s fist. “When a patient calls to make an appointment, the secretary or clerk who takes the call is supposed to punch the name and time into the system.”

Barent looked happy. “Perfect. And how about afterward? You said that there’s a central computerized listing of patients. Are all the patients’ visits listed as well?”

“Of course.”

Barent extended the sheaf of papers to Kurtz, who eyed it with suspicion and made no move to take it. Barent carefully placed it down on the desk in front of Kurtz. “That’s a list of names,” Barent said. “Every individual who was ever known to be associated with Tony Korda or Jaime Ruiz. I would like you to see if any of them are listed in your hospital’s computer.”

“That’s all?”

“Names, dates and times.”

“Diagnoses?”

“If you think it’s relevant.”

“If I think it’s relevant,” Kurtz said with disgust. His eyes flickered from the sheaf of paper up to Barent’s face and back down to the paper. “I know I’m going to regret this.” He picked up the paper and settled it in his lap.

“Thank you,” Barent said simply.

“You know,” said Kurtz, “there’s one suspect neither of us has mentioned.”

“Who’s that?”

“The one we don’t know about—and haven’t thought of.”

Barent nodded his head. “True.” He pointed to the sheaf of paper sitting in Kurtz’ lap. “But maybe his name is on that list. Let’s hope.”

BARENT HAD NOT LIED to Kurtz, not exactly, but he had deliberately allowed him to labor under a misconception. The problem right now was not that they had no case, but rather that the case they had was too good.

“Baloney.” Ted Weiss was the Assistant D.A. He was average height, thin, with straw colored hair and narrow blue eyes. “Mose has no alibi and Sharon Lee had his blood under her fingernails. You can’t tell me that doesn’t make a case.”

Barent put a pained look on his face. “Come on, Ted, give me a break. What about the burglary? What about Herman Delgado?”

“What about them? So her apartment was robbed and Delgado most likely did it. Apartments get robbed all the time. You have nothing to tie Delgado to the murder. Sure, he turned up with a hole in his chest, but so what? People like Herman Delgado get murdered all the time. You have no evidence to point to Korda or anyone else. You’ve got nothing.” Weiss stabbed his finger at the air to add emphasis. “Nothing except a lunatic whose blood is under the victim’s fingernails.”

Barent opened his mouth to protest but Weiss held up a hand. “You’re going to mention the ring. Don’t. A ring, for Christ’s sake! A nut case swallows a gold ring and that’s supposed to be evidence? It could have come from anywhere. Anywhere at all!”

Barent sighed and slumped down in his chair. Hard headed, by the book: that was Ted Weiss. “I know it’s flimsy,” Barent said. “I know it’s circumstantial. But it makes sense. This thing with Mose...” He waved his arms in the air helplessly. “It’s too easy. It’s too pat.”

“What is this?” Weiss asked. “Policeman’s instinct?”

“Yeah, you could say that.”

“Try taking ‘instinct’ to the jury.”

“The investigation,” said Barent, “isn’t over. I hope to be able to confirm my suspicions.”

“Okay.” Weiss nodded. “I understand that. But you have to understand that I’m under a lot of pressure with this case. A doctor...a young, pretty, female doctor. Right now it’s a scandal. The family is going to sue the hospital. They’ll get a nice settlement and that’ll be that. Everyone is embarrassed but the case is closed. It’s a one in a million occurrence and everybody sleeps well at night. If we let on that we don’t know who did it, the public will be upset, and when the public is upset, the mayor gets upset. When the mayor gets upset, my boss gets upset. Guess who gets upset then?”

Barent was already upset but he didn’t say it. “Give me another few weeks.”

Dolefully, Weiss shook his head. “I’ll give you two weeks. You come up with something better than you’ve got in two weeks or I’m going to indict Mose. I’ve got no choice.”

“Two weeks...” Barent slowly nodded, his mind already considering the possibilities. “Thanks,” he said grudgingly.

“Don’t mention it,” Weiss said. “And by the way, just so we understand each other, you should realize that I’m doing this as a favor because I think you’re going to come up with nothing. I think Mose did it. But I’m giving you the time because I want you to be satisfied. I hope you appreciate that.”

“They used to pay people to draw blood from patients. Usually they were med students trying to earn some extra money; sometimes it was a nurse or a nurse’s aide or a lab tech.” Nolan shrugged. “Anybody with hospital experience could apply for the job; it didn’t pay very much.

“There was this one guy—he was a pharmacy student—the guy was a whiz with a needle. I mean, he could get blood from a stone. He was always the first one finished with his rounds. Five hundred pounder with no veins? No problem. Just call Joe. But after a while people began to get a little curious. How could this character be so much better than anybody else? How did he do it? Joe would never tell. You’d ask him, he’d just smile and say, ‘Trade secret, man, trade secret.’ So one day one of the other phlebotomists decided to find out. He waited until Joe was in with a patient who was known to be a particularly difficult stick and he opened the door suddenly and looked in. There was the patient, lying back on the bed and there was Joe with an extra long needle stuck in her chest.” Nolan looked at the nurse. “Scissors,” he said.

The nurse gave him the scissors. “In her chest?” Liebert said.

Nolan tied off a stitch, then dabbed at the wound with a four-by-four and waited a moment. No bleeding. Satisfied, he nodded his head and said, “He was using cardiac needles and drawing the blood from their hearts.”

Kurtz shuddered. Franklin hunched his head down onto his shoulders and gave Nolan a disapproving look. Franklin was the serious sort. Crane had rotated out at the end of the month and Franklin had replaced him on the Service. Franklin was short, thin and quiet, and seemed to have no sense of humor at all, but he had good hands.

“Tie here,” Kurtz said.

Franklin didn’t look up but he did as he was told—two sutures around the cystic duct and the gall bladder, bulging from a stone obstructing the outlet, was swinging in the breeze. Nolan cut between the sutures and the specimen was free. Franklin handed the gallbladder off to the scrub nurse and Kurtz inspected the wound carefully. There was minimal bleeding from the liver bed but nothing unusual. “Lap pad,” he said.

The scrub nurse picked up a white square of cloth about the size of a kitchen towel, soaked it in a bucket of sterile saline and handed it to Kurtz. He packed it into the abdomen and they waited.

“What happened to him?” Liebert asked.

“Who? Joe?”

Liebert nodded. “They fired him.”

“That’s all?”

“What else were they supposed to do? Hey, his job was to get the blood. He was getting the blood. So his methods were unorthodox, nothing illegal in that.”

“But what if somebody had died?”

Nolan gave him a pitying look. “They didn’t.”

“But what if they had? Isn’t it assault? Or even murder?”

“More like malpractice, I think. But they didn’t, so why make waves? Get rid of the asshole and forget about it, and hope the whole thing stays buried.”

Liebert wrinkled his brow. “I see,” he said doubtfully.

“You know kid, you tend to be a little naive, sometimes.” Nolan looked at Franklin and said, “Doesn’t he tend to be a little naive?”

Franklin grunted and Nolan rolled his eyes.

Kurtz removed the lap pad. The wound stayed dry. “Okay,” he said. “Close it up.” He glanced at the clock and thought about the sheaf of papers sitting on the top shelf of his locker. It was 10:15 A.M. He had no patients scheduled in the office until after lunch: time to do a little searching through the computer.

Nice, Barent thought. Real nice. The Lee's home was a Tudor mansion set on three acres of rolling ground outside Stamford, Connecticut. Large oak trees straddled the driveway. The grass, even in winter, looked green and neat. A hedge of rhododendrons sat under the box windows and ran the length of the house. A marble fountain filled with a ring of dark, frozen water sat next to an iron lamppost.

Moran parked the car in the circular driveway. Barent pressed the doorbell and a short, plump woman dressed in a maid's uniform answered the door. "Yes?" she said.

"I'm Detective Barent and this is my partner, Detective Moran. Mrs. Lee is expecting us."

"Come in." Barent and Moran entered. "Please wait here." The maid turned and walked away. Barent looked up. An enormous crystal chandelier hung in the foyer. White marble tiles separated by black inlays covered the floor. To their left, a white, carpeted stairway curved up and around, leading to a second floor balcony that looked down on the foyer. A painting hung on the wall above the balcony. The painting was at least six feet long and brightly colored, a large white ball fading into green shadow, surrounded by dancing triangles in magenta, blue and rose.

"You like the painting? It's a Vasarelli." A tall, thin woman stood in the hallway. Her skin was wrinkled and she had bags under her eyes. She wore a light gray business suit with a lavender blouse. Her mascara was smeared.

"I like it very much," Barent said. He squinted upward. "But the style is hardly characteristic of Vasarelli. It looks more like an Ernst Gottlieb."

The woman frowned and looked up at the painting. She cleared her throat. "Well," she said. "You are Detective Barent?"

"And Detective Moran."

"I'm Estelle Lee." She held out her hand and Barent gravely shook it.

"I'm sorry to bother you, Mrs. Lee, but it seemed necessary."

"That's quite alright, Detective. We all have our jobs. Please come with me."

Estelle Lee tottered as she walked. They followed her down a hallway and into a room that was completely lined with glass. The room looked out upon a red brick patio bordered by a dense line of mountain laurel. Beyond the mountain laurel stood a chain link fence surrounding a swimming pool covered with ice. A small, wrought iron table with a tea set on top stood in the middle of the room. "Please sit down," Mrs. Lee said. "Tea?"

"No, thank you," Barent said. Moran, as usual, said nothing.

A woman who looked like a younger version of Estelle Lee walked into the room. She had a look of what appeared to be perpetual disapproval pasted on her face. "I'm Sheila Hirschfeld." She said it without a smile. "Sharon's sister."

Barent shook her hand. Sheila Hirschfeld seated herself on a chair next to her mother. The two women stared at Barent, unblinking.

"As you know," Barent said, "we'll be going to trial very shortly, and there are certain things that we need to have clarified in order to tie up any possible loose ends in our case. First of all, can you tell me: who might have had anything to gain by your daughter's death?"

Estelle Lee's lips compressed into a rigid line. "How is that question relevant at this point?"

Barent looked at her sadly. "The defense will undoubtedly argue that people other than Bill Mose might have had reason to kill Sharon. We have to be prepared for that."

Sheila Hirschfeld leaned forward. "Nobody had anything to gain by Sharon's death. Nobody."

"I know this is difficult for you, Mrs. Hirschfeld, but please believe that I'm on your side. I want your sister's murderer to be brought to justice as much as you do."

"I doubt that, Detective. I seriously doubt that."

"My daughter is right," Mrs. Lee said. "Nobody could have had anything to gain by killing Sharon."

It must have been a nice view in the summer, Barent thought, with the trees all covered with leaves and the mountain laurel blooming. Not all cold and gray like now. He sighed to himself. Why did you have to hit people over the head? "Didn't Sharon have money?" he asked. "Her father was extremely wealthy."

The two women exchanged glances. Mrs. Lee cleared her throat and swayed a bit, then caught herself. Her hand, he noticed, trembled slightly and her eyes were puffy. Tea was certainly genteel, but without doubt Estelle Lee had been drinking something a bit stronger before their arrival. "Sharon had a trust fund," Mrs. Lee said precisely, "that was set up for her education. So did Sheila. Other than that, all of her father's money went to me."

"I see." Barent gravely made a notation in his notebook, then looked up. "Had she had any arguments with anyone lately?"

"Arguments?" Sheila Hirschfeld said.

"Disagreements. Fights. With anybody, anybody at all."

"Such as who?"

"You would know that better than I."

Sheila Hirschfeld shook her head. Estelle Lee stared out at the mountain laurel. If she heard them, she gave no sign.

"No," Sheila Hirschfeld said. "Not that I'm aware of."

"Do you know a man named Richard Kurtz?"

Again, Mrs. Lee and her daughter looked at each other. Mrs. Lee looked away without expression. Sheila shrugged. "He's a surgeon," Sheila said. "Sharon used to go out with him."

"What did you think of him?"

"I didn't like him," Sheila said. "He was overbearing and opinionated."

It occurred to Barent that Sheila Hirschfeld more than likely suffered from a touch of the same disease. "And you, Mrs. Lee?"

She shrugged. "I don't remember him particularly. He was a young man. Sharon went out with so many of them."

"Who was her latest?"

"Pardon me?"

"At the time of her death, was she involved with anybody?"

"I don't know," Mrs. Lee said in a faint voice.

"Mrs. Hirschfeld?"

Sheila blinked. "No," she said. "I don't think so."

Barent examined her face for a long, silent moment. "Are you sure?" he asked.

Sheila opened her mouth but no words at first came out. She swallowed, cleared her throat, and then said, "Yes."

He tapped his pen on his notebook and looked at her. She looked back at him without blinking. "Do either of you know a man named Jaime Ruiz?" he asked.

"No," Sheila said. Estelle Lee shook her head. "I never heard of him. What does this Jaime Ruiz have to do with Sharon?"

Barent sighed. "Probably nothing." He rose to his feet abruptly. "Thank you, Mrs. Hirschfeld, Mrs. Lee—you've been most helpful."

Sharon's mother barely nodded. Sheila frowned, then said slowly, "Call us if we can be of any further assistance."

"Of course." He turned on his heel and went out, Moran following.

They were back in the car and a mile down the road before Barent spoke. "What do you think?"

"She was lying," Moran said. "I wonder why."

Barent nodded. "Her sister is dead. Who does she think she's protecting?"

"Maybe her memory," Moran said. "Maybe someone else." Then he looked at Barent. "Ernst Gottlieb?"

"Ernie Gottlieb, friend of mine back in grade school; a regular genius with circles and triangles, if you know what I mean."

"Hmm," Moran said.

Barent chuckled. "Hey, she wants to talk art, we'll talk art." Barent looked out the window at the trees passing by and narrowed his eyes. "How much you think that stupid painting cost?" he asked. "A hundred- thousand? More?"

Moran shrugged.

"From what I remember, Ernie Gottlieb became a plumber. You think he makes as much money as Vasarelli?"

Moran grinned. "More than you and me, anyway."

"That is for sure," Barent said. He puffed on his cigar, watched the smoke curl up toward the ceiling. "That is for goddamn sure."

THERE WERE OVER TWO hundred names on the list. After an hour and a half, Kurtz had gotten through barely fifty of them. Patient data was accessed under the patient's Medical Record Number. If all you had was a name, you could type that in and the computer would give you the number, which you could then use to get biopsy reports, lab results and dates of both inpatient admissions and office appointments—but it took longer.

None of the fifty had ever been treated at Easton Medical Center. Kurtz was not surprised. It had seemed worth following up but it was a long shot at best. He glanced at his watch—he barely had time for a quick lunch before afternoon office hours.

Kurtz grabbed a sandwich in the Doctor's Dining Room, sitting by himself in a corner, then hurried back to his office. Mrs. Schapiro sat at her computer. "Mr. Callahan is a little early," she said. "Ellen showed him into an examining room."

Callahan. Kurtz repressed a shudder.

He took off his jacket, slipped on a white coat, swiped a hand through his hair, straightened his tie and practiced a smile in the mirror.

Ellen Grunfeld gave a perfunctory knock on the door and entered. She was a plump young woman with light blue eyes, ash blonde hair and a plain face. She wore a nurse's uniform. "Mr. Callahan is feeling poorly today," she said, and handed him a manila folder.

Mr. Callahan, Kurtz thought, is a grade A pain in the ass. "Mr. Callahan is under a lot of stress," he said.

Miss Grunfeld smiled knowingly. Kurtz took the chart and entered the examining room. Callahan sat on the metal treatment table with his white, hairless legs dangling over the side. He wore boxer shorts with blue polka dots and a sleeveless tee shirt. His outer clothes lay folded on a chair. Kurtz glanced at his chart. Five foot eight, two twenty. "You've gained a little weight, Mr. Callahan."

Callahan nodded sadly. "I know you said to exercise, Doc, but I can't exercise. My varicose veins are killing me."

Kurtz had operated on Callahan for a lipoma—a benign fatty tumor—on his back over a year before and the man had nearly driven him crazy. "Have you been watching your diet?"

"Like a hawk. I've cut back on the red meat, no animal fats, no tropical oils, no salt, lots of roughage. None of it does any good. I'm like cast iron in there, Doc—constipation like I wouldn't wish on my worst enemy. I got cramps almost all the time."

"Cramps," Kurtz said.

"Like I wouldn't wish on my worst enemy." Mr. Callahan repeated it with a brave smile. "And I think I got a hernia."

"Yes, you said so on the phone. Lie down and let me take a look at you."

Kurtz palpated Callahan's abdomen, feeling for any masses, then listened to the bowel sounds with his stethoscope. "Where is this hernia?"

Callahan pointed to the region below his umbilicus. "Give me a cough," Kurtz said.

Callahan coughed. Callahan's smooth, rotund abdomen quivered slightly, but that was all. Nothing bulged. Kurtz palpated the area carefully. "Cough again." Callahan coughed and Kurtz shook his head. "I don't think so, Mr. Callahan."

"No?" Callahan looked disappointed.

“Any blood in the stools?”

“Blood?” Callahan seemed momentarily bewildered. “No, I never noticed any blood.”

Kurtz looked at the chart. The only trouble with Callahan was that he ate like a pig and sat around on his fat rear end dreaming up problems for himself. “You’re fifty-six,” Kurtz said.

“Fifty-seven in March.”

“Have you ever had a sigmoidoscopy?”

Callahan’s face brightened. “No,” he said. “Should I?”

“Well, anybody your age should have screening for colon cancer. A sigmoidoscopy is routine; a colonoscopy would probably be better.”

“Really? When can we do it?”

“They’re usually done by the internists,” Kurtz said.

“Oh.” Callahan’s face fell. “I don’t trust the internists. You’re the one who saved my life. Can’t you do it?”

“I appreciate your confidence, Mr. Callahan, but I hardly saved your life. It was very minor surgery.”

“But it could have been cancer. You don’t know how relieved I was.”

“I can imagine,” Kurtz muttered.

“What?”

“Nothing, Mr. Callahan.”

“Well, can’t you do it?” Callahan repeated.

Kurtz stared at the chart, peered at Callahan’s eager, beseeching expression, and mentally threw up his hands. “I suppose so, Mr. Callahan.”

“Great,” Callahan said. “When?”

“You need a bowel prep. That takes a little time. Set up an appointment with Mrs. Schapiro outside. The nurse will tell you exactly what to do.”

“Thank you,” Callahan breathed. He grabbed Kurtz’ hand with both of his own and shook it. Kurtz extricated the hand with some difficulty.

“That’s quite alright, Mr. Callahan. Quite alright. I’ll see you in a few days.”

By four thirty, the last patient had left, and by five o’clock, Kurtz had finished dictating his charts. Mrs. Schapiro and Miss Grunfeld had gone home a few minutes before. He locked the door, turned out the lights and walked down the stairs to Bill Werth’s office. Werth already had his coat on. “You ready?” Kurtz asked.

“You bet,” Werth said. “Let’s go.”

They caught a cab and drove across town to Werth’s apartment, where Dina and Kathy were waiting for them. Dina came up and kissed Werth on the cheek. Kathy gave Kurtz’ hand a squeeze and he glanced at Dina, who was looking at them both with a fond smile on her face. He felt himself blushing. Kathy snickered.

Dina Werth was a pretty woman, dark hair, dark eyes, thin nose and graceful neck. She was on extended leave of absence from N.Y.U. since the birth of her first child two months before. “Come on,” she said, “let’s get out of here before Junior realizes I’m gone.”

“Who’s with him?” Kurtz asked.

“My mother. She’s in the kitchen, stuffing his little face.”

Werth smiled and made a shooing motion toward the outside hall. They tiptoed out. When the door had closed behind them, Dina breathed a long sigh. “Freedom,” she said, “Thank God.”

Werth looked at her sorrowfully. “I tell you, she’s an unnatural mother.”

“Baloney. You try staying cooped up with a howling infant, you wouldn’t last ten minutes.”

“You’re absolutely right,” Werth said placidly. “But it isn’t a fair comparison. Men aren’t emotionally equipped to deal with babies. It’s genetic.”

Dina slapped him gently on the cheek. “Sexist pig.”

“No, really. I’m a psychiatrist. I know these things.”

Dina turned to Kathy. “Shall you kill him? Or shall I?”

“I wouldn’t dirty my hands.”

They caught another cab to the Garden, grabbed a quick bite to eat and settled into their seats.

The Knicks were playing the Bulls and the crowd roared from the opening tip off. The game should have been a slaughter. Jordan was long since gone, Pippen traded. The Bulls were a shell of their former championship team, but somehow, the Knicks were just not into it. They moved sluggishly. They shot poorly. By the end of the first quarter, they were down by ten.

“Looking bad,” Werth said.

“They’ll come back,” Kurtz said. “I have confidence.”

The second quarter went a little better than the first. Houston made a baseline jumper that hit nothing but net. Ward stole the ball, went to the basket, was fouled and made both free throws. The two teams traded baskets and then Camby muscled his way inside for a gutsy rebound and got hammered as he put the ball back up. He sank one free throw and suddenly the lead was only four.

“Look,” Werth said, and grabbed Kurtz by the arm. “Isn’t that Bill Cosby?”

“Where?” Kathy asked.

“Down there.” Werth pointed to the expensive seats on the arena floor. Kurtz squinted, then stared. Huddled close together on the edge of the court in a private box large enough for eight, not far from a man who might indeed have been Bill Cosby, were two people that he thought he recognized. “Hey,” he whispered to Werth, “what do you think of the blonde?”

Werth looked, and silently whistled. “She must be a movie star.”

Kurtz gave a non-committal grunt and nodded thoughtfully.

At halftime the Knicks were down by only two. The buzzer sounded and the crowd rose to its feet. “Come on,” Kathy said. “I need something to drink.”

Dina sat up and stretched. “My back still hurts,” she said. “And it’s already been two full months. The little sucker better be worth it.”

“See?” Werth said. “Unnatural.”

They pushed their way through the crowd and up to a concession stand outside. The line moved quickly. They had just paid for four sodas when Kurtz heard a familiar, unmistakable voice say softly, “Hey.”

He turned around, telling himself sternly to be casual. “Lenore,” he said with a smile. “How are you?”

Harrison Thomas held out his hand. “Nice to see you.”

Werth, who was standing on line with a wide grin on his face, gave Kurtz a pointed look. “Bill Werth,” Kurtz quickly said. “This is Dina Werth and Kathy Roselli.” He turned to Kathy. “Lenore Brinkman. Harrison Thomas. I met them down in Cancun.”

“Ahh...” Kathy said, and smiled. “Cancun.” She held out her hand and Lenore shook it.

“Where are you sitting?” Thomas asked.

“Pretty high up. You can barely recognize the players.”

“The Company buys season tickets. We have the whole box. Would you like to come down with us?”

Kurtz hesitated. "We'd be glad to," Kathy said. She had been quite obviously examining Lenore, who had been doing the same to her. They both smiled, apparently liking what they saw, which made Kurtz, for some unaccountable reason, begin to feel an uncomfortable itching sensation between his shoulder blades.

They went back into the arena and made their way down to the floor just as the third quarter was about to begin. "It is Bill Cosby," Werth whispered.

Somehow, Kurtz found himself sitting next to Werth and Harrison Thomas, with Dina, Kathy and Lenore on the other side of the box. The three women kept their heads together and chatted continuously, occasionally looking over at Kurtz and giggling. Whatever they were talking about, they seemed far more interested in the conversation than the game. Kurtz watched them surreptitiously, but if they noticed him glancing over, they ignored it completely.

Camby made a spectacular dunk and followed up with a twisting, fall away jumper from the top of the key that bounced off the rim. Houston grabbed a missed shot on the other end and slammed it home. The game went back and forth for the rest of the quarter, neither team managing to gain a lead of more than two or three points. As the fourth quarter began, both teams seemed to dig in. The pace slowed, the defense tightened. The shots became harder and the passes crisp and pinpoint and the ball moved back and forth, neither team able to penetrate. With fifteen seconds left in the game, Chicago was up by one with possession of the ball. They inbounded. Sprewell jumped in and swatted it away. Both teams scrambled and the ball popped up, floating above a pile of jumbled bodies. Jackson leaped in and grabbed it. Under the basket, Camby waved his arms wildly and Jackson shot the ball down court. Camby jammed it in just as the buzzer sounded.

"Wow," Werth said, and grabbed his head with both hands. Kurtz let his breath out slowly and shook his head.

"Great game," Thomas said. "Absolutely a great game."

Kathy and Lenore looked at them with superior little smiles on their faces. "Men are so competitive," Lenore said.

Thomas, Werth and Kurtz exchanged perplexed glances. Kurtz scratched his head while Werth frowned up at the ceiling. Thomas shrugged. "We're going to get something to eat," he said. "Care to join us?"

"Sure," Kathy said. "Why not?"

Dina Werth frowned and glanced at her watch. "We better get home, before Junior drives my mother out of her mind."

"We'll catch a cab," Werth said. "Don't worry about us."

"I'll go get the car," Thomas said.

"I'll go with you," Kurtz said.

"Why don't you meet us on the corner," Thomas said to Kathy and Lenore. "Thirty-fourth and Broadway. I'll swing around and pick you up."

Kurtz and Thomas went down three flights of stairs to the garage. "Second aisle and around to the left," Thomas said. He wore a black trench coat and black leather shoes. His fine curly hair was neat on his head.

"Strange, running into the two of you this way," Kurtz said. "I never thought I'd see either of you again."

Thomas turned, flashed him a quick smile. "The company has season tickets for the Knicks, Nets, Rangers, Mets and Yankees. You never know when you might have to stroke a client."

"You and Lenore seem happy."

“Couldn’t be happier. The wedding is set for June.”

Kurtz nodded. “What does your father have to say?”

“He doesn’t.” Thomas smiled at him again. “This is it,” he said, and stopped next to a dark blue Mercedes 560. “Hop in.”

Thomas opened the door as Kurtz went around to the other side. The door opened. A gun pointed at Kurtz’ face.

“You heard the man,” a voice said. “Hop in.”

THERE WERE TWO OF THEM. The one sitting up front with Harrison was tall and burly, with brown, slicked back hair under a black fedora. He wore a dark blue suit and a sedately striped red and gray tie. His gun pointed unerringly at Harrison's head. "Straight ahead and turn left when you get out of the parking lot," he said. The gun, Kurtz noted, was a Ruger .22 caliber; he hadn't seen one of those since he left the army. It barely fit inside the gunman's hand.

"What's this all about?" Harrison asked quietly.

"You'll find out."

The one sitting in back with Kurtz was smaller, very thin, with long, hairy fingers and a five o'clock shadow over sunken cheeks. He held his gun loosely in his fist but it never strayed far from the center of Kurtz' chest and his eyes never left Kurtz' face. The gun was a Colt .44 magnum. Small man, big gun, and vice versa.

"Who's he?" the one up front asked.

"His name's Kurtz. He's a surgeon."

The little one put a sour look on his face and rolled his eyes. "Where's your girlfriend?" the big one asked.

"Waiting for us on the corner."

The two gunmen exchanged quick glances. "Turn right," the one in front said.

Harrison turned and the headlights of a passing car shone in briefly through the windshield. The big car's engine hummed smoothly. Both hoods looked attentive but vaguely bored, as if they had done this sort of thing many times before. After his one question, Harrison drove without speaking, hunched silently over the steering wheel, staring straight ahead. Kurtz sat quietly in the back, studying the situation. The knowledge that he was a doctor seemed to have relaxed the little hoodlum, and why not? Surgeons liked to think of themselves as men of action but an M.D. and a loud voice wasn't much good against a bullet. Kurtz hoped he could take advantage of that. Meanwhile, the little gunman sat in back with a sleepy smile on his face. Once, he stifled a yawn behind his fist.

They went crosstown on Thirty Fourth Street until they had almost reached the Hudson River. "Turn left," the one in front said. Harrison turned the wheel and they drove downtown along the West Side Highway. To their left, expensive walk-ups gave way to small old buildings sub-divided into storage space and single room apartments. To the right, the Hudson River flowed to the sea, dotted with chunks of ice. Between the roadway and the River sat a row of pilings and empty, rotting wharves. "Pull in," the big one said. Harrison turned and went off the road, into what used to be a parking lot, the big Mercedes bouncing in and out of crumbling potholes.

"Drive down to the end."

Harrison grimaced. He blinked and seemed to have trouble pulling air into his chest, but he did as he was told. The car drove out to the end of the lot. Ahead of them, past the edge of a rusting metal bulkhead, the Hudson gleamed in the moonlight. To their right, an empty warehouse, its windows long since shattered, lay crumbling. "Stop the car. Get out. Slowly."

The big hoodlum kept his gun on Harrison's back as the door opened. They stepped out of the car.

"You too," the little one said.

The air was frigid but Kurtz barely felt it. A whisper of cold wind caressed his cheek as he straightened.

The big one motioned at Harrison with his gun, waving him forward, and Harrison took three steps. "Stop," the gunman said. "That's far enough."

Kurtz stood with his back against the car, his breath coming faster, his heart racing. Things seemed unreal. It occurred to him vaguely that the crystalline blackness of the nighttime sky, the rippling moonlight on the ice of the river, the decaying old warehouse might be the last sights that he would ever see. His thoughts moved in slow motion and the stars seemed to twinkle overhead forever. The little hoodlum smiled at him, a strange, crooked grin, like he was smiling at something only he could see. For a moment, they stood there, and then the big gunman reached into a pocket and pulled out a set of steel rings and slipped them over the knuckles of his left hand. He wriggled his fingers, settling the rings more comfortably, and then he stepped forward and delivered a long left hook to Harrison's face. Harrison cried out and his legs crumpled. He fell, kneeling in the dirt. A black trickle of blood oozed from his mouth and dripped onto the frozen ground.

The gunman reached down, grabbed Harrison by the hair and tilted his face up. "Tell your father it will be him next. You understand?"

The gunman kicked him in the ribs, then kicked him twice more. Harrison rolled weakly onto his back, his eyes slits in his face, his breath wheezing.

A clatter of gravel came from the wharf. Kurtz saw a quick motion from the corner of his eye as a rat darted behind a moldering log. The little gunman's eyes flickered. Move, Kurtz thought. His left arm snapped up. His fingers clasped the gunman's wrist, wrenched the little man's arm down and to the side, and snapped his elbow over Kurtz' raised knee. The little man screamed shrilly.

The big gunman turned. His eyes flashed in the moonlight and his gun came up and spat flame. The little man gave a tiny cry, shuddered, moaned once and went limp. Kurtz grabbed the pistol from his slack fingers, raised it and fired. The big man groaned, clasped his hand to his side and fell heavily. Then he rolled, scrambled to his feet and, crouching low, ran a zigzag pattern over the rough ground and darted around the edge of the building. Silence.

Kurtz' breath whooshed out. He let the little gunman drop to the ground and examined him quickly. He was dead. Then he went over to Harrison, who was lying on his back with his head twisted to the side. A single lock of hair drifted over his forehead in the cold wind. Kurtz dropped to one knee and put a hand on Harrison's neck. The pulse was strong. His breathing was shallow but steady.

The big Mercedes stood black and silent in the frigid night. Kurtz went over to it and opened the door. He leaned across the front seat, picked up the cell phone and dialed 911.

The CAT scan was negative. Harrison had briefly awakened, smiled at Lenore and then drifted back to sleep. Kurtz and Kathy stood next to her while Lenore stared at Harrison's face and silently wrung her hands.

"Well," a familiar voice said, "isn't this a surprise?"

Barent stood there, a faint smile on his face. Moran was behind him.

Kurtz snorted softly and shook his head.

Lenore glanced at Barent once without interest before her eyes went back to Harrison. Kathy stared at Barent with obvious curiosity.

"Any place around here we can talk?" Barent asked.

"My office alright?"

"Fine."

"I'll be back," Kurtz said to Lenore. She nodded without looking up.

"I'm going along," Kathy said. "I want to hear this."

"That okay with you?" Kurtz asked Barent.

Barent shrugged. "Sure."

They trooped to the elevator, not saying anything, went down to the Third Floor and took the walkway over the street to the Hampshire Building. The hallways were brightly lit but the building was empty. Kurtz turned on the light in his office, sat behind the desk and said, "Sit down."

Barent took the visitor's chair while Moran crossed his arms and leaned against the wall. Kathy sat on the couch.

"I thought you only worked homicides," Kurtz said. "Why are you involved in this?"

Barent grinned faintly. "I'm interested in bodies." He shrugged. "There's a body."

"I see."

"The dead man was easy to identify. His name's Charlie Flanagan. He free lances, but he's done a lot of work in the past for Tony Korda, which I hope is a coincidence that can help us."

"How about the big one?"

"We're not sure. Probably Jimmy Raines. He fits the description you gave, and he's been associated with Flanagan."

"I was lucky," Kurtz said. "He took his eyes off me." Moran smiled ruefully and shook his head in wonder.

"What made you try it in the first place?" Barent asked.

"Are you kidding? I figured there was a real good chance that I would wind up dead if I didn't."

"Didn't they say to warn Thomas' father that he would be next? You can't give a warning if you're dead."

"The general situation did not inspire confidence."

Barent leaned forward. "These guys are pros. What made you think you could get away with it?"

"One would think that you resented my survival," Kurtz said.

Barent said nothing. Kurtz put his feet up on the edge of the desk and stretched, trying to work the kinks out of his tight muscles. The adrenaline had almost worn off and his nerves were frayed. "The only thing that bothers me is that I missed. I should have killed him. He was barely ten feet away, for Christ's sake." This was not exactly true. What really bothered him was that he had been less than perfect. Kurtz knew it was absurd but it was the way he had been taught to think. Excuses were not allowed.

"Have you ever killed anyone?" Barent asked.

"No," Kurtz grudgingly replied.

"You were rushed," Barent said.

"I suppose."

"These guys were not expecting you to be there. They were expecting Thomas and the girl. They would have beaten up Thomas and maybe the girl also, and then delivered their warning. And we would never have heard a word about it."

Kurtz looked at him doubtfully. "You don't know Lenore."

"Don't be a dope. I know these guys. If Thomas or his girlfriend had said anything to anybody but Thomas' old man, then either they or the old man would have wound up very dead. You can be certain that that message would have been delivered loud and clear.

"And also, we can assume that the old man wouldn't have let them talk because if Korda, or anybody like Korda, was putting pressure on him, it means that he's involved in some business that he needs to keep hushed up."

Kurtz nodded, thinking it over. It made sense. "I suppose so."

Barent stood up. "Tomorrow, Harry and I will have a talk with Mr. Oliver Thomas. I'd like you to come down to the station house. We'll have you look at some photos. Maybe you can identify the other one."

"It will have to be after four. I have surgery in the morning and then some patients to see in the afternoon."

"Fine." Barent's eyes flickered to Moran. "Harry will meet you."

Moran gave a soft snort and fixed his eyes on the far horizon. "How are you doing with that list of names?" Barent asked.

Kurtz shook his head. "Nothing yet."

"Keep on trying. Maybe something will turn up."

“SO TELL ME,” ASKED Liebert, “what brings a man to colon and rectal surgery?”

Kurtz gave Liebert a long, brooding look and then grudgingly smiled. Liebert reminded Kurtz a little of himself at a much younger age. The kid’s cheerful certainty seemed somehow to be a rebuke, but a rebuke for exactly what, Kurtz could not quite figure out. Maybe his lost enthusiasm. Usually Kurtz enjoyed morning rounds but lately things had been coming unglued. The events of last night seemed unreal next to the easy familiarity of the Surgical Floor, but they sat in the back of his mind like a lead weight. This whole thing with Barent and Moran, Bill Mose and Sharon Lee and Tony Korda was ridiculous. He was a surgeon, not a cop, not an undercover agent. What did he think he was doing? “General surgery is more than just colon and rectal,” Kurtz said.

“But it’s mostly colon and rectal,” Liebert said. “So why would anybody want to spend their entire career poking around in somebody’s rear end?”

Kurtz shrugged. “It’s a living.”

“I’m going into radiology,” Liebert declared. “I’ve decided that people are gross.”

“Wise choice,” Franklin said, “lucrative, pleasant, good hours, no worries.”

“Boring,” Nolan put in. “Very boring.”

“Not to me.” Liebert shook his head. “I mean, this is boring. Think about it; we’re spending an hour and a half looking at incisions, prescribing pain meds, changing dressings, listening to people moan about constipation, diarrhea and urinary retention. You really find that exciting?”

Nolan looked amused, Franklin annoyed. “You know, kid,” Nolan said, “you’ve got the wrong attitude. You’re a med student. You’re supposed to look eager, even if you think it’s all bullshit—wow, surgery sure is amazing! You guys sure are great! Don’t you want to get a good grade for the rotation?”

“I am eager,” Liebert said. He gave Nolan a smug smile. “I’m eager to finish up surgery and start radiology.”

Liebert pushed the chart rack down the hallway. They stopped outside of each room and discussed the case for a few moments and then went inside to examine the patient.

Mr. Benson had bladder cancer. The urologists had done a radical cystectomy over a year before and Kurtz had been asked to assist with the ileal conduit, isolating a piece of small intestine to which the ureters would be sewn and then inserting the conduit through the abdominal wall so that the urine could drain into a bag. Unfortunately, the cancer had recurred and despite radiation was spreading into the pelvis. Benson was on a morphine drip. He was somnolent but every once in a while he let out a faint moan in his sleep. His wife, a thin woman with a narrow, bony face, who seemed to be here twenty-four hours of every day, looked up as they came into the room. “How are you today, Mrs. Benson?” Kurtz asked. He deliberately did not ask how Mr. Benson was. They all knew how Mr. Benson was. Behind Kurtz, Liebert shuffled his feet and the residents assumed a solemn manner.

“I’m fine,” she said. Her voice was so faint they had to strain to hear her. “Thank you.”

Kurtz nodded. He glanced at Benson, then backed out into the hall. Liebert and the residents followed. “How much is he on?”

“Morphine?” Nolan asked.

“Yeah.”

“Eight milligrams an hour.”

“Up it to ten.”

“Isn’t that awfully high?” Liebert asked.

Kurtz shrugged. “Depends on what you mean by ‘high.’”

“Enough to cause respiratory depression?”

“It might cause respiratory depression, but he’s in pain,” Kurtz said. “I won’t allow that.”

“But ten milligrams an hour could kill him!”

Kurtz gave him a level look. “We don’t let our patients lie there and suffer.” He turned to Nolan.

“Give him whatever he needs.”

“Right,” Nolan said.

Liebert gulped. He seemed about to say something, then thought better of it. Something that might have been a smile pinched the corners of Kurtz’ mouth. “Benson is going to die,” he said, “and there’s no power on Earth that can prevent that. But he doesn’t have to die in pain. It’s all we can do for him.”

Liebert blinked his eyes rapidly and nodded his head. The next room was Stan Nugent’s. Nugent’s problem was similar to Benson’s, but not so far along. Nugent was seventy years old, skinny, bald and pale. His wife, a short, stout woman with gray hair and red lipstick, stood at his bedside. Kurtz had operated on Nugent for colon cancer ten months before. Nine months later, Nugent had returned with a bowel obstruction. Kurtz had taken him to surgery and explored him but he had closed without doing anything except a colostomy. Nugent had metastases to the omentum and the liver. He had been on chemotherapy for a month now, which may or may not have been killing the cancer but was certainly killing Nugent.

They played a little game. Nugent didn’t want to know he had cancer. They talked around his diagnosis, employing euphemisms like “abnormal cells” and “probable cure.” Nugent would listen to Kurtz with an avid gleam in his eye, his attention fixed like a laser bolt on Kurtz’ every word. Kurtz had seen many patients close to death, and he had always been amazed—even awed—at the quiet courage with which most of them faced it. But a few got like Nugent: cross and demanding. They pouted. They threw tantrums. Kurtz felt guilty about it but he had come to hate dealing with Nugent. The man clung to life like a miser, clawing with all ten fingers, blindly and with willful ignorance.

“You’re doing better today, Mr. Nugent,” he said. “Your white count has stabilized.” Nugent’s white count had ‘stabilized’ at less than a thousand. He was a setup for every infection in the book, but so far the germs had not found him worth bothering.

“That’s good, Doc,” he whispered. “That’s good.” He licked his lips with a dry tongue and gave Kurtz a knowing, sly smile. “So when can I get out of here?”

“Perhaps in a week or so, Mr. Nugent.”

“Good.” Nugent whispered, and nodded his bald head. “Good.” Nugent was much too sick for his wife to take care of but he no longer needed to be in the hospital. The floor social worker was trying to arrange for nursing home placement. When that came through, Nugent would be gone.

Kurtz patted him on his stick thin shoulder, and they left. Mrs. Nugent stared after them as she did every morning, with wide, beseeching eyes, but she said nothing.

They pushed the chart rack back to the Nursing Station and Nolan, Franklin and Liebert sat down to write the daily orders. Kurtz glanced at his watch. He had time for a cup of coffee and a donut before going to surgery.

“This guy Kurtz is some piece of work,” Moran said.

Barent stared out at the midtown traffic. A thin haze of foggy exhaust covered the street and Barent imagined his lungs crinkling inside his chest, silently screaming for mercy. “Nolan told me a little story about Kurtz: it seems that he was in the Emergency Room a few months ago, examining a patient with abdominal pain, when suddenly this character in the next room runs amok. Nolan said he was a biker, shaggy beard, black leather, tattoos running up both arms, smelled to high heaven and weighed close to three hundred pounds. His ‘friends’ had dropped him off, raving out of his mind on Angel Dust. The biker starts screaming, rips apart a row of cabinets, then grabs a nurse and begins to strangle her. Our boy Kurtz hears the ruckus, comes in and calmly knocks three of the biker’s teeth out. After that the biker got more mellow.” Barent took a cigar out of his inner pocket, frowned down at it and then squinted at the smog outside. He shook his head sadly and put the cigar back in his pocket. “There’s a lot of competition among the residents to be on his Service. Kurtz is a pretty popular guy at Easton. Have you looked at his records?”

Moran nodded. He kept both hands on the wheel and maneuvered deftly through the traffic.

Barent said, “Regimental pistol champ, marksmanship medal, runner up in the Divisional boxing tournament, first degree black belt in Tae Kwan Do.”

“He was a soldier,” Moran said.

“Hey, most people like to sit around when they get the opportunity, maybe relax a little. Not our boy Kurtz.”

“A black belt is not much use in his line of work,” Moran commented.

“Yeah? Don’t forget the biker. And then he takes a gun away from Charlie Flanagan and chases off Jimmie Raines in the middle of a job. Sounds pretty useful to me. You got a black belt in Tae Kwan Do?”

Moran took his eyes off the road, grinned at him briefly. “Shotokan,” he said.

“What the hell is that?”

“Tae Kwan Do uses a lot of kicks. Shotokan is mostly hands and arms. Legs have more power but hands are quicker. We like to think that we can get inside their guard and knock them out while they’re still thinking about it.”

“No shit?” Barent said.

Lenore Brinkman was sitting at a table by herself, looking tired and pale. Kurtz hesitated, then walked over, his coffee and a bran muffin balanced on a tray. “How are you doing?” he asked.

Lenore smiled at him wanly. “Not bad,” she said.

“Mind if I sit down?”

“Sure. I could use the company.”

The doctor’s cafeteria was closed for breakfast. Not enough business at this hour. Even the main cafeteria was almost empty. A cup of tea sat in front of her, along with a Danish pastry from which one bite had been taken. She had circles under her green eyes.

“You should go home and get some sleep,” Kurtz said. “Don’t worry about him. He’ll be fine.”

Lenore sighed. “I know that.” She sipped her tea and shook her head slowly, a sad expression on her face.

Kurtz put sugar and cream in his coffee and buttered his muffin. “Then what’s bothering you?”

She shrugged. “I like your girlfriend,” she said.

“Kathy?”

Lenore grinned, a brief upturning of her lips. “How many girlfriends do you have?”

He grinned back. “I like her, too,” he said.

Abruptly, Lenore’s smile vanished. A tiny shiver seemed to pass through her. “What did Harrison say to you last night? I mean about us.”

Kurtz looked at her, his muffin raised halfway to his mouth. “He said you couldn’t be happier. He said you were going to be married in June.”

“Well, he’s wrong.”

Kurtz blinked his eyes. He said nothing.

“We’re not going to be married in June. He was lying to you.” She smiled wryly. “It’s not his father this time. At least part of it is my mother, the way Harrison winces whenever he’s around her. He doesn’t act that way when it’s just me; I’ve got blonde hair; I dress nicely. He doesn’t have to think about the fact that I’m not eligible for D.A.R. membership. My mother, on the other hand, cannot pass for anything other than what she is. And she wouldn’t want to. Harrison doesn’t have to like her. Half the time I don’t like her. But he’s not allowed to be ashamed of her.” She shrugged and let her eyes wander out the window to the cold morning sky. “He’s a nice guy but a tiger can’t change its stripes and neither can a bigot.” Lenore shook her hair out and gave a sigh. “Maybe that’s a little too strong. I don’t know—but I know I’m not going to be marrying Harrison Thomas.” She shrugged. “So much for love. Mother doesn’t know yet. She’ll think I’m a fool.”

“I see,” Kurtz said. Lenore’s eyes were fixed on his face. It was beginning to rain outside; he noticed it with a part of his mind. A distant roll of thunder made the windows vibrate. “I’m sorry to hear that,” he said.

She smiled sadly. “Are you?”

He sipped his coffee and thought about it for a long moment. “I don’t know,” he said.

“We’re here. First Amsterdam Savings and Loan.” Moran flipped down the sun visor with the New York City Police logo on it and pulled the car into a parking spot next to a hydrant. They got out of the car and took an elevator up to the top floor. The elevator opened on an atrium lobby with a vaulted ceiling made out of glass. A receptionist sat behind a small black desk, which was bare except for a white push button telephone and a computer screen. “Detective Barent,” Moran said, “and Detective Moran. We have an appointment to see Mr. Thomas.”

The receptionist looked as if she doubted it. She scanned the computer, frowning prettily and nibbling on her lower lip, then her face cleared. “Yes, I see. You’re right on time. Please wait just a second.” She picked up the phone and spoke into it, “Your nine o’clock appointment is here, sir.” She put down the phone, said to Barent, “Go right on in. First door on your left.”

Barent pushed open the door and they entered a corner office, at least twenty feet by twenty, with views of the East River on one side and downtown on the other. Oliver Thomas sat behind an executive sized desk made of dark oak. “Gentlemen,” he said. “Please sit down.”

The desk was too big to reach across and Oliver Thomas didn’t offer to shake hands. Oliver Thomas had gray, wavy hair and a smooth, pink face. His suit was gray with a thin blue pinstripe and his tie had a flowered pattern in pastel pink and green. He wore cufflinks in the sleeves of his white shirt, solid gold ovals with tiny diamonds in the center. “What can I do for you?” he asked.

“We’re here to discuss the incident last night involving your son.”

“Ah...” Oliver Thomas nodded politely. His eyes wandered around the corners of the room. He seemed bored. “What is there to discuss? Two thugs kidnapped him at gunpoint and then assaulted him. These things happen routinely in the City of New York. Luckily, his injuries are minor.”

Barent smiled. Harrison had awakened this morning. He had a headache but was otherwise recovering without complication. His mother had swept in during the night, wearing diamonds and a floor length mink, barking demands and making herself generally difficult. Lenore had yawned in her face and then ignored her. Harrison had slept through her visit and Mrs. Thomas had gone home, angry and frustrated. Harrison’s father could have had no way of knowing about the warning that his son had been instructed to give him, but if Barent's suspicions were correct, then Oliver Thomas must have known what the attack implied without having to be told. But there he sat, as cold as ice. "Perhaps nobody informed you of the details," Barent said.

Thomas glanced at his Rolex and frowned very slightly. "Do you have any questions for me, Detective? If you don't, then I'm really quite busy."

"How long have you known Tony Korda?" Barent asked.

Thomas stared at him, an uncomprehending look on his face. "Excuse me?"

"I said: How long have you known Tony Korda?"

Oliver Thomas blinked twice, then looked down at his desk. A tiny dark line appeared between his brows. "Who is Tony Korda?" he asked.

"Tony Korda is a well known criminal. If you don't know him personally, you should know of him. Most people in New York have at least heard the name. You don't know him?"

"No."

"Think about it for a few minutes. Search your memory. You're absolutely sure?"

Oliver Thomas frowned. "I'm afraid I don't like your tone, Detective."

"I'm really sorry about that, Mr. Thomas. I wouldn't want you to get upset." Barent smiled thinly. "You're absolutely certain that you never heard of Tony Korda?"

"I already said so."

Barent sighed. "That's sad." He looked over at Moran. "Isn't that sad?"

Moran nodded, his face expressionless.

"Here's the way I figure it," Barent said. "You run a bank, not one of the biggest banks in the country but how big a bank do you need?" Barent shrugged. "He can't be simply stealing your money or you—as the man in charge of the money—would be screaming to high heaven. Besides, you steal money from somebody, you only get a chance to steal it once. And why kill the goose that lays the golden eggs? No. Korda already has plenty of money but what he doesn't have is a way to turn his money into legitimate money. I figure that the cash comes in and the cash goes out, and the I.R.S. never knows the difference." Barent slid the palms of his hands past each other and whistled between his teeth. "Clean as a whistle."

Oliver Thomas' pink face had grown redder as Barent talked. "That's slander," he said.

"It's only slander if it isn't true."

Oliver Thomas smiled. The smile went no further than the sides of his mouth. "It's only true if you can prove it."

Barent nodded. "The guy who beat up your son works for Tony Korda." This might not be true, Barent reflected, but he wasn't going to let Oliver Thomas know that. If Korda wasn't pulling his strings, then somebody else was. "You know what he said to him?"

Oliver Thomas said nothing.

"He said, 'Tell your father it will be him next.' Not too subtle, was it? Now why would Korda want to do that to you? Could it be that your relationship is not as cozy as it once was? Could it be that the sums of money that he is attempting to deposit are getting perhaps just a trifle too large for you to handle? And could it be that you are expressing this opinion to Tony Korda just a bit more forcefully than he wants to hear?" Barent shook his head sadly. "That's the problem dealing with a guy like Korda: once you start, there's no way to stop. He owns you."

"Nobody owns me," Oliver Thomas said flatly.

"No? When you were an ordinary rich banker, way back when, and these guys first approached you, you could have gone to the police and maybe got protection, but now it's too late. Are you immune to a bullet in the back?"

Oliver Thomas breathed a long sigh. He put the fingers of both hands together in front of his face and nodded thoughtfully. "And why would I ever get involved in such a scheme in the first place? What could possibly be my motive?"

"That's the easiest question in the world. Rich people are rich because they have a fondness for money. You can't have too much money. Besides, Lenore tells me that business has been bad lately. Hey, no need to be ashamed. It's happening all over. Everybody made bad loans back in the roaring Nineties. Why should you be any different?"

Oliver Thomas stiffened. "I told my son not to get involved with that girl. She's not our kind. And she has no respect."

"Respect for what? The way she tells it, you're a simple anti-Semite."

Oliver Thomas shook his head in disgust. "I see no need to respond to that comment."

Barent grinned. He spread his hands in an open, expansive gesture. "Hey, look at it this way. You were right: I've got no proof. But I do have enough to interest the Feds. Could your books really stand up to an audit?" He shrugged. "Maybe they can, but could your business stand up to the publicity? People lose confidence in a bank that's under investigation. Your customers frankly don't give a shit about your problems. There are plenty of other banks out there. Cooperate and we can avoid all that."

Oliver Thomas grinned wryly and for the first time looked almost regretful. "As you've already pointed out, Detective, I'm not immune to a bullet in the back."

Barent nodded. "True." He waited but Oliver Thomas only smiled. After a minute the silence began to drag, and Barent shook his head. "I'm sorry we couldn't do business," he said. "Give me a call if you change your mind."

JOGGING WASN'T A LOT of fun at this time of year. After a mile or so, Kurtz' fingers and toes no longer felt the cold, but his chest burned and his ears felt numb, even under the hood of his sweatshirt. Still, he did it. If nothing else, it gave him time to think while he accomplished something useful.

He had finished with Moran nearly an hour before. It had been a quick interview. "This one," he had said. The fat face looked a little younger, a little thinner, staring sadly into the camera, but it was nevertheless unmistakable. The guy must have really liked that hat. The suit—even the tie—was the same.

"Jimmy Raines," Moran said. He reached inside his jacket, got out a pack of cigarettes, looked at Kurtz and then put them back. He reached into another pocket, took out a battered stick of gum, removed the wrapper and put the gum in his mouth. "Pure chewing satisfaction," he said.

Kurtz shrugged. "It's your office. I'm not stopping you."

"For a moment, you looked like my wife. The guilt was too much for me to bear." Moran looked down at the picture of Jimmy Raines and cracked a smile. "I'll have him picked up."

So now what?

Kurtz jogged along the sidewalk on Central Park South. You couldn't push the pace too much on hard pavement if you wanted to avoid shin splints, but it was a good street for jogging, long, wide and straight, but not too crowded. Not too empty either. In the spring and summer, Kurtz ran inside the Park, but in winter, particularly at this time of day, Central Park was almost deserted and you were just asking for trouble.

He had run three miles already, two more to go. He reached the eastern edge of the Park and headed uptown in the fading light to his apartment.

He passed no one that he recognized. He thought about that as he ran. Growing up in a small town, you knew everybody. The sense of community, of belonging, was inescapable. You didn't have to think about it. In New York City, there were a thousand times as many people, and none of them belonged to each other. The City was too big, too anonymous—eight million people all scurrying about like ants in a hill, immersed in their own concerns. You had to have friends to survive in a place like New York, people you cared about, or you'd go crazy. Kurtz had always thought of himself as a loner, but there were limits, and New York City was the loneliest place that he knew.

He had almost died last night. He had seen death many times during his career as a physician but it was always somebody else, usually a stranger, almost always sick and old—except, of course, for Sharon Lee. Let's not forget Sharon Lee. Last night was the closest he himself had ever come to it. When Jimmy Raines had pointed the gun at him, Kurtz had not seen his whole life flashing before his eyes. He had seen Kathy.

Barent and Moran had told him there would be no risk when they asked him to help them. And there shouldn't have been, not to Kurtz. He was a consultant, a very minor player in the game they were playing. Last night had been an aberration, a chance occurrence of the sort that could have happened to anybody, its relationship to the death of Sharon Lee hazy and fortuitous at best. How many random killings were there every year in New York. A thousand? More? He thought there were more. He didn't want to be one of them.

He was looking forward to getting home. He had nothing planned for tonight except dinner, a brandy, some nice music and a good book, try to relax and go to bed early. He needed it.

“Richard scares me sometimes,” Kathy said, and felt a rush of relief at having finally admitted it. “I don’t like that feeling.”

Dina looked at her strangely. “What do you mean?”

“Last night is a perfect example. He almost killed a man. Afterward, he talked about it as calmly as you could please. His only regret about the whole thing was that he missed.”

Dina curled her legs underneath her on the couch and nibbled on a piece of carrot dipped in Blue Cheese Dressing. “Richard could very easily have been killed himself. Harrison Thomas almost was. Would you rather he had been?”

“No, of course not.”

“Well, then?”

Kathy shook her head helplessly. “I look at him sometimes and he looks like a stranger, like somebody I barely know and can’t understand. He’s unpredictable. He has a capacity for violence that frightens me.”

“Has he ever been violent with you?”

“No, of course not.”

“Has he ever harmed or threatened anyone you know?”

Kathy shook her head. “No. It’s not that.”

“Have you ever even seen this ‘capacity for violence’ that has you so upset?”

“Just once.” Kathy drew a deep breath. “We were on the way to a show. Richard hailed a cab. The cab pulled up next to us and just as Richard went to open the door, a man ran up and slid into the back seat.”

“Then what happened?”

“Richard got a strange look on his face, not quite a smile. He said to the man, ‘Excuse me, I believe this is our cab.’ The man looked at us and said, ‘I got here first, buddy. Get yourself another.’ Richard looked at the man. Then he looked at me. He seemed embarrassed. The cabbie said, ‘Come on, close the door. I ain’t got all day.’ Richard shrugged, reached in, grabbed the man by the collar and dragged him out.”

“Really?” Dina coughed on her carrot stick. “He did?”

“He held him up by the front of his jacket, gave him a shake that rattled his teeth and said, ‘You must have been mistaken.’ Then he put him down on the sidewalk, held the door open for me and got in.”

“What did the guy do then?”

“Nothing. His face was white as a ghost.”

“I’m not surprised.”

“The cabbie drove off. He didn’t say a word. Neither did Richard.”

Dina reached down, hesitated between another piece of carrot and a stick of celery, finally picked up the carrot and crunched it between her teeth. “It seems to me,” she said carefully, “that Richard is not the one who’s breaking the rules. In both of the cases that you mention, Richard only responded to provocation. While most people would perhaps have let the whole thing go, I don’t think Richard was inappropriate. I think the character got just what he deserved.”

“Who appointed Richard to give people what they deserve?”

Dina frowned at her. “Nobody wants to get involved. Nothing is anybody’s business. Isn’t that why society is falling apart? Well, Richard doesn’t mind getting involved.”

“No,” Kathy said. “He certainly doesn’t.”

“Richard Kurtz is not your average wimp, that’s for sure. Think about it,” Dina said. “Most women would like that.”

Kathy sipped her drink, a Black Russian. “Richard told me that he met somebody when he was down in Mexico.” She stared blankly at the tray full of vegetables. “He said it was nothing serious.”

Dina rolled her eyes. “Famous last words. Why did he tell you?”

“I asked him.”

Dina made a clucking noise with her tongue. “I always figured if you didn’t want to know the answer, then you shouldn’t ask the question.” Dina gave her a look of indulgent disapproval. “I told you to go along with him.”

“I had to work on my thesis.”

“Oh, sure.”

Dina was right, of course. She could have put the thesis off for a week. The real problem was that she wasn’t sure where she and Richard were going and even worse, she wasn’t at all sure where she wanted them to go. God damn it, she thought. Things were happening too fast. “It was Lenore,” she said.

“Lenore?” Dina pretended to shudder, then whistled between her teeth. “Tough competition. Where did Harrison fit in?”

“Harrison was temporarily out of the picture.”

“Don’t tell me: he realized that he’d been an idiot and rushed down to Mexico to win her back.”

A tiny smile crept across Kathy’s face. “That’s exactly what happened.”

“Men,” Dina declared, “are absolute fools.”

We’re all fools, Kathy thought bitterly. Why did I ever get involved with a man like Richard Kurtz, anyway? Richard was fun to be with. He took her to the best shows and restaurants in town. He was the soul of consideration. When she discussed her work and her classes and her friends with Richard, he listened. He seemed interested. He responded appropriately. But she always had the feeling that somewhere deep inside, he was remote from the concerns that were most important to Kathy Roselli. Richard Kurtz was like a juggernaut, going along on his merry way, oblivious to the rest of humanity.

“Yeah,” Kathy said. “You said it.”

“What is this, for crying out loud: The Father of the Bride?”

Tears glinted at the corners of Denise’s eyes and she stamped her foot in helpless anger. “Daddy...”

“What? What did I say?” He threw his hands up and looked beseechingly at his wife. “Is it a mistake to think that thirty thousand bucks might be a little too much to spend on a party? Jesus Christ!”

Betty Barent looked back and forth between her husband and her daughter. “You go and get ready for Paul,” she told Denise. Then she smiled narrowly at her husband. “You and I will discuss things after dinner.”

“But Mother—”

Betty held up a finger. “Don’t worry about it. Go out and have a nice time. You hear what I’m saying?”

Denise looked at her father doubtfully, then shook her head and trudged upstairs.

“Don’t tell me,” Barent said. “You’re taking her side, aren’t you?”

Betty was ironing. She held up a shirt, an oxford with narrow blue and white stripes and a solid white collar. “You like this shirt?”

“It’s fine. Don’t change the subject.”

“Subject? What subject?” She took a spray bottle and moistened a pair of pants. “If you mean our daughter’s wedding, I already said we’ll talk about it after dinner, and that’s the last word I’m going to say on that subject.” She fixed him beneath an imperious gaze. “You understand?” Barent stared at her, his breath coming quicker, then he caught himself.

“Fine,” he said gruffly. “Just fine.”

“You always get like this when you’ve got a tough case. How many times do I have to tell you, don’t bring your work home from the office? It’s not good for the family. Frankly, I blame Harry Moran for all this. He’s been working with you long enough, he should be able to catch one little murderer by himself. Goodness knows, he’s had enough practice.”

Barent’s brow wrinkled. He stared at her. She ignored him. “I’m going to have a drink,” he announced.

“Good,” Betty said. “Make me one too. A scotch on the rocks.” She finished with the oxford shirt, picked up another. “On second thought,” she added. “Make mine a double.”

“So then she says, ‘This is Denise’s wedding and she’s going to have the sort of wedding that she wants. Just remember, after she’s married, she’s not going to be your little girl anymore. She’s going to be Mrs. Paul Janus. Denise Barent was stuck with you. Denise Janus won’t be. You’re smart, you’ll give her the sort of wedding she won’t have to resent—that is, if you want her to ever come home for the holidays and maybe bring the grandchildren along too.’”

Moran rolled his eyes and shuddered. “Oh, man, I can see it now. My little girl’s only seven but it’s inevitable.”

Barent rolled a cigar in the fingers of his right hand and stared down at it moodily while rubbing his temple with the left. “My God, what a headache I have. Mrs. Paul Janus...” He winced. Barent had suffered from headaches for as long as he could remember. He had asked a doctor about them once. The doctor had said they might be migraine but were more likely to be caused by tension. He had suggested aspirin and a different line of work.

“It’s going to be a Church wedding...” Barent added.

Moran looked at him and nodded sympathetically. Barent had grown up in a non-religious household. He had converted to Catholicism when he married Betty because it was important to her. Barent himself could not have cared less. But ever since Benjamin’s death, Barent had refused to step foot inside a Church. He had developed a conviction that God was not to be trusted.

Moran drove along silently while Barent stared out the window, shaking his head every once in a while, feeling sorry for himself.

Finally, Moran said, “This investigation has gotten all screwed up, you know?”

“Yeah,” Barent shook his head one last time and dragged his mind back into the present. “It’s definitely ass backwards. We should have made these calls the day after the murder. That’s what happens when you jump to conclusions.”

They pulled to a stop in front of a small enclave of four identical brownstones set in a cul-de-sac, each facing outward in a different direction. Presumably the houses had been constructed long ago with the intent that they would form their own little neighborhood; they had the same brick facing, the same verdigris on the roof, the same six stone steps leading up to the front porch. All four houses were surrounded by a red brick wall and arranged around a communal backyard. Old mercury vapor lamps on bronzed fixtures were attached to their sides, arching out over the street. It was only four P.M. but the sky was growing dark and the street lights were already on, throwing a faint blue light.

Sharon Lee had lived here for five years before her death. Moran pulled the car to a stop by a hydrant and they walked up the front steps. The lobby was tiny; there was a gray metal door, two mail slots in the wall and a staircase leading up to the second and third floors, both of which Sharon Lee had rented. The downstairs neighbor, according to the lease, was named Mario Gilbert. All the landlord had known about him was that he paid his rent on time.

Barent rang the doorbell. There was no answer. Moran looked at him and shrugged and Barent rang again.

“Just a moment,” a muffled voice said.

The door opened. A young man, slim, with soft brown eyes and light brown hair cut short along the sides and long in the back stood blinking at them. “Yes?” he said.

“Are you Mario Gilbert?”

“No. Mario is at rehearsals. Can I help you?”

Barent and Moran exchanged glances. “Who are you?” Barent asked.

The young man’s brows rose. “Well, I could ask you the same thing.” Then he shrugged. “I’m Ronald Evans, Mario’s roommate.”

“The landlord didn’t tell me about you,” Barent said.

Ronald Evans grinned. “That’s because I don’t pay rent.”

“Oh,” Barent said.

Ronald Evans folded his arms across his chest and tapped his foot while he waited. He seemed content to tap and wait all day.

“Have you lived here long?” Barent asked.

“Why,” asked Ronald Evans, “do you want to know?”

Barent pulled out his wallet and flashed his badge. “I’m Detective Barent. This is Detective Moran. We’re interested in finding out anything we can about Dr. Sharon Lee.”

“What took you so long? She’s been dead for three weeks.”

“We were working on the information that we already had,” Barent said.

“Huh.” Ronald Evans gave a little snort. “Sounds like a fuck up to me.”

“Look, can we come in and talk?” Barent asked.

“Sure, sugar pie,” Evans said. He stepped aside and swept his arm down from his shoulder, beckoning them inside. “Come right in.”

The living room was furnished like a Nineteenth Century salon, with antique, cherry wood stands and plush couches with deep cushions, a style that had always reminded Barent of a Nineteenth Century whorehouse. “Sit down,” Ronald Evans said. He looked at Moran and smiled like a bird that has its eye on a particularly luscious worm. He sat on a couch covered with a floral print and patted the seat. “Why don’t you sit by me, Sugar?”

Moran sat in one of the chairs, his face expressionless. “Could you tell us about Sharon Lee?” Barent asked.

“Well, she wasn’t the friendliest person on Earth, that’s for sure,” Ronald Evans said.

“How so?”

“She had the nerve to call me macho, just because I told her to keep her hands off my property. Can you believe that?” He blinked at them.

“Are you by any chance speaking of Mario Gilbert?”

“Yes.” Ronald Evans’ hands began to tremble. His lips drew down in a thin quivering line and he seemed for a moment to be on the verge of tears. Then a sardonic smile crept across his face and he said in a normal tone of voice, "Though why he would be interested in a smelly old thing like her, I'm sure I don't know."

Moran stared at the ceiling, then the walls. He stifled a yawn behind a closed fist.

Barent plowed ahead. "Are you saying that Sharon Lee and Mario Gilbert were sexually involved?"

"Well, involved is probably too strong a word. Mario did seem intrigued, but when I reminded him that AIDS is most commonly transmitted through heterosexual sex, he thought better of the notion."

"I see." Barent rubbed at the bridge of his nose. His headache, which had receded for a little while, was returning with a vengeance. "So far as you know, was Sharon Lee involved with anybody at the time of her death?"

"You do like that word, don't you? Involved." He shrugged. "I couldn't tell you if she treated them all the same once the lights were out but I can tell you that she spent time with a lot of different men."

"Did you know any of these men?"

Evans shook his head. "No."

"Would you recognize any of them if you saw them again?"

"Maybe. A few days before she died, I saw her outside with somebody. He was big, with dark hair. I might recognize him."

"Did you ever hear fights or arguments coming from her apartment?"

"No." Ronald Evans shook his head decisively. "Never."

Barent looked once more around the apartment, then his eyes came back to Ronald Evans' face. "What is it that you do for a living?"

Ronald Evans' eyes fluttered. "I'm an actor."

Barent grunted. "I would never have guessed."

“SO WHERE ARE YOU GOING after radiology?” Nolan asked.

“Obstetrics,” Liebert said.

“Give me a clamp,” Nolan said. The scrub nurse handed him a clamp and he closed the jaws on a small bleeder. Franklin touched the electro-cautery to the clamp and the bleeder sizzled.

“I liked O.B.,” Nolan said. “I almost went into it.”

The patient was a fifty-seven year old with diverticulosis. They were removing the sigmoid colon. Aside from a few adhesions, which tended to bleed when they were lysed, everything was going smoothly. Kurtz held a retractor and let Nolan do the case. One thing about Nolan, he loved to talk. Kurtz himself didn’t say very much during a case. Talking broke his concentration, but Nolan’s hands moved with smooth assurance at almost the same speed as his mouth.

“Only problem was, I could never tell where the baby’s head was at. I’d stick my hand in there, call out ‘plus one, plus two’ as if I knew what I was talking about, but it was only a guess. Funny thing though, I was almost always right. Unless everybody was faking it, which I suppose is possible. Still, it didn’t seem too smart to go into O.B. if I couldn’t tell how far down the baby’s head was at. You know what I mean?”

“I guess so,” Liebert said.

“You guess so...” Nolan snorted. “You ever deliver a baby?”

“Not yet.”

“You will. Your first time, they’ll stick you in front of some nice lady who doesn’t speak English and is having her seventh kid. You won’t have to do anything but catch it when it pops out. Just make sure you don’t drop it.”

Liebert looked at him with wide eyes and gulped.

“Pretty nurses up there too. They like medical students. You don’t have a girlfriend, do you?”

“Not now,” Liebert said, his ears perking up.

“Tie,” Nolan said. The scrub nurse handed him a piece of suture and he tied it twice around a small artery. Franklin cut between the ties.

“Ask out Alice McMahon,” Franklin said. “Alice has made whole generations of medical students happy.”

Nolan guffawed. “Alice McMahon? A little old, isn’t she?”

“She’s experienced,” said Franklin. “Experience counts.”

“A little plump, too.”

Franklin gave him a hurt look.

“There’s a real cute one up there,” Nolan said, “I forget her name. Peggy something. Try her.”

“Ryan,” Franklin said. His voice was frigid. “Peggy Ryan. She’s married.”

“Yeah?” Nolan cut through a segment of omentum, picked up a scalpel and extended the incision further into the pelvis. “I heard she got divorced.”

Kurtz cleared his throat. Nolan looked at him quickly and seemed to get the message. “Anyway,” Nolan said. “You’ll like O.B.”

“I doubt it,” Liebert said gloomily. “O.B. is even grosser than surgery.”

The scrub nurse, Kurtz noted, seemed a little stiff. The last thing Nolan needed was to get himself reported for sexual harassment. Maybe after the case, he should have a little talk with Nolan. It probably wouldn't do any good, though. He glanced at the clock. They should be out of here in an hour. Then he could finish up that list of names on the computer.

"Why are we doing this?" Moran asked.

Barent looked at him, stuck an unlit cigar in his mouth and chewed on it. "Stir the pot. See what comes to the top."

"But what's the point?"

"I don't know," Barent said. He removed the cigar, frowned at it and dropped it in the wastebasket. "I just know we're not getting anywhere fast. Frankly, I don't understand this case. I don't understand how things tie together. Too many things have happened that don't seem to have anything to do with each other."

"Maybe because they don't," Moran said. Barent morosely nodded.

"Excuse me, Mr. Korda," Moran said in a mincing voice. "We're policemen and we're investigating a murder that we think you might have had something to do with and other than that we don't have a clue. You mind helping us out here, maybe give us a confession and save us the trouble?" Moran shook his head. "Take it from me. We're wasting our time."

"Maybe we are," Barent said. "And maybe we aren't. And maybe he'll let something slip."

Moran snorted through his teeth.

"Okay, so probably he won't. So look at it this way: maybe it'll be fun."

Moran shrugged.

Tony Korda ate lunch most days at a place on the East Side called the Bangkok House, one of the city's best Thai restaurants. Barent himself was not a great fan of chili peppers, regarding people who ate food that was designed to hurt them as being slightly crazy. Tony Korda was reputed to love the stuff.

Korda was spooning a bowl of soup into his mouth as Barent and Moran walked up. Five men sitting at adjacent tables looked at them with open suspicion as they approached. Barent had never met Tony Korda, but he was easy to recognize. One side of his face was covered in pink scar tissue. The fingers of the hand that held the soup spoon lacked fingernails and were shorter than they should have been.

Barent smiled politely. "Mr. Korda?"

Korda looked up. "Cops," he said with disgust. His voice was thick and grating, as if a membrane covered his vocal cords. Korda shook his head. "Always cops. I'm eating. This can't wait until I'm finished with my lunch?"

"Sorry," Barent said. "We're in a hurry."

"Always in a hurry." Korda put down his spoon and looked at them. "You think you're tough guys, don't you? You come in here, disturb my lunch, you're not in a hurry. You just want to show me that you're tough guys." Korda picked up a snowy white napkin and patted his lips. "There are laws against police harassment. I got enough lawyers on the payroll, they tell me these things. What do you want?"

"Herman Delgado," Barent said. "Jaime Ruiz and Sharon Lee."

"I don't know any Sharon Lee," Korda said.

"How about the other two?"

"I know Ruiz. Delgado?" Korda shrugged.

"How about Oliver Thomas," Barent said.

Korda blinked at him. A thin smile spread across his face. "Who?"

“Oliver Thomas runs a bank. His son was assaulted the night before last by two men named Jimmy Raines and Charlie Flanagan. They told the son to tell Oliver Thomas that ‘he would be next.’ Does this mean anything to you?”

Korda stared at them. A waiter in a white jacket put a plate holding four small pastries and a bottle of Singha beer down in front of him and walked off without uttering a word. Korda’s eyes flicked to the pastries, back up to Barent’s face. “You like Thai food?” he asked.

“Not really,” Barent replied. Korda looked at Moran. “You?”

Moran shrugged.

“I was caught in a fire when I was just a kid,” Korda said. “My lungs and the inside of my mouth got burned. These things are called curry puffs. They’re supposed to be hot.” Korda smiled. “I can barely taste them. They make my lips tingle, but that’s about all.

“You want to try some?”

“No, thanks,” Barent said.

Korda grunted and began to eat.

“So you don’t know Oliver Thomas?” Barent asked.

“Never heard of him,” Korda said. “If I ever do hear of him, I’ll give you a call. Right?”

“Yeah,” Barent said. “That’s right.”

“You got any more questions?”

“Not at this time.”

“Then you mind letting me get back to my lunch?”

“Sure. Have a nice day.” Korda grunted.

Barent rose to his feet and Moran followed him out the door. “You enjoy that?” Moran asked.

Barent looked at him. “Shut up,” he said.

“That’s what I thought.”

The pick up order on Jimmy Raines had so far resulted in nothing. Raines’ last listed address housed an insurance agent and his family.

“Raines?” The insurance agent scratched his head. “I don’t know any Raines.

“Honey, come on out here?”

A plump woman wearing an apron and a harried expression came out of the kitchen. A four-year-old child was clinging to her leg and howling. “What was the name of the guy we rented the apartment from?”

“It was a year ago. Who remembers? It was some realtor.” The woman reached down, picked up the four-year-old and held him against her ample breast. She trudged back into the kitchen.

“Yeah, she’s right. Of course it was. Yeah, how could I be so stupid?” He hit himself in the forehead with the flat of his hand. “It wasn’t even a guy. It was a woman. Raines?” He shook his head. “Never heard of him.”

“Who was the realtor?” Moran asked.

“Let me see now...” The insurance agent walked over to a bureau in the living room and began to rummage through the drawers. “Here it is.” He held up a card, then handed it to Barent.

“Highland Estates Realty,” Barent read. “Joan Gray, Licensed Realtor.”

“That’s the one.”

Barent handed him back the card. “Thanks.”

Joan Gray wore a pink polyester pants suit over a white, frilly blouse. Her hair was short, blonde and curly. A sincere smile seemed pasted to her round, pink face. Her skin was flawlessly smooth. She reminded Barent of a younger Shelley Winters. “Why, yes,” she said. “I remember him very well.” She smiled down at the picture of Jimmy Raines. “I rented him the apartment.” She opened a ledger book and flipped the pages. “Here. It was nearly three years ago. It was a two year lease. He didn’t renew it.”

“Do you have a forwarding address?”

“No, I’m afraid we don’t.”

“Is there anything you can tell us about him, anything that you remember?”

A quick frown briefly marred the smooth perfection of Joan Gray’s skin. “He was rather loud, and he wore a black hat. I remember that particularly, because it was summer and the hat didn’t fit the season.”

“Nothing else?”

“Sorry.” She shook her head. “No.”

The drive back to the station was silent. Barent was in a bad mood. He hated this part of the job, driving all over town to talk to people who rarely had anything useful to say. For awhile, after he had been promoted to Detective First Grade, he had let the younger men go out into the field and interview witnesses. He had found, however, that he needed to see people’s faces and listen to their voices to be effective. So much of the job was talking to people, trying to figure out when they were lying and when they were sincere. He couldn’t picture them in his mind if all he had to go on was somebody else’s dry summary.

“Put out an all points,” Barent finally said. “We’ve had nothing but bad luck and dead ends with this investigation. I’m tired of it. I want Jimmy Raines.”

Moran looked at him with his flat, gray eyes and nodded. “Raines is from Woodmere, on Long Island,” Barent said.

“I’ll give them a call,” Moran said. He shrugged. “Maybe he went home to lie low.”

Nice place, Barent thought. When he had been here the other night, he hadn’t really looked at the decor. It was open and airy, dark blue carpet on the floor, soft, orange vinyl chairs lined up in neat rows, a pastel abstract painting that was probably supposed to look cheery hanging on the wall. Piles of magazines sat on low tables between the chairs. A fat little man was reading a newspaper—The Times. He held it open, struggling to keep the edges from folding down out of sight. A young woman was turning the pages of Vogue, barely glancing at them. She seemed to have difficulty concentrating. She kept looking at her watch. A white formica counter set up beneath a window took up one corner of the room. Behind the counter, a thin woman with iron gray hair and a straight back looked up. The nametag pinned to her blouse said, Rose Schapiro. “Can I help you?” she asked.

Barent leaned forward. “I’m Detective Barent,” he said in a low voice. “I was wondering if Doctor Kurtz could spare me a few minutes of his time.”

Mrs. Schapiro’s brow creased. “We’re very busy,” she said. “Doctor Kurtz is already running late. Could Doctor Ornella help you?”

“I’m sorry, it’s Doctor Kurtz that I need to speak with. If he could, it won’t take long.”

“Wait a moment.” Mrs. Schapiro rose to her feet and vanished down the corridor. She came back in a few seconds and said, “Come with me.” She conducted him into Kurtz’ office. “He’ll be with you in a few minutes. Please sit down.”

“Thank you,” Barent said.

Mrs. Schapiro vanished. Barent sat down in a chair opposite the desk and waited. It was more than a few minutes, but finally Kurtz came in.

“Barent,” he said. “What can I do for you?”

Barent removed a manila folder from his briefcase. “This arrived yesterday afternoon from the insurance company. I can’t make heads or tails out of it. It’s the list of Sharon Lee’s malpractice claims.”

“What’s the problem?”

“I don’t understand it. What is ‘failure to detect amniotic fluid embolus’ supposed to mean? And here’s another: ‘failure to monitor for the presence of placenta accreta.’ I figured you could help me with this. You got any thoughts regarding ‘placenta accreta?’”

Kurtz grimaced. “Sure. Let me see.”

Barent handed him the list. Kurtz scanned it rapidly, holding the sheaf of papers by the edge as if afraid he might soil his fingers, shaking his head and swearing to himself under his breath.

Barent ventured an opinion: “Doctor Lee seems to have gotten herself involved in a lot of difficult cases.”

“Are you kidding?” Kurtz snorted in disgust. “Medicine has risks. So does surgery. Having a baby is supposed to be a happy occasion but a lot of things can go wrong. An obstetrician in New York City pays over a hundred thousand a year for malpractice insurance, and this crap is the reason why.”

“A hundred thousand?” That’s a lot of babies, Barent thought.

“This first one,” Kurtz said, “amniotic fluid embolus. Sometimes during labor, some of the amniotic fluid—that’s the liquid the infant swims in while still in the womb—gets squeezed into the mother’s blood. It goes to her lungs. It can cause hypotension, difficulty breathing and even cardiac arrest. It can be fatal. But there’s no way to prevent it and no way to detect it until it happens, and it’s nobody’s fault. The patient was successfully resuscitated and she did just fine.

“This other one: placenta accreta. That’s when the placenta grows into the uterus. Sometimes they bleed during pregnancy, but just as often everything is completely normal until after the baby is out and then you have to do an emergency hysterectomy or they bleed to death. Again, there’s no way to prevent it and usually no way to detect it beforehand. Now this patient, it was her first kid. She wanted more kids and she’s pissed off but what she doesn’t understand—or doesn’t want to admit—is, first, Sharon Lee saved her life, and second, her beef is with God, not the medical profession.” Kurtz shook his head. “Or what’s just as likely is that everybody understands it just fine but her husband or her mother or her lawyer think they can gouge a few bucks out of the system. “The third one—that’s the one I was telling you about: the viral syndrome? Again, no way to prevent it. No way to detect it. The family doesn’t want to accept that, they sue.”

Kurtz shrugged and handed the folder back across the desk to Barent. Barent took it grudgingly and said, “Alright, thanks.” He had hoped there would be more in it. “We’ll see what we can do. Have you had any luck with that list of names we gave you?”

“I’ve finished. No luck at all. None of them have ever been treated at Easton.”

“Too bad,” Barent said. He gazed off into space for a moment, thinking. “Thanks again for your time,” he said. He tucked the file of malpractice claims back in his briefcase and rose to his feet. “We’ll get right on it, such as it is.”

The patient with the amniotic fluid embolus had survived without sequelae and made a complete recovery. She had had one other child a year later, and had moved to Texas when her husband’s business relocated. A notice of intent to sue had been filed with the court but the actual suit had never been brought.

The lady with placenta accreta was named Lily Schultz. She had also made an uneventful recovery after the emergency hysterectomy that saved her life. She and her husband had adopted a second infant and moved to California. The lawsuit they had filed was still pending. Barent called the plaintiff's attorney, a man named Jonas Morley.

"Hey, I advised against it, but the family insisted. I had a choice of taking on the case or seeing it go elsewhere. I figure we'll settle for a nominal sum." Barent could almost hear Jonas Morley shake his head. "It's too bad about the murder. You lose a lot of sympathy for your client when something like that happens."

"Yeah," Barent said, "it must be tough to lose a case that way."

"You being funny?" Morley said.

"Not at all. What do the Schultzes do?"

"You mean their jobs?"

"Yes."

"They're both schoolteachers. She's First Grade. He does High School Chemistry."

"They're still in California?" Barent asked.

"Sure. Sun and fun. Why would they come back here?"

"No reason I know."

"You bet. Anything else I can do for you?"

"No," Barent said. "Thanks."

The third one looked more promising. The suit had been filed by a couple named Carmen and Emilio Gonzaga, who lived in a poor section of Brooklyn. The suit had fought its way through the courts, neither side willing to settle, and the Gonzagas had lost.

The infant, a boy, though barely able to move his arms and legs, had survived until after his second birthday. He had been brought into the Emergency Room at Long Island Jewish with a fractured skull, and had died. Child abuse charges had been filed against Emilio Gonzaga but were dismissed for lack of evidence.

Transcripts of the trial were requested and arrived the next day. Barent reviewed them quickly, hesitated, blinked, and looked again. A slow smile spread across his face.

"Something?" Moran asked.

"Take a look. The wife's testimony, where she states her full name." He passed the sheet of paper to Moran.

Moran whistled. "Carmen Rivera Gonzaga..."

Emilio Gonzaga worked as a laborer at a warehouse. Barent and Moran went out to see him the next day. The warehouse floor was a huge, enclosed space, with row upon row of metal shelving piled all the way up to the ceiling. The walls were corrugated aluminum. Men in hardhats, bales and bundles in their arms, scurried in and out of the building, while cranes lifted packages back and forth from the shelves. A tall man with a barrel belly came up to them. He carried a clipboard and wore a yellow hardhat tilted back on his head. "Can I help you folks?"

"Are you the foreman?"

"That's me."

"We're looking for a guy named Emilio Gonzaga. We understand that he works here."

The foreman gave them a doubtful look. "You police?"

"Yeah."

The foreman nodded. "You look like police. Gonzaga in trouble?"

"We just want to talk to him."

The foreman glanced down at his clipboard. "Come with me." They followed him to a far corner of the warehouse where a group of men ferried bales of foam insulation onto a flat truck. "Wait a second. I'll get him."

The foreman walked over to a thin man wearing jeans and a tight green tee shirt. He had a lean face covered with old acne scars and a pack of cigarettes rolled up in one sleeve. As the foreman spoke to him, he looked over toward Barent and Moran and shrugged. Then he nodded and walked up to them and silently waited.

"Are you Emilio Gonzaga?" Barent asked.

"Si."

"You ever hear of a doctor named Sharon Lee?"

"Lee?" Gonzaga frowned and said softly. "What for you ask me that?"

"Please answer the question."

Gonzaga shrugged. "Sure I know her. I hate that bitch. She killed my son. You here because she's dead?"

Barent frowned at Moran. "How did you know she was dead?"

"You kidding? I read it in the newspapers. You think I can't read?"

"Did you happen to read how she died?"

"The papers say some nut job strangle her. That's good. She deserve it."

"Sharon Lee was strangled on the night of December Twenty-Second. Where were you that night?"

"December Twenty-Second? Who remembers?"

"Try," Barent said.

Gonzaga's face screwed up in thought. "I played cards with two friends. Then I go to bed."

"Until what time did you play cards?"

"I'm not sure. Maybe midnight. Maybe a little earlier."

"Who were the friends?"

"Roberto Santana. Tomas Vasquez."

"They work here?"

"Santana does. Tomas a friend from the neighborhood."

"Was your wife at home that night?"

Gonzaga looked annoyed. "Of course she at home. Where else my wife gonna be?"

"Do you know a man named Tony Korda?" Barent asked.

Gonzaga shook his head. "No."

"Jaime Ruiz?"

Gonzaga reached up slowly, unrolled the pack of cigarettes from his sleeve, tapped one out and lit it. Smoke dribbled out of his nose and spread around his face like fog. "No," he said. "I don't know no Jaime Ruiz."

"How about Herman Delgado?"

Gonzaga frowned. "No."

"Carlos Rivera?"

Gonzaga gave him a slow, suspicious look. "Carlos Rivera my wife's brother."

"Do you know where he is? We've been trying to find him."

"What for?"

"Please answer the question."

Gonzaga shook his head. "Carlos leave home maybe a year ago. He say he going to Florida. We not hear from him since."

“I see,” Barent said. He nodded and scribbled something in his notebook. “Now,” he said. “Where were you on the night of December Twenty-Eighth?”

Gonzaga stared at him. “I don’t know,” he said. “I don’t remember.”

“You remembered where you were on the Twenty-Second. Why can’t you remember where you were on the Twenty-Eighth?”

Gonzaga shrugged. “Some things you remember. Some things you don’t remember. It’s not a crime to not remember.”

Barent smiled at him gently. “That’s certainly true. Thank you for your time.” He turned to Moran. “Come on.”

As they walked off, Barent could see Gonzaga smoking his cigarette, his hands in his pockets, staring after them. “What do you think?” Barent asked.

“I think you’re both right,” Moran said. “It’s not a crime to not remember.”

“Have someone talk with Santana and Vasquez,” Barent said. “See if they confirm his story. Some things aren’t crimes.” He settled his glasses more firmly on the bridge of his nose and smiled thinly. “Some things are.”

“HARRY, HOW YOU DOING?”

“Fine, Lieutenant. Just fine.” Moran shook hands and sat down. He grinned. “You look busy.”

“Yeah.” The other man glanced at the pile of paper sitting on his desk and gave Moran a crooked smile. “So what’s up?”

Ed Lipsky worked out of a precinct on the Lower East Side. Moran had briefly worked under him after graduating from the Academy but had soon moved uptown, where he had remained ever since. Lipsky was burly, not quite fat since a lot of his bulk was muscle, with a broad red face and a crooked nose. His hair, salt and pepper when Moran had known him, had since turned entirely white. “The record says you were the last one to bust Jimmy Raines.”

Lipsky nodded. “Sure. I remember Raines. A real dirt bag.”

“I was wondering if you might tell me a little bit about him: friends, habits, anything that might prove useful.”

Lipsky shrugged. “Raines...” He leaned back in his seat and folded his hands above his ample stomach. “He pays a lot of attention to his clothes, wears a suit and tie, thinks that makes him better than the other dirt bags.”

Moran nodded. “Go on.”

“He’s a crazy fucker, likes to think of himself as a sophisticated hit man. He uses twenty-two caliber softpoints. The bullet mushrooms, stays inside the target and rattles around. Innocent bystanders don’t get hurt.”

“Makes a big hole in the victim,” Moran observed.

“They’re supposed to.”

“I seem to recall a James Bond character like that.”

“Scaramanga. The Man with the Golden Gun.”

“You think Raines has seen it?”

Lipsky shrugged.

“Anything else?”

“Jimmy had a girlfriend named Linda Angel, a stripper at the Flamingo Club in Queens. Her real name is Sophie Glass but Linda Angel sounds better, you know what I mean?”

“Sure. Go on.”

Lipsky frowned, thinking about it. “His mother lives on the Island someplace.”

“Woodmere.”

“That’s right.”

“We’re already looking into it. Anything else?”

“No.” Lipsky shook his head. “That’s about it.”

“Alright, Lieutenant. Thanks.”

“Lipsky chuckled. “You catch Raines, you tell him hello for me.”

“We’ll do that.”

Jimmy Raines stood on the corner of Bank Street and Seventh Avenue and watched the traffic go by.

Jimmy Raines had been busy. Jimmy did indeed think of himself as better than the other dirt bags. Jimmy was a professional. He didn’t do it for the money, though the money was just fine, thank you.

He did it because he loved it. Jimmy had long ago figured something out about himself—he liked to hurt people. Even more, he liked to exert power over them, shock them out of their middle class complacency, show them the error of their ways. The real world, Jimmy figured, was composed of only two types of people: lambs and tigers. Jimmy was one of the tigers. The lambs, they got up in the morning, ate breakfast, went to work, got home in the evening, had dinner, maybe watched a little T.V. They thought they were safe. Oh, most of them had an intellectual knowledge that violent crime was a fact of everyday existence in New York City, but every one of them thought it couldn't happen to them, not if they stuck to well lit streets and avoided bad neighborhoods. They didn't realize that a jungle was lurking just outside their door. Jimmy got a real kick out of showing them they were wrong.

The other night, that guy Kurtz... Jimmy had been pretty shaken up by the way things had turned out. Kurtz was a lamb. The lambs were not supposed to grow teeth. Kurtz probably thought he was hot stuff, but he wasn't. Charlie had grown careless and Kurtz had gotten lucky. Professional pride—and a prudent reluctance to leave witnesses—impelled him to show Kurtz the nature of his mistake.

Jimmy had been following Kurtz for two full days, biding his time, planning his strategy. It wasn't enough to simply bump the guy off. You had to bump him off in a way that would make him realize just how stupid and insignificant and hopeless his position in life really was. He had to understand that he was a lamb and Jimmy Raines was a tiger.

Jennifer Levy came streaking out of her bedroom, pinning her hair back as she ran. "Gotta go," she said. "I'll be late." Kathy, who had never been a morning person, sat at the kitchen table with a cup of coffee and the paper and stared at her, bemused and vaguely revolted by such a display of energy before eight A.M. Jennifer was teaching a class on 'Woodrow Wilson and the Origins of the Great War.' Jennifer was always in a hurry and always on the verge of being late. The door opened. The door slammed.

Kathy drew a slow, silent sigh. Blessed quiet. She finished her coffee and slowly ate a cheese omelet and some home fries and by the time she had finished, she felt more human. The amount of fat in a meal like this was ridiculous. Kathy knew it but every once in a while she indulged herself. Ever since the events of the other night, Kathy had felt skittish, sleeping poorly, waking up every couple of hours from bad dreams that she could not quite remember. She took the dishes over to the sink, rinsed them off and placed them in the dishwasher, then went into the bedroom to shower.

An hour later, dressed and alert, she opened the door.

A big man smiled at her. A gun pointed at her face. She stared at it, seeing nothing but the small black hole in the middle of the barrel. She started to say something—she hardly knew what.

"If you scream, I'll kill you," the man said. "Shut your mouth and go back inside."

She shut it.

"Very good," the man said. "We don't want any trouble, now do we?"

"Beautiful girl," Nolan said.

"Yeah." Kurtz nodded. Her name was Cary Schneider. She was twenty-seven, an aerobics instructor. She had first noticed the lump in her breast while examining herself in the shower. At first she had dismissed it. Twenty-seven was much too young. It couldn't be, not her, but the lump refused to go away and after a few months of feeling it, Cary Schneider made an appointment to see Kurtz and now here she was, about to undergo a mastectomy for breast cancer. Kurtz was glad she was finally asleep. She had seemed in a good mood, resigned to the surgery, already talking about the reconstruction that would follow. She had laughed and told a stupid joke in the holding area, something about a duck with one wing, while the anesthesia resident put the I.V. in and then, all of a sudden, she burst out crying. The men had looked at each other helplessly. Kurtz said, "I'm sorry, Miss Schneider.” It was all he could think of to say. He thought about taking her hand or patting her on the shoulder but it seemed somehow inappropriate. Luckily, one of the nurses saw what was happening and bustled over. The nurse didn’t say anything aside from the usual platitudes, but maybe the fact that it was coming from a woman helped. Cary Schneider’s sobs turned to quiet sniffles and then they wheeled her inside and put her off to sleep.

Kurtz picked up the scalpel and made the incision and soon the beautiful, quivering breast was lying grotesquely alone in a bucket.

“The lesion here is small,” Kurtz said. “If you can leave the underlying musculature and not take the lymph nodes then the later reconstruction looks pretty good.”

Liebert nodded while he held the retractor.

The O.R. door opened. A nurse poked her head in. “Doctor Kurtz, there’s a phone call for you.”

“Could you please take a message?” Kurtz said. “I’m busy.”

“She says it’s important.”

She? Kurtz looked at the nurse, then frowned at the wound. The edges were dry, the flaps already sewn. “Okay, Steve,” he said to Nolan. “Let me go get it.”

Nolan nodded. “No problem. I’ll just finish closing.”

Kurtz stripped off his gown and gloves and then went out to the Nursing Station. One phone was off the hook, waiting for him.

He grabbed a cab outside the hospital and gave the cabbie the address. “And hurry it up,” he said.

The cabbie looked at him with bored eyes. “Sure, whatever you say.” The cab went infinitesimally faster. Kurtz stared out the window, seething, ticking off the streets in his mind as they crawled by.

“He hurt me,” she had whispered. “He hurt me.” Her voice had been almost incoherent, on the verge of hysteria.

“Call the police,” Kurtz said. “I’ll be there as soon as I can.”

Fifteen minutes later, the cab pulled up in front of Kathy’s apartment. He paid the tab, ran up the stairs and knocked.

The door opened. A fat man stood on the other side, smiling, wearing a black suit and tie, holding a gun. “Come in,” the man said. He backed away, keeping the gun pointed at Kurtz’ face. “Come in slowly. Close the door.”

Standing by the couch, Kathy was quietly sobbing. Her face was puffy, a purple bruise beginning to form under her eye.

“Jimmy Raines,” Kurtz said.

The man frowned. “You know me,” he said. “That’s too bad.”

“So do the police. I’ve already identified you.”

Raines shrugged. “It means nothing if you’re not there to say it in Court.” Raines shook his head. “The other night,” he said, “you shouldn’t have done that. It wasn’t smart. We would have beat up Thomas, delivered the message, you would never have seen either of us again. But no, you had to get cute. You had to think you were a tiger, when all you really were, was a lamb.” Raines looked honestly regretful.

Kurtz backed away one step. “You always use that gun?” he asked. “Yeah. What of it?”

“Ruger twenty-two. I’m pretty good with a handgun.” Kurtz smiled thinly. He felt his heart beating, felt the air moving slowly in and out of his lungs. “Anybody ever tell you that you look stupid in that hat?”

Raines frowned. He blinked his eyes and looked momentarily hurt.

“Twenty-two caliber long rifle shells will go through an inch and a half of pine,” Kurtz said. “Softpoints, maybe an inch or a little less. Which do you use?”

Raines mouth twitched. “Softpoints. People aren’t pine.”

Kurtz shrugged. “Whatever, a moving target is hard to hit,” he said. “And you’ve got to hit two of us. How good are you?”

Raines sighed, shrugged and raised the gun. Kurtz jumped.

Kathy screamed and the gun jerked, just for an instant. Kurtz had not jumped toward Raines. Curling himself into a tight ball, he rolled beneath the kitchen table. He came up carrying it in front of him like a shield and charged toward Raines.

Raines fired. The bullets hit the table and mushroomed. Lead fragments and chips of wood flew in all directions. Kurtz grunted in pain and kept coming.

Screaming, Kathy picked up a lamp and hurled it, then she threw herself to the floor and huddled behind the couch. The lamp hit Raines in the shoulder and his aim momentarily wavered.

Kurtz slammed the table into Raines’ gut. Raines fell heavily onto his back and the gun went flying. Kurtz fell next to him, still clutching the table. Eyes glaring, lips pulled back in a snarl, Raines staggered up and jumped for the gun but Kurtz grabbed him by the ankle and Raines fell across his chest. Raines kicked out with both feet while Kurtz desperately held on to one leg. Kurtz groaned and felt his fingers begin to slip but managed to bring his other arm up, got hold of the bottom of Raines’ pants and pulled him back. Raines turned toward him and they grappled, rolling over and over until they crashed into the wall. Kurtz struck out with the heel of his hand, snapping Raines’ head to the side, but Kurtz’ right shoulder was numb and the blow lacked force. Raines brought his knee up into Kurtz’ abdomen and Kurtz felt his grip give way. Both men wobbled to their feet, Kurtz gasping, Raines’ eyes fixed on the gun lying on the other side of the room.

“Come on,” Kurtz said. “Try it.” Oh, sure, try it. Kurtz’ head spun. He put a cold smile on his face, raised his hands in a karate stance and willed them not to tremble. He tried to look mean. It must have worked. Raines stared, hesitated, said, “Shit” in a disgusted voice, then turned and ran out the door.

Kurtz breathed a long sigh in the sudden stillness. He blinked down at the front of his shirt. The bullets had shattered against the wooden table. The table was peppered with deep gouges and small holes where fragments of lead had gone through. One fragment had lodged in Kurtz’ right arm, another in his shoulder. The right side of his shirt was turning red.

Kathy was still sobbing, her face in her hands. Kurtz walked over to her and reached down to help her to her feet. She shrugged his hand away with a violent motion and looked up at him, her face twisted through the tears. “Don’t touch me.” Her voice was a hiss. “Just don’t touch me.”

Kurtz drew a deep breath, staring down at her. “Alright,” he said softly. “I’m sorry.” He stood there for a long moment, swaying. Then he felt dizzy suddenly and sat down on the couch.

Kathy’s sobs turned to strangled laughter and then back into sobs. Still crying, she picked up the phone.

Jim Farkas was the plastic surgeon on call that morning. He met them at the Emergency Room. “Jesus,” he said. “What happened to you?”

“A mosquito bit me,” Kurtz said. Farkas looked at him doubtfully. “It’s the middle of winter.”

“It must have been a roach.”

Farkas grunted. He snapped an x-ray into a view box and peered at it. “Looks like bullet fragments to me. Two of them.”

“Amazing,” Kurtz said. “Absolutely amazing what you can tell with those things.”

“Superficial,” Farkas said. He shrugged. “You’ll live.”

He said to Kathy, "Lie back. Hold still." She did as he asked. His fingers moved gently over her face. "These are just bruises," he said. "There's nothing for me to sew up. They should be gone in a few days." He shook his head. "I told you to drop him. He's bad news." Shaking his head and chuckling, Farkas walked off.

"The man's real funny, you know?" Kurtz said.

Three hours later, he was out of surgery and discharged from the Recovery Room, the bullet fragments removed from his arm and shoulder and sent to Pathology.

Barent met him up on the floor. "How are you feeling?" he asked. "Not bad," Kurtz said. "Not bad." He smiled. The room was swirling around him and he felt like throwing up but he was telling the truth. He sighed and felt himself sink back into the pillows, content for the moment just to be alive. But then he fuzzily remembered Kathy and all of a sudden his euphoria melted away.

Barent looked uncomfortable. He seemed to have trouble looking Kurtz in the face. "I'm sorry about this," he said. "I never intended for you to put yourself at risk."

"It had nothing to do with Sharon Lee or your investigation. It was just bad luck."

Barent made a clucking sound through his teeth and then frowned. "Maybe, but for the moment at least, your involvement with this case is ended. You've done everything you can, anyway."

"Really?" Kurtz felt a sensation that he had trouble identifying. It might have been relief but it might have been regret. "Just like that?"

Barent gave him a curious look. "What do you mean? I asked you to help. You helped. I'm grateful. What else do you want?"

Kurtz drew a deep breath. His head was still spinning from the anesthetic and it was hard to concentrate. "I thought I was a part of the investigation," he said.

"You're not paid to get shot at," Barent said.

"I'm getting shot at anyway." Kurtz shrugged, then sucked in air at the sudden pain. "Harrison mentioned my name," he said. "But how did Raines know about Kathy?"

"He was probably following you."

"But why do it like that? Why not just ambush me at my place? Why involve her?"

"Who knows what he was planning? Probably he would have raped her, robbed the apartment, then killed you both—tried to make it look like a random event."

"Great. That's just great. Just another day's work in the City of New York."

Barent shrugged. "Sad but true. Keep your eyes open, if you want, but don't be obvious about it. Call me if you need me. I'll be in touch if we learn anything."

SANTANA AND VASQUEZ confirmed Gonzaga's story. They had been together playing poker until close to midnight. Carmen Gonzaga claimed to have been sleeping. She had no idea when her husband had come to bed.

"Sharon Lee was killed sometime between three o'clock and five o'clock in the morning," Barent said. "He has no alibi."

"Sure," Moran pointed out. "But we have no evidence."

Barent grunted. "Find Jimmy Raines. He's evidence."

Linda Angel—or Sophie Glass—was married to a construction worker named Archie Borden and lived in a working class neighborhood in Queens. She had a crying infant in a stroller and a harried expression on her face. She said she had not seen Jimmy Raines in more than three years. Barent believed her.

Raines' mother was a small, round woman with curly gray hair and wrinkles around the eyes. She looked at Barent sadly. "Is Jimmy in trouble again?" she asked. Barent had flashed his badge as soon as she opened the door but hadn't said a word.

"What makes you say that?" he asked.

"It's always the same thing. Jimmy's always in trouble."

"Have you seen Jimmy lately?"

"No."

"Has he called?"

"Officer, the last time I saw Jimmy was three years ago. He was being carted off to prison. I told him then that I didn't want anything to do with him, ever again."

She looked sincere. Sad, but sincere. "Does that sound heartless to you?" she asked. "Do I sound like an unnatural mother?" She shook her head. "I wonder about that sometimes. But all of us had had it up to here with Jimmy"—she made a throat slitting gesture with the forefinger of her right hand—"I did my best with him but nothing worked. He was always in trouble. Maybe it's my fault. Maybe I should have raised him different. I don't know." She raised her arms and let them fall helplessly to her side.

"You'll let us know if he contacts you?"

She shrugged. "He won't."

Apparently, he didn't. Barent heard nothing from Mrs. Raines and a surreptitious watch on the neighborhood turned out to be entirely fruitless.

But two days later, they got a break.

Vincent Graham was tall and thin, with graying hair and a lean face. He wore tailored blue suits that fit him with understated elegance and he carried a black leather briefcase. Nobody figured him for a drug dealer. The staff of the Ritz-Carlton in Chicago were properly appalled, therefore, when Vincent Graham was arrested in the lobby with a briefcase full of cocaine.

Graham smiled a gentle smile at the plainclothesmen and sadly shook his head. He held his hands out for the cuffs and went along quietly. His lawyer met him at the station house and they immediately proceeded to deal.

Vincent Graham named as many names as he could think of, dates, times, places. He had a remarkable memory. One of the names he dealt was Jimmy Raines, who turned out to be living in a neighborhood of quiet apartments near the Lake.

When the police turned up at his door, Jimmy Raines looked through the peephole, said, "Just a minute," in a bored voice, settled his black fedora on his head, grabbed his gun and a packed suitcase from the kitchen table as he walked by, opened the window of a side bedroom and calmly climbed down the fire escape. At the bottom, he looked around. Nobody. He smiled then, and walked away, brushing some dust from his jacket as he went. At the mouth of the alley, a low voice said, "Freeze," and the cold barrel of a pistol pressed suddenly against his head. He froze.

Two days later, Jimmy Raines was back in New York.

He looked, Barent thought, like a stocky undertaker: black pants, white dress shirt, round sloping shoulders. The police had done something with the jacket, fedora and tie. "Harrison Thomas?" Jimmy Raines said, and shook his head. "Richard Kurtz? Never heard of them. You've got the wrong guy."

"Really?" Barent pasted a doubtful expression on his face. "That's too bad. We wouldn't want to send an innocent man to jail."

"Jail?" Raines looked pained. "What are you talking about? I've been living in Chicago for the past year."

"Chicago and New York are about an hour and a half apart by plane. You can live anywhere you want, but we have reliable witnesses who say you were in New York on January 17th and 20th."

"It wasn't me," Raines said.

Barent ignored this. "And that scab on your side looks a lot like a bullet wound."

"No way," Raines said. "I fell down and scraped myself."

"On what?"

"On the edge of a table."

"Sure." Barent shook his head sadly. "And then of course there's the gun with your fingerprints on it, but maybe you lost the gun on the subway and somebody who looked just like you happened to find it. Like I said, we wouldn't want to send an innocent man to jail."

"Hey, man," Raines said. "Give me a break here, would you?"

"Sure we'll give you a break—if you give us a break."

"I want a lawyer," Raines stated.

"A lawyer?" Barent folded his hands across his chest and leaned back in his chair. "You can have a lawyer any time you want one. A lawyer's not going to keep you out of jail." That was not necessarily true, Barent reflected. In this city, at this time, nothing about the legal process was certain. Raines could look the jury in the eye and deny everything—he undoubtedly would deny everything—and they might even believe him. You never knew. But it didn't seem likely.

"Look man, I don't know anything." Raines swiped a hand through his hair and suddenly looked like he meant it.

"No?" Barent said. "Tell me all about it."

"Charlie took the job. Charlie Flanagan. All we were supposed to do was beat up the kid and his girl and tell them to warn the old man not to fuck around. That's all I know. I was just along for the ride. I don't know who hired us. There wasn't any need for me to know."

"You don't know?"

"No. I swear it."

"And how about Richard Kurtz and Kathy Roselli? Anybody hire you to kill them?"

"Kill?" Raines held his hands out to the side. "What do you mean, kill? I wasn't going to kill anybody. I just wanted to give them a little warning, maybe convince them to keep their mouths shut."

He looked sincere. No doubt he had had a lot of practice. "Well, Jimmy, that's too bad for you," Barent said. "Because your little warning didn't work. Now, let's be realistic here." Barent leaned back, stretched, put a thin smile on his face. "I want Tony Korda, and I want Jaime Ruiz, and if you can't give them to me, then I've got no reason at all to cut a murdering piece of shit like you any sort of a break whatsoever."

Raines hung his head. "I want a lawyer," he said again.

"Yeah, we'll get you a lawyer. And good luck to him. You're going back to the Pen, Jimmy. You're going back for a good long time." Saying it made Barent feel a little better. He stared at Jimmy Raines' hang dog face and realized morosely that Raines wasn't lying to him about Ruiz and Korda. "Shit," he muttered to himself. Another dead end.

"How's the shoulder?" Ornella asked.

"Better," Kurtz said. "I'll be back in the O.R. tomorrow."

"That's good," Ornella said, and frowned down at a copy of the New England Journal of Medicine from April of 1978. "How's Nugent?" he asked.

"About the same." About the same didn't mean exactly the same. If anything, Nugent was worse, a little weaker, a little thinner, blood counts dwindling lower. "We're still waiting for nursing home placement," Kurtz said.

"At this rate, he'll be dead before he can get there," Ornella said. Kurtz nodded. He might be; and it wouldn't be the first time that a patient had died in the hospital while waiting to leave it. "How's your young lady?" Ornella asked.

"Fine," Kurtz said.

There must have been something in his tone because Ornella grinned and said, "Trouble in Paradise? Don't worry, she'll get over it. And if she doesn't, there are plenty of fish in the sea."

Kurtz didn't feel like discussing it. He hadn't seen Kathy since the assault. He had called her twice. Her voice had been cold. She had been reluctant to talk, but he had persuaded her to get together tomorrow evening.

Ornella looked around the lobby of the office suite and sighed. Mrs. Schapiro had already gone home and the place was empty except for the two of them. Kurtz hadn't seen his partner much lately. Ornella was scheduled to officially retire on March 15th, but he had been coming into the office much less frequently in the past couple of months. "I like the changes you've made," he said. "The old place looks good." The old place looked like a new place, which was the way Kurtz wanted it. During the past year, he had replaced the fading carpet, painted the walls and purchased the art, the white formica desks and the brightly colored vinyl chairs.

"Can I help you with that?" Kurtz asked.

Ornella smiled wanly. "No, thanks." He had brought in a couple of big cardboard boxes and was cleaning out his desk. Apparently he had never done so in all the years he had worked here. He did it slowly, looking at each piece of paper as he went, weighing it in his fingers, trying to decide whether or not to discard this particular piece of his past or to save it. He had already gone through the Nineties, the Eighties and the Seventies. So far, more pages had gone into the boxes than into the garbage.

"Look at this," Ornella said, and held it under Kurtz' nose. It was a ticket stub for a Rangers game from 1963. "I remember that game. Bobby Hull and the Blackhawks." He shrugged. "The Rangers lost." He hesitated, then shrugged, and carefully deposited the ticket stub in the trash.

"You sure you don't want it?" Kurtz asked. "You might need it."

“Hmph.” Ornella grunted and continued slowly to skim through the fossilized layers. “You got any interest in a Life from 1957?” He held it out to Kurtz. Frank Sinatra and Ava Gardner smiled at him from the cover.

“Not me.” Kurtz shook his head. “Maybe you could donate it to a museum.”

Ornella gave him a sour look and dropped the magazine in the garbage. He turned back to the desk, rummaged slowly through the papers. He was almost down to the bottom of the first drawer. He had been at it for nearly an hour already. “Wow,” Ornella said. “Talk about memories.”

He held a faded white piece of paper out to Kurtz. It had embossed lettering on it:

Benefit Dinner and Dance to Celebrate the Opening of the Hampshire Building

7:30 P.M., June 24, 1959

R.S.V.P.

“I went with Lily. It was quite a night.” Lily, Kurtz remembered, was Ornella’s wife. She had died of cancer nearly ten years before. Ornella’s eyes grew misty as he stared at the invitation. He carefully placed it in one of the cardboard boxes.

“I met her when I was an intern. She was a nursing student.” Ornella shook his head and wistfully smiled. “I used to sneak her into the dorm. All of us used to sneak our girlfriends into the dorm.”

“What dorm?” Kurtz asked.

“The old Intern’s Dormitory. Back then, an intern was an intern. We all lived here. Spent the whole year hardly budging from the Medical Center. You’d finish a night on call, then work all the next day and drag yourself back to the old dorm, ready to collapse.” Ornella breathed a sigh and shook his head. “Man.”

Kurtz thought about his own internship and shuddered. “Where was this dorm?”

“Right here. They tore it down to put up the Hampshire Building. Jesus, we all hated the place. We used to sleep in scrubs in case we had to run in. The phone would go off, we’d jump out of bed, run down the stairs and into the tunnel and across the street to the hospital. Sometimes three, four times a night.”

Kurtz blinked. “Tunnel?” he said.

“Yeah. It was nice of them. You shouldn’t freeze your butt off if you got called in and it happened to be the middle of winter. Thanks a lot. They put the walkways up over the street when they built this place.”

“Whatever happened to this tunnel?”

Ornella shrugged. “Beats me.”

“Tunnel?” Wellesley said. “I never heard of it.”

“It may not exist any longer. Supposedly it used to connect an Intern’s Dormitory to the Medical Center. This was before the Hampshire Building.”

“I never heard of it,” Wellesley repeated.

Barent tapped his pen on his notebook. “Who might have the blueprints?”

Wellesley picked up his phone. “Maybe Engineering.”

A half hour later, Barent and Wellesley were in the office of the Chief Engineer, a man named Suzuki, who looked Asian but spoke English without an accent. “There was a whole series of tunnels back then,” Suzuki said. “The main hospital was much smaller than it is today. There were separate buildings for Orthopedics, Eye Surgery and Neurosurgery, and of course, the Intern’s Dormitory. They were all connected underground. See here?” The blueprints spread out over the table were yellowed and crumbling around the edges, but they were still legible.

“What happened to these tunnels?” Barent asked.

“Some of them were incorporated into the basement of the present building. Others were boarded up. The last one still in use was the one leading to the dormitory, where the Hampshire Building is now.”

“Any of them still accessible?” Barent asked.

Suzuki frowned. “Maybe,” he said.

Barent smiled at Wellesley. “Let’s go see.”

It was easy to see why the police had missed the tunnel entrance when they searched the place after Sharon Lee’s murder. It looked like a ventilation grate, tucked away in a far corner of the deepest layer of the sub-basement. A Yale lock held it tightly to the floor in the corner of a storage room filled with antique pieces of medical equipment. Barent recognized an iron lung and two bullet shaped devices that were probably obsolete EKG monitors. A ghoulish contraption that looked like an electric chair sat in a corner. “What’s that thing for?” he asked.

Robinson frowned at it, his jowls quivering. “I think they used it for electroconvulsive therapy.”

Barent shivered and Robinson gave him a peevish look. Robinson had insisted on coming along but was evidently hoping that the search proved a dead end. From Robinson’s point of view, nothing to do with this case was going to help the bottom line and he just wanted it to all be over with and disappear.

Suzuki held the blueprint up to the dim light. “This is definitely it,” he said. They stared at each other. Barent wordlessly gestured to Suzuki, who stepped forward with a set of keys. The second key seemed to fit the lock but would not turn the bolt. The fifth key, however, slid right in and the lock clicked open. Harry Moran and Arnie Figueroa put on gloves, grasped the heavy steel frame and lifted. The grate resisted for a moment, then rose upward and slid to the side.

“Bingo,” Barent said.

“SO OKAY,” BARENT SAID, “It was a dead end. So sue me.”

Moran seemed to be having difficulty repressing a smile. The grating had concealed a set of concrete steps, which led down to a molding wooden door. The door swung open at a touch. On the other side of the door, a long, gloomy tunnel, walls and floor constructed of unpainted concrete, curved away to their left.

Suzuki held a lantern up and squinted at the blueprints. “This leads under the playground, toward the Administration Building,” he said.

Barent looked at Moran, who shrugged.

Robinson glanced at his watch and frowned.

“Let’s see,” Barent said. The tunnel was large enough for two people to walk together. The air smelled moldy and damp. After a few hundred feet, the tunnel branched.

“Which way?” Barent asked.

Suzuki shook his head. “Beats me.”

“Forget it,” Barent said. “Let’s get a team down here. They’ll know what to look for.”

Within an hour, the tunnels had been thoroughly searched. As Suzuki had told them, they crossed the entire grounds of the Medical Center in a connecting web. The branch that had once led across the street to the old Intern’s Dorm had long since been filled in. In one isolated branch, huddled against the wall, they found a dusty old blanket, four empty bottles of Grolsch beer and an antique, desiccated condom (Later, when informed of the condom, Edward Ornella at first frowned, then shrugged and slowly smiled.). And that was all. Nothing to indicate that Bill Mose, Herman Delgado or anybody else had been down here in the past 30 years.

Barent believed in the virtues of serendipity, in luck both good and bad. Barent believed that if you scratched at a problem long enough, if you turned over enough rocks, then sooner or later the bugs would scurry out into the light and expose themselves. You had to be persistent. You had to keep digging.

When bewildered by a case, Barent always returned to the victim. The victim, after all, was the focus. The victim, whether she knew it or not, contained the key to every crime. Barent had interviewed many survivors of attempted murder. He had always been struck by the fact that the victims were almost never surprised by the attack; they understood it, and in a strange way, almost accepted it. You had to know the victim.

Barent did not understand Sharon Lee. She seemed to have lived her life almost without touching other people. Even her best friends hardly knew her. Evelyn Hobbs, Joyce Davenport, Jennifer Parks...he had called them as Kurtz had suggested. They had no clue. Evelyn Hobbs was a buyer for an importing firm and had spent most of the past six months in Paris and Hong Kong. Jennifer Parks claimed to have seen Sharon Lee no more than three times in the past year. Perhaps the fact that they were both doctors explained it. Jennifer Parks had a schedule that would have exhausted most men, with office hours for eight to ten hours each day, a husband and two children to take care of. Joyce Davenport had gotten married and moved to Seattle over a year ago. She had nothing to offer.

Alice McMahan, Peggy Ryan, Rita Mendez...forget it. Nolan, Stills, Franklin, Farkas, Werth...Barent had interviewed over fifty members of the hospital staff during the course of this investigation. Almost all of them seemed like perfectly nice people, which of course meant nothing in itself since murderers quite often appeared to be nice people except for the fact that now and then they killed somebody. If any one of them had possessed a motive to kill Sharon Lee, Barent had been unable to discover it.

Barent sat in the cool darkness of his office and thought about Sharon Lee.

Two weeks ago, shortly after the robbery that may or may not have been committed by Herman Delgado, Barent had gone to Sharon Lee's apartment.

He had of course been there shortly following the murder, but at that time the place had been mobbed with uniformed policemen and technicians from the crime lab. It had been hard to think. Now it was quiet. Now he could stand in the center of the apartment and try to get a feel for the essence of the dead woman.

A stack of cartons stood in the corner, half filled with clothing already removed by her sister from the dresser drawers. The artwork was "modern" but indistinct. It looked quite a bit like the stuff hanging in Kurtz' office, pastel, pretty and boring (not that Barent considered himself an expert on art, his old pal Ernie Gottlieb notwithstanding). The place was neat. A book of Erte prints and another book of photographs by Annie Liebovitz sat out on the coffee table. A baby grand piano stood in one corner. Barent hit middle C and winced. The piano needed to be tuned.

Sharon Lee had left no scrapbooks, no photo albums, no mementos hanging on the walls, no little trophies brought back from trips to Greece or Puerto Rico or Spain. A small stack of opened mail lay on the kitchen table, all advertisements and bills. Impersonal, that was the impression: neat, clean, sterile...except for one thing, one small touch of humanity: a framed photograph sat under a lamp on a table next to the couch: a picture of Sharon Lee and her sister, arms around each other by the sea, laughing.

Barent nodded to himself, rose to his feet and grabbed the keys to his car.

An hour later, he pulled the car into the driveway of the Lee household and parked. The same plump maid answered the door. "Is Mrs. Hirschfeld at home?" Barent asked. He held out his badge.

The maid's eyes flicked to the badge, then up to Barent's face. "Please come in," she said.

Barent waited in the foyer, peering up as he had before at the Vasarelli painting above the second story landing. He heard a clatter of heels on the tile floor and turned. Sheila Hirschfeld stood there. "Detective...?"

"Barent," he said.

"Yes, of course," she said quickly. "I hadn't expected to see you again." She bit her lip and flushed, evidently realizing how this sounded.

"I felt that we needed to talk."

She stared at him. "Oh? What about?"

"Can we sit down, Mrs. Hirschfeld?"

Barent looked at her with a grave expression on his face. After a moment, she looked away. "Yes, of course," she said again. "Come with me."

She led him back to the same garden room they had sat in before. This time, there was no tea. She sat on the edge of a cushioned hassock, clasped her knees tightly together and looked at him without speaking. Barent took the chair across from her.

"How is your mother?" he asked.

"She's fine."

"Is she at home?"

"Yes, but she's resting." Barent nodded.

"That's good," he said. "It's better if we speak alone."

She stared at him. "Why do you say that?" she asked. Her voice was little louder than a whisper.

"I felt that you would be more candid with me if we were alone." Barent looked at her and lifted one eyebrow.

She seemed about to say something but the words would not come out. She cleared her throat. Barent waited.

"What do you mean?" she finally asked. Amazing, Barent thought, how they always asked that.

"Detective Moran and I both had a strong feeling that you knew more than you were telling us."

Her lips thinned. She was offended. They always got offended, especially if they were lying. "I can't imagine what you're talking about."

Barent shook his head and allowed his lips to curl ever so slightly. "When Detective Moran and I were here last, you seemed reluctant to speak, particularly when the subject of your sister's romantic involvements came up."

She stared at him. Slowly, one hand rose, the fingers coming to rest ever so gently on her throat.

"The fact is," Barent said, "that we have acquired evidence strongly suggesting that someone other than Bill Mose may have murdered your sister."

She swallowed, her eyes still fixed on Barent's face.

"You said that you spoke to your sister often, I think you said at least once a week."

"That's right," Sheila said, and gave a tiny nod of her head.

"It's been stated by a number of witnesses that your sister was involved with someone at the time of her death. Yet no one has been able to tell us who that person might have been, and no one has stepped forward. Can you tell me, Mrs. Hirschfeld?"

"No." Barent could barely hear her.

"You can't tell? Or you won't tell?"

Sheila shook her head and gave a nervous little laugh. Her posture was hunched and defensive, the expression on her face, faintly disdainful. "When I thought that you had arrested the man who killed her, I saw no point in dragging Sharon's good name through the mud. This changes things." She frowned, staring out the window at the line of shrubs by the edge of the woods, and looked back at Barent. "I can't tell you. I don't know his name. All I know is that he's married."

"I see." Barent nodded slowly. "Can you tell me anything else about him. Did she describe him in any way?"

Sheila hesitated. "You had to know my sister, Lieutenant. She... had a thing about men. She collected them. My sister was very good looking, even beautiful. She was intelligent and dedicated to her work. But somehow, she had a lifelong struggle with her own self-esteem. She needed constant affirmation of her attractiveness and worth. I think the fact that this last one was married only added to the appeal for her. It takes a real woman, after all, to steal a man away from someone else."

"She never mentioned a name? She never described him?"

"No." Sheila shook her head. "Never." She added, "I disapproved. I told her so. After that, she was reluctant to talk and frankly, I didn't want to hear about it."

"Did she mention where she met him? Or what he did?"

"She did talk about meeting him secretly. I had the impression that the people she worked with knew him and would recognize them together. I assumed he was another doctor, but I don't know that for certain."

Her face was downcast, and Barent felt a pang of guilt. It wasn't pleasant having to drag people back through things that they would rather forget. "Thank you, Mrs. Hirschfeld," he said.

She nodded her head, staring out the window at the frozen ground. "If you think of anything else that might help us, please give me a call."

She shrugged. "Of course."

A bank of high, rolling clouds obscured the full moon outside. It looked like it might rain. They could dimly see a barge floating past on the East River. A searchlight funneled upward from somewhere on the Brooklyn shore.

Kathy sat slumped on the couch in Kurtz' living room. She seemed to have difficulty looking him in the eye. An open bottle of champagne sat on the coffee table. Kathy fingered her glass and every once in a while took a tiny sip. She touched the bruises on her face with the tip of a finger and grimaced. "Why aren't you angry with me?" she asked.

"Angry?" Kurtz blinked at her. "Why should I be angry?"

She gave him a dull, guarded look. "I betrayed you. I lured you into coming to my apartment and you were almost killed."

This, of course, was true; but Kurtz had long ago learned when to slug it out and when to roll with the punches. By now, considering that they were both alive and relatively unhurt, Jimmy Raines and everything to do with him was water under the bridge. At least, he hoped so. "What else could you do?" he said. "You had no choice."

She set her lips into a mulish line. "I could have refused."

"And what then? He had already hit you." Kurtz shook his head. "You had no choice," he repeated. "There is no way that you could have refused."

"I was so scared!" she said, and suddenly she was crying.

He took the glass from her and set it on the table. "Come on," he said. "Don't do that." Gently, he took her in his arms and she clung to him, sobbing. After a while, her sobs grew quiet and after a few final snuffles, they ceased.

Her face still buried against his chest, she said, "I can't see you anymore."

Just like that. I can't see you anymore. He opened his mouth and then closed it. "Oh," he finally said.

She pulled away from him and huddled in the corner of the couch, looking miserable. "Maybe it won't be forever," she said. "Maybe just for a while. We're very different sorts of people, you and I. You're so certain about things." She shook her head, looking forlorn. "I need some time to think."

"I'm certain about things..." Kurtz sighed. Absently, he noted that it had begun to rain. "I wish I were," he said, "but I'm not certain of anything. Anything at all."

She blinked at him, then looked away.

"You're blaming me for what happened. Aren't you? That's not fair."

"Maybe it's not," she said sadly. "But it's the way that I feel."

He stared at her, frustrated and helpless. She meant it. He could see that. It was his fault some cold-blooded bastard had paid to have Harrison Thomas assaulted. It was his fault that a lunatic assassin had decided to hunt them both down.

And was it also his fault that drug addiction and poverty and ignorance and hate led people to kill each other on the street? And Sharon Lee, was that his fault, too? Maybe it was, he thought. Maybe if he had never met Sharon, maybe if he had never broken up with her, her sad life would have turned out differently. Maybe if Sharon Lee had never been born, then she would never have been killed. Yeah, it was her mother's fault. Her mother's fault all the way.

"I don't accept that," Kurtz said.

"I know you don't. That's why I can't see you anymore."

THE NEXT MORNING, A Ford minivan rolled up across the street from the Hampshire Building and parked in an empty space by a hydrant, where it stayed for the next twelve hours. At three o'clock, a foot patrolman walked by, wrote out a parking ticket and tucked it under the wiper on the front windshield. Then he walked off. At five o'clock, people began to stream out of the building. By seven, the place was deserted, with all the lights off and the front doors locked. At eight, the van's engine started up and it pulled away from the curb.

Easton, like most hospitals, published a staff directory, with colorful, brightly smiling pictures of every physician associated with the institution. Barent and Moran had taken the directory down to Bank Street, hoping that it might jog the memory of Mario Gilbert or Ronald Evans. "Why, gentlemen," Ronald Evans had said with a bright smile, "how nice to see you again."

"Can we come in?" Barent asked.

"But of course." Ronald Evans fluttered his lashes at Moran. "Will you sit next to me this time, Sugar?"

Moran gave Ronald Evans a brief, meaningless smile as they entered the apartment. A thin young man with deep set green eyes and black curling hair sat in a chair in the living room, listening to something classical on the stereo. He gave the detectives a questioning look and rose to his feet. "Mario," Ronald Evans said, "these are the policemen that I told you about. Detective Barent and Detective Moran."

Mario Gilbert glanced warily from one of them to another but held out a hand to shake. His grip was firm. "Nice to meet you," he said. "What's up?"

"Mr. Evans has told you about our previous visit?"

"Of course. You're investigating Sharon Lee's murder."

"Yes. We were particularly interested in knowing who her friends were."

"Friends?" Mario Gilbert narrowed his eyes. "I assume you mean boyfriends."

"Boyfriends, girlfriends." Barent shrugged. "Anyone she might have spent time with."

"Isn't the big one luscious?" Ronald Evans blinked at Moran and licked his lips. Moran ignored him. Mario Gilbert frowned.

"I mean, did you ever see such muscles in your life? Yum!"

Mario gave Ronald a sour look. "Ronald likes to talk dirty but he's really a housewife at heart. Pay him no mind."

"Oh, you," Ronald said with a sly grin.

"We really didn't have much to do with Sharon," Mario said doubtfully.

"Mr. Evans said that you and Sharon Lee were quite friendly. He said that she displayed a certain...interest in you."

Mario looked at Ronald and frowned. Ronald smiled up into space. "Sharon was an acquaintance," Mario said firmly. "Nothing more."

"I see," Barent said. Ronald continued to smile, looking quite satisfied with himself. Barent gave a little shrug. "It doesn't matter." He held the directory out to Mario. "Would you do us the favor of looking through this book? It's a hospital directory for Easton Medical Center. We would like to know if you recognize any of the people in it."

Mario kept his hands at his sides. "Do we need a lawyer?" he asked.

“You might be witnesses,” Barent said. “I don’t consider you to be suspects. Please; I’d appreciate your help.”

Mario and Ronald looked at each other, exchanging glances that Barent could not interpret. Finally, Mario nodded. “Let me see it.” He weighed the book in his hand, shrugged his shoulders minutely and sat down on the couch. Ronald sat next to him and they proceeded to flip through the pages. They paused a few times, once over a picture of Sharon Lee, smiling brightly for the camera. But that was all. When they reached the end, Mario closed the book on his lap and shook his head, looking up at Barent with what appeared to be genuine regret. “I’m sorry,” he said. “A few of them look familiar. But I don’t think so.”

There were over a dozen who looked “familiar.” None of these were people who Barent had previously interviewed. Barent sighed inwardly, thanked them both and left. He assigned a team to investigate all the men whose pictures had made Mario and Ronald hesitate. He didn’t expect much to come of it, but it was worth a try and he would have been remiss in not following through.

Sharon Lee’s mysterious lover had most likely been a doctor, according to her sister. Ronald Evans had already told them that he had been a big man with dark hair.

Robinson had been reluctant to authorize the surveillance, worrying about adverse publicity. “Something like this could do us tremendous harm. Patients don’t like to think that one of their doctors might be a murderer. You’ll do it quietly?”

“Surveillance isn’t much use if people know you’re doing it,” Barent said. “Of course we’ll do it quietly.”

Robinson had morosely agreed.

Inside the van, a cop named Ferruci turned to his partner, whose name was King, and said, “I hate stakeouts. I always gotta pee.”

“Me too,” King said. “I wish they’d given us one of the new ones. They’ve got toilets.”

They drove across town to the Precinct House, parked in the lot outside and brought their videotape in to be stored for the night. The next morning, a similar van rolled up to the front of the Hampshire Building and repeated the process.

Each morning, the crime lab reviewed yesterday’s tape, cataloguing the face of each person who entered the Hampshire Building, looking for clues. It was a tedious procedure. In all, over 700 people had walked through the doors during the first day. The police fully expected most of these to be unrecognizable, people with no record of criminal activity. They hoped to spot at least a few that were known to the police, a few who might forge a link between Easton Medical Center and Jaime Ruiz or Tony Korda.

On the third morning, Barent was going over the negative report of the previous day’s tapes, when a knock sounded on his office door. “Come in,” he said. The door opened and Ted Weiss stepped inside.

“Morning, Ted.”

“How’s it going, Lew?” Weiss asked.

“Not bad.”

“You satisfied yet?”

“No,” Barent said.

Weiss took a cigar out of his jacket pocket. He scratched a kitchen match across Barent’s desk, held it up to the tip of the cigar and puffed until the cigar glowed like a coal. “What have you got? Anything?”

“Take a look.” Barent tossed a manila file folder across the desk to Weiss.

Weiss flipped through the file, stopping now and then to examine a piece of paper more closely, occasionally shaking his head. Finally, he looked up. "Not much," he said.

"No," Barent agreed.

"Mostly speculation and wishful thinking."

"I wouldn't go that far."

"I would." Weiss puffed thoughtfully on his cigar. Barent lit a cigarette of his own, blew smoke toward the ceiling and waited.

"The papers are starting to sniff," Weiss said. "I got a call from John Costas yesterday morning wanting to know what the delay was in indicting Mose."

"Is he the only one?"

"So far."

"I know Costas," Barent said. "Leave Costas to me."

Weiss continued to puff, slow coils of smoke issuing from his mouth and drifting to the corners of the room. "You haven't convinced me," he stated. "But you have raised a whisper of a doubt." He held up a hand in front of his face, the thumb and forefinger almost touching. "A whisper," he repeated. "The merest whisper."

Barent puffed on his cigarette. He tapped his pencil eraser on the desk. He leaned back and studied the cracks in the ceiling.

Weiss grinned. "How is Mr. Mose?"

"Kurtz tells me he's still recovering. He won't be able to appear in court for"—Barent looked at his watch and narrowed his eyes—"at least another two weeks."

"I don't think I can stall for another two weeks," Weiss said. "Not without coming clean. I think you better come up with more than you've got in one week or Mose is going to have to make a sudden, miraculous recovery.

"And talk to Costas."

"Hello, John?"

"Who is this?" The voice on the phone registered open suspicion. "Barent?"

"Yep."

"You don't call me, Barent," Costas stated. "I call you. I ferret out the news. You do your best not to tell me anything. A call like this is a perversion of the natural order of events. What is going on here?"

"I just had a little visit from Ted Weiss."

There was sudden silence on the other end of the line.

"Ted is worried," Barent said. "He thinks you're losing your touch."

"He thinks...?"

"Ted thinks you've lost your ability to figure out when you've got a good story."

Barent could almost hear Costas thinking over the phone. "Alright, what gives?" Costas asked, his voice suddenly serious.

"I've got a deal for you," Barent said. "You've been getting curious about the Sharon Lee story."

"True. Go on."

"Actually, I was pulling your leg. Ted doesn't really think you're losing your touch. Ted admires you. 'That Costas,' he said to me, 'a real nose for news.'"

"Don't make me gag."

"Alright, I'll give it to you simply. We have evidence suggesting that Bill Mose is not the murderer. We'd like to keep it quiet just a little bit longer."

“That’s what you want, huh?” Costas said. “Well, what I want is the Pulitzer Prize for Journalism. Now that you’ve confirmed my suspicions, why shouldn’t I report it?”

“So far, you’re the only one who’s asking questions. If you stop asking them for a few more days, I’ll give you an exclusive when the story breaks.”

“You mean it?”

“I mean it.”

“Then I’ll take it,” Costas said immediately. “Eat your heart out, Connie Chung.”

“Three more days,” Liebert said. “Thank God!”

Nolan sadly shook his head. “It’s a pity seeing a young man make such a mess out of his life. Isn’t it, Jack?”

Franklin grunted.

“No,” Nolan said. “I mean it. Radiology? How can you do it to yourself? After a few years radiologists start to glow in the dark and then they die from cancer. And their kids all have genetic mutations.”

“At least they have kids,” Liebert said. “Surgeons aren’t home enough to get their wives pregnant.”

“Touché,” Nolan said. “Touché.”

Liebert smiled smugly.

Kurtz took Stan Nugent’s chart out of the rack and quickly reviewed it, wishing that Nolan and Liebert would shut up. After his talk with Kathy the other night, he had been in a totally foul mood, a mood that the intervening time had only made worse.

The chart was not good. Nugent’s hematocrit had fallen to 17 as the chemotherapy wiped out his bone marrow. Yesterday, the nursing home placement had finally come through and Nugent was scheduled to leave tomorrow morning, but nursing homes did not accept unstable patients. “Do you know what the term ‘hematocrit’ means, Doctor?” he asked Liebert.

“The hematocrit is the percentage of the blood that’s composed of red blood cells.”

“That’s correct; and what’s a normal hematocrit?”

“40 to 45 in an adult male. 35 to 40 for women.”

“Good,” Kurtz said. “And what do you think we should do for Mr. Nugent?”

“He needs blood,” Liebert said.

“So?”

“So we have to keep him. He’s not stable enough to leave.”

“We don’t have to keep him.” Kurtz turned to Nolan. “Give him three units of packed cells,” he said. “Get his crit up to at least 35, then send him out.”

Kathy was wrong. It wasn’t that he was so certain about things, but life was full of decisions. You had to make them. There was no point in mooning over them from here to eternity and there was no point in regretting them, either. You made the best decisions you could with the information available and you tried to learn from your mistakes.

Liebert’s face clouded over but he said nothing. Kurtz smiled at him. “You look doubtful,” he said.

“That doesn’t seem fair,” Liebert complained.

“To who?”

“To the nursing home.”

“The nursing home is not your patient. Nugent is your patient and Nugent wants more than anything else in the world to get out of here. Nugent is going to die. He knows that, whether he’s willing to admit it or not. He would rather die somewhere other than the hospital and we're going to help him do it."

Lenore had bundled Harrison up and taken him home a few days before. Kurtz hadn't had a chance to speak to her again after that one morning in the cafeteria, and that was just as well. He thought too much of his relationship with Kathy to risk it.

What a jerk.

"But if he's going to die anyway," Liebert said, "then we're wasting the blood."

"You know what D.N.R. means?"

"Of course: Do Not Resuscitate."

"Is Nugent D.N.R.?"

"No, he's not; but he's terminal. He should be D.N.R."

"Maybe he should. But as long as he's conscious and in his right mind, the only one who can declare him D.N.R. is himself. And until he's D.N.R., we're obligated to do everything possible to treat his condition, whether it's a waste of medical resources or not.

"And don't worry about the nursing home. They'll follow his crit, and when it drops low enough, they'll send him back here. But if Nugent is lucky, he'll be dead before that happens."

He had thought about Lenore a lot lately but Lenore had her own problems and Kurtz didn't want to add to them. He had a feeling that her relationship with Harrison was not quite as dead as she thought it was. She and Harrison had been involved for a long time. She had hovered over his sickbed like a guardian angel, hardly ever leaving his side. Maybe in a few days he'd give Lenore a call, after he had calmed down. Maybe.

They followed Kurtz into the room. Nugent was lying curled on his side in the bed, his limbs shriveled, his skin waxen. His bald head gleamed in the light and he looked at the little group with a thin, feral smile. "Tomorrow, I'm getting out of here," he said in an eager whisper.

"Yes, Mr. Nugent," Kurtz said.

"It can't come too soon for me." Nugent's watery eyes wandered around the little room. "I can't stand this place," he said.

"Yes, Mr. Nugent. I understand your feelings."

"Good riddance," Nugent whispered.

"Congratulations, Mr. Nugent," Kurtz said. "And good luck."

BARENT WIPED A SCATTER of ashes off the front of his shirt, sipped at his coffee and breathed a sigh. “Denise is busy picking out patterns,” he said. “Silver patterns, china patterns, linen patterns. Everything’s got a pattern. And all the bath towels and the napkins are supposed to be monogrammed. You have monogrammed bath towels and napkins?”

“We usually use paper napkins,” Moran said.

“We’ve got linen napkins someplace. Betty brings them out maybe twice a year on the holidays. They’re not monogrammed. Denise Janus will have monogrammed linen napkins.”

“Is Betty happy?”

“Ecstatic,” Barent said morosely.

“Well, then.”

“Fathers are definitely superfluous in these things. Husbands too. Paul seems just as bewildered as me.”

“That’s probably the point. The women exclude the men from all these rituals and that’s supposed to bring the Father-in-Law and the Son-in-Law—who probably up to now couldn’t stand each other—closer together.”

“I still can’t stand him,” Barent said.

“You’ll get over it.”

Barent frowned down at his cigarette. “I hate sitting around and waiting.”

“Me too.”

Barent had had a little conversation with the priest who would perform the ceremony, Father Michael Ianello. Father Michael was a mild mannered man with a weak chin and thinning hair. He looked like a pushover. He wasn’t. Barent had let Father Michael know that he didn’t like priests, he didn’t like churches and he had no use for a God who allowed bad things to happen to good people. Father Michael had simply shrugged, “If you want to talk about it, we can talk,” he said. “But if all you want to do is bitch, then I really couldn’t care less.”

For a moment, Barent was floored. “What do you mean, you couldn’t care less? You’re supposed to save souls, aren’t you?”

“I mean I couldn’t care less. One thing I realized a long time ago: you can’t save souls who don’t want to be saved. I’ve got no interest in butting my head against a brick wall. You want to go to Hell, that’s your business.”

Actually, Barent rather admired Father Michael.

He drew in another long sigh and tried to turn his mind to the job. “Anything turn up on Sharon Lee’s credit card records?”

“She went to San Diego in October for a conference on fetal monitoring. She had a single room. Could she have met somebody?” Moran shrugged. “Sure. Plenty of doctors go to conferences. Plenty of people go to San Diego.”

“Nothing local?”

“She ate out a lot, and from the prices it looks like she sometimes paid for somebody else, but it was never more than twice at the same restaurant. I went to the three most recent. Nobody remembered her.”

“The surveillance better come up with something.”

A knock sounded from the door. "Yes?" Barent called out loudly.

A uniformed policeman stuck his head in. "Phone call for you, Lew."

"Who is it?"

"Guy says his name is Oliver Thomas."

Kurtz smiled warily upward at the corner of the hallway where the wall met the ceiling. Even though he knew it was there, he couldn't see the miniature lens that the surveillance team had installed. There were similar lenses in all the corners of all the floors of the Building. Kurtz opened the door to his office suite, went inside and said to Rose Schapiro, "Who's first?"

Mrs. Schapiro looked at him with a cheery smile on her face. "Mr. Callahan," she said. "He's here for his sigmoidoscopy."

Kurtz audibly groaned. Mrs. Schapiro smiled at him brightly. "Miss Grunfeld brought him back to the endoscopy room."

"Thanks," he said, and walked in. Callahan was sitting on the table, dressed only in a thin cotton gown opened down the back. His hairy legs dangled over the edge of the table.

"How are you today, Mr. Callahan?"

"Not so good, Doc," Callahan said. "I still got that constipation." "Did you follow the instructions Miss Grunfeld gave you?"

Callahan nodded proudly. "Nothing to eat after noon yesterday except clear liquids. A Fleet's enema this morning." Callahan shook his head in amazement. "That Fleet's cleaned me out good. I feel like a new man."

"Well, turn over on your side and let's take a look."

The sigmoidoscopy appeared to be entirely normal; Callahan's rectum and lower colon were pink and shiny, but Callahan moaned and grunted pitifully throughout the procedure and refused to stay still, his toes curling and his heels kicking at the examining table every time Kurtz advanced the scope. "Almost done now, Mr. Callahan," Kurtz said. "Please try not to move."

"You're killing me, Doc," Callahan groaned. "Jesus, Doc, you're killing me."

"It's just cramps, Mr. Callahan. I have to pump air in to expand the bowel, otherwise I can't get a good view. Now try to keep still and it will be over soon."

"I never had cramps like this. This is like a weasel tearing at my insides."

"Uh-hmmm..." The fiberoptic scope worked its way up Callahan's bowels like a roto-rooter reaming out a pipe, while Kurtz squeezed the air bladder with one hand and peered through the lens, dreaming wistfully about weasels and gerbils. Finally, the scope was in all the way to the hub. "I'm coming out now, Mr. Callahan," Kurtz said. "Try to relax."

"Good," Callahan groaned. "Good."

A few minutes later, Callahan was sitting up on the table, wheezing, his face covered with a sheen of sweat. "Are you okay?" Kurtz asked.

Callahan looked at him doubtfully. "I think so. You sure you didn't rupture me?"

"I'm sure."

Callahan nodded grimly and compressed his lips. "Well, what's the word?" he asked. "You find anything?"

"No. It's a normal exam. Everything checks out fine."

Callahan heaved a deep breath. "Alright, then," he said. "What's the next step?"

"What next step?" Kurtz blinked at him. "There's nothing wrong with you."

"But Doc, what am I gonna do about this constipation?"

"See me next January," Kurtz said. "We'll do another sigmoidoscopy."

“It’s been going on for a little over four years,” Oliver Thomas said. “A man approached me. He was well dressed. His voice was cultured. He seemed to be a gentleman. His name was Gordon Stone. He knew all about my financial difficulties. He offered me a way out and I accepted. At first it was only Stone; after awhile it was another man also, a man named Roberto Alvarez. One of them would deliver a bag full of money. I deposited it into an account. A few weeks later, I transferred the money out to another account in the Cayman Islands. What happened to it after that, I have no idea.” Oliver Thomas shrugged.

“Always these two men?” Barent asked.

“Yes.”

“Never anybody else?”

“No.”

“In whose names were the accounts?”

“Gordon Stone”—Thomas seemed to hesitate—“and Raymond Santiago.”

“Not Roberto Alvarez?”

“No. All Alvarez did was deliver the money.”

“How many accounts are we talking about?” Barent asked.

“Here or in the Caymans?”

“Both.”

“Here, there were two; one for Stone and one for Santiago. There are five different accounts in the Cayman Islands, three in Stone’s name, two for Santiago. I never made a deposit into the same account more than twice in a row.”

“This Gordon Stone, was he white?”

Oliver Thomas frowned at him. “Of course.”

“And what did you think when guys like Alvarez came into the picture?”

“I protested.”

“Got you real far, didn’t it?”

Oliver Thomas shrugged.

Barent nodded thoughtfully. “That’s the trouble dealing with people of inferior ethnic backgrounds; they can get you mixed up in things that are downright sleazy.”

“I’m afraid I don’t like your tone, Barent.” Thomas looked down at his desk in bleak disgust. “I know I made a mistake. I should never have gotten involved with these people, but I was on the verge of bankruptcy.” He laughed softly. “I was born rich. I’ve always been rich. I don’t know how to be poor and I didn’t want to have to learn.”

“Any of these people ever mention Tony Korda?” Barent asked.

“Korda?” Thomas blinked at him. “You brought him up before, didn’t you?” Thomas shook his head. “No. Never.”

“How about Jaime Ruiz?”

“No.”

Barent frowned and looked at Moran, who shrugged silently. “So, why are you telling us?”

Oliver Thomas stared off into the far corners of his office. He took a long time before answering. Finally, he shook his head. “I’m in too deep. I don’t know how to get out.”

“Maybe you should have thought of that before you got involved.”

“You’re right.” Oliver Thomas shrugged. “Can you help me?” he asked.

“I don’t know. You’ve committed federal crimes, crimes over which I have no jurisdiction. I’m a cop, not an F.B.I. agent.”

Thomas sadly nodded. He opened the middle drawer of his desk and pulled out a thin, black notebook. "Here is a listing of the people involved, the dates and the amounts of all the transfers." He tossed the book across the desk to Barent. "Take it. Do anything with it that you want."

Barent picked it up gingerly, weighing it in his palm. Then he tucked it under his arm. "Give me a few days," he said. "We'll see what I can do."

"Richard?"

The voice was familiar but for an instant he couldn't place it. Then he realized who it was and his heart gave a thump. "Lenore," he said.

"I would have called you sooner but I hadn't heard. I was in Boston, at an exhibition. Are you alright?"

"I'm fine," he said. "How did you find out?"

She laughed softly. "Doctors don't get shot at every day, even in this town. It was in the newspaper."

"Oh," he said. "I guess it was."

"And Kathy? How is she?"

For a moment, the words stuck in his throat, then he said, "She's fine."

"That's good. The paper said she was beaten."

"Some bruises. They'll heal in a few days." Lenore's voice was deep and smooth, like molasses. He noted it absently. "Kathy and I are not seeing each other at the moment," he said.

Lenore said nothing. He could imagine her on the other end of the phone line, frowning while she mulled this over.

"I'm glad you called," he said. "I've been thinking about you." He swallowed, the words suddenly sticking in his throat. "Would you like to have dinner with me tomorrow night?"

Her voice seemed to hesitate for a brief instant. "I can't," she said. "I'm having dinner with my parents."

"Then how about Friday?"

"Friday sounds good," she said.

Day after day, the Ford minivan pulled up across from the Hampshire Building in the morning and left in the evening after all the staff and patients had gone. Every morning, the lab developed the film gathered from the day before and sent it upstairs to be reviewed by their resident expert and his team. On the fifth morning, Arnie Figueroa suddenly stopped the tape he had been watching, re-wound it and watched it again. Then he picked up the phone. "Lew?" he said. "I think you'd better come down here."

Ten minutes later, Barent and Moran were sitting next to the monitor screen, watching the tape. Barent watched it through twice, then he rubbed his hands together and gleefully smiled. "That the one?" he said to Figueroa. He pointed to a face on the screen.

"That's the one."

Barent nodded, still smiling. He turned to Moran. "Remember him?"

"Sure," Moran said. "The maitre'd at the Vanity Club, Ruiz' receptionist."

Figueroa frowned. "He is?"

"Yeah," Barent said. "Isn't that why you called us?"

"No." Figueroa shook his head. "I called you because that's Carlos Rivera."

Barent stared at the screen. "Well, hallelujah," he finally said. "Which office has he gone into?"

"Number twenty-three." Barent looked at Moran, who was flipping the pages of the hospital directory. Moran found number twenty-three, nodded and looked up. "Longo," he said.

ONCE A MONTH, JAIME Ruiz came for dinner at Tony Korda's mansion in the Fieldston section of the Bronx, more often than that if circumstances seemed to warrant it. Tonight was routine.

Korda was a man who tried to have no illusions about other people or himself, particularly himself. He had been a wild kid, he knew that, with a real chip on his shoulder, but that was years in the past. Korda did not regard himself as a cruel man, not anymore. When he was very young, he had acted out of rage, then out of necessity. Now...now, he enjoyed himself.

Ruiz picked up his soup spoon, dipped the spoon in the bowl and raised it to his lips. Korda smiled. Six months ago, Ruiz had not known what a soup spoon was. Now, he wouldn't have dreamed of using anything else. It was amazing, Korda thought, how often those who lived by breaking the major rules of society insisted on aping the little ones.

To Korda, it was all a game. He had long since passed the point where he needed the money. Now, he did what he did to amuse Tony Korda.

Korda was an intelligent man. While his college career had long ago been aborted, he was nevertheless widely read. In the long run, we are all dead. Sartre got that one right.

"How has the take been going on the betting parlors?" Korda asked in his grating voice.

Ruiz quickly swallowed. "Good," he said. "Up fourteen percent."

"Any problems?"

Ruiz' lips thinned. His nostrils flared. "The connection to the Caymans is coming unglued."

"The banker still antsy?"

"Yes," Ruiz said shortly.

Korda sighed to himself. With Ruiz it was all personal. Machismo, that's what it was. Face. Ruiz believed in imposing his own brand of discipline on the world. Korda believed in doing as little as necessary to achieve his objectives. In the long run, extraneous moves had a tendency to weaken one's position. "Has he paid back your original investment?"

Ruiz hesitated. "Yes."

"Then let him go. We don't need him."

"He's been useful. He can be more useful," Ruiz said.

"I don't agree with you."

A butler brought in the next course, a salad. Both men picked up their salad forks. The butler left.

"He's an investment that has already paid off and now is going sour. Take your profit and put it somewhere else."

Ruiz stared at him, his breathing rapid. "It's a mistake," Korda said mildly, "to let other people know what you're thinking."

Ruiz hesitated. "Maybe you're right," he said. He grinned wryly then and took a deep breath. "Flanagan and Raines, they mess up pretty bad. The police know."

"Exactly," Korda said. "Forget about Oliver Thomas. There are plenty of other sharks in the sea."

Two days later, a member of the surveillance team named Cesar Herrera made positive identification of a man named Hector Cruz going into Doctor Philip Longo's office. The day after, there were two more, both young, male and Hispanic. All were known associates of Jaime Ruiz. None were listed as patients in the computer system of Easton Medical Center.

"Tell us about Longo," Barent said.

Kurtz rubbed a hand across his forehead and winced. "He's a nice guy," Kurtz said. Then he amended, "He seems like a nice guy. I know him pretty well. Bill Werth and I go fishing with him. We went out to Montauk last summer and chartered a bluefish boat. Then in the fall, we went up to the Beaverkill for trout."

"Go on."

"His practice is tremendous. He employs two physical therapists of his own. He works hard. He has a reputation for being better than most in the O.R. He doesn't yell at the nurses, which puts him one up on a lot of surgeons, believe me." Kurtz grinned weakly. "He's a normal human being."

"Strange way of putting it," Barent commented. He blew smoke at the ceiling, then said: "These therapists, you know them?"

Kurtz shook his head. "No. I've never met them."

"Isn't that strange?"

"Not at all. A lot of people work here. I don't know most of them."

"What are their names?"

"I couldn't tell you."

Barent blew smoke at Moran. "Find out from Wellesley." Moran nodded.

"How about his secretary?"

"He has two of them, both full time. Most of the surgeons' secretaries cover for each other when their own boss is in the O.R., but not his. With the therapists always there, they've got plenty of work to do, even when Longo isn't around."

"Do you know their names?"

Kurtz shook his head. "Sorry."

Barent glanced at Moran, who nodded again. "How is he with money?"

"What do you mean?"

"Bad investments? Any debts? Does he like to gamble?"

Kurtz frowned. "He goes to Atlantic City now and then, and he's going to Las Vegas next month with Farkas—he's a plastic surgeon—and some of the other guys. I never heard of him being a compulsive gambler, if that's what you mean."

"What else?" Barent asked.

Kurtz shrugged. "What else...?" He stared off into space, thinking about it. You thought you knew a guy, and then something like this happens. What was relevant? "He collects antiques, or his wife does. His wife is on the Board of Settlement House. Longo does a lot of charity work."

Barent glanced at Moran. "Sounds like a fine, up-standing citizen."

Kurtz spread his hands to the side. "I always thought so."

"Whatever is going on has got to involve money," Barent said, "and you can bet it's some sort of a scam."

"Blackmail?" Moran said. "Fraud?"

"Big time physician, runs his own physical therapy..." Barent smiled cynically. "My wife threw her back out a few years ago. Let me tell you, they bill plenty for physical therapy and insurance covers nearly all of it. I would bet on insurance." Barent turned to Kurtz. "You ever been in Longo's office?"

"Sure. It's like any other office." He thought about it. "A little bigger than most. He has a treatment room for the P.T."

Barent's pencil went tap-tap-tap on his notebook. "Tell me about his wife."

"She's his second wife. Her name is Sylvia. They've been married for about five years."

“What’s she like?”

“I don’t know her too well.” He thought about the New Year’s Eve party and gave a tiny shudder. “She’s got a reputation for getting what she wants. Settlement House is the best funded charity around here.”

“I don’t know much about Settlement House,” Barent said.

“They run a homeless shelter, collect food and second hand clothing for poor families, sometimes help people get jobs.”

“What happened to the first wife?”

“Divorce.” Kurtz grinned fleetingly. “Surgeons get divorced a lot. Women think it’s glamorous, being married to a surgeon. They find out pretty quick that they spend most of their time by themselves.”

“How long did the first marriage last?”

“I’m not sure. I think about ten years.”

“Any kids?”

“Two.”

“Alimony?”

“I have no idea.” Kurtz shrugged. “Probably.”

Barent leaned forward, the tips of his fingers pressed together under his chin. “Think about it,” he said. “Maybe something else will occur to you. We’ll talk again.”

“Wait a minute,” Kurtz said. “What does all this have to do with Sharon Lee?”

“Damned if I know,” Barent said. “Maybe nothing.”

“So what are you going to do about Oliver Thomas?” Moran asked.

“I’m going to alert the F.B.I.,” Barent said. “What else would I do?”

“Why haven’t you done it yet?”

Barent blew a smoke ring up to the ceiling and watched it spread out. “No hurry,” he said. “No hurry at all.”

“Sure,” Moran said. Then he grinned. “Anything new on the wedding plans?”

Barent blew another smoke ring and gave Moran a woebegone look. “They’ve finally decided on a menu,” he said. “First, the open bar and hors d’oeuvres while the stragglers wander in, then we all move to the buffet table. After the buffet, the sit down dinner will feature shrimp cocktails followed by a salad followed by a choice of London broil and baked potato or saffron rice and Hawaiian chicken. Filet of sole with asparagus will be offered for the diet conscious. Music and dancing between the courses, naturally. Dessert will be the usual Viennese table, with, of course, the cake.”

Moran grunted in sympathy.

Truthfully, Barent hadn’t fully decided yet what to do about Oliver Thomas. The list that Thomas had given them was intriguing. Gordon Stone, Roberto Alvarez and Raymond Santiago were presumably false names. Neither the police nor F.B.I. files had any record of them. Gordon Stone—whoever he was—made deposits in the three to four hundred thousand dollar range. Raymond Santiago put in more like fifty to a hundred thousand at a time. Big operator and small operator. Stone’s deposits were regular, always on the third Monday of every month. Santiago put money in on no discernible schedule but rarely missed more than a few weeks at a time.

Barent had been operating all along on the supposition that Tony Korda was the elusive mastermind behind this whole affair, the spider at the center of the web. Unfortunately, he had been able to gather no evidence to prove it.

He had one person in custody at the moment who might—despite his earlier denials—be able to give him some answers. Jimmy Raines was awaiting trial for kidnapping, forcible restraint, felony manslaughter and attempted murder.

“Tell me about Tony Korda,” Barent said.

Raines looked at him with his flat, dead eyes. “Go to Hell.”

Barent smiled. “Jimmy, you’re facing enough time to last you the rest of your life. You’re sure you don’t want to think about making a deal?”

“A deal?” Raines looked around the little room as if searching for a place to spit. “You’re a cheapskate, Barent. I’m not interested.”

Barent leaned back, allowed a smug, happy look to wander across his face. “Well, maybe you’re right,” he said. “A little word to the prosecutor about cooperation with the police—what’s that worth? A lousy five years? Ten?”

Raines snorted through his teeth. “Not good enough.”

“No?” Barent loved the look on Raines’ face, desperate and desperately trying not to show it. Raines’ face was thinner. His skin, once as smooth as a baby’s, now hung off his cheeks in sagging jowls. “We could probably go a little higher. If you really know what you’re talking about, make a significant contribution toward the elimination of organized crime in the City of New York, there could even be a place for Jimmy Raines in the Witness Protection Program.”

“Witness Protection is federal,” Raines said.

“I’ve got friends.”

Raines gave a small, bitter laugh. “Sounds good,” he said. “Only problem is, I’ve got nothing to sell. Was Korda involved? I’ve got no idea. I free lance. Sometimes people approached me. I never knew who they worked for; it was better that way. Sometimes Charlie Flanagan asked me to help him out on some of his action. Sometimes I say ‘yes.’ Sometimes I say ‘no.’ If I say yes, then an envelope full of cash appears under my door.”

“And what if you get caught?”

Raines laughed again. “Then I’m on my own.”

Barent was not surprised. Keeping your mouth shut was the number one rule in the criminal code of survival. You get caught, you’re on your own. You talk, someone, somewhere, sticks a knife in you. It may be years down the road and a thousand miles away but it was as inevitable as the changing of the seasons. “I bet you really enjoy swinging in the breeze,” Barent said.

Raines shrugged. “It was the best deal in town. Believe me, they all paid well.”

Barent sighed and rose slowly to his feet. “Sorry we couldn’t do business, Jimmy.”

“Charlie told me this last job was sort of weird,” Raines said. He said it in an even, offhand tone. “He got a call. He never saw the face. Whoever it was mentioned people Charlie knew, jobs he had done in the past, enough so it had to be on the level. Charlie said the guy had a strange voice,” Raines said. “A real deep voice, like that guy in the movies, I forget his name, the one who played Darth Vader.”

Barent’s ears pricked up. “James Earl Jones?”

“Yeah.” Raines nodded. “Him. Charlie said he would recognize that voice.”

“Charlie’s dead,” Barent said. Raines shrugged. “Yeah.”

A voice...Barent thought about that for a moment, then shook his head. A voice without a face to match it wouldn’t get too far with the D.A. “I’ll keep it in mind,” he said. “Don’t count on anything. A voice isn’t much.”

The next afternoon, the report arrived regarding the physical therapists and the secretaries. The therapists were named Donald Lake and Evelyn Morris. The secretaries were Janet Crowley and Kimberly Jones. There was no history of criminal activity listed for any of them in any police or government file.

“Look at this,” Barent said.

Moran looked at the file. Prior to the current staff, Longo had employed a number of different nurses. “Jean Evans...Margaret Donaldson... Louise Klein. So?”

Barent shrugged. “These were all young women. Young women tend to be transient. They get married; they get pregnant; their husband moves; a better job comes along. A high turnover is pretty common. But about five years ago, suddenly Longo had no more turnover. That suggest anything to you?”

“The ones he’s got now are in on the scam,” Moran said.

Barent nodded. “I would bet on it.”

“Think we’ve got enough for a warrant?”

Barent gave him a look that said Moran should have known better. “No way,” he said. “So the Doctor sees patients—big deal. We have nothing to tie him to Sharon Lee. We have no evidence that any crime at all has been committed.”

“Why do you need a warrant?” Kurtz asked. “Robinson gave you permission to go in.”

Barent hissed disdainfully through his teeth. “Robinson gave me permission to enter the building but the offices are leased to the physicians. I can’t go into the office without a warrant or Longo’s specific permission. At this stage, I’m not about to ask. If Longo’s got anything in there, all he has to do is say ‘No.’ He knows we’re on to him; he destroys the evidence and we’re left with nothing.” He shook his head. “It’s not enough. We need more.”

“Where do we get it?” Kurtz asked.

Barent looked at him and scratched behind his ear. “I don’t know.”

KURTZ HAD BRIEFLY CONSIDERED Lutece, or maybe La Caravelle, but you couldn't get a reservation at any of the top French restaurants on such short notice, not for a Friday night. Anyway, the place down in Cancun had been French, which might actually have been a good association to make but which, he came to the reluctant conclusion, seemed just a little too contrived. Indian, he decided—foreign enough to be exotic but familiar enough to seem comfortable, at least to a New Yorker.

The place was called Shangri La. It occupied the penthouse of an older building off Fifty-Ninth Street. The floor was tiled in squares of pink and black marble and copies of temple sculptures adorned the walls. A man dressed in white robes sat in one corner on a raised dais and played the sitar. The waiters wore turbans and red jackets with gold epaulets on the shoulders.

Kurtz had requested a table by the window. There wasn't really that much of a view, but at night the dirt and the potholes became invisible, and any street corner of the city became something to see, full of flashing headlights, brightly lit windows and the constant, swirling motion of people wandering by below.

"Very nice," Lenore said.

"I think so."

A waiter brought over a basket of crispy papadums, spooned mint and tamarind chutneys onto two small plates and handed them both menus.

Kurtz watched her while she studied it. It was hard not to. She was wearing a light blue silk blouse that showed just enough décolletage to be enticing without being crass, a matching skirt and a string of pearls around her neck. Her golden hair was arranged in short bangs over her forehead and then fell loosely down her shoulders and back.

"Shall we each order what we want, or shall we share?" Lenore asked.

"Why don't we each order what we want and then share?"

She grinned. "Sounds good to me."

Kathy would have wanted to come to a consensus regarding each dish. The thought occurred to Kurtz fleetingly, then he dismissed it.

They gave their order. The waiter wrote it down impassively, gave a little bow and departed. A few seconds later, a girl who appeared to be no older than fifteen brought them two oversized bottles of Golden Eagle beer, popped them open and poured half of each bottle into two frozen steins.

"Cheers," Kurtz said, and took a sip. Tiny crystals of ice had already formed on top of the beer.

Lenore was looking intently into her glass. "I've never seen that before," she said. "Do they keep the glasses in the freezer?"

"I guess they do."

"I like it."

Lenore, Kurtz figured, was the sort who took things as they came. What she didn't like, she ignored. Maybe living with a mother who was just a tad unpredictable (to put it charitably), had something to do with it. Then again, intrusive, manipulating parents just as often produced children who were hostile, rigid and full of preconceived notions into which every new experience had to neatly fit. More often, in fact.

The waiter wheeled over a cart and placed a platter of golden fried vegetable *pakor*as and four meat samosa—triangular pastries filled with spiced ground lamb—down on the table. “One of the few advantages to living in a city like this is the fact that you can find any sort of food to eat any time you want it. I love this stuff,” Lenore said.

“The food was pretty simple where I grew up. Mostly meat and potatoes.”

“A deprived childhood, without a doubt.”

“Oh, I don’t know. People weren’t shooting at me in West Virginia.”

Lenore’s face immediately fell. “Oh, Richard, I’m sorry. I forgot.”

He grinned faintly. “It’s alright. It only hurts when I move.”

“I guess you better not move,” she said, and grinned back.

They finished the appetizer and within a few moments the waiter wheeled over the main course: a platter of rice with peas and chopped onions, flavored with cardamom and fennel seeds, chicken tandoor, shrimp in a coconut curry and saag paneer, a dish of buttery creamed spinach with cubes of homemade cheese.

Lenore rubbed her hands together. “Oh, boy,” she said.

A dozen different spices were blended into each dish and they were all tingling hot. They ate for a little while without speaking, putting out the fire with spoonfuls of raita, a yogurt sauce with cucumber and dill, and gulps of the ice cold beer. Finally, Kurtz sighed and pushed away his plate. “Great stuff,” he said.

“Yes, it is,” Lenore agreed. She stifled a lady-like burp behind a fist. “But it’s not really Indian, though. Most Indians are Hindus and Hindus don’t eat meat. They call it Northern Indian but it’s Pakistani, mostly. Pakistan is a Muslim country and a lot of Americans, particularly New Yorkers, aren’t too fond of Muslims these days, not after the Ayatollah, Saddam Hussein and September 11th.”

“I didn’t know that.”

She shrugged, looked down at the cars passing by on the street and sighed. Then she said, “I understand that they caught the man who shot you. He’s the same one who beat up Harrison.”

“Yes. He was living in Chicago.”

“I’m glad.”

“So am I.”

“So,” she said delicately, “is Harrison. He told me.”

She was still looking down at the street. The expression on her face was guarded. “You still see Harrison?” Kurtz asked.

“I still talk to Harrison. On the phone, mostly.” She looked him in the eye and grinned wryly. “He says he would like to remain friends. I don’t know how realistic that is but I feel obligated to give it a shot. I’m not too happy about the way things turned out.”

“I see,” Kurtz said, a non-committal comment, but one that seemed suddenly wiser to express than the sentiment (the very sincere sentiment) that things between Lenore and Harrison had most certainly happened for the best. It must have been fate.

Lenore grinned wider. “Yeah,” she said.

For dessert, they had small ovals of sweetened cheese with slivers of pistachio, sprinkled with rose water, and tiny cups of thick coffee flavored with cinnamon and mace.

“Would you like a brandy?” Kurtz asked.

She shook her head. “I don’t think so. Not after the beer.”

Kurtz glanced at his watch and said, “It’s a little early to call it an evening. How about a movie?”

“I don’t think I’m in the mood for a movie,” she said. She squinted one eye at him and looked for an instant like she was mulling something over. Then she grinned at him with one side of her face, gave a tiny shrug and said, “How about your place?”

The bar on East Houston was busier at night. There were three dancers now, two blondes and a brunette, and they swung their hips like they meant it. The stage behind the bar was lit with strobe lights that changed color every few seconds, red to magenta to blue and back again. Barent winced. The music was something by the Pointer Sisters, not exactly Barent’s cup of tea. He had looked at the flickering lights for no more than a few seconds and already he could feel a headache coming on.

He wandered to the back of the bar where it was a little quieter and found Croft sitting in a booth with two women, drinking Roederer Cristal. Croft wore a brown leather jacket and a paisley tie. On the table sat a tan fedora with a leopard skin band around the rim. One of the women was black, with creamy smooth skin and long, curling black hair. The other was blonde, with blue eyes and full, red lips. They both wore tight, low cut dresses and they both sat very close to Croft.

“Barent,” Croft said. “Didn’t expect to see you here so late. Sit down. This is Heather”—he smiled at the top of the blonde’s head—“and this is Chantal.

“Ladies, this is Officer Barent, of the New York City Police Department.”

Heather and Chantal both cast Barent doubtful glances. Neither of them said a word.

“Heather. Chantal.” Barent tipped his hat and slid into the seat opposite Croft.

“Drink, Barent?” Croft asked.

Barent shook his head. “I’m on duty.”

“Damn,” Croft said. “I’ll have to watch my mouth.” Heather was looking at Barent warily. Chantal snuggled up to Croft’s arm and smiled as if she hadn’t a care.

“I need some information,” Barent said.

Croft looked miffed. “What am I, a library? Can’t a man enjoy a quiet evening after work with his lady friends?”

Barent smiled at Heather. He craned his head forward and said, “Boo.” Heather blinked and looked startled.

“Now look what you done,” Croft said. “You scared her.” He patted Heather on top of her head. “Daddy won’t let the big bad policeman hurt his little girl.” Heather looked up at Barent uncertainly.

“Tony Korda and Jaime Ruiz,” Barent said.

Croft winced. “Not in front of the children.”

“Then take a hike, girls,” Barent said pleasantly.

Both women looked at Croft. He nodded and they rose from the table without a word and walked over to the bar. Croft stared after them.

“New merchandise?” Barent asked.

Croft shrugged. “Korda and Ruiz not my business. I told you what you wanted to know. Why you bothering me now?”

“It wasn’t enough.”

“It was all I had,” Croft said. He shook his head, chugged back his glass of champagne and poured another. “Look, Barent, there ain’t nothing new in this. Kids, they play their little kid games, like cops and robbers. But in the ghetto, they be serious games. You know how many kids in the ghetto die before they grow up? One quarter get shot or stabbed or stomped on or O.D. And what you think happens to the rest? Not one in ten gets out of there unless he got people he can count on, someone to watch his back. So kids, they need protection, they form a gang, and after awhile they ain’t kids no more and then what? Kid games not enough. They want to play grown up games. But they don’t know how. So if they not too dumb, they look for a bigger gang to take them in, show them the ropes. That's the way it is with Ruiz and Korda, or so they say on the street. Me?" Croft shrugged. "I don't mess with things that don't concern me."

Barent shrugged. "I've heard the story before; this city is filled with rejects from the criminal major leagues."

Croft nodded sagely. "That exactly what it is. Ruiz, he a little rough around the edges, maybe not too smart but smart enough to know it. He need a little polish, a little shine. Korda, he give him some jobs, shine him up real good. Ruiz handle them, Korda give him some bigger ones. Pretty soon, Ruiz and his boys playing in the big leagues, they a part of the team."

"Unless they decide to form a team of their own."

"It happens." Croft poured another glass of champagne. "You sure you won't have some?"

"No, thanks." The thought, actually, made him feel ill. Even from across the room, the music made his skull vibrate and the flickering lights were inescapable. Barent's head was beginning to seriously pound.

Croft pursed his lips and swirled his champagne. "You know that fella wrote The Godfather? Mario Puzo? After he wrote The Godfather, he wrote another book called Fools Die. You think Ruiz know how to read?"

Barent peered at Croft doubtfully. "When did you get so literary?"

"Not much to do in prison. Place had a good library."

As soon as the door closed behind them, Lenore stepped toward him, still with that same faint grin on her face, put her arms up over his shoulders and kissed him. It was a very nice kiss, an expert kiss. She used her teeth delicately, nibbling on his lower lip. Lenore wasn't going anywhere, wasn't planning on doing anything else with the rest of the evening except stand there and let her lips rove over his, her tongue peeping out enticingly every once in a while to tease his. He put his arms around her back and she reached up to run her fingers through his hair, all the while keeping their lips glued together.

Kurtz felt dizzy. He felt like maybe neither of them were getting enough air. He remembered reading somewhere that hawks sometimes died while mating. They flew as high as they could, joined together, folded their wings and plunged toward the earth at two hundred miles an hour. Only when they were finished did they uncouple and fly off. If they didn't finish in time, they died. Kurtz felt like he might die right here from lack of oxygen. He felt like Cary Grant in that old Hitchcock movie, kissing Ingrid Bergman, the one where he was a secret agent and she was reluctantly infiltrating the gang of bad guys. The censors at the time didn't allow a kiss that lasted more than a few seconds, so they had to vary the kiss, mixing it up with little sighs and whispers of conversation, so that they could claim it wasn't really one kiss, it was a series of kisses that went on almost forever, and which wound up being far more erotic than one single kiss could possibly be—and that was a pretty good way to feel, even if (especially if) little red lights were dancing before your eyes and you seriously thought that you might blissfully slide into unconsciousness.

"I can't breathe," Kurtz whispered.

She went right on kissing him and he went right on kissing her back. It was amazing. Not since high school had a kiss (or rather a kissing experience) been so satisfying, and that was only because kissing was at that time as far as he had ever gotten and he could barely imagine anything better. The thought occurred to him that maybe he should start to vary the action, slide a hand up under her skirt, maybe let the tips of his fingers wander over her breast but nope, if this was as good as it seemed, and it seemed pretty amazingly good, then Richard Kurtz was going to let things happen as they happened and be blissfully content to go along for the ride.

As it happened, after what seemed to be about five hours but was actually somewhat less, Lenore broke off, leaned back, looked up into Kurtz' eyes and said, "Undress me."

Despite what trashy novels always said about it, Kurtz had never found undressing a woman to be the phenomenal experience it was cracked up to be, mostly because women's clothes were a lot more complicated than men's clothes, and unless you really knew what you were doing, you always wound up fumbling for zippers and buttons and clasps that you either couldn't quite reach or that wouldn't quite come undone. It probably would have been more romantic to simply rip the clothes off a woman, let her know you really wanted her and couldn't wait a single second longer, but most women, whatever they might say about the virtues of unrestrained passion and romance, tended to get a trifle upset when their no doubt expensive blouses and skirts and lingerie got ruined (Kurtz could remember one smart young lady in college who always wore a one piece jump suit with a single long zipper in the front when she was in the mood. A man could peel a woman out of a garment like that as easily and romantically as you please without having to fumble around like a jerk.).

But hey, what the hell? If Lenore wanted it, Lenore got it, especially here and especially tonight. She stood there with her eyes half closed while Kurtz gently, oh so slowly, opened the buttons on her blouse, pausing after each one to kiss the golden skin that the button had concealed, and by the time he had opened the last one and slid the blouse down over her shoulders, her breathing was rapid and she audibly sighed. She was wearing a low cut, lace edged bra, so sheer it was transparent. She kissed him again, hard, and he unclasped the bra, paused for a moment to look at her and then slid her skirt and bikini panties to the floor and then she was gloriously naked.

She smiled wickedly and looked suddenly thoughtful. "There's something very sensual and erotic about standing here undressed with a man who still has all his clothes on," she said.

"I never realized that. Should I keep them on?"

She frowned slightly. "I don't think so." She reached up and unbuttoned the top button of his shirt, then hesitated and stepped back with an impish grin. "No," she said. "You do it. I want to watch." His clothes were off in maybe a thousandth of a second, or maybe a millionth. She squinted at him as if assaying what she had found and then nodded in approval and stepped forward and then his arms were full of squirming, gasping Lenore.

Ten seconds later, they tumbled into bed, giggling.

Lenore wasn't loud enough to wake the neighbors but she made a gratifying amount of noise, which Kurtz thought was very considerate of a woman, letting a man know how much she was into it. It certainly puffed up the old ego. Once, when Kurtz slowed down, thinking he might be hurting her, she groaned out, "No. Keep going," which was just fine with Kurtz.

And then it was over, at least for the moment, and they lay there panting, arms and legs twined together and Kurtz thought with a sleepy glow that he had rarely been so content in his life. Somehow, Kurtz had slipped down on the bed and Lenore was clutching his head to her breasts. One perfect, pink nipple was bobbing next to his eye. He kissed it and she gave a tiny purr.

"I'm not usually this aggressive," Lenore said in a low voice. She yawned. "I want you to know that."

"No problem," Kurtz said, and kissed the nipple again. It was beginning to pucker. "Believe me."

"Kathy might come back to you. I wanted to stake my claim." She gave him a wicked, sleepy grin. "I like that," she said. "Don't stop. And try the other one."

Which also was just fine with Kurtz.

BARENT WOKE UP WITH his headache intact. He briefly considered calling in sick but glumly rejected the idea, dragged himself out of bed and drove to the office, his temples throbbing. Once there, he poured himself a cup of coffee, swallowed two aspirin, picked up the phone and slowly dialed Kurtz' office. Mrs. Schapiro answered and asked him to hold. After a few moments, Kurtz picked up. "Barent," he said, "What's happening?"

Barent winced. The sound of Kurtz' voice was like a knife slicing through his brain. "I was wondering if anything else might have occurred to you," he said. "About Longo."

Kurtz hesitated. "No," he said. "Sorry."

"Too bad," Barent said morosely, "I was hoping it might have."

"Sorry," Kurtz said again, then, "Are you alright?" he asked.

"What do you mean?"

"You don't sound too good. Is anything wrong?"

"Just a headache," Barent said. "I get headaches. I asked a doctor about it once, he said maybe it was migraines. You know anything about migraines?"

"Not too much. Do you take ergotrate?"

"No. Should I?"

"I think you should see a neurologist. They know more about headaches than I do."

Barent grunted. "I was in a bar last night, talking to a guy who had given me some information. They had these colored strobe lights. I don't know why anybody thinks it's sexy, seeing women dancing around in strobe lights. They don't look sexy to me; they look like aliens from outer space."

"Colored lights?" Kurtz said.

"Strobe lights. Red, purple and blue. Jesus, my head is killing me."

"Lights..." Kurtz said. His voice was distant.

"Yeah," Barent said, "lights. What about them?"

"Son of a bitch," Kurtz whispered. "Lights..."

"Hello, again," Barent said.

"Just can't stay away, can you?" Ronald Evans simpered. "Did you bring that luscious hunk with you?"

"No," Barent said, "the hunk is back at the office."

"What a shame. Well, what can I do for you?"

"Is Mario home?"

"No. He's at work."

"Maybe you can help." Barent reached into his jacket pocket and pulled out a series of black and white photographs. "Do you recognize any of these men?"

Ronald looked at him doubtfully. "Again?" he said. He took the photos and shuffled through them. When he came to the fifth one he stared for a moment, his brow wrinkling, then nodded briefly. "For sure," Ronald said. He tapped the picture with a fingernail. "This one."

Barent realized he had been holding his breath. He let it out slowly. "Finally," he murmured, "we're in business."

"It was the lights," Barent said. "Mercury vapor bulbs cast a blue light. Red hair looks dark brown under mercury vapor lights. That was smart of you," Barent said to Kurtz. "Real smart."

Barent's headache had disappeared. "You got any more of that brandy?" he asked.

They sat in Kurtz' apartment. Kurtz leaned forward and re-filled Barent's snifter. "I'm glad it worked out," he said shortly.

"We made some black and white prints from the pictures in the hospital directory. Without the red hair confusing the issue, they recognized him right away."

"Great," Kurtz said morosely. Longo. Kurtz still had trouble with the idea. Longo? "I don't get it," he said, and shook his head. "He's a successful surgeon. He doesn't need the money."

"You don't know what he needs," Barent said.

"I guess not. I guess I don't know him at all."

"Doc, listen to me, there's no such thing as your average murderer. I've known cold blooded killers as sweet and mild mannered as choir boys, guys who go to church every Sunday, guys who donate a tenth of their income to charity. I'm telling you, you just can't tell."

You just can't tell...Kurtz had wanted to find Sharon Lee's murderer but he had somehow assumed it would turn out to be somebody he didn't know, or at least somebody he didn't like. Not Longo. "So what now?"

"Good question," Barent said. "In the past two days there have been three more. Longo's running a regular little assembly line. We know these guys are members of Ruiz' organization. We don't know how Rivera got involved with Longo and we don't know how Longo got involved with Ruiz. And we don't know how Tony Korda fits into the picture—if he fits into the picture at all. You know anything about insurance fraud?"

"No," Kurtz said, "not at all."

"Most of it is workman's comp or phony accidents. Minor car crashes are very popular. The way it works, they take out a policy on a vehicle, maybe medical policies also on the driver and passengers, then the guy runs into another car that may or may not also be insured but is full of passengers. This car is also in on the deal and they get half a dozen claims for fictitious injuries on each crack up. Another variation, the guy will stop short at a light and get himself rear-ended. The guy who hit him was set up but it doesn't matter—his insurance has to pay. You don't do it on a highway, you do it on a nice street with a lot of traffic lights where you can't go fast enough to cause serious damage. The injuries are mostly orthopedic or neurologic: lower back pain, chronic headaches, whiplash, the sort of stuff that's difficult to disprove and is likely to need repeat treatment over a long period of time.

"It's quite a racket."

"It sounds like it," Kurtz said. "And how do you figure Sharon Lee ties in to all this?"

Barent swirled his brandy and squinted into the glass. "Maybe she doesn't. We don't know that he killed her, just that they were involved." Barent took a cigar out of his pocket, looked doubtfully at Kurtz, shrugged and put away the cigar. "But now we should have enough to get a warrant."

They jimmed the lock on Longo's office suite and went in the next night. Kurtz was not with them. He had wanted to come but Barent had refused. "You're a consultant, not a cop. You wouldn't want me hanging around in the O.R. and I don't want you hanging around here. So forget about it."

Kurtz hadn't liked it but he wasn't given a choice.

Longo's suite was much larger than Kurtz'. There were three examining rooms. A fourth room was filled with weights, parallel bars, wheelchairs, walkers, canes and vinyl-covered treatment tables. The equipment in the cabinets ran to heavy-duty scissors, rolls of plaster and ace bandages, rather than syringes and vials of medication. Longo's private office was filled with a weird assortment of exotic stuff gathered from around the world: three coconuts carved into faces, one smiling, one frowning, one crying, a set of Zulu shields, a zebra skin rug on the floor, a Chinese tea table with a relief sculpture of two opposing armies set beneath a glass cover. To Barent, most of it looked like junk.

The filing cabinets were closed but not locked. Patient records, neatly typed, filled most of the drawers. There were hundreds of them. He looked under “R” but found nothing for Rivera.

“Here.” A cop named Vargas whispered it to him. Sitting on the secretary’s desk was a black appointment book. “Okay,” Barent said, and rubbed his hands together. He flipped through it briefly. On the dates that the suspects had been seen entering Longo’s office, appointments were listed for Eduardo Santana, Raymond Cisneros, Guillermo Cordova and Paul Vilas. The filing cabinets contained records corresponding to these names and Barent quickly photographed the pages.

“Oh, boy,” Moran whispered. “Look at this.” He held a sheaf of paper in his hand that he had pulled out of Longo’s desk. They appeared to be white typing paper. He held them out to Barent. “Be careful,” Moran said. “Don’t burn your fingers.”

Barent read the first one and whistled. He read, “When you put it into me I came immediately and then I must have come another four times before you finished. I’ve never had a cock as large as yours before and I want it all the time.” The letter—if it was a letter—was unsigned. “Are they all like this?”

“All except the last one,” Moran said. “Take a look.”

Barent flipped through the sheaf to the last page. He stared at it. It read: I know what you’re doing. I won’t let you get away with it.

Barent felt a ferocious grin spread across his face. The tips of his fingers almost tingled. “Put everything back neatly,” he said. “Except these. These are evidence.”

“He’ll miss them,” Moran said. “He’ll know someone was in here.”

“Were they on the top of the stack?”

“No. They were in the middle.”

“Good. Chances are he doesn’t read them every day. With a little luck, he won’t notice that they’re gone, at least for a while. And if he does,”—Barent shrugged—“so what? There’s not a thing he can do about it.”

They put a tail on Carlos Rivera and the men who had called themselves Raymond Cisneros, Guillermo Cordova and Paul Vilas. Within a few days, all four of these men were observed entering the local branch offices of various insurance companies.

One day later, Barent and Moran drove up to a State Farm Insurance office in Queens. The manager was a lanky, thin man with a brush moustache and no hair at all on the top of his head. His name was Joe Weinbaum.

State Farm, it turned out, had no record of Carlos Rivera, but they did have a policy on Eduardo Santana. “He was in an accident about three months ago,” Weinbaum said. “He suffered a dislocation of the sixth cervical vertebrae. It says here he has continuing weakness and pain down both arms and is currently unemployable. The medical bills are”—he frowned—“quite extensive.”

“Who’s the physician?”

“Philip Longo.”

Barent smiled at Moran, who sat back with his hands folded across his chest, seeming to pay the conversation no attention whatsoever.

“What’s this all about?” Weinbaum asked.

“Eduardo Santana’s real name is Carlos Rivera. He’s employed at a nightclub in Harlem. We’ve seen him there. He does not appear to be disabled.”

“How much have you paid out?”

“Two thousand for auto repairs,” Weinbaum said. “Over five in assorted medical bills.” Weinbaum looked vaguely sick.

“Any of that for physical therapy?”

“Most of it. He’s still going and we’re still paying.”

Barent scratched the side of his nose. He said, “We came across this information in connection with another case, the details of which I’m not free to discuss. When our investigation is completed—which should be within a few weeks—we’ll release all the information and then you can pursue charges.”

When they got back to the office, Barent settled himself behind the desk and leaned back, his hands behind his head. Moran poured a cup of coffee. Barent felt good. Things were finally coming into focus. Sharon Lee and Longo had been having an affair. She had found out about his illegal activities and tried to get him to stop. Most likely, he had killed her for it, or had her killed.

“What’s next?” Moran asked.

“Talk to Longo.” Moran nodded.

A knock came on the door. A plainclothesman stuck his head inside. “Man here wants to see you, Lew. Name’s Oliver Thomas.”

Barent and Moran looked at each other. Moran shrugged. “Show him in,” Barent said.

A few seconds later, Oliver Thomas was sitting across the desk from Barent. He seemed uncomfortable. He fidgeted in his seat. Probably worried that he’ll get his suit dirty. Barent smiled. “What can I do for you, Mr. Thomas?”

Oliver Thomas looked at Moran. “Can we speak alone?” Moran put down his coffee and left without a word.

Thomas followed Moran closely with his eyes. When the door had closed, he seemed to relax. “I got a call from Gordon Stone,” he said. Thomas grinned with one side of his face. “I can hardly believe it. He says his organization will be ending its business association with First Amsterdam Savings and Loan. He actually sounded sorry, like he thought I might be upset and he was breaking it to me easy.”

“Congratulations,” Barent said. “That’s what you wanted.”

“Yes...” Oliver Thomas breathed the word as if a tremendous weight had been removed from his shoulders. “It’s incredible. I would never have expected it.” He smiled widely. “I would like to have my notebook back.”

“Really...” Barent let a doubtful look cross his face. “How is your son, by the way?”

“He’s doing fine.”

“And Lenore?”

Oliver Thomas shrugged. “I try to pay the relationship as little attention as possible.”

Barent smiled. “Well, Oliver,” he said, “that doesn’t surprise me. But your little request does. By your own admission, you’ve been involved for a number of years in crimes that include tax evasion, money laundering and racketeering. Under the RICO statutes, the feds could confiscate your entire organization. Do you really expect me to just hand the evidence back to you and forget about it? Why should I do that?”

“Evidence?” Oliver Thomas blinked at him. “What evidence? You have a notebook with the names of people who don’t exist, listing transactions that never took place. Without my testimony, you have no evidence at all. Considering that I am no longer in any danger, I’m not about to give it.”

“You might not have a choice.”

Oliver Thomas was looking just a trifle annoyed. He fidgeted in his seat and leaned forward. "I suppose you could launch a formal investigation. You could subpoena me. I assure you, you would find nothing, and the law does not require me to testify against myself."

"But still, I do have a notebook in your handwriting. How would you explain that?"

"I'm writing a novel." Thomas waved his hands impatiently. "Those are my notes regarding the plot."

"A novel." Barent shook his head in amazement. "I've always admired creative people." He tapped his pencil against the desk while he thought about it. Oliver Thomas was a bigoted, supercilious windbag, but he was probably right. Without Gordon Stone and Raymond Santiago, the notebook alone would not be enough to convict anybody of anything.

"You may be correct," Barent said, "but I think I'm going to hold on to it for a little while longer."

Oliver Thomas opened his mouth to say something, then snapped it shut.

"Yes?" Barent said.

"You'll regret this," Oliver Thomas said.

"Get lost, Ollie." Barent stifled a belch behind his fist. Then he smiled. "And on your way out, would you ask Officer Moran to step back in here? We were about to have a cup of tea before you interrupted us."

Intellectuals only kill their own. It wasn't quite true, Kurtz reflected. They also killed whomever they regarded as a traitor to their class. That, he suspected, was at least a part of the problem with Kathy. Kurtz was intelligent, but he was not an intellectual, not by Kathy's rigorous standards, at least. She had still not called.

Lenore's comment the other night, the one about staking her claim...a lot of men might have resented a comment like that. Not Kurtz.

Kathy didn't trust people who were "certain" about things. Certainty, to Kathy, was the sign of a superficial intellect. Kurtz, on the other hand, had been trained to make decisions. A necrotic gallbladder was not amenable to philosophical persuasion. Kurtz respected people who knew their own mind; he felt comfortable with them. He also respected honesty, which had been one of the things that had attracted him to Kathy in the first place and was also one of the things he liked about Lenore. He supposed he might have felt differently about Lenore's comment if he had felt differently about Lenore, but he didn't. Lenore Brinkman was a woman he enthusiastically wanted to see again, anywhere, anytime. The next time would have to wait at least a few days, however, since Lenore had taken the shuttle down to Washington to consult on the artwork for an ad campaign. In a way, though, maybe that was just as well. Kurtz needed a little time to think. The fact was, he still felt bad about Kathy. He felt bad about the way it had ended (if it had ended). A woman was supposed to stand by her man and Kathy hadn't exactly stood four square and firm by him. But then, if we're being honest, it was pretty obvious that Kathy never had seen Kurtz as "her" man.

Whatever, she had still not called, and after last night he didn't much care...which made him feel guilty. He felt like he was supposed to care.

The next day was hard. The Sharon Lee case was finally breaking and he was only a spectator. That grated on him. He knew the feeling was illogical but he wanted to be there for the kill. He wanted to look Longo in the eye while the police confronted him and see his face crumple and ask him why he did it.

He passed Longo once in the hallways. Longo looked distracted. He had lost weight. Kurtz wondered what was going through his mind. Nothing good, he hoped.

Benson had passed away two nights before. He went quietly in his sleep, his wife at his side. She seemed grateful for the little that Kurtz had been able to do for him.

Nugent had left for the nursing home. Nugent had not been grateful at all. He seemed to think that his continued existence was a disappointment to his physicians and he took a spiteful pleasure in the fact. "Good riddance," he whispered. "Good riddance." And he smiled, his stark, white face glowing with malevolent glee.

“GENTLEMEN.” LONGO’S eyes flicked back and forth between their faces. “Come in.” Did his smile falter just a trifle? Barent couldn’t be sure.

Elegant, Barent thought. Weird but elegant. A large papier-mache sculpture painted in orange and purple sat in the living room. It looked like a cartoon character, with bulbous eyes, a Pinocchio nose and a tiny hat on its head. An abstract wire mobile hung from the ceiling. The windows gave a panoramic view of Downtown, with the Empire State Building framed in the middle.

Longo shifted his feet. He cleared his throat. “What can I do for you?”

“Can we sit down somewhere?” Barent asked.

“Yes, of course,” Longo said. “Come this way.”

They followed him across a tiled floor into a den with thick blue carpet. An oak coffee table sat in front of a brown leather couch. Book cases lined one wall. The other three walls were covered with shelves holding an assortment of small items; knives made of ebony, obsidian and bronze, ivory figurines, feathered masks, jade incense bowls, Chinese maidens carved out of some sort of lavender stone, small boxes from Russia and China painted in black lacquer, coral encrusted candelabras retrieved from sunken wrecks, old gold and silver coins, a pewter teacup with an engraved signature of Paul Revere on its side.

“Don’t touch the boxes,” Longo said, “the lacquer contains urushiol, the active ingredient in poison ivy. It can give you a bad rash.”

“Poison ivy?”

“They used to paint valuables with the stuff, in China. It prevented thievery.”

“I’ll bet.” It sounded like a good idea, actually. Maybe the Department should start recommending it.

Whatever, Longo seemed a bit more confident here in his inner sanctum, among his private treasures. He smiled brightly—though the smile seemed strained—and crossed his legs. “Please sit down,” he said.

Moran slumped into a corner of the couch and fixed his expressionless gaze on Longo’s face. Barent also sat. Longo glanced once at Moran and frowned minutely. He shifted in his seat and looked at Barent. “Tell me about Jaime Ruiz,” Barent said.

Longo blinked. After a long moment, he said, “Jaime Ruiz? I don’t think I know anyone by that name.”

“No? How about Tony Korda, you know anyone by that name?”

Longo shook his head immediately and said, “No.”

“Then how about Eduardo Santana? Raymond Cisneros? Paul Vilas? Shall I go on?”

Longo’s face grew pale and his eyes wandered around the shelves lining the room. Probably kissing it all goodbye. Barent allowed a slight note of sympathy to enter his voice. “Tell me about it. How did you get involved with these people?”

“What people?” Longo whispered.

Barent frowned. “Don’t be a dope. We’ve had you under surveillance for two weeks. We’ve seen every person who entered your office. One way or another, it’s over.”

Longo pulled in a long, deep breath and seemed about to say something. He closed his eyes. For almost a minute, he sat there without moving. Moran gave Barent a tiny grin and Barent nodded. Then

Longo blinked his eyes and looked at Barent. "I gamble," he said. "Did you know that?"

"We knew it," Barent said. "I guess you don't win much."

"I'm pretty good. I win a lot." Longo shrugged.

"But not as much as you lose." Longo shook his head. "No."

"Is that all?"

"No. If it was only the gambling, I might have been able to handle it. I've been gambling for years. Like you said, I always lost a little more than I won but I never got into a hole I couldn't get out of—until my divorce. Annette took almost everything. Do you know the laws regarding child support in this State? Plus alimony?" Longo slumped down in his seat and a pained expression crossed his face.

"The more I got behind, the more I gambled, and the more I gambled, the more I got behind.

"And Sylvia..." Longo laughed softly. "Sylvia has expensive tastes."

"So then you met Ruiz."

"It was at the Showboat. We were playing blackjack."

"He beat you," Barent stated.

"Oh, yeah."

"And now he owns you."

"I know it and he knows it but you'll never prove it. Everything was done through intermediaries. Vilas is the one who set it all up. I collect nothing on the patients they send me. Ruiz gets every penny. I'm trapped, but it's better than being dead."

"I understand," Barent said. "You're in a tough spot." Then he smiled. "So what made you kill Sharon Lee?"

The blood drained from Longo's face. "What?" he whispered.

"You heard me, you bastard," Barent said. His voice was no longer sympathetic.

"Sharon..." Longo shook his head. He licked his lips. "You don't know what you're talking about. I never killed Sharon Lee. I never killed anyone. Sharon and I..."

"Were having an affair," Barent stated.

"Yes." Longo barely nodded.

"And she found out about your little dealings with Ruiz and threatened to expose you. So you decided to kill her."

"That's crazy," Longo said. "Absolutely crazy. I would never have harmed a hair on Sharon's head. I—" He stopped abruptly.

"Go on," Barent said mildly. "Tell us how much you loved her." Longo swallowed. He frowned at the carpet.

"I thought so," Barent said. He smiled widely, put his hands in his pockets and stretched. "Speaking of hair," he said, "you got a zebra skin rug in your office. The two of you do it very often on that rug?"

Longo's face grew red. "I don't believe you have any legitimate reason to ask that."

"Really?" Barent's grin grew wider. "We found what appeared to be horse hair on her clothing. Zebra hair and horse hair look a lot alike."

Longo shrugged.

Barent waited a moment, then said, "And how about this?" He smiled down at a piece of white paper and handed it to Longo. Written on the paper were the words: You won't get away with it. I won't let you.

Longo visibly winced. "Where did you get this?" he demanded.

“Where do you think? From the desk in your office. We’ve seen all the little messages she sent you.”

“Sharon got a big kick out of these.” Longo paused and grimaced in embarrassment. “The thought that she was doing it under the noses of her co-workers really turned her on. She used the computer terminal up on O.B. and sent them through the hospital mail. This one arrived just like all the others. When I first received it, I thought exactly the same thing you did, that Sharon had found out. But why send me a thing like this? We saw each other all the time. Why not confront me with it directly? Once I calmed down, I decided to take the bull by the horns. I showed it to her. She knew nothing about it.”

Barent looked at him. “Then who sent it to you?”

Longo shrugged. “Somebody else.”

“Somebody else,” Barent said. Pretty lame story. Lame enough to be true? Barent looked over at Moran, who shrugged minutely. “Good old somebody else. Tell me, just out of curiosity, what were you doing on the night Sharon Lee was killed?”

“Sylvia and I went to a benefit dinner for Settlement House.”

“And after the dinner? What did you and the lovely Mrs. Longo do then?”

“We came home and went to sleep. We were together the entire night.”

“Convenient,” Barent said. “Did Mrs. Longo know anything about you and Sharon Lee?”

“No.” Longo shook his head emphatically. “Never.”

“So even though she might have had a motive to kill your girlfriend, she didn’t know it.”

“No.”

Longo looked pretty shaken up. Good. He deserved it. He also looked sincere, which didn’t mean a thing in itself because people who made a habit of telling lies usually got pretty good at faking it. Still...

“We’re going to take you into custody,” Barent said. “The charge is insurance fraud, which actually I couldn’t care less about; but I want to be able to find you if it turns out that you haven’t been telling me the truth.” He stared into space, thinking. “Then we’ll call Robinson,” he said to Moran. “I have an idea.”

It was nearly midnight. Except for the light shining through the glass door of the Personnel Office, the Administrative Floor of the hospital was dark.

Kurtz had been thinking of going to bed when the call from Barent had come. “Meet me in the Personnel Office at Easton. You might find it enlightening.”

“Personnel? What are you talking about?”

“Harry and I are doing a little research. You don’t have to bother if you don’t want to but I thought you might be interested.”

“I’ll be there,” Kurtz said.

He pushed open the door and entered. A long counter contained an open section in the middle. Behind the counter, parallel rows of stacks crammed full of file folders rose almost up to the ceiling. Nobody was in sight from the front of the room but Kurtz could hear voices coming from behind the stacks. He walked through. Barent and Moran were sitting at a long table with piles of folders strewn across the top. A small man with rumpled clothes and an annoyed expression on his face stood at the head of the table.

Barent looked up at Kurtz. “Sit down,” he said. He glanced at the little man. “This is Jerry Simon, the Chief of Personnel. Robinson asked him to help us out.”

“This is most irregular,” Jerry Simon complained. “I see no reason why it couldn’t have waited until the morning.”

Barent ignored him. "Take a look at these," Barent said. He handed Kurtz a small pile of folders. "Tell me what you think."

Barent looked pleased. He had a happy smile on his face. Moran, though he rarely looked anything but impassive, was smiling as well. Kurtz weighed the pile doubtfully in his hand. "What's this all about?"

"Take a look."

At this hour of the night, Kurtz was not exactly in the mood for games, but the expression on Barent's face made him pause. He shrugged.

When he opened the third folder, he blinked, then looked up sharply at Barent. Barent's smile grew wider. "Jesus," Kurtz whispered.

"Let's go," Barent said.

Five minutes later they walked through the open doors of the Obstetrics Suite. Barent and Moran were in front, Kurtz right behind them. "I figured you deserved to be here but stay out of our way," Barent had said. That was fine with Kurtz.

It seemed to be quiet for a change. The delivery room doors were all dark. Nobody was screaming. A group of five nurses sat together in the central work area, sipping coffee and talking. They all looked up as Barent approached. Barent fixed his eyes on one of them, a pretty woman with dark hair. "Hello, Mrs. Ryan," he said softly.

She frowned. "Detective Barent..."

"Yes," Barent said. He paused for a moment, smiled, then said, "I'd like you to come down to the Station House with me."

"Why?" she asked in a small voice.

Barent glanced at the other nurses, who were staring wide-eyed at his face. "I think you know why," he said.

One hand came up and lightly rested on her throat. She blinked. "I didn't do it."

"Sure you did," he said.

“COULD YOU STATE YOUR full name, please?”

Peggy Ryan looked at Ted Weiss with wide, frightened eyes and said, “Margaret Donaldson Ryan.”

“Mrs. Ryan, for the tape, I would like you to also state that you have been informed of your Miranda-Escobedo rights and that you have agreed to give this testimony of your own free will.”

“Yes,” she said.

“Yes, what?”

She said obediently, “I have been informed of my rights and I have agreed to give this testimony of my own free will.”

Ted Weiss smiled. “Thank you, Mrs. Ryan.”

Weiss was enjoying this, Barent thought. He was in his element, a hawk circling for the kill.

“Now, Mrs. Ryan, could you please tell us where you were on the night of December Twenty-Second?”

“Why do you want to know that?” Peggy Ryan’s lawyer asked. His name was Abner Cole and he seemed out of his depth. Probably did mostly tax work, maybe divorce. Barent silently nodded, morosely satisfied with this idea. Yeah, divorce.

“Sharon Lee was murdered on the night of December Twenty-Second,” Ted Weiss said.

“Murder? Who said anything about murder?”

“This is a murder investigation, Counselor,” Weiss said patiently. Cole shrugged his shoulders and sniffed, expressing his contempt for the proceedings.

“I don’t know where I was on that night,” Peggy Ryan said. “It was a month ago.”

“The work schedule on the Obstetrics Floor says that you were working the four to midnight shift.”

Peggy Ryan wrinkled her brow, as if trying hard to remember. “Then I guess I must have been. I don’t recall.”

“As I said, December Twenty-Second was the night that Dr. Sharon Lee was murdered. Does that refresh your memory?”

“You’re harassing her,” Abner Cole said.

Weiss looked at him with a wooden expression. “We’re not in a courtroom. She can refuse to answer any time she wants to.”

Cole shrugged. Peggy Ryan looked confused. “Not really,” she said. “And yet, the next morning, you were observed to be crying. That’s a pretty strong reaction.”

“A person that I worked with every day was dead. I don’t think my reaction was unusual.”

“Do you know Dr. Philip Longo?”

“What’s the significance of that question?” Abner Cole asked.

“It will become clear in just a moment, Counselor.”

Peggy Ryan looked at her lawyer uncertainly. “He’s right,” Cole said. “You don’t have to answer any questions that you don’t want to.”

She still looked uncertain, but she said, “I used to work for him.”

“Why did you leave?”

“I felt that it was time for a change.”

“I understand that you got married shortly after you left Dr. Longo’s employ. Is that correct?”

“I was married about two years later.”

“And now you’re recently divorced.”

“That’s correct.”

“What was the basis for the divorce?”

She looked away, a tense expression on her face. “He was cheating on me. I wouldn’t tolerate that.”

“I see.” Weiss nodded. “Prior to leaving his employ, were you having an affair with Philip Longo?”

“No,” she said immediately.

“Really? Dr. Longo tells us that you were.”

Her lips compressed into a thin line and she sat back into her chair, her shoulders tight and hunched.

“He says that your affair with him began shortly before his divorce. He says that you were rather...demanding. You wanted him to spend all of his time with you. If he had a late case in the Operating Room or wanted to go fishing with the boys, you threw a tantrum. He didn’t like that. He dropped you for Sylvia Shannon, whom he eventually married.”

She stared at him, saying nothing. “So you left.”

“That bitch,” Peggy Ryan said in a clipped voice.

“Perhaps you’ll be happy to know that she’s divorcing him also.” She only looked at him, breathing hard.

“What did you do on the night of December Twenty-Second, after you left work?”

“I don’t remember.”

“She’s already answered that question,” Abner Cole said.

Weiss looked at Cole and shrugged. “I understand that you share an apartment with a woman named Abby Sloane,” he said.

“Yes, that’s right.”

“Do you think Miss Sloane would remember whether or not you came home that night?”

“You’ll have to ask her.”

“We will,” Ted Weiss said. He pulled a sheet of paper out of his briefcase. The paper said, You won’t get away with this. I won’t let you. “Have you ever seen this before, Mrs. Ryan?” Weiss asked.

She barely glanced at it, then looked away. “No.”

“After it’s been used for a little while, the drum on a laser printer begins to develop a pattern of tiny scratches, which leave a corresponding pattern of toner on the paper. This”—Weiss shook the piece of paper, which made a rustling sound—“was printed on the laser printer on the Obstetrics Suite.”

Peggy Ryan shrugged. She stifled a yawn behind her open palm. Weiss grinned. “So then there’s no way your fingerprints could be on this piece of paper; isn’t that so?”

She looked at him and didn’t answer.

“It’s laser printer paper,” Weiss said gently. “It’s smoother than ordinary typing paper so that it can slide into the printer more easily. Paper like this holds fingerprints quite well, much better than most paper.”

Her breath came faster. Abner Cole looked as if he might say something; then he looked away and shrugged.

“No possible way your fingerprints could be on this piece of paper?” Weiss asked.

“I think I’ve had enough of this,” Peggy Ryan said. Abner Cole looked relieved.

Ted Weiss looked at Barent. It was the signal Barent had been waiting for. He took a small, cardboard box out of his pocket. “Would you open the box, please, Mrs. Ryan?”

She did so and looked down uncertainly, then drew in her breath.

Sitting in the box was a gold ring with an inscribed ‘D’ and a small diamond on a black obsidian face.

“Do you recognize that ring, Mrs. Ryan?” Barent asked.

“No,” she said. “I don’t think so.”

“No? The other nurses on Obstetrics tell me that you often wore a ring that looked just like this one, on a chain around your neck. They tell me that the ring belonged to your father.”

“So?”

“As you probably know, a psychiatric patient named Bill Mose has been accused of Sharon Lee’s murder. Mr. Mose is a schizophrenic. He likes to swallow things. He had swallowed that ring. Have you any idea where he might have gotten it, Mrs. Ryan?”

Peggy Ryan looked at him for a long moment. “I hated her,” she said softly.

“As your attorney,” Abner Cole said, “I advise you to stop.”

She looked at him, uncertain. Barent nodded encouragingly. Weiss sat back, an interested, almost sympathetic expression on his face.

Finally, she shook her head, shrugged and looked down at the floor, a brooding expression on her face. “I saw what she was doing,” she said in a small voice. “He met her sometimes on the O.B. floor. I saw them together. Oh, they were careful. I doubt that anybody else noticed what was going on, but I knew him. I saw the way he looked at her. I recognized the signs. And she looked so smug, so satisfied with her dirty little affair.”

Weiss smiled gently. He gave an encouraging little nod. Abner Cole sighed, shook his head and looked away.

“He had other women before me, I know that, but what we had together was special. He loved me. Maybe now he’s telling you a different story—men do these things. They’re always trying to rationalize their stupidity. Then she came along.”

“Sharon Lee?” Weiss asked.

Peggy Ryan looked at him as if he were an idiot. “Of course not. Sylvia Shannon.” She shook her head sadly. “We were going through a rough time right then. His divorce was almost final but the money situation looked terrible and his wife was giving him hell. He was under a lot of tension and I”—she gave a bitter little laugh—“I was probably not as understanding as I should have been. Maybe he was coming to associate me with his problems, though I assure you, his relationship with his wife had gone sour long before I entered the picture. Still, I was with him when he was going through the bad times and maybe he wanted somebody who wouldn’t remind him of them. Then he met her.” She shrugged. “I couldn’t take it. I quit. I saw him every once in a while after that but I don’t think he saw me. I tried to keep out of his way. It would have been too painful. And then recently he began taking up with Sharon Lee.” She shook her head. “Everybody hated Sharon Lee. She was an arrogant, obnoxious bitch.”

Barent had heard somewhere that women doctors often had a difficult time of it with women nurses. It seemed there was a lot of resentment on both sides. Then again, from everything he had heard about her, Sharon Lee probably had been an arrogant, obnoxious bitch.

“One night, I was working the graveyard shift and she had a case, a D and C for a missed abortion. I guess he had a case too because I saw them near the elevators afterward, going up to the call rooms, giving each other little glances like love struck rabbits, and I knew then that I had to do something to stop it. I sent him that message. I don't even know why. I suppose I wasn't thinking very carefully but I knew better than to confront her. She would have just laughed at me, the woman scorned, the sore loser. I guess I thought maybe he would pay attention."

She shook her head. One slow tear began to trickle from the corner of her eye. "But they didn't stop, and I couldn't let it go on. I just couldn't. I wouldn't. But I needed help. There was no way that I could...do it by myself. I knew a man who I thought would help me. His name is Emilio Gonzaga. I was the nurse on duty the day his little boy was born with a congenital abnormality. He went crazy. He threatened to tear the place apart and then later, I heard that he tried to sue her. It wasn't hard to find him."

"How much did you pay him?"

"He didn't ask much. He wanted to do it. He really despised her. Almost as much as I did."

"Was he the only one involved?"

"No. He brought along two other men." She frowned slightly. "Carlos Rivera...I'm not certain of the other one, Delgado something."

Weiss glanced at Barent. "Herman Delgado?"

"I think so. Yes."

"Go on."

"I waited until she had a patient in labor at night. I was pretty sure she would be stuck until late and I called Gonzaga. I almost turned out to be wrong. The patient delivered faster than I expected and Sharon left. She was probably halfway home when an emergency case arrived, a teenage girl who needed a stat C-section. So we beeped her and she had to come back. I had called Gonzaga before the late shift started and he came in with his friends. The security guards are supposed to stop people who don't have legitimate business but I had given him my I.D. card to copy. He put pictures of himself and the others on the phony cards, just in case the guards were looking, but they probably weren't. It's never too hard to get past them."

Weiss glanced at Barent again. "So I've been told."

"They waited for me in the basement, in one of the old storerooms. Nobody goes down there at night. It was perfect."

Weiss nodded. "Go on."

"After the C-section was over, I went and got them." Peggy Ryan shook her head and gave a little shudder. "I was frightened, but they were waiting for me, just like they were supposed to. We went upstairs and they stayed behind for a few minutes while I went onto the attendings' wing to make certain it was empty." She shrugged. "It almost always was. We didn't have a key to Sharon's room, either. I suppose they would have broken in if they had to but the connecting room door was open." She stopped and gave a little smile.

"Yes?" Weiss prompted.

"They killed her."

"How?"

"They strangled her."

"Did you see it? Were you there?"

"No. I waited in the connecting call room."

"Why did you go with them? Couldn't they have done it without you?"

Peggy Ryan hesitated. "I wanted to see it. I wanted to see her face." She gave a tiny laugh. "But at the last second, I left. I couldn't bring myself to watch."

“How did you know which room she would be in?”

“The room she was in and the one it connected with were reserved for obstetrics.”

Weiss nodded. “Then what?”

“Then we left. On the way out, we ran into Bill Mose, the psych patient. He was stumbling down the hall, babbling to himself. Gonzaga and Delgado wanted to kill him but I had a better idea. I recognized him. I had seen him when they took the psych patients out to the playground. I knew he was completely out of his mind. He didn’t know where he was or who he was or who we were. He was hallucinating. There was no way at all that he could have remembered us or been any sort of a credible witness. We took him back to the call room and Delgado held him still while Gonzaga and Rivera lifted up Sharon’s body and scratched his arm with her fingernails, enough to draw blood.” She shrugged. “I found a kitchen knife in one of the call rooms. We gave it to him and put him on an elevator.

“I didn’t notice until I got home that the chain had broken and my father’s ring was missing. I couldn’t be certain of where it had happened but it was already morning. I didn’t know what else to do and so I came in to work.” She shook her head and smiled awkwardly. “I was terrified that it might have fallen while we were up in the call room. That’s why I was crying when you saw me; I hadn’t had much sleep and I was pretty strung out. I was afraid you were coming to arrest me, but when nobody mentioned the ring, I figured it would never show up.”

“So that’s it,” Weiss said.

She shrugged. “I hated her. I would do it all over again, even if I knew I was going to be caught. I want you to realize that.”

“Thank you, Mrs. Ryan,” Ted Weiss said. He glanced at Abner Cole, who was staring at the floor with a sour expression on his face. “We appreciate your candor.”

“Well, I would,” she said sincerely. “I really would. I wouldn’t want you to think that I did it for trivial reasons. What she did was wrong, stealing another woman’s husband. She deserved to die for that and I’m not sorry about it one bit.”

“PEGGY DONALDSON.” EDWARD Ornella shook his head sadly and took a bite out of a turkey sandwich. He had brought his lunch into the office and was eating it between patients. “Little Peggy Donaldson. I remember her very well. It was an awful tragedy.”

“What was?” Kurtz asked.

“You didn’t know?” Ornella frowned into space. “I guess you wouldn’t know. Peggy’s mother played around. She left her husband for another man. Peggy must have been eight, maybe nine years old when it happened. Frank Donaldson was a real nice guy. He was pretty broken up about it. He shot himself.”

Kurtz stared at him. “That’s terrible. What happened to Peggy?”

“I’m not sure. I think she was raised by an aunt.”

Peggy Ryan had been well liked. The people she worked with were all stunned by what had happened. Kurtz, who had never known Peggy Ryan, was willing to feel sorry for a little girl abandoned and then tragically orphaned but was not inclined to waste much sympathy on the killer she had grown into. Mostly, he was glad that it was over. Longo would probably lose his license. He might even go to jail, but in the end he was a weakling, not a murderer. Kurtz felt a little better about that. Order had been restored to the world. Here’s to order, Kurtz thought, and sipped his Coke.

Barent was not as pleased. Barent and Moran had dropped in on Kurtz’ apartment the evening before to tell him how it had gone. Barent sat with his shoulders slumped and barely looked at the glass of brandy that Kurtz had placed in front of him. “What’s bothering you?” Kurtz asked.

“I sort of hoped that this case would go a little higher than it has,” Barent said morosely.

“Ah,” Kurtz said. So that was it; the big ones were swimming away. “Maybe it will yet. You still don’t know who killed Herman Delgado. And you don’t know what Gonzaga and Rivera will have to say.”

“True,” Barent said, but he sounded unconvinced.

That afternoon, Barent and Moran drove out to the warehouse where Emilio Gonzaga worked. The foreman gave them a blank look when he saw them walk up. “Gonzaga again?”

“Yes.”

“He’s still at the same place.”

“Thanks.”

Maybe Gonzaga had heard something. Maybe he saw it in Barent’s face. Gonzaga was hoisting a bale in both hands when Barent approached. He froze, then without a word he dropped the bale and started to run. “Hey,” Barent yelled. “Come back here!”

Gonzaga ignored him. Arms pumping, head down, he ran all out toward the entrance on the other side of the stacks. Suddenly, Moran stepped out from behind a pile of shelving. Gonzaga tried to swerve but he stumbled on the dusty floor. Moran spun once. His left foot connected with Gonzaga’s abdomen and Gonzaga collapsed, gasping. “You have the right to remain silent,” Moran said. He pulled a pair of handcuffs from his belt and snapped them around Gonzaga’s wrists. “If you choose to give up that right, then anything you say may be used against you. You have the right to an attorney...”

“I thought you said Shotakan didn’t use kicks,” Barent said as he sauntered up to them.

Moran smiled. Gonzaga looked back and forth between the two policemen. A drop of blood trickled from the corner of his lip. “Shotokan encourages the practitioner to express his latent creativity.”

Gonzaga glared at them. “I tell you nothing,” he said. “Nothing!”

“Who asked?” Barent said.

“Hey, man, you can’t come in here,” Carlos Rivera said.

The little man wore dirty denim jeans and a worn out olive colored parka that leaked stuffing from a small hole below the front pocket. He looked up blearily. “Why the fuck not?” he slurred.

“Cause we got a dress code. Nobody comes in here dressed like that. You want to come in here, you got to wear clean clothes, get a shave, look nice.”

“Shit...” He peered up at Rivera uncertainly. “It’s cold out there,” he whined.

Rivera shrugged. “Tough.”

“Say,” the little man said. “Don’t I know you?”

“Not a chance,” Rivera said.

“Sure. I know you.” The little man squinted, then nodded his head firmly. “You’re Carlos Rivera.”

Rivera’s nostrils flared. A tense expression crossed his face. “Get out of here,” he said.

“Sure.” The little man bobbed his head. “Carlos Rivera.”

“Out.” Rivera reached out and attempted to grab the little man by the collar but he backed away.

“Hey, Carlos, you need any help.” Two enormous bouncers wearing suits and ties approached from the rear of the club.

“No,” Rivera said.

“Jeez,” the little man said, and smiled. “How long you been working here, Carlos?”

“Get out!”

The little man shook his head, reached into his jacket, pulled out a badge with one hand and a gun with the other and said, “You’re under arrest.”

Rivera stopped abruptly. He stared at the little man. The little man smiled widely and said, “You have the right to remain silent...”

Gonzaga, as he had promised, stayed in his cell, glared at them sullenly from under hooded eyes, set his lips and refused to talk. Carlos Rivera also shook his head and said absolutely nothing. Barent was not surprised. “These guys talk, somebody will break their skulls with a baseball bat as soon as they hit prison. Forget it.”

“Peggy Ryan’s testimony ought to do it,” Moran said. Barent hardly heard him. “Yeah,” he said. “Sure.”

“What’s on your mind?”

Barent’s eyes flicked to Moran, then away. He shrugged. “Ruiz,” Moran said, “and Korda.”

“That’s right: Ruiz and Korda.” Moran looked at him questioningly and Barent shrugged. “When all is said and done, the case is solved but we’ve hit a dead end. We’ll never find out what happened to Herman Delgado and we’ve got no way to connect Ruiz or Korda to any of it. At least, no way that will hold up in court.” Barent shook his head sadly.

For the next two days, Barent moped around the house. He seemed distracted. Betty tried more than once to talk to him but he barely heard her and finally she gave up and let him stew. The Priest, Father Michael, visited once to discuss the wedding plans. He pointedly avoided Barent. Barent barely noticed. Barent was thinking. For two days he sat in his chair in front of the television, staring at the list of deposits that Oliver Thomas had given him. By the end of the second day, he came to a conclusion. He copied the list on the Xerox machine at the office, put the copy in an envelope and dropped it in the mail. Then he waited.

Three days later, at two o'clock in the morning, Jaime Ruiz and his bodyguards left the Vanity Social Club. Jaime felt good; all of his plans were going well. He was rich. His head spun with fine cognac and the best cocaine. The night was cold, clear and still, and he breathed in the crisp air like it was another line of coke. He shook his head slowly as he considered where he had come from and where the future was taking him and he thought, No, I don't feel good. I feel wonderful! It was a thought that Jaime cherished and had grown used to. He laughed a little and rubbed at his nose. The tip was numb.

One of his men went to get the car. A minute later, the limousine came around the corner and pulled up to a stop. The doors opened. Jaime Ruiz barely had time to register the single man in the front seat and the two others in the back before their weapons opened fire. Gouts of orange flame pierced the air. Jaime felt something thud against his chest and then, his legs suddenly weak, he slumped to the ground. He tried to gather his feet underneath himself and rose fitfully to his knees but another bullet hit him in the back and he fell. The car doors closed and the limousine pulled away from the curb. Jaime Ruiz blinked his eyes once at the stars twinkling so high overhead, shuddered once and then lay still.

The shooting took place in another precinct and so Barent did not get the call. He first received the news from a third page story in The Times. He noticed the heading, read it carefully through twice, nodded silently to himself and closed the paper.

That afternoon, Moran said to him, "You hear about Ruiz?"

Barent smiled into his cup of coffee. "Uh-huh."

"What do you think?"

"You know that list of deposits that Oliver Thomas gave us?" Barent allowed a small, grim smile to creep across his face. "I wonder about that list, the amounts that Ruiz put in. You think those are the amounts that Ruiz told Korda?"

Moran looked at him.

"The insurance scam, the nightclub...who knows what else Ruiz was into? A guy like Korda, he expects his take. He doesn't get it, he won't be pleased."

"How would he know?"

Barent nodded his head. He stared at the smoke rising from his cigarette, then he shrugged. "These things have a way of getting out," he said.

Moran stared at him for a long time, while Barent sipped his coffee and blew smoke rings at the ceiling, then he slowly smiled. "What about Gordon Stone?" Moran asked. "What about Korda?"

Barent shrugged again. "Patience, Harry," he said. "We're only human."

Peggy Donaldson had been seven years old. She had awakened at night, hearing noises coming from somewhere in the apartment. "Daddy?" she whispered. There was no answer. Sleepily, she got out of bed and toddled down the hall. The sounds were coming from her parent's bedroom, rhythmic gasps, whistling moans. She pushed open the door. Her mother was on her hands and knees in the dark. The sounds were coming from her. She was naked. A man Peggy didn't recognize knelt on the bed behind her, moving back and forth. He was naked too. "Mommy?" she asked uncertainly.

Her mother's eyes snapped open. She saw Peggy and began to laugh. "Come here," she said.

The man behind her stopped moving and slowly smiled...

Abner Cole had posted her bond and now Peggy Ryan was back home after a long two days in jail. Peggy's roommate had moved out in her absence, evidently unwilling to share an apartment with a murderess. It was almost midnight. Peggy Ryan sat at the kitchen table and filled a glass full of vodka and drank all of it in a single gulp. Then she took a Valium out of a pillbox, put it in her mouth, chewed it and swallowed. There had been twenty Valiums in the pillbox; this was the last. She emptied the final shot of vodka into the glass and slowly sipped until it was finished, then she rose to her feet, slid open the door leading to the balcony and walked slowly over to the edge. Her entire body was numb. She barely felt the cold. She closed her eyes, deliberately relaxed her legs and slumped forward, over the railing. She felt as if she were drifting as the ground rushed toward her and she almost giggled. What she did was wrong, Peggy Ryan thought fuzzily. She wondered, in the instant before she hit, exactly who it was that she meant.

He sat on the couch in his living room, sipping brandy, and watched the river flow by. It rippled in the moonlight. "In a Sentimental Mood," Ellington and Coltrane, was playing on the stereo—a very sad piece. Sharon Lee, Peggy Ryan, Jaime Ruiz...they were all dead. Kurtz was alive, reason enough to feel good about things, considering the alternative.

He stared at the phone, brooding, and at that instant, it began to ring. Kurtz smiled wryly and picked it up.

"Richard?" It was Kathy. She sounded hesitant.

For a moment, he could barely speak. "Yes," he said. "How are you?"

"I'm fine." He could hear her swallow. Her voice wavered for an instant, then she said in a rush, "I know it's been a long time but I've been thinking. I've been thinking that perhaps I was too hasty. I miss you.

"Could we get together, please, maybe on the weekend?"

"I see." There was silence for a long moment. "I've been thinking about you, too." He paused, the words suddenly sticking in his throat. He opened his mouth and then closed it. He stared at the phone. He shook his head slowly and said, "I'm sorry, Kathy, but I've come to think that your misgivings were justified. Remember when you said we were different sorts of people? Well, I think you were right."

"Oh..." She sounded surprised. He waited a long ten seconds, then he sighed and gave a little shrug. "Goodbye, Kathy," he said. He hung up the phone so softly that it barely clicked.

Just like that.

Lenore had been home for at least two days. He picked up the phone again and dialed it. Her deep, husky voice answered. "Yes?"

"Lenore? Hi. It's Richard Kurtz."

"Well, hello." The slightest tinge of amusement colored her tone. "I was beginning to wonder if you were going to call."

"I'm sorry," Kurtz said. "I really am. I had some things I had to work out first. Would you like to have dinner with me, maybe tomorrow night?"

"Tomorrow? Let me see...tomorrow is Thursday. Yes, I think tomorrow would be just fine."

"Pick you up at seven?"

"Seven is perfect."

"Is there anyplace special you'd like to go?"

"Not really. Why don't you meet me at my apartment and we'll play it by ear?"

"Okay, I'll be there at seven."

"Great," she said. "I'll see you then."

He leaned back into his couch, sipped his brandy and watched the river drift by. The stars twinkled overhead; the city lights reflected on the water; the moon was full. Nice view, Kurtz thought. The stereo faded into silence.

He glanced at his watch, finished the brandy and rose to his feet. He had a tough case scheduled for the morning, a gallstone stuck in the ampulla of Vater, where the common bile duct and the pancreatic duct join together before entering the duodenum. The stone had caused obstruction and scarring of both ducts. The indicated procedure was to take everything apart and sew the pancreas and the remains of the bile duct directly to the duodenum. It was a tough case, Kurtz thought, an interesting case.

He could hardly wait.

—The End—

• • • •

We hope you enjoyed Surgical Risk.

THE SERIES CONTINUES with The Anatomy Lesson, in which surgeon Richard Kurtz and police detective Lew Barent are determined to solve the brutal murder of Rod Mahoney, a respected Professor of Anatomy at Staunton College of Medicine.

Click Here To Get, The Anatomy Lesson Now!

• • • •

KEEP READING FOR THE next book in Fractured

• • • •

JUMP TO THE TABLE OF Contents

• • • •

ROBERT I. KATZ— COLUMBIA College; Northwestern Medical School; Professor of Clinical Anesthesiology and Vice-Chairman for Administration at Stony Brook University; Clinical Professor of Anesthesiology, University of Florida and Chief, Anesthesiology Service, North Florida/South Georgia Veterans Health System; author of 15 novels including the Kurtz and Barent mystery series, the Chronicles of the Second Interstellar Empire of Mankind plus author of the non-fiction Make Money, Don't Lose Money: The Defensive Investor on Thriving and Surviving Through Bull and Bear Markets.

For updates regarding new releases, author appearances and general information about Robert's books and stories, please sign up for his newsletter/email list at www.robertikatz.com/join.

AUDREY J. COLE: INSPIRED BY MURDER

---

INSPIRED BY MURDER

BY AUDREY J. COLE

Author's Rating:

• • • •

Language: * Sexuality: * Violence: *****

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE, each book in this collection has been rated by the author for language, sexuality and violence, so that you as a reader can make an informed choice.

Our collection includes books that span the intensity range.

Language Intensity:

- * - No or mild profanity, if any
- ** - Stronger profanity, with up to 5 uses of the f-word
- *** - Strong language

Sexuality Intensity:

- * - Sexual reference or no sexuality
- ** - Sexual reference which might include some details.
- *** - Intense, descriptive sexual scenes

Violence Intensity

- * - Violence, but no gory details.
- ** - Mild violence, fairly detailed with some blood
- *** - Detailed violence

Inspired by murder Copyright © 2018 Audrey J. Cole

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, businesses, places, events and incidents are either the products of the author's imagination or used in a fictitious manner. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, or actual events is purely coincidental.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, scanned, transmitted, or distributed in printed or electronic form without the written permission of the author.

He's a master of the human mind. But can he get away with murder?

Dr. Eric Leroy hungers for literary fame. Exhausted after years of listening to his rich clients wallowing in their worries, the psychiatrist intends to pursue his true passion of writing murder mysteries. And with his most obnoxious patient in mind, he crafts a killer plot to write exactly what he knows...

Eric's blood pressure felt like it had doubled by the time he pulled into the parking lot of his psychiatry practice. He sped into his reserved parking spot before slamming on the brakes. His brake pedal pulsated under his foot from the activation of his anti-lock braking system atop the black ice. He swore as his six-month-old BMW slid into the metal sign post marked RESERVED. The one day a year Seattle had black ice he had to be late for work.

He got out and walked on literal thin ice to the main entrance of his office. His body tensed from the cold. Seeing his name, Eric Leroy, M.D., etched across the glass depressed him lately. He knew it should be enough. It should be something to be proud of, but he wasn't. He was bored with psychiatry. What he cared about was murder. He wanted to be a writer. A good writer. A great writer. A gifted writer. One who wrote bestsellers and won Pulitzers.

He felt a rush of heat when he opened the door. Crikey. Patricia Watts, his eight o'clock appointment, was already seated in his newly-remodeled waiting room. He wasn't sure why this surprised him when it was after eight fifteen.

She tossed aside her magazine when he came through the door. From the look on her face, you'd think she'd been treading water instead of parking her ass in a comfy chair and catching up on celebrity gossip while she waited for him.

"Morning." Eric heard the voice of his twenty-two-year-old secretary. "Working on your novel again this morning?"

He turned to see her, bright-eyed as usual, waiting eagerly for his response. Telling her about his book was a mistake. She half-smiled at him from behind her desk while she chomped vigorously on a large piece of gum.

"Just a lot of traffic today," he said.

"Novel?" asked his eight o'clock, as though she were part of the conversation.

He pretended like he hadn't heard the question. Begrudgingly, Eric marched toward his office but turned back before he reached the door.

"Come on back, Patricia," he said in a professional tone, trying to rebuild the boundary in their relationship.

He closed the door behind her as she threw down her purse and plopped herself into one of his leather chairs as if she'd been on her feet for hours. The seat cushion let out a whoosh as it deflated. Eric took a seat in his chair across from her and tried his best to look interested in whatever she might have to say. He reached for his notebook and pen.

"How about you tell me how things have been going this last week." He tried to not stare at her cankle crease that became visible below her pant seam after she sat down.

"Well, I wish you hadn't been late because I have quite a lot I want to talk about."

So talk about it, he thought. "Right. Let's get started."

He leaned back in his chair and pretended to be engaged as Patricia rattled on about her latest woes. Judging solely by her looks, she was a hard woman to figure out. Her straight gray bob, cut to a blunt line above her jaw, suggested she was uptight. The lack of attention she gave to her figure, however, suggested something else.

For the last six months, he'd been listening to Patricia bitch about pretty much everyone she encountered. Her problems were always someone else's fault. As he'd had the pleasure of getting to know her, he'd observed Patricia was overindulged and completely absorbed with herself. At fifty-two, he surmised her personality bore no hope of improvement. At least, none that he could offer her. If it weren't at the cost of sounding too dramatic, he'd say listening to her had become beyond exhausting.

Eric doodled on his notebook as she talked. If he could only tell her the truth in less than clinical terms: you're a whiner. You're a big, fat whiner. Maybe then she'd be forced to look inward. But saying something to that effect would most likely lead to the loss of his practice. So, he allowed her to continue bitching about the newest pain in her ass, while he allowed his mind to drift back to his book. Where it belonged.

His mind also began to psychoanalyze itself after losing interest in the hopeless, self-obsessed Patricia. His mother was Australian and his father came from a long line of American patriarchs. They both had a love for the arts. Why he had decided to become a doctor he did not know. He realized now that he needed to create.

He was aware that Patricia had moved the focus of her bitching toward her husband. Poor bastard. Eric had been married once. She was nothing like Patricia. She was beautiful. Patricia was still complaining when he looked down at his wiry hand, startled by what he had drawn.

He had doodled Patricia lying in a puddle of her own blood with a dismembered arm laying off to the side. A ferocious beast looked ready to devour her, its jaw open wide, exposing ginormous fangs.

Interesting. Must've been his overactive subconscious.

Shockingly, Patricia said something intriguing enough to make him look up.

"I think this all started when I saw my brother die."

"How did he die?" he asked, genuinely curious.

"He was murdered."

Eric snapped forward in his chair. "Go on." He focused on Patricia for the first time that morning.

"I try not think about it."

"Do you think you can tell me what happened?"

He thought she would benefit from talking about it, especially after she brought it up. He also hoped it would be something he could use in his novel.

"I was twelve and he was eight. Charlie was his name." She paused, and he could see she was starting to tear up.

He handed her a box of tissues from the table beside him.

"Take your time," he said, hoping she'd get on with it.

She dabbed her eyes and seemed to compose herself. "It was a hot summer night. July. I had left my bedroom window open for a breeze. My mother's boyfriend was in a drunken rage."

Oh, drat. A domestic affair. But maybe he could use it. He listened closely as she continued.

"I closed the window so the noise wouldn't travel around the neighborhood. He was beating my mother, I could hear it all the way down the hall. I knew better than to interfere. But not Charlie."

She stopped to dab her eyes again.

"He finished with my mother but still needed someone to beat on. I heard his heavy footsteps come down the hall. I knew there was nothing I could do to stop him. He flung open my bedroom door and I braced myself for what was coming. He stumbled into my room and, at first, all I saw behind him was the poker stick. I didn't see Charlie until after he swung the poker into the back of my mother's boyfriend's head. But the blow didn't even faze him. He ripped the poker stick out of Charlie's hands before he took another swing..."

He waited in silence. After a minute, she went on.

“I’ll never forget the look on Charlie’s face after he died.” Tears now freely ran down her face, and she made no effort to wipe them away.

Eric found it hard to feel sorry for her. He only felt for poor little Charlie. He wished it had been Patricia the boyfriend had killed. Charlie sounded nice.

When their time was up and she had collected herself, he offered his condolences and gave her his standard, Well, I think you’ve got a lot to think about response before pushing her out the door. He liked that last bit about the look on Charlie’s face. He pictured Charlie, his soft brown eyes staring into nothingness and his hair matted with blood. That he could use in his book. At least their session hadn’t been a complete waste.

• • • •

ERIC WAS EAGER TO GET home that evening and work on his book. Patricia’s story had inspired him. He let himself into his small, modern apartment, poured a glass of wine, and sat down to write. He sat by his floor-to-ceiling window, enjoying the company of the city lights. The evening skyline was a mix of modern skyscrapers and smaller, historic buildings.

He could’ve easily bought a house in the suburbs with more space and a yard. But that felt like it was for someone with a wife, kids, and a dog. Not that he would’ve minded a dog.

So here he was, over forty, living in a small apartment, with his only heir to the world being his psychiatry practice full of self-obsessed, albeit well-paying clients. But that would all change when he published his bestseller.

The words flowed easily that night. But when he reread the pages, he knew it wasn’t the edge he needed. The scenario wasn’t quite right for his book. His writing felt more tangible and had improved after hearing Patricia’s account. But he needed something more.

He shut down his laptop and had a terrifying thought. What if he died tomorrow, before he had written and published his brilliant novel? Before he accomplished his true purpose for being on this earth? It would mean he was no better than Patricia, just a waste of human life.

• • • •

THE WEEK DRAGGED ON and he attended several more pity parties at his office for many different clients. The rush he’d felt from Patricia’s account had already faded; he realized he still had a whole novel to write and was out of ideas. He wanted to craft at least three more murders but had no life experience to draw from.

He was down in the dumps again the next Monday morning when he met with Patricia. She looked the same as always, all her efforts going to her hairdo and none toward her physique. He crossed one of his lanky legs over the other and half-listened to her complain about her husband going out of town for the week on business. His mind drifted back to her account of Charlie’s slaying. It dawned on him that he was jealous she had witnessed her brother’s murder. That was exactly the sort of thing he needed for his book.

He wanted to write a masterpiece so bad he could kill for it. For reasons he couldn’t explain, he examined Patricia from across the room, as a hunter would eye his game. She continued to grumble about her husband’s business trip. This gave him an idea.

“We should do this more often,” Adams said.

Stephenson glanced at his partner as he took the exit for the Auburn Airport. “More often? I don't know how often we can make an arrest by answering a Craigslist ad for items stolen during a home invasion turned double homicide.”

“No, I mean go undercover. Even if it is my day off.” Adams pulled his sweatshirt over his holstered firearm. “I'm good at this.”

“You better be good at this. I'm planning to make a clean arrest and make it home in one piece.”

“Don't worry, we will. What could go wrong when you're with me? I should be the one concerned; you're the rookie here.”

Stephenson smirked. Although he'd been working homicide less than two years, he had proven he could handle himself in a life and death situation.

“Does it seem weird to you that these guys are storing their stolen goods in an airplane hangar? That can't be cheap rent,” Adams said.

“They're not renting it. After Jason told me where to meet him, I checked and found the hangar is registered to Walter Perry, Jason and Bryce's father. He died in 2012.”

“That makes more sense. How convenient for them to inherit such a large storage space when they make their living burglarizing homes.”

Stephenson turned the unmarked vehicle into the airport and slowly headed in the direction of the hangars. As they got closer, he spotted the two brothers standing in front of a T-hangar halfway down the row.

Stephenson recognized Jason and Bryce Perry, both convicted felons who'd been the prime suspects in a series of home invasions over the last few months. When their latest robbery ended in the fatal stabbing of the two homeowners, he and Adams had taken over the investigation. Their deaths were two of the most brutal killings he'd ever seen. He stopped the car a few feet in front of them.

“Let's do this,” Adams said before stepping out.

Jason approached Stephenson as he got out of the car. “I thought you said you couldn't bring anyone to help you? My brother could've stayed home.”

“Tony said he could come last minute.” Stephenson motioned to his partner. “I have a bad back, so I figured I could use the extra help. The TV looked pretty heavy.”

“It's not that heavy, but whatever.”

Jason looked back and forth between Adams and Stephenson before opening the door on the far side of the hangar. He and Bryce went in first. Bryce held the door open for Stephenson and Adams to follow.

Jason flicked on the overhead light. Although the hangar was only a third full, the two detectives could see it contained everything they were hoping for. Two large flat screens leaned against one wall. TV stands, a stereo, speakers, all kinds of electronics, home office equipment, and a few pieces of accent furniture were also stored in the large space. It was the final piece of evidence they needed to make their arrest.

“So here's the TV,” Jason said, pointing to the larger of two flat screens.

Adams pulled out his badge when Bryce turned around to face them. Stephenson reached inside his jacket and placed his thumb on the release lever of his gun holster.

“Jason and Bryce Perry, you're under arrest for—”

Seeing Adams' badge, Jason shoved his brother into Stephenson and bolted toward the door. Stephenson pushed Bryce out of his arms. Adams drew his firearm and fixed it on Bryce while Stephenson turned and chased after Jason.

“Get down on the ground and put your hands on your head!” Adams ordered.

Bryce froze, staring at Adams in wide-eyed shock.

“Now!” Adams said.

Keeping his eyes on the detective, Bryce slowly got to his knees and complied.

Stephenson ran out of the hangar in time to see Jason disappear around the corner of the building. Stephenson sprinted after him. When he rounded the corner, he watched Jason turn left down another row of hangars. After turning down the same row, Stephenson picked up speed and started to close the gap.

A small, bright yellow aircraft was parked outside an open hangar and Stephenson realized Jason was headed straight for it. Stephenson watched the pilot manually spin the propeller before the engine roared to life.

Stephenson spotted the gun in Jason's hand as he neared the plane. The pilot threw up his hands when he saw the gun pointed at his head. Stephenson stopped twenty feet from the plane and drew his 9mm. He raised his weapon at Jason, but no longer had a clean shot.

Jason stood behind the pilot with his gun to his head, using him as a human shield.

“Drop the weapon!” Stephenson yelled over the rumble of the plane's engine.

Jason ignored the order and backed up to the door of the plane. With his arm around the pilot's neck and his gun pressed against the side of his head, Jason climbed into the small aircraft and pulled the pilot in after him.

Stephenson aimed his gun at the plane's windshield, but Jason sat behind the pilot who completely blocked his shot. The plane's engine grew louder and the aircraft came directly toward him. Stephenson jumped out of its path as the plane picked up speed.

The aircraft sped toward the taxiway as Stephenson holstered his gun and raced after it. He pushed himself as hard as he could. Despite the plane's increasing speed, Stephenson managed to come within arm's length of the tail.

The plane sped up and the distance between him and the tail widened. When the plane slowed to make the turn onto the taxiway, Stephenson knew this was his only chance to stop it. Already running as fast as he could, Stephenson threw himself forward and dove onto the tail. His hands slipped, but he managed to grab hold of the rudder cable. His feet dragged violently underneath him as the plane veered to the right.

His ankle folded underneath him against the pavement as the plane pulled him across the taxiway, but he was struggling too hard to hold on to the cable to notice. The plane bounced across the grass that separated the taxiway from the runway. Stephenson strained to maintain his grip as the plane swerved onto the adjoining runway.

Out the corner of his eye, he spotted Adams speeding across the taxiway in their unmarked vehicle. Adams drove over the grass and brought the car to a stop in front of the plane. The plane took a sharp turn to avoid colliding with the vehicle and Stephenson cried out as his legs scraped against the pavement.

One of his hands lost its grip as the plane bumped across the grass before continuing back onto the taxiway. The plane took a hard left, causing his other hand to slip off the cable. He rolled to a stop as the plane crashed into a parked four-seat Cessna.

The propeller broke in two upon impact. Half of it landed a few feet from where Stephenson lay on the taxiway. Oblivious to the pain in his ankle, he got to his feet and rushed toward the plane. Adams had gotten out of the car and followed right behind him.

“Are you nuts?” Stephenson heard his partner call out.

He ignored the question and kept running toward the plane.

“You okay?” Adams asked when they approached the back of the plane.

Stephenson drew his firearm before moving to the front of the aircraft. Adams did the same.

“I’m fine.”

Stephenson stood at the door of the plane and aimed his gun at Jason. The pilot was visibly terrified but looked only mildly injured.

“Hands above your head!”

He kept his gun fixed while he waited for Jason to comply. Slowly, Jason raised both hands above his head. Stephenson used his left hand to open the door of the plane.

“Get out of the plane and get down on the ground. Keep your hands on your head.”

Jason complied and Adams handcuffed his hands behind his back.

“Are you hurt?” Stephenson asked the pilot who was breathing heavily in the front seat.

He rubbed his temple. “I hit my head when we crashed, but I think I’m all right.”

“Help is on the way,” Adams said. “I’ve already called for backup and an ambulance. They should be here any minute.”

Adams left Jason lying face down on the ground while he retrieved Jason’s pistol from the back seat. Stephenson helped the pilot out of his light aircraft. After Stephenson made sure he had no visible injuries, the pilot took a seat on the ground away from Jason while they waited for more help to arrive.

Adams ran back to the car to radio their backup unit and let them know they were on the taxiway.

“Are you crazy?” Adams asked after he got back from making the call. “You almost gave me a heart attack.”

“Sorry,” Stephenson said, suddenly aware of the pain in his ankle. “I couldn’t let him get away. Especially not with a hostage. Jason wouldn’t have had any use for the pilot once they landed somewhere.”

They heard the wail of their backup unit’s siren as it pulled into the airport.

“How did you know the plane couldn’t take off with you holding on to the tail?”

Stephenson glanced back at the plane before turning to his partner. “I didn’t.”

Stephenson's phone vibrated in his pocket as he stepped outside the boutique, family-owned jewelry store ten minutes east of downtown Seattle. He saw it was Adams and continued walking down the busy street to his car.

"Hey. How'd it go?"

"I just finished booking them. They'll have their first court date tomorrow. What did your x-rays show?"

"A couple bruised ribs and a sprained ankle."

"I'm surprised it wasn't worse. What did the sergeant say?"

"That he's glad I wasn't killed and to never do anything that dangerous again. But he understands my desperation to catch Jason and keep him from killing the pilot. He didn't say so, but I'm sure he would've done the same thing."

"You're lucky McKinnon is the only person in the department who's crazier than you when it comes to catching a killer. How long are you off for?"

"I'm hoping only a week. I'll see the doctor on Friday about coming back to work."

"Get some rest. I know you probably won't, but take more time off if you need to. Are you home now?"

Stephenson looked down at the small bag he carried from the jewelry store. "Actually, I had an errand to run."

"An errand? After you nearly died? Please tell me you're joking."

"I didn't nearly die. And no, I'm not joking."

"You're unbelievable."

Stephenson pictured his partner shaking his head on the other end of the call.

"Must've been an important errand," Adams added.

"It was."

"Well, I'm definitely not running any errands on my way home. I'm exhausted from watching you in action today."

Stephenson smiled. "Next time I'll let you chase the runner."

"There's just one problem with that."

"What?" Stephenson opened the door to his car.

"I don't like to run."

He let out a short laugh. "That's what I thought."

Eric stayed up practically all night thinking of how he would kill Patricia. By the next evening, he had a plan. He'd done an incredible amount of research in the last twenty-four hours and felt certain he could pull off her murder without a hitch. Or a trace. Her husband's business trip was short, only two days. He'd be flying out of Sea-Tac on a red-eye to New York tomorrow night, and he planned to kill her right after he left.

He remembered Patricia telling him the conference her husband was speaking at paid for him to park at the airport, so she didn't have to drop him or pick him up. Eric would make sure her time of death was right after her husband left for the airport so he'd be the prime suspect. Or, at least, he would be after Eric sent the police Patricia's medical record that he'd doctored up to incriminate him.

He checked his mailbox first thing when he got to his apartment building and was ecstatic to find his lock-picking kit had arrived. How he loved living in a world with overnight shipping.

Once inside his apartment, he was filled with a nervous excitement. He gathered everything he would need for tomorrow night. He'd have to time it perfectly to ensure her husband went down for the crime. At least he would no longer have to live with Patricia. He was about to do the man a favor. This made him smile.

He made a neat little pile on his dining table with his leather gloves, lock-picking kit, and a black baseball cap. He couldn't risk forgetting something. A gun would have been easier. But, being from Australia, he had always despised Americans for their overuse of guns. He shivered at the thought. Guns just seemed so...violent.

He spent the rest of the evening going over every detail he'd preplanned in his head. Finally, he headed for bed, assured his plan was foolproof, if not ingenious. All this research and planning gave him a greater respect for murderers. At least, those who got away with it. Getting away with murder was no small accomplishment.

He climbed into bed with a book to calm his nerves. It was a romance, which wasn't his usual genre, but he needed something to relax him. It was also a New York Times bestseller, and he figured it wouldn't hurt to check out his competition.

The book was written by a bloke from the Pacific Northwest, the story taking place in Seattle. The author's name was familiar to him even though he'd never read any of his other novels. One of his patients must've mentioned him.

He snapped the book closed after only ten minutes upon reading the line: Winter came and went.

Winter never came and went in Seattle. It lingered and stayed way beyond its welcome until it seemed it would never end. By mid-February, the entire outside world looked to have turned a shade of gray. Life was sucked dry of color. Finally, when it felt like there was nothing left to live for, a tiny patch of sun would peek through the clouds just long enough to give one hope that spring was, although late, on its way.

No wonder he made so much money as a psychiatrist. Over the nearly twenty years he'd lived in Seattle, he'd heard several people say they didn't mind the weather. This never made any sense to him. Winter in Seattle was akin to watching a Renee Zellweger movie. The ending never came soon enough.

He turned out the lights, the book spoiling any further appetite for reading. He'd no sooner rested his head against his pillow when he felt a steady, rhythmic vibration in his head. He knew instantly what it was. The drumming. It was even louder than usual. He tried to ignore it, but he could feel it resonate in his bones. He needed to rest; he couldn't afford to be disturbed. He had a murder to pull off tomorrow. And not just pull off, but get away with. But only if he kept a clear head.

He'd tolerated the all-too-frequent noise coming from his neighboring apartment ever since the mediocre musician had moved in two months before. This was only because he was a night owl and the drumming always quit before he went to bed.

The drumming stopped. But who knew for how long, and he couldn't risk not being at his best tomorrow. He threw back his comforter, walked into the hall of his building, and knocked on the drummer's door. He waited for a minute and was about to knock again when the door opened.

There stood his twenty-something, good-for-nothing neighbor. His curly, shoulder-length hair looked its usual mess. He was dressed in sweats and a worn-out t-shirt.

The drummer seemed to be home at all hours of the day and he'd never seen him wear anything nicer than what he wore right now. He'd wondered on occasion how the drummer could afford to live in such an expensive building in the heart of downtown and had concluded his parents must be footing the bill.

"Hiya neighbor." He smiled. Eric didn't.

Who says that? he wondered. He realized the answer to his question was staring him in the face, grinning like an idiot while showing off his perfectly straight teeth.

He was glad he'd never had children. Imagine spending all that money on orthodontics only to have them grow up to be nothing more than an unemployed, semi-talented drummer who annoyed the other residents in his apartment building.

"Hi," he said. "I came to ask if you could stop drumming for the night, given the time and the fact that this is an apartment building."

His neighbor ran a hand through his hair. "Oh. Sure, man. No problem. Sorry."

He hadn't expected him to be so agreeable. He'd already planned on aggressively convincing him to be quiet. But apparently there was nothing more to be said.

"Thank you." He walked back to his room, perplexed by the obnoxious drummer having been so polite.

He lay his head back on his pillow and reveled in the quiet. Would he really be capable of murder tomorrow? It was a silly question to ask himself because he already knew the answer. He was, and had always been, capable. In retrospect, he'd always carried a grudge for the squeamish and weak because he had the ability to do whatever necessary to fulfill his destiny. No matter what. And killing Patricia was the only way to take his writing to the next level.

After tomorrow, he would never be the same. He could never take it back or erase it from his memory. He wondered how his life might have been different if he'd never come to America. There were some things he missed about Australia, like decent people. But he had grown accustomed to life in America, even preferred it. It was now his home.

When his excitement dissipated enough for him to fall asleep, he dreamt of Charlie.

Eric couldn't stop daydreaming about killing Patricia the next day as he suffered through listening to all the pathetic problems of his patients. He envisioned her lying on her bathroom floor, her eyes bulging and her pale skin with a bluish hue. It grew harder to fake interest in his patients as the day went on. Fortunately, most of them were too consumed with themselves to notice.

Finally, his workday came to an end. The sun had already set when he pulled out of the parking lot right behind his last appointment and tailgated the slow-moving traffic back to his apartment. As soon as he let himself in, he went to his room and changed into running tights, athletic shorts, and a zip-up sweatshirt. This way, if anyone saw him in Patricia's neighborhood, they would just assume he was out for an evening jog.

He tied his running shoes and checked the time on his watch. He'd made better time than he thought getting home, and it was too early for him to go to Patricia's. Her husband's flight wouldn't leave for nearly another four hours.

He wondered how to fill the time until he went to her house and realized he was starving. He'd been so preoccupied with killing Patricia he'd forgotten to eat lunch. He surmised it would be best not to have low blood sugar when pulling off a murder and went into his kitchen to make a sandwich.

He sat down at his dining table next to his killing supplies. It surprised him how much he enjoyed his ham and cheese on whole wheat. No condiments. That was how people got fat. He was nervous, yes, but not too nervous to enjoy a good sandwich. The next half hour passed slowly, and he gathered the pile off the table. It would be better to be ahead of schedule than behind.

He used his free hand to wipe the crumbs off the table, take his plate into the kitchen, and load it into the dishwasher before leaving. He hated coming home to a mess.

Avoiding traffic cameras on the way to Patricia's Madison Park home took longer than he planned. He didn't put her address into his GPS in the unlikely event he became a suspect, but he'd found it on a map earlier and had a good idea of where he was headed.

He found McGilvra and turned onto it. He slowed when he saw 3890, counting aloud until the street number reached 3898. He made sure there were no other cars on the street and stopped in front of the two-story home.

Although it was dark, he could tell the front yard was immaculately landscaped. Much more than he would've expected, knowing Patricia. He couldn't imagine Patricia wearing gardening gloves in less-than-ideal weather pruning the bushes or weeding the lawn. Either her husband oversaw the yardwork, or they paid to have it maintained.

Blue lights flashed from inside a front room window. Just as expected, Patricia was home watching TV. He turned his car around at the end of her cul de sac and parked on an unlit part of the street a few blocks away. He checked the time on his phone before slipping it back into his pocket. Patricia's husband's flight would depart in just over two hours. It would take him about forty-five minutes to get to the airport, so Patricia should be all alone.

It dawned on him as he got out of his car that he should've come earlier and watched for Patricia's husband to leave the house. That way, he could've killed her almost immediately after his departure. Oh well, he thought, by the time someone found her body, her time of death would be only an estimation anyway. An hour or so shouldn't make that big a difference.

He felt his sweatshirt pocket for his lock-picking kit and gloves. Satisfied he had both, he got out of his car and zipped his keys into his shorts. He slipped on the gloves, assuring himself no one would find them odd in this weather.

His blood pumped with excitement as he jogged down the quiet street in the freezing cold. By the time he reached Patricia's, the ache in his ears and the burn in his throat from the cold reminded him of why he did indoor yoga to keep in shape. He stopped in her driveway, seeing his breath as it escaped his lungs.

The dimly-lit front yard made it easy to approach her fence. He reached over the wood structure and undid the gate latch. His pulse quickened as he trod softly along the gravel on the side of the house.

This was the first time, in all his preparation, that he stopped to wonder if she had a dog. He moved slowly, on his guard against a beast that might jump out and attack him. But the yard remained quiet. Upon reaching her back door without having his plan ruined by some stupid mutt, he felt himself relax. He chided himself for worrying; Patricia was far too lazy to take care of a dog.

He tried the door and was glad to find it locked. It would've been a shame to not use his lock-picking kit when he'd come so prepared. He pulled out his tools and started to pick the lock. It wasn't quite as easy as the guy had made it look on YouTube. But after a minute, he heard the sweet click of the lock come free.

He entered a small, narrow room and quietly closed the door behind him. He listened for a security alarm, but the house was quiet except for the sound of the TV playing down the hall. He knew Patricia had an alarm system, but she'd told him in one of their sessions that she never set the alarm until she went to bed. So far, so good. The door at the end of the room was open to the hall. The hall was dark except for the flickering blue light from the TV.

He moved toward the door, his running shoes sticking to the linoleum floor. He could make out a washer and dryer against the wall and realized he was in the laundry room. Fortunately, the sound from the TV muffled his footsteps.

He peered out into the hall, making sure it was empty before he stepped out. The light from the TV illuminated the doorway at the end of the hall, which looked to open to a large living area. He paused in the hallway and listened. It sounded like a sitcom and when laughter from a studio audience sounded through the speakers, he heard Patricia let out a deep chuckle. Although he despised her, he was happy for her to have one last laugh. If she only knew what he had in store for her.

He turned and moved in the opposite direction down the hall. He needed to find her bedroom. The other end of the hall opened to an entryway and stairwell. A light shone from above the stairs, and he decided to try upstairs for her room.

He looked at the framed photos that lined the wall as he ascended the carpeted staircase. He was about halfway up when he realized Patricia wasn't in any of them. In fact, the two people who were pictured in most of the photos were a woman in her forties and her teenage daughter.

Patricia didn't have any children. It was the one thing he liked about her. His phone chimed to the sound of his reminder alarm. He scrambled for the phone in his pocket, cursing himself for not putting it on silent. He held up his phone and fumbled to silence it. The words, Reminder: Kill Patricia lit up his screen.

He cursed again at his phone when he caught movement at the top of the stairs out the corner of his eyes. He recognized the skinny teenage girl from the photographs standing at the top of the stairwell. Her curly brown hair came down to her waist, and, despite it being below freezing outside, she wore only a spaghetti-strap tank top and very short shorts.

Her eyes widened upon seeing him, and she let out a high-pitched scream as he turned and ran down the stairs. Obviously, somehow, he had gotten the wrong address. He immediately blamed

Patricia. Had she moved and not told him?

The girl was still screaming when he reached the bottom of the stairwell. He ran toward the front door when he heard his phone skid across the tiled entry.

“Crikey.”

When he stepped forward to pick it up he saw a woman running toward him from down the hall. He recognized her short, dark hair from the family photographs. He swiped his phone off the floor just as she grabbed a vase off the entry way table and threw it at his head. He dove to the side to avoid the vase. The porcelain shattered as it hit the floor next to him. The girl continued to scream at the top of the stairs.

The woman seemed to be looking for something else to throw at him as he stood. He put both hands in the air to try and calm her down.

“It's okay. I was just leaving,” he said, moving toward the front door.

The woman seemed unassured and charged him. Fortunately, the woman was petite. He waited for her to get close and grabbed ahold of her forearm before shoving her onto the floor. The woman cried out in pain and struggled to get up while he made a move for the front door.

To his relief, the door was unlocked and swung open when he pulled. He ran across their front lawn. He could still hear the girl screaming when he reached the front sidewalk. He continued running until he reached his car. He waited to turn on his headlights until he had finally fled their neighborhood.

Eric caught his breath and tried to clear his head on the drive home. It was fortunate he'd been wearing the baseball cap. They shouldn't be able to give a very good description. But how had he gotten the wrong address?

“Dammit, Patricia!” he yelled.

His shout cut through the silence of his small sedan. He slammed his hand against the steering wheel, inadvertently honking the horn and making himself jump. “Dammit!”

Although last night had been a terrible blow to Eric's ego as a killer, he wasn't going to let one small slip keep him from carrying out his master plan. He just needed to regroup. He would count last night's mishap as a learning experience.

He also realized how he'd managed to show up at the wrong address. And it wasn't even Patricia's fault. In his excitement, he had turned onto McGilvra Boulevard East instead of East McGilvra Street. Who knew there could be two streets named McGilvra in the same neighborhood? It was an honest mistake.

He'd come home last night and had a meeting with himself over a large glass of red. He decided he could still kill Patricia in the exact way he'd planned, only he would have to do it tomorrow night, just before her husband came home. He realized it would be even better for him to discover her body and be at the scene when the police showed up. They would suspect him immediately.

He just needed to iron out a few more details before tomorrow night. He couldn't afford any more mistakes.

In the meantime, it was business as usual. He did his best to appear interested in his other self-centered, needy clients as the day went on while his mind focused on how to kill Patricia...and get away with it.

"My mother was an amazing woman. She won three Olympic gold medals for synchronized swimming before she went into politics. She served as the Ambassador to the United Nations for four years."

He looked up from his notepad to his teary client sitting across from him. Susan was in her late forties, and, if he remembered right, had just lost her mother to cancer. She paused from whatever she'd been saying for the last ten minutes and her eyes brimmed with tears. He handed her a tissue box, which she accepted.

"Take your time," he said. I charge by the hour, he thought.

Three more patients and many sob stories later, he was, at last, done for the day. His blonde, overly-bubbly secretary poked her head into Eric's office after his last appointment had left.

"I wanted to make sure it was still okay that I take Wednesday off next week?"

"For my birthday?" she added, seeing the blank expression on his face.

He vaguely remembered her asking him about it a while back. "Umm...sure. That should still be fine. You arranged for a temp to fill in for the day?"

"Yes. Did you need me to do anything else before I go?" she asked with a smile.

She was always smiling. Why, he could never be sure. She was what Australians would call a few 'roos short in the top paddock, but she was pleasant and always looked nice. In the eight months she'd worked for him, she'd always showed up on time and was competent enough to get the job done. He didn't need her to be a rocket scientist.

"Actually, yes. Would you mind smiling at me just a little bit less? You always act like there's so much to be happy about. It makes me feel like a rotten human being."

"Are you asking me out?" She beamed at him, as though he'd be thrilled by her discovery of his secret motives.

He was dumbfounded. She had to be kidding.

"No," he said.

She made no effort to hide her disappointment, and he realized she'd been totally serious. Hopeful even. She looked as though he had crushed her. He couldn't take the way she was looking at him.

"I mean, yes," he heard himself say. "I was."

Her depression quickly changed to giddy excitement. She smiled wide.

"I've been wondering how long it would take you to finally ask."

As if there had been anything between us? he wondered, perplexed.

"So, when?"

"When what?" he asked.

"When do you want to go out?"

"Oh. Right. Umm..." He wanted to say he was in the middle of planning a murder but figured that probably wasn't a good idea. Even though she would probably think he was being hilarious.

"How about tonight?" She looked gratified, like she'd done him a favor by offering to give him exactly what he wanted. Only he didn't want it at all.

"Umm..." He cursed himself for not being able to think of an excuse. He had nothing. "Sure."

She practically jumped in the air.

"Great! I'm starving, I'll just grab my purse. Do you mind driving? I know this amazing little sushi place downtown. You like sushi, right? You're going to love it. Their sake is the best. I'll just be two secs."

In a blur of movement, she turned to fetch her purse, sending her blonde curls swinging through the air. Apparently, both of her questions were rhetorical.

He sighed. This was not what he had planned for the evening. He wasn't even sure how he had gotten himself into this mess. He couldn't let himself be outsmarted by his twenty-two-year-old secretary and get behind in planning Patricia's murder. He was on a schedule. He would just have to tell her the sushi didn't agree with him and hurry home right after dinner.

No sooner had he gathered his thoughts when she reappeared in his doorway. She brushed her blonde fringe out of her eyes.

"Ready!" she announced with glee.

"Great."

Stephenson took a swig from his beer as he flipped the steaks one last time. It had taken longer than usual to barbecue them in the forty-degree weather, but they finally looked about perfect. Not wanting them to be overdone, he used his metal tongs to remove them from the grill. He turned off the barbecue before lifting the plate of meat and heading inside his townhouse through the sliding door.

Serena was already seated at his kitchen table but was too engrossed in her phone to look up when he came inside. Her shiny, dark hair framed her face as she looked down, fixated by her screen.

After making them each a plate with salad and a baked potato to go with their steaks, he joined her at the table.

“I hope you can put that down while we eat,” he said.

She looked across at him through her long, false lashes.

“Of course I can.”

She slid the phone away from her plate.

“You know you didn’t have to cook for me. I could’ve met you somewhere for dinner.”

Stephenson cut into his steak.

“I thought it would be nice since I had the day off. We always go out.”

“You had the day off because you almost got yourself killed this weekend. I still can’t believe you did that.” She reached her hand across the table and grabbed hold of his. “But I’m glad you’re okay. And thank you. This is nice.”

He took another drink from his beer.

“You’re welcome. I might not be in good enough shape to chase murderers around, but I’m not too beat up to cook you dinner.”

“So, what’d you do today?”

“I had to give my medical leave form to Sergeant McKinnon. Then I met with a—”

Serena’s ringtone blared atop the table. “Sorry,” she said before picking it up. “Hi, can I call you back later?”

Stephenson took a bite of his steak.

“No, I just can’t talk right now,” Serena said. “I’m having dinner with Blake.”

He looked across the table at her. She seemed to be looking anywhere but back at him.

“I told you about him,” she continued. “Anyway, I have to go. I’ll give you a call back later tonight.”

“Who was that?” Stephenson asked after she placed the phone back down on the table.

She took a stab of her salad. “Oh, just another realtor from my firm. He wants to talk about doing a joint listing.”

“You told him about me, huh?”

She looked up defensively, then saw he was smiling.

“So, what do you want to do for your birthday?” he asked.

“I’ve got a bunch of listings to show.”

“On Saturday?”

“That’s when most people are available to look. I’ve told you this.”

“I was just hoping we could do something fun for your birthday.”

Her phone went off again. She checked the screen.

“Sorry, it’s a client. I have to take it.”

She got up from the table to answer it. Stephenson finished his dinner alone while she took the call in his living room.

“They want me to do a showing tonight,” she said, coming back into the kitchen as he rinsed his plate.

“What time?”

“I need to leave now.”

“Seriously? You’re not even going to eat?”

“I’m sorry. It’s my first listing over a million. I need to show the firm I’m ready to sell high-end properties.” She came toward him and wrapped her arms around his waist. “Thanks for cooking for me, I’m sure it’s delicious.” She lifted her head and kissed him softly. “I’ll call you tomorrow.”

She turned and grabbed her purse off the table. He leaned against the counter as she rushed out the door. He looked across at her untouched plate while he finished his beer.

They hit rush hour traffic on the way to the restaurant, and it took another twenty minutes to find a parking spot downtown. When they finally got to the modern sushi house, the place was packed. Eric held the door open for his secretary to enter first, which she appeared to take as a sign of his undying love. As soon as he stepped inside, he was accosted by potted bamboo plants slapping him in the face.

The few seats in the small entry area were already filled with people waiting for a table. The music that played reminded him of something from Lost In Translation. He put his name in for a table for two and was told by the hostess it would be at least a thirty-minute wait. Thirty-minutes! He didn't have thirty-minutes. He needed to get back to planning Patricia's murder so he could return to writing a bestseller. He couldn't believe he had agreed to this.

"You're welcome to wait at the bar if you like." She pointed behind her, where there were a few barstools still open.

"That sounds great," his secretary chimed in.

They walked together toward the bar. He realized he didn't even know her name. That could be awkward. He'd obviously known it at one point, like when he had hired her, but somewhere between then and the last eight months she'd worked for him, it must've slipped his mind. Probably because he didn't care.

"Do you like sake?" she asked after they'd taken seats at the white marble bar.

He did, but he needed to stay focused so he could continue with his planning and research after dinner. He couldn't afford to make any mistakes. Although, one drink probably wouldn't hurt.

"I do. You?"

"Love it."

His eyes followed the sound of the kitchen doors opening to the right of the bar. He watched a chef carry a huge tray of raw fish and veggies out to a table for a large group. He wore a Japanese-style chef hat, white with red trim and a flat top.

"What can I get for you two?"

He turned his attention to the bartender behind the counter. He looked like he was probably in college.

"We'll have two sakes, whatever's your best seller."

"You got it."

Eric looked over at his secretary. She stared at him while biting her lip and twirling a small piece of her hair. She was apparently enthralled with his ability to order nothing but the best. He noticed she had taken off the sweater she had worn all day at the office. Her low-cut, pink floral blouse showed off her large breasts.

She looked at him with her green eyes, and he appreciated her beauty for the first time. She had a slender nose, average-size lips, and baby-smooth skin that screamed of youth. She was a pretty girl but not his taste. Too dumb.

He came to terms with the fact he would not be able to think about Patricia's death until their dinner date was over. He forced himself to turn his attention toward his secretary, hoping to get through the dinner as quickly and as painlessly as possible.

"Have I ever told you I love your accent?"

He was about to reply when she continued. It seemed it was another rhetorical question.

“Where are you from again?”

She paused this time, and he assumed this one he was supposed to answer.

“Australia.”

“That's right, I remember you saying that before. Isn't that where Arnold Schwarzwahatever is from?”

“I think that would be Austria.”

“Oh.” She looked confused. “So, anyways....”

She rambled on about how she couldn't believe it took him so long to ask her out when she'd known he'd had a thing for her since pretty much the beginning. She clearly had a wild imagination. She was still talking when they finished their sakes, and he wasn't sure how he could survive listening to her for the next hour. She changed the subject to her hair while he signaled the bartender for two more drinks. He felt himself relax after downing the second one.

A waitress called his name for their table and he practically jumped for joy out of his barstool.

His secretary giggled at his reaction. “You must be starving!”

Something like that. “Yes.” He'd had enough sake that he smiled back at her as they followed the waitress to their table.

She seated them at a small table against the wall. The seat next to the wall was a cushioned booth and across from it was a chair. Eric extended his arm to offer his secretary the booth. She beamed at him before sitting down. His head had cleared a little from the sake by the time he took his seat. They needed to get the show on the road so he could get back to business.

“You like California rolls?” he asked his secretary before the waitress walked away.

“Love them.”

Of course she did. “We'll start with some California rolls.”

“Anything to drink?” the waitress asked.

His secretary looked eager for another drink, and he figured it would be just as easy to ditch her if she was drunk, even if he had to order an Uber to drive her home.

“We'll have a bottle of your best sake.”

The waitress nodded and tried unsuccessfully to suppress her smile surfacing, presumably in hope of a big tip.

We'll see about that, he responded in silence. He looked over the menu as he inadvertently pictured himself standing behind Patricia with his hands around her throat.

“So....” His secretary said from across the table, apparently her best attempt at a conversation starter.

Oh, right. You again. “So.” He set down his menu. “You know what you want for dinner?”

“You want to share something?”

Not really, but to speed things along, he agreed.

“How about the halibut?”

“Sure.” Whatever.

He was staring at the pastel painting of over-fed tangerine and white coy swimming in a lily pad-infested pond that hung on the wall behind his date when the waitress came back with their sake and California rolls. Quick service. He liked it. He wasted no time in giving her their dinner order.

“Great. Won't be too long,” she said.

Maybe she would get that big tip after all. He poured his secretary a large glass of sake and filled his only half full.

“Are you trying to get me drunk?” she asked hopefully.

"I'm driving."

"Oh, right." She laughed before taking a big swig of her sake.

She finished off her glass and had already halfway downed another when their food arrived. Thankfully it hadn't taken too long. His secretary's words started to slur as they ate.

She was in no shape to drive home from his office, where they had left her car. And this so-called date would be over right after dinner. He had work to do. Which reminded him, he was supposed to come down with food poisoning.

He waited until they had finished eating. Her sake glass was empty again, and he refilled it with what remained in the bottle.

"So, what made you decide to become a psychiatrist?"

He honestly didn't know and couldn't come up with one good reason. He wiped fake sweat from his brow. "Would you excuse me?"

"Sure, are you okay?"

"I think the sushi may have not agreed with me," he said while holding his stomach before scurrying away to the loo.

He took his time taking a leak and washed his hands for a full two minutes. He checked his over-bleached teeth for seaweed and splashed his face with water. He partially towel dried his face but made sure his hairline stayed wet when he left the bathroom. It was time to tell what's-her-face goodnight.

He was glad to see her sake glass was empty when he got back to their table. The drunker she was, the easier this should be.

"You don't look so good."

"I don't feel so good."

He caught the attention of the waitress as she walked by. "Can we get the check please?"

"Got it right here." She handed him a black leather booklet.

"Thank you."

Nothing like a waitress who already knows what you need. He slipped his Visa into the plastic cardholder and handed the booklet back to her.

"I'll be right back," she said.

His secretary looked either worried for him or depressed their evening was ending early. Maybe both.

"I'm probably going to be sick again and won't be able to drive you back to the office. Can I get you an Uber?"

"No. I—" She swallowed hard. She looked terrified, and he couldn't understand why.

"Are you feeling okay?" he asked.

"Um...it's just that I can't go home tonight."

"Why not?"

"I told my boyfriend I was spending the night at my sister's. And I can't go to my sister's because she's out of town and I don't have a key."

"You have a boyfriend?"

She reached across the table and put her hand on top of his, knocking over her empty sake glass in the process. "I know you're thinking I'm a horrible person, but it's not what it seems. I do have a boyfriend, but he's really controlling and I'm going to leave him. I've been planning to do it for a while, I just haven't found a way to tell him yet. Anyway, I didn't want to pass up the opportunity when you asked me out, so I told him I was spending the night at my sister's place."

“Maybe you should just tell him the truth.” It seemed simple enough.

“You don't understand. He's—” she trailed off, looking frightened.

“Has he ever hurt you?”

“No, no, it's not like that.” She shook her head in an overly eager effort to convince him. She squeezed his hand. “But please, let me stay with you. I can't go home tonight.”

She pulled her hand away when their waitress came back but kept staring intently into his eyes.

“Have a great night you guys,” the waitress said after handing him back his card.

He ignored her and stared back at his busty blonde secretary. He wasn't sure he believed her boyfriend had never hurt her. She looked genuinely scared. He'd seen enough cases of domestic abuse over his career to know, due to fear or denial, victims were often not forthcoming about their abusers. And, with how much she'd had to drink, he doubted this was an act. It wasn't like him to feel compassion, but there was something about the way she looked at him with those big green eyes that he just couldn't tell her no.

“All right, you can sleep on my hide-a-bed.”

“Thank you.”

He could swear he saw her choke back tears as she leaned back against the booth and pulled her hand away from his. He stood from the table and held out his hand to help her up.

“Let's go.”

“Your apartment's amazing.”

Eric's secretary clutched her sweater to her chest as she turned to admire his living room.

As soon as he'd let her in, he quickly snatched his leather gloves and lock-picking kit off the table. He held them tightly in his hand just barely behind his back as to not look like he was hiding something.

“Can I get you something to drink?” He supposed even though his guest was a pain in his ass, keeping him from planning the murder that would shape his destiny by releasing his creative genius, he could still be a proper host. He also found her endearing despite her flaws.

“Yes, thank you.”

She stepped forward to admire his expansive bookshelves.

“I've got water, wine, or vodka.” He also had coffee, but he wanted her to go to sleep so he could get on with things.

She smiled at the options. “Wine would be great, but I can get it myself since you're not feeling well.”

Oh, right. He was sick. “Yes, help yourself. The wine fridge is to the right of the sink.”

“Thanks.”

He went to the linen closet, pulled out a blanket and pillow for the hide-a-bed, and set them on the coffee table. “The couch folds out into a bed. You okay to do it yourself?”

“Sure, I'll be fine.” She had already made her way into the kitchen.

This went easier than he had thought. He was free at last to plan Patricia's demise. He just needed his laptop.

“Well, I'm going to try and get some rest. You probably won't see me for the rest of the night.”

“Thank you for letting me stay.”

“It's no problem.”

He grabbed his laptop off his desk and unplugged it from the wall. He noticed his secretary giving him a wondering look as he carried it into his room, but she didn't say anything. Probably because of his overreaching hospitality.

He waited until after two to sneak out of his room for a glass of water. His secretary was out cold on the couch. She hadn't even bothered unfolding it into the hide-a-bed. Her empty wine glass sat on the floor next to her. He picked up the glass and admired her for a moment, watching her sleep. Her chest moved up and down beneath the throw blanket with each of her even breaths. Her blonde hair lay sprawled out across the pillow.

He found himself wishing she were more of an intellectual. Maybe then, there could be something between them. Although, his true reason for not falling head over heels wasn't because of her IQ, but because no one would ever compare to his wife. Or rather, his ex-wife.

He pictured her as if their last day together was only yesterday. Her hair was neither brown nor blonde. It was a unique shade of honey somewhere in between. She was a natural beauty and Australian through and through. She shared many of the same magnificent qualities of her beloved country. He could never love another the way he loved her.

He sighed and continued to the kitchen to get his glass of water before returning to his room to iron out the final details of Patricia's death.

HE AWOKE TO THE SMELL of coffee and nearly jumped out of bed at the sight of his secretary standing over him, holding a steaming mug in her hands.

“Crikey!”

She giggled. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to scare you. I made coffee. Are you feeling better?”

He let out a breath and brought his hand to his forehead. There was no way it could be morning already. He had stayed up until after three going over every detail of his perfect plan for Patricia’s murder, making sure he had thought of everything. There could be no room for error. He had fallen asleep after he’d finally assured himself his plan was foolproof.

His bedside clock read seven fifteen. He sat up and accepted the coffee. “A little.”

She was wearing a gray Seattle Mariners t-shirt that he recognized as his own. His shirt came down to the top of her bare thighs. It was obvious from the shape of her nipples protruding through the thin cotton that she wasn’t wearing a bra. Her normally smooth blonde hair had a kink on each side from where she had slept on it. She looked adorable. Beautiful, even.

She pulled at the bottom of the shirt. “I hope you don’t mind; I got this from a pile of clean clothes in your laundry.”

“How did you know they were clean?”

She smirked. “Because no one would fold their dirty clothes like that.”

Except for him.

“You up for going to work today?” she asked.

“Yeah, I’m feeling much better.”

“Good. Mind if I use your shower?”

“Not at all. Help yourself.”

“Great.” She turned and he took a sip from his mug.

“This is good. You know how to make a cup of coffee.”

She flashed him a cheeky, American smile. “I know.”

• • • •

IT WAS A NORMAL DAY apart from the few times he caught his secretary eyeing him as if they’d had some top-secret love affair last night. But, instead of being annoyed, he found it endearing.

They walked out of the office together after his last patient of the day. A light, wet snow was falling when she turned to him before getting into her car.

The sun had just disappeared below the horizon, and he admired the way the street lamp highlighted the contour of her round cheekbones.

“I had fun last night. Thanks for letting me crash at your place.”

“Me too,” he said as she got in.

He’d wondered about her boyfriend a few times throughout the day. What had he done to her that she was so afraid to go home last night? He opened his mouth to ask her if she was sure it safe for her to go home, but he was too late.

She gave him a wave before pulling out of the office parking lot, and he assured himself she would be fine. He climbed into the heated seat of his BMW and suppressed a smile. There was no denying how he felt. Contrary to his best intentions, he liked her.

He counted his blessings for going to the wrong house on Wednesday night. He realized there was something he'd forgotten to consider. An alibi.

He knew there were security cameras in the building's parking garage, but whether they covered every parking space he wasn't sure. He had located two cameras in the parking area, but it seemed there were a few parking spots near the entrance that were not covered by the cameras.

Before work that morning, he called down to his building's apartment manager. A woman answered on the second ring.

"Yes, good morning," he said. "My car was parked in the underground parking last night and appears to have gotten scratched by another vehicle. I was wondering if there might be security footage that could show what happened?"

"I'm sorry to hear that. Yes, we do have security cameras that cover almost all the parking garage. Do you know what parking spot you were in?"

"42A."

"Okay, let me just double check if we would have footage of that area."

"Thank you." Eric waited on the line for a couple minutes before she came back on.

"You still there?"

"Yes."

"Unfortunately, our cameras don't reach to that parking spot. I'm so sorry. There are only about four spots outside of our cameras' view, and 42A happens to be one of them."

Just as he had thought. "What about at the entrance? Can you see what cars came and left overnight?"

"No, I'm sorry. Our only cameras are inside the parking garage; we don't have anything at the entrance."

"Well, that's disappointing."

"Sorry I couldn't be more helpful."

"Yeah, me too," he said before hanging up.

Perfect. That was all he needed to know before he carried out his plan. Luckily, 42A was open when he got home from work. Now all he had to do was create an alibi and he would be off to kill Patricia.

• • • •

DRESSED IN HIS BRIGHTEST-colored flannel pajamas, Eric knocked hard on his neighbor's door. He needed him to remember this.

When he didn't answer after about five seconds, Eric knocked even louder. He heard footsteps heading toward the door from inside the apartment. He knocked three more times before the door flew open.

"What's your problem, man? You didn't even give me a chance to come to the door."

His neighbor looked his usual self, liked he'd just rolled out of bed. Eric wasn't sure, but it looked like his neighbor was wearing the same clothes as the last time he'd seen him.

"My problem is you."

To this, his eyes narrowed and a look of confusion washed over his face.

“I’ve got a busy day tomorrow, and I’ll be turning in early. So, I just wanted to make sure you weren’t planning on doing any obnoxious drumming this evening. I need a good night’s sleep.”

“I’m not gonna do any drumming. I realize it’s getting a little late for that.”

Eric couldn’t leave until he made sure this conversation would stick in his neighbor’s mind.

“Well, I’m not so sure. I remember a few times you seemed to go on a drumming rampage late at night without any regard for the rest of us in the building. I’m surprised no one’s complained.”

Eric knew no one else on their floor would complain. There were only four units on their level. One was currently unoccupied and the other was inhabited by ninety-year-old Betty Jensen. She couldn’t hear a thing.

He opened his mouth to protest, but Eric cut him off. Eric raised the palm of his hand just below his neighbor’s face.

“But I’m not here to argue with you. I just ask that you do me the courtesy of staying off the drums tonight so I can get a good night’s sleep.”

“No problem,” he said. He frowned at him before slamming his door closed.

Brilliant. He had irritated him just enough to jog his memory if the cops ever questioned him about his alibi. Now he could go to Patricia’s.

He went back to his apartment to change his clothes. When he walked by his neighbor’s door on his way out, he heard him start to beat on the drums. He smiled at how easily he’d unnerved him. Bastard.

Eric donned his baseball cap and gloves before getting out of his car at the end of Patricia's street. This time, he made sure to leave his phone behind.

With his lock-picking kit safely stowed in his pant pocket, he jogged down the neighborhood street with his head down. He expected his heart to be racing, but it was calm. Steady.

He paused when he reached the end of Patricia's driveway, feeling a sense of déjà vu from two nights earlier. Her front porch light was on, but, aside from that, the house was dark. He could tell her hedges needed trimming, and the plain front lawn could've used some landscaping. This was definitely Patricia's house.

He moved along a tall hedge on the edge of her property and stopped at a wooden fence. Just as he had done two nights previous, he reached his hand over the fence and undid the latch to open the door. He stepped into Patricia's backyard and softly closed the latch behind him.

Not surprisingly, there was no dog waiting to attack him on the other side. Her backyard was even darker than the front of the house. He moved slowly along the house's exterior, careful not to trip on any crap she might've left laying out on the lawn. He made it to the French doors off the back patio and felt into his pocket for his lock-picking kit. His hand slipped in the darkness just as he was about to insert his tool into the lock. He felt the metal instrument scrape against the door handle before he inadvertently jabbed it into the wood door.

He took a deep breath and tried again. This time the tool slid easily into the lock, only the lock didn't budge as easily as it had when he broke into the wrong house. He pulled it out and tried another time, wiggling the tool back and forth. The lock still didn't give, and he worried he might have to devise another way to get inside. He hadn't seen any other doors on the home's main level other than the front, which he hoped to avoid using if possible.

The lock pick finally glided farther into the lock and he heard a click. He tried the handle and felt relief when it turned inside his hand. He pulled on the lock pick to remove it, but it was stuck. He tugged harder to no avail before he wrenched it back and forth with enough force that it came loose.

He tucked the pick back into his pocket. When he twisted the handle again, he realized he had all but dislodged the lock in his effort to remove the pick. Loose bits from the lock rattled inside the doorknob as he slowly opened the door and stepped inside the house.

Eric had intended to break in without a trace, but now he wondered if the cops would be able to deduce that the back-door's lock had been picked. It wasn't as bad as breaking into the wrong house, but it wasn't according to plan.

His eyes had adjusted well to the dark, and he could see that he stood in a breakfast nook off the kitchen. He heard a TV going in the other room. That was good, it would cover the noise of his footsteps. He crept toward the sound of the TV while he kept an eye out for Patricia. As he moved closer to the open doorway, he could see a blue, flashing light shining out into the hall. He paused before leaning his head just enough to see into the room.

He realized he risked exposing his presence much too early by poking his head inside the doorway, but it was too late. He was already exposed. His heartrate increased. He took an inward sigh of relief when he recognized the back of Patricia's gray bob on the sofa.

He judged her for being such a slug that she wasted her life away sitting on the couch, staring at a screen until her mind went numb. Although, he should have been grateful. This was exactly how he had hoped to find her.

He turned to look for her bedroom, where he would wait for her to come to bed. He saw a staircase at the end of the hall and figured it would be a good place to start. He caught himself stopping to look at her wall of family photos when he was halfway up and quickly reproached himself. What do I care? he thought.

He entered the room closest to the top of the stairs and could tell, even in the dark, it was the master bedroom. He felt repulsed but not surprised by the unmade bed and pile of dirty clothes on the floor. What an animal.

He found her walk-in closet and stepped inside in search of one of her husband's ties. He felt around in the dark, but with his gloves on it was impossible to find what he needed. Oh, screw it, he thought. He flicked on the light to the closet. Patricia was immersed in her TV anyway; she wouldn't notice the light. He just needed to be quick. Her husband's clothes occupied the right side of the closet, and, fortunately, he was much more organized than Patricia.

Unlike her chaotic hodgepodge of clothes on the left, her husband's shirts were hung according to color and shirt type. His shirts went from white to black, t-shirts on one side and dress shirts on the other. Pants were folded neatly on the shelves below. His neckties hung on hangers next to his dress shirts, and he grabbed one before flicking off the light.

He looked around for a better place to hide as his eyes readjusted to the dark and saw she had an en suite bathroom. Perfect. He checked his watch. Now for the hard part: he had to wait. From what Patricia had told him in their sessions, she always went to bed by ten. She complained about her husband being a night owl and disturbing her when he finally came to bed after midnight.

He waited behind Patricia's bathroom door with a rush of nervous tension. The minutes passed by about as slowly as Patricia moved toward anything, other than the fridge. He used the time to remind himself to take detailed mental notes on everything about Patricia's murder. Even the way it felt to kill. He had decided to write his novel from the point of view of the serial killer he had crafted in his mind. They say all a writer's characters are a part of themselves, which, he supposed, was probably true.

He suddenly felt the urge not to kill, but to pee. He laid the necktie down on the bathroom counter and untied the drawstring of his joggers. He could see well enough now in the dark that he had no problem aiming into the toilet bowl. He had just released a stream when light flooded the bathroom and Patricia waltzed in. Upon seeing him, she let out a scream. His body involuntarily jerked in her direction before he was able to stop the urine flow, and he trickled piss onto the floor. In a panicked attempt to pull up his pants, his waistband slipped out of his hand. His sweats fell to the floor from the weight of the lock-picking kit in his pocket.

Patricia wore a grandmotherish nightgown, and, after the initial shock of finding him taking a wiz in her en suite bathroom, she looked relieved when she recognized him.

Truly, she couldn't think this was a social call. He supposed his baseball cap didn't exactly say I'm here to kill you. But she would be beyond delusional to think he came over to keep her company while her husband was away. He was a good ten years too young for her, in addition to being out of her league. Plus, he couldn't stand her.

He took as big a step toward her as he could with his pants down at his feet and watched her face change to suspicion and then to fear. She screamed again, louder this time, and took a step out of the bathroom. He had planned to strangle her from behind, but, knowing he wouldn't be able to catch her with his pants down, he had to improvise.

He swiped the tie off the counter and used both hands to loop it over the back of her head. Her eyes filled with terror as he pulled it taut across the front of her neck. She scratched and clawed at the tie as her face turned the color of beetroot. He felt a tinge of nostalgia for his homeland. He would never understand why Americans didn't put pickled beets on their sandwiches.

He hadn't intended on strangling her head-on and didn't like the awkwardness of watching the capillaries burst in her bulging eyeballs as he squeezed the life out of her. He forgot about the details he needed for his book and closed his eyes until she stopped resisting and he felt her weight start to sink to the ground. He loosened his hold on her neck and opened his eyes.

He expected her to fall to the floor but was taken aback to see she was still alive. Patricia's face was now an ugly purple. She gasped for air and placed the back of her hands against the counter to stay on her feet. She looked at him in shock and horror of what he had done before she swung her fist toward his face. It was as if she saw him for who he really was for the first time.

He grabbed hold of her hand before she made contact and twisted it behind her back, forcing her to turn toward the bathroom counter. She let out a weak cry of protest. He grabbed her by the back of her hair and threw her forehead into her bathroom mirror. Patricia groaned. When he pulled her head away, he saw the mirror had cracked as though a baseball had hit it. Before she could react, he flung the tie around her neck once again, only this time he tightened it from the back.

She groped at the necktie and threw her legs back one at a time in an unsuccessful effort to kick him. It didn't take long for him to realize this was no different from strangling her from the front since her asphyxiated face stared back at him in the shattered mirror. He didn't like it any more than he had the first time. He closed his eyes, promising himself that if he ever killed again, he would keep them open.

He pulled the tie as tight as he could and felt the weight of her body as it went limp. He leaned forward, pressing his body against hers to help take some of the weight from his arms. He continued to hold the noose tight around her neck for what felt like an eternity.

Once he was sure she was dead, he opened his eyes. Out of breath, he let her go. He thought her fat corpse would slump forward onto the counter. But, before he could stop it, he watched her body heave to the side. Her skull smacked against the side of the toilet on the way down.

She lay on the tile floor, her swollen face littered with burst capillaries. Blood seeped out from a gash in her forehead where it had collided with the mirror. His breathing slowed. He looked down at the mess of his yellow piss and her dark blood on the pale tile, reminding him of ketchup and mustard on a hot dog. This had not gone at all to plan. And, judging from the color of his urine, he needed to drink more water.

This led him to wonder, was there DNA in urine? The fact that he was uncertain made him question his abilities as a doctor. But it had been a long time since medical school and, thank goodness, he didn't ever have to deal with his patients' piss. After a moment's consideration, he decided there probably was. Drat. He was going to have to clean this mess up.

He should've been a medical examiner. Then he could've written a crime thriller without needing to kill one of his own patients. He realized his pants were still around his ankles. He pulled up his jockers and cringed as the urine-soaked fabric rubbed against his legs.

“Crikey.”

Keeping his gloves on, he checked under her bathroom cabinet for cleaning supplies. There were none. Of course not. He was about to go in search of some, and, when he thought there was no way this night could've gone more wrong, he heard the sound of the front door close. A man's voice echoed through the house.

“Patricia, I'm home.”

Eric considered his options as he assessed the mess around him. Either he needed to make a quick escape or kill her husband too and make it look like a murder-suicide. He opted for the quick escape. He pulled a few sheets of toilet paper off the roll and wiped his urine spill as best he could, careful not to smear Patricia's blood.

He tossed the paper into the toilet bowl and automatically flushed. He realized the noise this would create as soon as he pulled the lever. Footsteps sounded up the stairs.

The man's voice called out again, but this time it was louder. "Patricia?"

There was no window in the bathroom, so his only route of escape would be out the window beside her bed. Patricia's husband would no doubt see him before he could get away. He would have to kill him.

He pulled at the tie that was still tight around Patricia's neck. He struggled to get his finger in between the tie and her neck since he had looped it through itself to get a better cinch on her neck. Her neck fat sagged over the tie, making it impossible to grip with his gloved hands.

He didn't have time for this. Patricia's husband was probably already at the top of the stairs. He swung open the door to the bathroom cabinet and pulled out her curling iron. He turned off the bathroom lights, ran across the dark room, and dove under Patricia's bed.

No sooner had he tucked under it than the bedroom lights came on. His heart pounded against the carpet as he watched the man's patent leather dress shoes stop in the doorway.

"Patricia?"

Eric gripped each end of the curling iron's electric cord and wrapped them once around the back of his hands. He waited for the feet to move. He thought maybe the man was going to turn back downstairs when they started toward the bed. They didn't slow as they moved past him, and Eric knew he was headed for the bathroom. For this to pass as a murder-suicide, he needed to minimize any signs of a struggle with Patricia's husband. That would probably be easier if he killed him before he saw Patricia.

His feet had almost reached the edge of the bed when Eric stretched out and grasped his ankle just as he started to take a step. Eric yanked it backwards as hard as he could from his awkward angle. He felt the floor shake when the man fell to the ground.

Eric moved fast, crawling over the husband's back until he was within arm's reach of his neck. The man started to flip onto his back, but Eric used his weight to keep him face down to the floor. With one of his knees pressing into the middle of his back, he looped the electrical cord around the front of his neck, crossed his arms, and pulled it taut.

The husband yelled out. Eric pulled harder. His yell turned into a wheeze as Eric compressed his vocal cords. Just like Patricia, he brought his hands to his neck and frantically scratched against his noose. Eric estimated the man had about fifty pounds on him. He was concentrating so hard on strangling him that he was knocked off balance by the sudden roll of the man's body.

Next thing he knew, he was staring at the ceiling with the heavy weight of Patricia's husband on top of him. Eric had slightly loosened his grip on the cord when Patricia's husband knocked him onto his back, but quickly regained his hold when he heard him gasp. The man rolled back and forth on top of him, his weight crushing the air from Eric's lungs. Eric wrapped his legs around the man's middle as best he could to keep him from rolling away. It took all his strength to maintain a tight pull on the cord. His hands shook from the strain on his muscles as he noticed the man's movements become weaker. He exhaled and forced himself to hold tight for a little longer.

Eric was overwhelmed by the powerful scent of the man's cologne. It was about five times too strong for what was socially acceptable. There was something wrong with a man who wore that much. For a moment, he pitied Patricia. Her husband's body finally went limp, but he didn't let go. He wasn't about to make the same mistake that he did with the man's wife. He counted backward from thirty in his head to distract himself from the burn in his arms and hands. It felt like an eternity until he reached zero. Satisfied Patricia's husband was dead, Eric pushed his fat corpse off him. He moved onto his hands and knees to catch his breath.

He lowered himself onto his elbows and examined the man he had just killed. He had a thick build, in addition to the medium-sized potbelly that was obvious underneath his dark suit. His balding hair was overly-slicked back. He was clean-shaven and wore a large class ring on his right hand. He had even more neck fat than Patricia.

Eric wondered if maybe he had judged Patricia a little too harshly.

The man's face was now the color of merlot, and he decided to have a glass when he got home. Eric wiped the sweat from his brow and looked around the room for a way to rectify the situation. He needed to hang him from something, but the room only had recessed lighting on the ceiling.

He left him on his bedroom floor and stepped out into the hall. He crossed his arms at the top of the staircase and looked at the nineties chandelier that hung over the stairwell. A chain helped support its weight on the electrical socket. Perfect.

He went back and grabbed the fat man's lifeless hands to pull him out to the stairwell. He was surprised by the effort it took to drag him. He had a new appreciation for the term dead weight. He thought he was in shape from his regular yoga practice but now wondered if he needed to incorporate something more into his daily workout routine. He released him when they reached the top of the stairs and took a deep breath.

Eric looked again at the chandelier and then at the length of the curling iron's electrical cord. He surmised it would be possible to hang him from the chandelier. Possible, but not easy. He was glad he had worn active gear.

He reached down and linked his forearms under the husband's armpits. Eric stood, pulling the dead man with him. He leaned the man's top half over the railing, careful not to let him fall. Once Eric had him propped in a stable position, he looped the electrical cord inside itself around the man's neck and pulled tight against the power inlet.

After checking if it would hold, he grabbed the end of the curling iron and climbed on top of the wood stairwell railing. He stood up slowly, stopping a few times midway to find his balance with his arms held out at his sides. He held tight to the curling iron attached to the man's neck and used the weight of his corpse to help him stay upright.

He realized the cord was a little short to reach the chandelier unless he pulled the corpse forward. Eric carefully pulled on his neck so that his feet were barely touching the floor. If he pulled any farther, he was afraid his body might topple over the staircase.

Now for the tricky part. He now had enough cord, but he couldn't reach the chandelier without falling. He would have to lob it over the top and hope the curling iron caught on the gaudy crystals.

He threw it over the chandelier, but, when he did, he inadvertently jerked the corpse's neck. The curling iron had almost crossed over top the chandelier when the weight of Patricia's husband pulled it down, before it had a chance to snag on anything. Eric watched as the man's body pivoted over the railing and crashed to the hardwood floor near the front door below.

Eric felt himself fall forward and reacted by throwing himself backward. His back landed hard on cheaply padded carpet. He rushed to his feet and leaned over the railing. Patricia's husband lay face down on the floor in his pinstripe suit with the curling iron wrapped around his neck.

That wasn't good. Eric had read enough true crime to know a medical examiner could tell if a body had been moved postmortem, so he couldn't just drag him up the stairs and have another go at hanging him by the chandelier. He'd probably also sustained injuries from the fall. Eric figured he only had one choice.

He climbed back on top of the railing and launched himself toward the chandelier. He only managed to grab it with one hand. The light fixture swayed to the side while he reached for it with his other arm. He had no sooner gotten hold of it with both hands when it detached from the ceiling, bringing Eric and its surrounding drywall down with it.

He felt the air leave his lungs when his back hit the floor. He decided to leave this part out of his novel.

He stayed there for a moment while he regained his breath and waited for a sign that he had broken his back. He wiggled his toes and, once certain he hadn't broken a bone, sat up slowly. He pushed the chandelier off him and onto Patricia's husband. He wound the curling iron securely around it before standing.

He shook himself off from the fall and assessed his work. He moved some of the drywall pieces on top of the dead man and wiped his hands together over his body to rid his gloves of the white powder. He looked up at the hole in the ceiling then down at the dead man again. This could pass as a suicide.

He had one more look around before concluding his work here was done. He let himself out the back, the same way he had come. He broke into a jog when he reached the sidewalk in front of the house. The cold night air felt good as he headed back to his car and reflected on the evening.

Although there were a few hang-ups, he thought he pulled off the two murders swimmingly. Especially when he had only planned the one. Not too bad for someone who'd never killed before. He couldn't wait to translate them into his novel.

He got to his car and opened the driver's side. Before getting in, he took one last look in the direction of Patricia's house. He was completely alone on the quiet street. Sayonara Patricia.

“Can I get a name for the coffee?” the gothic barista asked from behind the counter.
“Blake.”

Stephenson checked his watch and backed away from the register to wait for his drink. He had plenty of time. His girlfriend wouldn't be leaving for work for another hour. He'd already bought flowers to go with her skinny vanilla latte.

Counting Crows played throughout the coffee shop as he looked over at the small, empty table where he and Serena had spent their first date over a year before. She'd picked the coffee shop—an artsy, locally-owned cafe where most of the customers stayed to drink their coffee out of bright-colored pottery while they lounged on a couch or in an overstuffed chair. They'd had an instant connection and ended up talking for hours. He'd never met another woman like her.

His hand brushed against the small, square jewelry box he'd safely zipped into his jacket pocket. He wanted to surprise her with something thoughtful without being too over-the-top. Serena hated any sort of grand gestures, especially in public. So, he would propose on her front doorstep on the morning of her birthday. It would be private, which she would appreciate, but Stephenson hoped it would be romantic enough.

It was Saturday, and he was planning to take her out to dinner when she got off work. He would've preferred to propose to her then, but he was on call over the weekend and next up for a homicide case, so the chances he might have to cancel were high.

“Blake!” the barista called out before moving on to make the next coffee.

He grabbed the latte off the bar and walked out of the busy coffeehouse to his car. He seemed to hit every light on the way to Serena's house. He drummed his hands nervously against the steering wheel as he waited for light after light to turn green. He didn't want her latte to get cold; he wanted everything to be perfect. His heart was pounding by the time he pulled in front of her house. He checked to make sure the ring was still in his pocket before getting out of his car.

He was surprised to see a Land Rover in the driveway. It was early, but maybe one of her friends had also stopped by to wish her happy birthday.

With Serena's latte in one hand and flowers in the other, Stephenson strolled up her drive and rang the doorbell. He waited a minute for her to come to the door and was about to ring again when he heard Serena's footsteps come through the entry way. Only it wasn't Serena who answered the door.

A shirtless, muscular man a few years older than Stephenson stood inside Serena's doorway squinting from the morning sun.

“It's a little early to be ringing people's doorbells, don't you think?” The man ran his hand through his bedhead of dark hair.

Serena appeared behind him, wrapped in a towel with wet hair dripping down her shoulders. Her eyes widened when she saw who was at the door. She nearly dropped her towel but managed to recover it before it fell to the floor.

“Blake! What are you doing here?” She saw the flowers and latte in his hands. “I mean...um...look, I'm sorry. I meant to tell you.” She pushed herself in between her male guest and Stephenson. “Shawn and I met through work. I never meant for any of this to happen, but one thing just led to another. We've been seeing each other for the last few weeks.”

“Few weeks?” Stephenson was in shock. He thought they were in love, that they'd spend the rest of their lives together.

“I was just trying to find the right time to tell you.”

She laid her hand on Stephenson's arm, but he shook it off.

Shawn remained in the doorway behind Serena, as if he were part of the conversation.

“That would've been before you decided to start cheating on me.”

Stephenson's cell rang from inside his pocket. He tossed Serena's bouquet of flowers onto her front lawn before he answered. His fingers rubbed against the leather jewelry box inside his pocket when he pulled out his phone and he fought the urge to throw it out alongside the flowers.

“This is Stephenson.” He stayed on Serena's front porch as he took the call.

“Hey, it's Adams. We're up. A jogger found the body of a young woman just off one of the trails at Discovery Park this morning. So, looks like you and I get to spend some quality time together this weekend. I'm already on my way to the scene.”

“I'll be right there.”

Stephenson hung up and put his phone back in his pocket.

“Happy birthday,” he said before taking a drink from her latte and turning back toward his car.

“Blake, wait!” Serena ran out onto the porch in her bath towel.

He ignored her and took another swig from the artificially-sweetened coffee. He needed a shot or two of whiskey, but it would have to do for the moment.

Serena continued to holler at him from her front lawn as he peeled out and headed for the crime scene.

The next morning, Eric stared out his apartment window while he breathed through chair pose. In the distance, he watched a sailboat glide across the sound. He took a deep breath and could almost smell the fresh sea air.

He wore an almost identical outfit to what he had worn to kill Patricia. Since he practiced yoga seven days a week, nearly half his closet was active wear. He had already laundered everything he wore last night, including his running shoes, just in case they had picked up anything that could link him to the crime scene.

He decided not to do any novel writing last night when he got home from killing Patricia and her husband. He thought it would be best to let the night's events sink in. He jotted down some notes and made a few sketches while he enjoyed a glass of merlot before going to bed. He wished he could've taken pictures of their dead bodies, but he couldn't afford to have that kind of evidence on his phone.

He surprised himself by sleeping like a baby. He had thought he might have trouble sleeping after committing murder, but he was totally at peace. When his alarm woke him at seven that morning, he felt refreshed and ready to dive into his soon-to-be bestseller.

The sailboat disappeared behind a skyscraper and he moved into humble warrior. He wondered how long it would be before Patricia and her husband's bodies were found.

He liked to do yoga before he started writing. It helped clear his head and get the juices flowing. He focused on his breath entering and leaving his lungs.

He was three breaths into bird of paradise when there was a hard knock at his door. He took one more deep breath before going to answer it. He opened the door to find a man with pale blond hair and gray-blue eyes dressed in business casual. He was clearly of Nordic descent. He flashed his police badge at chest level.

Eric hadn't expected to be questioned so soon. Patricia's murder investigation seemed to be moving much faster than he had anticipated.

The detective was young. That was good. Probably hadn't been solving murders for too long. Eric smiled inwardly, thinking to himself that these were two he wouldn't solve.

A shorter, brown-haired man stood behind him. He looked to be closer to Eric's own age, probably in his forties. He reminded him of Mark Wahlberg, only more muscled. The buttons of his shirt barely contained his pectoral muscles, and his biceps protruded out of his leather jacket. No one was naturally built like that, Eric thought. It was a clear sign of a man who was trying too hard. Surely, he spent hours in the gym every week trying to boost his self-esteem.

"I'm Detective Stephenson, and this is Detective Adams," the blond one said. "Are you Dr. Eric Leroy?"

Eric felt a tinge of nervous tension run through his bowels. He knew this was probably just routine to ask if he knew what kind of relationship Patricia had with her husband, but he suddenly feared they somehow knew what he had done.

"I am," he said, hoping to sound as if he had no idea why the police would be knocking on his door on a Saturday morning.

"We need to ask you a few questions. Just routine. Do you mind if we come in?"

"Not at all." He opened the door wide.

"Thank you."

He led them into his living room and motioned toward the couch. "Would you like to have a seat?"

They followed in single file. "Thanks," Blondie said before they both took a seat.

Eric moved his yoga mat out of the way and sat down across from them. He decided to let them speak first. It was utterly important he not seem as though he knew why they had come knocking on his door. He crossed his legs and felt himself relax. He had planned his reaction to Patricia's murder to the tee. They didn't know what he had done, he reminded himself. The ball was in his court.

The Marky Mark lookalike cleared his throat before speaking. "I'm afraid we have some bad news."

Eric relaxed his mouth and opened his eyes wider as if to say Oh, no.

"The body of your front office assistant, Daisy Colbert, was found early this morning in Discovery Park. She appears to have been murdered," Blondie said.

My secretary? They must be confused. He refused to accept what they were telling him. They had come to question him about Patricia's murder, not his secretary's. There had to be some mistake.

"I just saw her at work yesterday. She was fine. Are you sure you have the right person?"

"Yes, her body has already been identified by a next-of-kin. We know this news is a shock, but we wouldn't have come before she'd been positively identified."

"I just saw her yesterday," Eric repeated, in disbelief of what he had heard. It couldn't be true. Not his beautiful, sweet secretary.

"Do you have any idea of who might have wanted to hurt her?"

It took him a moment before he realized the blond one had asked him a question. It was the boyfriend. He knew it was the boyfriend.

"From what she said, it sounded like her boyfriend could be pretty controlling. In fact, I think she was afraid of him."

Both detectives wore flat expressions, giving Eric no idea whether they believed him or not.

"And, just for our records, where were you last night between ten p.m. and two a.m.?"

Eric was in shock but fortunately had already prepared a response to this very question. "I was in bed, asleep."

"Can anyone verify that?"

"Not really. But I did knock on my neighbor's door around eight to ask him to keep his drums down."

The bodybuilder pulled out his cellphone. "Which neighbor?" he asked.

"915."

He appeared to type this into his phone. Or maybe he was just texting his girlfriend.

"Is there anyone else you can think of who may have wanted to hurt Daisy?" Stephenson asked.

Daisy. Her name was Daisy. "Like I said, from what she'd told me, her boyfriend was very controlling. Jealous too. If I were you, I'd be looking at him."

"Was he ever jealous of the two of you?" the brown-haired detective asked.

Eric thought quickly about his response before he answered. "No."

Marky Mark put his phone back in his pocket, and the two of them exchanged glances before getting up from the couch. "I think that'll be all, Dr. Leroy. Thanks for your time." Stephenson reached out his hand to shake Eric's, and he returned the handshake.

Eric followed behind them as the two men walked toward his door.

"Do you have a suspect? I mean, have you arrested her boyfriend?" he asked.

"Everyone is a suspect at this point in the investigation. We haven't made any arrests yet."

“I'm sure it was her boyfriend.”

“We'll look into that.”

From Blondie's expression, Eric couldn't tell if he took him seriously.

They reached his front door and Adams let himself out first.

“How did she die?” Eric asked before Stephenson went through his doorway.

Stephenson turned and looked him in the eyes, examining him for his reaction. “She was strangled.” Stephenson stared at him for a moment before closing the door behind him.

“Play it again.” Stephenson stood over Adams’ shoulder and looked down at his partner’s computer screen.

Adams played the video from the beginning. Sweat shone against Dwayne’s forehead as he sat across the metal table from Stephenson and Adams earlier that morning. His hands fidgeted on his lap.

“We know this isn’t the first time you’ve hurt Daisy,” Adams said. “We’ve seen the reports from police responding to your residence for domestic disputes—three different times. The police were called twice by your neighbor...and once by Daisy.”

“Is that what happened last night? Did things get out of control?” Stephenson asked.

“That was different. I didn’t kill her.”

Stephenson and Adams waited in silence to see if he would continue.

“We’ve had our fights, but I would never kill her.” Dwayne chewed his lip and looked back and forth at the two detectives. “All couples fight.”

“It seems a little one-sided to call it a fight when you’re the only one throwing the punches. We also know your ex-girlfriend, Kristi Tilman, filed a restraining order two years ago claiming you knocked her around,” Stephenson said.

“She’s a liar.”

“What happened to your hand?”

Dwayne glanced at his red knuckles on his right hand.

“Did you hit Daisy last night?”

“Yeah. But only once. We’d both been drinking. She told me she was gonna move out, and I lost my temper. I hit her on the side of her face. Then she told me to get out, so I did. She was alive when I left.”

“Was it an accident? Now’s your chance to tell us your side of the story,” Adams said.

“I didn’t kill her!” He pounded his fists onto the table, spilling his paper cup of water.

Stephenson held out his hands. “Calm down.”

“Your neighbors heard shouting and doors slamming in your apartment right before the time Daisy was killed,” Adams said.

“We had a fight, okay? I stormed out around ten and drove around the city to try and cool down. I ended up crashing at a friend’s place in West Seattle.”

“Where exactly did you drive around for an hour?” Adams asked.

“Downtown.”

“Downtown Seattle?”

“Yeah.”

“That’s a thirty-minute drive from your apartment. What made you go there?”

“I don’t know.”

“We’ll need the name and address of your friend who let you spend the night.”

Stephenson looked away from the screen at the sight of their stickler superior, Lieutenant Greyson, marching through the Homicide Unit on a Saturday afternoon.

“What brings you here on a Saturday?” Stephenson asked as they made eye contact.

Adams stopped the video.

Greyson paused a few feet from their desks. "I have to lead a press release later today," he said. "Two people were found dead in their Madison Park home this morning, and one of them was Martin Watts."

Eric stared blankly at his computer screen. He'd been trying to write his novel for over an hour, but all he could think about was his secretary. And her son of a bitch boyfriend who had killed her. He was so upset he nearly cried for her.

He Googled to see if they'd arrested him yet, but there weren't any new articles since the initial one saying her body had been found. He skimmed the article again. It ended by stating no arrests had been made. He balled up his fist before releasing it to slam his laptop closed.

He wasn't sure how long he'd been sitting there plotting her boyfriend's demise when he heard another knock at his door. Happy for the distraction, he got up and answered it.

He was surprised to see the same two detectives standing in his hall. Their expressions were just as unreadable as the last time they came.

"I'm afraid we've had an unexpected development," Blondie said.

What could be more unexpected than his beloved secretary being murdered?

"We'd like you to come downtown and help us straighten a few things out."

Eric wanted to appear helpful and like he had nothing to hide. Plus, getting an inside tour of Seattle's Homicide Unit would be great for his story.

"Sure," he said. "Although, I don't know if I'll be of much more help. You really should be talking to her boyfriend."

"This isn't about your front office assistant. It's about one of your patients," Marky Mark said.

Oh, yeah. Patricia. They must've found her. He tried to look confused. He'd been so sad about his secretary's death that Patricia's had escaped him.

"Oh, no. I hope it's nothing serious. I don't think I can take much more bad news today."

Both detectives eyed him suspiciously. "We'll explain at the precinct," Blondie said.

"Okay, I'll just grab my coat."

• • • •

THE HOMICIDE UNIT WAS different than Eric had imagined. He realized he'd pictured it looking like the ones he'd seen on TV. It was smaller, more open, more cluttered, noisier, and much less glamorous than he had anticipated. Walking through the depressing hallway to the tiny shoebox of an interview room made him feel like he should pay more taxes. He would never understand why Americans fought socialism so hard.

The detectives let him enter the room first and motioned for him to have a seat. He obliged and hoped he wouldn't have to sit in the ass-numbing, unpadded chair for too long. Beavis and Butthead took their seats across from him in what looked to be equally uncomfortable chairs. They stared at him in silence, sizing him up. Eric stared back, his face revealing nothing.

Marky Mark finally broke the silence. "Do you have a patient by the name of Patricia Watts?"

"Yes."

"We're sorry to inform you that she was killed last night." The two detectives exchanged a look. "Probably not long before Daisy."

Eric dropped his jaw. "What?"

"We're sure this must be a shock, especially after the death of your front office assistant."

He tried to appear dumbfounded. "Yes, it is." He brought his hands to his face and wondered why he never pursued a career in acting. There were plenty of Australian actors who had made it in America.

“Patricia's husband, Martin, was also found dead this morning. At this point, we're treating both deaths as suspicious. Did Patricia ever say she was afraid of her husband? Or that he had ever hurt her?”

Eric slowly took his hands away from his face, as if he were still taking in the news about Patricia's husband. He hoped he looked as though he was struggling to focus.

“Well, um...she never said he had physically hurt her. If she had, I would be obligated to report it. But, I wouldn't be surprised if he ever was. From what she'd said, he was extremely controlling. Oftentimes, that type of behavior is a precursor to abuse.”

“What do you mean by extremely controlling?” Blondie asked.

“I would have to look over my notes to give you all the details, but he didn't like her having any friends and tried to keep her away from her own family. Many abusers use isolation as a way of controlling their victims.”

Fortunately, he had already doctored up her medical record to match what he had just said.

The detectives looked unimpressed by this information. So, he gave them more.

“He was always telling her she was fat, always lowering her self-esteem. I remember a specific instance when he wouldn't let her buy any new clothes until she lost weight.”

He was annoyed he hadn't come up with anything better. He tried again. He figured he could always alter her medical records to substantiate his statement.

“He had also threatened to kill himself on several occasions if she didn't do what he wanted. He sounded incredibly unstable, but, according to Patricia, he refused to get any help. He always blamed everything on her.”

To this, they raised their eyebrows. Eric withheld a smile to their reaction.

“And Patricia? Was she unstable?”

“Patricia? No. Most of her problems were because of her husband, she even said so. I encouraged her to leave him if she ever felt unsafe, but she insisted he would never physically hurt her. I wish I could've done something to prevent this, but, unfortunately, my hands were tied unless I knew he had hurt her physically.”

“We've got a warrant for Patricia's psychiatric records. We'll need you to send those over ASAP.”

“Of course. I'll go by the office on my way home and send them to you. All our records are electronic.”

“Where were you last night between eight p.m. and midnight?” Marky Mark asked.

Eric scoffed. “I already told you, I was at home. In bed. Asleep.”

“Actually, I only asked you earlier where you were between ten p.m. and two a.m. Did you leave your apartment at all last night?”

“No.”

“Well, that'll be all. Thanks for coming down, and we'll need those medical records as soon as you can get them to us,” Stephenson said as he and his partner stood up from the interview table.

They pushed in their chairs and moved toward the door.

“Oh, and just one more thing,” Stephenson said, turning around to face him. “We haven't been able to locate the cell phone of your front office assistant, Daisy. Are you aware of her leaving it at the office or have any idea where we might find it?”

“No.”

“All right. We may need to search your practice if we don't find it soon.”

Eric nodded and followed them to the door. "Have you arrested Daisy's boyfriend yet?" he asked as Stephenson held the door open for him to exit first.

"No. But don't worry, we'll make sure her killer doesn't get away with it."

Then he remembered the question he had planned but had forgotten to ask. "How did Patricia and her husband die?"

"They both died by asphyxiation due to strangulation."

"Could it have been a murder-suicide?" Eric asked.

"We haven't ruled out that possibility." Stephenson answered.

"Strange that two people you know are murdered on the same night, in the same way, at almost the same time. Almost seems like too much of a coincidence to be a coincidence," Marky Mark said.

Eric decided in that moment that Blondie was his favorite of the two. "I hope you're not insinuating that I killed anyone. You know, sometimes coincidences are just that. Coincidences." Like Daisy's boyfriend killing her the same night he killed Patricia. How he hated him.

"You okay to walk yourself out?" Blondie asked.

"Sure." You good-for-nothing cops.

Adams took a sip from his cold coffee when they got back to their desks.

“I can't believe you volunteered us for the Martin Watts case after we just got the girl in the park. Now we'll definitely be working all weekend.”

“Their deaths could all be related. You don't think it's strange that three people who all know Dr. Leroy die by strangulation on the same night?” Stephenson asked, annoyed his partner cared more about being home on the weekend than solving their case.

“Stranger things have happened. The guy's a psychiatrist. I'm sure she's not the first of his patients to die of unnatural causes. I just don't like the idea of taking on an extra caseload when we don't even know if they're connected. The husband and wife are probably going to be ruled a murder-suicide by the ME anyway. And the media is going to go crazy when they learn a famous romance writer offed his wife before hanging himself.”

“We don't know that yet.”

“Not officially, but I'll be shocked if that's not what happened. Plus, the girl was killed by manual strangulation on the other side of town from where the husband and wife were strangled using a necktie and an electrical cord from a curling iron.”

Stephenson normally got along fine with Adams, but after catching Serena cheating on him that morning, his partner was getting under his skin. He looked down at the framed picture on his desk of his late partner, Detective Christina Rodriguez. She had been only thirty-three when she was murdered. There wasn't a day that went by he didn't think about her; sometimes he still couldn't believe she was gone.

“The ME isn't going to be able to explain why their back-door lock had been picked. And Pete thought Martin's ligature marks were more suggestive of homicide than suicide when we were at the house. If he'd hanged himself, the ligature line would've moved upward on the back of his neck. And the ligature marks were straight all the way around. My gut says it'll be ruled a double homicide, or at least undetermined pending our investigation.

There is no way that chandelier would've held the weight of a man that size long enough for him to suffocate. It would've been practically impossible to even ensure the curling iron would catch on the light fixture anyway. He would've had to jump off the railing at the top of the stairs. I don't see how he could've done it.”

“Well, I guess we'll just have to wait for the autopsy results. At this point though, it looks like Dwayne killed Daisy.”

Stephenson couldn't disagree. Since Daisy's body had been outside on a near-freezing January night, determining her time of death at the crime scene had been difficult for the ME. For now, they were relying largely on other environmental factors to pin down the precise time of her death. A light snow covered the top of her body when the jogger had found her that morning. When the medical examiner checked underneath her body at the scene, it was dry. The snow had started around midnight the night before, so they were working with an approximate time of death between ten p.m. and midnight.

Daisy had bruising on her left temple. It looked consistent with her being punched in the side of her face, as Dwayne had admitted. She'd also sustained bruising to both of her arms, probably from being restrained by her killer while he strangled her. Both these injuries helped explain her lack of defensive wounds.

Stephenson and Adams had found ten empty beer bottles scattered around the main living area of Dwayne and Daisy's apartment, which matched Dwayne's story that they'd been drinking.

Dwayne gave them the names of the two friends that let him stay the night but told them they'd left early that morning on a week-long snowboarding trip to Canada. Being out of the country, they didn't have cell service, leaving no one to confirm his alibi. Dwayne stated he hadn't returned to his and Daisy's apartment until that morning. Both Dwayne and Daisy's cars had been parked outside their residence when the detectives visited him earlier that day.

Dwayne had willingly answered all their questions and gave them permission to search his car. CSI was processing it now along with Daisy's.

Stephenson wasn't ready to admit that his partner may be right, but it was shaping up to look like there was no connection between Daisy's death and Martin and Patricia's. Although, there was something not right about Patricia and Martin's deaths. It was a bizarre scene, and Stephenson didn't buy the murder-suicide theory. Why would the husband leave the front door unlocked and pick the lock on the back door only to hang himself? It made more sense to Stephenson that he'd come home and walked in on his wife's killer.

When Stephenson learned earlier that day that Patricia was a patient of Daisy's boss, he'd insisted they take the case. He couldn't pinpoint exactly why, but Dr. Leroy had given him a bad feeling. And to have three people he knew all strangled on the same night seemed like more than a coincidence.

The doctor had looked genuinely shocked when they informed him of his front office assistant's death, but his reaction to the deaths of Martin and Patricia had felt rehearsed to Stephenson. Adams hadn't seemed to notice.

"They were an odd couple, you know?" Adams mused. "Daisy was a beautiful girl from a seemingly normal family. What was she doing with an overweight sleazeball who probably liked to beat on her?"

Stephenson let his question linger in the air while he continued going through Dwayne's cell phone records. His gaze drifted to the sleeves of his navy sweater that Serena had bought him for Christmas. He wished he would've worn something different. He didn't need the sweater serving as a constant reminder of her. The wool was beginning to feel like sandpaper against his skin. He tugged at the neckline and tried to focus on the stack of papers in front of him.

Adams studied his partner from across their desks. "You seem agitated today."

Stephenson shot Adams a look of annoyance before going back to looking through Dwayne's phone records. "I'm not."

"You piss off your girlfriend or something?"

Stephenson ignored the question.

Adams let out a snort. "All right, whatever you say."

"Dwayne made several calls to Daisy's cell after she died. Makes me wonder if he didn't know she was dead."

"He could've done that just to try and look innocent. Or maybe he was calling it to try and find it. That could be why we haven't been able to locate it," Adams said.

"Maybe. Two of the calls did ping a cell tower in vicinity of Discovery Park just before midnight, which places him at the scene of where Daisy's body was dumped but could also confirm his story about driving around the city for an hour before crashing with friends."

"I doubt his story is true."

"Found anything yet on the traffic camera footage in that area?"

"Not yet. I'm still looking."

Stephenson's desk phone rang.

"Stephenson."

"Hey, we've finished processing the cars of both your victim and her boyfriend."

Stephenson recognized Matt's voice from CSI.

"I've sent you an email with our preliminary report. We found Dwayne's fingerprints inside Daisy's car on both the driver and passenger side. His prints were also on both front doors. No prints inside the trunk and no blood anywhere. Daisy's fingerprints were all over the inside of Dwayne's car. We also found a few strands of hair that look to be a likely match to hers in the front and backseat. Nothing inside the trunk. And no blood."

"Thanks, Matt."

"No problem."

Stephenson hung up and briefed Adams on what Matt had said. Afterwards, Adams went back to looking through the traffic cam footage.

"Looks like you're no longer the only rookie on the squad," he said a few minutes later.

Stephenson turned to see an attractive, blonde woman in her mid-twenties being shown her desk across the room by another detective.

"I'd like to be her partner," Adams said.

"Thank you."

"No offense."

"None taken," Stephenson went back to looking through the phone records.

"I'm gonna ask her out."

Stephenson looked up to see if Adams was serious. It appeared he was. Adams looked back at him with a straight face. Stephenson didn't know how to respond. Adams was a great detective, but when it came to women, he was a total screwball. Apparently, it hadn't occurred to Adams that the beautiful, young detective might not be interested in an overly-muscled, forty-something divorcee such as himself.

"I don't think that's such a good idea. Plus, she just got here. You don't even know her."

Stephenson watched Adams check out the new detective as her partner showed her around the Homicide Unit.

"I'll give it a few days first."

Stephenson rolled his eyes.

Detective Suarez came over to their desk to introduce them to his new partner.

"Stephenson, Adams, this is Detective Tess Richards." He motioned toward the blonde rookie at his side. "She's just joined the squad."

Adams leapt from his chair and shook her hand. Stephenson subtly shook his head when he saw Adams lay his left hand on top of hers, sandwiching her hand between both of his during the handshake.

"Great to meet you. It's about time we had another female on the squad," Adams said, finally letting go of her hand.

Only so you can hit on her, Stephenson thought.

"Thanks," she said. She pulled her hand back to her side as he let go.

Stephenson stayed seated. "Welcome to the squad," he said with a friendly smile.

She returned his smile. "It's great to be here."

The two detectives stepped away from their desk as Suarez continued showing her around.

"I think she likes me," Adams said after they walked away.

“You're an idiot.”

Eric got a call from the homicide detectives later that afternoon. They hadn't found Daisy's phone and wanted to search his office building. They said they'd get a warrant if they needed to but asked if he'd instead drive over and let them in. Eric obliged. He didn't have anything to hide. At least, not at his practice and not about Daisy.

He hung around while they searched his entire medical suite. They started with his office, and Eric followed them inside while they searched. He took a seat in the chair normally reserved for his patients, hoping to make them uncomfortable enough to hurry up. Not that he had to worry what they would find; there was no way they could know he altered Patricia's medical records. He just didn't like them going through his stuff.

"It's not here," Marky Mark said after rifling through every drawer of his desk.

"I could've told you that," Eric said before following them out into the hall.

Eric reclined in the waiting room while they went through the front desk area where Daisy spent most of her time. He longed to see her again, sitting behind the desk, too bubbly and bright for a psychiatry practice. An hour later, he wished he'd brought his laptop to work on his book. Although, everything in the office reminded him of Daisy and he probably wouldn't have been able to concentrate anyway.

Soon after that, the two of Seattle's finest announced they were done with their search.

"Did you find it?" Eric asked.

"No," Blondie said. "Thanks for letting us in."

"No problem. If there's anything else I can do to help, let me know."

"We will," Marky Mark said with a flat expression.

Stephenson pulled into the darkened driveway of his Northgate townhouse late Saturday night. He killed the engine but didn't get out of the car. Daisy's preliminary autopsy results had come back just before he'd left the precinct. The bruising on her left temple was consistent with her being punched in the head, as Dwayne had said in his interview. Pete believed the contusions on both her arms were caused from her killer restraining her during her strangulation. He guessed the killer straddled her, using a knee on each of her arms to hold her down. They'd have to wait and see if any DNA could be obtained from under her fingernails, but, without any defensive wounds, it seemed unlikely.

Her boyfriend was still their prime suspect in her death. Adams had found Dwayne's car on a traffic camera less than a mile away from Discovery Park around ten thirty the night before. The park was a twenty-minute drive away from downtown where he said he'd driven around. It was also in the opposite direction from West Seattle where Dwayne claimed to have spent the night. It didn't make sense for him to have gone there apart from dumping his girlfriend's body. They were close to being able to arrest him, but they needed a little more evidence.

Pete wouldn't have the preliminary autopsy results back for them on Patricia and Martin until tomorrow morning. With not much more they could do that night, he and Adams had called it a day nearly sixteen hours after they'd arrived at Daisy's crime scene.

He reached into his pocket for his phone and was surprised when his fingers rubbed against the smooth leather case that housed Serena's ring. In his rush to get to the crime scene that morning, he'd forgotten to take it out of his coat.

He pulled the small jewelry box out of his pocket and opened it. He wanted to get her something unique, so he'd gotten the ring specially designed. He'd made sure there wasn't another one exactly like it.

After taking the emerald-cut diamond ring out of its case, he held it up. The diamond gleamed in the faint light coming from his neighbor's front porch. He placed the ring back in the box before slipping it back into his pocket.

He took out his phone and tapped on her photo that was still on his home screen. A shortcut came up with an option to Call Mobile. His finger hovered over the screen as he struggled against the desire to call her. Where is your pride? he thought before finally shoving his phone back inside his coat. He wiped away the tear that managed to escape down his cheek before he got out of his car and went inside.

Stephenson pressed his palm against the cool tile of his shower wall while he closed his eyes and let the hot water beat against his face. He pictured Serena from yesterday morning wearing nothing but a towel with her hair dripping wet, standing next to her newfound love. Or whatever. Maybe he'd just been replaced by some casual fling.

He forced the image out of his mind and tried to focus on his new case. He heard his phone ring over the sound of the water and turned off the nozzle before stepping out of the shower. He grabbed his towel off the wall and quickly dried his hands before picking his phone up from the bathroom counter.

“Hey, Pete.”

“Morning. I just wanted to let you know I've sent over the preliminary autopsy results for Martin and Patricia.”

“Great. I'll have a look now.” Stephenson wrapped the towel around his waist and walked into his bedroom. He placed Pete on speaker and set the phone on his bed while he logged onto his work laptop. “What's the manner of death?”

“For Patricia, homicide, as we'd already surmised. She suffered a nonfatal injury to her forehead prior to death when she collided with the bathroom mirror. The injury was significant enough that she would've been shoved with significant force against the mirror. She also has scratch marks around the ligature mark on the front of her neck and what looks to be her own tissue present under her fingernails. We'll have to wait for the DNA testing to be sure it's only her tissue and not her attacker's. And you know, these defensive wounds would be consistent with her trying to free herself from the necktie when she was strangled. At the scene, you saw the ligature mark around her neck was straight. The lack of blood pooling above the ligature mark and the way her body was found are also inconsistent with hanging.”

Stephenson had begun to skim the report as Pete spoke. “And what about her husband, Martin?”

“His autopsy, I'm afraid, was not as straightforward. His ligature mark does angle upwards slightly on the back of his neck, which could be consistent with hanging. However, like Patricia, the lack of blood pooling above his ligature mark suggests the pressure around his neck was released shortly after death, which would be inconsistent with him hanging himself. Although, being that we found him on the floor, it's possible he fell from the chandelier not long after he asphyxiated. I suppose it will be up to you to determine if that chandelier could've held his weight long enough for that to have happened.

“Also like Patricia, he has scratches around the ligature on his neck. This could be consistent with defensive wounds in a homicidal strangulation, or he could've panicked at the last minute and tried to free himself from the cord around his neck.

“He sustained some bruising across his torso which appears to have occurred just prior to his death. But I'm unable to determine if this was a defensive wound he incurred in the process of killing his wife or if he was held down during a homicidal strangulation. There's more details in my report, but, for the time being, I've ruled Martin's manner of death as undetermined.”

Stephenson looked at the photo of Martin's body lying atop the metal autopsy table, the bruising across his middle exposed.

“Could his killer have pinned him down by wrapping his legs around Martin's chest while he strangled him from behind? If the killer was positioned slightly higher than Martin when he killed him, that could also account for why his ligature marks come up on the back of his neck.”

“I suppose that would be one plausible scenario,” Pete said. “I’ve finished the evidence collection process from both of the deceased, so they are ready for you to pick up and submit to the crime lab.”

Stephenson had investigated enough cases by now to know that this evidence collected by the ME would include clothes, hair samples, swabs, blood, nail clippings, and a DNA card from each of the victims.

“Great. I’ll be right over.”

“Oh, good. I’m ready to get out of this place. I’d like to think I’ve done enough work for one weekend.”

“Wish I could say the same, but I’ve got a lot more still to be done.” This wasn’t exactly true, but he wanted to sound normal. Truth was, he was grateful for the distraction his work had provided that weekend. “See you soon.”

He ended the call and dialed Adams.

“Is it morning already?” he asked, sounding groggy.

“Yes, and we’ve got an undetermined manner of death for Martin. Patricia’s been ruled a homicide, but no surprise there.”

“Huh. Well, maybe you were right after all. I take it we’re treating Martin’s death as suspicious, then?”

“Sure are. I’ll meet you at the station in half an hour. We’ve got some work to do.”

“Can’t wait.”

• • • •

ADAMS GOT TO THE HOMICIDE Unit five minutes after Stephenson. He slapped the Sunday edition of The Seattle Times on Stephenson’s desk and waited for his partner to read the headline.

“This is thanks to our press release last night.” Adams sighed. “It’s all over the national news too. I told you the media was going to be in a frenzy over this case.”

“We had to do a press release. He’s a world-famous author.”

“I know. I just don’t like the added pressure.”

Stephenson scanned the news story before handing the paper back to Adams. “It doesn’t matter whether he’s famous or not. We were right to take the case, and we’ll treat it no different than any other.”

“I just hope we can solve it soon.”

• • • •

THEY SAT ACROSS FROM Daisy’s sister, Emily, three hours later in what the detectives called the “soft room”. It was similar in size to their two interview rooms, but instead of stark white walls, a one-way mirror, and chairs that were bolted to the ground, the soft room provided neutral colors with painted walls, a carpeted floor, and multiple chairs that could be moved around.

Emily had come to the Homicide Unit on her own accord, tearfully asking to speak with them when she arrived. Stephenson set a cup of water on the table in front of her before taking his seat.

“Thank you,” she said.

She wore no makeup and looked about five years older than Daisy. Her eyes and nose were red from crying, and she dabbed her eyes with a tissue.

“So, you wanted to talk with us about Dwayne?” Stephenson asked.

She nodded. “He left a voicemail on my phone Thursday night threatening to kill Daisy.”

Stephenson and Adams exchanged a look.

“Do you still have the voicemail?” Adams asked.

“Yes.” She pulled her phone out of her purse. “He called me three times that night looking for Daisy, but I didn't answer. I was out of town. She must've told him that she was staying with me, but I had no idea where she was and didn't want to get in the middle of it. She would stay with me sometimes when she wanted to get away from him. I don't know where she was that night...” her voice broke into sobs. “Maybe if I'd answered and told him she was staying with me she'd still be alive.”

“This isn't your fault,” Stephenson said.

She wiped her face with her tissue after she placed her phone on the table and played the voicemail for them to hear.

Dwayne's voice came through the phone's speaker: Where's Daisy? I know she's not with you, that lying bitch! Tell me where she is. I'll kill her if she's with another guy. You tell her to call me—or she's dead.

“I didn't think he was serious. He and Daisy fought all the time. It was their normal. Don't get me wrong, I hated him. But I didn't think for a second that he'd actually kill her.”

Stephenson watched the color drain from her face. He recognized the look that washed over her as one he'd seen before on other victims' family members. He pulled the garbage can beside her chair moments before she threw up. Most of her vomit made it into the can, but some splattered onto the beige carpet.

“I'm so sorry.” She covered her hand with her mouth as she looked down at the mess on the floor.

“Don't be,” Stephenson said. “We know this is really difficult. And you're doing great.”

“I just can't believe she's dead!” Emily burst into fresh tears and buried her face in her hands.

“Don't blame yourself.” Stephenson placed his hand on her arm. “You did the right thing by coming in. May we borrow your phone?”

With her hands still covering her face, she nodded.

“Is this the only voicemail Dwayne left you that night?”

“Yeah.”

“All right. We're just going to make a copy of it for evidence. Are you okay to wait here?”

She pulled her hands away from her face, exposing her red, tear-streaked cheeks. “Yes, that's fine.”

“We won't be too long.”

Stephenson picked up her phone and followed Adams out of the interview room.

Adams turned to Stephenson after they stepped out into the hall. “Well, it looks like we need to bring Dwayne in to have another chat. Maybe we won't be spending the entire weekend here after all.”

• • • •

THEY WENT BACK TO DWAYNE's apartment and he agreed to ride back to the station with them to answer more questions. They brought him into Interview Room One. If he was aware that they were close to arresting him for murder, he didn't show it. It seemed that asking for a lawyer hadn't even entered his mind.

“We've confirmed your friends' address in West Seattle where you say you stayed last night,” Adams began. “We also tried calling both of their cells, but they were turned off. Based on their social media pages, it looks like they did in fact head to Canada for a week-long snowboarding trip like you said.”

“Okay. So why did I need to come in then?”

Adams cleared his throat. “Well, here's the thing Dwayne. Daisy probably died between the time you say you left your apartment and when you arrived at your friends' place. So, even if you did stay at their house, you still could've killed Daisy and dropped her body at Discovery Park before you went to their place.”

“We also know that your cell phone pinged a cell tower near Discovery Park around Daisy's time of death, which places you close to where her body was dumped. And we have your car on a traffic camera a mile away from the park at 10:37 p.m.,” Stephenson added.

“I didn't kill her,” Dwayne said matter-of-factly.

They played him a recording of the voicemail he'd left on Emily's phone Thursday night.

“Did you leave this voicemail on Daisy's sister's phone the other night?” Adams asked as the recording played.

“Yeah, but I didn't actually mean it! I was pissed, okay? She didn't come home that night, and I was worried she might've been with another guy. I just wanted her to come home. I swear.”

“Maybe you didn't mean to,” Stephenson said. “Like you said, you were pissed. If you explain it to us, we might be able to help you.”

“I didn't kill her!”

Dwayne stood up from the table.

“All right, calm down.” Adams put up his hands. “We're going to give you a little time to think and make sure there's nothing more you want to tell us. We'll be back in fifteen minutes, okay?”

“I've already told you everything.”

Dwayne paced back and forth in the small space.

The two detectives got up and started for the door. “We'll be back,” Stephenson said before leaving Dwayne alone in the interview room.

“I think we can get a confession out of him,” Adams said after Stephenson closed the door behind him. “He already admitted to striking Daisy and he hasn't asked for a lawyer. Hopefully, he'll open up when we go back in there.”

They walked back to their desks where they sat down across from each other.

“I'm thinking Dwayne probably strangled her at home and then dumped her body at the park,” Adams said.

Stephenson leaned back in his chair. “So, we have the neighbors hearing an argument between Dwayne and Daisy right before her time of death, a history of domestic disputes, Dwayne's admission to hitting her, his threatening voicemail to Daisy's sister, traffic camera footage and a cell tower placing Dwayne near the location of where Daisy's body was dumped right around the time of her death, and her fingerprints and strands of hair inside his car. And he's got no alibi.”

“You still think there's a connection between Daisy's death and that couple in Madison Park?”

Stephenson sighed. “No. I think Daisy's killer is sitting in Interview One,” Stephenson said.

“I'll fill out the affidavit if you call the judge to get the arrest warrant. Then let's go back in there and see if we can make him crack.”

• • • •

DWAYNE HADN'T EXACTLY cracked, but they'd had enough on him to arrest him even without his confession.

“How about I take you out for a congratulatory beer since we closed our case?” Adams asked as they walked side by side through the parking garage.

“Thanks, but I'm pretty tired. I think I'll just head home.”

“Yeah, me too. But I plan on enjoying what's left of my Sunday. You should too. There's even still time for you to see your girlfriend.”

Stephenson didn't respond, and they walked in silence the rest of the way to their cars.

Adams stopped when he reached his car, parked across from Stephenson's. He pulled his keys from his pocket and looked up at his partner.

“You've been acting different this weekend. You sure you're okay?”

“Yeah. I'm fine, thanks.”

Adams stood still for a moment and looked like he was trying to read him. “Okay. I'll see you tomorrow.”

“See ya,” Stephenson said.

Adams watched his partner get into his car before he climbed into his own and followed Stephenson out of the parking garage.

Eric got up early Sunday morning and decided to go to his favorite café, The Streamliner, on Bainbridge Island for breakfast. He hoped that its organic coffee and buttermilk biscuits might help take his mind off Daisy. Maybe even clear his head enough to work on his book.

With his laptop bag slung over his shoulder, Eric made his way down the steep, city street to the ferry. A light mist was falling, but he didn't mind. He needed to get out of his apartment.

The ferry ride was uneventful. He sat inside and stared out the window at the calm water that shone a cobalt blue in the winter morning light.

Only a short walk from the ferry, The Streamliner was busy as usual when he stepped inside.

It was more American diner than Australian café, but there was a quaintness about it that reminded him of his home country. Although, it had grown busier in recent years. Its notoriety for good food and local feel had caused it to become a tourist destination.

He took a seat at the counter and ordered the breakfast special. He sipped his steaming coffee and was about to open his laptop when he realized he was in no state to write. Or, for that matter, to eat. His grief was just too strong.

His eyes wandered to The Seattle Times on the counter to his left.

"Care to read it?" his fellow diner patron asked, motioning toward the paper. "I'm all done."

"Thanks," he said.

He slid the paper toward him as the man stood from his seat. He held up the front page.

NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING AUTHOR MARTIN WATTS AND WIFE FOUND DEAD IN SEATTLE HOME

They must be mistaken. How had I not known this? Why hadn't Patricia ever told me? He racked his brain through all their sessions. Strangely, he couldn't recall much of anything other than the murder of her brother and her never-ending complaints about her husband. So, maybe she had mentioned it. His mind might've just been elsewhere.

He moved his attention back to the paper and read through the entire article. The police hadn't yet released their cause of death. But, according to the article, they were treating both deaths as suspicious. Eric wondered what that meant exactly. Hopefully, they were just waiting on official autopsy results to announce it as a murder-suicide.

Apparently, Martin was a famous man. Not only were most of his books New York Times bestsellers, but many of them had also been made into high-earning film adaptations. None that Eric had seen, however, being that they were all romance.

He looked for an article on Daisy's death and was saddened to find it all the way back on page 8. His breakfast arrived and he set down the paper, still blown away that he had killed a bestselling author without even knowing it. He supposed it was one way to get rid of some competition. The scandal of Martin's death would undoubtedly boost his book sales for the short term, but Eric hoped people would've forgotten about him by the time his own book was released.

Despite having no appetite since he'd heard of Daisy's death, his poached eggs and buttermilk biscuits looked incredibly delicious. Before he knew it, his plate was empty. Eric set down his fork and looked again at Martin's headline. He sighed, wondering how many million copies Martin Watts would sell today.

If only he could be on the front page of The Seattle Times. In a way, he was famous already. The man who killed Martin Watts. Too bad the world would never know.

SEEING THE MEDIA CRAZE over Martin's death had helped take his mind off Daisy, but by the time he got back to his apartment she had crept back into his mind. Eric spent the rest of Sunday moping around his apartment, trying to get her out of his head so he could make progress on his manuscript. He needed to write while Patricia and Martin's murders were fresh in his mind. After finishing his hour of yoga, he went to work on the novel.

His thoughts drifted between his book and his secretary for the rest of the day. In his grief over Daisy, he kept thinking back to his ex-wife, Stella. Gorgeous Stella.

They married young. She had been nineteen and he had been twenty. They had some pressure from their families, he supposed, because Stella had gotten pregnant. But that wasn't the only reason they got married. In fact, it only made them happier. They were madly in love, and he had been planning on marrying her one day anyway.

She was a professional surfer, which made her a local celebrity in their hometown. She'd even won some international competitions by the time they got married, and her name was becoming well-known in more than just Australia.

Stella's family despised him for getting her pregnant, as if he'd ruined her life. Although they hated him, they thought them getting married was the right thing to do.

They were married on the beach in Nelson Bay, the small coastal town in Eastern Australia where both Stella and he had lived their entire lives. He replayed the day in his mind like a scene from a movie. It was January, in the middle of a heat wave. How he missed January in Australia. Stella looked radiant. He remembered sweating through his suit, looking at her and thinking he was the luckiest man alive.

Poor Stella must have been sweltering in the heat, being pregnant, but she didn't complain. She had never looked happier. The ceremony was small, private, and low-budget, with just their families and a few close friends. The minister finally pronounced them man and wife, which they sealed with a tender kiss.

Afterward, Stella grabbed his hand with a twinkle in her eye and pulled him toward the turquoise water. She kicked off her heels when they reached the waves. She waded into the water, pulling him along behind her. Before he knew it, they were swimming side by side in the refreshing sea, he in his suit and she in her wedding gown. Dolphins surfaced not far from where they swam. Thinking back on that day still made him smile.

When Stella lost the baby only a couple weeks later, they were devastated. This made her family hate him even more. Eric was sure that her sister or parents tried to talk her into divorcing him at that point. But he knew that he didn't have to worry. The love they shared was real. They tried to get pregnant again over the next few years, but never did. Even though they weren't without their problems, they were very much in love. Or, so he had thought. Their life together was as close to perfect as one could get. Until the day she left and never came back.

ERIC WOKE THE NEXT morning before his alarm. When he saw the book on his nightstand, it suddenly dawned on him why Martin's name had sounded familiar. It was the book he'd tossed aside after reading that stupid line about winter in Seattle. He picked up the novel and opened it to the last page, already knowing who he would see.

There he was. Martin Watts, New York Times Bestselling Author. Martin looked better in his photo than he had in person, even before he killed him. His photo had no doubt been photoshopped to make him look more attractive. You couldn't even tell how fat he was.

Eric set the book back on his nightstand and got out of bed. He supposed readers preferred books written by attractive people. Fortunately, for him, that wouldn't be a problem.

When he walked past the drummer's apartment door on his way to work, Eric wondered if he'd played his drums at all the day before. If he had, Eric hadn't even noticed.

It was Monday night when he saw the news. Eric had taken a break from writing his book to check if there were any breakthroughs in Daisy's case. And, lo and behold, there was. Dwayne Morrison, Daisy's live-in boyfriend, had been arrested for her murder.

When Eric had opened his internet browser to his national news homepage, he was annoyed to see that Patricia and her overrated husband were once again the center of attention. Although, Eric did feel a little prideful that his handiwork had resulted in the biggest news story in the country. For today at least. Bold, red letters filled the top of the page.

MANNER OF MARTIN WATTS' DEATH STILL UNDETERMINED; WIFE'S DEATH RULED HOMICIDE

He wondered what exactly they meant by undetermined. The article said Martin was found at the base of his staircase lying under a fallen chandelier with an electrical cord around his neck. Everything Eric read implied suicide. It made him wonder why they hadn't made a ruling on his cause of death. He clicked out of the article and searched for news related to Daisy's murder.

Eric set down his glass of wine and read through the article on his laptop more than once. It didn't give many details, like what evidence had led to Dwayne's arrest. Just that his bail had been set for $300,000. Eric scowled at Dwayne's picture at the top of the article, his hatred for him growing the longer he stared.

The picture showed Dwayne being led out of an apartment building by Marky Mark and Blondie. Dwayne was overweight and there was little distinction between his chin and his neck. He had dark brown hair and his polo shirt was too tight for his gut. Eric wondered what beautiful Daisy could've possibly seen in him. Aside from his looks, Daisy deserved to be with someone who appreciated her, who loved her. Someone like himself.

He got up and paced around the living room before refilling his glass of wine and sitting back down to work on his book. Daisy would get justice, and he needed to focus on finishing his manuscript. The world needed his novel.

He'd only written half a page when he realized that Dwayne getting arrested wasn't justice at all. What if he gets some unconscionable attorney to make a jury find him not guilty? Or what if he strikes some sort of deal for a lighter sentence? He could be a free man in less than ten years. The thought made Eric nauseous. Even on the minute chance that Dwayne got the death penalty, he'd probably die of old age on death row. And that was much, much more than he deserved. He should've killed him before the cops could get to him. That would've been justice.

He stared at the picture of Dwayne on his screen. The more Eric thought about him, the madder he became. He should've never allowed his fate to be determined by the so called "justice system" of the United States. He deserved to die just like Daisy.

Eric fantasized about winding an electrical cord around his neck, hearing the pathetic sound of him wheeze as he slowly tightened his grip. Dwayne would try to disarm him by swinging his arms behind him, but it would be to no use. Eric would only pull tighter and soon his attempts to pull the cord away from his neck would stop. Eric would relish in taking the last breath from his body.

When he looked at the clock he realized he'd been daydreaming about revenging Daisy's death for over an hour. How could he have been so careless? He got up to pour another glass of wine, hoping the distraction would help take his mind off Dwayne so he could concentrate on the matter at hand: becoming the greatest author in the world.

But it didn't help. As he walked past his couch, he remembered the way Daisy had looked in her sleep. So lovely.

He sighed, thinking of the temp he had hired to replace Daisy for the time being. She was twenty years older than he had hoped, hard on the eyes, and had an extremely unlovable personality.

She seemed to snub her nose at him every chance she got. Whenever he asked her to do something, she pursed her lips before mumbling an unenthusiastic all right. As though he was being completely unreasonable for asking her to do her job. As if he was working for her. Just thinking about her frumpy brown hair and sensible flats made him cringe.

It reminded him that he needed to hire a permanent replacement for Daisy. Preferably a bubbly, young blonde who liked to wear spiked heels. But he'd have to worry about that later. He had a book to finish.

He took a sip from his wine after sitting back down to write. He closed out of the article about Dwayne and forced himself to recall everything about Patricia's murder. He opened a new document, ready to reconstruct every detail about that night for his book. He would change the victims' names, of course, but everything else would be the same.

No sooner had he started typing when he heard the familiar sound of his neighbor's drums pulsating through the wall. He tried to tune it out, but the beat grew louder, faster. He couldn't think straight.

He needed total silence when he wrote. He found any noise, even classical music, a total distraction that blocked his creative pathways. While he would've loved to get lost in his favorite AC/DC album while he crafted his novel, that is exactly what his novel would be if he did: lost.

In his book, On Writing, Stephen King tells how he cranks head-banging hard metal while he pens his manuscripts. Eric was in awe of this. For him, that would be utterly impossible. His genius was best unleashed in the quiet.

His neighbor never drummed this late. At least, he never did until Eric asked him not to. The throb of the drums felt like it was coming from inside Eric's head. He couldn't take it anymore. He jumped out of his chair and marched down the hall to his door. He banged twice. Then again. But the drums didn't stop. He banged again, but his neighbor probably couldn't hear it over his obnoxious drumming.

Eric took a deep breath and tried to calm down. But his anger about Daisy's death, Dwayne's arrest, his new dud of a secretary, and his neighbor's relentless drumming was an overwhelming force he could no longer contain.

He had tried to be nice. If his neighbor had answered the door, he would've politely asked him to stop. But now he had forced his hand. There was only one thing left to do. Eric turned back for his apartment to retrieve his gloves, lock-picking kit, and something he could use to strangle the drummer.

• • • •

ERIC ENDED UP GRABBING one of his ties out of his closet. He figured it worked well enough on Patricia, it would do the job for his neighbor—who was still hammering away on the drums.

Eric went out into the hall and double-checked that he was alone before using his gloved hand to try his neighbor's door. Lucky for him, the dimwit had left it unlocked.

Eric slid his lock-picking kit into his pocket before he let himself inside and closed the door behind him. His neighbor's apartment was a mirror image to his own. Eric spotted him as soon as he stepped inside.

The drum set sat smack in the middle of the living room. Fortunately, his neighbor faced away from him toward the window. Eric wrapped each end of the tie around his gloved hands as he crept toward him.

Eric could see his reflection in the window in front of his neighbor. But he was oblivious to Eric's presence, his head bobbing up and down with each beat. Eric almost felt sorry for the insensitive little prick. Almost.

A large, painted canvas stood on an easel to the left of the drum set. Eric couldn't help but admire the oil painting as he snuck closer. Painting supplies were scattered on the floor under the painting. Although it looked to be a work in progress, it was an exceptionally beautiful work of art. Maybe the drummer should've spent a little more time creating masterpieces and a little less time perturbing his neighbors with his late-night, so-so drumming.

He was directly behind him when his neighbor finally noticed his reflection. He jumped and started to turn around, but it was too late.

Eric wrapped the noose around his neck and pulled with all his strength. The young man's drumsticks fell to the floor as he stood. He grasped at the necktie and spun around to face Eric. Eric moved quickly to stay behind him and keep a tight hold on the noose, but his neighbor kept spinning. Eric jumped onto his back so he wouldn't lose hold of the necktie. The drummer stumbled forward, knocking Eric into the side of easel. The intricate painting fell to the floor. Eric cringed as his neighbor stepped on it as he struggled to free the tie from his neck. They moved across the living room until Eric's weight finally pulled the drummer backward. Eric grunted as his neighbor slammed him against the wall that divided their apartments. Eric's back slid down the wall and they dropped to the floor.

His neighbor thrashed about in a wild motion until finally his movements slowed. Eric held tight until he went limp like an overcooked vegetable. A couple minutes later, he knew it would be safe to let go. His neighbor fell to the side. Eric pushed the rest of his body off his lap before getting up. He didn't look down. He had no desire to see his bloated, discolored face. After all, he did have a heart.

Standing next to the drum set, Eric suddenly wanted to play. It seemed a shame to kill the people that irritated him most if he couldn't enjoy it a little. He had drummed in a band in his early years in Australia, before medical school. They were called Great White. He smiled at their choice of name. They weren't half bad—but never picked up much of a following. They toured around New South Wales the summer after they graduated from year twelve but were too broke to tour any longer.

He bent over and picked up the drumsticks from the floor. When he did, Eric inadvertently got a close look at the whites of the drummer's bulging eyes. They were now pink with pops of bright red from the broken blood vessels. He knew the neighborly thing to do would be to close them, but he didn't do it. Instead, he stepped over his body and took a seat on the stool in front of the drums.

He tapped softly at first, timid that he wouldn't be any good after so many years of not playing. It didn't feel right with his gloves on. If he was going to play, he wanted to put his heart and soul into it. He slipped off his gloves and dropped them on the floor next to him. He made a mental note to wipe the drumsticks off before he left. He closed his eyes and started again.

Gradually, the beat took over him, and his rhythm grew louder and louder. He was amazed by how good he was, like he had never stopped playing. He and the rhythm were one, and, for a while, he lost track of time. It was magical. Like he was high on drugs though he was completely sober. He felt as though he could stay until his neighbor's body decayed.

Eric finally came to his senses. He needed to get back to his book. He let out a sigh and let the drumsticks rest atop his thigh. He knew he shouldn't have taken off his gloves. That was a rookie mistake. But the temptation had been too sweet. He looked around the apartment, wondering what he could use to wipe away his fingerprints. He spotted the small can of paint thinner lying next to the fallen easel. That would work.

He picked up his gloves and went into the kitchen in search of paper towels. He retrieved a nearly full roll from the pantry. He turned the can on its side, soaking a few paper towels and spilling the solution onto the floor. He vigorously wiped the drumsticks until he was certain no trace of his fingerprints remained. Like a good neighbor, Eric disposed of the paper towels in the kitchen garbage before he pulled his tie away from his neighbor's neck and headed for the door.

He felt elated as he meandered back to his apartment. Not only would he never have to hear the sound of those drums come through his apartment walls again, but this killing would make a wonderful addition to his story.

Eric was a page into recreating his neighbor's death when he remembered that his car was parked in a spot visible by the building's security cameras. He would likely be the prime suspect in his neighbor's murder once his body was found. Having his car parked in the parking garage all night wouldn't do him any favors.

He checked the time and did a quick Google search for local movie showtimes. A movie he hadn't heard of was starting in ten minutes at the theater closest to his apartment. He grabbed his wallet and keys and dashed out of his unit.

He fought the urge to take the stairs and waited impatiently for the elevator to take its thirty seconds to come to his floor. He looked away from his neighbor's door as he stood in the hall. He didn't want to succumb to feelings of guilt and ruin his night at the movies. Two minutes later, he drove out of the parking garage into the dark, rainy night.

He couldn't remember the last time he'd seen a movie at the theater. Although his outing was a forced necessity to create an alibi, he was actually looking forward to it. The only downside was it meant he would lose two hours that he could've been writing. And he would never get that time back.

Playing his neighbor's drums had made him nostalgic for his old rock band. He remembered as he drove that he had one of their old hits downloaded onto his phone. He connected it to Bluetooth and rocked his head back and forth to the beat. As time had gone by, he'd forgotten how good they were. He wondered if they would've stuck together if they could have made it big. He replayed the song for the rest of the drive. By the time he got to the movie theater, he was in a fantastic mood.

"One for Fifty Shades Freed, please," he said to the teenage girl behind the ticket counter. Freed from what? he wondered. He guessed he'd find out soon enough.

She smiled awkwardly as if she were trying to suppress a giggle. "That'll be twelve fifty."

Eric reached into his wallet and pulled out his credit card so the detectives could verify his purchase.

"Unless you have a senior's discount," she added.

His jaw dropped open. Her smile was gone.

"Are you kidding? I'm forty-five."

Her face flushed as she took his card. "Sorry, we're told to ask if..." she paused, as if realizing what she was about to say.

"If what? Do I look like a senior?"

She avoided eye contact as she passed him back his card and movie ticket. "Enjoy your movie," she said, ignoring his question.

"Unbelievable," Eric said, stepping away from the counter.

The previews had just finished when he walked into the theater. It was empty aside for a middle-aged woman seated in the middle of the back row. He sat down on the end of her row, pretending not to see her smile as he sat down.

The movie was not exactly what he was expecting, although he wasn't sure what he'd expected. It was horrible, all the way to the end, when he read Based on the Bestselling Novel by E L James.

Bestselling novel? If that was what it took to write a bestseller then his book would be winning him a Nobel Prize.

The story wasn't even as entertaining as his co-inhabitant of the theater, who he caught making pathetic eyes at him more than once during the film. Women. He hurried out to the men's room while the credits played, sparing her the embarrassment of trying to pick him up.

He checked his watch on his way out of the theater and saw it was just after ten thirty. If his neighbor wasn't found for a few days, he wondered how precisely the police would be able to pinpoint his time of death. He might need a longer alibi.

He went back to the ticket counter where the teenage girl was still working. She looked less than thrilled to see him.

"I'd like to see another movie. What do you have playing?"

"Um, Fifty Shades Freed starts again in five minutes. That'll be our last showing of the night."

"I don't mind being a little late. Have any other movies started in the last half hour?"

"No, sorry. Everything else is just getting out."

Right. "Then it'll be one adult for your next showing of Fifty Shades Freed," he said, passing her his credit card.

"Oh. Okay." She ran his card before handing it back to him with another movie ticket and a dumbfounded expression. "Enjoy the show. Again."

"Thanks."

He walked back into the theater and was glad to see that his ex-movie patron from the eight fifteen showing was gone. He just wished he'd brought a book.

• • • •

ERIC WAS STARTLED AWAKE by a sharp poke in his arm. He swatted at the hand that jabbed him, disoriented by his unfamiliar surroundings. The young girl from the ticket counter slowly came into focus. She backed away, putting him at arm's length.

"Excuse me, sir. The credits have been finished for over ten minutes, and we're closed. We need you to leave now."

He rubbed his eyes and got up from his seat. He could remember watching the opening scene of the movie for the second time but realized he must've dozed off soon after. The girl followed him out of the theater and into the main lobby.

He pushed open the glass door and walked through the parking garage to his car. He started his engine and saw that it was after midnight. But since he napped through the second showing, he knew he wouldn't be able to fall back asleep. At least not for a while.

He stopped in front of the first bar he saw and went inside for a drink. Or two. He figured he might as well extend his alibi until he was tired enough to go home to bed.

The bar was surprisingly not as sleazy as it looked from the outside. The black and white interior appeared recently renovated and had a modern, industrial feel. The lights that hung from the ceiling were turned down low and pop music blared through the speakers. The seating was a mixture of booths and tables with a long row of barstools set against the bar's concrete counter. A giant mirror covered the wall behind the bar.

The place seemed busy for a Monday night. He took one of the last two empty seats at the bar, next to a twenty-something blonde who was involved in a heavily animated conversation with the two women on the other side of her.

"What can I get you?" the bartender asked.

"Scotch and soda. Make it a double," he said.

The bartender placed a short glass tumbler in front of him a minute later. It was filled to the brim. A single round ice cube floated in the pale brown liquid. Eric emptied the glass after only a few swigs and signaled the bartender for another. He replaced Eric's empty glass with another filled just as full as the first.

Eric started to take a drink as the blonde to his right turned in his direction. After quickly looking him over, she smiled.

"Hi," she said.

He swallowed his mouthful of Scotch. "Hi."

"I'm Laci."

"I'm Eric."

"Do you come here often?" she asked.

"No. This is my first time here. You?"

"Every once in a while, with my friends."

Although not nearly as beautiful, her facial features and blonde hair shared many similarities to Daisy's. As they continued to engage in small talk, he couldn't help but think about sitting at the sushi bar with Daisy while they waited for their table a few nights before.

"What are you drinking?" he asked when his glass was empty.

She glanced at her half-full martini glass, still half full. "A lemon drop."

He flagged the bartender who made his way toward them at a tortoise's pace.

"We'll have two lemon drops," Eric said when he finally came within earshot. "And make mine a double."

He nodded and turned to make their drinks.

A comfortable silence passed between them, and Eric continued to feel nostalgic for his lovely secretary.

"You remind me of someone," he finally said.

She playfully rolled her eyes. "Like who? You're ex-girlfriend?"

"Not quite. Her name was Daisy."

"Was? Like you don't know her anymore?"

Their lemon drops appeared in front of them and he wasted no time in taking a drink. "Mmm. This is good."

She grinned. "Yes, they are. You said her name was Daisy?"

He took another drink. "Yeah." He looked down at the lemon rind floating in his martini glass. "She's dead."

"Oh. I'm so sorry."

He noticed this made her uncomfortable and watched her take a sip of her drink. She looked straight ahead as if trying to think of what to say. Or maybe she was debating whether to keep talking to him. He finished his delicious lemon drop and pointed to hers that she'd left untouched while she finished her other martini.

"You mind?" he asked.

"Oh. Umm, no. Go ahead," she said. "You bought it."

She turned back toward her girlfriends as he downed half the lemon drop in one swig.

"I'll have another," he said to the bartender as he walked past. "And make it a double."

Eric watched him unenthusiastically make him another martini. He finished off what was left in his glass and pushed it in the bartender's direction when he set down his newly-made drink. Sometime between his first sip and the bottom of the glass he sobbed for his beloved secretary, overcome by the tragedy of her death. His glass had not long been empty when Laci stood to leave.

“It was nice meeting you.” She placed her hand on his shoulder. “I’m really sorry about your friend.”

She turned to follow her friends out of the bar. Seeing her long blonde curls bounce against her back as she moved struck a chord inside him. He jumped from his barstool, nearly losing his balance on the unsteady floor. His eyes were blurred with tears as he chased after her.

“Wait! Daisy, don’t go!”

He grabbed her by the arm, but she pulled away and hurried toward her friends at the door.

A male patron stepped away from the bar and pressed his palm against Eric’s chest when he started to go after her.

“I think you better just let her go, dude.”

Eric wanted to punch him in the face but knew he was in no condition to put up a fight. The room was spinning despite his standing still. Instead, he put up his hands as a sign of surrender.

“Okay. I’ll let her go.”

The man slowly pulled his hand away from Eric’s chest. Satisfied when Eric didn’t make a run for the door, the man walked back to the bar. As soon as he was out of reach, Eric bolted outside.

He scanned the cars parked along the street before jogging to the parking lot adjacent to the bar. Eric saw her climb behind the wheel of a red Honda with her two friends in tow. He raced to the car as she started the engine.

“Hey!” a male voice shouted from behind him.

It was probably the tough guy again, but it didn’t deter him. He needed to get to her. Her eyes widened when Eric reached the car and he heard its doors lock.

“I’m calling the cops!” the man yelled from the sidewalk.

Eric rapped frantically on her window.

“Daisy! You can’t do this. You can’t leave!”

He tried to open her handle with no success. Her friend shrieked in the backseat.

The car pulled forward and Eric dove onto the hood in a desperate attempt to make her stay. She screamed from behind the wheel and the car jolted to a stop. Eric rolled off the front of the car onto the wet pavement. He stood up, staggered to the side, and shook himself off before climbing back on top of the hood toward the windshield. All three of the women made terrified noises from inside the car.

He pressed his face against the glass in front of the driver’s seat. “Please, don’t go. I beg you. I can’t bear to lose you again.” He sobbed with his hands and face still against the windshield. “Daisy!” he cried.

The women’s shrieking eventually quieted, and Eric rolled over onto his back. He continued to cry for his secretary while he looked at the unexpectedly clear sky. He hardly noticed the flashing red and blue lights from the squad car that pulled up beside him. Two uniformed officers stood over him with stone cold expressions. They were completely unsympathetic to his state.

“Sir, we’re going to need you to get off the car and place your hands on top of your head.”

Eric did as he was told and was shocked to feel the cold metal of a handcuff lock around his wrist in exchange for his cooperation.

“You’re under arrest for disorderly conduct,” the officer said while he secured the cuffs to his other wrist.

The other officer read him his Miranda Rights as they led him into the back seat of their car. Eric watched through the window as they questioned the three women. The officers walked back to the squad car when they were finished and Eric saw the red Honda pull out into the street.

“Daisy,” he muttered under his breath as the car disappeared into the night.

Stephenson watched Adams stifle a yawn from across their desks Tuesday morning. The city was wet and gray out the window behind him. He and Adams had spent the day before interviewing Martin and Patricia's neighbors, family members, and Martin's publicist. They also revisited the crime scene and went through Patricia's medical file from Dr. Leroy.

The neighbors neither saw nor heard anything the night of the murders. The victims' family and friends had no idea who would do this to them. And revisiting the crime scene had given them no new information.

Nothing appeared to be missing from the home. Both victims' wallets were left in the house full of credit cards and cash. Expensive electronics and Patricia's jewelry had also been left untouched.

They had no clear motive for the crimes. According to Patricia's file from the psychiatrist, her husband was a controlling narcissist who often inflicted emotional abuse on his wife. However, everyone they interviewed loved Martin and had nothing but glowing things to say about him. But, if there was one thing Stephenson had learned during his time as a detective it was that no one ever really knew what went on behind closed doors. In this case, either way, it seemed to be irrelevant. Martin didn't kill Patricia. The husband and wife appeared to be victims of the same crime.

Although they'd arrested Dwayne for Daisy's murder, it was bothering him that three people connected to Dr. Leroy were murdered on the same night by strangulation. The doctor's neighbor had confirmed his statement that he'd knocked on his door and asked him to keep the noise down for the evening, but that was about two hours before Daisy's time of death and approximately an hour before Patricia and Martin's. Because the building's security footage in their parking garage only covered part of the parking area, they couldn't tell if his car had been parked in the garage or whether he came or went anywhere that night.

The doctor seemed to have no motive to kill Daisy, or Patricia and Martin for that matter. And all the evidence pointed to Dwayne as Daisy's killer. Nothing so far had linked the doctor to Martin and Patricia's deaths, but there was something he didn't trust about Dr. Leroy.

Despite all their efforts yesterday, they'd gotten nowhere in the investigation. When they'd finally decided to go home and get some rest late last night, it had felt like a waste of a day.

Adams' face lit up when he saw Detective Richards walk past their desks. Here we go, Stephenson thought.

"Got your first case yet?" Adams asked, raising his voice just enough to get her attention.

She turned to face the detective. "Yep. Suarez just got the call. We'll be heading to the crime scene in the next few minutes."

"Enjoy," Adams said with a wry smile.

"Thanks." Her eyes traveled to Stephenson and lingered for a moment before she smiled.

"Morning," he said casually.

"Morning." She looked down at the framed photo of Detective Rodriguez on his desk. "Your girlfriend's a cop too?" She motioned toward the photo.

"My late partner, actually. She was killed just over a year ago."

Her expression turned somber; she obviously had no idea. "I'm so sorry. That's horrible."

Stephenson was about to respond when Adams interjected. "He does have a girlfriend though. Getting pretty serious, right Stephenson?"

"Actually, we broke up."

Adams' eyebrows shot to the top of his forehead. "What? When?"

"Saturday morning."

"What happened?"

Richards glanced at her desk before turning back to Stephenson. "Looks like Suarez is ready to go. I'll see you guys later."

"Sure," Stephenson said, grateful she'd excused herself from their conversation that had just turned personal.

"So?" Adams pressed.

Stephenson took a deep breath. He might as well tell him the truth. He knew it would probably do him good to talk about it. "I went over to her house to propose on her birthday and found another guy had spent the night. Apparently, they'd been seeing each other for a few weeks."

Adams' jaw dropped. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"I didn't want to talk about it."

"Wow. I'm sorry, man. I really am. That's rough."

Stephenson nodded.

"Well, at least you didn't marry her," Adams said.

"I guess."

• • • •

STEPHENSON'S CELL PHONE rang half an hour later. "Stephenson."

"Hey, it's Richards. We just got to the crime scene and I wanted to make sure our homicide isn't related to those cases you're already working on. Our victim is a twenty-three-year-old male who was strangled in his apartment. I know you picked up other strangulation cases over the weekend."

"Yeah, we made an arrest for one of them, but we're still working the other two."

"You guys want to come have a look at the scene? See if it might be connected?"

"Sure, what's the address?" He scribbled it down on a notepad as Richards rattled off the downtown location. "Could you say that again?" He looked in disbelief at the address he'd jotted down.

She repeated the address.

"Thanks, we'll be right there."

"Be right where?" Adams asked as Stephenson hung up.

"You're not going to believe this. Dr. Leroy's neighbor has been murdered. And guess how he died?"

• • • •

"OUR VICTIM IS TWENTY-three-year-old Robert Benson," Richards said.

The apartment looked the part of a bachelor pad. A drum set took up much of the space in the small living room. A pair of drumsticks sat neatly atop the stool. Next to the drums, a large painting and easel lay on the floor of the small living space, surrounded by a mess of painting supplies. Presumably, it had gotten knocked over in the struggle that led to Robert's death.

In the kitchen, Detective Suarez spoke with a member of the CSI team. The team was already working away at processing the scene. Stephenson and Adams stood over the body of Dr. Leroy's neighbor. He lay face-up on the hardwood floor. He was barefoot, wearing a faded black t-shirt and baggy jeans. Even though his face was now mottled with a purplish-gray hue, Stephenson recognized him as the young man he and Adams had confirmed the doctor's alibi with a few days before.

“We spoke to him over the weekend to confirm his neighbor's alibi for our other strangulation cases.”

Richards raised her eyebrows. “Really? That's interesting. Well, looks like you two might need to have another chat with that neighbor.”

“What's that smell?” Stephenson asked. “Acetone?”

“Paint thinner.” Richards pointed to an open can on the floor with clear liquid surrounding it. It lay next to a fallen easel and painting. “We found paper towels in the kitchen garbage that appear to be soaked with it.”

Stephenson looked at the mess of liquid on the floor. “If Robert was cleaning up a spill, he didn't do a very good job.”

“Maybe it got knocked over during the struggle, and the killer tried to wipe up the mess,” Adams said.

It seemed too sloppy for Dr. Leroy. And Stephenson doubted anyone else was responsible for his neighbor's death.

Richards pointed down at the victim. “His friend found him just like this earlier this morning. Robert here was supposed to pick the friend up from the airport last night at eleven thirty but didn't show. His friend called him several times without an answer and ended up taking a taxi home. He came by this morning to make sure Robert was all right. He's pretty shaken up.”

“How'd the friend get in?”

“The door was unlocked. There's no sign of forced entry.”

“No indication the lock been picked?”

“Not that we could tell.”

Stephenson looked over at Adams. “So maybe he knew his killer and let him in.”

“Or he felt safe enough to leave his door unlocked,” Adams said.

“His friend has already given us his statement, but I asked him to stay in case you two had any questions for him. We haven't been able to find what was used to strangle him. It looks like the killer may have taken it with them.”

Stephenson bent down to get a closer look at the victim. “His ligature mark is very similar to Patricia's. I'm guessing it was a necktie.” He lifted one of Robert's hands to his nose with a gloved hand. “I can't smell any paint thinner.”

“Doing my work for me, detective?”

Stephenson looked up to see Pete heading toward them from a few feet away. His coat was wet from the rain and his normally neat short curls were in disarray atop his head. Despite the ME's slightly disheveled appearance, Stephenson could tell he was in a good mood. He placed his black canvas bag of supplies that he brought to every crime scene down next to Robert's body.

“As best I can, doctor,” Stephenson said, stepping back from the body and allowing Pete to start his examination.

Pete knelt over the victim. “I agree, it does look very similar to Patricia's ligature mark.” He carefully turned Robert onto his side and inspected the back of his neck. “Do you have reason to believe his death is related to Martin and Patricia's?”

Stephenson looked at Adams before he answered. “Yes.”

Pete continued to inspect the body while Stephenson turned back to Richards. “Have you requested the building's surveillance footage?”

“We've placed a call to the building's manager. She should be here any minute and can show us what they have. There are no cameras on this floor or in the elevator, but there are a couple in the building's parking garage.”

“Yeah, we learned that when we requested footage over the weekend to check the doctor's alibi. Problem is, the cameras in the parking garage don't cover the exit or the parking spaces close to it. But we'll see what they show. We should talk to the building manager about getting a camera on the exit. You said the friend who found Robert is still here?”

“Yeah, he's waiting out in the hall. His name is Travis. He confirmed the address for Robert's parents. They live in Kirkland.” She handed him a small piece of paper with their handwritten address.

“Thanks. We'll take over from here. Sorry to take your first case away from you.”

“That's all right. You owe me one,” she said, nudging him with her elbow.

“Okay,” Stephenson said before turning to Adams. “Let's go talk to the friend.”

Adams nodded and turned to Richards before following Stephenson out of the apartment. “See ya later.”

They reached the front door of the apartment and Stephenson bent down to examine the lock for himself. Like Richards had said, the lock looked perfectly intact.

“Richards was totally flirting with you back there,” Adams said in a lowered voice.

“Really? I didn't notice.”

“It was obvious.” Adams shot him a sideways glance. “I hope you're not planning to ask her out before I do.”

Stephenson grinned at the overly-concerned look on his partner's face. “Relax. I'm not planning on asking anyone out. I've got other things on my mind.”

He stepped out into the hall and Adams followed behind. It was easy to spot Robert's friend. The young man had taken a seat in the hallway with his back resting against the wall. His knees were pulled to his chest. As Stephenson approached him, he saw that his eyes were red from crying.

“Hi, I'm Detective Stephenson and this is Detective Adams. You're the one who found Robert this morning?”

He nodded. “Yeah. I already gave the other detectives my statement, but they asked me to hang around in case there were any more questions.” He stared at the wall opposite him as he spoke, avoiding eye contact with the detectives.

“When was the last time you talked to Robert?” Stephenson asked.

“Um...I texted Rob before my flight left from Boston yesterday and he texted me back saying he'd be there to pick me up when I got to Seattle.”

“And what time was that?”

“Around nine p.m. in Boston, so I guess around six o'clock here.”

“Did he ever mention any problems with any of his neighbors?”

“No. Why?” Travis looked up and made eye contact with the detectives for the first time. “Do you think one of his neighbors killed him?”

“How did you get into Robert's apartment this morning?” Adams asked.

“I knocked a bunch of times and he didn't answer. I called his phone and could hear it ringing inside his apartment. When I tried the door, it was unlocked. I went inside and that's when—” his voice broke. Travis cleared his throat. “That's when I found him.”

Stephenson watched Travis' eyes brim with fresh tears.

“Thank you for staying. We're very sorry about Robert.”

“Are you going to catch whoever did this?”

Stephenson made a point not to make promises he couldn't keep to friends and family of homicide victims. But, in this case, he felt strangely confident he would bring Robert's killer to justice.

"Yes we are."

Stephenson could feel Adams' eyes on him as they walked back down the hall to Robert's apartment. But if he felt Stephenson was wrong for promising to catch Robert's killer, he didn't say so.

Pete turned Robert's body onto its side and pulled his t-shirt up to his arm pits as the detectives reentered the apartment. Richards knelt beside him, listening intently, as the medical examiner took advantage of the teachable moment with the young detective.

"This is the lividity I'm talking about." Pete pointed to the purplish discoloration of Robert's back as Stephenson and Adams approached. "When the heart stops, blood pools in the dependent parts of the body. Since there is no lividity present on the victim's abdomen, it would seem he died in this position. The discoloration doesn't shift when I turn the victim, which means the lividity is fixed. This tells me the victim has been dead for at least eight hours." Pete looked up at the two detectives standing over him. "The victim's liver temperature is seventy-eight degrees; he's in full rigor, and, as I was just showing Detective Richards, his lividity is fixed. Right now, I'm estimating he's been dead for approximately eleven to thirteen hours."

Adams checked his watch and turned to Stephenson. "That puts our time of death between seven thirty and nine thirty last night."

"I'll notify Robert's parents if you want to chase up that security footage," Stephenson said.

"You sure?"

Stephenson nodded.

"Okay. Call me when you're on your way back. I'll probably still be here. I want to see what else CSI finds in Robert's apartment before I go back to the homicide unit."

"Will do."

"I'll call you when I get done with the autopsy," Pete said.

"Thanks." Stephenson took a deep breath as he moved toward the elevator and prepared to do the hardest part of his job.

• • • •

STEPHENSON CHECKED his phone before pulling out onto the street as he left the home of Robert's parents. He'd placed it on silent before doing the notification.

He looked out his window at the landscaped lawns that lined the steep street as he drove to the end of the block. The Benson's large water-view home was like all the others in its Kirkland neighborhood. Overlooking Lake Washington, the newly-built, two-story house left little space between them and their neighbors. Like many homes in the area, the lot was developed for a much smaller structure in the sixties or seventies, which would've been demolished and replaced with their current dwelling. The upscale neighborhood was just up the hill from the lake and offered a mixture of both mature trees and new homes.

He felt drained after informing the Bensons of their son's death. It didn't matter how many death notifications he'd done before, it never got easier. He doubted it ever would. The Bensons were obviously well-off, but Stephenson didn't envy them. No amount of money could ever replace their loss.

He reflected on his conversation with Robert's parents as he drove across the floating bridge over Lake Washington back to the city. On a bright summer day, the view of the lake with Mount Rainier in the backdrop made for a spectacular sight. But on this dreary day in January, the visibility from the bridge was poor. Stephenson could only make out the water close to the bridge, which rippled on the surface from the wind and rain.

He called Adams when he got to the other side of the bridge.

“How did it go?” Adams asked.

“They were in shock. Grief stricken, as expected. I wish I could unsee the look on their faces when I told them. I hate that part of the job.”

Adams exhaled into the phone. “I know. Me too.”

“Are you still at the scene?”

“Yeah, CSI is still processing it. After you left, I noticed Robert’s drumsticks reeked of acetone. We dusted them for prints but there were none. It seems they were wiped clean with the paint thinner that had spilled on the floor. I’ll have them sent to the lab to be tested for mineral spirits and acetone.”

Stephenson wasn't surprised by the finding but still found it disturbing. It left only two possible scenarios in Stephenson's mind. Either the doctor had played his neighbor's drums prior to killing him or he'd played them after strangling Robert and while his dead body lay at Dr. Leroy's feet. He thought the second scenario more likely, which meant they were dealing with a psychopath.

“I’m still going over the building’s security footage so I’ll be here a little longer. You coming back?”

Stephenson passed the exit that would take him to Robert’s apartment, deciding to make another stop first. “No, I’m going to pay Leroy a visit. I’ll meet you back at homicide this afternoon.” The only positive thing that had come from his visit with the Bensons was it made him even more determined to catch their son's killer.

“Okay, see you then.”

A few minutes later, Stephenson pulled into the parking lot of Dr. Leroy's psychiatry practice. He was all but convinced the doctor had murdered his neighbor. And he sure as hell wasn't going to let him get away with it.

Eric was half asleep listening to a typical whiny millennial complain about the stresses of her day job when his drab new secretary rudely interrupted them. She threw open his office door and butted into the middle of his client's private session. He noticed she didn't even have the good grace to look sorry. He felt his left eye begin to twitch.

After sleeping off his few too many drinks in a jail cell, he'd been released early that morning. Slapped with a thousand-dollar fine, Eric was told he would receive a subpoena in the mail with an upcoming court date for his misdemeanor charge. His head throbbed despite the aspirin and half a pot of coffee he'd consumed before coming to the office. He tried not to feel down on himself for the absurdity of his actions after he'd left the theater.

"There's a police officer here to see you. He says it's urgent," she blabbed.

"Police officer?" His client sat forward in her chair.

He really needed to get a new secretary.

"Well, tell him that he has to wait. As you can see, I'm with a client."

"I don't think he's going to take no for an answer."

It seems like the one who's having a hard time taking no for an answer is you, he wanted to say. He checked his watch. There was only fifteen minutes left in his client's session, and he had lost interest in anything she said nearly an hour ago. He looked down at her chart to find her name.

"I'm sorry, Bridgett. But it looks like we will have to pick this up again next week. My apologies for the interruption."

Bridgett looked at his secretary and then back at him.

"Okay."

She sheepishly stood from her chair and followed his secretary out of the room. It was moments like these when he missed Daisy almost more than he could bear.

The door hadn't yet fully closed behind them when Blondie pushed it back open. He did not look happy to see him.

"Good afternoon, doctor."

Eric crossed his leg and set down his notepad.

"Good afternoon, detective."

He shut the door but remained standing just inside of it. Eric looked from him to the chair and then back to him again, as if daring him to sit down. He didn't. Probably afraid Eric would start reading his mind if he did. And then he would know they had nothing on him.

"What were you doing last night between seven p.m. and midnight?"

Well, fair dinkum. They'd found his body already. That was quick for a bloke who never seemed to leave the apartment. Eric thought it might be weeks before his body was discovered, after someone finally complained of the smell or a relative came to check on him.

"Um...let me think."

He picked up his pen and tapped it against his notebook.

"I went to the movies. I think I have my ticket stubs in my wallet if you'd like to see." He reached into his back pocket.

"I would. What time was the movie?"

"I actually saw two movies, back to back. Well, the same movie. Twice. The first showing was around eight thirty." Eric pulled out the movie tickets and held them up. "Eight fifteen to be exact," he read aloud before handing it off to the detective. He had made sure to also have the receipts handy. He pulled them out next and held them out. "Here's my receipt with my credit card information."

Blondie took it from him, looking unimpressed. His expression changed, and Eric realized he must've seen the movie title.

"Fifty Shades Freed, huh?"

"Yes."

"You go by yourself?"

"I did."

"Interesting. And it was good enough that you had to see it twice?"

"What can I say? I liked it. So kill me." He smiled. Blondie frowned. "No pun intended."

"You were late," he said, ignoring Eric's joke. "This receipt is timed eight twenty-one."

"Only a few minutes. They were still playing previews for a while after I took my seat."

"What did you do from seven p.m. until the time you got to the movies?"

"Let me think." Eric motioned toward the chair across from him that was usually occupied by his patients. "Are you sure you wouldn't like to have a seat?"

"I'm sure."

The detective shifted his weight from one foot to another and Eric could tell he'd made him uncomfortable.

"Suit yourself. Anyway, I got home about six. I made dinner and then watched TV until I decided to go to the movies." That last part was a lie. He never watched TV that early in the evening. But there was no way he was going to tell him about his book. Or murdering his neighbor. "Why do you ask?"

The cop looked like he was trying to read him before he answered.

"I'm afraid that yet another person that you know has been murdered."

Eric portrayed a look of surprised concern. "I hope you're joking."

"I never joke about murder."

His stone-cold expression and unmoving form reminded him of a statue, and something about this struck Eric as funny. He did his best to suppress the laugh that rose to the surface but was unable to control the smile that escaped his lips.

"Something funny?"

He relaxed his mouth.

"No. It just doesn't seem like that could be possible."

"You're not going to ask who it is?"

"I assume you're going to tell me."

"Your neighbor, Robert Benson. The one you asked to stop drumming the night of Patricia, Martin, and Daisy's murders."

"That's awful. He was so young."

"Yes. I've just come from notifying his parents of their twenty-three-year-old son's death. Their lives will never be the same."

If he was trying to make him feel guilty about killing the drummer, he was wasting his breath. Eric had heard the TV going in his neighbor's apartment during the day and all throughout the weekends. He shuddered at the thought. What kind of lowlife watched TV during the day? His neighbor, apparently.

Eric had always been revolted by people who watched TV during the daylight hours. It seemed a little more civilized when it was at least dark out. But people who sat on their ass wasting the daylight hours by numbing their brains with mindless television and having no ambition whatsoever never ceased to disgust him. Eric reminded himself of this whenever he started to feel sorry for killing him.

“Did you go straight home after the movies?”

“Well, no. But that's a long story.”

“I have time,” he said.

Eric sighed. Of course he did. “I stopped at a bar on the way home.”

“You have a receipt to show for that too?”

“No. I got arrested before I was able to pay my tab.”

His face perked up. “Arrested? For what?”

“Disorderly conduct. I had a few too many. I slept it off in a jail cell and they released me this morning. I'm sure you'll be able to verify that without a problem.”

“I will.”

Eric could see the detective was intrigued by his arrest. More so than he thought he should be.

“Was something bothering you that caused you to drink so much?”

Eric scoffed at his lousy attempt to psychoanalyze him. “Nope.”

“Have you ever been inside your neighbor's apartment?”

He was about to say no but changed his mind in the off chance that he'd left some trace of himself inside the drummer's apartment.

“Yes, once.”

Blondie waited for him to offer more information. Eric obliged.

“We rode together in the elevator one afternoon, and I asked if I could have a go at his drum set.”

“Have a go?”

“Yes. I was the drummer in a band during my youth in Australia.”

He paused, proud of this fact. The detective looked back at him blankly. What a buzzkill, Eric thought.

“Anyway, I asked if he would mind if I had another crack at it since it had been so long, and he said sure.”

“And how long ago was this?”

He should probably make it recent. “Two nights ago.”

Blondie crossed his arms and Eric had difficulty reading his expression.

“A few of the tenants complained about his drumming to the building's manager, but not you. I would imagine you felt he was pretty inconsiderate though. Living right next to him and all.”

He was fishing for information, but Eric didn't take the bait. “I wasn't bothered by it. But I guess I've always had a deep appreciation for the arts.” Eric looked at him like he knew he would understand, even though he knew he wouldn't.

“Did you hear anything last night, before the movie?”

“Mmm...” He pretended to think for a moment. “No.”

“Nothing?”

“Nothing. Sorry I can't be of more help.”

Blondie seemed to study him, obviously not believing what Eric had said.

“It would help if you allowed me to search your apartment. Would you consent to that?”

“I'm afraid not without a warrant.”

Blondie looked as though he'd expected this.

“It must be hard to trust people after all the terrible things you see on the job,” Eric said. “You have a family, detective?”

When he didn't respond, Eric continued. “I imagine it's difficult to switch off from the dead bodies, heinous crimes, and murderers you encounter when you go home and feel obligated to act normal with your family, wife, or girlfriend. Like it's all just another day at the office. That must be wearing.”

Eric could see he'd struck a nerve, but not in the way he intended. He had misjudged him.

“Oh, wait. You don't have any of those,” Eric corrected.

Now he had gotten under his skin. The detective's eyes narrowed, but he otherwise tried to ignore Eric's observation. Blondie was young, probably not yet thirty. But old enough to have a family, or at least someone to go home to.

“You let the job consume your life, don't you? Well, I guess that makes things easier. No one to have to interact with after some of the grotesque things you must see.”

“While I'm here, I may as well inform you that your client, Patricia, and her husband's deaths are being treated as a double homicide. So, don't leave town. I'll probably need to speak with you again soon.”

If the young cop was trying to shock him, he failed.

“Anytime. You know where to find me.” Eric took a business card off his desk and held it out for the detective. “Here, this has all my contact information.”

He hesitated to accept it. “Thanks, but we've got all your information already on record.”

He lifted the card higher. “Just in case.”

Reluctantly, Blondie took the card and slipped it into his back pocket before turning to leave.

“Thanks for your time, doctor,” he said as he opened the office door.

“If you ever need to talk about anything, I'd be happy to fit you in. I think you'd find I'm an excellent listener.”

Blondie slammed his door shut.

Stephenson looked up from his desk when Adams got back to the Homicide Unit later that evening. Adams took a seat across from his partner. “How’d it go with the doctor?”

Stephenson placed his hands on the back of his head. “He has an alibi for most of the night. He went to the movies, actually two movies in a row. He watched two back-to-back showings of Fifty Shades Freed and paid with his credit card. I stopped at the theater on my way back and checked their security footage. He was there.”

“Interesting movie choice.”

“It gets better. He stops at a bar on the way home, gets drunk, follows a group of women to their car where he jumps onto the hood and hysterically begs them not to leave. According to the arrest report, he kept calling one of them Daisy. He cried out her name the whole ride back to the station.”

Adams raised his eyebrows.

“What did the building’s security cameras show?” Stephenson asked.

“Not much. There’s a camera at the front entrance and three in the parking garage. Twenty-eight of the seventy-five people who entered through the building’s front entrance between five and ten last night had to be buzzed in. The rest used their keycard. I asked Robert’s friend, Travis, if he recognized any of those twenty-eight visitors, but he said no. The footage isn’t the best quality, but I’ll run those images through our facial recognition software to see if we get any hits.”

“How did Travis get in the building without Robert letting him in?”

“He was let in by a woman leaving for work. She must’ve presumed he lived in the building. So much for controlled access.

“Anyway, there’s only one other resident on Robert’s floor other than Dr. Leroy. She’s ninety years old and was watching TV in her apartment during Robert’s time of death. She didn’t see or hear a thing. The entrance to the parking garage is gated. You can only get in with the building’s keycard. The parking garage cameras show Dr. Leroy get into his car and leave the garage at 8:10 p.m. and he doesn’t come home until seven thirty this morning.”

“So, his alibi’s solid, but only from 8:10 onwards,” Stephenson said. “I’m guessing the doctor probably killed Robert shortly before he left for the movies, but that’s going to be difficult to prove unless we can get a more precise time of death. What else did you find at the scene?”

“Not much. I dropped Robert’s laptop and cellphone off at TESU to be analyzed.”

The Technical Electronic Support Unit was located on the seventh floor next to the Homicide Unit.

“I also sent the drumsticks to the crime lab on my way here from the crime scene. They’re backed up as usual, so it’ll be a few weeks before we get the official results. So far, there’s no match to Dr. Leroy’s fingerprints anywhere in the apartment.”

“Leroy said he went over and played the drums two nights ago.”

It didn’t surprise him that Dr. Leroy lied, but it made him wonder why he’d said he’d been in his neighbor’s apartment on Sunday night. There must be something that linked him to Robert’s crime scene.

“You think the killer played the drums before he killed him?” Adams asked.

“Or after.”

Adams leaned forward and rested his elbows on his desk.

“We need to search Dr. Leroy’s apartment. I spoke with Judge Tanner about it this afternoon, but she doesn’t think we have enough on Leroy for a warrant. Maybe we should ask if he’d let us do the search without one.”

Stephenson let out a sigh and leaned back in his chair. “I already tried. He said no.”

Adams nodded. “Figures. Robert's building manager said she'd received two complaints about the noise from Robert playing his drums in his apartment. Both from tenants on the floor below who have solid alibis for last night. There were no complaints from his next-door neighbor, Dr. Leroy. I think he preferred to take matters into his own hands. The manager said if she got one more complaint, she would've given Robert notice to evict the apartment.”

“I'll check the traffic cams between his apartment and Martin and Patricia's address on Friday night.”

“I'll help you,” Adams said.

Even though their addresses were less than five miles apart, it took several hours for them to go through every traffic cam footage between Dr. Leroy’s and Martin and Patricia’s residence the night of their deaths. Stephenson studied the map after looking through the last of the footage. It would’ve been possible for Dr. Leroy to have avoided all traffic cameras on his way to their house, but it would have required a great deal of premeditation.

“It's kind of strange that a middle-aged man with a clean record would suddenly murder three people within less than a week. Although, it happens, I know. When did he move here from Australia?” Adams asked.

“Twenty years ago. He was twenty-five. I requested a background check from the Australian authorities, but I’m waiting on the report.”

“Oh, and I almost forgot,” Stephenson added. “Dwayne's two friends saw his arrest on the news and came home early from their snowboarding trip in Canada. They came into the station this afternoon to confirm Dwayne had spent the night at their place the night of Daisy's murder. Only it doesn't change anything. Like Dwayne had said, he didn't get to their house till about midnight, so it leaves plenty of time for him to have killed Daisy. Their statements will be pretty much useless to his defense.”

“I agree,” Adams said.

Stephenson shut down his laptop and stood from his chair. “Let’s call it a night.”

Adams was already at his desk when Stephenson got to work the next morning. Stephenson had his coat halfway off when Adams got up from his seat.

“You might want to leave that on,” he said. “I came in early this morning, and I stumbled upon something interesting.”

“What's that?” Stephenson pulled his rain jacket back over his shoulder.

“I searched for Martin and Patricia's case file using their address, only I typed in 3898 McGilvra instead of East McGilvra Street. Coincidentally, this pulled up two files, 3898 McGilvra Boulevard East and 3898 East McGilvra Street. The first report is for a break-in that occurred a few blocks from Martin and Patricia's two nights before their deaths. And the addresses are only one word different. Nothing was taken from the home, and, when the mother and daughter surprised the intruder, he fled but hasn't been caught.”

“So, did they see his face?”

Adams smiled. “They did. He was wearing a baseball hat, but they describe him as being in his mid-forties, Caucasian with light brown hair, and approximately five ten with a thin build.”

“It could be Dr. Leroy.”

“Yes, it could. They believe the intruder entered the house through the back door, and there's a slight indication the lock was picked. I'm thinking if I got the address wrong, maybe he did too. Anyway, I've already printed off a photomontage that includes Dr. Leroy for them to ID. If we head there now, we could probably question the daughter too, before she goes to school.”

“Nice work. Let's go.”

• • • •

THEY PULLED IN FRONT of the Madison Park home twenty minutes later. It was in the same neighborhood as Martin and Patricia's house, where the streets were lined with maple trees and the homes aged from the 1920's to new. Stephenson was glad to see two cars were parked in the driveway. The rain had started to come down hard, and he pulled the hood of his jacket over his head as he stepped out of the car.

When they got under the covered front porch, he drew back his hood. Adams rang the doorbell. Moments later, a teenage girl cautiously opened the door only enough to see who was there.

“Can I help you?” she asked.

According to the police report, she was seventeen.

Adams smiled, hoping to put the girl at ease. “Good morning. I'm Detective Adams and this is Detective Stephenson. We have some questions for you and your mother about the break-in you had last week.”

She looked back and forth between the two detectives.

“Mom!” She turned back toward the inside of the house. “Some detectives are here to ask about the break-in,” she yelled.

“Okay, I'm coming,” a woman's voice called from upstairs.

The girl opened the door wide and stepped aside to make room for the detectives.

“Come on in.”

“Thank you,” Adams said, stepping into the entryway.

Stephenson followed closely behind. The girl used one hand to fling her long dark curls behind her back while she closed the door with the other. A thin middle-aged woman descended the carpeted stairway that led to the entryway, securing an earring as she went. In contrast to her daughter's casual attire, she wore fitted black pants and a red blouse. She stepped carefully in her stilettos.

“Ms. Phillips?”

“Yes. Call me Beth.”

Adams repeated their introduction as the woman reached the bottom of the steps.

“Have you caught him?” she asked, looking expectantly at the detectives.

“Not yet,” Adams said. “But we're hoping you and your daughter might be able to answer some questions that would help us identify him.”

She let out a sigh in her obvious disappointment. “Of course. Would you like to have a seat?”

She motioned toward the sofa in a formal living room to the right of the entryway.

“That'd be great, thank you.”

The detectives took a seat on the sofa. The woman sat across from them in an armchair while her daughter started to go upstairs.

“Kaitlyn, come sit down.”

Kaitlyn looked put out as she turned back down the steps. “I'm gonna be late for school.”

“This is important. It won't take long,” Beth said.

The girl let out a loud sigh before plopping herself down next to her mother in an identical armchair. She looked across at the detectives with a pained expression.

“Has anyone ever told you that you look like Chris Pine?” Kaitlyn asked, staring at Stephenson.

“Kaitlyn.” Beth looked slightly shocked at her daughter's question.

Adams rolled his eyes. “Trust me, he knows how good he looks. You don't have to tell him. Don't make my life any harder than it already is. He doesn't even work out. It's disgusting.”

Although he knew his partner was half-joking, his comments were out of character for him to say in front of their two witnesses. He was normally nothing but professional. Stephenson wondered if Richard's flirting with him was getting to his partner.

“Anyway, we have some photos we'd like both of you to look at and see if any of these men is the man who broke into your house.”

Adams pulled the photos out from the inside of his jacket and laid them on the coffee table.

“Okay,” Beth said.

Stephenson held his breath while the mother and daughter leaned forward to look closer at the pictures.

They stared at the photos for almost a minute before Beth spoke. Stephenson knew what she was going to say before she said it. There'd been no look of recognition on either of their faces.

“I'm sorry, I don't know. It all happened so fast, and he was wearing a baseball hat so it's hard to tell from the pictures. I can't be sure.”

“What about you, Kaitlyn?” Adams asked.

The girl was still staring down at the photos.

“Maybe this one.” She pointed down at Dr. Leroy's photo. “But I'm not sure. He looks different without the hat.”

It's him, Stephenson thought. “Take your time, Kaitlyn. Is this the man who broke into your house?”

She bit her lip and took another look at his picture then glanced across at all the others. “Maybe. But he also kind of looked like him.” She pointed to a man in another photo who had similar features to Dr. Leroy.

Stephenson tried his best to hide his disappointment. They were so close to her making a positive ID of Dr. Leroy.

“Are you sure?”

“Yeah. It could've been either of those two.”

“Did you notice if he had an accent? Did he say anything while he was here?”

Beth's eyes lit up. “Yes, he said he was leaving when I came into the entryway. Now that you mention it, I think he might've had an accent. I'm not sure from where though, maybe British? No, it was subtler. Actually, I'm not sure.” She rubbed her fingers against either side of her temples. “I'm sorry. I was so panicked that a stranger had broken into our home. That's all I was focused on.”

“That's okay,” Adams said. “Do you remember an accent, Kaitlyn?”

She shrugged. “I didn't notice.” She turned to her mother. “Can I go to school now? I'm already late.”

Beth nodded.

She jumped out of her chair and grabbed a backpack laying by the stairs.

“Hope you catch him,” she said to the detectives before she ran out the door.

Not as much as I do, Stephenson thought.

She had only been gone for a few seconds when the front door flung open again. She leaned her head around the door. “He said crikey. I just remembered.”

“And are you sure he didn't have an accent?” Stephenson asked.

“Maybe, I don't know. But I remember he said crikey when he dropped his phone because I thought it was a weird thing to say. Anyway, I gotta go,” she said before disappearing behind the door and pulling it shut behind her.

“I should probably be getting to work,” Beth said. “Unless there's anything else?”

Adams looked at Stephenson before he answered. “No, that's all for now. Thanks for your time.”

“Sorry we couldn't be more helpful.”

She stood from her chair and the detectives followed her to the door.

“I changed the lock on the back door and had a security system installed in the house. Do you think we're in danger of the man coming back?”

“We can't say for sure, but we don't think so.” Adams handed her his card before following Stephenson outside. “If you think of anything else, please let us know.”

“I will,” she said, closing the door behind them.

“He said crikey,” Stephenson said once they got in the car. “It had to be Dr. Leroy. We were so close to Kaitlyn identifying him.”

He leaned his head back against the headrest while Adams drove.

“I agree, but it still doesn't give us an arrest.”

Stephenson looked out the window. The rain had stopped, but it had been enough to leave puddles in the street. His mind went back to Dr. Leroy's arrest report from two nights before.

“Where do you think Daisy was that night when she told Dwayne she was at her sisters? Her parents said they hadn't seen her in weeks.”

“I don't know. Why?”

“What if she was with Dr. Leroy?”

Adams seemed to think about this for a moment. “You think there was something going on between them? Her phone records didn't show any contact between them.”

They still hadn't found Daisy's phone but were able to get her text and call history through her phone records. Although, having her actual phone would've been more helpful. There were some things, like photos, that couldn't be obtained through phone records.

“True. But he seemed genuinely stricken when we informed him of her death. It was different than the way he reacted when we told him about the death of his neighbor and one of his patients. Like he actually cared.”

“Yeah, I agree. But he did work with her every day. He could've had more of a personal relationship with her than with his neighbor and Patricia. Plus, if he killed those two, their deaths wouldn't have come as a shock.”

“Right.”

Stephenson's eyes were drawn to the oppressive gray cloud cover that hung over them as he thought about how they were going to prove the doctor's guilt. Dr. Leroy had killed three people in a matter of days. If they didn't arrest him soon, Stephenson was sure there would be more. He had to be stopped. He had an idea, but his partner wasn't going to like it. He decided not to say anything as they drove back to the Homicide Unit. He needed to talk to Sergeant McKinnon.

Stephenson could see the sergeant was in his office when they got back. He stopped at his desk to quickly check his email before he went to see the sergeant. He'd gotten an email back from the Australian police in New South Wales. The doctor's record was clean.

He forwarded the email to Adams before he closed out of his inbox, all the more intent to carry out his plan. It might be their only chance of catching Dr. Leroy.

"Can I ask you something?"

He looked to see Richards standing at the end of his desk.

"Only if you promise not to ask if anyone's ever told him he looks like Chris Pine," Adams said.

She looked confused. "What?"

"Don't mind him. He's just kidding," Stephenson said.

She smiled. "Okay. Well, since you've taken over my first homicide case, I wanted to know where you guys were at. Did you talk to his neighbor, the doctor?"

"I did."

"And? Is he your guy?"

"I think he killed Robert, yes. Unfortunately, we're still a ways off from proving it."

"Well, I'll let you get back to work then. Just wanted to get an update."

Stephenson watched Adams' eyes follow her as she walked away. He stood and headed for McKinnon's office.

Adams looked up from his desk. "Where are you going in such a hurry?"

"I need to see McKinnon about something."

Adams waited a moment for him to elaborate. "Okay," he said, turning back to his laptop.

Stephenson felt a little guilty about going to the sergeant before telling his partner about his plan, but he didn't want to argue about it. And he felt he had no choice. It was their only option if they wanted to stop the doctor from killing anyone else.

Stephenson tried to gather his thoughts as he approached the sergeant's office. He knew what he was about to ask was against protocol and there was probably no way the sergeant would go for it. But, if anyone would see the need to break standard procedure for the sake of catching a killer, it would be McKinnon.

The glass door to McKinnon's office was closed and Stephenson could see him sitting at his desk behind his computer. He knocked against the glass enough to get the sergeant's attention. McKinnon lifted his head and motioned for him to come in. He took a deep breath as he opened the door.

Eric rose early on Thursday morning to get some writing in before work. His drunken escapade on Monday night had put him behind on his writing schedule. He took a sip from his freshly brewed black coffee and sat at his desk. He looked out his large window at the city that was still dark. It was so quiet, he felt like he was alone in the world. It was the perfect atmosphere to work his novel.

After Blondie's visit to his office on Tuesday, Eric started to think he might need to take some precautionary measures in the unlikely event they charged him with murder. He was sure he'd been careful and was confident they wouldn't find adequate evidence to arrest him. All they probably had to go on was that he knew all three of the deceased. It was certainly not proof that he killed anyone.

Even so, he needed to prepare for the worst-case scenario. He had stopped by his bank on his way home from the office the day before and withdrawn ten thousand in cash. It was safely stowed in his fireproof box under his bed where he kept his passport and other important documents. Just in case.

He still had two hours before he needed to leave for the office. He ran a Google search of Dwayne Morrison to see if there were any updates on his arrest and when he might go to trial. Eric choked on his coffee as he read the first headline that came up.

He set down his mug and coughed while he reread the headline. Surely, he'd read it wrong. But he hadn't. He clicked on the article and subconsciously shook his head as he read through it. Unbelievable. Starsky and Hutch really were as dumb as a box of rocks. Their incompetency was infuriating.

He looked at the time and got up to take a shower. There was no way he could work on his novel now. He needed to go have a word with his inept friends at the Seattle Homicide Unit.

• • • •

IT WAS JUST BECOMING daylight when Eric got to the Police Headquarters. He knew his way around from his visit over the weekend. After convincing the cop at the front desk that he needed to speak with the detectives regarding his secretary's murder, the officer had Eric wait while he called the homicide unit.

"The two detectives you wanted to speak to are both on the phone, but another detective will be down shortly to escort you upstairs," the officer said after making the call.

"Fine." Eric paced back and forth while he waited for the detective to bring him upstairs.

A dark-haired detective stepped off the elevator five minutes later. He introduced himself as Detective Suarez. He used his ID badge to get back into the elevator with Eric and pushed the button for the seventh floor.

"I'll take you to one of our interview rooms where you can wait to speak to Detectives Adams and Stephenson," Suarez said as they got off the elevator and entered the homicide unit.

Ignoring the detective, Eric stormed into the large open room cluttered with desks. There they were sitting across from each other. Dumb and dumber.

"How could you let him go?" he yelled.

They both looked up as Eric marched toward them.

Adams mumbled something under his breath and looked across at his partner. Eric must've heard wrong because it sounded like, that's what I said.

“What?” Eric asked.

Suarez caught up to Eric and pulled both of his hands behind his back.

“It’s okay,” Blondie said, signaling for Suarez to let him go.

Eric felt the detective slowly release his grip from Eric’s wrists.

Blondie rested both his elbows on his desk and leaned forward.

“We’re working on a theory that the same person who killed Daisy, also killed your client, Patricia Watts, her husband, Martin, and your neighbor, Robert.”

While Eric was happy the blond one was not as smart as he thought, he was irritated he couldn’t solve something so simple as Daisy’s murder. “That’s ridiculous.”

“Is it?”

“I know her boyfriend killed her. She was clearly afraid of him.”

“Did she ever tell you specifically that he’d hurt her? Or that she thought he might kill her?”

No, he thought. But he couldn’t say that. “Yes.”

They seemed to notice his hesitation. “And did you tell her to go to the police?”

This time Eric didn’t hesitate. “Well, she only told me last Thursday. I told her she should leave him. Maybe that’s what she was trying to do when he killed her.”

“Hmm.” Blondie folded his arms and sat back in his chair.

From what Eric could tell, he wasn’t taking him seriously.

He turned to Marky Mark. “If you had enough evidence to arrest him over the weekend, why in the world would you release him now?”

Marky Mark cleared his throat. “He has an alibi for the time of Daisy’s death. It was just confirmed yesterday.” Eric noted that he didn’t look happy about it.

“That has to be a mistake. I’m telling you he killed Daisy. You’ve let her killer back out on the street.”

“No one seems to know where Daisy was last Thursday night, the night before she was killed. Was she with you?” Blondie asked.

“Why? You think I killed her?” He pointed to his chest.

“Did you?”

“Of course not! I—” He stopped short, realizing he was about to say he loved her. He guessed maybe he did, but he couldn’t say that to these buffoons. “She was my friend.”

Blondie seemed to be taking pleasure from his outburst, which only made him more furious.

“You haven’t come across her phone, have you? Maybe she left it in your apartment?” he asked.

“No, I don’t have her phone. Maybe if you two were doing your jobs properly you’d have found it by now. Are you still even treating Dwayne as a suspect?”

“His alibi has pretty much ruled him out. He couldn’t have been in two places at once.”

“Well he couldn’t possibly have been wherever he said he was, because I’m certain he killed Daisy.”

“Sorry, doctor. I’m afraid, with a confirmed alibi, we have to accept that he’s not our guy.”

Only the jackass wasn’t sorry. Eric might’ve been imagining it, but he looked like he was trying not to smile. Eric narrowed his eyes at him before turning to Wahlberg. He couldn’t read anything from his expression.

“You’re wrong. You need to check his alibi again.”

“Do you have any other information you’re not telling us?” Blondie asked.

“No. Except that Daisy wasn’t killed by the same person who murdered Patricia, her husband, and my neighbor. Daisy was killed by Dwayne.”

“And who killed Patricia, her husband, and your neighbor?”

He was nearly tempted to confess for the sake of getting Daisy the justice she deserved. Nearly, but not quite. “That's your job to find out, not mine. You two have made a serious mistake,” Eric said before he turned and walked out of the homicide unit.

If they weren't going to make Dwayne pay for what he did to Daisy, he'd have to kill him himself.

Stephenson's desk phone rang an hour after Dr. Leroy's visit. He recognized the number from the security desk on the building's first floor.

"Stephenson."

"Hey, it's Drew from security. I've got a couple down here who want to speak with you about their son's murder. They said his name is Robert Benson."

"Tell them I'll be right down."

Stephenson stood from his desk after hanging up. Adams looked up from his computer screen.

"The Bensons are here and want to talk to us about Robert's case."

Adams nodded. "I'll see if the conference room is available."

Stephenson put his hands on his hips and stared at the floor while he waited for the elevator. It was possible the Bensons had some information that could help him solve their son's murder. But, most likely, they had come for answers. Answers he wouldn't be able to give them.

• • • •

"HOW CAN YOU NOT KNOW who killed him? He lived in a secure building."

Robert's mother gripped the armrests of her chair. Her eyes searched for answers as she shifted her gaze between Adams and Stephenson.

Scott and Linda Benson looked like different people from the put-together couple Stephenson had met two days earlier. Linda's strawberry-blond hair was pulled back in a severe ponytail. From the dark circles under their bloodshot eyes, Stephenson doubted they'd had any sleep since he last saw them.

"We're still processing some of the evidence from Robert's crime scene. And we have a person of interest."

"So, why don't you arrest him?" Robert's father asked, taking hold of his wife's hand.

"We don't have enough evidence to arrest anyone at this time," Adams said. "But we're doing everything we can to prove who killed him."

Scott Benson choked back tears. Stephenson slid a box of Kleenex across the conference table.

Linda pressed Stephenson. "Robert's been dead for nearly three days now. I read that if a homicide isn't solved after the first forty-eight hours the odds of solving the case go way down. Does this mean you might never catch his killer?"

Before Stephenson could answer, Scott loudly pulled a tissue from the box.

"It's true that the first forty-eight hours are critical in a homicide investigation, but we can't always make an arrest that quickly. Some cases just take longer to solve. It doesn't mean that we aren't going to solve your son's case."

"There wasn't even a mention of Robert's death in the news today. All they could talk about was that big-shot author who offed his wife before killing himself. It's like the world has forgotten him already. I want to make sure that you won't forget him."

Stephenson chose not to correct her assumptions about Martin and Patricia's deaths.

"We promise. We're doing everything we can to find your son's killer. And we won't forget him," Adams said.

"We'll let you know when we make an arrest. In the meantime, feel free to contact us if you have any questions."

Linda gave a somber nod and the couple stood from their chairs in silence.

“I’ll walk you out,” Stephenson said.

After escorting the Bensons out of the building, Stephenson rode the elevator back to the seventh floor. He hated not being able to give them closure by proving Dr. Leroy killed their son and arresting him for Robert’s murder. The elevator stopped and the doors slid open.

Stephenson took a deep breath before getting off. He could only hope his plan would work. A lot depended on what the doctor would do in response to Dwayne’s release.

Eric was still seething over Dwayne's release when he got home from work that night. He was too upset to start his evening yoga ritual and instead went about madly cleaning his apartment.

Over the years, he'd employed a few different house cleaners, but none of them ever quite matched his standards for cleanliness. He always ended up finding dust around the baseboards or an unwiped surface in the kitchen after they left, forcing him to do his own cleaning anyway. He'd let all of them go after a brief period of disappointment. It was better to simply do it right himself.

He didn't mind cleaning. In a way, he found it an effective stress releaser. Which was exactly what he needed tonight.

The more he thought about it, the more he became convinced Dwayne's release was a trap. Those cops had to know Dwayne was guilty. And they must have enough evidence to prove it or they wouldn't have arrested him in the first place.

Blondie seemed to have it out for him, but he obviously couldn't prove he killed Patricia, her fat husband, and whatever his name was who lived next door. Eric's guess was that they had let Dwayne go and placed him under surveillance in the desperate hope they could catch Eric in the act of killing him. Then, if they intervened in time, they'd rearrest Dwayne when they arrested Eric. Killing two birds with one stone, as the saying went.

But that wasn't going to stop Eric from killing him. If they were watching Dwayne, then they were probably watching him too. He'd just have to work around it. Fortunately, Harry and Lloyd weren't that hard to outsmart.

Two hours later, he was on to his final cleaning task: the floors. He didn't have a single strand of carpet in his apartment. Carpet was disgusting, filled with dust and festering bacteria. He plugged in his vacuum and started in the living room.

When he glided it under his couch, something shiny skidded out from the other side. He picked it up and recognized the bedazzled phone cover instantly. It was Daisy's. And it had been here all along.

He tried to turn it on but it was, of course, dead. He grabbed his phone from his desk and searched for the number for the Seattle Homicide Unit. There could be evidence on it that proved Dwayne killed her.

He found the number but paused before selecting it. How would he explain that Daisy's phone had been in his apartment this whole time? What if it made him look guilty, instead of Dwayne? There was possibly nothing on her phone that would incriminate Dwayne anyway. Plus, the detectives had already let Dwayne walk when it was obvious he killed her; that gave Eric little hope that turning in her phone would make any difference. He set his phone back down on the desk instead of making the call. He had a better idea.

• • • •

A QUICK GOOGLE SEARCH told him the cops probably couldn't track Daisy's phone to his place unless he used it to make a call, but he didn't want to risk it. Plus, if Dwayne used a tracking app on her phone, it could alert him to its location the moment Eric turned it on.

He threw on his coat, grabbed his killing gloves and a pack of antibacterial wipes, and went down to his car in the parking garage. He plugged Daisy's phone into the car charger as he drove. He waited until he pulled into Discovery Park to turn it on.

Leaving his engine running, he watched her screen light up and ask for the passcode. Crikey. He tried to think of what it would be. Daisy was a sweet, simple girl. He typed E-R-I-C. Incorrect passcode.

He drummed his fingers against his steering wheel. Her birthday. She'd asked for the day off. He tried 0-1-2-4. Her phone unlocked. Fair dinkum.

Eric disabled her phone's location settings and went to her text messages from Dwayne. While some of his texts could be construed as controlling, Eric was disappointed not to find anything more incriminating. There were no threats, not even any hostile messages.

He searched for Dwayne's name in her email next. Nothing. He looked out the window into the night. It wasn't as he had hoped, but he could still use it to blackmail Dwayne. He was grateful he hadn't been stupid enough to turn it over to the police. It wouldn't have helped them build a case against Dwayne anyway.

Eric pulled on his gloves and cleaned Daisy's bedazzled cover and screen with one of his antibacterial wipes before stepping out into the vacant parking lot with her phone in hand. After removing the SIM card, he placed her phone on the ground behind his rear tire. He laid the SIM card on top of the phone and got back into the car. He reversed over it, hearing it crunch against the gravel parking lot. He pulled forward before driving over it once more.

He put the car in park and got out to retrieve the smashed phone and SIM card. He could see by the red glow of his tail lights that they were nicely damaged. The phone screen had shattered, and the SIM card was now broken in two. He picked them up and placed them in his cup holder before pulling out of the dark parking lot.

He hopped on Interstate 90 and headed for the nearest bridge to dispose of her phone. Twenty-five minutes later, he slowed to ten under as he crossed the middle of the floating bridge that connected Seattle to prestigious Mercer Island. With his passenger window rolled down, he grasped the phone and SIM card from his cup holder and flung them as hard as he could out the window.

He watched to make sure they made it over the side of the bridge when the blare of a horn on his left pulled him from his concentration. Eric turned his attention to the road and saw he had merged halfway into the adjacent lane. The car beside him moved as far into the shoulder as the bridge would allow to avoid being sideswiped by his BMW. Their vehicles were only inches apart. He jerked his BMW back into his lane as the car beside him sped ahead, laying on their horn another time.

Eric over-corrected and felt his front fender smash into the concrete barrier, which protected his car from going over the edge. He swerved to the left, crossing over into the passing lane once again. Only this time there was no car next to him. He slowly merged back into his lane and let out a deep breath, thinking how close he'd been to a much worse collision. That was the last thing he needed.

He leaned his head back against the headrest and tried to relax. He'd taken care of Daisy's phone and had a sure-fire plan to blackmail Dwayne. He'd work out the details of his murder later. He just hoped his car wasn't too badly damaged.

His blood pressure had nearly returned to baseline when he saw the flashing red and blue lights in his rear-view mirror. Crikey. He hoped the squad car would pass him in its pursuit of another vehicle, but his hope disintegrated as the lights drew closer and the wail of a siren filled the quiet void of the night. Great.

There was nowhere to pull over on the bridge, so he kept driving with the cop car on his ass until he found a place to stop when they reached Mercer Island. He rolled down his window and waited calmly for the egotistical patrol officer whom he was about to have the pleasure of meeting.

He squinted from the blinding light that shined in his face as the officer approached.

“Been drinking tonight?” she asked.

He wanted to demand she take that obnoxious light out of his face, but he couldn't afford to have any more unnecessary run-ins with the law when he was currently a suspect in multiple homicides.

“No, ma'am.”

“You were pretty out of control back there on the bridge. You sure you haven't consumed any alcohol this evening? Or drugs?”

“I'm sure. I looked down briefly to adjust the climate control when I drifted into the other lane. It was a stupid mistake. I'm just glad no one was hurt.”

She sighed like she'd heard it all before.

“License and registration.”

His eyes tried to adjust to the dark, but he couldn't see a thing when he opened his glove compartment. He turned on the ceiling light and easily found his registration inside his neatly organized dash. He handed it to the officer before pulling his license out of his wallet.

“I'll be back,” she said. “You sit tight.”

He waited for what felt like an hour for her to return. Had she seen him throw Daisy's phone out the window? He couldn't even be sure the phone had made it all the way to the water. If it were recovered from the bridge and somehow made it back to the cops, it would not help his case to get a ticket in the same location as her lost phone. That is, if they were even able to trace it back to her. Both her phone and the SIM were in pretty bad shape.

Being that he was a murder suspect, he wondered if his name would come up with some sort of flag when the officer ran his information. He was probably just being paranoid. He assumed she would, however, see his arrest from a few nights earlier. Luckily, he hadn't had anything to drink tonight.

By the time the officer finally returned with his license and registration, he concluded he had nothing to worry about. He was sure Daisy's phone had landed in the lake. Even if it didn't, it probably wouldn't end up in the cops' hands anyway.

“You willing to take a breath test?”

“Sure.”

“I'm going to need you to step out of the vehicle.”

Eric did as instructed. She whipped out a mobile Breathalyzer device and held the small, plastic tube in front of his mouth.

“Blow.”

He gave one big, long breath into the device until it beeped, and she pulled it out of his mouth. She looked surprised when she checked the results. She handed him back his license and registration.

“I'm going to let you off with a warning, but only because you have a clean driving record. Next time, keep your eyes on the road.”

He couldn't believe his good luck. He thought for sure she'd been writing him a ticket. He climbed back inside his BMW, refolded his registration, and packed it away in his glove compartment as she walked back to her patrol car. It was probably his accent, he reasoned. In all the years he'd been here, it still made the American women swoon.

• • • •

ERIC WENT INTO WORK early the next morning, before his annoying new secretary came in. He rummaged through the filing cabinets behind the front desk and found what he was looking for only moments before Nurse Ratched arrived.

“Morning,” he said, stepping out from behind her desk.

“Morning.” As usual, she eyed him suspiciously. She looked down at the paper he held in his left hand.

He ignored her gaze and retreated into his office. He closed the door behind him and scanned through Daisy's employment application. Just as he had hoped, she'd listed Dwayne as her emergency contact along with his mobile phone number.

He walked outside to his car on his lunch hour and felt sick when he saw the damage he'd done to the passenger side the night before. Not quite as sick as he'd felt when he learned of Dwayne's release, but almost. The perfect black paint job on the front fender was marred with ugly gray scrapes from where he'd hit the guardrail.

He made himself look away before he got in on the driver's side, telling himself it was nothing that couldn't be fixed. He drove to the nearest gas station to buy a burner phone.

Being lunch time, the place was busy. He was fifth in line for the cashier by the time he found a phone. His eyes drifted to the TV that hung on the wall behind the register. Two news reporters, a man and a woman, sat behind a desk and speculated about Martin's death.

“There are still a lot of questions surrounding the death of bestselling author, Martin Watts. While police have confirmed that his wife Patricia's death was a homicide, they are still unable to confirm the manner of Martin Watts' death,” the woman said.

“That's right,” the man agreed. “Seems they are still trying to determine whether his death might have been a suicide rather than a homicide like his wife. It does raise questions, however, as to why the police haven't been able to determine this yet.”

The reporter continued to talk, but Eric tore his eyes away from the screen when he moved to the front of the line. Blondie had said they were treating Martin's death as a homicide. But, according to the news, he still had no clue.

He activated the phone as soon as he got back into his car. He punched in Dwayne's number. He slowly typed out a text using the old-school numbered keys. I have Daisy's phone and I can prove you killed her.

He sat in the gas station parking lot and waited for a response. The phone chirped less than a minute later.

Who is this?

He had sparked his attention. Good. He'd let him stew over that for a while before he messaged him again. That way, like a big, fat fish chomping on a well-baited hook, he wouldn't be able to resist when he demanded to meet with him in a few days. He pulled out of the gas station and stopped by his bank to withdraw a few thousand more in cash before he headed back to his practice. He had a homemade salad waiting for him.

“I still can't believe we let that lady-killer back out on the street,” Adams said.

“I think you mean woman-killer. A lady-killer is someone who seduces women, not kills them.” Stephenson refilled his coffee mug in the homicide unit's small break room on Friday morning.

“Whatever. You know what I meant.”

“Relax. We've got surveillance on him twenty-four-seven. He's not going to hurt anyone else and he's not getting away with anything. Hopefully, if all goes to plan, we'll be arresting him and the doctor soon. From the way Dr. Leroy reacted to Dwayne's release, I'm guessing he'll try to kill him before the week is over.”

“I hope you're right.”

Stephenson took a sip of the cheap, bitter brew as Detective Richards walked into the break room.

Adams stepped back from the old coffee maker and motioned toward it with his empty mug. “Ladies first.”

“Okay,” she said, looking unimpressed by the gesture.

She turned to Stephenson as she poured her coffee. She had just started to speak when Adams interrupted.

“You know, it can be hard starting out without knowing anyone in this place. It's not any easy job. So, if you ever want to pick my brain or need someone to talk to who's had a lot of experience with this job, I'm here.”

She turned back to Adams and tucked a strand of blonde hair behind her ear. She paused for a moment before she spoke, as if unsure how to respond. “Thanks,” she finally said.

She turned back to face Stephenson. “How long have you been in homicide?”

“Coming up on two years. Once you start getting cases, you learn the job pretty quick.”

“I heard you've already solved a pretty high-profile case.”

He assumed she was referring to the Seattle Slasher killings, the case he and Rodriguez had worked together. “I guess so. You get your first homicide yet?”

“No, we're still waiting. Thanks to you.” She smiled.

“Oh, right. Sorry for taking over your first case.”

“Since you did steal my first case out from under me, maybe you could make it up by giving me some advice on the job. One rookie to another.” She took a sip from her coffee and grimaced. “This is disgusting.”

“Yeah, but it keeps you awake. You'll get used to it after a while.”

“I don't know if I'll ever get used to that. I actually have a couple tickets to the Seahawks' playoff game this Saturday and haven't found anyone to go with me yet. My brother's a backup defensive lineman and my dad has season tickets. We normally go together, but he's out of town this weekend. Would you want to go? Maybe we can talk shop in between plays.”

Stephenson nearly choked on his coffee. “The playoff game? Are you kidding me? I'd love to go. If you're sure you wouldn't rather take someone else.” Stephenson was surprised she wasn't taking one of her friends, since the two of them barely knew each other. But there was no way he would turn down a seat at a home-field playoff game.

“I'm sure.” She gave him a slight smile. She started to leave the break room but turned around when she reached the doorway. “Want to meet here and drive together to the game? I'm sure parking will be a nightmare. I'll get your number later so we can plan what time to meet.”

Stephenson nodded. “Sounds great.”

Once they were alone, Stephenson turned to see Adams staring at him while he leaned against the linoleum counter.

“I hate you,” his partner said before stalking out of the room with his empty mug.

Stephenson lifted his coffee but stopped short of putting it to his mouth. For the first time in almost a week, he laughed.

• • • •

WHEN THEY GOT BACK to their desks, they went to work seeing what they could dig up on Dr. Leroy. Adams was going through his bank account and credit card statements but hadn't found anything of use so far. Because Dr. Leroy was only a suspect at this point, they'd only been able to get a warrant for his periodic statements, not live transactions. The latest account statements they'd received ended before Patricia and Martin were murdered. But you never knew, maybe they'd get lucky and find something useful. Otherwise, they'd have to wait for the next round of statements.

Stephenson tapped his pen against his desk as he once again read through Patricia's records that Dr. Leroy had turned over to them. From the way Martin's treatment of his wife was described, it did seem plausible for him to have killed her.

“What if Dr. Leroy falsified information in Patricia's chart before he gave it to us? I mean, how do we know any of it is true? I get that it's hard to know what goes on behind closed doors, but this description of their relationship doesn't match what their friends and family said. Maybe the doctor changed her records to make it look like Martin was controlling and emotionally abusive to try and substantiate their deaths as a murder-suicide.”

“I suppose it's possible. Those medical records were all electronic, right?”

“Yeah. I'll have to contact the software company Dr. Leroy uses and see if there's a way to tell if the records have been altered.”

Stephenson's phone vibrated against the top of his desk. He lifted it and saw it was Serena. It was the first time she'd called him since the day he'd planned to propose. He stared at the screen, debating whether to answer it before hitting Ignore and setting the phone back down on his desk.

“You need to take that?” Adams asked.

“No.”

Adams gave him a knowing look. “Okay.”

Despite having some weak moments, he'd refrained from calling her since that horrible day. Now, he was glad he hadn't. He had nothing to say to her and didn't want to hear whatever she wanted to say to him. She could never undo what she'd done.

“Excuse me, detectives.”

Sandra, the receptionist for the homicide unit, stood between their desks. Her short auburn hair flipped out on the sides and her bangs were overly-curved to the point of distraction. Stephenson saw she had the same hair in her ID badge photo that was taken over twenty years before.

“Yeah?” Stephenson asked.

“I have a woman on the line who wants to speak with one of you about her brother-in-law, Eric Leroy. She's in Australia but said she saw on the news that his front office assistant was murdered. She says it's important.”

“I'll take it,” Stephenson said.

“All right. I'll transfer her.”

"Thanks," he said before she walked away.

"That's interesting," Adams said. "Wonder what she's got to say."

"We'll find out."

A moment later, his phone rang. He picked up immediately.

"This is Detective Stephenson."

"Hello, my name is Maggie Flemming. I live in Australia, but I saw on the news that a woman was recently murdered who worked for my brother-in-law, Dr. Eric Leroy."

Stephenson recognized her accent immediately. It sounded like Dr. Leroy's, only more distinct.

"Yes, that's correct."

"I read you made an arrest initially but have since let the man go. I think my brother-in-law may have killed her. I wanted to make sure you're investigating him."

"And what makes you think he killed her?"

Adams' head perked up at Stephenson's question.

"Well, her body was never found and he was never arrested, but Eric Leroy killed my sister. I'm sure of it. My parents and I filed a missing person's report twenty years ago, but nothing's ever come of it. I know she's dead and he killed her. He must've disposed of her body, which is why he got away with it. He immigrated to Seattle shortly after."

This was huge...if what she was saying was true. It could mean that despite his clean record, Dr. Leroy had been a killer all along. Although, from the sounds of it, this would not be something easy to prove.

"He's crazy. Never even showed a trace of remorse."

Sounds familiar, he thought. He picked up his pen and pulled a notepad in front of him.

"What was your sister's name?"

"Stella. Stella Leroy. Her missing person's case is technically still open, even though we know they'll never find her."

The sadness in her voice was unmistakable as he jotted down her sister's name.

"Do you know the exact date the missing person's report was filed?"

"December 18, 1997," she said without hesitation.

"And in what city?"

"Nelson Bay, New South Wales."

"I'll look into it. Thank you. Is there anything else you'd like to tell me?"

"Eric's been walking free for over twenty years. He hasn't had to pay a single day for what he's done. Meanwhile, my sister is dead and, without a body, we've never even been able to give her a proper funeral. Nothing will ever bring my sister back, but promise me you'll put him away for good so he'll never be able to hurt anyone again."

"I promise I'll look into your sister's case. And, if Dr. Leroy is responsible for the death of his front office assistant or anyone else, we'll do our best to catch him."

"I hope you do."

"Can I get your contact information in case I need to speak with you again?"

"Sure."

He wrote down her phone number and email address before ending the call.

"Who does she think he killed?" Adams asked as soon as Stephenson got off the phone.

"Her sister."

Stephenson repeated their conversation.

"Wow."

“Yeah. But even if he did kill her, it sounds like it would be nearly impossible to prove. I’ll have to request the missing person’s report from Australia.”

“Let me know when it comes through.”

Stephenson got on his computer and checked what time it was in Nelson Bay. It was five thirty in the morning, but he decided to call anyway. Someone should be at the station.

“Nelson Bay police, how can I help you?”

The man sounded as if the call had woken him from a nap.

“Good morning. This is Detective Stephenson from Seattle Homicide. I’m after a copy of a missing person’s report that was filed at your station on December 18, 1997. Would you have that on file at your station?”

“Seattle, huh? I’ve been to Seattle once. Rained the entire week I was there. We should have the report still on file. It’d be a paper case file, so it might take me a little while to find it. What was the name of the missing person?”

“Stella Leroy.”

“Oh, yeah. I know that case. It’s a bit of a legend around here. Did you know she was a professional surfer?”

“No, I didn’t.”

“Born and raised here in Nelson Bay. She was becoming pretty famous before she disappeared. I wasn’t working here at the time, but it made the national news.

“There were a few theories surrounding her disappearance. One was that a shark took her while she surfed the huge waves during an evening storm. Her family all claimed her husband killed her, but her body was never found. The case is still unsolved. Can I ask why you’re interested in that case?”

“Eric Leroy, Stella’s husband, is a suspect in some recent murder cases of ours. Her sister called and told me about Stella.”

“Crikey. Well, if he did kill her, I hope you get him.”

“Me too.”

“I’ll need you to fax me an official request for that case file, and I’ll send it to you as soon as I find it.”

“Sure thing,” Stephenson said.

“You know, it was all over the news here when it happened. I’m pretty sure Stella’s family were interviewed on national TV about their theory that Stella’s husband killed her. You could probably find some of it online.”

“Thanks, I’ll have a look.”

“Good luck with the case.”

• • • •

STEPHENSON WAS STILL waiting to receive Stella’s case file over an hour later. He thought about what the Australian cop had said about her case being on the national news and ran an online search to see what he could find. A five-minute video clip of Stella’s family being interviewed on what looked like a major Australian news station appeared at the top of the results.

Stephenson clicked on the video. The clip was dated May 1998. A couple who looked to be in their fifties sat next to a young woman who Stephenson guessed was Maggie.

“Hey, come check this out,” he said to Adams.

Adams got up and came around their desks. He stood behind Stephenson as the video continued to play.

A female reporter sat across from them wearing a dark pantsuit.

“Stella's been missing for over five months now. What makes you sure her husband killed her?”

Stella's mother spoke first. “We'd been trying to convince her to leave him for years. He was incredibly controlling. We worried about how much worse he might treat her behind closed doors when we witnessed how verbally abusive he was when we were around.” She paused and dabbed her eyes with a tissue. “A week before she went missing, she had a black eye. That's when we realized things were even worse than we'd thought. She made an excuse that she'd ran into something, but we knew he'd beat her. We begged her to leave him. She said she was thinking about it, but he must've found out and killed her before she could get away.”

She began to sob, and Stella's father took the opportunity to speak.

“Stella was last seen at her work on Friday, December 16. The detectives confirmed with the hospital that Eric had mistakenly shown up for a shift that Friday and went home after realizing he wasn't rostered that night. We believe Stella had taken the opportunity to leave him while he was at work. When he came home early, he probably found her getting ready to leave him and killed her.”

“Detectives searched the home she shared with her husband, Eric. They didn't find any blood or evidence of a struggle in the home. They've also never found her body. If he killed her, what do you think he did with her body?” the reporter asked.

Stella's mother looked too emotional to speak.

“Eric has a fishing boat. We believe he took the boat out and dumped her body in the ocean,” the father said.

“And where are the police in the investigation? Do you think they'll ever arrest her husband for murder?”

“Without a body, they are treating her case as a missing person's. Unless they find her body or some other hard evidence that she was killed, it's doubtful they'll ever be able to arrest Eric, even though we know he killed her.”

“When we tried to contact Eric for an interview, we learned he's left the country and is now living in Seattle. We were surprised he would make such a big move only a few months after his wife's disappearance. Do you see that as further proof of his guilt?”

“Yes,” her mother said. “He never showed any emotion about her disappearance. Just said that she'd left him. He didn't even care. It was disturbing to see that he had no remorse whatsoever. He fled to Seattle to start a new life, while we have to live with the fact that we'll never see our daughter again.”

The clip ended, and Stephenson turned to Adams.

“Sounds like the same story her sister told me over the phone. After we get Stella's case file from Australia, let's go pay Dr. Leroy a visit.”

Friday afternoon, Eric had an hour free between clients and was using the time to write another chapter in his novel. He was tirelessly typing away on his keyboard when he heard a tap on his door.

“Come in,” he said, assuming it was his secretary.

The door opened, but he didn't bother looking up. She probably came in to tell him something dreadfully unimportant that could've waited until the end of the day.

“I figured it would be easier for you if we came here than to ask you to come down to the station.”

Hearing Blondie's voice, Eric tore his eyes away from the screen. In his office doorway, there stood Blondie and his less than brilliant partner. Nice of his secretary to give him a heads up. What now?

“If you keep coming here, detective, I might have to start charging you. Are there some things you'd like to get off your chest? Your childhood perhaps?”

He frowned as his partner closed the door behind them, and Eric was filled with gratification.

“I just had a very interesting chat with your sister-in-law.”

“You mean my ex-sister-in-law?” Eric said.

“No, I mean your sister-in-law. Your wife has never been declared dead and you haven't gotten a divorce, right? So, legally, Stella is still your wife.”

Eric closed his laptop. “Technically, yes. But she hasn't been my wife since she left me twenty years ago. And why would you be chatting with my sister-in-law?”

“She saw your name in the news connected with our recent murder victims and thought we should be aware of your history.”

“My history?”

“She claims her sister didn't just go missing. She says she was murdered.”

He paused, apparently expecting him to respond.

When he didn't, Blondie added, “By you.”

This news didn't exactly come as a shock. Although, Eric had conceded the reason her sister made those wild accusations all those years ago was due to grief. It had probably been easier for her to believe that he'd killed her sister than to bear the truth: Stella had left them all for a life she deemed better. But he had hoped by now Maggie would've come to her senses.

He himself had considered that something terrible could've happened to Stella. The media had several theories regarding her disappearance, one of them being that she'd been taken by a shark while surfing. It was possible, but not likely. No body parts or surf board had ever been found. And me, kill Stella? It was preposterous.

He sighed. “I hope this wasn't the only reason you came to see me. No wonder you two have so many homicides left unsolved if this is the best you can do with your time.”

Another frown. “So, you're not even going to deny it?”

“Look, I'm sure hearing her claim I'm a murderer was like music to your ears. I don't know why, but you both seem like you're dying to arrest me for murder. Probably just so you can close your case. If I had killed her, then where is her body? And why wasn't I arrested for her murder all those years ago? Hmm? Did my lovely sister-in-law have any explanation for that?”

“Solving a homicide without a body is extremely difficult, especially in the absence of other physical evidence,” Marky Mark said.

It was the first thing he'd said since they'd come into Eric's office. It was also the first thing he'd ever said to him that actually made sense.

"She figures you dumped her sister's body in the ocean from your fishing boat," Blondie said.

"Well, she obviously doesn't remember my boat very well. You'd have to be crazy to take that boat outside the calm waters of the bay. It was much too small to handle the open ocean."

Blondie smirked. "That's funny, because crazy was the exact word she used to describe you."

"I'm not the one telling twenty-year-old conspiracy theories to the police."

Blondie cupped his hand and ran his thumb and index along the corners of his mouth, as if feeling for crumbs left over from his lunch. "Sounded a lot more like the truth than a conspiracy theory to me. But what do I know?"

"Apparently not enough to solve your own homicide cases."

His eyes narrowed ever so slightly. "We're actually pretty close to making an arrest in three of our homicides."

Yeah right, he thought.

"Don't leave town, doctor. I suspect we'll be speaking to you again soon."

Marky Mark opened his door and Blondie followed him out.

"Looking forward to it," Eric said before the door shut behind them.

He opened his laptop but, despite his best efforts, couldn't get back into the head space he needed to write his novel. There was no way they were close to arresting him for those murders. They had to be bluffing. But what if they weren't? What if he had somehow made a mistake along the way? He was almost certain he hadn't, but was he certain enough to bet his freedom on it? His life? He'd have to kill Dwayne sooner than he had planned. And start preparing for his escape.

He glanced at the clock on the lower right corner of his screen. Time for his next appointment. Stupid cops. They cost him nearly an hour of creative productivity.

• • • •

"CANCEL MY LAST APPOINTMENT for me. I've got to take care of a few things this afternoon," he said to his secretary on his way out of the office.

"Your next appointment will be here any minute. I think it's a little too late to cancel."

Nobody asked you what you think, he thought. He ignored her retort and continued moving toward the office doors. Remembering this was probably the last time he would ever see her, he turned around.

"And I think you should've given me a heads up before letting those two cops waltz into my office unannounced."

"I'm sure they had good reason to see you. Plus, I thought they might've wanted to have the element of surprise."

He stared back at her while he turned the door handle. He wished he was staying in town long enough to be able to kill her next.

"I don't pay you to think. Just to do your damn job." He let the door slam behind him and walked to his car.

He stopped at the bank one last time on his way home to make another withdrawal. Once back at his apartment, he packed a carry-on bag with basic toiletries, a few changes of clothes, his laptop for writing his novel, and twenty-two thousand in cash. He separated the ten thousand that would go through airport security and the other twelve he would use to purchase his ticket and take through on his person.

He turned off his car stereo and drove to the airport in silence. He parked in the short-term parking and dropped off his bag at the baggage storage outside of security before getting back in his car to drive home. He kept the stereo off while he sat in traffic on I-5 and finalized his plan to ensure he killed Dwayne before the weekend was over—and not get caught.

• • • •

IF ERIC WAS UNDER SURVEILLANCE, and his recent encounter with those two schmuck detectives told him he was, then he couldn't take his own car to kill Dwayne tomorrow. Fortunately, sweet old Margaret across the hall owned a Buick she hardly ever used. He'd seen her come and go in the parking garage. She had her groceries delivered every week and was too old to be driving, but she seemed to still get out and about occasionally.

She would probably have let him borrow it if he asked, but he didn't want to involve her in any of this. Plus, he didn't want her to tell the cops he had borrowed her car, in case they came looking for him before he was safely out of the country.

Eric waited until midnight and listened outside her door a few minutes to make sure the TV was off and no other noise came from inside her apartment. He pulled his trusty lock-picking kit out of his pajama pant pocket and did a quick look around the hall to make sure he was alone.

He, of course, was the only person in the silent hallway. He smiled to himself. Now that he had killed the little drummer boy, there were no tenants left on the floor to be witnesses.

The door unlocked with a click after he worked his magic with the pick. He slowly stepped inside the dark apartment. From what he could tell, the floorplan was the same as his. He'd traded his slippers for socks before coming out of his apartment, and he padded silently through the entryway toward the kitchen. Not that he needed to worry old Margaret would hear him; she was practically deaf in her old age.

Once he had reached the vicinity of the kitchen, he used the light on his phone to look for her purse. He could make out the kitchen counters now, and noticed they were neat and sparse. The way kitchen counter tops should be. But her purse was not sitting atop them like he'd hoped.

Eric drummed his fingers on the tidy kitchen workspace. He was hoping to avoid having to go in her bedroom, but it was looking like he might have no choice. He'd probably give the sweet old lady a cardiac arrest if she awoke to find a man lurking around in her room. But perhaps it was in the living room.

He used his phone to scan the adjacent room. Empty sitting chair, empty coffee table. He moved his light toward the couch and was startled by both the body lying on it and the sound that came out of Margaret. Instinctively, he shut off the light and jumped behind the couch. It sounded somewhere between a hack and cough, followed by a deep clearing of the throat.

He crouched low to the ground, motionless while he listened. He couldn't kill Margaret. If she came toward him, he would overpower her as gently as possible and race out of her apartment. Except that he still needed her car keys.

Margaret went quiet before exhaling deeply. He waited as her heavy breathing changed to a loud, even snore. He stood slowly and turned his phone light back on. He could see the outline of the old woman lying on her back as he slipped past the couch. He moved down the hall into the bedroom and shined his light on the bedside table. There sat her small black leather purse.

Right. She sleeps in the living room but keeps her purse in her bedroom. Go figure. He'd just opened the bag and shined his light inside when Margaret made a horrendous choking sound from the other room. The dreadful noise continued for nearly a minute. He thought how ironic it would be if she died while he was stealing her car keys. But then she sharply cleared her throat and returned to her rhythmic snoring.

Old people, he thought. He went back to searching for her keys. He found them in a side pocket and crept back to his apartment before she made any more death-defying noises.

Eric got up early Saturday morning and started the day with an hour of yoga. He needed to be calm. He needed to be centered. He needed to kill Dwayne and then flee the country before his friends at Seattle Homicide realized he had gone.

Before going to bed the night before, he'd texted Dwayne using his burner phone. He told him to meet him at a cafe on Bainbridge Island that Eric sometimes frequented on the weekends. It was in walking distance from the ferry that came across the sound from downtown Seattle. But thanks to good old Margaret next door, he wouldn't be walking.

He told Dwayne to meet him at four o'clock. After a shower and two cups of coffee, he sat down at his desk to work on his novel. He was nearly halfway done. His progress was slower than he'd hoped, but once he killed Dwayne and fled the country, he would have all the time in the world to finish it.

With his laptop packed into his bag at the airport, he was forced to write on his old iPad that he hardly ever used. He felt himself relax after he typed his first three hundred words. The double-spaced page filled with his typed words was food for his soul. He needed to write like he needed to breathe. He'd once told himself he'd stop writing once he published his bestseller, but he knew now that he needed to write to survive.

Two thousand words later, it was nearly time to carry out his plan. He uploaded his new chapter onto the cloud. Satisfied that his work was saved, he turned off the iPad.

He donned his baseball cap before he pulled on his jacket and took one last look around his apartment. Although he'd always despised Seattle's long gray winters, he was struck by an overwhelming sense of nostalgia as he prepared to leave his current home for the last time. He felt the sides of his jacket to ensure he had his cellphone in one pocket and a necktie and burner phone in the other.

"Well, I guess this is good-bye," he said to his apartment.

He grabbed Margaret's keys off the kitchen counter and his iPad from his desk. He couldn't leave it behind in case the cops came to look through his stuff. He'd have to dispose of it on his way to kill Dwayne. He locked the door behind him and headed downstairs to the parking garage.

Sweet old Margaret had even parked her Buick out of view from the security cameras. Bless her heart. The Buick ran surprisingly well for how little she used it. He made it to the ferry dock without incident. He slowed the car and rolled down his window when he reached the ticket booth.

"Bainbridge or Bremerton?"

"Bainbridge."

"Just the car and driver?" the woman asked from inside the booth.

"Yes."

"That'll be $18.70."

He handed her a twenty through the window.

"You'll be on the three o'clock boat," she said as she handed him his change.

"Thank you."

He pulled into the row behind other idle cars and turned off the engine. His stomach growled, breaking the silence in the car. He must've forgotten to eat lunch. With twenty-five minutes to spare, he got out and walked down the street to Ivar's.

The wait was short, and he ordered a large clam chowder. The young girl behind the counter handed him a big paper bowl covered with a plastic lid.

“Spoons are to your right,” she said.

“Could I also get a bag for this?” he asked.

“A bag?” She furrowed her brow and gave him a look that said, What kind of weirdo carries his bowl of soup in a bag?

He didn't find his request that odd.

She handed him a white, medium-sized paper bag with an Ivar's logo on the side.

He watched her brow furrow again as he took off the lid to his soup, tucked the bag under his arm, and ate as he walked back to the ferry.

He got back to the Buick and set his half-eaten bowl of chowder on the armrest, something he would never do in his BMW. He didn't even drink water in it, let alone clam chowder. But he was sure good old Margaret wouldn't mind. The ten-year-old Buick had seen better days. Or had it? he wondered.

He reached into the glove compartment and pulled out his iPad. He dropped it inside the Ivar's bag and rolled down the top, closing it in. Holding the bag from the top, he walked over to the nearest rubbish bin and tossed it inside. The ferry had just arrived. Cars and walk-on passengers had started to disembark. He hurried back to the Buick as a group of seagulls squawked overhead.

After driving onto the ferry, he turned off the car engine but didn't go upstairs to the passenger deck. The car smelled strongly of clam chowder from his near-empty bowl he'd moved over onto the passenger seat. Bored, he streamed music from his phone while he went over his plan to kill Dwayne one more time.

“Zombie” by The Cranberries started to play when they had almost reached the island. He turned up the volume and lost himself in the music. Not in a way that distracted him from what he was about to do. Instead, he became more focused. The chorus came on, and he played air drums against the steering wheel until the end of the song.

The ferry docked right as the song ended. His blood was pumping when he started the Buick's engine. He was more than ready to get Daisy the justice she deserved.

• • • •

ERIC PARALLEL PARKED across the street from the cafe on Bainbridge Island where he'd told Dwayne to meet him. He was sure he hadn't been followed but was certain the police had round-the-clock surveillance on Dwayne. Eric looked around for an unmarked cop car along the street but didn't spot any. They were here, somewhere. And they would be watching.

He walked a block to the nearest crosswalk and waited for his turn to cross the street. A minute later, he moved through the parking lot of the business next door to the cafe and approached the cafe from the rear. He'd seen some of its workers taking a smoke break out back on one of his previous visits and knew there was a door marked Employees Only.

He covered his hand with the end of his jacket before twisting the handle. He slipped inside the door and found himself in the cafe's back kitchen. A red-haired guy making sandwiches looked up from what he was doing.

“Excuse me, sir. This is employees only,” he said sternly.

“Oh, I'm sorry.” Eric looked around the kitchen. “I was looking for the bathroom. I must've gotten turned around.”

“From outside?”

He looked back at the door he'd come through. "Yeah, I'm pretty sure they told me it was outside and through a side door. This was the only door I could find."

He looked unconvinced by Eric's story. Nevertheless, he set down the sandwich and pointed to a door on the other side of the kitchen. "Well, they told you wrong. Go out the door and make a left."

"Thanks."

The man shook his head and went back to making the sandwich.

With the sleeve of his jacket still covering his hand, Eric let himself out of the kitchen and stood in a small, empty hallway at the back of the cafe. He turned to the left and was glad to find the door to the men's room unlocked. He went inside and closed the door behind him. The loo consisted of a single toilet and sink with a door that could lock from the inside. The small, rectangular window above the toilet was exactly as he had remembered. Just big enough for him to escape through. He checked the latch to make sure it opened. It did.

He pulled out the burner phone and texted Dwayne. You're being watched. Meet me in the men's room. He left the door unlocked while he waited for Dwayne to join him. The door swung open less than a minute later.

He recognized Dwayne immediately from his picture in the news. He was bigger than Eric had anticipated, however. Dwayne was only an inch or two taller than Eric, but he had the build of an out-of-shape rugby player. This was not going to be his easiest kill.

"Lock the door behind you."

Dwayne did as he was told.

"You have the phone?"

"I need to hear you say it first."

"Say what?"

"That you killed her." You son of a bitch, Eric wanted to add. But he needed to maintain the upper hand if he was going to kill him. He couldn't afford for Dwayne to lose his temper.

Eric realized it was already too late.

Dwayne's face reddened as he took a step toward him. "You're the psychologist she worked for."

Eric refrained from correcting him and explaining how lowly a psychologist was compared to a psychiatrist. He took a step back.

"You're the reason she didn't come home that night, aren't you?"

He didn't answer.

"What makes you think you could sleep with my woman? You think because you're a doctor you can do whatever the hell you want?" Dwayne poked the middle of his chest with his pointer finger.

Eric yearned to laugh out loud at the idea of a psychologist being referred to as a doctor. Maybe we should award that title to chiropractors while we're at it. But, once again, he refrained.

"Maybe I should kill you. After you hand over that bitch's phone." Dwayne held out his palm for Eric to give him Daisy's cell.

He'd had about enough. Time for Dwayne boy to die. "I don't have it with me."

"What? You're lying!" He put a hand below each of Eric's shoulders and shoved him backward. He fell against the sink.

"If anything happens to me, I've made sure the phone will get to the police."

Dwayne's jaw clenched and both of his hands balled into fists at his side. His eyes looked intently into Eric's as he decided whether or not Eric was telling the truth. Dwayne's eyes narrowed. He'd apparently concluded Eric was lying.

Dwayne grinned through yellow teeth. Eric couldn't imagine what Daisy had seen in him.

“Yeah right. Empty your pockets.”

Eric regained his posture and smoothed the front of his jacket. “No.”

Dwayne’s grin disappeared. He rushed forward and pushed Eric’s arm against the sink while he used his other hand to try and open Eric’s jacket pocket. The only thing in that pocket was his necktie, and Eric couldn’t let him take it. Eric made a fist with his free hand and threw a punch into the side of Dwayne’s face.

Pain resonated through his knuckles. Dwayne opened his mouth wide and stretched out his jaw. His hand fell away from Eric’s pocket as he raised it to his cheek. He snarled and brought both of his hands to Eric’s neck. He clamped his grip tightly around Eric’s throat. Just like he'd done to Daisy.

Dwayne’s hands were crushing Eric’s trachea, and his entire throat felt as though it were about to shoot out through his mouth. But the thought of Daisy brought him back to focus. She deserved more than justice. She deserved revenge.

Using every ounce of strength he had, Eric brought his hands to Dwayne’s face and jarred his thumbs into each of his eye sockets. Dwayne let out a pathetic cry and flung his head back. His grip loosened around Eric’s neck and Eric threw another punch into his Adam’s apple. Dwayne gagged as his hands fell away.

This was his moment. Eric pulled the tie out of his pocket and wrapped each end around his hands. Dwayne had rebounded from the blow to his windpipe. He saw the tie just before Eric looped it around the back of his neck. He crossed it in front of his throat and pulled it taut. Dwayne reached up and grabbed the ends of the tie, but it was no use. Eric pulled tighter. They were face-to-face, but, unlike Patricia, this time it didn’t bother him.

Dwayne ripped off his hat and hurled his forehead into his. Stunned from the hit, Eric’s feet wavered. He fell back onto the bathroom floor, pulling Dwayne’s massive weight on top of him. The air escaped his lungs when Dwayne’s body landed on him. His grip on the tie had loosened during the fall.

Eric scrambled to retain his hold and managed to pull it tight again across Dwayne’s throat. Dwayne’s face was only an inch from his and he watched his veins protrude out of his skin from the pressure of the noose. Eric struggled to fill his lungs with air against the crushing force on his chest. For a second, he worried he might suffocate before Dwayne did. But he told himself that was ridiculous. He just needed to concentrate.

Dwayne pushed himself up from the floor and slammed his fist into Eric’s left temple. Eric lost his grip on the tie when Dwayne delivered another punch. His knuckles felt like a sledgehammer when they struck his cheekbone. Eric’s hands fell to the floor as he lay stunned from the blow.

He felt Dwayne’s enormous weight lift off him and knew he had to act fast if he was going to be the one who walked away from this fight. Dwayne got to his knees and raised his fist in the air. Using all his strength and then some, Eric drew back his knee and kicked Dwayne in the gut before his arm came forward for another hit.

He fell backward, and Eric grabbed the tie off the floor. Dwayne turned toward him on his hands and knees as Eric flung the tie around his throat and climbed onto his back. Dwayne brought a hand up to the tie as Eric crossed it behind his neck and pulled with all his might. Dwayne moved onto his knees. He swayed from side to side in a wild motion, trying to loosen the noose around his neck. Eric strained to pull the ends of the tie against his chest.

His arms trembled as Dwayne’s movements gradually slowed. The next minute felt more like sixty. Dwayne’s body went slack and Eric moved with him, landing atop his back as Dwayne hit the floor. Eric kept the noose tight for another minute longer before he rolled off him and let his arms collapse at his sides. He lay next to him on the bathroom floor, finally able to take in a deep breath.

A sharp knock sounded at the door and Eric lifted his head. It could be the cops who were watching Dwayne. Crikey. Maybe they were suspicious of what was taking him so long. Or maybe they heard something from outside. Were they loud? He had no idea.

He needed to get out of there. He pulled the tie from Dwayne's discolored, swollen neck and tucked it inside his jacket pocket. He rushed to the window and opened the latch when he remembered Dwayne had knocked off his hat. There was another loud knock at the door. He turned and swiped his hat off the ground.

Eric hoisted himself through the window but only managed to make it out halfway. His legs dangled inside the bathroom as he tried unsuccessfully to pull himself through the small opening. There were three sharp bangs on the bathroom door.

“Dwayne! It's Seattle Police. We know you're in there,” called a male voice. “You've got five seconds to open this door or we're coming in!”

His pulse quickened. He pressed his palms against the building's exterior but his lower half didn't budge. The bathroom door shook against its frame as a sharp thud resounded from the other side. The cops must've been trying to kick the door in.

Eric grunted as he sucked in his stomach and pushed against the outer wall one last time. Astoundingly, his lower body slid through the window frame and he fell to the ground. He'd no sooner landed on the pavement when he heard the door to the bathroom bust open. He crawled past the edge of the window before he got to his feet.

“Call an ambulance!” He heard the male voice yell from inside.

It's much too late for that, Eric thought with a smile before he broke into a run.

Richards told him during their walk to CenturyLink Field that they'd have pretty good seats. When Stephenson saw where they were sitting, he realized she'd lied. Their seats were incredible, only ten rows up from the fifty-yard line. You could hardly do any better.

They were nearly an hour early, but the stadium was already filling with fans sporting blue and green from head to toe. Many had their faces painted.

“Not bad, huh?” she said as they sat down.

Stephenson grinned. “Yeah, not bad. I think you might've downplayed how good these seats are. Just a little.”

“Well, I'm glad I could impress you. All the players get a few tickets for family and friends, but the seats are way up the top. My dad has had season tickets for years, so we have a close-up view when my brother plays.”

“I'm definitely impressed. You said your dad was out of town this weekend?”

She nodded. “Yeah, on business. He'll still be watching, but he was pretty bummed he couldn't be here.”

“I bet. I'm gonna grab a beer before the game, you want one?”

“Sure.” She rubbed her gloved hands together to warm them.

“I'll be right back.”

Twenty minutes later, he walked down the steps back to their seats with a beer in each hand and marveled at how he'd gotten so lucky.

Richards turned when he got to their row and reached out for her beer. “Thanks.” She took a sip from the nearly overflowing cup.

He'd been taken aback by how stunning she looked when they met at the station. Her makeup accentuated her high cheekbones and full lips. Her hair was always pulled back when he'd seen her at work, but today it framed her face and fell almost to her waist.

They chatted comfortably as the stadium continued to fill. The noise from the fans grew louder the closer it came for the game to start, and they eventually had to yell to hear one another.

They stood and cheered as the Seahawks ran onto the field. The energy from the crowd was electric.

“Which one's your brother?”

“The one in the pink shoes.” She pointed to him on the field. “Most of the players only wear them in October for breast cancer awareness month, but because we lost my mom to breast cancer, he wears them every game.”

“I'm so sorry,” he said.

“Thanks. She's been gone nearly five years now, but I still think about her every day.” She took a sip from her beer. “Anyway, it's his first year on the team, so he hasn't had a lot of playing time. Hopefully we'll get to see him out there today.”

The scores were tight from the beginning and the two teams were tied at halftime. Richards' brother came out and played for most of the third quarter, and they were both too intent on watching to engage in much small talk. At one point, he felt her hand brush against his. She smiled when he looked over at her.

The score was just as close in the second half as it had been in the first. At the end of the fourth quarter, they went into overtime. They watched, frozen in anticipation, as a coin was flipped to see which team got the ball first. The opposing team won the toss and the Seahawks kicked off again.

In the first play, the other team's quarterback threw a long pass to their receiver. Stephenson held his breath while he watched to see if the pass would be complete. The Seahawks' star defensive back read the pass the whole way and intercepted the ball deep in their own territory. He and Richards screamed with joy as they watched him run it all the way back for a touchdown. The roar of the Seattle crowd was deafening as Richards threw her arms around his neck and he returned her embrace. It was an exhilarating end to one of the most intense games he had ever watched. Their embrace lasted a little longer than it needed to, but neither one was ready to let go right away.

Celebratory fans began to leave their seats, and they followed the slow-moving crowd toward the exit. Their arms touched as they climbed the stairs amid the mass of people leaving the stadium. Stephenson couldn't deny he liked the feel of her close to him.

“My brother invited us to an after-party for family and friends here at the stadium. The players won't be there for a little bit, but we can head down there now. Would you mind if we stopped by before we go?”

“Are you kidding me? Of course I wouldn't mind. That'd be awesome. I'll try not to embarrass you by acting starstruck in front of some of the greatest NFL players in the world.”

She laughed. “You better not. Especially not in front of my brother. He already thinks he's hot stuff as it is.”

It took them awhile to move through the crowded stadium. Stephenson's phone rang as they reached the entrance to the party. It was Adams. He probably wanted to talk about the game and give him a hard time for going with Richards.

“Sorry,” Stephenson said. “It's Adams. I'll tell him I'll call him later.”

“No problem.” She stopped in front of the door and waited for him to take the call.

“Hey. I hate to rub it in, but we're about to go say hi to Richards' brother at the team's after-party, so I'll give you a call back in a bit.”

“We have a problem.” Adams' tone was serious. It sounded like he was driving. “Dwayne's dead.”

“What?”

The door in front of them opened, and Stephenson recognized the team's star tight end, who emerged into the hall. He said hello to Richards while Stephenson turned away to talk to Adams.

“How did that happen?”

“He was at a cafe on Bainbridge Island. He got up to use the bathroom and the two officers assigned on his surveillance got distracted by the end of the Seahawks game that was playing on TV at the cafe. He'd been gone for about ten minutes before one of them went to check on him and found him on the floor of the bathroom. Strangled. They did CPR but it was too late.

“The bathroom's window was open. They said it was big enough for someone Dr. Leroy's size to squeeze through. They never saw him, but one of the cooks said a man fitting his description came into the kitchen from the back alley saying he was looking for the bathroom right before the time Dwayne was killed. They're canvassing the area for him now.”

Stephenson rubbed his head. This was bad. He couldn't believe Dwayne was killed by Dr. Leroy while he'd been under police surveillance. McKinnon was going to be pissed. The sergeant did him a favor by allowing him to release Dwayne in the hope of being able to arrest Dr. Leroy. And he'd trusted him to carry out his plan. Dwayne shouldn't have been in any danger of the doctor getting to him without the surveillance team knowing.

“Did they show the cook a photo of Dr. Leroy?”

“They did, but he wasn't able to give a positive ID. Said he was wearing a hat and he didn't get a good enough look at his face.”

“Do they have any surveillance video?”

“None. It's a small, locally-owned cafe.”

“How could Leroy have possibly killed Dwayne and escaped unnoticed when he was under our surveillance?”

Richards walked over to where he stood and raised her eyebrows. He realized he was yelling.

“Those officers will have to answer for that,” said Adams.

And so will I, thought Stephenson.

“The cafe is within walking distance to the downtown Seattle ferry. It's just left for the city. It's possible Dr. Leroy is on it. I'm on my way to the ferry dock now. Can you meet me?” Adams asked.

The stadium was only a short walk from the ferry. “I'm on my way. I'll be there in fifteen minutes.”

“I've already requested to have a couple patrol officers to assist with the search. We'll start by searching the vehicles as they get off the ferry, and I'll have them hold the walk-on passengers for you to check when you get there.”

“Okay, see you there.”

“What was that about?” Richards asked as Stephenson zipped his phone back into his coat pocket.

“Dwayne's dead and it looks like Dr. Leroy killed him. I have to go.”

“I thought Dwayne was under twenty-four-hour surveillance so you could catch the doctor in the act? Before he killed him, I mean.”

“He was. I'll explain later. Sorry.”

“It's fine. Go.”

“Thanks for an amazing day. Tell your brother congratulations,” he said as he backed down the hall.

“I will.”

He saw her wave before he reached the exit at the end of the hall. He picked up his pace. What a horrible end to such a perfect afternoon.

When Eric got back to the street, he could see the Seattle ferry docked at the bottom of the hill. They'd almost finished loading cars for its journey back to the city, but if he hurried he could make it as a walk-on passenger. He walked as briskly as he could without drawing attention to himself. The wind came in strong off the water, blowing the rain into his face as he went. He put his hand on top of his head to keep his hat from flying away.

His blood was pumping when he reached the gangway. The last car had just been loaded onto the ferry as Eric jogged toward the boat. Thankfully, he didn't have to stop to buy a ticket. Walk-on passengers only had to pay when getting on in Seattle. Out of breath, he made it to the ferry right before a ferry worker closed the gate behind him.

"You just made it," he said.

Ignoring his comment, Eric let out a sigh of relief and casually strolled onto the upper deck. He went inside and glanced around at the tables near the windows, which were already mostly filled. Still flooded with adrenaline, he decided to go back outside despite the storm. The door flung back from the force of the wind when he opened it. He pulled his hood over his head as he felt the rain blow sideways against his face. The boat dipped down and then up again as he made his way to the edge of the stern.

A small group of preteens were leaning over the edge of the railing on the other side. They were trying to be bad-asses, but in reality just being idiots. A few of them were lifting their legs off the ground as they leaned forward onto the railing, seeing who could lean over the farthest without falling.

Eric turned away and grabbed hold of the railing. He looked at the rough water below. The whitecaps on the choppy water seemed to remind him of something in his distant past, the details of which he couldn't come to remember. The ferry picked up speed as more and more water separated them from the island.

A seagull struggled to hover above the boat, getting tossed about by gusts of wind. Eric turned around at the sound of kids screaming. He watched the middle-schoolers fall back onto the deck as ocean spray came over the side. It was apparently more than they could handle, and they took off as a group toward the doors that led inside.

Alone on the ferry deck, he took out his phone. After removing the SIM card from the back, he tossed them both into the Sound. He watched them disappear into the gray-blue water almost instantly.

He stayed outside despite the weather, admiring the evergreen-covered island as it faded from his view. All these years he'd hated the dreariness of Seattle. He hardly even allowed himself to enjoy its summers, knowing they would be over all too soon. He seemed to be appreciating its beauty for the first time, now that he might never see it again.

He leaned against the railing, filled with a sense of righteous indignation. Now that Dwayne was dead, he could start his new life over in peace. Even if he'd been wrong to kill Patricia, her husband, and his twit of a neighbor, surely he'd redeemed himself through the act of removing such a disgusting human being like Dwayne from this earth.

It had been a risk to kill him while he was under surveillance. It also delayed his escape out of the country. He could already be on a plane, browsing the in-flight movie selection on his way to a new life. But he knew it had been the right choice. It had been worth it to ensure that worthless scumbag never took another breath.

Maybe Daisy would have come with him if she'd been alive. What a life they could've had.

He looked out at the sea and thought about Blondie accusing him of killing his wife. It was absurd. Stella's family was obviously still as crazy as ever. And Stephenson had been dumb enough to believe them. He was the one they should feel sorry for. She was the one who left me.

He felt an uneasiness well up inside him and he tried to think of something else. The taste of salt in his mouth and the stormy sea below gave him a sudden sense of déjà vu.

• • • •

ERIC WAS A FOURTH-YEAR medical student and arrived at the teaching hospital for his night shift in the emergency room. It was the start of summer, and he'd watched a colony of flying foxes soar overhead during the drive. When he got there, however, he realized he had looked at the schedule wrong. He wasn't due back at the hospital until the following night.

Even though the hospital was an hour south of where they lived, he was happy to go home and spend the rest of the evening with Stella. Throughout the drive, he made plans in his head of how he and Stella might enjoy his unexpected night off. He pictured them cuddling on the couch while they watched a movie or sharing a bottle of wine on the back porch while they gazed at the stars and listened to the ocean waves crash on the beach. In both scenarios, of course, they ended up in bed, making love well into the night.

But he couldn't have been more wrong.

When he got to the small home he and Stella shared in Anna Bay, he unlocked the front door and called out to his wife. Seeing she wasn't in the kitchen, he called out to her again and continued to their master bedroom. He stopped in the doorway to their room.

"Stella?"

A suitcase lay open on the bed, piled high with clothes. Stella stared at him with her emerald eyes. Her mouth gaped open, obviously frazzled by his presence. More than frazzled. She looked terrified.

"What are you doing?" Eric asked.

She took a deep breath and slammed the suitcase closed. "I'm sorry, Eric. I didn't want it to be this way. It's not exactly what it looks like. I think we need some time apart. I'm going to stay with my parents."

"You're leaving me?"

"I just think we need to take a break."

He took a step toward her. Her eyes widened, and she moved back.

"Why? Did your parents talk you into this?"

"No, this has nothing to do with my parents. You know why. You're starting to scare me with your mood swings and your temper. After you hit me the other night, I don't think it's safe for me to be here anymore."

Now she had insulted him. "Hit you? That was an accident!"

He watched her demeanor change, and she no longer looked afraid. She was angry.

"It wasn't an accident and you know it!" she yelled. She moved forward, bringing her face within an inch of his. "And I'm not going to stick around and let that happen again."

There was a look in her eyes he had never seen before: hatred. She leaned over and zipped the suitcase shut. She started to pull it off the bed, and Eric realized he couldn't let her go. She would probably never come back. He loved her too much to lose her.

He didn't mean for it to end the way it did. She was just so...stubborn. He grabbed the suitcase and pulled it out of her hands.

"No. You're not leaving. I'm your husband. Your home is with me. You're not going anywhere."

He was trying to be understanding, but that's when she pushed him over the edge.

"Oh, yeah? What are you going to do? Hit me again?"

She had never used that tone of voice with him, and Eric knew there was no way he was going to win this argument with words. She grabbed his arm and tried to tear it away from the suitcase.

"You can't make me stay. I'm leaving and there's nothing you can do about it. Let me go or I'll call my parents to come get me!"

She pushed him away, and that's when he lost it. He grabbed her by the throat with both hands and shoved her against the wall. She kicked and thrashed her arms at him before trying to pry his hands away from her neck. This only made him squeeze harder. She slowly stopped fighting him, but, because of his rage, Eric held tight for another few minutes.

When he finally let go, she fell to the floor and Eric knew she was dead. He hadn't meant to kill her. She just wouldn't listen.

When his emotions calmed, it became clear he needed to get rid of her body. He paced their bedroom floor, trying to think of where he could leave her so no one would find her. Then he heard the sound of the waves pounding against the sand. What better than the ocean?

Lightning flashed outside their window. Eric remembered hearing on the radio that a severe thunderstorm was predicted for during the night. He couldn't risk leaving her body at their house any longer. If her parents had been expecting her, they might come looking for her when she didn't show. He would have to brave the storm.

He and Stella owned a small fishing boat they mainly used inside the bay. The water could be rough outside the headlands, and it made Stella nervous to venture into the open waters on anything but a flat calm day. He looked down at her body on the hardwood floor. Sorry, Stella. Tonight we are going to have to risk it.

He couldn't just throw her overboard. He needed to make sure she would never wash up on shore. He pulled out all the frozen meat from their freezer and went into the garage to grab some rope. He used a knife to cut a hole in the middle of every steak and chicken breast. He strung them all onto the rope and tied it three times around her waist. He made sure the knot would hold before carrying her body to the garage. Even now, he was amazed at his quick thinking.

Eric threw her into the boat before running back inside to find his four heaviest dumbbells. He brought them into the garage, grabbed another long piece of rope, and hopped into the boat alongside his wife. He cut the rope into four pieces and tied each dumbbell to one of her limbs. Fortunately, he had a tarp in the garage and used it to cover her body. He placed the dumbbells on top of its edges to hold it down.

After hitching the boat to the back of his car, he drove fifteen minutes to the boat launch at Little Beach. Eric was happy to see the parking lot was empty and he was the only one there. It was silly to think he wouldn't be. No one else was desperate enough to be launching their boat at ten o'clock at night in the middle of a storm.

It was raining by the time he pulled the boat away from the pier. The roaring thunder and lightning flashes became more frequent as he pushed the throttle forward and steered toward the headlands. The water was choppy inside the bay, and Eric knew it would be much worse once he got outside the port. The visibility was terrible, even with his outer lights on. Somehow, he managed to pass safely through the headlands into the open ocean.

The boat rocked up and down on their way to the outer waters as he rode over the waves coming in with the tide. He checked to make sure Stella was still in the boat. He couldn't see a thing through the blur of the rain as he powered farther out. There were islands staggered throughout these waters, and he could only hope he didn't run into any of their limestone shores.

The area also had an outer reef that was popular with scuba divers, so he kept cruising until the ocean depth reached 150 meters. Eric pulled back on the throttle and put the boat into neutral. A wave crashed into the boat as he turned to grab Stella. He fell forward, his foot slipping on the wet tarp under his feet. His armpits landed on the side of the boat, which dipped into the rough sea from the weight of his body. His arms and top of his head went into the water, and, for a moment, Eric thought he was a goner.

He reached back and clasped one of his hands around the side of the boat. As it tilted upward from the force of another wave, Eric threw himself backward on top of Stella's body. He lay on the tarp and caught his breath while the boat thrashed around in the wild sea.

One by one, he slid each dumbbell that was tied to Stella's arms and legs off the top of the tarp. He grabbed her arms and pulled them over the side of the boat first. The boat rocked so violently he had to be careful not to get too close to the edge or he would go with her. Eric sat down and grabbed her waist on either side. He pushed her top half overboard, but her legs were still in the vessel, weighted down by his heavy dumbbells.

Thankful Stella hadn't been very big, he lifted her calves up and over the side. The dumbbells clunked against the side of the boat as she sank beneath the surface. Eric felt a rise in emotion when she disappeared into the deep, but he forced himself to stay calm. Now he had to get home.

With the aid of his compass and an incredible amount of luck, he succeeded in getting back inside the headlands of Port Stephens safe and sound with minimal damage to his boat. Eric would've felt like a hero if he hadn't just disposed of his wife's body.

When he got home, there was no sign of his in-laws. Stella must have not told them she was leaving him tonight. Eric knew they were partly to blame for her trying to leave him. They'd been planting the seed inside her head for years.

He parked the boat in the garage and went inside to take a warm shower. When he crawled into their empty bed, he tried not to think about the fact she was gone.

• • • •

ERIC WENT BACK TO THE hospital the next night as usual. He didn't want to appear suspicious by calling in sick, plus it helped take his mind off things.

A couple of Stella's friends came by their house over the next few days wanting to know where she was. He told them she'd left him and had gone to stay with her parents. When Stella's parents and sister heard this, they were furious. They accused him of all kinds of horrible things and said they were filing a missing person's report with the local police. He told them to go right ahead, but they were wasting their time. If she wasn't staying with them like she'd said, she obviously didn't want to be found. But they were adamant he had done something to her and knew where she was.

As time went on, her family became convinced Eric had killed her, and they tried to sell the police on this as well. They even went on national television and shared their story. Through tear-soaked eyes, they pleaded with Eric to confess what he had done to their daughter. But he never did. And the police never had enough evidence to arrest him. What was it Marky Mark had said? It's extremely difficult to solve a homicide without a body.

Eric moved to the front of the ferry as they got closer to Seattle. It didn't take long to see he had a problem. He'd underestimated the local law enforcement. A squad car and an unmarked vehicle were parked on either side of the ramp at the ferry dock. Two uniformed officers stood between the vehicles, ready to inspect every car as it got off the boat. The unmarked car likely belonged to Beavis and Butthead, who were probably waiting for him inside the walk-on passenger terminal.

Eric hurried back inside and down the nearest stairwell before most of the passengers returned to their cars. Once on the lower car deck, he moved toward the back of the boat. Fortunately, the setting sun would work to his advantage. He braced himself for what he had to do as the foamy water came into view.

He stopped when he reached the chain that had been pulled across the rear of the last car. A ferry worker stood at one end of the chain, waiting to remove the blocks from tires of the cars last in line once they docked. Crikey. It wouldn't exactly help his escape to jump off right in front of this bloke. He eyed Eric curiously while Eric planned his next move.

"You all right, sir?"

"Fine, thanks," Eric replied as he turned toward the stairwell. It was full of passengers coming down to get back into their cars as he made his way up. Hopefully, that would mean there would be no witnesses on the rear upper deck. Keeping his head down, Eric bumped shoulders with more than one as he ascended the stairs two at a time.

Once upstairs, he dodged through more passengers heading back down to their vehicles. When he got close to the rear deck, he could see it was empty. Good. He was accosted by wind and rain when he opened the door and stepped outside. He grabbed hold of the railing and looked over the edge at the choppy waves that had grown darker with the setting sun. He realized the weather he was enduring on the upper deck was nothing compared to what he was about to do.

Eric took a quick look around to make sure no one was watching, glad he'd had the foresight to wear black. Seeing no one, he climbed over the railing, took a deep breath, and dove into the deep.

It took everything in him to not inhale from the shock of the cold the second he became submerged in the Sound. The rumbling of the ferry engine filled his senses and sent a vibration through his body. Eric forced himself to take a few strokes underwater before coming up for air. There was already good distance between him and the ferry.

He hyperventilated and forced himself to keep moving through the frigid water toward the shore. A wave came over his face and he inadvertently drank in salt water. He swam to the left as the ferry veered right. Eric focused on a pier down away from the ferry dock. At least he didn't have to worry about sharks in these waters like he would in Sydney, but he'd happily take his chances with them now to be free from this hypothermia.

Eric swam as fast as he could for the next few minutes but was dismayed to see the pier didn't look any closer. His body seemed to be slowing down. He may have underestimated the distance to the shore. Despite being out of breath, he concentrated on making one stroke after another, hoping his slow, continual progress would get him to the pier before his body shut down completely from the cold.

“He's not here,” Stephenson said after the last walk-on passenger had disembarked the ferry.

He had tried calling the doctor's cell on his way to the ferry, but, not surprisingly, the doctor's phone was off. He held his phone to his ear and peered over the railing at Adams who stood in the waiting bay below.

“I just checked the last car to leave the ferry. He wasn't in any of the vehicles. And none of the passengers recognized him from his driver's license photo.”

“Same here,” Stephenson said. “Let's see if any of the crew spotted him.” He flashed his badge to the ferry worker on the upper deck and stepped onto the boat. “I'm on the ferry. I want to do a search of the inside in case he's hiding somewhere on the ship.”

• • • •

THEY GOT OFF THE FERRY and walked through the terminal after their search of the boat yielded nothing. None of the crew had recognized the doctor from his photo either. However, one of the workers did report seeing a man dressed in black and a black baseball cap acting strangely near the back of the boat shortly before they docked. Although the worker was unable to ID him from the doctor's license photo, the vague description he gave to the detectives sounded like it could've been Dr. Leroy.

“You think it was him?” Adams asked.

“It'd be my best guess. Since we didn't see anyone who matched that description leave the ferry, he could've jumped off before the boat docked.”

“You want to notify the Coast Guard?”

Stephenson shook his head. “No. It's dark out and the ferry's been docked for an hour. If he's still in the water, he'd be unconscious from hypothermia and likely drowned by now. But he could've made it to shore, and our priority is the safety of the public.” Stephenson wished they could put out a bulletin with Dr. Leroy's photo to the local police. However, since no witnesses could ID Dr. Leroy from his driver's license photo, they had insufficient grounds to bring him in. “Let's send one of our sketch artists over to meet with the cook from the café. Maybe the artist can get more details out of him. Then, let's use the composite to put out a bulletin to Seattle PD.”

“You know,” Adams said as Stephenson pulled out his phone, “I hate to say I told you so but we should've never let Dwayne out of custody to use as bait for Dr. Leroy. It would've made a lot more sense if we could've justified putting the doctor under surveillance too.”

Stephenson shot a sideways glance at his partner. “That's exactly why we needed Dwayne. We needed his release to provoke the doctor, which it obviously did. Only we should have him in custody right now and Dwayne should be alive. If those two surveillance officers had paid a little more attention to Dwayne and a little less to the Seahawk game, none of this would've happened.”

“Maybe. I'm just glad it's your ass on the line and not mine. This is all you and Sergeant McKinnon. I never wanted to release that dirtbag.”

“Yeah, well you can let me worry about that. For now, let's find the doctor.”

Exhausted, Eric finally made it to the end of the pier. It had nearly grown dark in the time it took him to reach it, and he could only hope he'd managed to cross the distance unnoticed. He looked at the pillar that held up the end of pier. The pier stood about two meters above the water, and there was no way he'd be able to climb the barnacle and algae-covered post to the top.

He spotted a ladder about ten meters ahead. It hung down from the side of the pier and almost reached the water. It took every bit of willpower he had left to swim toward it. It felt like an eternity until he reached it. Triumphant, he encircled his hand around one of the rusted, metal bars and slowly pulled himself onto the pier.

Eric collapsed on the wooden structure and looked over at the ferry landing. His body shivered uncontrollably as he took in slow, shallow breaths. The two police vehicles were still there, stopping every car as it drove off the boat. Hopefully, that meant Eric had escaped the ferry unnoticed.

When his breathing returned to normal, he stood up. He trembled from the cold and walked down the empty pier toward the city. He needed to get out of here, away from downtown. He needed to get to the airport. But first, he needed some dry clothes.

Eric felt for the burner phone in his pocket and realized it probably no longer worked after his swim. Nevertheless, he held up the wet device and attempted to turn it on. Nothing.

As he neared the street, a man and woman holding hands under a shared umbrella stopped and stared at him. Eric's shoes squished with each step from the water inside. Sopping wet, he smiled at the gawking couple.

"Good evening," Eric said with a nod of his head.

The woman's mouth fell open and she continued to stare. Eric broke their gaze and turned left onto the sidewalk.

"Good evening," he heard the man say.

Eric shoved the useless phone back into his pocket and ducked inside the first gift shop he saw. An old man sat behind the register reading a novel.

"Hello," the man said, not bothering to look up from his book.

Eric headed straight for a rack of hooded sweatshirts with a picture of the space needle on the front. He grabbed a pair of matching sweatpants on his way to the dressing room. His lips were purple when he saw his reflection in the dressing room mirror. His left cheekbone had already started to bruise in the shape of Dwayne's fist.

He threw off his wet clothes and retrieved his burner phone and wallet from his jacket pocket. He felt warmer almost immediately after putting on the dry sweats. He stepped back into his wet shoes. Eric took the extra minute to fold his clothes into a neat pile in the corner of the dressing room.

The old man looked up from his book when Eric approached the register. He carefully bookmarked his page before setting the book aside. Eric rolled his eyes when he spotted the author's name on the cover. Martin Watts. Martin was so overrated, it was maddening.

"I'll take this sweatshirt and sweatpants," Eric said.

"Couldn't wait to wear them, huh?"

"It's a wet one out there today. My clothes got soaked by the rain." Eric pulled a saturated hundred-dollar bill out of his wallet and laid it on the counter.

The man gawked at the bill before looking up at Eric.

“You drop your wallet in the Sound?” He took in Eric’s appearance for the first time since he’d entered the store. “From the color of your lips, you look like you jumped in after it.”

“Like I said, it’s coming down hard out there. Keep the change,” Eric said before walking out of the store.

Eric stopped at the nearest bus stop only a block away. It was time to get off the street.

The bus arrived after only a few minutes. He rode it to Pioneer Square, where he got off and jumped on the light rail that would take him all the way to the airport. Eric took the last seat in the carriage, not bothering to get up for the old man with a cane who got on at the next stop.

Eric leaned his head against the window for the rest of the way. He continued to warm up from his swim and felt himself relax when they reached the airport. He was going to make it. A few more hours and he'd be on a plane out of the country, ready to start his new life.

He picked up his bag from the luggage storage kiosk, thankful for his preemptive planning of a change of clothes and cash. He found a bathroom outside security and changed into jeans and a t-shirt. He left twelve thousand in cash in his carry-on bag. Two thousand for the airline ticket and ten thousand to declare through customs. He hid the other ten thousand on his person. He carefully placed five thousand inside the bottom of each of his socks before getting in line for the ticket counter at Air Canada.

It felt strange to be fleeing the country he had once fled to. It was right after Stella's parents went on TV that he moved to America. Even though he was never arrested for Stella's murder, people in their small town started to look at him differently. Especially after her family went on TV.

His parents eventually sided with Stella's family. He was crushed to learn they too believed he had killed her. Even though he had. During his shifts at the hospital he would get the question, Hey, aren't you that bloke who was on TV for killing his wife?

He even felt like an unwelcome outsider at his local grocery store. It began to wear on him. He didn't want to live with a stigma like that for the rest of his life. The final blow had been when his parents told him they never wanted to see him again. It was then that he knew he needed a fresh start. Being born a dual-citizen made America an easy choice.

“Can I help you, sir?”

The voice of the ticket agent brought him out of his thoughts, and he realized he was standing at the front of the line for the ticket counter.

“Um, yes. I need to buy a ticket for the next flight available to Australia. Sydney, preferably, but I'll go to Melbourne or Brisbane if you can get me there today.”

“Okay, let me see what I have available for tonight.” Her long, acrylic nails tapped loudly on the keyboard. “I can get you on the red-eye flight to Sydney out of Vancouver. I've got seats on the seven o'clock flight to Vancouver, which will put you there in plenty of time. It'll be 2200 dollars.”

He let out a sigh of relief at his good luck.

“Great, I'll pay cash.”

He set the money on the counter and waited to see if she found this unusual. She took the money and counted it out without blinking an eye, and he realized he was being paranoid. After all, she didn't know he'd killed anyone.

“Could I have your passport and I'll check you in?”

“Sure.” He placed his passport on the counter.

A minute later, she handed it back to him along with his tickets. He flashed her a grateful smile.

“Thank you,” he said as he picked up his bag. She'd just made his day.

He got to the front of the line at security and realized there was a problem with his plan. He watched as most travelers were made to walk through the full-body scanner. He placed his shoes and bag on the conveyer belt of the x-ray machine, aware of the stacks of cash under his feet. Surely, they would see the cash if he went through the scanner.

He held his breath as the woman in front of him was told to go through the full-body scanner. The TSA agent held up his hand for Eric to wait. How could I have been so stupid?

The woman exited the scanner and the agent motioned for Eric to come forward. Eric took slow steps toward the scanner, fearing his escape was about to come to a bitter end.

“Sir, this way,” the agent barked.

Eric stopped and saw the man was pointing to the metal detector.

“Come on through,” he said impatiently.

Eric’s jaw fell open. He turned away from the scanner and went through the metal detector as instructed.

“Thank you. Have a good flight.”

Eric smiled at the agent before retrieving his bag from the x-ray machine. “I will.”

Although he made it through security without a problem, he felt slightly nervous as he walked to his gate. He couldn't shake the feeling his escape was too good to be true.

Adams hung up with the surveillance officer who'd found Dwayne's body that afternoon. "They've searched the area surrounding the café, but there's no sign of the doctor or anyone else fitting his description."

"Let's stop by the homicide unit and grab that photo montage we used for the break-in at Madison Park before we go to the crime scene. I want to give the cook another chance to ID him."

"They're in the process of checking the Bainbridge Island ferry holding cameras, but so far they haven't found any trace of the doctor's car being on the island today. The officers found text messages on Dwayne's cell from someone who claimed to have Daisy's phone with evidence that Dwayne killed her. The texts threatened to turn her phone into the police unless Dwayne met them today at that cafe on the island. The texts weren't from Dr. Leroy's number, but they're sending Dwayne's phone over to TESU to be analyzed."

"Dr. Leroy knew we didn't find Daisy's phone. We never released that to the media."

"They also found part of a broken-off zipper on the ground outside the window of the bathroom. We should have the fingerprint analysis back in a few hours."

They rode together to the doctor's apartment. The sky was dark and lights had come on around the city. The traffic moved slowly from the Seahawks game. They needed to get to Dwayne's crime scene, especially since they had a witness who could possibly ID the doctor. But Dwayne's body was already being transferred to the Seattle Medical Examiner's Office, and first they wanted to find Dr. Leroy.

His car was in the parking garage when they got to his building. Stephenson guessed he probably walked to the ferry to kill Dwayne.

There was no answer when they knocked on his apartment door. Stephenson tried the doorknob. It was locked.

"We need to get in there. We might find Daisy's phone. The doctor could even be hiding out in the apartment."

Adams pulled out his phone. "I'll see if I can get a warrant in case we find anything incriminating in there."

"See if you can get one for his car, too, while you're at it."

Adams nodded.

Stephenson had put the building manager's number in his phone when they came to Robert's crime scene. He dialed her number while Adams made the call to the judge. Fortunately, she was on site and brought up a key to the doctor's apartment before Adams got off the phone.

"Thank you," Stephenson said as she handed him the key. "We'll bring it back down to you when we're done."

"You're going to search his apartment then?"

"Yes."

She bit her lip. "Has he done something wrong? Did he kill Robert?"

"We're in the process of investigating that."

She lingered uncomfortably for a moment, as if wanting to ask more but not sure of what to say. "Okay. I'll be downstairs when you're done with the key."

She walked slowly back to the elevator as Adams ended the call and walked back toward him.

"We've got it. Let's go."

He looked back at the building manager as she stepped into the elevator.

“You already got the key?”

“Yeah. I didn't see the point in waiting till you got off the phone.”

Stephenson unlocked the door and announced themselves as they cautiously entered the apartment.

“Dr. Leroy? It's Detectives Stephenson and Adams from Seattle Homicide. You home?”

The apartment was silent.

The unit was meticulously neat, just as it had been when they came to inform the doctor of his front office assistant's death. Too neat, Stephenson thought. No one he knew kept their place that perfect. A sign of a sick mind, he thought.

“I'll check the bedroom.”

“All right. I'll start out here,” Adams said, pulling a pair of gloves out of his coat pocket.

“Dr. Leroy?” Stephenson called again when he reached the bedroom door.

He donned his own gloves before reaching through the doorway and flicking on the light. The bed was made and the nightstands on either side of the bed were bare apart from a lamp. The floors were spotless.

He opened the double doors to the doctor's closet. It was filled with perfectly organized clothes. He entered the en suite bathroom and noticed the shower was empty. No shampoo, no soap, nothing. This struck him as odd, even for a neat freak like Dr. Leroy. He went through the bathroom cabinets and found they too were nearly empty. There was no toothbrush, toothpaste, deodorant, razors, shampoo, or soap. Despite the closet being full of clothes, he feared the doctor had already skipped town.

While they could monitor his airline travel and entry into other countries, they couldn't stop him. Not without a warrant for his arrest. And they still didn't have enough evidence to get one.

“I found something,” he heard Adams call from the other room.

Stephenson stepped out into the living room and found Adams holding up a small black leather case.

“Found a lock picking kit in the top drawer of his desk. It was sitting next to a pair of black leather gloves.” He pointed down to the opened drawer. “I already took photos of them in the drawer.” He pulled two plastic evidence bags out of one of his pockets and bagged the items.

“Can you smell paint thinner on the gloves?” Stephenson asked.

Adams pulled them out of the bag and lifted them to his nose. “It's faint, but I think so.” He pushed them back into the evidence bag. “We still don't have results back on Robert's drumsticks, but I'll make some calls when we get back to homicide and see if they can speed it up. Hopefully we'll get results as soon as tomorrow.”

Stephenson told him about the lack of toiletries in the doctor's bathroom.

“You think he's going to try and disappear?”

“Maybe. But wherever he goes, we'll find him. Even if we can't stop him from leaving the state or the country until we have an arrest warrant, we can at least monitor his travel until we get one. When we get back to the homicide unit, I'll work on getting a warrant we can serve to the airlines.” Stephenson pulled his phone out his pocket. “In the meantime, I'll call my contact at the Port of Seattle and ask him to notify us if Dr. Leroy shows up on any flight manifests out of SeaTac.”

They searched the doctor's apartment for another hour before heading back to the homicide unit. Adams made the necessary phone calls to speed up the lab analysis of Dr. Leroy's gloves while Stephenson filled out the paperwork for their warrant to monitor the airline manifests.

With Adams still on the phone, Stephenson retrieved the photo montage for their witness at the café. Other than the gloves and lock picking kit, they didn't find anything else in Dr. Leroy's apartment to help with their investigation. Stephenson found a fireproof box under the doctor's bed with the key left in it, but the box was empty. He guessed it was where the doctor would've kept his passport, and he now worried he might be planning to leave the country, not just the state.

There was no computer or laptop and they didn't find Daisy's phone. Until they got the lab analysis back on the doctor's gloves and Robert's drumsticks, they needed more evidence to arrest him.

Stephenson logged into his email when he returned to his desk and saw he had a new message from his contact at the Port of Seattle. He swore under his breath when the doctor's name came up on his screen in an international passenger manifest.

"What is it?" Adams asked as he hung up his desk phone.

"Dr. Leroy is on a flight to Vancouver, B.C. It took off ten minutes ago. He's booked on a connecting flight from there to Sydney, Australia."

"Well, that makes things a bit more complicated."

Stephenson gritted his teeth as he stared at his screen. He was beyond frustrated they didn't have enough on the doctor to arrest him before he fled the country. Now, when they finally got what they needed to arrest him, they'd have to go through the process of extradition.

"Yeah, just a bit."

• • • •

IT WAS LATE WHEN STEPHENSON got home. He retrieved a beer from the fridge on his way to the couch, glad he'd remembered to put some in there that morning. After the day he'd had, he needed one.

He collapsed on the couch and dialed Richards. It was after ten, but he figured she'd still be awake. She answered on the second ring.

"Hi. You arrest Dwayne's killer already?"

He felt himself relax at the sound of her voice. "I wish. But no. I wanted to thank you for taking me to the game today. I had a great time."

"You're welcome. I had a good time too. Plus, it didn't hurt that we won."

"I'm sorry I had to leave so quick."

"That's okay. You only missed meeting my brother. Oh, and Russell Wilson. It was the first time I'd met him. He was super nice. Came over and talked with us for like ten minutes."

"That makes me feel a lot better about rushing out."

Hearing her laugh on the other end of the call, he smiled.

"Did you get back to your car okay?"

"Yeah, my brother gave me a ride back to the station. I'm leaving his place now. He had a small party at his house. Have you eaten anything tonight?"

It was the first time he'd thought about food since he'd left the stadium. Now that she mentioned it, he realized he was starving.

"No, we were too busy to think about food."

"I'm actually at Northgate, isn't that close to where you live? Want me to bring over some take out?"

"That sounds great, but you don't have to do that." He glanced at his work laptop sitting on his coffee table. "Plus, I've got some work to do tonight, so I probably wouldn't be that great of company.”

“I don't mind. Maybe I could help you.”

“I'd love that, but only if you're sure that's how you want to spend your Saturday night.”

“I'm sure.”

• • • •

TWENTY MINUTES LATER he heard a knock at his door. He got up and opened the door to let her in. She looked as beautiful as she had earlier that day, maybe even more so.

“Mexican okay?” She held up a large paper bag.

“Perfect. Come on in.”

She followed him into the living room and took a seat next to him on the couch. He was already halfway through his burrito by the time she took her first bite.

“Good thing I bought you two,” she said, watching him inhale the second half of his burrito.

“Thank you.” He wiped his hands on a paper napkin. “I didn't realize how hungry I was.”

“So where are you at on Dwayne's murder case?”

“A cook at the café saw a man matching Dr. Leroy's description in the kitchen right before Dwayne was found dead. Unfortunately, he was wearing a baseball hat, so the cook was unable to positively ID him in a photo montage.”

He sighed and pulled another burrito out of the bag, irritated that Dr. Leroy's average looks and baseball cap had kept him from being positively ID'd twice in their investigation.

“We found threatening text messages on Dwayne's cell from someone saying they had Daisy's phone and could prove Dwayne killed her. They told him to meet them at the cafe where he was killed. Problem is, the texts were sent from an untraceable burner phone. There was no other communication between him and Dr. Leroy.

“We visited the crime scene, but there wasn't much to see. We did, however, get a partial fingerprint match to Dr. Leroy from a piece of a zipper that was found outside the bathroom's window, which is how we think he fled the scene.”

“That's great! I mean, that's huge isn't it? Does that give you enough for his arrest?”

He shook his head as he swallowed the last bite of his second burrito. He crumpled its paper wrapper before tossing it back inside the empty take-out bag.

“No. Well, we might've been able to justify an arrest warrant with that, but we could've used more to strengthen our case.”

She leaned back against the couch while he went on.

“But Dr. Leroy is now on a flight to Australia. Since we didn't get the fingerprint analysis back until after he'd left the country, there was nothing we could do to stop him.”

Her eyes grew wide. “So, what? You'll have to extradite him?”

He nodded. “Yes, when we have enough evidence. The partial on the zipper might've been enough for a warrant while he was still in the country, but it may not be enough to make a case for extradition, which will be a drawn-out, complicated process. But I'm going to do whatever's necessary to bring him back and charge him with murder.”

“I'm sure you will.”

Their eyes met. He wanted to lean over and kiss her but wondered if maybe it was too soon. Instead, he cleared his throat and told her about the call he got from Dr. Leroy's sister-in-law.

“Wow. So, you think he killed his wife and has gotten away with it for twenty years?”

“Personally, yes. But I don't think we'll ever be able to prove it. Unless he confesses.”

“Well, he must think you have something on him if he's fleeing to Australia. Maybe it means he screwed up somehow.”

The same thought had already crossed his mind. “I hope so.”

He looked into her blue eyes and was suddenly overcome by how stunning she was. He wondered if he was boring her with all the details of his case, but she didn't seem bored. She looked intrigued.

“I hope I'm not ruining your Saturday night with all this shop talk,” he said.

She smiled, and he felt his heart rate quicken.

“Not at all. It's fascinating. Plus, I'm enjoying being with you.”

“Me too.”

“I actually had a bit of a crush on you when we were at the police academy.”

That would've been six years ago, but he didn't remember her being at the academy when he was there. He was sure he would've remembered her.

“You were in my class?”

“Well, no. I was in the class below yours, but I used to see you around at the training center. I never worked up the nerve to introduce myself.”

“I wish you would have.”

His urge to kiss her grew even stronger. He might've imagined it, but she seemed to be sitting closer to him on the couch than she had a minute ago. He leaned forward slowly, bringing his mouth to hers. Her lips moved against his as she returned his kiss.

Her fingers intertwined with his. They reclined on the couch and continued to talk between kisses. After walking her to her car an hour later, he didn't think about Dr. Leroy again for the rest of the night.

Eric boarded both flights without a problem. He had a window seat on the leg to Sydney, and he leaned forward to take in the view of his homeland as they descended.

Rugged sandstone cliffs dropped into the bright sapphire water along the outer shores of Sydney's coastline. The view of Sydney Harbour was breathtaking as they flew over the Opera House and Harbour Bridge. He suddenly realized how much he had missed this beautiful, diverse country.

After clearing customs without a hitch, Eric relaxed even more. He stepped outside into the warm, morning air. He drew in a deep breath as he squinted in the bright sunlight. Seeing the palm trees that lined the street immediately lifted his spirits.

He knew without a doubt he hadn't left Australia because he wanted to. He'd left because he felt like there was no other option. He pulled out the sunglasses he'd bought in the airport gift shop while killing time in Vancouver.

After nearly twenty years, it was good to be home.

On Monday morning, Stephenson sat next to Sergeant McKinnon and looked across at Lieutenant Greyson, who frowned from behind his large desk. The wall behind him was covered with plaques and certificates of what looked to be every achievement and award the lieutenant had ever been given. They confirmed to Stephenson that Greyson had always been more interested in ass-kissing and moving his way up the department's ladder than he had ever been in solving crimes.

Stephenson had felt like a kid getting called into the principal's office by the way the lieutenant had summoned them into his office. Greyson seemed to enjoy exercising his authority, which made their meeting all the more painful. Stephenson couldn't help but notice the lieutenant's hair was significantly thinner than the last time he saw him.

"So, let me get this straight. You released Dwayne Morrison, a known killer, for the purpose of using him as bait to catch a supposed serial killer who you couldn't justify putting under surveillance."

"Well, actually—"

McKinnon raised his left hand in front of Stephenson's chest, signaling he'd do the talking.

"Not as bait. We released him and placed him under twenty-four-hour police surveillance in the hope of using any communication or interaction he had with Dr. Leroy as something we could use to prove Dr. Leroy was responsible for a string of recent murders. If the doctor threatened Dwayne, or the officers felt Dwayne was in danger at any point, they were ordered to intervene and arrest the doctor."

"So, as I said, you released him and used him as bait. You not only risked his life but also posed a risk to the community by letting a killer back on the streets."

Stephenson heard McKinnon let out a sigh. As he looked back and forth between his two superiors, he thought they couldn't have been more different. Not only in appearance, but also in personality. Even sitting down, one could see that Greyson was small in stature. His pale complexion gave him a washed-out look, especially in the middle of winter. And he was all about upholding policies and procedures. A man who lived for the rule book.

McKinnon was a couple inches taller than himself. Stephenson guessed he was about six three. And, much to Greyson's disapproval, McKinnon felt that in extreme circumstances rules sometimes needed to be bent, if not broken, to get the job done.

"Being under round-the-clock surveillance, Dwayne should never have been in any danger nor been allowed to harm anyone else. Prior to his release, we also had received a confirmation of Dwayne's alibi for the time around Daisy's death. Without a more precise time of death for Daisy Colbert, we couldn't be certain Dwayne was her killer."

Stephenson knew McKinnon was stretching the truth a bit but hoped it would pacify the lieutenant. Since they only had an approximate time of death for Daisy, it was possible she was killed right after Dwayne got to his friends' house. But his alibi also left plenty of time for him to kill her within the window of her time of death, so it wouldn't have given them cause to release him.

The lieutenant stared back and forth between them as if deciding what to do next.

McKinnon took the opportunity to continue in their defense. "We aren't responsible for the actions, or lack thereof, of the two officers who were watching Dwayne at the time of his death. Plus, he wasn't in police custody when he was killed. We didn't owe him any protection. Their job was to see what we could learn from any interaction Dwayne had with the doctor."

This seemed to appease the lieutenant, at least for the moment. He turned his focus to Stephenson.

“And where are you in the investigation of Dwayne's death and your recent strangulation cases, including Martin and Patricia Watts?”

“Our prime suspect is Dr. Eric Leroy, but we're still working on compiling enough evidence for his arrest.”

He didn't add that they would be closing Daisy's case by attributing her death to Dwayne. Or that the doctor was now in Australia and they'd have to extradite him once they could make a strong enough case. McKinnon sat silently next to him, and Stephenson was thankful he didn't bring up either of those things either.

They found Daisy's fingerprints in the passenger side of the doctor's BMW when they processed his car over the weekend. It made Stephenson wonder what sort of relationship the two of them had, even though there was no record of any calls or texts made between them. If Dwayne had suspected there was something going on between them, his jealousy could've been part of his motive for killing her.

Greyson leaned over and pulled that morning's edition of The Seattle Times from his desk drawer. “I take it you've seen this?”

Stephenson tried not to cringe when he read the front-page headline. Adams had told him there was an article but not the extent of what it had said.

MURDER-SUICIDE OR KILLER WALKING FREE? COPS STILL HAVE NO ANSWERS IN DEATH OF MARTIN WATTS AND WIFE PATRICIA

“We're very close to getting an arrest warrant for Eric Leroy.”

Greyson tossed the paper onto his desk. “I want to see those cases solved. And soon.”

Like I don't? Stephenson thought. “Yes, sir,” he said.

McKinnon stood, taking the cue they'd been dismissed and Stephenson followed suit. Stephenson shut the door to Greyson's office behind him.

“Thanks for having my back in there,” he said.

“You're welcome. Just find a way to bring the doctor back and put him away for good.”

“I will.”

The sergeant gave him a firm pat on the back before heading to his office. Stephenson walked back to his desk and tried to believe his own words.

He checked his email when he sat down and saw he had a new message from Patricia's health insurance company. Before he'd left on Friday, he called the software company Dr. Leroy used for his medical records. They confirmed Patricia's medical documents had, in fact, been edited by Dr. Leroy a few days before she was killed. However, when they tried to look up the previous versions of her records in their system, they found they'd all been deleted by Dr. Leroy.

He'd contacted her insurance company before his meeting with the lieutenant to request a list of other doctors she'd seen in the past couple years. He hoped maybe one of them had been sent her records from Dr. Leroy and he could compare them to the file the doctor had given them.

He scanned through the list of specialist doctors and stopped when he read she'd seen another psychiatrist three months earlier. That'd be his best bet for receiving a copy of her records from Dr. Leroy's office. He saw their address was in Madison Park, not far from where Patricia had lived. He dialed the number and spoke briefly with the receptionist.

She looked up Patricia in their database and verified she'd been seen once by their office three months before. She said their psychiatrist had agreed to cover for Dr. Leroy by seeing his patients while he was on vacation. She confirmed they'd received Patricia's entire file from Dr. Leroy at the time of her visit. It was exactly what he'd hoped for. He stressed the importance of them receiving her file and promised to fax over a warrant within a couple of hours.

It was late afternoon when Patricia's medical records came over their fax machine. Her file was lengthy. Stephenson and Adams worked together for over an hour comparing the file to what Dr. Leroy had given them.

Stephenson set down his highlighter when he reached the last page. "He completely falsified all the verbally abusive and controlling behaviors of Patricia's husband."

"Yeah, looks like she complained about him a lot, but there's nothing in this file that would suggest he was any sort of danger to her. Dr. Leroy obviously wanted us to think Martin killed his wife. Falsifying her medical records should give us enough to start his extradition process. Plus, we have his prints on the zipper from Dwayne's crime scene."

Stephenson picked up his highlighter and tapped it against the desk. "It's a start, but the medical records aren't enough to prove he killed Martin and Patricia. I think we need to find more before we request his extradition. With double jeopardy, we only have one shot to get him convicted of Dwayne's murder. I want to bring him back on solid murder charges, not just this."

"Blake?"

He turned and was shocked to see Serena. Unlike the last time he'd seen her, her hair was dry and she wore a tight black skirt that stopped above her knees and a button up shirt.

"What are you doing here? Who brought you up?" he asked.

"Suarez. I told him it was really important that I speak to you. I got off work early, and I figured you'd still be here."

Her demeanor was serious, and Stephenson wondered what she'd possibly want to speak to him about. He couldn't imagine she'd come all the way here to say sorry for cheating on him. He had no desire to speak to her again; there was nothing to say.

Adams looked nearly as shocked to see her as Stephenson did. He glanced back and forth between the two of them, waiting for his partner's response.

"Okay. Go ahead." Stephenson leaned back in his chair. "But make it quick, because I need to get back to work."

She looked over at Adams before turning back to him. "Could we go somewhere private for a few minutes?"

Stephenson debated for a moment before answering. "Fine. We can talk in the break room." He reluctantly got out of his chair. "I won't be long," he said to Adams as he led the way to the small room down the hall from the large, open area where they worked.

He stepped aside and motioned for Serena to enter first. He followed behind, leaving the door open behind him. She turned to face him. He crossed his arms and waited for her to speak.

"So, how are you?" she asked.

The look of concern on her face was almost laughable. Seriously? he thought.

"I'm fine. I hope that's not what you came all the way down here to ask me."

She took a step toward him and looked up with her big brown eyes, now brimmed with tears. "I wanted to say that I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. I made a huge mistake."

A tear spilled onto her cheek, but Stephenson made no effort to comfort her. If she wanted sympathy, she'd come to the wrong person.

“I don't know what I was thinking. Things seemed to be getting so serious between us I guess I... got scared, you know?”

“No, I don't.”

She put her hand on his arm. “I want you to know I'm not seeing Shawn anymore.”

“I don't care.”

Another tear slid down her face. “I was wrong. It was stupid, and I hope someday you can forgive me. I love you, Blake.”

Before he could pull away she reached her hand behind his neck and put her mouth to his. The familiar feel of her lips against his left him frozen in shock.

“Guess who got their first homicide? Oh—sorry.”

He tore his mouth away from Serena's at the sound of Richards' startled voice in the doorway. Their eyes met for only a second before she turned away down the hall. He swore and pulled Serena's hand away from his neck.

“Tess, wait!”

He hurried after her down the hall.

“That wasn't what it looked like,” he said as he closed the distance between them.

He could see the hurt in her eyes when she whipped around to face him.

“It looked like you were making out with your ex-girlfriend. Or is she even your ex?”

“There's nothing going on between us. I—”

She put her hand in the air to silence him. “I have to go. We're about to leave for the crime scene. I was just coming to tell you I'd gotten my first case.”

She turned and marched back toward her desk. He started to follow her, then realized they were in a room filled with other detectives working their cases. Not exactly the time or place for him to try and explain what she just saw.

“You ready?” her partner asked, putting on his coat.

She glanced back in Stephenson's direction. “Yeah. Let's go.”

He watched them leave before he returned to his desk. Even though he'd only known Tess a short time, the thought of losing her made him feel sick. He was about to sit down when Serena appeared at the end of the hallway. It was obvious she'd been crying. Her eyes were red and her dark eye makeup was now smudged underneath them.

It was embarrassing for her to come to his workplace and act like this. He took a deep breath and tried to suppress his anger toward her before he went to where she stood.

“You need to leave, now,” he said in a lowered voice. “It's completely inappropriate for you to be coming here like this.”

She nodded and started to leave. Stephenson let out a sigh of relief when she didn't cause more of a scene. She turned when she was only a few feet away and he held his breath for what she might say in front of his coworkers.

“Call me if you ever want to talk. I miss you.”

“Goodbye, Serena.”

He went back to his desk without looking back. He ran his hand through his hair after sitting down.

“Sorry, man. Richards came over and asked where you were, and I told her you were in the break room and you'd be back in a minute. I thought she'd wait here for you to come back. When she headed back there, I wasn't sure how to explain you were talking privately with Serena.”

“It's okay. It's not your fault.”

“She didn't look too happy when she came back down the hall. Everything okay between you two?”

“No. She walked in on Serena trying to stick her tongue down my throat.”

“Yikes.”

“Yeah.”

“Well, I'm sure you can explain to her what really happened.”

“I don't know. I hope so. But I'm sure what she saw didn't look good.”

• • • •

STEPHENSON WAITED UNTIL the end of the day to try talking to Richards again. When he saw her pack up her laptop, he followed her out of the homicide unit and down the stairwell.

“Tess, wait!”

His footsteps echoed in the stairway as he hurried after her.

She was three flights down before she paused on the landing half a flight below him and looked up. Her expression was both weary and annoyed.

“There is nothing going on between me and Serena. I know what it looked like, but believe me —”

“Stop. I don't want to hear it.”

He stopped two stairs up from where she stood. “It's not what you think.”

“It's best if we just keep things professional between us, okay? Getting involved with someone at work was obviously a bad idea. I need to focus on the job for right now.”

He longed to move closer to her but could see she needed her space.

“There's nothing you can say to change my mind. It's better this way. I'll see you tomorrow,” she said before continuing down the stairs.

He slumped down onto the steps when he heard the door open and shut at the bottom of the stairwell.

ERIC TOOK THE TRAIN from the airport to Newcastle and caught a bus from there to Nelson Bay. He would've hired a car, but the rental companies required too much personal information. Like a driver's license. It was information he couldn't afford to give.

The fact that he'd made it all the way to Sydney was a great sign. The cops must've not had enough evidence to arrest him. If that remained the case, they wouldn't have enough evidence to extradite him.

They might've not even realized he had gone yet. Eric knew they'd eventually figure out he fled to Australia, but he clung to the hope they wouldn't be able to do anything about it. He didn't want to take any unnecessary chances.

He rented a one-bedroom unit downtown, close to the beach. He paid cash for one week. In the meantime, he'd look for something more permanent. The weather was glorious in Nelson Bay in February. He awoke early to the bright morning sun and the sound of kookaburras laughing in the trees outside his window. He spent the morning at the beach, where he sat on the white sand and basked in summer sun. When he felt overheated, he waded into the clear blue water and watched as juvenile whiting swam past his legs.

After stopping for gelato at the marina on his way back to the apartment, he worked on his novel for the rest of the afternoon. In the evening, before sunset, he headed back down to the marina and walked along the break wall. It was alive with people this time of year. The area was home to over twenty inland and coastal beaches, making it a popular holiday destination, especially in summer.

There was a mix of both locals and tourists, fisherman, couples holding hands, and a few young families. Pelicans hovered on the rocks near the fishermen, waiting for handouts. Dolphins often surfaced along the wall during their evening feed.

Eric climbed down the rocks and admired the small reef fish swimming in the shallow waters. His father used to take him fishing along this break wall as a kid. He remembered seeing the occasional penguin swim by in the winter and sea turtles in the summer. Growing up, this magical place had seemed ordinary to him. Well, maybe not ordinary. He knew it was a great place to live, but it had also seemed normal. It was the only home he had ever known. He promised himself he would never take this paradise for granted again. After dusk, he went back to his unit and wrote late into the night.

He wrote tirelessly during that first week back in Australia. Being home gave him a new energy and he felt free to unleash his unfiltered creative genius. He even wrote a scene where he recreated Stella's murder. He figured since she was already dead, some good might as well come out of it. By the time Eric moved into his new apartment where he intended to stay as a long-term tenant, his manuscript was complete. He had a bit of editing to do, but the end was in sight.

He'd found an ad for a furnished granny flat close to downtown that was for rent by owner. It was a one-bedroom, standalone unit situated at the rear of the larger home's property. He contacted the owners, a retired couple looking to bring in a little extra cash. They hit it off right away. When he offered to pay for three months up front, they were happy to let him move in the next day.

In another week he had completely edited his manuscript. He emailed it to a dozen top literary agents in New York. Now all he could do was wait.

Eric kept up his same routine, minus the writing. He didn't stop writing intentionally, he just didn't have any ideas yet for the next novel. He walked everywhere. He even found a scenic bushwalk that ran through the natural habitat behind his granny flat. He jogged it in the early morning on days he felt especially ambitious, before the summer heat became too intense.

This town brought back so many memories for him. As he strolled down the quaint downtown enjoying his gelato, he felt like he was reliving the past.

Eric walked past his parents' house not far from the town center. He had checked the phone listings to see if they still lived there. It was the house he had grown up in. His heart ached for the family he no longer knew as he stood in the street in front of the house. He could see that his mum still kept the yard in exceptional condition. She had always taken great pride in her garden. The hedges were trimmed to symmetrical perfection, the front lawn a lush green despite the hot weather, and there wasn't a single weed in sight.

He longed to knock on the front door and tell them he was home. He fantasized about them throwing their arms around him, their eyes glistening with tears of joy. In this fantasy, they would tell him how much they'd missed him and how happy they were that their only son was finally home.

Eric snapped back to reality, knowing that would never happen. They had made themselves clear: he was dead to them. Nearly twenty years later, the words still stung.

He pushed his sunglasses farther up the brim of his nose and blinked back his tears. He took one last look at the house before turning around and heading back to his granny flat.

• • • •

ERIC CHECKED HIS EMAIL fanatically over the next few days. Six of the literary agents had replied to him with rejection letters, one had requested his full manuscript for review, and five had yet to respond. He clung to the hope that the agent to whom he'd sent his book would fall in love with his writing and offer him representation. It nearly killed him having to wait for her decision.

He was at the local grocery store one morning picking out a perfectly ripe avocado for that night's dinner when he caught a woman, a little older than himself, staring at him from across the produce table. She was not just staring but gawking at him with a look of horror, as if he were a zombie looking for a fresh human to devour in the middle of a supermarket.

She continued staring, the whites of her eyes growing bigger by the second. It dawned on him that she didn't think he was a zombie. She thought he was the man who'd killed her sister.

She hadn't aged well. The smooth face he remembered was now marked with deep lines. She'd also gained a good sixty pounds since the last time Eric saw her. But there was no mistaking who she was. He was standing less than a meter away from Maggie, Stella's older sister.

When Maggie's shock faded, a look of anger washed over her face. She dropped the tomato she was holding and pointed her finger toward his face.

"You! You killed my sister!"

He pulled down the brim of his straw hat as he watched her become even more enraged.

"How dare you come back here!"

She was screaming now. People around them stared. A mother put her arm around her small child and pulled him away from the scene.

"I'm afraid you must have me confused with someone else," Eric said.

Her dark brown eyes seemed to pierce through him, as though she could read his thoughts.

"Don't lie to me. I know exactly who you are. You killed Stella! You killed her!"

She was shaking with anger. Her finger remained pointed at his face.

Eric set down his avocado and put both of his hands in the air.

“It's all right. I'll just go.”

He left his cart and backed away.

“It will never be all right. Stella's dead!”

Now she was sobbing.

Eric turned around to face a store clerk who stared at him with a gaping mouth.

“It's okay,” he said to the young man.

Eric felt surprisingly unaffected by the encounter with Stella's sister as he walked back to his place in the morning sun. It was crazy to think he wouldn't run into one of her family members sooner or later; Nelson Bay was just too small. But he hadn't considered what would happen if he did.

She couldn't prove anything, so he knew he didn't have to worry. He supposed it was possible, however, that she would let his friends at Seattle Homicide know where he was. But he doubted those detectives would be able to do anything about it. He figured if they had enough evidence to extradite him, they would have found him already.

Stephenson awoke to darkness at the sound of his alarm. He moaned, seeing the time on his phone. Four thirty. He shut off his alarm, rubbed his eyes, and got out of bed. He walked to the kitchen and was glad to see that his coffee maker had already brewed a full pot of coffee.

It had been more than two weeks since the doctor had escaped to Australia. They were tracking the IP address of the doctor's laptop and could see he was staying in Nelson Bay, New South Wales. A few days after Dwayne's murder, Dr. Leroy's ninety-year-old neighbor had reported her Buick stolen. They'd found the car parked across the street from the cafe where Dwayne was killed with the doctor's fingerprints all over the steering wheel and driver's side door. His prints were also on a plastic spoon from a half-eaten bowl of chowder left on the passenger seat. They'd started the process for his extradition from Australia but were waiting for all the paperwork to go through.

Right now, they were only able to charge him with falsifying Patricia's medical records and the murder of Dwayne Morrison. But, it was enough to bring him back into the country. Stephenson was trying to find a way to prove he killed Martin, Patricia, and Robert. It drove Stephenson mad to think the doctor was lying on a sunny beach when he should be serving time for his crimes, but that would change soon enough. Although, he was beginning to worry they might never have enough to charge him with the three other murders.

It had been weeks since he'd gone for a run before work. His ankle was still sore from the plane incident, but he needed to clear his head. After downing a cup of coffee, Stephenson got dressed and wrapped his ankle to avoid further injury. He stopped in his entry way to put on his running shoes when he realized they weren't there. He opened his small coat closet, but they weren't in there either.

He thought of the last time he'd worn them and remembered where they were. He swore as he went back to his bedroom to get his phone. He sat on the side of his bed and hesitated before sending the text. It would be easier to buy new shoes. Except, he loved those shoes. Screw Serena, he thought. He wasn't going to let her stand between him and his favorite shoes.

He sent the text and was surprised when she responded immediately despite the early hour. I'll be home tonight between 4:30 and 5. You can come over then.

He typed a quick reply. I'll probably still be working. Can I come over later?

Her response came as quick as the first. Sorry, I'll be showing homes for the rest of the night.

He rubbed the back of his head while he thought of what to do. He doubted she would be showing homes for the rest of the night and was probably just being difficult because of what happened between them at the station. It meant he would have to leave work to go to her house during rush hour before turning around to go back to station. Fine, he typed. He tossed his phone onto his bed before getting into the shower.

• • • •

NOTICING THE TIME, Stephenson stood from his desk and threw on his coat.

Having hours of work still to do on their case, Adams looked inquisitively at him from across their desks.

"I'll be back. I just have something personal to take care of."

Adams waited for more details before responding. "Okay."

"I'll be back in just over an hour."

Stephenson rang the doorbell at Serena's home in Shoreline. With traffic, it had taken him forty-five minutes to get to her house.

The door swung open. Serena was dressed to the hilt in a form-fitting black dress and platform heels. She greeted him with a straight face.

"Come in," she said.

Stephenson shook his head. "That's okay. I have to get back to work. Would you mind getting my shoes? I thought I left them by the door anyway." He looked around at the bare floor of her entry way.

"I think they got moved," she said. "Sorry, I haven't had time to look for them. I just got home. I have to leave soon, so why don't you just come in?"

"Fine."

She held the door as he came inside.

"Would you mind taking off your coat? It's soaked from the rain, and I don't want you to drip all over my floors."

He pursed his lips. "I'm not going to drip on your floors. And I'm not staying. I just need my shoes."

A buzzer sounded from her kitchen.

"I need to check on dinner. Why don't you take a look upstairs? I think that's where I saw them last." She turned before scurrying down the hall in her tight dress and four-inch heels.

"You never cook."

"And seriously, can you take off your coat before you go up there?" she called from the kitchen.

"Sure," he muttered. He shook it off and hung it on the bottom of the banister before going upstairs.

He entered her bedroom and found his shoes on top of her perfectly made bed.

"What the—" He swiped them off her comforter and turned for the door. "Whatever."

He heard his phone ring from inside his jacket pocket when he stepped into the hall.

"Hello?" he heard Serena say.

There's no way she would answer my phone. He hurried to the top of the stairwell. His jaw dropped at the sight of her standing over his coat, holding his phone to her ear.

"What the hell are you doing?"

He flew down the steps.

"Yes, he's right here. Just a moment."

Stephenson ripped the phone from Serena's hand.

"This is Detective Stephenson."

"Umm, hi. It's Tess. I just wanted to run something by you about a case I'm working on, but you're obviously busy. I'll ask Adams."

He glared at Serena who gave him a look of wide-eyed innocence.

"No, I'm not busy. Go ahead." The phone was silent. "Are you still there?" More silence.

Stephenson checked his screen. Call ended.

He brought the phone to his side. His eyes narrowed at his ex-girlfriend.

"What is wrong with you?"

"Nothing's wrong with me! And you don't have to yell."

"I'm not yelling."

She raised her eyebrows and gave him a look that said, Yes, you are. "I figured you wouldn't want to miss a call that could be important. Sorry for trying to help you."

He opened his mouth to respond when Shawn walked in through her front door. Shawn looked as shocked to see Stephenson as he did to see Shawn.

“So, that’s why you’re cooking,” he said to Serena.

“Blake, I know this looks bad. But you made it very clear that you didn’t want to get back together.”

“And you made it very clear that you’d stopped seeing Shawn.”

“I did.” She put her hand on his arm. “But after what you said at the homicide unit, I thought I’d give Shawn another chance.”

He pulled away and threw his coat over his arm. “You’re unbelievable.”

He moved to the doorway, coming face-to-face with Shawn. He looked dumbfounded by Stephenson’s presence. Stephenson got halfway out the door before he turned around. Serena remained still at the base of the stairs.

“I hope you ate before you came,” he said to Shawn.

“Why?”

“You’ll see.” He stepped outside into the heavy rain and walked to his car without looking back.

Adams was on the phone for nearly ten minutes after Stephenson got back to his desk. He looked across at his partner with excitement after he hung up.

“Who was that?” Stephenson asked.

“A literary agent in New York. Apparently, our friend Dr. Leroy has written a novel. He's titled it Inspired By Murder. He sent the manuscript to this agent, and when she Googled him, she saw his name had come up in connection with some recent murders in the news. She started reading his manuscript and says the murders in the novel are all strangulations and have striking similarities to the murders in the Seattle news articles. She's forwarding me the email from him with his full manuscript.”

“That's kind of bizarre. But I'll take whatever we can get. How come we haven't already seen that email?”

“We can't view his email activity live, and he only sent it a couple days ago. We'll be getting a report tomorrow for his email activity over the last forty-eight hours.”

“Forward it to me when you get it,” Stephenson said. Let's hope it's something we can use.”

• • • •

STEPHENSON STARTED reading from the beginning and Adams from the middle so they could get through the manuscript as quickly as possible. They remained at their desks as their cohorts from the morning shift all went home for the day and were replaced by the afternoon squad.

Stephenson looked across at his partner after he finished chapter eleven of the doctor's manuscript.

“I think he peed on the floor,” he said.

“What?” Adams' forehead creased between his eyebrows as he glanced up from his computer.

“At Martin and Patricia's. I think he peed on the floor. It's something he wrote in chapter eleven. CSI took a sample of Patricia's blood from the bathroom floor, right?”

“Yeah.”

Stephenson picked up his desk phone. “I'll call CSI and have them test it for Dr. Leroy's DNA. The bacteria in the urine has probably degraded the DNA by now, but if it's been refrigerated, we might still be able to get his DNA from it. It's worth a shot.”

A few minutes later, he hung up with the forensic technician who'd agreed to test Patricia's blood sample for the presence of the doctor's urine. Now all they could do was wait for the results.

He went back to reading the doctor's novel. He finished reading the first half at nearly the same time as Adams got to the end.

“That asshole put us in the book.”

“I know.” Adams grinned. “You think I look like Mark Wahlberg?”

“No.”

Stephenson watched his partner's grin fade. “Really? Because I could see how you'd be mistaken for Debbie Harry.”

Adams contained a laugh, seeing the unamused look on his partner's face.

“He was obviously recreating murder scenes from his own kills,” Stephenson said. “There were details about Martin, Patricia, and Robert's murders in the first half of the book that would've been impossible for the doctor to know unless he killed them. It explains a lot, especially how he killed Martin and Patricia.”

“Yeah, it's the same in the second half. He's clearly recounting Dwayne's death. The killer buys a burner phone on his lunch break from a gas station close to his work. I'll work on getting the security footage from the gas stations near Dr. Leroy's practice the week before Dwayne's death. There's also a chapter where a man strangles his wife and dumps her body in the ocean out of his small fishing boat. I wonder if that's what he did to Stella.”

Stephenson sat back in his chair, growing more impatient every hour the doctor was still at large.

Later that afternoon, Stephenson and Adams began the slow process of going through the surveillance footage from the four gas stations closest to Dr. Leroy's office.

“Have you patched things up with Richards yet?”

Stephenson shook his head. “I couldn't convince her there was nothing going on between me and Serena. I guess it seemed hard to believe after what she saw in the break room. Anyway, she's made it clear she doesn't want anything more than a professional relationship with me.”

“Well, give her some time. I'm sure she'll eventually see you were telling the truth.”

He went back to work on his laptop and Stephenson tried to do the same but found he couldn't concentrate. And not because of the whole Serena-Tess situation. Something had been bothering him, and, after reading the doctor's novel, it was nagging at him even more.

“Do you still have all the traffic cam footage from around Discovery Park the night of Daisy's murder?” he asked Adams sitting across from him at his desk.

“Yeah, why?”

“We need to look through it again. I think we may have missed something.”

Stephenson and Adams had been knocking on doors for over an hour at Dwayne and Daisy's Lynnwood apartment building. They'd split up to make the most of their time. They had waited until five thirty to go to the apartment complex, hoping that most of residents would be home from work. So far, none of the neighbors recognized Dr. Leroy from his driver's license photo. The temperature had dropped after the sun went down, and Stephenson was starting to think this was a waste of time as he knocked on a second-story apartment door.

A skinny, thirtysomething guy wearing a dress shirt and slacks opened the door.

"Good evening," Stephenson said. "I'm Detective Stephenson from the Seattle Homicide Unit. I'm investigating the death of Daisy Colbert. She was a resident of this apartment building. I'd like to ask you some questions about what you remember about the night of January 19, and if you saw anything suspicious."

Like most of the other residents he'd talked to, the man looked surprised by the news and slightly uncomfortable at being questioned by the police.

"Okay, sure," he said.

Stephenson held up the picture of Dr. Leroy on the well-lit porch. "Have you ever seen this man?"

His eyes narrowed as he studied the picture. "Yeah," he said. "He was here a few weeks ago."

Stephenson raised his eyebrows. "Are you sure?"

He nodded. "I remember because it was snowing when I saw him on my way to my mailbox."

"And what time was this?"

The man rubbed the back of his head with his hand. "A little after ten I think. I'd just gotten my mail and was walking back to my apartment when he pulled up in a BMW. I noticed it was a nice car. Then, he hurried toward one of the ground floor apartments and bumped into me hard enough that I dropped my mail. He didn't even have the decency to say sorry."

"Do you remember what color his BMW was?"

He thought for moment. "Like a blueish-gray."

"And did you see what apartment he went in to?"

"I'm not sure if he went inside, but I watched him bang on the door until a blonde woman opened it. Then I came back to my apartment. I don't remember the unit number, but I can show you which one it was if you want."

"Yes, that'd be great."

Stephenson waited for the man to get his coat before they descended the stairs and walked across the apartment complex. Stephenson spotted Adams walking along the sidewalk. He motioned for his partner to join them.

The man stopped in front of Daisy's apartment and pointed to her front door. "That's the one."

It was a few days after seeing Maggie at the grocery store when Eric got an email from the literary agent who'd requested his full manuscript. He hovered his cursor over her name in his inbox, holding his breath until he got up the nerve to open her email. Being that she'd had his manuscript for less than a week, her email could only mean one of two things: either she hated it and stopped reading right away, or she loved it so much she couldn't put it down.

Eric clicked on the email and braced himself for the news he was about to receive as her response filled the screen.

Dear Eric,

Thank you for sending me your full manuscript of Inspired By Murder. As a whole, I really enjoyed your story. I think with a few minor revisions I would be able to sell your novel to a major publishing house and would like to offer you representation as a literary agent. Please respond by signing the attached contract if you wish to accept this offer and we can get started on making the necessary revisions to get your novel ready to sell.

Sincerely,

Elizabeth Stone

Eric stood from his chair and raised his arms above his head as if he'd just crossed the finish line after a marathon. It was the news he'd been waiting for. He was over the moon.

He unplugged his laptop and rushed outside. He crossed the lawn and knocked on his elderly landlords' back door. They were kind enough to let him use their printer and scanner so he could get his signed contract back to the agent as soon as possible.

Even though it was now evening in New York, his agent replied immediately saying she received his contract. She added that she was confident she could sell his book to a major publishing house within the next couple of months.

Finally, the world would receive his gift. He'd always known his creative genius was likened to the great Stephen King, but it still felt surreal.

To celebrate, that night he treated himself to a three-course dinner at the most expensive waterfront restaurant in Nelson Bay. He couldn't remember food ever tasting so good. He sat outside at the busy restaurant overlooking the bay. The surface of the water was perfectly still. He finished off a bottle of wine as he watched a paddle boarder glide across the calm sea. A pod of dolphins surfaced near the shore as the sun began to set. It was a night completely opposite to the one all those years ago when he'd taken Stella's body out to its final resting place.

He enjoyed the view until it grew dark. When he got up to leave, a pretty, dark-haired woman sitting alone at a table caught his eye. He guessed she was in her early-thirties. Although she wasn't exactly his type, he felt an instant attraction to her. Their eyes met as he walked by her table and he stopped next to the empty chair across from her.

"Beautiful night, isn't it?"

"Yes, it is." She gave him a pleasant smile. "Are you here on holidays?"

"No, I've just moved back here. I grew up in Nelson Bay but spent the last twenty years in America."

Her blue eyes grew wide with fascination. "I've always wanted to do something like that."

“Do you live here?”

She nodded. “I’m from Sydney, but my family used to holiday here when I was a kid. I took a job here about five years ago. It’s a beautiful place, but it can be a little too quiet. Especially in winter.”

“Do you mind?” He pointed to the chair across from her.

“No, go ahead.”

He pulled the chair back away the table and took a seat. “You miss the city?”

She looked into his eyes before shaking her head. “No, but I think I’m just bored with my mundane life. I’m ready for an adventure.” She smiled. “Maybe I should go live in America for twenty years.”

“It’s exciting to move to a new country, but after a while, you start to miss home.”

She played with the stem of her empty wine glass. “How long have you been back?”

“A couple weeks.”

“And did you move with your family?”

“No, it’s just me.”

From the twinkle in her eyes, it seemed that was the answer she was hoping for.

“I’m Talia, by the way.”

“I’m Eric.”

“So, what do you do for work?”

“I’m a psychiatrist.”

She laughed. “Oh, so are you psychoanalyzing me right now?”

He grinned. “No, I’m actually trying to get up the nerve to ask you back to my place for another drink.”

She turned serious. “Oh. I probably shouldn’t. I’ve just had two weeks off, but I have to be at work early tomorrow.”

“I live only a few blocks from here. How about just one drink?”

“I live just a few blocks away too.” She bit her lip before giving him a half smile. “Okay, let’s go.”

He put his arm on the small of her back and led her out of the bar. They made small talk on the short walk back to his place. They strolled slowly along the water, enjoying the calm evening air.

He flicked on the lights when they got to his granny flat. As usual, his place was meticulously clean. She looked around the small space before setting her purse down on his kitchen table.

“This is nice,” she said.

“Thanks. Can I get you a glass of wine?”

“Sure.”

“White or red?”

“White, thank you. Mind if I use your bathroom?” she asked as he pulled a glass out of his kitchen cabinet.

“Not at all. It’s there on the left.” He pointed to the far corner of the room.

She went into the bathroom as he poured her a large glass. He set it down next to her purse. Her wallet protruded out the top of her bag, and, out of curiosity, he picked it up. When he pulled it out, he inadvertently removed a square, black leather object that fell to the floor with a thud. His jaw dropped when he bent down, seeing that it was a Nelson Bay Police ID badge. Was she an undercover cop sent to spy on him? No wonder she’d been so eager to come back with him to his place.

Hearing the toilet flush, he stuffed her wallet and badge back into her purse before he rushed to his bedroom closet. He hurriedly pulled the shoelace out of his running shoe and slid it into his shorts’ pocket. He returned to the main living area the same time Nancy Drew emerged from the loo. With his most charming smile, he handed her the large glass of wine. He'd be a gentleman and let her finish it before he choked the living daylights out of her.

ERIC WALKED BACK FROM the beach the next morning and stopped in at his landlords' place to borrow The Port Stephens Examiner, as was his routine every Wednesday. The husband invited Eric in for a cup of tea and he obliged. Now that his manuscript was finished, he had all the time in the world. He led Eric to a small sitting room at the front of the house while his wife went into the kitchen to put the kettle on. His landlord sat in a worn-out armchair and motioned for Eric to take a seat on a two-seater lounge.

They had started to chat about the weather when they heard a loud rap against the front door. The old man excused himself before he got up to answer it. When he did, Eric immediately recognized Blondie's horrible American accent. He cocked his head to see him for his own eyes.

He was almost as shocked as if Stella had been standing on the doorstep. The detective was the last person on earth Eric wanted to see. His blond hair looked almost white in the Australian sunlight. A grim-faced U.S. Marshall stood behind him.

Blondie looked pleased with himself at the sight of Eric. That was not a good sign. This can't be happening, Eric thought. Not when he had just landed an agent and was on the brink of a publishing contract. He wanted to kill him.

Stephenson flashed his badge to Eric's landlord and ordered for him to step aside. He sauntered into the sitting room, the U.S. Marshall following behind along with a meaty Australian officer. He looked down at Eric with a look of smug gratification.

"You've come quite a long way just to tell me you finally figured out who killed Daisy," Eric said. "Let me guess, he's already dead."

"I did figure out who killed Daisy. But I'm afraid he's not dead. In fact, I'm looking at him right now."

Eric scoffed at his accusation. "You've got your facts wrong, and I hope the Seattle PD didn't pay you to fly halfway around the world based on that misinformation."

"It's not misinformation, and I actually paid for my flight myself. I wanted to see the look on your face when I arrest you for murder. Plus, I've always wanted to come to Australia. So, it was a win-win."

"Arrest me for murder?" There was no way Blondie had enough on him to arrest him. "And where's your partner?"

"He didn't think you were worth the airfare." Blondie shrugged his shoulders. "Can't say I blame him. I enjoyed your book by the way."

"My book?"

"Yes, Inspired By Murder. Not bad for a work of fiction. Problem is, it's not really fiction is it? You killed Stella, Patricia, Martin, Robert, and Dwayne and made them fictional characters in your book. You carried out their murders in the exact same way on paper as you had in real life. You killed Daisy too, but I'm not sure why you chose to leave her out of your novel."

"You haven't read my book."

"Oh, but I have. Elizabeth Stone sent it to me." He took off his sunglasses and folded them into his shirt pocket. "I'm afraid she didn't get a chance to read your full manuscript. After she saw your connection to the recent murders in the news that shared a striking resemblance to the killings in your book, she got concerned and forwarded your manuscript to my partner. But, if it makes you feel better, we quite enjoyed it.

“Anyway, in addition to the evidence we'd already compiled, we used the details from your book to find your DNA at Martin and Patricia's crime scenes and security footage of you buying the burner phone you used to text Dwayne. We'd already found your fingerprints at his crime scene and your neighbor's stolen car parked across the street from the cafe with your prints inside. We also have footage of you driving to Discovery Park where you dumped Daisy's body. When we examined the trunk of your car more closely, we found fibers that matched the sweater Daisy wore when she died. We also found small amounts of acetone and mineral spirits on your gloves matching the paint thinner you used to wipe off Robert's drumsticks after you killed him. Altogether, it's practically a confession.”

His landlord's wife came into the sitting room holding two steaming mugs. She looked startled at the sight of the officers. Her wide eyes gawked between them and Eric. Stephenson ignored her presence and continued.

“We were tracking your IP address and confirmed your Australian address from the contact info you sent to Elizabeth. I also got a call from your sister-in-law saying she ran into you at her local grocery store.

Sorry that you actually don't have a literary agent. But, congratulations, you are under arrest for the murders of Martin and Patricia Watts, Daisy Colbert, Robert Benson, and Dwayne Morrison and are being extradited to the United States.”

When the wife bent over the side table to Eric's right to set down his tea, Eric took the opportunity for a way out. He stood and pulled her into a choke hold. She let out a weak cry. Stephenson drew his firearm and Eric made sure her body shielded his own from the officers. Her husband looked on in silent horror from the front doorway.

“Let her go!” Blondie ordered, his gun aimed at Eric's head.

Eric tucked his head behind hers and squeezed his arm tighter around her neck. He backed into the kitchen, dragging her resistant weight with him. The U.S. Marshall also drew his weapon and aimed it at Eric. Stephenson moved with them into the kitchen, followed by the U.S. Marshall.

Eric swiped a butcher knife from the knife block on the counter. The woman began to sob as he held it to her throat.

“Drop the knife, Eric! I don't want to kill you, but I will if I have to.” Blondie kept his gun fixed at Eric's head.

But he couldn't kill him. Not with the woman's head blocking Dr. Leroy's. There was no way he could get a clean shot. With the knife pressed to her throat, Eric retreated to the door behind him that led to the backyard.

“It's over—there's nowhere to go. Don't make me shoot you.”

The woman's sobs grew louder, and Eric could hardly hear himself think.

“Shut up!” he yelled into her ear.

Eric quickly considered his options. He didn't have many. He decided it wouldn't do him any good to kill her. Instead, he shoved her toward Blondie's aimed gun and ran out the door. He jumped over the back-porch steps, his feet landing hard on the lawn.

He looked beyond the yard to the undeveloped bush. That's where he would have to make his run for it. He sprinted across the lawn. He'd only made it halfway when he spotted the Australian officer out the corner of his eye. The officer came at him at full speed. Eric pushed to widen the distance between them.

He heard Blondie jump off the deck and make a what sounded like a rough landing onto the grass. He knew he wouldn't be far behind. Luckily, Eric was in good shape from all his recent exercise.

He reached the bush trail and forced himself to run faster. Eric knew he had the advantage now since the bush was familiar to him. He maneuvered easily through the dips and curves of the terrain. He could hear the heavy footsteps of the officers on his tail but managed to keep the distance between them until the trail came to an end.

Eric ran to the open field and couldn't believe his good luck. The scenic flight helicopter that was usually parked in the field during his morning runs was in mid-takeoff, only a foot off the ground. He dashed toward it at lightning speed.

Eric ran against the wind force created by its rotor blades. Knife in hand, he grasped the door handle before it lifted out of his reach and leapt onto the landing skid. He slid the door open before he threw himself into the empty seat next to the pilot. The pilot looked so startled when he turned to him, Eric was afraid he might lose control of the chopper. In his desperation for a safe escape, Eric thrust the knife against his throat like he'd done to his landlord.

The rhythmic pulsation from the spinning blades overhead muted the screams from the couple in the backseat.

Eric brought his face closer to the pilot's. "Go!" he yelled.

The pilot broke Eric's stare to look out the windshield as he lifted the lever in his left hand. Keeping the knife against his throat, Eric let out a sigh and leaned back in his seat as the pilot did what he was told.

Eric felt two hands clamp around his left ankle that dangled out the side of the helicopter. He grabbed the inside of the open doorframe to stable himself and carefully leaned his head over the side. They were nearly ten feet off the ground. Blondie hung in the air, all his weight suspended from Eric's lower leg. What a showoff.

Eric pressed his hand against the wall of the helicopter and fought to stay inside the aircraft while he shook his foot as violently as he could against Blondie's weight. One of the detective's hands fell away from Eric's leg. Blondie grabbed onto the landing skid before reaching back for his leg. Eric looked frantically for his seatbelt but couldn't risk taking the knife away from the pilot's throat or his hand away from the doorframe to buckle it.

The Australian officer stood in the field looking up at them. Blondie hollered something to him that Eric couldn't make out through the noise from the rotor blades.

His foot was numb from Blondie's tight grip around his ankle. Eric watched Stephenson shake his legs above the officer's head.

"We need more weight!" he heard Blondie yell.

Eric watched in horror as the hefty officer jumped and grabbed onto one of Stephenson's legs with both arms. Eric pulled his head inside the helicopter as it dipped to the side.

Eric spotted the pilot's elbow a second before it slammed into his temple. He lost his grip on the doorframe and fell toward the open door. He was searching for something to grab hold of when the pilot shoved his torso. Eric toppled out of the aircraft. His hand skimmed Blondie's pant leg on the way to the ground.

He landed flat on his back against the grass, air leaving his lungs upon impact. He had a déjà vu of landing at the bottom of Patricia's staircase next to Martin's still-warm corpse. Only instead of a chandelier crashing down on him, he was almost crushed by Blondie and his Australian sidekick. Fortunately, both landed a few feet away.

Despite the pain from the fall, Eric got to his feet as fast as he could. He dashed toward the motorway across from the field. He'd only made it a few steps when he was tackled from the side. They went down hard before skidding to a stop on the lawn.

Eric felt a knee dig into his back as he tried to get up. The officer wrenched Eric's hands behind him and placed them in handcuffs. Eric recognized Blondie's legs come to a stop in front of him on the lawn. Eric could see his smug look of satisfaction had returned when the Australian officer pulled him to his feet.

They were eye to eye and, for a moment, neither of them spoke.

"Let's go," Blondie finally said, grabbing him by the arm.

Eric felt like crying as he read him his Miranda rights. No literary agent? How could that be? It wasn't fair. He was destined to be a bestselling author. As Blondie led him through the bush trail, Eric decided he wasn't going to spend the rest of his life in an American prison. They might even give him the death penalty. Australia had done away with capital punishment a long time ago. Plus, this was his home. He'd wasted twenty years living in America, and there was no way he was going to let Blondie take him back now.

"I have to confess something," Eric said.

Stephenson stopped in the middle of the trail. "What?"

"I killed someone."

"You killed several someones. We can stop at the Nelson Bay Police Department if you want to tell me what happened."

"No. I killed a cop. Last night."

Stephenson moved in front of Eric and looked him in the eyes.

“What did you say?”

On their way to arrest Eric, the Nelson Bay detective had told Stephenson that one of his colleagues hadn't shown up for work that morning and they hadn't been able to get ahold of her.

“Her name was Talia,” Eric said without emotion.

The detective who'd come to help them arrest Eric grabbed Eric's shoulder from behind and swung him around.

“You're lying!”

Stephenson watched the detective's face turn red with anger.

“I buried her in the bush right over there.” He pointed to a clearing about ten feet from the trail.

The detective ran toward the clearing and used his hands to dig through the recently disturbed native grass. Stephenson left Eric with the U.S. Marshall and ran after the Australian detective. The U.S. Marshall grabbed Eric by the arm and pulled him toward the clearing.

“Stop! We need to wait for the forensic team. You might disturb the evidence if she's actually buried here,” Stephenson said.

“She might still be alive!” he yelled and continued to dig through the sandy ground with his hands.

Stephenson put his hand on the front of the large detective's shoulder. “She won't be alive if what Eric said is true. Don't risk contaminating her crime scene if he's telling the truth.”

“A little to the left,” Eric said when he and U.S. Marshall approached the site.

The detective shook Stephenson's hand away and, per Eric's instructions, clawed into the soil to the left of where he'd been digging. Stephenson felt a knot form in his stomach as he watched him dig an even deeper hole with his bare hands. An image of his late partner's dead body ran through his head. No matter how much he tried, it was something he could never erase. Even though Rodriguez had been gone over a year, the memory of finding her the morning after she'd been killed was fresh in his mind.

“Talia!”

The detective's shout brought Stephenson out of his thoughts. A pale, cyanotic hand lay exposed in the dirt at the bottom of the two-foot hole.

“I'll call it in,” the U.S. Marshall said, pulling out his phone as the detective worked frantically to unearth her body.

“I know this is hard, but I think we should wait for forensics,” Stephenson said, knowing she was beyond saving.

Ignoring Stephenson, the detective removed enough dirt to expose her face. Recognizing her dead face, he sank back on his heels and brought the back of his hand to his mouth.

“It's her,” he choked.

Stephenson looked down solemnly at the woman's face, enraged by her death and the memory of Rodriguez.

“You son of a bitch!” he heard the detective yell.

Stephenson turned to Eric, who wore a slight smirk as he overlooked the scene. The detective jumped to his feet and charged him. The U.S. Marshall quickly stepped in between them. Stephenson rushed toward the detective and gave him a shove in the opposite direction of Eric and the U.S.

Marshall who blocked him. Although Dr. Leroy would've deserved it, Stephenson and the U.S. Marshall struggled to block the infuriated detective from delivering any blows.

"I'm afraid this is going to halt his extradition to America," the U.S. Marshall said to Stephenson once the Australian detective had calmed down. "The Australian government won't release him until after he goes to trial. If he's convicted, we won't be able to extradite until he's completed his sentence here in Australia."

"New South Wales has a mandatory life sentence without parole for killing a cop," the Australian detective added.

"But no death penalty." Eric flashed a disgusting smile at Stephenson.

Stephenson knew he wouldn't have faced it anyway. The Australian government had requested the death penalty not be used in Eric's sentencing upon extradition, and Washington State had agreed to those terms. But he was too repulsed to offer any rebuttal to the sadistic doctor.

The four of them remained in the clearing by Talia's dead body and waited in silence for the forensic team to arrive.

An hour later, Stephenson and the U.S. Marshall led Eric to the front of the house where their borrowed squad car waited to take Eric to the Nelson Bay Police Station. The Australian detective had stayed behind to continue processing the scene with the forensic team. A handful of journalists stood by their vehicle when they approached. Their cameras flashed as they captured Eric being led to the car in handcuffs. When they got closer, the reporters all shouted questions at once.

“Is it true you killed your wife in Nelson Bay twenty years ago?”

“How many people have you murdered?”

“What do you want to say to Stella Flemming's family?”

“Does your family know you're here?”

“That's enough,” Blondie said. “Give us some space.”

He pushed him into the car and buckled his seatbelt. The press continued to spout questions and take pictures from outside. Eric sank back into his seat. He couldn't believe he'd been duped by some idiot cop into thinking that he had gotten an agent. It was an even bigger blow than getting arrested.

Eric took one last look at his hometown through the backseat window as they drove through Nelson Bay's town center. They passed a bookstore that displayed a bestselling hardcover in its front window and his heart ached. That should've been his book.

Then it dawned on him. He was an international fugitive. A media sensation. He felt a smile surface when the car pulled out onto the gumtree-lined motor way, knowing the headlines of his arrest would ensure his book a number one spot on the New York Times bestseller list.

ERIC REMAINED LOST in thought for the rest of the short drive. Later that afternoon, he sat alone in an interview room at the Nelson Bay Police Department. He couldn't believe they were arresting him for Daisy's murder on top of all the others. He knew Blondie and Marky Mark weren't exactly Seattle homicide's best and brightest. At least not Marky Mark. But even a child could've figured out that Dwayne killed Daisy. Eric shuddered at the thought of beautiful Daisy ever being with such a lowlife.

Maybe he should've handed her phone over to them instead of destroying it. He didn't think he was in jeopardy of being arrested for a murder he had nothing to do with. He'd do the time for the murders he was guilty of, but he refused to go down for something he didn't do.

If only he had gone to her address that night after she left his practice for the last time. Maybe he could've rescued her from that pathetic loser. He suddenly had a strange recollection that he'd tried. On his way home from killing Patricia. She was alone, Dwayne wasn't even there. But she refused to come with him. She actually chose Dwayne over him.

She told him she'd only stayed the night at his apartment because she didn't want to go home to Dwayne. It had nothing to do with Eric. She told him she was leaving Dwayne, but that didn't mean she'd be desperate enough to jump into another relationship with someone his age. His age. That's when he lost it.

An image of his secretary's final moments came to his mind. She'd looked so peaceful when he finally pulled his hands away from her delicate neck. So peaceful, it had almost made him feel as though she were still alive.

Stephenson pulled a beer out of the fridge, wishing he had someone to celebrate with. It was Friday night, and he'd only been back from Australia for twenty-four hours. Adams was out of town for the weekend. He had tried explaining to Tess again before he left for Australia that there was nothing going on between him and Serena, but she was adamant she wanted to be nothing more than coworkers.

Dr. Leroy had given his full confession to the Nelson Bay Police for the murder of Talia Palamo. The doctor was being held at Cessnock Correctional Centre, a large maximum-security prison an hour inland of Nelson Bay, while he waited to go to trial for her murder. He would probably never be tried for the murders of Stella, Martin, Patricia, Robert, Daisy, and Dwayne, but at least their families would have the reassurance he was no longer living as a free man. Although, Stephenson felt he'd let them down by not bringing the doctor back to be convicted for the killings of their loved ones.

The only good thing about the trip was that the pursuit had served as a distraction from the emptiness he felt from losing Richards so soon after falling for her. Even though he'd only known her a short while, he felt they had an instant connection, as if he'd known her a lot longer. Now that it was over, she kept finding a way back into his thoughts.

He took a swig of his beer as he walked into his living room. He was about to turn on the TV, for lack of anything better to do, when he heard a soft knock at his door. He opened it to find Tess standing on his front porch in the pouring rain.

"Mind if I come in?" she asked.

He opened the door wider. "Of course not."

She stepped inside and pulled down the fur-lined hood of her down jacket, exposing her long, blonde hair. There was an awkward silence between them. Stephenson wondered if he should invite her into the living room to sit down. She spoke before he could ask.

"I just wanted to say I'm sorry I didn't believe you when you told me there was nothing going on between you and Serena."

"What made you change your mind that I was telling the truth?"

"Adams. While you were in Australia, he told me the whole story. How you caught her cheating on you and then what happened that day she came to see you at the precinct. He also said you want nothing to do with her and are head over heels for me. Is that true?"

Adams never ceased to surprise him. Despite their differences at times, his partner always had his back. "Yes, it's true."

A slight smile surfaced on her lips, and he moved toward her.

"Why don't we start over? Maybe I take you to dinner over the weekend?"

"That sounds nice. How about after you watch the Super Bowl with me?"

"You have tickets?" he asked, taking a small step back.

She let out a laugh. "Sorry, no. My brother is having a Super Bowl party, even though they didn't make it. A bunch of his teammates will be there. Want to come?"

"Love to."

He moved toward her and placed a hand gently on either side of her face. He felt her hand on the lower part of his back, pulling him closer. Their lips met, and he didn't think about Dr. Leroy again for the rest of the night.

The End

WANT MORE?

Detectives Blake Stephenson and Tess Richards return in the next Emerald City Thriller. It was the perfect summer job—until it turned into her worst nightmare.

Click Here To Get The Summer Nanny

AUDREY J. COLE IS A registered nurse and a USA Today bestselling author of thrillers set in Seattle. Audrey lives in the Pacific Northwest with her husband and two children.

Get your FREE bonus content and deleted scenes, including an ALTERNATE ENDING to INSPIRED BY MURDER at AUDREYJCOLE.COM/sign-up.

Fractured is a limited time set. We hope you enjoyed this collection of Thirteen Medical and Psychological Thrillers.

If you haven't read all the stories, go back to the beginning and pick up another story.

THANK YOU FOR READING OUR BOOKS!

---

JUDITH LUCCI, FIONA QUINN, NICK THACKER, BRETT BATTLES, JENIFER RUFF, DAN ALATORRE, SUZANNE JENKINS, TAMARA FERGUSON, CHRIS PATCHELL,
A.J. SCUDIERE, EDWIN DASSO, ROBERT I. KATZ, and AUDREY J. COLE.

• • • •

Would you recommend this boxset to a friend?